THE DAY'S DOINGS OF A NOBODY—II.
FIGHTING FOR THE CROWN IN SHROPSHIRE
ERASMUS' "DE COPIA"
CORRESPONDENCE
REVI WS
SYLVANUS URBAN'S NOTEBOOK
THE CASTROS OF LENOS LEARNED SOCIETIES
REVIEW OF THE MONTH
OBITUARIES
SHORT NOTICES OF RECENT PUBLICA-TIONS
TYPOGRAPHICAL NOTES ON SOME NEW BOOKS
GARDEN NOTES

Published in the middle of the month at the office of THE OBSERVER, 125 Strand, London, W.C., and of all Booksellers.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expenses when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr.
GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

H. R. ALLENSON'S CHOICE BOOKS FOR EASTER.

EVERLASTING LOVE AND OTHER SONGS OF SALVATION.
By DORA GREENWELL. New volume in "The Heart and Life Booklets." 6d., 1s., and 2s. net.

GREAT SOULS AT PRAYER.

India paper, P.G., 2s. 6d. net; thick paper, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

DAILY MESSAGE FROM MANY MINDS

India paper, P.G., 2s. 6d. net; thick paper, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

BROWNING'S EASTER DAY.

"Heart and Life" Booklets. 6d., 1s., and 2s. net.

PHILLIPS BROOKS' EASTER SERMON

"Heart and Life" Booklets. 6d., 1s., and 2s. net.

JOHN TAULER: Life and Sermons.

By Miss WINKWORTH. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

MADAME GUYON. By T. C. UPHAM. 6s.
Introduction by W. R. INGE.

"MR. JOWETT AT HIS BEST."

BROOKS by the TRAVELLER'S WAY.

Twenty-six Addresses by J. H. JOWETT, M.A. 3s. 6d.

THIRSTING FOR THE SPRINGS.

Twenty-six Addresses by J. H. JOWETT, M.A. 3s. 6d.

THE GOLDEN WINDOWS.

Allegorical Stories by LAURA E. RICHARDS. Crown
8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net. [New Edition just ready.]

CHOICE INDIA PAPER EDITIONS.

CARLYLE'S HEROES.

500 pages. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; paste grain leather, 2s. 6d.
net.

BROWNING'S AURORA LEIGH.

490 pages. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; paste grain leather, 2s. 6d.
net.

THE BRITISH WEEKLY says: "We have never seen a more tasteful or attractive edition of these most popular books."

London: H. R. ALLENSON, LTD., Racquet Court,
Fleet Street, E.C.

Publishers' Media.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 of 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes.
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art,
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Spectacularly dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S.

appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."
Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER

ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY AND WEEKLY.

The Liverpool Courier is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS PAGE EVERY FRIDAY

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

In Pocket size (pott 8vo), cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt top, 3s. net.

THE POCKET GEORGE MACDONALD.
Being a Choice of Passages from his Works made by ALFRED H. HYATT. Uniform with The Pocket R.L.S. and The Pocket Richard Jefferies.

"A dainty little volume, containing a selection of passages illustrative of the wise, genial, and elevating philosophy of the dead poet and novelist. Mr. Hyatt has chosen well from among the many-hued and sweet-scented products of Mac-Donald's genius."—GLASGOW HERALD.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH SEAS.

By CLEMENT L. WRAGGE, F.R.G.S. With 84 Illustrations.

"Well informed, gossipy, and light. . . . It is so animated, so fresh, and so well illustrated that it will both inform and interest every one curious as to the present state and prospects of the islands in the South Seas."—SCOTSMAN.

"Will fascinate. Mr. Wragge has a wonderfully observant eye, and can render his impressions convincing. . . . Humour and pathos are excellently mingled. . . . Deeply impressive."
MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

LITERARY RAMBLES IN THE WEST OF ENGLAND. By ARTHUR L. SALMON.
With a Frontispiece.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

MARA: A Study of an Unconventional Woman. By CHRIS HEALY, Author of "Heirs of Reuben."

"Messrs. Chatto & Windus will issue 'Mara,' by Mr. Chris Healy, whose 'Confessions of a Journalist' was well noticed a couple of seasons ago. Mr. Healy was somewhat unlucky with his workshop novel, 'The Endless Heritage,' last spring, which appeared a year before the great Labour revival. One of its chief interests is the fact that it is perhaps the only novel about the workshop written by a man who has worked at the bench as a manual workman. Mr. Healy breaks new ground, however, in his latest work, for 'Mara,' in addition to a series of pictures of East Anglian workhouse life, gives a realistic sketch of Salvation Army rescue work. The fact that, in order to secure accuracy and true 'local colour' in 'Mara,' the author slept in common lodging-houses and Salvation Army Shelters, and rubbed shoulders with that fascinating, almost hopeless class of vagabondry which aimlessly drifts through life, would suggest further realistic touches in Mr. Healy's new book."

A MENDER OF NETS. By WILLIAM
MACKAY, Author of "The Popular Idol."

[March 22.]

IN THE ROARING FIFTIES. By EDWARD
DYSON, Author of "The Gold-Stealers."

HUGO: A Fantasia on Modern Themes.
By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "The Grand Babylon Hotel."

"A clever story, breathlessly exciting, and up to date to the last degree. There are plenty of emergencies in Mr. Bennett's ingenious plot, which never for a moment loosens its grip of the reader's amused attention. . . . The author has told his tale with marked ease and success, and will assuredly reap the reward of popularity."—GLOBE.

NATURE'S VAGABOND, etc. By COSMO
HAMILTON, Author of "Duke's Son," etc.

"Mr. Cosmo Hamilton writes with the air of one to whom writing is a relaxation, and sets his persons upon the stage. . . .
because their good points and their bad points, their seriousness and their frivolity, their antics and their aspirations, are all living and delightful to his mind, and for their own sake deserve chronicling. Therefore these persons are as excellent company for the reader as they were for the writer himself. In 'Nature's Vagabond' he portrays a hero whom everybody in the story dotes on almost to foolishness, and who yet exercises an equal fascination over the reader."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

FOR LIFE—AND AFTER. By GEORGE R.
SIMS (Dagonet). SECOND IMPRESSION

"Mr. George R. Sims has never done better than in 'For Life—and After,' never, never done better. . . . A most remarkable popular melodrama. . . . From the very first page we have a pleasurable sensation of thrilling excitement to come, and we are not disappointed. . . . Every page has one of those imperishable clichés which adorn the popular novelist's art, and every young novelist who wishes to become popular should study the art of this book under the microscope."—SPEAKER.

THE FREEMASONS: a Novel of the Craft.
By L. S. GIBSON. SECOND IMPRESSION

NEW VOLUMES OF THE
ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

Immediately. Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net per vol.; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net per vol.

TAINÉ'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITE-RATURE. Translated by H. VAN LAUN.
A New Impression in 4 pocket-size volumes, with 32 Portraits.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS,
111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S SPRING NOVELS are having an unusual success, and nearly all are in Second or Third Editions.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish on March 22 a delightful NEW NOVEL, by Mrs. FULLER-MAITLAND, Author of "Pages from the Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre." It is entitled BLANCHE ESMEAD.

They have just published a New Volume, LOAVES AND FISHES, by BERNARD CAPES, and a highly interesting Collection of Letters by Mrs. STEVENSON, the mother of Robert Louis Stevenson, entitled LETTERS FROM SAMOA, 6s. net. They cover her life with her distinguished son in Samoa up to his death in 1894.

MESSRS. METHUEN would call particular attention to the New Volumes now ready in METHUEN'S STANDARD LIBRARY, a series of the great Classics of all Nations in SIXPENNY VOLUMES.

Kindly write for Messrs. METHUEN'S Spring Illustrated Announcement List and their New Bulletin

GENERAL LITERATURE.

READINGS ON THE INFERNO OF DANTE, chiefly based on the Commentary of BENVENUTO DA IMOLA. By the Hon. WILLIAM WARREN-VERNON, M.A. With an Introduction by the Rev. Dr. MOORE. In 2 vols. crown 8vo, 15s. net. Second edition.

MACEDONIA. By H. N. BRAILSFORD. With many Illustrations and two Maps. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"At last we have a book in which the most crying problem of the Near East is discussed and explained with entire clearness and a minute and personal knowledge such as no previous writer on the subject has possessed. For a long time to come, the book before us is likely to be the one authority upon the vital question of Macedonia. It is to this that all who wish to understand the situation of that unhappy region in its reality will have to turn, and the thing is done with such mastery of style and arrangement that even readers who have no special knowledge of the subject will find here a work of most attractive interest."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

A BOOK FOR A RAINY DAY. By JOHN THOMAS SMITH. Edited by WILFRED WHITTEN (John o' London of T. P.'s Weekly). With 48 Illustrations, wide demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A good old book much quoted by writers on London, in a modern dress.

"One of the most delightful of London books."—GLOBE.

"A vastly entertaining book."—MORNING POST.

"Full of interest at nearly every page."—T. P.'s WEEKLY.

THE MANOR AND MANORIAL RECORDS. By NATHANIEL J. HONE. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

[Antiquary's Books.

"Mr. Hone is a model of lucidity and interest."—MORNING LEADER.

"One of the best popular accounts of a very interesting but little understood institution."—STANDARD.

SIR WALTER SCOTT. By G. LE G. NORGATE. Fully Illustrated, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The "Life of Sir Walter Scott" treats of its subject both as man and author, and is in many important respects different from any other Biography at the service of present-day readers. Whilst Lockhart's great work, the "Letters" and the "Journal" have been freely utilised, notable particulars have been drawn, not merely from contemporary writers, but from memorials and recollections only given to the world in recent years. Abbotsford and the Scott country have been specially visited, and interesting details are given as to their condition at the present time. In the volume are collected fresh facts about Scott not to be found elsewhere. The illustrations are carefully collected from authentic and trustworthy sources. An entirely novel feature is a monograph on Scott as a lawyer by Francis Watt, Barrister-at-Law.

ABOUT ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

LETTERS FROM SAMOA. By Mrs. M. I. STEVENSON. Arranged by M. C. BALFOUR. With 12 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

These final letters of Mrs. M. I. Stevenson cover the period of her life in Samoa up to the death of her son (R. Louis Stevenson) in 1894. They are full of interesting pictures of the island and of the Samoans, as well as of the home life of Vailima itself. The illustrations are unusually intimate and interesting.

HOW TO IDENTIFY OLD CHINESE PORCELAIN. By Mrs. WILLOUGHBY HODGSON, Author of "How to Identify Old China." With 40 Illustrations, small demy 8vo, 6s.

"It is a book for the beginner, and is quite admirable. It is extremely well illustrated."—MORNING POST.

"A book of value and importance to all amateurs and connoisseurs."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"Well arranged and full of information."—SCOTSMAN.

"Mrs. Hodgson discourses in a delightful way on her subject."—BIRMINGHAM POST.

DEVELOPMENT AND DIVINE PURPOSE. By VERNON F. STORR, M.A., Lecturer in the Philosophy of Religion in Cambridge University; Examining Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury; formerly Fellow of University College, Oxford. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

An endeavour to analyse the conception of evolution or development, and to show that it includes the idea of purpose. The argument from design, as set forth by Paley, and criticised by Darwin, is examined and restated. The distinction between the organic and inorganic is investigated. Canons or principles for interpreting and testing a process of development are suggested. The final conclusion is that evolution in nature is Divine purpose at work.

THOUGHTS FOR THE DAY. Arranged by R. MUDIE SMITH. Fcap. 8vo 3s. 6d. net.

THE IRON TRADE. By STEPHEN JEANS. Illustrated, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Books on Business.

CHRIST IN ART. By Mrs. HENRY JENNER. With 40 Illustrations, demy 16mo, 2s. 6d. net. [Little Books on Art.

INTRODUCTION TO THE DEVOUT LIFE. By ST. FRANCIS DE SALES. Translated by T. BARNES, M.A. Small pott 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net. [The Library of Devotion.

A PRIMER OF RELIGION. By W. J. OLDFIELD, Canon of Lincoln. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. This book is based on the Catechism of the Church of England, and is for use in families.

TO-DAY. By J. G. WRIGHT. Demy 16mo, 1s. 6d. net. A small volume of thoughts for each day.

UTOPIA, and POEMS. By Sir THOMAS MORE. Paper, 6d. net; cloth 1s. net. [Methuen's Standard Library.

CRANFORD. By Mrs. GASKELL. Paper, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net. [Methuen's Standard Library.

A SERIOUS CALL TO A DEVOUT AND HOLY LIFE. By WILLIAM LAW. Paper, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net. [Methuen's Standard Library.

THE REPUBLIC OF PLATO. Translated by SYDENHAM & TAYLOR. Paper, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net. [Methuen's Standard Library.

FICTION.

THIRD EDITION.

THE SCHOLAR'S DAUGHTER. By BEATRICE HARRADEN.

Author of "Ships that Pass in the Night." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It has all Miss Harraden's old strength, pathos, and insight, and the character-drawing is superb."—MORNING LEADER.

"Briskly and dramatically written, with much quiet pathos and quaint humour."—SKETCH. "The hand of the artist and the effect of the art that hides art are to be recognised in 'The Scholar's Daughter.' The book contains effective characterisation, and the adroitness with which the delicate mechanism is handled commands admiration."—MORNING POST.

THIRD EDITION.

THE PORTREEVE. By EDEN PHILLIPOTS. Author of "The Secret Woman." With a Frontispiece by A. B. COLLIER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"This powerful tale moves like a river through the moorlands."—STAR.

"Its characters are vitalised, and their passions touch and quicken and sadden the reader in the same way that the Dartmoor scenery affects him."—DUNDEE COURIER.

"Every figure in the book is alive; Ilet and Dodd, in particular, are magnificent creations A fine book."—MORNING LEADER.

"Powerful and entralling and full of genuine human nature."—OUTLOOK.

"Once more Mr. Phillipotts has depicted exceptional characters motivated by the stronger emotions, the passions that give occasion for episodes dramatic."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Amid this finely conceived setting of quiet homesteads and ragged scenery move the characteristic country people whom Mr. Phillipotts so well knows how to draw."—DAILY NEWS.

SECOND EDITION.

THE MAYOR OF TROY. By "Q" (A. T. QUILLER-BOUCH),

Author of "Hetty Worsley," "Dead Man's Rock," Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It is a merry story, rich with the fragrance of the sea, and overflowing with the quaint humours of an earlier day."—DAILY NEWS.

"All Mr. Quiller-Couch's literary qualities are present here, and all at their highest."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Immensely enjoyable, with plenty of well-imagined action, plenty of keenly-noted character, plenty of fun, good writing, and atmosphere."—OUTLOOK.

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

LOAVES AND FISHES. By BERNARD CAPES. Crown 8vo, 6s.

DURHAM'S FARM. By C. C. YELDHAM. Crown 8vo, 6s.

This story, the scenery of which is laid in the Weald of Kent, describes the struggles of a clever, determined girl of twenty to save her invalid father from ruin. Finding circumstances too strong for her to compass this by legitimate means, she is tempted to commit a daring act of crime, for which she means eventually to make restitution, but that almost immediately brings about a wholly unforeseen catastrophe for herself. For this she finds herself bound at all costs, even if by confession and publicity, to save herself. In the end, by means entirely unsuspected, ruin is averted, and she and her father are made happy.

SECOND EDITION.

THE PATHWAY OF THE PIONEER. By DOLF WYLLARDE

Author of "Uriah the Hittite." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A strong human interest pervades the book from the first line to the last, and through it all there runs a vein of genuine sympathy."—TRIBUNE.

"Sincere, forceful, and singularly impressive."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"A romance of infinite variety put before us with vigour, with vibrating sympathy, and with no little artistic perception."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

SECOND EDITION.

THE HIGH TOBY. By H. B. MARRIOTT-WATSON, Author of

"Twisted Eglantine." With a Frontispiece by C. A. SHEPPERSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A delightful set of stories. Dick, the hero, is swift and strong, brilliant in device, reckless and fortunate in danger."—MORNING POST.

"A doubly delightful volume to those who like good stories, and like to have these stories told well."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

SECOND EDITION.

ROSE AT HONEYPOOT. By MARY E. MANN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A story full of human as well as of topical interest. Mrs. Mann is a faithful observer; she realises acutely the limitations and the strength of the rustic intellect; and she has humour. The narrative abounds in charm as well as in surprising strokes of realism."—SPECTATOR.

A story of varied and continuous charm. Upon Lorry Faraday Mrs. Mann has lavished all her sympathy and skill, while Rose, with her sweetness, her allure, and her touches of irresponsibility, is admirably felt."—TIMES.

VICTORY. By Mrs. L. T. MEADE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Only Mrs. Meade could have written this book."—OUTLOOK.

"Full of those domestic touches in which the authoress excels."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

THE SCAR. By FRANCIS WARRINGTON DAWSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A fine strong story of which the setting possesses hardly less interest than the characters or the action."—EVENING STANDARD.

"The author has a remarkable faculty for description, and the life of old Virginia is set forth with a most skilful and minute vividness. Power permeates the whole story."—WORLD.

THE SEA MAID. By RONALD MACDONALD. With a Frontispiece by E. R. HUGHES. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Here without question is an excellent novel, blended of adventure, romance, farce, and clever characterisation in just the right proportions. We have rarely read so delightful a romance or enjoyed one better."—GUARDIAN.

"A rollicking story. Extremely fresh and entertaining."—OBSERVER.

THE GREAT MASSACRE. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. 6d.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	253	The Drama : . . . .
Literature : . . . .		En Revenants de la Revue . . . .	262
A New Life of Sir Walter . . . .	256	Fine Art : . . . .
A Realist of the Aegean . . . .	257	Mr. Baillie's Flower-show . . . .	263
Rabelais . . . . .	258	Music : . . . .
A New Mythology . . . . .	259	On Extempore Playing . . . .	264
The Fighters . . . . .	259	Forthcoming Books . . . .	265
A Literary Caserle : . . . .		Correspondence . . . .	266
The Novel of Manners . . . .	260	Books Received . . . .	267
Fiction . . . . .	261	The Bookshelf . . . .	269

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE appeal of Bodley's Librarian for £1700 to complete the purchase of the Turbutt Shakespeare is one that Oxford men must not allow to pass unsatisfied; and here bis dat qui cito dat, for on March 31 the chance is gone and the book sails for America, unless a total of £3000 is forthcoming. A full account of the volume and its history may be found in the ACADEMY of July 15 last, or in the illustrated monograph which Bodley's Librarian will send on demand to any one "who might possibly make a contribution of importance."

It is not a case of securing an unique book for the Bodleian, but of restoring to the Bodleian a book that once belonged to it. "But the Bodleian got rid of it." True; but two and a half centuries ago, before it came to be of value. Now help is asked to buy it back again, and the appeal is one that should be supported, first and foremost by those who owe what some of us owe to the Bodleian; and then by all English people who wish to keep English treasures in England. No help is asked of the Government—rightly or not we are not concerned to say; but a subscription list has been opened at Messrs. Barclay's Old Bank, Oxford, and we would urge on all Oxford men the duty of sending what they can, however little. We may mention that £3000 is not the sum fixed by Mr. Turbutt; it is the sum he has been offered—and is perfectly justified in accepting; though it is true that Mr. Edmund Gosse wants to know (merely in the Rosa Dartle manner, of course) who it is that has offered it.

The poverty of the Bodleian is a standing but a genuine cause of complaint. All Souls College, in stating that it will contribute this year £1000, issues a warning that it "may not always be possible for us to keep an annual contribution up to this level." And munificence alone has enabled the Curators to do the valuable work now in progress in preserving the pictures in its picture-gallery. Will no millionaire be so obliging as to die and leave his fortune to the Bodleian?

"Venus—At Home" was the title commonly given to the reception held last Tuesday at the New Gallery by the National Art Collections Fund. The Rokeby lady was there—and it was a full-dress occasion. Now she has been handed over to the Nation: she ought to have been taken to Trafalgar Square in a kind of Cimabue procession; with Lord Balcarres and his coadjutors in the van and in the rear a corps of American millionaires with Stars-and-Stripes reversed. Amid the general pæan there would have been one voice—not so much dissentient as interrogatory—the voice, again, of Mr. Edmund Gosse, asking, with complete justification, who? why? what? Meanwhile there is a rumour that the "Nelson Memorandum" sold to Mr.

Sabin at Christie's on Wednesday will go to America, unless the Trustees of the British Museum will give him the £3600 he paid for it.

After nearly three centuries of existence in one spot the Old Central Library, King Street, Bristol, is now passing to a more palatial home in the new building next to the Cathedral, the splendid gift of an omnivorous reader—the late Vincent Stuckey Lean, who bequeathed £50,000 to the City for that purpose. In the year 1613 Mr. Robert Redwood, a wealthy citizen, gave his "lodge near the Marsh" for a library for the citizens. One of the first to supplement his generous gift was an old Bristolian, Dr. Tobias Matthew, Archbishop of York.

With varying fortunes the library survived the storm and stress of the Stuart and Puritan times until 1773, when an important event occurred in its history, its amalgamation with the newly started Library Society, the first of whose patrons was Edmund Burke; he gave twenty guineas to its funds and next year was elected to represent "the second city in the kingdom." Nearly a quarter of a century later two young men were to be seen almost daily ascending the old oak staircase (still existing) to slake their thirst for knowledge—S. T. Coleridge and Robert Southey. The unique registers are still carefully preserved wherein are recorded the books they borrowed and signed for in their own autograph.

There, too, at a later period came their friend Humphry Davy the chemist, who arrived in 1798 to superintend the Pneumatic Institution at the Hotwells, founded by the celebrated Dr. Beddoes; whilst Joseph Cottle, the publisher of the "Lyrical Ballads," John Tobin of "Honeymoon" fame, and Richard Champion, the Bristol potter, were also borrowers. So, too, was Landor, a tangible proof of whose constant borrowing exists in a copy of his "Pericles and Aspasia" bearing the inscription in his autograph that it was presented to the Library by reason of the courtesy shown him. Maria Edgeworth, who lived in Clifton during the closing years of the eighteenth century, mentions in one of her letters that her father has been making use of the Library.

We have before us as good a specimen of library cataloguing, on a comparatively small scale, as we have ever seen—the catalogue of the books in the lending library of the public library at Gravesend, compiled by the Librarian, Mr. Alex. J. Philip. The library is composed of between six and seven thousand volumes, and the printed catalogue runs to about a hundred and thirty pages. It is at once an index of authors and titles and a subject index, and having tested it in various ways we are able to pronounce it admirably lucid, helpful and accurate. In certain cases brief descriptive notes of books with obscure and misleading titles are given—a very useful plan, which, we gather, would have been followed more completely had space and cost permitted. Under certain authors (e.g., Shakespeare) we find a list of the books about him and his works, preceding the list of his own writings. A reader of ordinary intelligence who had only a hazy idea of what he wanted, or had no idea at all, could tell at a glance what there was in the library on his subject, or what was the particular book he required; and the whole catalogue speaks highly for the thoroughness and ardour which characterise the work of borough librarians.

There is incontrovertible evidence that the centralisation of public libraries, which was first mooted some years ago, is nearing either its realisation, or its rejection for many years to come. The matter is the subject of the next meeting of the Library Association, and, no doubt, this will result in some definite action for legislation; in fact, an omnibus library bill is already foreshadowed. The proposal, which is very ably sketched out in a brochure before us ("Library Grouping," by Lawrence Inkster, Borough Librarian of Battersea, published by the Aberdeen University Press), suggests that the County Councils shall be the library authorities for villages and the rural districts, while the control of the whole of the libraries of London would be centred in the London County Council. The writer draws attention to the many and vexatious anomalies existing in London, to the large rural districts in the counties where books are rare, and to the want of co-operation with the schools. But he is scarcely fair when he states that "the place of the public library in the system of national education . . . is not yet recognised even by those who are directly interested." What is required to promote efficient combination with the educational system is not one administrative authority for both schools and libraries, although County Councils might well be the representative authorities, but the alteration of the Education Act making it possible for Education Committees to contribute to the funds of public libraries for the purpose of school libraries without acquiring exclusive property in any of the books. It must not be forgotten that the public library cannot become a school adjunct and still fulfil its mission, which, although we agree with the writer in describing it as primarily an educational one, is not only that but much more.

Copyrights will expire, we know, and in these days of eager reprinting it is natural and creditable that all haste should be made in reproducing good books. But we cannot commend the reproduction of inferior versions of books that are still easily accessible, and in a particular case under our notice we are strongly of opinion that the issue of a reprint will not redound to the credit of the publisher. We have before us a reprint of Palgrave's Golden Treasury of English lyrics. The first edition of that work was published in 1861; Palgrave himself lived to bring out the second edition in 1891, and the book was again revised and enlarged in 1904. The publisher of the reprint before us had to go back to the edition of 1861. He had the sense to engage a clever editor to do the work for him; and the volume contains a well-chosen selection from the works of poets who were living when Palgrave made his compilation. But what is the total result?

We have examined the first two "Books" in each volume, and find that the Golden Treasury, 1904, contains no less than thirty-five numbers that do not appear in the reprint; while the reprint contains eighteen that are not in the Golden Treasury, 1904. So that, even on numerical strength, the older publication is the better in just that portion of our literature where lyrics are less easily accessible. We can all read the songs of Rossetti, Tennyson, and Matthew Arnold in our Rossetti, our Tennyson, or our Arnold. It is less easy to get at Elizabethans and Carolines.

In point of quality there can be no comparison. The editor of the reprint has given in the first part of an Appendix some few poems not known in 1861, or for some reason not included, and his Books I. and II. contain things that were omitted from later editions of the Golden Treasury. Thus, under one heading or another, we have Spenser's Epithalamion, Constable's Diaphenia, Bacon's "The world's a bubble," and other good things. But there is nothing among them all to compare with the poems which the Golden Treasury, 1904, includes and the reprint does not: the Vaughans, the Marvell, Waller's "Go, lovely rose"; Cowley's "Death of Mr. William Hervey"; Greene's "Weep not, my wanton"; Lodge's "Rosalind's Madrigall"; Herrick's "Corinna's Maying," and, best of all, Ariel's song, and "Come unto these yellow sands," from The Tempest. The reprint lacks, too, Palgrave's preface, notes, and list of authors. From every point of view it is inferior to its original. From no point of view is it the kind of publication which we should have expected or can welcome from those responsible for it.

It was not (as we shrewdly suspected) Mr. A. E. W. Mason, of Coventry, who asked the question in the House about Mr. William Le Queux's new story. There were obvious reasons why Mr. Mason's mouth should be closed on such a topic; but it was (we are glad to see) another man of letters, though not a novelist, Mr. R. C. Lehmann, who took upon himself at the earliest possible moment a delicate and unpleasant duty. It is upon men of letters, artists, and other apostles of agreement between nations that the duty falls first and foremost of doing all in their power to check the production of inflammatory material; and we are happy in having in so high a place so ardent a supporter of peace as the member of Parliament who will call attention to a story which he has not yet read.

Our sympathies and convictions are entirely on the side, in this matter, of Mr. Lehmann and the Prime Minister. We should be glad to see strong measures taken to repress the publication of jingoistic stories about wars and battles, which, instead of gloating over, we should shrink from with horror. The good sense and good taste of British people, to which the Premier looks for relief, are agents that, as yet, have not proved their efficiency. But, of course, all this may have nothing to do with Mr. Le Queux and his story. We have not read it, and are quite prepared to hear that the Peace Society has secured the rights of bringing it out in pamphlet form.

We have discovered in a (foreign) publisher's "puff" of a forthcoming book a new version of cacoethes scribendi. The power of the attack on the Conventionalism of the Church, we read, will "make the pens of opponents itch." The pen we are writing with scratches, but —

Gravesend appears to be on the verge of an interesting Dickens discovery. In the little village of Chalk, some two miles distant, on the main road to Rochester, lies the house in which, in 1836, Dickens spent his honeymoon. On the authority of Laman Blanchard, who, at the time of Dickens's residence at Gadshill, was stopping at Rosherville, on the other side of Gravesend, Kitton in "Dickens Country" gives an illustration of a comparatively large house, known as "The Manor House," at the corner of Thong Lane, on the south side of the main road, which, he says, is the one at which the novelist stopped. Blanchard is quite clear upon the subject. "Here," he says, "the brisk walk of Charles Dickens was always slackened, and he never failed to glance meditatively for a few moments at the window of a corner house on the southern side of the road. . . . It was in that house he lived immediately after his marriage, and there many of the earlier chapters of Pickwick were written."

It appears, however, that the house in question was at that time, in the occupation of a well-to-do French surgeon, M. Lereaux, who was not under any necessity of "taking in" boarders, and who had, besides, several daughters. Perhaps the most conclusive proof, however, is that, in the memory of several of the inhabitants of Chalk, a newly married couple spent their honeymoon at a cottage on the northern side of the road in April 1836, the exact date at which Dickens spent his honeymoon there. A further piece of circumstantial evidence, if possible more convincing still, is that the then landlady of the old-fashioned cottage was named Craddock, and Mr. Pickwick, when visiting Bath, lodged with a woman of the same name.

It is announced that Mr. Granville Bantock has undertaken to write for the Birmingham Triennial Musical Festival a choral work, the subject of which is FitzGerald's Omar. We wish that he had not. Not that we doubt his making a very beautiful piece of music, but because FitzGerald's work has its own rhythms which sing themselves in the mind; and it will be inevitable that, once the music has been heard, the recollection of it will come between the mind and the rhythms of the poetry. Already there are parts of the poem which we cannot say over to ourselves without the intrusion of a tune. A "song-cycle" has been made of it; and now whenever we think, for instance, of "O Moon of my delight," we catch ourselves putting it thus: "Ooooo Mooon of my-y-y-y delight that knooo-owst no wane"—in the rhythms not of the poem, but of the music.

Happy are those who do not "get tunes in their heads" and can hear music and forget it. Some of us cannot, and for that reason would rather avoid even such beautiful things as Sir Hubert Parry's "Blest pair of Sirens" and Dr. Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius." There are very few settings of poetry to music, which, like the popular versions of Herrick's "To Anthea," and some old hymns, notably "O God, our help in ages past," preserve almost exactly the rhythms and inflections of the poem. And while lovers of music may rejoice, lovers of poetry are sad when the musician comes between them and the more delicate art of the poet.

All the Heine stories are recalled by the public commemoration, in Paris, of the fiftieth anniversary of his death. The most pathetic is that of his meeting with Augustin Thierry at a time when the historian was blind and the poet, on his "mattress grave," was nearly paralysed. "In order that he might the better converse with Heine," says M. Jules Claretie, who had the details from an eye-witness, "the great historian of ancient France bent over him without seeing him, while Heine, in order that he might be able to see Thierry, lifted a fallen eyelid with an emaciated finger."

Heine was so bad a German that the proposal to erect a monument to him in Germany was, quite lately, forbidden by the Government. He had called himself "a liberated Prussian," and had spoken of Prussia as "the Tartuffe of nations," and that sufficed to get him put on the black list. What the Emperor William would not do, however, was done by the late Empress of Austria, by birth a Bavarian. In her splendid castle at Corfu a statue of Heine stands, overlooking the sea of which he sang so magnificently.

Though Heine loved France, his adopted country gave him a very bad wife in Mathilde Mirat, a typical Parisian grisette. A single trait suffices to depict that lady. Her husband, suffering agonies of pain, expressed the wish that he might die. "No, no, Henri," she pleaded, "you must not do that; you must not die. Only this morning my sweet parrot died, and if you were to die too I could not bear it." Heine himself used to tell the story. "You see," he said, "I have continued to live in obedience to orders. One must when so good a reason is given."

We have not yet read The Faithless Favourite, a mixed Tragedy, by Mr. Edwin Sauter, of which a copy has been sent to us by the author from Saint Louis, U.S.A.; but two things in what looks like either a very original or a very imitative volume have interested us. One is the very amusing "Catalogue of Flaws and Objections; or a handy syllabus for Zoilus," which he appends to his play. Here we find no less than 102 objections, set out in columns: we cull one or two: "The ha-ha-has are probably the most intelligible parts of the dialogue"; "The author . . . knows nothing of drama"; "He knows nothing of poetry"; "He knows nothing of history"; "Anile decrepitude"; "He might at least have ended happily—by stopping at the first scene!" This is much better than the usual apologetic preface: it must make the critics silent through sheer envy of the author's own destructive power. The other notable point in the book is the little bundle of "Schediasm." How many people could say, without looking at their Liddell and Scott what "Schediasm" is? It means—and we write with no desire to appear superior persons—"things written off-hand."

On Thursday, April 5, at 9 P.M., and Saturday, April 7, at 3.30 P.M., the New Stage Club will give, at the Bijou Theatre, Victoria Hall, Archer Street, Bayswater, performances of Villiers de L'Isle Adam's La Révolte (an English translation by Lady Barclay, published by Messrs. Duckworth) and The Fool of the World, a new Morality play by Mr. Arthur Symons. La Révolte is a play we have long been anxious to see acted. It was written in 1870, nine years before Ibsen's The Doll's House, and bears a strong resemblance to it. This was the play that contained a scene during which the clock struck all the hours and half-hours between one and four in the morning. Tickets may be obtained at the Box Office, Bijou Hall.

A suggestion was made in our columns some time ago to the effect that interpretive readings from the poets with illustrations and comments would be much better for an appreciative public than mere lectures upon them. We are able to announce that an experiment in this direction will be made by Professor Knight, who will give "Readings from Browning" in the Chelsea Town Hall on Monday next at three o'clock, and from Tennyson on Friday, March 23, at the same place. Tickets from Messrs. Truslove and Hanson, Sloane Street, or at the door.

At the last council meeting of the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers the following were elected Associates: S. Nicholson Babb, Paul W. Bartlett, W. L. Bruckman, A. S. Hartrick, Raven Hill, Sir Charles Holroyd, Gaston Latouche, Louis Legrand, Bertram Mackennel, A. D. Peppercorn, R. F. Wells, and I. Zuloaga. Mr. Timothy Cole was elected an honorary member.

The Musical Association.—The fifth meeting will be held on Tuesday, March 20, at the King's Hall, Messrs. Broadwood and Sons, Conduit Street, W., when a paper will be read by the Rev. G. R. Woodward, M.A., on "German Hymnody, from the Twelfth Century to the middle of the Seventeenth."

Royal Meteorological Society.—An ordinary meeting will be held at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster, on Wednesday, March 21, at 7.30 P.M., when a lecture will be delivered on "South Africa as seen by a Meteorologist," by Hugh Robert Mill, D.Sc., illustrated by slides from photographs taken during the tour of the British Association in 1905.

Royal Microscopical Society.—The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 21st inst, at eight P.M., when the following papers will be read: Mr. C. F. Rousselet, "A Contribution to our Knowledge of the Rotifera of South Africa"; Mr. E. M. Nelson, "On the Resolving Limits for the Telescope and the Microscope."

Royal Statistical Society.—The fifth ordinary meeting will be held on Tuesday, March 20, at 5 P.M., at the Society's rooms, 9 Adelphi Terrace, Strand, Paper to be read: "Statistics of Population and Pauperism in England and Wales, 1861-1901," by Professor C. S. Loch.

Royal Geographical Society.—Evening meeting, Monday, March 19, 8.30 P.M., at the Theatre, Burlington Gardens. Paper to be read: "The Economic Geography of Australia," by Professor J. W. Gregory, F.R.S.

LITERATURE

A NEW LIFE OF SIR WALTER

The Life of Sir Walter Scott. By G. LE GRYS NORGATE.
(Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

IT might be thought that a new Life of Sir Walter Scott was superfluous, but that written by Mr. Le Grys Norgate has a special feature which will render it of value to readers of the great novelist. The book might be described, in a phrase, as a collection of literary gossip about Sir Walter Scott. Opinions, no doubt, will differ as to its value, because the process of creation in the mind of the imaginative writer is one not clearly understood. The material on which a romancer works is the experience garnered by himself in the course of a life-time. Out of nothing, nothing is or can be made, but only the very poorest of the tribe attempt to paint their characters direct from Nature, that is, to make photographic copies of people they have known. The creation of a man like Dandie Dinmont, for instance, must be the result of much observation of the class to which he belongs. In his wanderings in search of material for his Border Minstrelsy, Scott was continually meeting such characters, and out of the features of many of them was constructed the sturdy Dandie. In the course of his narrative Mr. Norgate makes many references to characters in the Scott novels wherein the author seems to have portrayed himself. All those romantic and slightly moony youths with a dislike for practical affairs, a love of literature and a knack of turning verses, were, no doubt, drawn from one side of his character. He was to some extent, Waverley, and Alan Fairford; he was also Colonel Mantering. As Hogg said, the last was "just Walter Scott painted by himself." We are told with equal truth that he was Jonathan Oldbuck in "The Antiquary," but, as Mr. Norgate points out, Jonathan was also the "old friend of my youth," George Constable. Lockhart, however, held that here Scott was the half-conscious delineator of himself, and no one was in a better position to judge. Of course, such guess-work is futile. Sir Walter picked up a hint here and a hint there, and to complete his picture, working with the unconsciousness of the highest art, wove into his tissue such personal traits of his own as were suitable to complete the individuality. If we take the well-known character of Edie Ochiltree in the same novel, it may be quite true that the germ of the character was Andrew Gemmels, the splendid old military-looking beggar with whom Scott had often conversed in his youth, but it could only have been a germ. The filling-out and development of the gaberlunzie was due to the novelist's imaginative genius alone. In the same way the gypsy, Meg Merrilies, could only have been vaguely suggested by Jean Gordon, "the gigantic gipsy-queen who was ducked to death as a Jacobite at Carlisle by the mob, crying, 'Charlie yet!' with her last breath." The very incident itself shows that the character of Meg as it is developed in "Guy Mannering" must have been very different indeed from that of Jean Gordon. If it were desirable to carry the proof further, it would be an easy thing to do so by reference to the historical novels, where Scott had nothing but his reading to depend upon. Here, by the bye, our author's criticism is singularly weak. It is a matter of no consequence whatever that the Richard Cœur-de-Lion of "Ivanhoe" is not the historical Richard King of England. He is an authentic human being, and as such has a more vital existence in our minds than the actual personage who, even to the historical student, is little more than a name, or at any rate is like one of those vague figures seen in a distant landscape.

We do not know to what nationality Mr. Norgate belongs, but whatever be his place of birth he is patriotically, or rather provincially, Scottish in his predilections and will have it that Sir Walter Scott is never at his best except when depicting the scenery and characters of his native land. We do not think that this is so. Scott's strength as a novelist did not lie in his local colour, exquisitely as he uses it, but in a knowledge of human life that was as extensive, though not so profound, as Shakespeare's. Wherever he may locate his romance we always find that the characters in it are recognisable human beings with their weaknesses as well as their strength. Mr. Norgate is not quite just to "Ivanhoe."

If an Englishman naturally places Ivanhoe in the first rank, it is because he gets more pleasure from its perusal. The Scottish dialect, the Scottish character, must always present some difficulty to him, and obstruct that perfect sympathy and ease of apprehension necessary to full enjoyment in reading. Again, Scott had not that intimate acquaintance with and keen perception of the remote past of England that he had of the remote past of Scotland. Thus his touch is uncertain and his pictures vague and superficial. In a word Ivanhoe is a rollicking good story, but it is little more, and all modern critics will agree with Lockhart that as a work of genius it is inferior to Waverley, Guy Mannering, and The Heart of Midlothian.

Those of us who remember our first reading of the famous encounter in the lists at Ashby-de-la-Zouch and the inimitable scenes between King Richard and the hermit will not readily endorse this opinion. The truth is that "Ivanhoe" is the most perfect of the romances that Scott wrote, and yet, like almost every other work of his, it is to some extent spoiled by haste. Athelstan, the hero himself, Rowena, and even Cedric the Saxon are too little individualised, while the Templar and the other knights of the period lean to the side of the melodramatic. But in the best of his Scottish novels similar faults are to be found. In "Guy Mannering" we see Dirk Hatteraick, Glossop, the Gypsy and several other characters that are not well and truly drawn. In "The Heart of Midlothian" Madge Wildfire and her mother, Effie Deans and her lover, lack the vividness with which Jeannie Deans and the Laird of Dumbiedykes are thrown on the canvas. In "The Antiquary" Oldbuck himself and Edie Ochiltree are rendered inimitably, but the hero Lovel is a colourless personality. The German charlatan would have done for the transpontine theatre, and there is much that is more dead than alive in the novel, which, nevertheless, is of its kind unsurpassed. In "Rob Roy" Baillie Nicol Jarvie is inimitable, and we do not agree with our author's fault-finding in regard to Rob himself; but Rashleigh is the villain of the sensational romance, and there is much in the book that might have been improved by stern revision. Mr. Norgate thinks that "Peveril of the Peak" was a failure; yet it is curious how people like to read this novel, which has bulk and space in which to wander. Many good novelists also have held that "St. Ronan's Well" was a better novel than the ordinary reader gave it credit for being.

Another feature of this book to which attention may be directed is its topography. The author seems either to have followed in Scott's footsteps or to know the country very accurately. Probably he is mistaken when he assumes that few people know Orkney and Shetland, as these islands have become very popular resorts since Scott's time. If, however, the poems and novels were to be examined under the microscope, there would be found defects in them which our author has not noticed. Scott was in the habit of drawing a landscape with broad sweeps of the brush and of neglecting detail. Nothing could be better than his rendering of the salient features of the scene of "Marmion," but it would be difficult to fight the battle over again with no other help than "Marmion"; and we say that while recognising that the description of the fight is one of the greatest battle-pieces in all literature and it has a spirit and energy that would have done no discredit to Homer. Nor do we blame Scott because he did not seek to be as accurate as a geographer. A work of fiction is a work of art, and natural scenery, like human beings, is only the suggestion on which the writer works. His business in the end is to make a world of dream and to people it with dream figures, and the final test of his excellence lies in the fidelity with which, while giving imagination rein, he holds the mirror up to nature.

A REALIST OF THE AEGEAN

A Realist of the Aegean. Being a verse translation of the Mimes of Herodas. By HUGO SHARPLEY, M.A., late Scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. (Nutt.)

THE discovery of the Mimes of Herodas in an Egyptian papyrus in 1891 was a piece of good fortune hardly less than that which had just given us that ancient and valuable tract on "The Constitution of Athens" ascribed by most critics (but wrongly in our opinion) to the sage of Stagira. The mime seems to have been invented by Sophron from whom Herodas (probably 300-250 B.C.) and his slightly older contemporary, Theocritus, borrowed largely. The editors and translators of Herodas—Kenyon, Rutherford, Nairn, Headlam—speak in high terms of his genius, but we own that we find his work, in the form in which it is presented to us, decidedly second-rate. We are so much accustomed to associate Hellenic art with supreme success in everything attempted by it, that we can hardly bear to open our eyes to vulgarity and dull grossness. The mimes are as full of proverbs as Petronius and of bawdry as Aristophanes, but are unredeemed by the light touch of the Roman and the Athenian. The sixth mime is as dull as it is foul, and is hardly made palatable by a bit of clever realism at the beginning and another at the end. It takes the form—which seems to have been conventional when two housewives met—of detailing and bewailing the shortcomings of servants, and threatening them with punishment:

KORITTO.

Pray sit down, Metro. [To the servant] Now then, up you spring. And put a chair for the lady! Everything I've got to tell you: nothing will you do Of your own self, you good-for-nothing, you! You're not a slave, you're just a stone about The house; but, mind you, when the corn's dealt out, You count each crumb, and if but that much tumbles, Such a commotion all day long, such grumbles, The very walls can't stand it! Now, look there! You needs must scrub and polish up that chair Now when it's wanted, robber! You may bless This lady; but for her being here I'd dress You down most soundly!

METRO.

Ah, then you appear To be in the boat with me, Koritto dear, I grind my teeth all day and night, like you, At these vile creatures, aye and bark at 'em too Like any dog. Now for my special mission— Outside, you pests, you models of discretion— Ears and tongues only, all else holiday.

And at the end:

KORITTO.

Fasten the door securely, You poultry girl, and count the fowls up quick, To see we have not lost a single chick Throw them some corn. The bird-stealer will clap Hands on 'em though you nurse 'em in your lap.

The above extracts afford an average sample of the work of the poet and his translator, who is correct and literal, but by no means easy or fluent. The fact is, the mimes are not yet in a fit state for the exercise of the translator's art. The absence of Scholía is deeply felt in a work of this kind. In the extraordinary úyíeia passage (iv. fin.) it would be hard indeed to find this in the Greek:—

Please, just a little of the "healthy bread"! I'd always rather have a taste of it, Than get my proper portion. Just a bit!

In spite of some evidences of favourable appreciation by the ancient world, may we not venture to say that Herodas is but second-rate? Compare the conventional mistress-and-servant passage in the beginning of the Theocritean Adoniazusae, and observe the subtler characterisation of the elder poet, not to mention the superiority of the noble Doric hexameters over the creaking Ionic scazons disfigured in every line by prodelision and syniziesis and crasis. We learn from Aristophanes that there were poetasters in his time, and a recent discovery of a dithyramb by Timotheus of Miletus (which appears to have formed part of a libretto) shows us that Hellas had not only her Alfred Tennysons but her Alfred Bunnys. Timotheus calls oars "the long-necked hilly feet of the ship," that is "the long instruments of wood (growing on hills) which serve as means of motion to the ship." Jebb in the introduction to his Bacchylides translates part of this nome (the Persae), in which a drowning Persian upbraids the sea:—

Bold as thou art, ere now hadst thou thy boisterous throat bound fast in hempen bonds [alluding to the bridge over the Hellespont]. And now my king—aye mine—will plough thee with hill-born pines, and will encompass thy navigable plains with his far-roaming rays [i.e., the Persian king's power, radiant as the sun, will close round the Aegean on all its coasts]. O thou frenzied thing, hated from of old, that treacherously embracest me, while the breeze sweeps o'er thy surges.

Thus Timotheus in the end of the fifth century B.C. missed the mark. He was one of those who cannot see that "those who live in glass houses should not throw stones" fails to assume a dignity in

Let those in vitreous tenements who dwell
Forbear the flinty missile to propel.

So in the beginning of the fourth century Herodas falls very short of the successful characterisation which we expect from a Greek writer. In the first mime a grass-widow, being advised by her friend to console herself with a lover in her husband's absence, declines, but dismisses her visitor with a friendly glass of wine. And was there ever a mother like Metrotime in mime iii., who takes her son to the schoolmaster to be flogged and after he has been beaten black and blue will not let him off?

KOTTALOS (the boy).

Oh! Oh! How many more? It's agony.

SCHOOLMASTER.

How many! Ask your mother, don't ask me.

KOTTALOS.

Mamma, Mamma! How many? I declare—

METROTIME.

As many as your wretched hide will bear.

The scene is undramatic, unnatural, and very disagreeable. In the same mime, l. 61, τῇ Ἀκίσεω σεληναίῃ δείξοντες has never been explained. An ingenious suggestion is to read τὴν . . . σεληναίην, "the full moon," in the sense of pueriles. We now and then meet an interesting phrase or expression such as τριηκὰς ἡ μικρὴ, "Black Monday," the first day of school after vacation; σύμποδα πηδῦντα, "dancing in fetters"; πρόσω πιεῦσα, "drinking deep"; ρύγχος, "gob" (vulgarism for στόμα).

The passage ii. 44, 45, is as dark as the úyíeia crux. Mr. Sharpley seems on the whole to be nearest to a possible sense in following Dalmeida's rendering, "de peur que, comme dit le proverbe, on ne nous arrache à la fois cul et chemise":

[To the Usher.] And you, good sir, bung up the water-clock Until he's finish'd. Thales must not dock
Poor Battaros of "his last suit of clo'es
And what's beneath 'em," as the proverb goes.

Two good conjectures may be noticed unrecorded by (perhaps subsequent to) Mr. Nairn's edition. In iv. 47, Crusius' πανταχὴ λίθος κείσαι is condemned by the lack of an adversative particle, yet ἴσ' ἐγκείσαι will not do. Dr. Starkie's πανταχὴ δ' εἰκὸς κείσαι is abundantly defensible from Herodas himself; εἰκὸς, "a personified holiday," is a characteristic phrase for a lazy servant; ἐοπρὴ and ἑβδομή, "Sunday," are used in the same way. In vii. 54, for Crusius' ἰνηθείσας, "emptied," Professor Beare, of Trinity College, Dublin, suggests ἰανθείσας, "pleased." It is much more natural that a shopkeeper should express (whatever his real feelings might be) his desire that his lady customers should leave the shop "pleased, satisfied" (with their bargains) rather than "with empty pockets." It would be a great convenience if the number of the mime were printed at the top of the page, and this remark applies also to Mr. Nairn's edition.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

RABELAIS

Les Navigations de Pantagruel. Par ABEL LEFRANC. (Paris: Librairie Henri Leclerc, 12 fr.)

Hours with Rabelais. Edited by F. G. STOKES. (Methuen, 3s. 6d.)

IF anything were needed to prove the vitality of Rabelais's masterpiece, we might look for it in the tireless curiosity of scholars. Not even our own Shakespeare has suggested a vaster literature than the author of Gargantua. Not merely does there exist a Société des Etudes Rabelaisiennes, which during the last few years has performed an excellent task in comment and illustration, but serious studies follow one another from the press, whose sole aim is to throw fresh light upon the works of the Master. From all this it is clear that Rabelais is still a living influence, that he tempts the scholar as he entrances the man of letters, and that he belongs as intimately to the life of France as does Shakespeare to the life of England.

Here, for instance, is Professor Abel Lefranc devoting his acute intelligence and his profound erudition to the voyages of Pantagruel, and discussing the geography of Rabelais as though it were a matter of science rather than of romance. And an intensely interesting subject it is. It will be remembered that Rabelais, following the practice of Lucian and many others, sends his hero upon more than one imaginary voyage. In this voyage there is no little satire, no lack of reflection upon men and things, and the exploits of Pantagruel may easily be assumed to represent the enterprise and discovery of the sixteenth century. As Professor Lefranc says, Rabelais "was associated with all the fluctuations of the national life. Far more than has been supposed, his work is a reflection of contemporary history." That is perfectly true. Rabelais wrote under the impulse of a sincere scorn, inspired by what he saw around him, as well as with a serene hopefulness of a re-awakened spirit and energy. As he hated the monk, so he loved the traveller, and he regarded the heroes who crossed the seas as the saviours of his country. But, when we have said so much, we have said all that need be said, and we cannot but think that Professor Lefranc, in attempting to mark out the route followed by Pantagruel and to define the goal of his voyage, is taking his author all too seriously and is confusing what is really a collection of "flim-flam" stories with a weighty geographical treatise.

A few examples will make our meaning plain. Professor Lefranc identifies Dipsodie with Scythia, which, by an obvious play upon the Latin word, silis, may be translated as "the land of thirst." This ingenuity seems wholly alien from the method of Rabelais. He called his imaginary country Dipsodie, or the land of thirst, because his heroes were "noble and illustrious drinkers," to whom thirst was the first essential of life, provided only it might be satisfied. Again, Professor Lefranc is certain that Pantagruel's voyage was undertaken in search of the North-West Passage.

Thus Rabelais [says he] interested himself in the great question of polar circumnavigation; he gave it a place in his work, and this place he wished to be neither limited nor fortuitous. He adopted the perilous, passionately, jealously sought by the nations of Europe, and boldly made his hero realise it.

Surely this is not the spirit in which to approach the work of Rabelais? You cannot convert the author of Pantagruel into a stern historian without impairing his humour or dulling the echo of his whole-hearted laughter.

And Professor Lefranc carries this process a step further. He has no doubt whatever as to the identification of Xenomanes, who attended Pantagruel on his voyage. He was, says he, none other than Jean Fonteneau, called Alfonse le Saintongeais. Others have detected signs of Jean Bouchet in the same personage, and, if once we begin to discuss Pantagruel as a roman à clef, there will be no end to scholarly ingenuity. We prefer to remember the advice which Rabelais gives us in the epilogue of his second book, and to read his stories to make ourselves merry, "as in manner of pastime he wrote them."

Rabelais, then, represents, as none other represents, the wisdom and intelligence of contemporary France. He summed up in a single work the triumph of the Renaissance over monkish superstition. The new learning was as precious to him as the discovery of new lands. As America was an unknown continent of wealth and curiosity, so Greek was an unknown continent of learning. In "Gargantua" and "Pantagruel" you may find narrated all the aspirations and enterprises of the sixteenth century. But if you attempt to search for minute resemblances and literal interpretations, you will miss the true meaning and purpose of the Rabelaisian humour. However, if Professor Lefranc is disposed now and again to push his ingenuity too far, the value of his treatise is indisputable. In every chapter there are proofs of a unique erudition and of a rare sympathy. His discussion of the fifth book is a model of wisdom, and he detects in Rabelais a striking resemblance to Sir Thomas More, which has escaped the commentators. And while we would point out our disagreement with some of the Professor's conclusions, at the same time we commend his book to all students of Rabelais with perfect confidence.

If Professor Lefranc takes the text of Rabelais too seriously, Mr. Stokes errs on the other side. He treats the author and his text with a careless lack of restraint. He has made another attempt to bowdlerise a book which must always elude the attention of puritans. Not to read Rabelais is an achievement within the reach of all. To read him in snippets is to make a pretence, which can bring us neither pleasure nor profit. You may spend as many "hours" as you like with Rabelais under the auspices of Mr. Stokes, but you will learn little or nothing of the author or his meaning from these neatly purged pages. Now, Mr. Stokes deplores the grossness, which he says "sullies much of the work of the great Frenchman." Well, if it be grossness, it is both characteristic and essential, and there is one course only to follow, if grossness you think it, and that is to leave Rabelais alone. But is it grossness? According to the arbitrary convention of to-day, perhaps it is. To a stronger age it appeared nothing of the sort, and it seems to us the last act of absurdity to judge Rabelais by the timid standard of the twentieth century. It is our amiable practice to turn our faces away from the facts of life, and to pretend that the facts do not exist. Rabelais took a more wholesome view. He neither deceived himself nor others. Moreover, what Mr. Stokes calls "grossness" was necessary to the work which he set himself to accomplish. There were certain evils in the world, which he was determined to hold up to ridicule, and he could not accomplish this task, if he restricted his vocabulary, so that he might bring it into harmony with the traditions of a young ladies' academy. But the purpose of Rabelais appears to be immaterial, in Mr. Stokes's view. He has not only corrected the manners of Rabelais, and castigated the extravagant style of Urquhart and Motteux; he has also omitted and curtailed, wherever he thought fit. We are unable to detect any guiding principle in the process. We look in vain for many famous chapters, in which we had never detected the smallest rock of offence to puritanism. Why, for instance, should the chapter be omitted, in which is described the stable at the top of the castle? Why are we told nothing of Gargantua's games? Why may all men read "how Gargantua did eat up six Pilgrims in a salad," or "how the monk was feasted by Gargantua, and of the jovial discourse they had at supper"? And why may we not be told "why monks are the biggest outcasts of the world: and wherefore some have bigger noses than others?"

There are few more famous passages in the works of Rabelais than the passage in the prologue to Book iii, in which the author indites a panegyric to the bottle:

Ennais drinking wrote, and writing drank. Aeschylus, Plutarch in his Symposiacs merit any faith, drank composing, and drinking composed. Homer never wrote fasting, and Cato never wrote till after he had drunk.

Why is all this omitted? Is it that Rabelais must be proved to the world a teetotaler as well as a prude? We know as little as we know why Mr. Stokes has industriously pruned his author's redundancies. Rabelais delighted in expansions and repetitions. Such was his temperament, such was his humour. Mr. Stokes takes another view of literature, and we conclude he is resolved that nobody else shall be bored by what bores him. But in all this he forgets Rabelais, who, after all, had some purpose and some plan in writing his book. He did not sit down to cover paper with gibberish, which might just as well be away. And a grave injustice is done to the great man's memory by the timidity of a critic who thinks he can soften the asperities of Rabelais by ruthless omissions. The masterpieces of the past are not ours to hack at as we will, and Mr. Stokes would have been wiser had he refrained his hand from the masterpiece of Rabelais. Nor was he without a warning.

If you desire to be good Pantagruelists, that is to say, to live in peace, joy, health, making yourself always merry, never trust those men that always peep out at one hole.

Those are the men whom Mr. Stokes has trusted, and we reflect with a certain pleasure that when they have finished reading his "Hours with Rabelais" they will know no more of the master than when they first took up the book.

A NEW MYTHOLOGY

The Gods of Pegāna. By Lord DUNSANY. Illustrations by S. H. SIME. (Elkin Mathews, 5s. net.)

THE theme of this book is explained in the preface, which we quote entire:

There be islands in the Central Sea, whose waters are bounded by no shore and where no ships come—this is the faith of their people.

Lord Dunsany's original mythology is purely artistic in its aim. It must not be read as philosophy, for it does not seek to explain anything; it is not Utopian, for it contains no theory or practical suggestion; and it is unlike a fable, because it has no moral. Its structural ideas are formed deductively rather than derivatively: that is to say, they are the outcome not so much of an acquaintance with previous mythologies and theologies, as of an understanding of the human mind and an appreciation of the effect which certain unexplained phenomena have on many races of mankind at an early stage of civilisation. The author has placed himself in the position of one of these early thinkers, men who were seekers, not after God, nor, had they been analytical enough to realise it, after a reasonable explanation of the mysteries, but after some tale of beauty, whose constant repetition might make it easier for men to feel reconciled to the scheme of things. For everyday facts and ever-present conditions, which in their nakedness seemed cruel or meaningless, they invented mystical causes and marvellous origins; so that the natural fear and repulsion which many of the facts of life inspired might be partly overcome by the romantic charm of their explanations. Lord Dunsany's work, then, is infinitely more archaic in its essence than the "Contes Drolatiques," the "Imaginary Conversations," or the work of the modern German polyphonic revivalists in church music. On that account it is interesting. It is also remarkable intrinsically for simple and beautiful language, effective imagery and the poetical invention of the "belle menzogne," with here and there a spice of the most good-humoured satire. Schoolmasters might consider us dangerous reactionaries if we were to suggest that this would be a good book to read aloud to children: but be this as it may, great pleasure can be derived from its perusal by a grown man, who will read it as a little child, forgetful of Zeus, Odin and Jehovah, letting his fancy be stirred by the story of the elemental beings who compose the hierarchy of Pegāna, the dwelling-place of the gods.

Of these the chief is Mana-Yood-Sushai, who is inactive and hears no prayers; for, having made the small gods and the worlds, he rested and fell asleep. Before his feet sits Skarl, beating upon his drum; and if Skarl should cease to drum, then would Mana awake, and the worlds and gods which he had made would be no more. Among the gods of Pegāna it was Kib who created Life, and Mung who out of jealousy created Death. So the gods are still playing their game with Suns and Worlds and Men and Life and Death. Of the sayings of Kib the giver of Life, we must report the first and the last:

Kib said: I am Kib. I am none other than Kib. . . . Because this is written, believe! For is it not written, or are you greater than Kib? Kib is Kib.

This we may regard for the moment as the boast of Life, and set against it one of the sayings of Mung:

Mung said: Many turnings hath the road that Kib hath given every man to tread upon the Earth. Behind one of these turnings sitteth Mung.

One of the most sympathetic of the minor deities in Pegāna is the god of Mirth and Melodious Minstrels, who finds that the ways of the gods with men are strange and cannot understand them. He sent jests and a little mirth into the worlds. He bids men dance with him on clear nights or offer up a jest to him, but not to pray to him in their sorrow, for sorrow, although "it may be very clever of the gods," he does not understand.

There are many other gods in Pegāna, but it is time now to glance briefly at the second half of the book, which tells of the doings of certain mortals. Of these the most interesting are the various prophets which were upon the earth. Yonath, the first prophet, would not tell the people what they wanted to hear, as his gospel was: "Seek not to know." After his death men still desired knowledge, so they said to Yug:

Be thou our prophet, and know all things, and tell us concerning the wherefore of It All.

And Yug said: "I know all things." And men were pleased. And Yug said of the Beginning that it was in Yug's own garden, and of the End that it was in the sight of Yug.

And men forgot Yonath.

But the fate of this prophet was like that of many of his successors. He saw Mung making the sign of Mung, and became among the Things that Were. One among the prophets is remarkable because, instead of praying and expounding in the usual manner, he built a tower, on the top of which he used to curse Mung every day. But Mung revenged himself by refusing to make his Sign against him, and still from a heap of bones at the foot of a ruined tower goes up the voice of the prophet crying in the wind for the mercy of Mung. Another prophet, the greatest that had yet existed, dared to speak of death to the King, with the result which may be imagined. "And there arose prophets in Aradec who spoke not of death to Kings."

A word must be said for the excellent grotesques of Mr. S. H. Sime, who has entered admirably into the spirit of the text. We like especially the picture of "Slid, whose soul is in the sea" and that of the "Thing that is neither god nor beast."

THE FIGHTER

WHEN from the ranks of battle I drop out
Into the dark and silence, shall I rest
In placid cold oblivion, or my breast
Yearn for the exultation of hot strife,
And my lips long to give the rallying shout
Among the shades for one last desperate bout
With the o'erwhelming force that ruthless life—
The unconquerable, beloved antagonist—
Doth range against all men who dare resist
His iron law, and flaunt the rebel crest?

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE NOVEL OF MANNERS

So far as I am aware, the phrase at the head of this article was first used by Gibbon to describe the work of Henry Fielding. It has never come into general use as part of the critic's outfit, and yet is so descriptive of a certain class of novel that it would be a pity to let it slip out of the language. Apart from all that, a question that must often have suggested itself to the minds of those who think about the development of English literature is to what extent the novel of manners has been of recent years neglected. But first let us try to come to a clear understanding of what is meant by the term. In a sense, the phrase might be applied to all works of fiction, because it is simply impossible to tell a story without in one way or another indicating the manners and customs of those who are the actors in it. In a very broad sense, Richardson as well as Fielding wrote the novel of manners, and yet the name, properly speaking, is not applicable to his work. He did not rest his chief interest on manners, but on the problems that arise out of the play and interplay of emotions in the female heart. As we talk of the problem play, so we may also talk of the problem novel. Far be it from me to say which is the higher form of art. We know, however, that Richardson suited the French taste, and that many novels were written on the same principles that had guided his composition. On the other hand, Fielding took a broader, and perhaps a sunnier view of the task that lay before him. As he was never tired of telling his readers, his desire was to paint human nature as he saw it. No doubt, problems were bound to arise and be discussed in his work too. Human nature is so constituted that, whenever it is given free play, the emotions and passions, the ambitions and pursuits of different people will bring them into positions out of which character and intellect have to find an outlet. Such a puzzle is presented when Tom Jones is placed in this dilemma—that he must either forsake Sophia Western or, as he thinks, play a dastardly part to the gamekeeper's daughter. A French writer, especially one of the modern school, could easily have elaborated this situation, touched up the girl's character, introduced complications, and emphasised the sacrifice of Sophia Western. We all remember the solution, more laughable than delicate, which Fielding found for the difficulty. It was not his way to linger over a dilemma of this kind; he brushed it aside as small troubles disappear under the influence of a breezy, sunshiny day in spring. The career of Tom Jones is one in which fate plays a very great part. He is giddy and thoughtless, it is true, but the wind of ill-fortune seems to drift him hither and thither. That we believe to be more true to life than the formation of a problem that has to be rightly or wrongly solved by the chief actor in the novel.

For a long time the Fielding tradition was the dominant one in the world of English fiction. It gave a cue to Sir Walter Scott, to Dickens, to George Eliot, to Thackeray, to every one who aimed at writing in the grand style. But when the last of these great writers had passed away, a new spirit seemed to take possession of their successors. Perhaps the most influential of modern writers was George Eliot, each of whose works came to be a kind of treatise on a question of the day. Charles Reade carried the practice a good deal further and made of each of his novels an avowed sermon. Anthony Trollope, on the other hand, followed much more closely in the footsteps of him who has been rightly called the father of the English novel, but he scarcely had power enough to gain the position in which he would have wielded a great influence. Just after he had passed his meridian the cloak and rapier school took possession of the field and for a long time we were deluged with romances, formed more or less on the model of "The Three Musketeers." Attention to character was altogether neglected. It was sufficient to have an amiable Quentin Durward sort of a hero and a heroine sufficiently attractive to interest the reader. Add a duel or two, plenty of desperate adventures and a few delicate situations, and there was the novel or romance. Many thousands of them were printed between the years 1880 and 1900. Of course, they formed as well as fed the public taste, with the result that scarcely any recent writer has evolved a character that lives on its own account. We have had in galore sex problems set before us, problems of wealth and poverty, problems of town and country, problems of simple and complicated life, and problems of morality. But the intentness of the writers on bringing about the crucial situation that is meant to illustrate the doctrine they advance seems to prevent them from giving that tranquil and urbane presentation of character that the elder novelists delighted in. It seems to me, too, to militate against the quality of their work. It is a commonplace to say that the novel of to-day will not stand a second reading. It generally has a fairly interesting fable, as the critics called the plot, and one or two telling situations, but at a single glance one gets out of it everything that can be got. Librarians say that even a popular work of fiction has a life that can be measured by months. It is quite otherwise with those novels in which character and manners are really studied. One may pant through them hurriedly the first time for the sake of the story they contain (and there is no reason whatever why the novel of manners should not also be an enthralling narrative), but just as in real life it requires continual contact to become really familiar with any one and a character seems to disclose itself very gradually, so in reading again a novel in which a character is presented with insight and subtlety we discover new charms at each perusal. One of the most eminent men of my acquaintance reads the Waverley novels from beginning to end once every year, and he tells me that the charm, far from palling, grows on him. To take one well-known example, I think that this is the case especially with Jane Austen's masterpiece, "Pride and Prejudice." It is very curious, by the bye, that, although this story was written when the author was a girl scarcely out of her teens, it is by no means very attractive to young people. I remember myself reading it as a youth when I had a capacity for reading anything and everything that came in my way, but the beauty of it did not dawn on me until a great number of years had passed and riper judgment was brought to the understanding of the exquisite charm that is found on every page of this work. It seems to me that what Jane Austen wrote afterwards, though abundant in cleverness, never had the fine and exquisite freshness of the first novel. I know that opinions differ upon this point and must do; but the impression I give is my own.

Looking at the subject from another point of view, one is led at times to wonder what proportion of the reading public prefers old books to new. Publishers say that the excellent reprints of standard authors have a steady and extensive sale, and this would go to imply that there is a reading public which prefers the novel of manners both to the problem novel and to the productions of the school of Dumas. The books that seem to me to be most assiduously reprinted are Thackeray's "Esmond" and Scott's "Ivanhoe," but when one looks over the list of reprints a feeling of surprise is experienced at the others which are selected. Each series claims to be a library of masterpieces, and yet there is scarcely one which does not include several works of only third- or fourth-rate merit. It would be extremely interesting to see what the effect would be if some publisher would start a series called the novel of manners, and include in it only those works of the very highest rank. I imagine that a considerable section of the public would become purchasers.

P.

[Next week's Causerie will be "New Ideas for Old," by T. Sturge Moore.]

FICTION

The Fifth Queen. By FORD MADOX HUEFFER. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

WE have rarely read an historical novel which gives so clear and forcible a picture of its period as Mr. Hueffer's. The period is towards the end of the reign of Great Harry the Eighth, that prodigious creature who seems to embody in his huge bulk and immense attainments and power all the turbulent raw elements of the turbulent Tudor time. "If the lion knew his own strength, hard were it for any man to rule him," were the words in which Sir Thomas More summed up his experience of Henry VIII. to Thomas Cromwell, that mysterious, potent figure of English history. The story opens about the year 1539, when Cromwell was arranging the alliance with Lutheran powers and seeking to strengthen it by the king's marriage with his fourth Queen, Anne of Cleves, "the great Flanders mare." Even as her state arrival is hourly expected, Katherine Howard comes to the palace at Greenwich from the country, escorted by her boisterous cousin and lover, Culpepper, and meets the king dramatically as he is pacing the terrace; she is riding a stubborn mule, her dress is torn and muddy, her arm is wounded by the brawlers at the gate, and the king in compassion orders her to wait upon his daughter, the Lady Mary. So ends the first part. Thereafter, we see Katherine caught up in the intrigues of the court. She falls into the power of Throckmorton, the infamous spy; but he respects her, for he has seen how the king admires her. She moves blindly in his hand, but his game is deep and subtle. Cromwell's power is really at an end, though the king, according to his tigerish habit, is loading the doomed man with favours; and at the end Katherine learns, in an exceedingly powerful scene, that she has been serving the king and that he loves her. There the book ends; we do not hear of the marriage, nor of Cromwell's execution, which took place in July 1540, the very year in which he was created Earl of Essex. Thus, the action of the story is confined to the space of one year, a very crucial year in the history of England, and that without any effort or overcrowding. Mr. Hueffer has managed to suggest very clearly the way of life, both in town and country, of the early sixteenth century. It was an age, to quote Brewer, "instinct with vast animal life, robust health and muscular energy, terrible in its rude and unrefined appetites, its fiery virtues and fierce passions." There are types of all these in the book, from old Nicholas Udall, whom Mr. Hueffer has drawn out of his own mouth, up to the king himself.

The Measure of Life. By FRANCES CAMPBELL. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

IN her dedication Mrs. Campbell alludes to these tales and dreams as her "spiritual adventures," and that is perhaps the clearest description that can be given of them. Dreams, legends, and visions have each a golden thread of spiritual meaning woven into them. All the author's eloquence is upon the side of right and goodness; her pages are full of counsels of perfection, of the wisdom of endurance, of the salutary effect of patience under pain, suffering and loss, of the value of self-sacrifice and tribulation in the discipline of life. Throughout she glorifies those bracing qualities which ordinary human nature is least inclined to go out of its way to cultivate. Some of the tales are charming in their tenderness and gaiety; several of them we have read and admired in another place, and welcome in more permanent form. Others, of dreams and second sight, are curious and interesting, yet more so for the manner in which they are told than for their subject. Mrs. Campbell is a facile writer, with a vivid imagination. Ideas flow easily and find expression in a wealth of imagery that transforms familiar truths into something new and strange. The two best examples of her remarkable descriptive powers, as well as of her prodigious use of superlatives, are to be found in "A Sarong of Trenggam," and "Blown from the Infinite," with its unexpected and beautiful ending. Here and elsewhere it is when Mrs. Campbell tells us about flesh-and-blood men and children that she delights us most; we would not exchange one of her human stories for a dozen such visions as "The Lock of the Little Souls." Yet those who love to speculate upon the mysteries of the unseen world should read Mrs. Campbell's spiritual adventures, which are all, as she might express it, "shot with gold and crossed with silver" thoughts and aspirations.

The Master of Pinsmead. By ALGERNON GISSING. (Long, 6s.)

"THE MASTER OF PINSMEAD" gives the title to a collection of twenty short stories, any one of which may be read in about as many minutes. Brightly written by an experienced hand, they embrace a variety of interests, romantic or tragic, but avoid the humorous aspects of life. Some half-dozen of the miniature plots are too condensed, and leave much to the reader's imagination. One story, even after a third reading, left a doubt as to what really happened. In "The Parson's Text" the part played by the "gentleman in spectacles" is not at all clear, nor do we understand why the haughty lady promised him all her fortune in such contemptuous terms. And what was the end of "Lonesome Jane"? On one point the author treats his readers handsomely; he always gives them a story, a romantic episode, or a dramatic situation, and not merely an anecdote spun out to cover a certain space.

The Burglars' Club. By HENRY A. HERRING. (Cassell, 3s. 6d.)

"Mor, je ne cherche pas mes emotions à me casser le cou," said the Frenchman anent foxhunting, and, so far as appreciation of what sport really means, he might be own brother to the principal characters in this book, who have "all been in the army or the navy, all of whom are sportsmen," and who, despairing of any other whip to their jaded craving for excitement, form a Club, admission to and continuation in which rest on the ability to break the law of the land by stealing any article of value or interest—the more renowned at the moment the better—which the ingenuity of the rest of the club may demand. No scruples as to the violation of friends' houses, confidence or hospitality are allowed to interfere with the obtaining of trophies such as the Great Seal of England, a bishop's crozier, an ounce of radium—the talk of the scientific world and valued at £56,000—a Bunyan manuscript, and the last-given V.C. Their burglaries in most cases are utterly amateurish, and it needed not a Sherlock Holmes, but merely an ordinary Scotland Yard detective, to shatter these excitement-seekers' house of cards and bring them to the conclusion (with which most people would start the first page), "that the club has no connection with sport . . . and that it be disbanded." This book has no doubt fulfilled its function in giving employment to the printing trade, and with this remark we may leave it.

The Poison of Tongues. By M. E. CARR. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THE problem in this pleasantly told story is a pretty one. Handled with subtlety it should have been moving; handled with force, dramatic. But the author's touch is too light, her imbroglia too loosely knit for the situation she presents. The hero could not clear himself of a heinous charge without accusing the real criminal, who was dead and had been his friend and the brother of the girl he loves. What is a man to do in such a case? Refuse all explanations, turn confused and, stammering, slink out of the house next day, leaving his reputation behind him, or speak out and tell the three women concerned that the dead man had been faithless and a forger? Perhaps it was impossible for Captain Thursby to speak; but he might very well have thought it impossible that a houseful of English people should have believed such a story on the word of an emotional Eurasian musician who had a grudge against him. The Eurasian said that the Englishman was a forger: the Englishman denied it but retreated. So the other English people in the house went back to London and spread the story as the Eurasian had told it. They were not clever or they would have foreseen that the Indian mail and the Captain's brother officers would soon set things right. The heroine is original enough to get engaged to a man she does not love because she thought she ought to "share in the suffering." This seems hard on the man.

THE DRAMA

EN REVENANTS DE LA REVUE

How strange that social phrases retain their form and change their meaning—or, perhaps, it is not strange at all. A lady the other day at dinner, where conversation flagged, asked me if I believed in "Ghosts." I thought she referred to spiritual phenomena: but it was Ibsen's play. I have observed a similar mistake about the ACADEMY. "Have you seen the ACADEMY?" used to be a safe question from May till August bank holiday, and from January till March, when it referred to the summer and winter shows of pictures respectively; now it is a safe question all the year round—and it never refers to that exploded institution at Burlington House. Not a hundred yards away from this office, as in ancient Athens (I cannot be precise as to distance, Bædeker not being beside me), there stands the Porch of the National Sporting Club, in Covent Garden. Here, last Sunday, was perpetrated upon us, of Academe and elsewhere, a cruel practical joke. At eight of the clock, having cut a most delightful supper at the house of Hypatia, we stood, pretending to be Stoics, but with oaths under our lips and puddles under our feet, waiting for the doors to open. Conscientiously following Court (Theatre) etiquette, we were punctual; and how were we rewarded? I thought, in common with others, that if you flout the censor such things are inevitable. The English Drama Society had prepared a most unsportsmanlike booby-trap. Ghosts, advertised for eight o'clock, did not commence till three quarters of an hour later. The Vision, a morality by the Hon. Eleanour Norton, was to form a curtain-raiser. The programme, however, was consoling. After all there was a certain symbolism in the characters. For the Pleasure of seeing Ibsen I had come; in Innocence I was punctual; in Wisdom I am well equipped; but at the end of the performance I could have left with Passion for supper save for the temptation of seeing Ghosts again. The dreary balderdash of The Vision was hardly relieved by that talented actor, Mr. Esmé Percy, an artist who is more sensitive to praise, even than criticism. But for the announcement that he appeared by the courtesy of Mr. Tree, I would have said that his presence was a crime of lèse Majesty's Theatre. I hope Mr. Tree will never again lend any of his powerful cast for such purposes. Better to err with Stephen Phillips than shine with the Hon. Eleanour Norton.

Allegory should be regarded as an exquisite expression of mediævalism, whether in architecture, painting or drama. We are too sophisticated, however, for the simplicity necessary for its presentation; we are not sufficiently subtle to entertain its complexity. The more we know of mediævalism the less we can endure any simian product of to-day. We can stimulate our art and our curiosity by searching in the crypt, though we must not stay there to make forgeries, but only long enough to take photographs. Otherwise we shall contract a chill. "Where the cultured catch an effect the uncultured catch cold," as I did on Sunday night. I fear the late Mr. G. F. Watts was responsible for this toying with faded pietism and allegories on the banks of the Nile. Love whistling down the ear of Life, Christianity shutting off the water-supply from the House of Paganism, and other works of which the exact titles escape me, were among the obvious sources of the Hon. Eleanour Norton's inspiration. Of her deplorable work I say no more, but will record a little anecdote to illustrate my obscure point. In company with an Anglican clergyman of my acquaintance, I witnessed during the sacred season of Lent a provincial performance of that little masterpiece, Everyman. Following the admirable tradition of the Carthusian matinée, the names of the players were omitted from the programme. The production was perfect; the sham ritualism which marred later revivals entirely absent. The audience was deeply moved. Several worldly people broke into sobs. My friend came round to the stage-door in order to congratulate the manager, and asked to be presented to the artists who had rendered for us "the last enchantment of the middle age." We were introduced to Everyman, Good Fellowship, and Kindred (who were drinking champagne), and to all the players except the gentleman who sustained the part of the Supreme Being and the lady who represented Good Deeds. We inquired where they were. The others looked embarrassed. At last the whole truth had to be told. It transpired, as they say in the Press, that a warrant had been executed on God for fraud, and a writ for an unpaid dressmaker's bill had been served on Good Deeds. The officers of the law had considerably waited until the end of the performance before carrying out their ungrateful task. Then I realised that Oberammergau must always remain in Bavaria, though Mr. Laurence Housman has since shattered my opinion, and Mr. Arthur Symonds will expose the fallacy of my contentions early next month in The Fool of the World. Still the Hon. Eleanour Norton has not revised my views about Mr. Watts's allegories.

Of Ghosts you can say nothing which has not been better said by Mr. William Archer and Mr. Bernard Shaw. Since Hernani no play has produced such results on the drama of Europe. It taught French dramatists that psychology does not entirely centre on a wife's infidelity; it taught English playwrights that truth and probability are not stranger but quite as romantic and dramatic as middle-class fictions and false sentiments forming the staple and sewerage of the English stage. It killed Clement Scott. We owe to it The Voysey Inheritance. I know the pathology of Ghosts is wrong, but false pathology is less objectionable than false pathos. I cannot pay Miss Madge MacIntosh a higher compliment than by saying that she succeeded in making us nearly forget the Mrs. Alving of Mrs. Theodore Wright. Mr. Lumsden Hare was the best Pastor Manders I have ever seen, and the Engstrand of Mr. Curtis was admirable, though he gave too melodramatic an interpretation to some of his speeches. He is a finished and capable actor. I wish I could praise the Oswald of Mr. Goodsall unreservedly. During the first two acts I did not think him capable of doing what he achieved in the final scene. A physical resemblance to Dan Leno, which should be disguised by make-up, prevents you from accepting his Oswald on its face valuation. You are persuaded that he is a fine comedy actor but not designed for introspective drama. I would like to see Mr. Esmé Percy assume the part. He would have an opportunity of distinguishing himself. I make the suggestion to Mr. Nugent Monck, secretary of the English Drama Society, with a request that he will tuck any further Visions beneath his cowl and not abuse the courtesy of Mr. Tree by allowing Mr. Esmé Percy to desert the frying-pan of Mr. Phillips for the fires of the Hon. Eleanour Norton.

Paris, like Admetus, is not a character with which modernity has much sympathy. He followed the advice of Du Maurier's poet and was content to exist beautifully. The modern world would never go to him for settling disputes; his judgment has been reversed on appeal in favour of Pallas and the Education Bill. True, we go to Paris for our frocks, but not without them. We disbelieve the promises of Aphrodite arising from the sea, from Agnew's, or from Rokeby. We impugn her authenticity; we hardly subscribe to give her shelter in Trafalgar Square. C'enone is more in our hearts than her faithless lover. To

Mr. Laurence Binyon and Miss Gertrude Kingston the applause last week must have been reassuring. I sincerely hope the play will be seen again before long, and that the pace at which the blank verse was delivered may be slightly increased. Miss Kingston has a special gift for declaiming poetry, and—what is more rare—acting it; being a rebel (ipsa dixit), she might break away from the “slow” tradition of the English stage. Paris and Enone is a beautiful dramatic poem, written to be acted, as The Tempest was written to be acted. Always an admirer of Mr. Binyon's poetry, I confess to having thought the play rather tedious until it was presented by Miss Kingston. I accepted too readily the foolish criticism that Mr. Binyon was a lyric or epic poet and nothing more. Actors, it has been pointed out, are the real critics of drama, and their presentation of it is the only means by which we can appreciate a play. Like other critics they make dreadful mistakes, and insist on acting superbly in bad plays. This deceives both the public and those amphibious creatures called dramatic critics, who have one foot in the auditorium and the other in the actor-manager's private room. Paris and Enone, not only by the tender melody of the verse and intensity of the two situations, proves the possibility of a renaissance of poetic drama not necessarily Celtic. It is, however, no methodist revival of Jacobean and Elizabethan modes; no depressing piece of archæology, but a recrudescence of poetry for the stage. I believe the public will now be able to see (with the aid of a telescope) Mr. Binyon on the higher slopes of Parnassus where Keats and Marlowe are plaiting garlands for his head in the enamelled meadows, and where he is feeling a little nervous at the prospect of being introduced by Milton to Mr. Bernard Shaw. For the stage reveals your identity as no other art succeeds in doing.

The revival of How he Lied to her Husband gave Miss Kingston an opportunity for displaying her unique powers in comedy and reminded the audience that Mr. Granville Barker requires a long holiday.

Mr. E. F. Benson's The Friend in the Garden has been condemned by the superior critics. I admit that the writing fell far short of the author at his best; I admit that Maeterlinck's Intruder may have haunted Mr. Benson as it has many other dramatists. At the same time, there was an idea in the play, a dramatic idea; and there might have been pathos, but for the terrible platitudes of Death. If you materialise Death on the stage, the result must produce an element of surprise and some strangeness in proportion, as Bacon said of Beauty. If Mr. Benson would rewrite his play, dock Lord Accrington of his unnecessary title, and make his hero less dyspeptic, he would contrive a really moving and striking one-act play, only less thrilling than The Monkey's Paw. In its present form the notes are false, and recall those pictures of M. Jean Beraud, so popular in Paris some years ago. Violent contrasts and incongruities are always legitimate in drama, which has less limitations than any other art; but the dramatist must persuade you that he is creating, not violating, the laws of possibility. Mr. Benson can, I am sure, persuade

ROBERT ROSS.

FINE ART

MR. BAILLIE'S FLOWER-SHOW

“A SHORT time employed in painting flowers,” said Sir Joshua, “would make no improper part of a painter's study.” That many artists share the opinion of Reynolds is amply evidenced by the first annual exhibition of flower-paintings at Mr. Baillie's Gallery (54 Baker Street). The days when the painting of flowers was left to the young lady amateur have long since gone by, and the tendency now is for professional artists to devote not a short time but a life-time to the study of flower-painting. Mr. Baillie's exhibition reminds us how many modern artists have made a reputation by their renderings of flowers. We think of Fantin-Latour, though he is unrepresented here. But flower-painting was of Fantin's art a thing apart—he was equally great as portrait-painter, lithographer and painter of idylls; it is the whole existence of Mr. Francis E. James, Mr. Gerard Chowne, Mr. Stuart Park, and other exhibitors at Baker Street. Of these Mr. James's position is, perhaps, the most unassailable; his water-colours are as personal and distinctive as the oils of Fantin, which they do not in the least resemble. Mr. Stuart Park's flowers have also the merit of being his own, but they do not carry the conviction of Mr. James's. They are often beautiful, always clever, but they are artificial—artificial flowers of the finest and most expensive kind, exquisitely made, but seemingly of feathers, not of petals. Mr. Chowne's flowers are real, and they are none the worse because they recall the work of Fantin. On the contrary, it is pleasurable to find a great tradition being carried on so worthily, for Alfred Stevens are as hard to find as Michel-angelos.

An exhibition of flower-paintings without a Fantin may bear some resemblance to a performance of Hamlet with the part of the Prince of Denmark left out. But just as the play, even thus mutilated, could not rid itself of the unacted character's influence, so in Mr. Baillie's flower-show the power of the “Prince of Flower-Painters” is revealed, though his handiwork remains unseen. It is not only Mr. Chowne whose work reveals the happy influence of Fantin. It is seen no less clearly in the admirable paintings of Mr. James S. Hill, Miss Annie D. Muir, Mme. S. Hense, and many another. Even Mr. James Paterson's brilliant water-colour French Roses (83) recalls the Frenchman's oils, while Mr. D. S. MacColl gracefully pays Fantin homage in his delicious rendering of A Rose (70). It is rarely that Mr. MacColl permits the public to see his handlings of oils, and, if his manner of painting suggests the sympathetic study of many Fantins, the conception is Mr. MacColl's alone. Imagine a single pink rose bowing towards you from a slender glass and you will understand how it is that the Japanesque simplicity and refinement of Mr. MacColl's little picture makes all posies rather common, all bouquets rather vulgar.

It is impossible within a limited space to do justice to this fascinating collection. We should like to dwell on Mr. Clausen's exhibits. He is the most national of flower-painters. There is a fine air of British solidarity and sturdiness about his Zinnias and Michaelmas Daisies (31). The method of painting, too, is honest, straightforward, thoroughly British; not the slow, painstaking method of that nonconformist in painting, Mr. Holman Hunt, but the assured, direct method of the more orthodox Gainsborough and Millais. Clever, distinctive work by Messrs. J. D. Ferguson, H. M. Livens, James Cadenhead and H. C. Moon, by Meses. Isobel A. Dods-Withers, Katherine Turner, Agnes Raeburn and Jessie Algie, deserve more than a word of praise. Miss Katherine Cameron's fresh-blooming Roses (76), and her delightful Bees and Blossoms (103)—one can almost hear the buzzing of her fluffy little monsters—excite one's high enthusiasm. The few examples noted may suffice to prove that Mr. Baillie's flower-show is good; its surprising variety can only be appreciated by those who have seen a collection which ranges from the botanical diagrams of Mr. MacWhirter to the fantastic, anthropomorphised roses madly dancing in the jewelled landscape of Diaz de la Pena.

The official notification of interesting additions to our national art collections leaves a good deal to be desired. Mr. Duveen's presentation to the Tate Gallery of Mr. Sargent's portrait of Miss Ellen Terry as Lady Macbeth attracted much public notice, but a correspondent draws our attention to the fact that a previous addition to the permanent collection at Millbank has not yet been alluded to in the Press. This is the interesting painting of Gil Blas and the Canon Sedillo, by F. W. Hurlstone, which was commented on in the ACADEMY when exhibited at Messrs. Shepherd's last autumn. It was then pointed out that Hurlstone occupied a not negligible position in the history of British painting, as one of the first painters to be directly influenced by the Spanish masters, and thus to a certain extent being a precursor of John Philip and Whistler. While upon the subject of new additions to our art galleries we may mention that Mrs. Arthur Melville has presented to the Victoria and Albert Museum a fine example of the late Mr. Melville's art, his brilliant water-colour, The Little Bull Fight, which was exhibited at the Old Watercolour Society's exhibition three years ago, and now hangs on a screen in front of the cast of Rodin's John the Baptist.

MUSIC.

ON EXTEMPORE PLAYING

THERE is an august body called the Incorporated Society of Musicians; while I know nothing of this society's constitution or the personnelle of its members, the very name is suggestive of people who write eight-part fugues in their spare time, for recreation, and who habitually think in quadruple counterpoint. This impression was strengthened when, invited to attend one of their meetings for "members and friends," I found myself with some hundred odd "friends" (odd, numerically speaking), shut out in the passage for half an hour, while the deliberations of a meeting for members only were concluded. We, the hundred odd friends, were very patient; knowing that to admit us at all was a favour, we waited quite meekly till the magic portals unfolded, and then scrambled as decorously as possible into the vacant seats. The chairman called upon Mr. Thomas Crawford, Mus. Bac. Dunelm, to read a paper on "The art of extemporising," and with his reading my wonder began. For lo! instead of minding high things he appeared to condescend to men of low estate. He warned against "meandering" on the piano or organ. What incorporated musician would deign to meander? He told us that we should always extemporise in some clearly defined form, and explained, with little diagrams on the blackboard, such as reminded one of a "Child's First Primer of Musical Instruction," the elements of "binary" and "ternary" form. My wonder increased until I realised from the benign expressions on the faces of the "Incorporated," that this talk was not for them, but for the instruction of the humble and ignorant "friends." It may have been a disappointment to be denied an introduction into Walhalla, but it should certainly be a consolation that the gods come down and hobnob with us on something like equal terms, and this the incorporated ones did. In his little lecture, Mr. Crawford said some very sensible things and offered some useful hints to beginners; moreover Mr. W. Wolstenholme improvised skilful fugues on the piano, and he, Professor Prout, and the lecturer between them made up a whole sonata of four movements upon given themes, and oh! how dull it was!

But apart from this mixture of puerility and scholarship, the subject of extemporisation is worth some consideration. Is it, as Mr. Crawford says it is, "a beautiful art," and, if so, how can it be true that the best piece of extemporisation is that which most nearly approaches to written composition? In such a case it would appear to have no individuality of its own, and without individuality no art is beautiful, and without beauty there is no art. There must be some element in extemporised music which is worth having, besides its approximation to written composition, if it is to be valued at all. I have heard many organists and some pianists extemporise, but I never found anything to enjoy in the efforts of any of them, save those of one man, and he is my friend. I do not remember that I ever heard him extemporise a fugue or a small sonata, and I should not always know in what form his piece had been cast, though I should be ready to defend it against the charge of "meandering," because it always speaks. It is more than possible, indeed quite likely, that it is friendship as much as music which in such a case gives that specially intimate and personal tone, without which all extempore playing is dead. I do not wish to analyse the psychological aspect of the case too closely, but the truth about extemporising undoubtedly lies in a more momentary and individual expression than written composition possesses. Conversation and oratory form a very close analogy to extempore and written composition. Every one knows to their cost the type of man who has acquired a method of talking fluently on any subject from fiscal reform to the degeneracy of the drama. He is the very essence of a bore, and an excellent debater. His subject is not his own but a "given theme"; or, if his own, it is chosen to be talked about, and once chosen he treats it in a certain definite sequence which he knows to be logical and believes to be effective. It is the same with extemporising as preached and practised by incorporated musicians. Take, says Mr. Crawford, a striking, melodious and easily memorised theme; if you cannot think of one, beat out a commonplace rhythm with thumps upon the table or on the back of the grand piano first (one supposes that this spirit-rapping process is gone through in the next room, if an audience is present), and then fit a sequence of notes to that, and behold, a theme! This theme proceed to mould into little contrasted sentences of eight or sixteen bars, and the "beautiful art" is complete. Were this the whole of the doctrine, it would be too pitiable to need refutation, but there lay the germ of something more substantial in Mr. Crawford's remark that the theme is the soul and the form the body and his plea for the health of both. Practically, however, he and his kind, like the devotees of physical culture, magnify the lesser, the claims of the body, into the all important. The extemporised sonata which he and his friends gave us had all its limbs fully formed, and even a fair show of muscular development; but it said nothing, for it had thought nothing, it had no soul, or, if it had, it was of the kind furnished by raps. Of course there must be a healthy body for the full expression of the soul, or, to return to the closer analogy, the man who takes your arm and talks with you as a friend must know the rules of grammar and syntax and have a logical way of putting things, if you are to understand all that he has it in his heart to say. But his words will not take the form of an essay or sermon or a great parliamentary speech, unless his matter is so weighty and so carefully thought out, that what he says is no longer for your ear alone or a passing conversation, but the summary of a life-long experience or of profound thought. A deeper knowledge of the purposes of such great forms as the fugue and sonata as used by Bach and Beethoven would save learned musicians from falling into the error of trying to express such slight thoughts as occur to them in the course of extempore playing with all the pomp and circumstance due to the expression of great things. It is not, therefore, true to speak of the theme as the soul, if the term "theme" be used in the limited sense of a short musical phrase, whose form more or less determines that of the whole piece. The immortal four-note theme of the fifth symphony does not contain within itself the soul of that great work; a child might pick it out at the piano and a starling has been known to whistle it. It is the use made of this theme—in fact, the subject-matter throughout the whole movement—which invests this small succession of notes with such a glory that it almost seems as if there were magic in them. Beethoven did not make a movement in sonata form out of this germ; he had in his mind a great musical thought which, starting from this germ, could only find full expression in a movement of such proportions as the first of the C minor symphony. Composers should, perhaps, be more chary of undertaking composition in great forms which demand great thought, but it seems very near to profanation for little men, be they never so learned, to attempt to extemporise in those forms in which the greatest have wrought painfully and slowly.

The art of extemporising, then, like the art of conversation, is one which depends upon simple and direct expression and the exact appropriateness of means to the subject in hand. It is so delicate a matter that deliberate culture is as likely to ruin the one as the other. As we shun the man who "talks like a book," so we may well fear the extemporised sonata. The real artist will find the exact means to make a perfect round of his thought; those who have not the power may still try to say what little they can consistently, and these may be helped by some of Mr. Crawford's concise rules. But in this matter we cannot get much help from the learned ones, and for my own part I left that assembly of Incorporated Musicians with some of that feeling with which every student closes his harmony book, a sigh of relief and a longing for one strain of real music.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

ON March 26 Messrs. Smith, Elder will publish the first volume of a new work by Mr. J. B. Atlay, "The Victorian Chancellors." Though Lord Campbell's posthumous volume contains the lives of Lords Lyndhurst and Brougham, neither of them has been accepted as satisfactory. Mr. Atlay therefore begins with the former, and includes Lord Brougham, whose name is so intimately associated with the legal history of the reign, though he was never Chancellor under Queen Victoria. The work will be complete in two volumes, the second of which, we understand, is in the press.—On March 30 Messrs. Smith, Elder promise two new novels: "Mr. Baxter, Sportsman," by Charles Fielding Marsh, and "Old Mr. Lovelace," by Christian Tearle—episodes in the life of an elderly, retired lawyer, whose kindly heart leads him to intervene with almost quixotic sympathy in the affairs of his granddaughter's protégés.

Messrs. Blackwood have in the press a new book on Charles Lever, from the pen of Mr. Edmund Downey. Mr. Downey's work is in two volumes, and takes the form of a Life of Lever told by himself in his letters.

Mr. John Murray will publish at Easter a biography of great interest, namely the Life of Mrs. Bishop, which has been written at Mrs. Bishop's own request by her intimate friend Miss Anna Stoddart, the author of a charming account of St. Francis, and of Professor Blackie's life, an admirable piece of biographical work. Mrs. Bishop's Life will appeal to more than her large circle of friends: for she was perhaps the greatest of woman-travellers; and the account which she gave of her travels in her books is vivid and stamped with the strong charm of her personality. She made her way through Japan, Persia, Kurdistan, Korea, Siberia and China; she was the first white woman to visit many places; and she visited them alone. No one is more fitted to deal with her many-sided character than Miss Stoddart.

Mr. Arthur Symons's Collected Poems are now out of print, and it is his intention to bring out a new edition with some revisions and some additional translations from Verlaine. Mr. Symons has also in preparation a new volume of miscellaneous poems which will include the Morality play mentioned on p. 255.

Early in April Mr. Unwin will publish "The Pope of Holland House," by Lady Seymour. The book is based on a collection of early nineteenth-century letters, written by and to John Whishaw between 1806 and 1840. Coming to London as a rich young man with a reputation for ability, Whishaw soon became known to the leading reformers and was introduced to Whig Society. He was an intimate friend of Lord and Lady Holland, Lord Lansdowne, Francis Horner, Sir Samuel Romilly, and other leading people of his day, and on account of his dogmatism earned the name of "The Pope of the Holland House Set." The book contains letters to Whishaw from Sydney Smith, Maria Edgeworth, Hallam, Sismondi, Dr. Holland, Sir James Mackintosh, Lady Holland and others. These, with Whishaw's own letters, are full of gossip about Napoleon, Wellington, Madame de Staël, and Byron, about Scott's novels and poems when they first appeared, and about the foreign politics of the time.

"Historic Dress, 1607-1800," by Elizabeth McClelland, is the subject of a book which Mr. John Lane will publish on March 20. The book is to be fully illustrated in colour, pen-and-ink, and half-tone, and in addition there will be reproductions from photographs of rare portraits, garments, etc. An introductory chapter is given on dress in the Spanish and French settlements in Florida and Louisiana.—Mr. Lane promises "The Wild Flowers of Selborne," by the Rev. Canon Vaughan, on the same date;—and he will publish shortly "Sir Edward Elgar," by Ernest Newman, the fourth volume of a new series, "The Music of the Masters," which Mr. Lane has taken over and will publish henceforth.

On March 22 Messrs. Methuen will publish a new volume of lectures by F. B. Jevons, entitled "Religion in Evolution." In these lectures, delivered in the vacation term for Biblical study at Cambridge, the author discusses the question whether the aborigines of Australia are in a pre-religious stage, and argues that, even if science had discovered the origin and traced the Evolution of Religion, the validity of Religion would still remain to be determined.—On the same date they will add to their "Ancient Cities" series a new volume on "Lincoln," by E. Mansel Sympson, and will publish a novel from the pen of Mrs. Fuller Maitland, entitled "Blanche Esmead"—a story of diverse temperaments.

"The Literary History of the Adelphi and its Neighbourhood," from the pen of Mr. Austin Brereton, will be published by Messrs. Treherne in the autumn. The volume will contain numerous illustrations, including views of the Adelphi at different periods, Garrick's house as it appeared when Dr. Johnson visited there, the library of Samuel Pepys, the famous "Fox-under-the-Hill," and other equally interesting scenes.

"The Genealogy and History of the Matthew Family" is announced for publication by subscription through Mr. Elliot Stock. The Glamorganshire family of Matthew is one of the most ancient in Britain and traces its descent through Sir David Matthew of Llandaff, standard bearer to Edward IV. in 1461, to Gwaetvoed Vawr, Prince of Cardigan in the tenth century. The family is largely represented in the work, as are also the English and Irish branches. It will contain some thirty portraits, drawings and facsimiles in illustration of the text.

Messrs. Constable will publish shortly three books dealing with religious subjects. The first, by William Burnet Wright, is entitled "Cities of Paul: Beacons of the Past rekindled by the Present." This book comprises a history of the ancient towns of Tarsus, Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Colossæ, Ancyra and Tyona, all of which have become famous from their association with the great apostle Paul. The second is by the late Henry Martyn Dexter, D.D., and his son Morton Dexter. It is entitled "The England and Holland of the Pilgrims," and is an attempt to present a more complete record than any which has been written of the religious and ecclesiastical movement in England which made the American "Pilgrims" what they were, and of their emigration to Holland, and their life there before they sailed to America.—"The Religion of all Good Men and other Studies in Christian Ethics," by H. W. Garrod, is a series of essays bearing out the author's contention that the hold of religion upon the minds of the youth of our country has never been stronger, nor the hold of Christianity weaker than at the present time.

Messrs. Harrison and Sons are preparing a new edition of "Burke's Landed Gentry of Great Britain"—a companion volume to the "Landed Gentry of Ireland" —which will appear early in May. This work comprises the family histories of untitled country gentlemen of a lineage equally as ancient and interesting as that of the titled aristocracy.

Mr. Henry Frowde has in the press and will publish shortly a book by Miss Constance A. Meredyth. The Poet Laureate says that the volume—an autograph album, birthday book, and guest book, entitled "Whisperings from the Great"—shows in the compiler a wide and intimate acquaintance with modern English and French poetry.

Mr. Horace Cox announces for publication in a few days "Chats on Angling," by Capt. Hart Davis. It contains chapters on the dry fly, some dry fly maxims, education of the south country trout, evening rise, jack, the May fly, the angler and ambidexterity, loch fishing, dopping for trout, grayling-fishing, salmon-fishing, etc.

CORRESPONDENCE

PAN AND THE YOUNG SHEPHERD

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I was delighted to see from your review of the performance of Mr. Hewlett's pastoral of Pan and the Young Shepherd that the Pan and Merla episode distressed you as much as it did me. I am a warm admirer of Mr. Hewlett's work and I have always considered the original edition of Pan and the Young Shepherd as his masterpiece. The lines have lost nothing in beauty in their translation to the stage in the mouths of actors and actresses who obviously appreciated their value. Mr. Hewlett starts out with a noble idea and deliberately drops it into the mire before he has done with it. He pits the two great forces of the Nature ideal and the Christ ideal against each other, and in my judgment the prize is not to the angels! In the first act we have the surrender of Balkis and Aglaë—mysterious Undines—to the human ideal of love and their growth through that love. We then touch the highest point that personal love can reach, the complete sacrifice of self and the natural desires and joys to the welfare of the beloved and their rival in Merla's and Dryas's appeal to Pan to save Neanias and Aglaë for each other. Now comes Mr. Hewlett's great chance, the culminating point of the conflict between the two forces, the irresponsible animal and the self-sacrificing God. It needs a great artist to treat Pan's surrender—not to his own bestial desires but to the power of the white Christ—a surrender made pathetic by the child-like ignorance of Pan as to what this new force is to which he yields; but then Mr. Hewlett is a great artist, and he should not have shirked the artistic climax which he could have made at once so mystic and so human. But though we reached the climax of the duel, I think many of us would have felt the play incomplete unless it left us hope that Merla—great heart and child of nature—would some day have her own man, her home and her babes. Now I am going to dare greatly, being a little poet suggesting emendations to a big poet! Where in the last scene Neanias tells his family and friends that Merla is trying to drag Pan to the altar, why should we not have instead something like this: Neanias tells them that he has news for them—he has to-day seen a stranger in the hamlet, a very proper youth too, and one that topped him by half a head. He had hair as black as the old bell-wether's face and as curling as a lamb's fleece and the shoulders of a man on him and the mouth of a man to him, for all it was beardless. The parson, it was said, had gone over the hills and had fetched the stranger back to be his serving-man. And who should the stranger be talking to but Merla, with such a flame in his great eyes that it held the soul of the maid so that she never even saw Neanias pass. And, as the others cry out with surprise, Balkis says softly, "God send it is a flame may dry our Merla's tears!" and to this Neanias says, "A good wish, mother, and I, for one, say 'Amen' to it." "And so say we all," cries the company, "and a health to it!" Then they drink, and afterwards Neanias puts them in mind of what night it is and all ends with the hymn of the manifestation of Jesus to the Shepherds.

This, as I have said, is great boldness on my part, but I long to see a noble, marred play nobly artistic from start to finish, and I beg Mr. Hewlett, if he ever sees this letter, to forgive me and better my suggestion.

DOROTHY FRANCES GURNEY.

March 8.

EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY NOVELISTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your selection of Fielding, Smollett, and Scott to adorn the ranks of the great "non-University" company of novelists must somewhat diminish the authoritativeness (though not the suggestiveness) of your Auseinandensetzungen in this week's ACADEMY.

A man sent, as Fielding was, from Eton to study the Civil Law at Leyden under "the learned Vitriarius" cannot be regarded as without the culture a University gives, even if he did not (as some accounts allege) graduate at the famous Dutch University.

Smollett passed from Dumbarton School to Glasgow University to qualify for the medical profession, added "an acquaintance with Greek to the fair stock of Latin he already possessed," and never forgot what he learned at his Alma Mater.

And those who have not lately read Lockhart's "Scott" may be glad to be reminded that Scott while at Edinburgh University was, on his own authority, already deep in "Matthew of Paris and other monkish chronicles"—arguing considerable familiarity with Latin; irritated the Greek professor by an essay exalting Ariosto above Homer; and knew Dante, Boiardo, and Pulci, before he devoted the years 1789, 1790, 1791, and 1792 "with great ardour and perseverance," to the study of Roman and Scots Law—still at the same University. Scott has especially recorded his debt of gratitude to Dugald Stewart's stimulating prelections in Moral Philosophy, and to Lord Woodhouselee's course of lectures on History—all at Edinburgh University. Hence it is vain to try to deduce from Walter Scott the characteristics of a non-University author; though Scott deplored to the last his lack of diligence in his earlier years at College.

As Lockhart, son of the minister of the University Church in Glasgow, completed a regular course of study there before he went to Oxford as Snell exhibitioner, and as he spent four years in the study of law at Edinburgh University, it is hardly fair to credit his academic accomplishments wholly to Oxford.

Christopher North and Robert Buchanan might both fairly claim to come before Benjamin Swift, amongst Glasgow University alumni.

Daniel Defoe, although only a Nonconformist bred for the ministry, was not the "illiterate scribbler" Swift pretends to take him for; as novelist he has more varied claims than Swift or Johnson.

And no list of non-University novelists is sufficient representative which does not allude to George Borrow, J. J. Morier ("Hajji Baba"), "Anastasis" Hope, Douglas Jerrold, T. Love Peacock, Captain Marryat, G. P. R. James, and Laurence Oliphant—to name but a few characteristic specimens of the unconsidered. Dr. John Brown might well be added to the Edinburgh list in virtue of "Rab and his Friends"; and George Macdonald is but one of the romancers Aberdeen has bred.

U. J. D.

Edinburgh, March 12.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Opening your first page this week, I am surprised to read, "Other Universities [besides Oxford and Cambridge] have also brought forth novelists. The Edinburgh and Dublin list may be set side by side:

EDINBURGH:

Henry Mackenzie
R. L. Stevenson
J. M. Barrie
Conan Doyle

DUBLIN:

Jonathan Swift
Oliver Goldsmith
Charles Robert Maturin
Charles Lever
Sheridan Le Fanu

The Dublin list is the longer and stronger of the two."

Is Sir Walter Scott no longer reckoned a novelist? Or is it forgotten that he had some connection with Edinburgh? And that besides being a student of its University, both in Arts and Law, he kept up a far closer connection with it all his life than most of the others whose names you give?

Scott tells in his autobiography how instead of going straight to College from the High School, "according to the usual routine," he went to Kelso for a while, then came back and entered the "Humanity" and Greek classes of the University under Professors Hill and Dalziel—then took what he calls the class of Ethics under Professor Bruce: which did not prevent him later on, from studying Moral Philosophy under Dugald Stewart, the most famous University man of his day. But that was when, as an advocate, he had to study the Civil or Roman Law—of course also at the University. Lockhart in the Life has a whole chapter entitled "Anecdotes of Scott's College life;" and that chapter brings out that this particular time was plainly the origin of many of his romances—e.g., Waverley and Rob Roy; not to speak of Redgauntlet which is absolutely woven out of his reminiscences of it. Many years after, when my old master "Christopher North," was appointed to Dugald Stewart's chair, Scott was the doer of it. But it is of course a mere slip.

A. TAYLOR INNES.

Edinburgh.

UNIVERSITY POETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your list of Oxford and Cambridge poets, although not exhaustive, is extremely interesting. But you must not give Beaumont to the younger University. The brilliant lyric poet and dramatist Francis Beaumont entered Broadgates Hall (now Pembroke College), Oxford, with his elder brother Sir John Beaumont, the author of "Bosworth Field" and other poems, early in 1597. You omit, too, his great partner in the dramatic firm, John Fletcher, who is generally supposed to have been a Bible-Clerk of C.C.C. Cambridge (Marlowe's College) in 1593.

You say "some poets have been omitted on the ground that they were at both Universities—Chaucer and Calverley among the number."

But you might have included the latter in your list: for he was C. S. Blayds at Oxford, and C. S. Calverley at Cambridge. And why drag in Chaucer? He is a poet of the fourteenth century; and your list begins with the Elizabethans. John Lydgate, Chaucer's pupil and friend, is asserted by Bale to have resided at both Universities; John Skelton, in the latter half of the fifteenth century, claims to have been educated at both; and Greene the Elizabethan, although an undergraduate of Cambridge, was proud to write M.A. of both upon his title-pages.

As for Chaucer, I venture to think that if he was at either University—that University was Oxford. He certainly mentions both in his works; but he shows a greater knowledge of Oxford life and manners than of the geography and customs of Cambridge. Professor J. W. Hales remarks that "the Court of Love, which used to be quoted as definitely proving a Cambridge undergraduateship:

Philogenet I call'd am far and nere,
Of Cambridge clerk—

is not now believed by any competent critic to be Chaucer's work." Mr. Augustine Birrell, in a well-known essay, declares "that no one has ever been found reckless enough to assert that Chaucer was an Oxford man." But Anthony Wood, following Twyne, more than two centuries before Mr. Birrell, had, in his list of Wardens of Canterbury Hall—long since absorbed in Christ Church—under the name of the second, a certain John Wycliffe written, "who, while he abode here (1365-7), as 'tis reputed, was tutor to Jeffery Chaucer."

The scene of the Miller's Tale is laid in Oxford; and in it we have the unforgettable portraits of Nicholas the gay young scholar and buck of the day and of Absalom the amorous parish clerk. The Clerk of Oxenford of the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, half-saint, half-scholar, is the reading-man of the period who has not been led away by strange philosophies; and Jarkin, the Wife of Bath's fifth husband, is the man to whom no learning comes amiss. The scene of the Reeve's Tale, which is the companion picture to that painted by the Miller, is laid in Cambridge. But the two Cambridge clerks are less closely drawn than their brethren at Oxford; and they are be-nighted at Trumpington, which seems unnecessary and to betray the poet's ignorance of the neighbourhood. The great College of this tale called "Solar-halle" is probably King's Hall, founded in 1337 by the poet's royal master, Edward III. Some of King's Hall, which was finally absorbed by Henry VIII.'s great College of Trinity, still exists; notably, the Great Gate (now of Trinity) which was finished in 1535, only eleven years before the learned tyrant dissolved his ancestor's foundation.

A. R. BAYLEY.

March 7.

"SIX-SHILLING" NOVELS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Uniformity of price is, I think, very desirable, for it would be a sad nuisance to be charged six shillings, five shillings, four shillings, or three shillings and sixpence on the publishers' estimates of the quality of their author's fiction, as W. J. suggests they should do. Miss Harraden's "Scholar's Daughter" is highly interesting apart from length, breadth or weight or its merit as a story. For this reason. It is one of the very few successful tales which have been first written as a play. Indeed, who but Charles Reade with "Peg Woffington" and Beatrice Harraden with "The Scholar's Daughter" have succeeded, although countless novels have been turned into plays? Perhaps Miss Harraden to the tenth or perhaps the twentieth edition of her story will prefix an introduction describing the genesis of both play and novel, and if she does so perhaps your correspondent in consideration of the additional pages will then buy a copy. Some people there will be who will wait for the sixpenny edition, and several of Miss Harraden's novels have eventually appeared at this price.

R. S. GARNETT.

ITS PRIVATE MAGGOT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your review of Mr. Greenslet's book on Lowell is capital reading—but that very American writer ought not to be blamed for the saying that "No brain but had its private maggot which must have found pitifully short commons sometimes."

That is not Greenslet, but Lowell himself. See the first page of his well-known article on Thoreau in his "Study Windows." Taken with its context the phrase your Reviewer takes offence at is by no means disgusting—it is wonderfully appropriate to the objects of his satire.

WILBUR WATTS PHILLIPS.

[Owing to pressure on our space a number of letters from Correspondents is held over.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY.

Hancock, F. Dunster Church and Priory, their history and architectural features. With many illustrations and plan. 9×6. Pp. xii, 236. Taunton: Barnicott & Pearce; Athenæum Press. 10s. net.

[Prebendary Hancock is Vicar of the beautiful old Somerset town of whose church he writes, and a well-known antiquarian. His book is more or less popular—a feature which he excuses by a graceful compliment to Sir H. Maxwell Lyte.]

Clare, the late Rev. J. B. Wenhaston and Bulcamp, Suffolk, containing curious parish records including Lists of Vicars from 1217 and church-wardens from 1547, an account of old wills and law-suits of the parish, two riots at Bulcamp workhouse and a glossary of old-fashioned words with a description of the recently discovered ancient painting known as "the Wenhaston Doom." 8½×5½. Pp. 119. Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d.

ART.

Rembrandt: A Memorial, 1606-1906. Part I. 14½×10½. Pp. 10+7 Plates. Heinemann, 2s. 6d. net.

[The first instalment of what promises to be a superb work on the great artist whose tercentary is to be celebrated at Leyden next July. It contains a preface by M. Emil Michel, and the first two pages of a study of Rembrandt by the same author.]

Binns, W. Moore. The First Century of English Porcelain. Illustrated. 11½×9½. Pp. xvi, 252. Hurst & Blackett, 42s. net.

[A beautiful book. Mr. Binns, who dedicates it to the memory of his father, Mr. R. W. Binns, F.S.A., writes as "a practical potter with artistic inclinations," and looks more at the technical side of the subject than other historians. There are 77 full-page illustrations, many of them in colour and gold. Index.]

Calvert, Albert F. Moorish Remains in Spain: Being a brief record of the Arabian Conquest of the Peninsula with a particular account of the Mohammedan architecture and decoration in Cordova, Seville, and Toledo. Illustrations and coloured plates. 10×8. Pp. 586. Lane, 42s. net.

Gardner, Ernest Arthur. A Handbook of Greek Sculpture. Revised edition. 8×5½. Pp. xxxii, 591. Macmillan, 10s.

[Mr. Gardner has revised the text of his first edition to keep up with the discoveries made since it appeared, and has added nearly forty pages of Appendix which is entirely new. The book thus remains substantially what it was, but is up to date. New matter yet unpublished, or not yet generally agreed upon, has been omitted as unsuitable for a text-book. There are a number of additional illustrations, and a good Index.]

Druitt, Herbert. A Manual of Costume as illustrated by monumental brasses. With 100 illustrations. 9½×6½. Pp. xxii, 384. The De la More Press, 10s. 6d. net.

[Mr. Druitt's title sufficiently explains the subject of his book. The brasses he studied were English. The book is very handsome, the illustrations excellent, and there are 64 pages of indices.]

Les Maitres de l'Art. Rosenthal, Léon. Géricault. 8½×6. Pp. 176. Paris: Librairie de l'art ancien et moderne. 3f. 50.

[This is a volume in the series published under the patronage of the Minister of Public Instruction. Dr. Rosenthal deals with the life and art of Géricault as the forerunner of the realistic painters of half a century later. "Born under David and dying under Delacroix, he was neither classic nor romantic." Good reproductions of little known works, and ample tables.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Norgate, G. Le Grys. The Life of Sir Walter Scott. With 53 illustrations. By Jenny Wylie. 9×6. Pp. x, 365. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net. (See p. 256.)

[Mr. Norgate proposes to make an attempt to supersede Lockhart. His work is "a brief story for readers of to-day." There is a chapter by Mr. Francis Watt, of the Middle Temple, on Scott as a lawyer. Good Index.]

Stevenson, Mrs. M. I. Letters from Samoa, 1891-1895. Edited and arranged by Marie Clothilde Balfour. With 12 illustrations. 7½×5½. Pp. x, 340. Methuen, 6s. net.

[A second and last instalment of the letters written by Mrs. Stevenson, the mother of Robert Louis Stevenson, during her journeys to Samoa and her life there. The first series, also edited by Mr. Balfour, was called "From Saranac to the Marquesas." In 1891 she sailed for Samoa, and remained there till after Stevenson's death in December 1894.]

A Memoir of Archbishop Markham, 1719-1807. By his great-grandson, Sir Clements Markham, K.C.B. 9×6. Pp. vii, 96. Clarendon Press, Oxford. 5s. net.

CLASSICAL.

The New Classical Library, edited by Dr. Emil Reich. Plutarch's Lives of Alexander, Pericles, Caius Caesar, Aemilius Paulus. Translated by W. R. Frazer. 7½×5. Pp. 263. Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. net.

DRAMA.

Binyon, Laurence. Paris and Oenone. A tragedy in one act. 7½×5½. Pp. 23. Constable, 1s. net. (See p. 263.)

Balbi, J. L. Regeneration, a play in three acts and an epilogue. 7½×4½. Pp. 79. The International Copyright Bureau.

[Disagreeing with Shakespeare, Mr. Balbi holds that the stage should not be a mirror to nature but a beautiful vista. He is tired, like most of us, of the stock subjects of the drama, and anxious to increase its scope for beneficence. One of the characters has invented an "atmosphere producer," which is to reform the state of society mainly by persuading those unfit to be parents to remain childless. A pamphlet in play-form.]

EDUCATION.

Hodgson, Geraldine. Primitive Christian Education. 8×6. Pp. xii, 287. Edinburgh: Clark, 4s. 6d. net.

[Miss Hodgson, who is lecturer on the history of education at University College, Bristol, has written an extremely valuable book on the educational work of the early Church. Early Christianity has hitherto been regarded as the deadly foe of education: in Miss Hodgson's opinion its critics have been narrow-minded and not a little unfair, and her work attempts to ascertain what is the truth. Such a book ought to have an Index.]

The Imperial Reader, being a descriptive account of the territories forming the British Empire. Edited by the Hon. William Pember Reeves and E. E. Speight. 7½×5½. Pp. 444. Hodder & Stoughton, 2s. 6d. net.

[A class-book giving accounts, written by travellers and administrators, of the regions of the Empire and the civilising mission of England. All the names of the authors are famous, and the whole book admirably done. Many illustrations and a map.]

Crook, C. W. Helps to the Study of Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream". 7½×5. Pp. xlvii, 93. Ralph, Holland, 1s. 9d.

- Marlborough's Self-taught series. Italian self-taught. By C. A. Thimm. 3rd edition revised and enlarged by G. Dallia Vecchia. Pp. 120. 1s. and 1s. 6d. Turkish self-taught. By C. A. Thimm, revised by Professor G. Hagopian; 4th edition. Pp. 138. 2s. and 2s. 6d. Each 7½ x 5. Marlborough & Co.
- English School Texts. Edited by W. H. D. Rouse. Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, parts i. and ii.; More's Utopia; The Age of the Antonines (first three chapters of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire"); Macaulay's History (third chapter); Edmund Burke's Speeches on America. Each 6½ x 4½; and about 130 pp. Blackie, 6d. each.
- Little French Classics: Daudet's La Dernière Classe, Edited by H. W. Preston, 8d.; Les Quatre Fils Aymon, 6d.; Bouilly's L'Abbe de L'Eppe, Edited by W. G. Hartog; Stahl's Les Aventures de Tom Pouce, Edited by H. H. Horton; Poésies Choisies, Introduction and notes by A. Mayenobe, 4d. Blackie.
- Latin Texts: Livy—Book VI. Edited by E. S. Thompson, 8d. net; Virgil—Aeneid, Books I.—IV. Edited by S. E. Winbolt, 6d. net each; Cæsar—De Bello Gallico, V., VI. Edited by W. H. D. Rouse, 6d. net; Ilias Latina, Edited by W. H. S. Jones, 6d. net. Each 7 x 4½. Blackie.
- Curtius—V. Hartel. Griechische Schulgrammatik, Kurzgefasste Ausgabe bearbeitet von Dr. Florian Weigel. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 176. Vienna: F. Tempsky; Leipzig: G. Freytag. K.2 and K.2.50.

FICTION.

- Hueffer, Ford Madox. The Fifth Queen. Alston Rivers, 6s. (See p. 261.)
- Griffith, George. The Mummy and Miss Nicotris. A phantasy of the fourth dimension. 7½ x 5. Werner Laurie, 6s.
- Lee, Vernon. Hauntings, fantastic stories. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xi, 236. Lane. 3s. 6d. net.
- [Uniform with "Hortus Vitae," "The Enchanted Woods," and "The Spirit of Rome." Four stories, not ghost stories "in the scientific sense," but of the supernatural drawn from the past.]
- Silberad, Una L. Curayl. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Constable, 6s.
- Oxenham, John. Giant Circumstance, with illustrations in colour. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 344. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- Lewis, Alfred Henry. The Sunset Trail. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 393. Brown, Langham, 6s.
- Stanton, Coralie; and Hosken, Heath. Miriam Lemaire, Money-Lender. 8 x 5½. Pp. 271. Cassell, 3s. 6d.
- [Certain facts and episodes in the career of a brilliant, clever, and remarkable, if unscrupulous, woman, from the actual observation of one who knew her intimately.]
- Glasgow, Ellen. The Wheel of Life. 7½ x 5. Pp. 474. Constable, 6s.
- Lowerison, Harry. From Paleolithic to Motor-Car; or Heacham Tales. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 209. Whiten, 3s. 6d. net.
- Hilliers, Ashton. The Mistakes of Miss Manisty. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 288. Ward, Lock, 6s.
- Delannoy, Burford. Prince Charlie. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 318. Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.
- Moberley, L. G. That Preposterous Will. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Ward, Lock, 6s.
- Alexander, Eleanor. The Lady of the Well. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 328. Arnold, 6s.
- Harker, L. Allen. Concerning Paul and Fiammetta. With a preface by Kate Douglas Wiggin. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 252. Arnold, 5s.
- Barr, Robert. The Triumphs of Eugène Valmont. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 307. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
- Lewis, R. M. The Divine Gift. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 264. Lamley, 5s.
- Pier, Arthur Standard. The Ancient Grudge. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 477. Dean, 6d.
- Capes, Bernard. Loaves and Fishes. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Methuen, 6s.
- [Twenty-two stories, many of which have appeared in various journals.]

GENEALOGY.

- Bartholomew, J. G. Atlas of the World's Commerce. Part I. 16 x 10½. Newnes, 6d. net. (See p. 269.)

HISTORY.

- Schulte, Dr. Aloys. Kaiser Maximilian I. als Kandidat für den päpstlichen Stuhl, 1571. 9½ x 6½. Pp. viii, 86. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot, M.2.20.
- [Dr. Schulte, Professor of History in Bonn University, has already touched on this matter in his "Die Fugger in Rome," and now, having acquired some new material, gives the public a fuller account.]

LAW.

- Lamas, Alvaro. Desde La Carcel. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 107. Estudios Profesionales. Santiago: Imprenta y Litografia Universo.
- [By a Spanish advocate. Studies of 7 law cases.]
- Boyd, William K. The Ecclesiastical Edicts of the Theodosian Code. Vol. xxiv. Number 2 of the Studies in History, Economics and Public Law edited by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia University. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 122. New York: The Columbia University Press. London: King, 3s. net.
- [Dr. Boyd's Dissertation for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy in Columbia University.]

LITERATURE.

- Stubbs, Charles William, D.D., Dean of Ely. The Christ of English Poetry, being the Hulsean lectures delivered before the University of Cambridge 1904-1905. 8½ x 6½. Pp. x, 216. Dent, 6s. net.
- [Cynwulf, Langland, Shakespeare, Browning: each lecture being followed by notes and illustrations.]
- A Descriptive Catalogue of the Western Manuscripts in the Library of Queen's College, Cambridge*. Pp. 29. A Descriptive Catalogue of the Western Manuscripts in the Library of Clare College, Cambridge. Pp. 51. Described by Montague Rhodes James, Litt.D., F.B.A. Each 11 x 7½. Cambridge University Press.
- A. E. Some Irish Essays. 7 x 4½. Pp. 39. London: Brimley Johnson & Ince. Dublin: Maunsell. 1s. net.
- [This is the first of "The Tower Press Booklets," edited by Seumas O'Sullivan and James Connolly. A. E.'s work is well known to a wide circle in England and Ireland. The papers in this volume are reprinted from English and Irish journals. The next volume is to be poems by T. G. Keohler.]
- Literarhistorische Forschungen. Zenker, Rudolf. Boeve-Amlæthus, das alt-französische epos von Boeve de Hamtome und der Ursprung der Hamlet-sage. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xx, 418. 9s. net. Fritz Resa, Dr. Phil. Nathaniel Lees Trauerspiel Theodosius, or the Force of Love. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 219.

- 4s. 6d. net. Melchior, Felix. Heinrich Heines Verhältnis zu Lord Byron. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 169. 3s. 6d. net. Berlin and Leipzig: Emil Felber; London: Williams & Norgate.

[These books are good examples of what German scholars are doing for our literature. Professor Zenker writes a very learned monograph on what we knew as "Bevis of Hampton" and the origin of the story of Hamlet: Dr. Fritz Resa reprints Lee's tragedy, The Force of Love, from the 1620 quarto (it has not, we believe, been reprinted in England since Bell's modern British Drama, 1811), and tells us all about Lee and his works: Herr Melchior discourses on Heine's personal and literary relation with Byron.]

- Noreen, Adolf. Vårt Språk. Bd V, 2. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 128. Lund: Gleerups. Kr. 2.

MILITARY.

- Ashmead-Bartlett, Ellis. Port Arthur. The Siege and Capitulation. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xiv, 511. Blackwood, 21s. net.
- [The author joined the Japanese Third Army early in August 1904, remained attached to General Nogi's headquarters till January 17, 1905, and entered Port Arthur with the Japanese. His book is illustrated, and well furnished with maps and plans. Index.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- The Arbiter in Council*. 9½ x 5½. Pp. 567. Macmillan, 10s. net.
- [A series of discussions at a conference convened with the idea that the proceedings should be reported and form a book which "would help people to reason about war and peace." Discussions on: The causes and consequences of war; Modern warfare; Private war and the duel; On cruelty; Perpetual peace, or the federation of the world; A plea for arbitration; The political economy of war; and Christianity and war.]
- Hatch, E. F. G., M.P. A Reproach to Civilization. A treatise on the Problem of the Unemployed and some suggestions for a possible solution. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 110. Waterlow, 1s. net.
- Hazell's Annual Guide to the New House of Commons*. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 75. Hodder & Stoughton, 6d. net.
- Mantoux, Paul. La Révolution Industrielle au XVIIIe. Siècle; essai sur les commencements de la grande industrie moderne au Angleterre. 10 x 6½. Pp. 544. Paris: Publications de la Société nouvelle de librairie et d'édition; Cornély, f.10.
- [This is No. IX. of the Bibliothèque de la fondation Thiers, of which we noticed No. VIII., "Mariana historien," some months ago. M. Mantoux has written a full and learned history of the growth of industry in England in the eighteenth century, from a scientific and sociological point of view; and his book also contain a very full and valuable bibliography.]
- Van der Lith, P. A., and Snelleman, Joh. F. Encyclopaedie van Nederlandsch-Indië, met medewerking van verschillende ambtenaren, geleerden en officieren. Afl. 40 and 41. Vordingsmiddelen—Wapens der inlandsche bevolking. Each 10½ x 7½. Pp. 128. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff; Leiden: Brill.

ORIENTAL.

- The Wisdom of the East Series. The Classics of Confucius. Book of History (Shu King). Rendered and compiled by W. Gorn Old. 6½ x 5. Pp. 67. Murray, 1s. net.

PHILOSOPHY.

- Thorndike, Lynn. The Place of Magic in the intellectual History of Europe. Vol. xxiv, No. 1 of the Studies in History, Economics and Public Law, edited by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia University. 10 x 6½. Pp. 110. New York: The Columbia University Press. London: King, 3s. net.
- [Carries the story to the end of the Roman Empire.]
- Marshall, Thomas. Aristotle's Theory of Conduct. 9½ x 6. Pp. 578, xxi. Unwin, 21s. net.
- [A general introduction in which the purport of the Ethics is set forth, and each chapter has a special introduction and explanatory remarks. Gives a paraphrase of the text—"sometimes full, sometimes condensed, in which repeated passages are left out and some liberties are taken in the way of omission and transposition."]
- Santayana, George. The Life of Reason, or the Phases of Human Progress. Vol. V. Reason in Science. 7½ x 5½. Pp. x, 320. Constable, 5s. net.
- [For reviews of former volumes of this work see the ACADEMY, June 3 and December 16, 1905.]

POETRY.

- Wiley, Sara King. Alcestis, and other poems. 7 x 5. Pp. 60. The Macmillan Co., 5s. net.
- Frankau, Gilbert. The X Y Z of Bridge. Illustrated by Lance Thackeray. 7½ x 9½. Pp. 47. King, 1s. net.
- [Very amusing verses setting forth the dreadful fate of the only man in the world who would not play Bridge. Illustrated with very amusing drawings.]
- The Poems of Charles Baudelaire*, selected and translated from the French with an introductory study, by F. P. Sturm. 5½ x 4½. Pp. liii, 135. The Canterbury Poets. Walter Scott, 1s.
- Rose of My Life*. 5½ x 4. Pp. vii, 69. The Chiswick Press, 2s. 6d. net.

POLITICAL.

- Moore, Harold, E. Our Heritage in the Land. 8½ x 5½. Pp. viii, 136. King, 1s. net.
- [Recommendations for Relief of the Unemployed, Training of Emigrants and Hand Husbandry. The book is founded on three chapters in Mr. Moore's well-known "Back to the Land," with much additional information drawn from recent experience. Sir William Mather contributes an introduction and the text of the scheme to provide work on the land for the Unemployed by State aid, which he laid before the Parliamentary Committee on the Unemployed in 1895.]
- Bérard, Victor. L'Affaire Marocaine. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 457. Paris: Armand Colin, 4f.
- [Un exposé complet et impartial de l'Affaire Marocaine." M. Bérard first describes Morocco; then gives the history of its relations with France since the sixteenth century, and proceeds to examine the Anglo-French agreement, the Franco-Spanish agreement, and the Franco-German disagreement. An admirable chapter on The Reforms concludes the volume. M. Bérard confesses that France has made great mistakes and is paying the consequences. The book is written as only a French publicist can write on such themes—brilliantly.]

Hishida, Seiji G. The International Position of Japan as a Great Power. Vol. xxiv, No. 3 of the Studies in History, Economics and Public Law, edited by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia University. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 289. New York: The Columbia University Press. London: King, 8s. net.

["Strongly believing that what has been accomplished by Japan in the interest of civilisation is an earnest of what will be done hereafter, I have endeavoured by careful research to trace Japan's historic policy in dealing with foreign nations." Thus writes Dr. Hishida in his Preface. And he finds (laying several bogies—yellow perils and so on—by the way) that the mission of Japan is to lead other eastern nations to the light of western civilisation, without abandoning national individualism. The text of the Treaty of Portsmouth, 1905, appears as an Appendix.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Simon, D. W. The Redemption of Man: Discussions bearing on the Atonement. Second Edition, revised. 9 x 6. Pp. xvi, 352. Melrose, 4s. 6d. net.

[The first edition of this book was published in 1889. Professor Simon has omitted his Preface and Introduction, and has incorporated a new chapter on "Justification and the Death of Christ according to the Apostle Paul."]

A Norman Gale Treasury, selected by Albert Broadbent. 6 x 3½. Pp. 45. The Broadbent Treasuries, No. 12. Manchester: Broadbent, 3d.

[Songs of Grey and Gold, Love Songs, Bird Songs, Song for Little People. No cricket songs.]

Dunbar, Paul Lawrence. The Jest of Fate. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 268. Jarrold, n. p. [A second and cheaper edition of the novel published in 1902 by the Negro poet who died recently of consumption.]

The Works of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher. Edited by Arnold Glover and A. R. Waller. In ten vols. Vol. ii. 7½ x 6. Pp. 527. Cambridge English Classics. Cambridge University Press. 4s. 6d. net.

[Contains The Elder Brother, The Spanish Curate, Wit Without Money, Beggars Bush, The Humorous Lieutenant, The Faithful Shepherdess.]

Readings in the Inferno of Dante, based upon the Commentary of Benvenuto da Imola, and other Authorities. With text and literal translation by the Hon. William Warren Vernon. Introduction by Edward Moore. 2 vols. 8½ x 5½. Pp. lxxxix, 1282. Methuen, 15s. net.

[First edition published in 1894; now largely rewritten.]

Palgrave's Golden Treasury of the Best Songs and Lyrics. 6½ x 4. Pp. 448. Dent. The Temple Classics. 1s. 6d. net.

[Edited by Edward Hutton. The title-page does not mention that Mr. Hutton has added a number of lyrics discovered since 1861, when the Golden Treasury was first published, lyrics by poets deceased since that date, and Spenser's "Epithalamion." The volume does not contain Palgrave's notes, nor the Index of writers with dates of birth and death, but it has a list of the poems in order. It is founded on the first edition of the Golden Treasury, and does not contain all the poems added in later editions.]

The Works of Flavius Josephus. Translated by William Whiston and newly edited by D. S. Margoliouth, D.Litt. 9 x 6½. Pp. xxv, 989. Routledge, 5s. net.

[Dr. Margoliouth has only altered Whiston's translation when improvement was necessary. He adds an introduction and notes, summarising the results of recent research. Whiston's notes and dissertations are omitted. The book has a good Index and is a marvel of cheap production.]

Browning, Robert. Dramatis Personæ. 6½ x 4. Pp. 167. Dent. The Temple Classics. 1s. 6d.

[Contains a bibliographical note by Miss Marian Edwardes.]

Holyoake, George Jacob. Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life. Sixth Impression. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xii, 320. Unwin, 2s. 6d. net.

Byles, John. The Legend of St. Mark, being Sunday morning talks to the children. Second edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 141. Alston Rivers, 1s. 6d. net.

Sidey, Rev. Arthur C. Mnemonics in a Nutshell, or Hints on Memory Training. Third edition, revised and enlarged. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 72. Everett, 1s. net.

["For ministers, students, teachers, elocutionists, vocalists, and general readers." A slightly enlarged edition of a common-sense book that has been found very useful.]

THEOLOGY.

A Declaration on Biblical Criticism. By 1725 Clergy of the Anglican Communion. Edited by Hubert Handley, M.A., Vicar of St. Thomas's, Camden Town, N.W., Hon. Sec. of the Committee. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 149. Black, 2s. net.

[This volume consists of the letter sent by a Committee of 101 members, including the Deans of Winchester, Durham and Ely, to every Anglican clergyman in the United Kingdom and the Colonies and abroad inviting them to sign a declaration expressing their conviction that the critical problems of the New Testament should be faced, and asking for authoritative encouragement to face them; the names of the Committee, the text of the Declaration, and the names of the 1725 (out of 32,000) who signed it, and certain subsidiary matter.]

Bain, John A. The New Reformation: Recent Evangelical movements in the Roman Catholic Church. 8½ x 6. Pp. 283. Religion in Literature and Life. Edinburgh: Clark, 4s. 6d. net.

Gwatkin, Henry Melville. The Eye for Spiritual Things, and other Sermons. 8½ x 6. Pp. 261. Edinburgh: Clark, 4s. 6d. net.

[Twenty-eight of Professor Gwatkin's sermons.]

TRAVEL.

Barry, Lt.-Col., J.P. At the Gates of the East: a book of travel among historic wonderlands. With 33 illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. xviii, 261. Longmans, 6s. net.

[A capital book: at once practical and "aesthetic." Colonel Barry, whose letters are reprinted from the Times of India, made two tours, Dalmatia and its Balkan hinterland in the spring, Greece and Constantinople in the autumn. Writing as a medical man, he hopes to win people from "the Cult of the Spas." His book is well illustrated from photographs and makes excellent reading. Index.]

THE BOOKSHELF

We have before us Part I. of Messrs. George Newnes's new Atlas of the World's Commerce (6d. net). To deal first with the aim and scope of the whole work, which is to be complete in twenty-two shilling parts published fortnightly: Its full title is "Atlas of the World's Commerce, a new series of maps with descriptive text and diagrams showing products, imports, exports, commercial conditions and economic statistics of the countries of the world, compiled from the latest official returns at the Edinburgh Geological Institute and edited by J. G. Bartholomew, F.R.S.E., etc." It regards the world, that is, from the merchant's point of view, as a vast commercial Exchange, and the complete work will be a key to the merchandise of the world—a summary of its material resources. The text will consist of the following articles: Economic Geography; The Commodities of Commerce; Development of New Lands; Principal Travel Routes; Statistical Tables, etc.; and, at the end, a Commercial Gazetteer of Countries and Seaports. The plates and diagrams, of which there will be more than one thousand, nearly all new, fall into seven divisions; General Physical, Political and Economic Aspects; Communication and Transport; Regional Maps; Distribution of Food Products; Distribution of Textile Materials, etc.; Distribution of Mineral Products; and Miscellaneous Products. Part I. contains the first four pages [Abaca—Blue] of Mr. W. A. Taylor's "Description and Geographical Distribution of the Principal Commodities of Commerce," which is really a dictionary, illustrated with diagrams, of all that is bought and sold all the world over; and sheets 61-64, "Wheat," and 85-89 "Coffee." The system is in both sets the same. First comes a General Summary; then a coloured diagram showing at a glance the development in the world's production of wheat from 1891 to 1902 stated in millions of bushels, and of coffee from 1832 to 1903. Then we have coloured diagrams showing the total annual production of wheat (average for years 1901-3) all over the world, and of coffee (average for years 1900-1902). Turning the page we find double-page coloured maps, showing in one case the wheat-growing countries, with larger scale inset maps of England and Wales, and other important wheat-growing lands, and an important small map of wheat-importing countries; and in the case of coffee the production (red) and consumption (blue) all over the world, also with special maps of important districts. The fourth page of the sheet contains a coloured diagram of the annual average of the imports of wheat and consumption of coffee in various countries; a coloured diagram of the average consumption of wheat and of coffee per head in various countries; another of the chief sources of the British supply of wheat and of coffee, and a fourth showing the rise and fall in the market price of wheat and of coffee in England for something over a hundred years. Each diagram is accompanied by a short note.

After looking at the tables, we are not surprised to hear that Mr. Bartholomew and his coadjutors have been digging for years in Blue Books, Returns, and all other kinds of volumes and statistics, in order to put before the public, in a form that can be read at a glance, knowledge, that can only otherwise be obtained by long and exacting study. The information is absolutely clear, and has never before been collected into so handsome or so accessible a form. Recent political events in Britain have aroused the public interest enormously in questions of commerce, but it is not only à propos of this that the Atlas makes its appeal. It is not only a novel publication which shows the world in a new light, but an enduring reference work of essential knowledge which must continue to be consulted for information by experts, merchants, and the public alike. As to the price, no one who sees it but will wonder that it is possible to produce a work entailing so much labour and including such superb specimens of map-engraving and printing for twenty-two shillings.

Reynolds-Rathbone Diaries and Letters, 1753-1839. Edited by Mrs. Eustace Greg (Constable: privately printed).—"I look upon critics at best to be but ill-natured wits," wrote Hannah Darby to her aunt in 1753. "It was not because I thought thou was a critic that I was afraid to write . . . but because I know there is a respect and awe which ought to be upon my mind when I write to one so much my superior in years and understanding; which there is, but I know too well I don't shew it much, neither in my writing nor conversation." It is largely because they "don't shew it much," but are unaffected and natural that the letters and journals of this able and delightful family must long continue to charm and perhaps to tantalise its descendants. Indirectly and with deep reserves, the volume reveals the characters of four or five ladies of the upper middle class, as rare and beautiful in mind and person as any of their day; but especially of Mrs. William Rathbone, whose diary for the years 1784-1809 is marked by much quaint if unconscious humour of expression in its too laconic record of reading, of friendship, of domestic affairs, and of public events. How exquisitely gentle is the note of rebellion against Quaker observances enshrined in the following entry: "Sunday, July 17th (1785).—This day we were blest with some showers of rain which prevented my going to meeting." A letter from Seaton in 1800 contains an irresistible description of children at the seaside: "Reba, bathed four times, and was very good, tho' she did not like it. John was pretty good the first time, only he said they knocked his nose against a rock, which made him cry; but I believe that was a mistake." One trusts it may have been. Mrs. Eustace Greg has done well to render accessible some of the memoirs of the notable Quaker families of the north, from whom she herself is descended. The whole book breathes a quiet, soothing charm, not unmixed with a shy humour; and the reflection strikes us forcibly that there are few, if any, such women nowadays, so full of dignity, sweet reticence and restrained feeling. The book throws a good deal of interesting light on the home life and the manners and customs of the time; part of it hints at a pleasing little romance; and if there are more such papers in the editor's possession, it might be worth while to give them to the world. The book is handsomely got up, edited with taste and discretion, and well illustrated with portraits.

Some few years ago we won some real enjoyment from a little book called Erebus, full of delicate verse with a rather melancholy sweetness. Lyrics by the Author of Erebus (Mathews, 2s. 6d. net), a volume equally small, equally delicate, and more mature, shows that in the intervening years the poet has read Blake with understanding, and gained rather than lost from observing the naïve technique that sends many of its imitators into babbling monotony. These lyrics are not monotonous, but varied, to an extent that surprises, both in metres and in subjects. Sometimes the finishing is a little careless and the rhythm hesitating, but more often the verses are finely polished, and the author shows herself capable of purposeful metrical wavering, which is very difficult to accomplish without harshness, and, at the right time, full of possibilities in evoking emotion. We should like to quote the whole of "The Irish Girl" as an instance of this; but it is too long to be quoted in full, and too good not to lose in partition, so that we take this fragment instead, from a dialogue in song:

Oh come thou not a King for me,
And a Queen's King come not, prithee,
Nay, but a beggar hungrily,
And a wayfarer thirstily,
A pilgrim halting wearily.
Yea, come an outlaw hastening
From will-o'-wisp amid the reed
When skies are strewn with starry seed,
Thy cloak entangled with a briar,
And come without a crowning deed,
And come to me without the ring,
That I may give thee food and mead,
And music for thy mood's desire,
And healing hands and hearts of fire

Respublica. A.D. 1553. A play on the social condition of England at the accession of Queen Mary. Edited for the Early English Text Society by Leonard A. Magnus. With Introductions, Notes and Glossaries. (Kegan Paul, 12s.)—There is no learned society that so richly deserves the support of scholars, students and men of letters as the Early English Text Society. "Until all Early English MSS. are printed," is its doctrine, "no proper History of our Language or Social Life is possible." Since 1864, when it was founded by its Director, Dr. Furnivall, the society has spent over £30,000 in printing and publishing texts; and its editors have ready a large number more which only lack of funds keeps back. A modest two guineas a year will entitle subscribers to all its publications, both in the Original Series and its Extra Series, and it appears to us that "value received," not only in the consciousness of having assisted a necessary and too long deferred work, but in the actual books themselves, should persuade many "inheritors of the speech of Cynwulf, Chaucer and Shakespeare" to avail themselves of this opportunity. As an example of the Society's publications, let us take the most recent, their political morality of Respublica (one of the Macro MSS.), edited by Mr. Leonard Magnus. It was written (we make bold statements when Mr. Magnus points to clues and deducts from scattered hints) for performance at the Coronation of Queen Mary, 1553, and postponed for one year. Its author, Mr. Magnus thinks, was very probably Parson Nicholas Udall, the author of Ralph Roister Doister; and it displays the post-Reformation miseries—debased coinage, impastured plough-lands, greedy land-owners, impoverished peasantry, a bankrupt exchequer, and the rest—that followed the Somerset and Northumberland regencies in the reign of Edward VI. It shows the glowing hopes with which Mary was welcomed to the throne, and nothing of the despair that followed her use of power. More than that, it is very amusing to read. There is, of course, the moral personification of the Morality: Avarice, Insolence, Oppression, and Adulation, the four "Vices," representing, perhaps, four specific statesmen; Misericordia, Veritas, Justitia and Pax, the four usual good qualities, and Respublica, a widow. Besides these there is Nemesis (= Queen Mary) and an amusing person, People, "representing the poore Commontie," who speaks a tongue that is meant to be Devon or Cornwall, and (Udall being by birth a Hampshire man, and having taught school in the North) succeeds in being a strange but instructive jumble of many dialects. It is amusing to note, too, that People was the original inventor of what Lewis Carroll called "portmanteau words": e.g., a delightful word "policate," made up of "polished" and "delicate," which we commend to the use of reviewers in a hurry. Besides all the allusions to the history of the period, we get a play which, if by no means free from the common faults of the Morality, shows a rudimentary sense of character and some dramatic power; and Mr. Magnus has fitted it with an introduction, notes, glossaries, etc., which explain a vast number of the allusions and bring the play into close touch with the history of the times, besides doing full justice to its linguistic interest.

SEELEY & Co.'s NEW BOOKS

First Edition almost exhausted, Second in Preparation.

THE MAKING OF MODERN EGYPT

By Sir AUCKLAND COLVIN, K.C.S.I.

Late Lieutenant-Governor of the N.W. Provinces and Oude and Comptroller-General in Egypt.

With Portraits and a Map. Demy 8vo, cloth, 18s. net.

"A book which is to be warmly commended. . . The first connected history worthy of the name of the progress of Egypt since the British occupation." MORNING POST.

"Sir Auckland Colvin knows all that there is to be known on the 'The Making of Modern Egypt.' The author's literary ability is conspicuous in passages descriptive of the leading persons of his story."—ATHENÆUM.

TWO YEARS AMONG NEW GUINEA CANNIBALS

By A. E. PRATT.

With 54 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. net.

"A book of vivid enterprise from beginning to end."—OUTLOOK.

"A travel record which, in its lucid description of new scenes, strange people, and rich naturalist rewards, is attractive throughout." MANCHESTER COURIER.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS' DISCOURSES. Edited with Introductions and Notes on Text and Illustrations, by ROGER FRY. With 32 Full-page Illustrations, extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A most interesting edition."—SPECTATOR.

"Of real value and importance."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

THE CATHEDRAL BUILDERS IN ENGLAND. By E. S. PRIOR, F.S.A., Author of "A History of Gothic Art in England." With 4 Plates printed in Colour and many other Illustrations, super-royal 8vo, sewed, 5s. net; or in cloth, gilt top, 7s. net.

"Most interesting as well as learned and thoughtful."—MORNING POST.

LONDON: SEELEY & CO., Limited, 38 Great Russell Street.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER
FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM
YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the "Westminster Gazette.")

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS
THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND
MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR
SPECIMEN COPY.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Fishing. Over 500 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated] [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SIX NEW MUSICAL WORKS

- Over 400 pages. 8vo, cloth, 10s.
- (1) GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT OF MUSIC Described in Chapters on the Study of Musical History. With Annotated Guide to Music Literature. By E. DICKENSON.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net (or paper covers, 1s. 6d. net).
  - (2) CHOPIN AS REVEALED BY EXTRACTS FROM HIS DIARY. By Count TARNOWSKI. From the Polish by N. JANOTHA. Portraits.
Crown 8vo, boards, 5s.
  - (3) THE ITALIAN SCHOOL OF FLORID SONG, Observations on the Florid Song and Ancient and Modern Singers and Singing by P. F. TOSI. Useful for all Performers Instrumental as well as Vocal. Reprint of this celebrated work as translated by Galilei in 1743.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
  - (4) THE DEEPER SOURCES OF THE BEAUTY AND EXPRESSION OF MUSIC. By JOSEPH GODDARD. With many Musical Examples
2 vols. Crown 8vo, cloth, 10s.
  - (5) LIFE AND LETTERS OF CHOPIN. By M. KARASOWSKI. NEW AND REVISED EDITION. Translated by E. HILL. With Extra Portraits and Facsimile.
8vo, sewed, 1s.
  - (6) THE PLACE OF SCIENCE IN MUSIC. By H. SAINT-GEORGE.

W. REEVES, 83 Charing Cross Road, W.C.

THE AUTOTYPE Co.

74 NEW OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.C.

Reproductions in Monochrome
of Famous Works of Art

By the AUTOTYPE Permanent Process.

Amongst the numerous publications may be mentioned :—

Selections from the National Gallery, London, the Wallace Collection, the Tate Gallery, the Walker Art Gallery (Liverpool).

Drawings by Holbein from the Royal Collection, Windsor Castle.

Selected Examples of Sacred Art from various Collections. Etchings by Rembrandt.

Drawings by Albert Durer.

Pictures from the Louvre, Luxembourg, Paris.

Prospectus of above issues will be sent free on application. Full particulars of all the Company's publications are given in

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE. — Now Ready. New EDITION. With upwards of 150 Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes, and 23 Tint-Block Illustrations. For convenience of reference the publications are arranged alphabetically under Names. Post free, One Shilling.

A Visit of Inspection is invited to

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1768

MARCH 24, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

HEAD MASTER REQUIRED (after Summer vacation) for Westminster City School. Subject to provisions of Scheme the Governors will proceed to fill this vacancy early in May. Candidates must be graduates of a University in the United Kingdom and be under 45 years of age. On present attendance the stipend and fees offered will amount to about £600 a year, exclusive of superannuation fund, and good unfurnished house, rent and rate free, coals and gas. Send addressed foolscap envelope for printed particulars. Applications must reach the undersigned not later than April 19.

C. SPENCER SMITH,
Clerk.

Office:
53 Palace Street,
Westminster, S.W.

EDUCATION SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Prospectuses and every information supplied to Parents FREE OF CHARGE. State Requirements.—UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS BUREAU, 122 Regent Street, W. Established 1858.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL, WEST KENSINGTON.

AN EXAMINATION will be held at the above School on Tuesday, April 3, 1906, and on the following days for filling up about seven vacancies on the Foundation.

Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Bursar.

ST. PAUL'S GIRLS' SCHOOL, BROOK GREEN, W.

AN EXAMINATION for Foundation Scholarships, open to Girls under sixteen years of age, will be held at the School on April 3, 4, and 5. These Scholarships exempt the holders from the payment of Tuition Fees.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Headmistress at the School.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

HUGUENOT PEDIGREES IN GREAT BRITAIN, and prior to emigration from France. Genealogical guide to French families, and some thousand pedigrees, mostly MS. and private sources. Also French Canadian pedigrees.—C. E. LART, Charmouth, Dorset, and London.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.
MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

BOOKS

Largest Stock in London of
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDER STOCKS,
All in perfectly new condition
as originally published,
but at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES,
February Supplementary Catalogue just Ready.

WILLIAM GLAISHER
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265 High Holborn, London,

JUST PUBLISHED.

CATALOGUE (No. CIV.) OF SECOND-HAND FRENCH BOOKS, comprising History and Literature—Memoirs—Biography and Correspondence—Art—Folk-lore—Travel—Fiction, etc.

MONTHLY LIST (MARCH) OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS consisting chiefly of Works dealing with the Topography of the British Isles; also of NEWLY PUBLISHED BOOKS, English and Foreign.

N.B.—The APRIL MONTHLY LIST will contain a SELECTION of MUSICAL WORKS.

B. H. BLACKWELL, 50 & 51 Broad St., Oxford.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.
School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

SHAKESPEARE'S WORKS.—The "Cambridge" Edition, edited by W. Aldis Wright, in 40 vols., imperial 8vo, cloth; hand-made paper copy, only 500 printed, good condition; Macmillan, 1893 95, £9.—Walker, 37 Bugate, Leeds.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published, in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net for 35s., 1901-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LTD.

Every month MUDIE'S publish a fresh list (classified and annotated) of their English and Foreign Surplus Books and New Remainders. The list contains popular works on Travel, Sport, Army and Navy, Biography, Theology, Arts, Philosophy, Economics, and Fiction.

List sent post free on application.
30-34 NEW OXFORD ST.; 48 QUEEN VICTORIA ST.
241 BROMPTON ROAD, LONDON.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Art

LADY DESIRES TO MEET ARTIST, willing to paint small child in return for visit during spring. Beautiful seaside country. Every hospitality shown. Golf, motor kept.—Address, L. M., ACADEMY Office, 20 Tavistock Street, Strand, W.C.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GORFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING WANTED.—MSS. and all Literary work executed accurately and promptly. 10d. per 1000 words. Carbon copies.—Mrs. BRAMBLES, 26 Clarence Road, Windsor.

TYPEWRITING BY A GRADUATE, 8d. 1000 words. MSS. of all descriptions accurately typed and promptly returned. Translations 3s. 1000.—CONWAY, 14 Primrose Terrace, Gravesend.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING. AUTHORS' MSS., 10d. 1000 all descriptions: neat, prompt, accurate; duplicating a speciality. Shorthand, translations. References. MICHEL, 23, Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S. W.

“There’s for you, 4/6
and there,
4/6
and there!”
4/6

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE

NEW EDITION

Edited by SIR HENRY IRVING & FRANK A. MARSHALL

Is the ideal Edition, dealing not only with the famous Dramatist's Works, but also with his Life, Surroundings, and Associations. It is at once a complete Literary and Stage History, and a Critical Analysis of each Play dealt with.

The greatest interpreter of “Shakespeare” in recent times, the late Sir Henry Irving, took an important part in the compilation of this important Work.

The publishers believe, with no undue exaggeration but in the spirit of honest satisfaction, that they have not come short of their own ideal: and that they have produced for all—the scholar, the general reader, and the judicious book buyer—a Work that cannot be swept away in the advancing tide of successive books, but will justly take its place as the Edition which the widest class of readers will desire to possess for reading, use, and reference.

The illustrations are of the highest order, and have been specially drawn for this Work: they comprise 550 designs embodied in the text, together with a large number of full-page etchings. In addition there is a series of fine reproductions in colour from Shakespeare's Works, after pictures by Daniel Maclise, R.A., Sir J. E. Millais, Bart., P.R.A., Ford Madox Brown, Charles R. Leslie, R.A., J. Northcote, R.A., Sir E. J. Poynter, P.R.A., W. Holman Hunt, Sir John Gilbert, R.A., &c.

Where so many have combined, it is confidently maintained that departmental excellence has been reached.

By special arrangements with the Publishers we are able to offer this unique Work at a price well within the reach of all. We are not offering this Work on the Instalment Plan, but by a simple arrangement it has been decided to send each subscriber one volume per month as issued from the Press. The first volume is now ready.

There will be fourteen volumes in all, and the price of each volume is only 4s. 6d., which works out at practically only 1s. per week. All we ask is that a Postal Order for 4s. 6d. should be sent us, together with instructions to send the remaining thirteen volumes as published, one each month, and the volume can be paid for on delivery. All carriage is paid, but no order can be accepted except for the complete set. The Work is printed on a paper of fine surface, especially made to give the best results with the hundreds of pen and ink and half tone illustrations scattered throughout its pages. It is beautifully bound in artistically decorated cloth boards, with an ornamental coloured design in gold by Mr. Talwin Morris. The size of each volume is 9 inches by 7 inches.

On completion of the Work, a Handsome Souvenir in the shape of an impression of the admirable Portrait of Sir Henry Irving as Hamlet, from the painting by Edwin Long, R.A., executed in Photogravure, will be presented to each subscriber.

The size of the engraved surface is 18½ by 13½ inches, with margin suitable for framing. This Portrait has been sold regularly for One Guinea net.

We respectfully intimate to subscribers that all orders will be executed in rotation.

The ATHENÆUM says:

“On the care with which the text itself of the plays has been prepared we have nothing but praise to bestow. . . . The general result of this care and labour is . . . so good that we must congratulate all concerned in it. . . . It is profusely illustrated by Mr. Gordon Browne, whose charming designs, executed in facsimile, give it an artistic value superior, in our judgment, to any illustrated edition of Shakespeare with which we are acquainted.”

The SPECTATOR says:

“This handsomely printed edition aims at being popular and practical. Add to these advantages Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations, and enough has been said to recommend an edition which will win public recognition by its unique and serviceable qualities.”

The ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE says:

“Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are amongst the most perfect things of the kind we have ever seen.”

It can truly be said that it is
AN EDITION
FOR ALL
TIME.

TO MANAGER OF
THE ACADEMY
20 Tavistock Street,
London, W.C.

Please send me, carriage paid, the first volume of the New “Henry Irving Shakespeare,” for which I enclose 4s. 6d., I agree to accept the remaining 13 volumes at (4/6 each net) the rate of one each month.

Name.....
Address.....

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	275	The Land-Grave . . . . .	285
Literature :		A Literary Canserie :
Sir Richard Burton . . . . .	277	New Ideas for Old . . . . .	285
The Making of Egypt . . . . .	279	Fiction . . . . .	286
Mr. Lang on Scott . . . . .	280	Fine Art :
The Early English Drama		A Hardy Annual . . . . .	288
Society . . . . .	280	Some Masterpieces of En-
Yone Noguchi . . . . .	282	graving and Etching . . . . .	288
The Age of the Salon . . . . .	282	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	289
Coleridge and the Wedgwood		Correspondence . . . . .	289
Pension—I. . . . .	283	Books Received . . . . .	291
The Bookshelf . . . . .	293

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

"POETRY IN YOUTH AND AGE" is one of several sub-titles which Mr. Mackail might have given to his inaugural lecture, just published by the Clarendon Press. In youth nearly every one reads and enjoys poetry, and most people try to make it. Youth is the season for writing poetry; the boys have all the best of it. In last month's North American Review there was a pleasant article by Mr. Francis E. Clark on "What English Poetry owes to young people," which touched just the fringe of the subject. His list of poets who died young comprises Kirke White, Chatterton, Shelley, Pollok, Wolfe, Marlowe, Beaumont. Keats, Richard Gall, Robert Nicoll and David Gray: the list might be extended indefinitely, if it were to include the poets who did their best work when they were young; All great poets have done their best when they were young; save, perhaps, that exception to almost every rule of human frailty, Shakespeare, who wrote The Tempest in full maturity. Instances will crowd to the mind: the Swinburne of "Poems and Ballads," and the Swinburne of the 'nineties; the Wordsworth of "Resolution and Independence" and the Wordsworth of the Ecclesiastical Sonnets; the Tennyson of "Locksley Hall" and the Tennyson of "Locksley Hall sixty years after." We know what Matthew Arnold thought of the matter—in "one of the most dismal of English lyrics," as Mr. Mackail calls it, "The Progress of Poesy;" and, though there are a few instances of good work done by men in whom the slow and conscious labour of composition has worthily replaced the fire of youth which does the labour unconsciously, the fact remains that in poetry youth has it all.

It would be interesting to discover what poetry is read and valued most by older men. Do they read the poetry written by older men? We believe not. They still read the poetry written by young men; but only so much of it as has "kept"; that is, has the power of appealing to them by qualities which they did not notice when they too were young. For youth loves the sound and scarcely anything else. It goes chanting to itself:

Fair as a rose is our earth, as a rose under water in prison Stretches and swings to the slow, passionate pulse of the sea;

or something of the sort, revelling in the "jolly" feeling it gives. Age cannot read it, and never chants it. It turns to poems that Wordsworth wrote before he was thirty, or to the songs of some other stripling, and finds in them not gratification of the senses alone, but some higher pleasure in which the senses, indeed, have their part, but which knits up senses and judgment, the whole man, and showers upon him consolation and peace and strength. The power of seeing so much more in poetry is one of the pleasures of advancing years to which, we think, Professor William Knight did not refer in his talks on old age in these columns. The power of poetry to please all ages is one of the surest proofs that it is great.

There was mention in Parliament, the other day, of a "war of the future" book, at present appearing serially in this country; and now it appears that Austria is perturbed by the publication of a similar work describing an imaginary campaign between the Empire and the Kingdom of Italy. Evidently this sort of literature has its public; and it is interesting to note how national characteristics are manifested in the writing of it. On the continent, as a rule, the underlying spirit is Chauvinistic. France, before the entente, produced "Sus à l'Angleterre," which exhibited England humbled in the dust. Germany has on more than one occasion similarly demolished us on paper. Our own romances in the genre have, on the contrary, mostly been composed in a spirit of pessimism for the purpose of drawing attention to weak points in the national defences. "The Battle of Dorking" is the classical instance; but there are plenty of others. It cannot be said, of course, that fiction of either sort brings us perceptibly nearer to the day when the sword will be beaten into the ploughshare, but if we are to have it at all, it is better that it should be utilitarian than aggressively bellicose.

A correspondent writes: When Mr. Keir Hardie, in the House the other night, complained that Mr. Hunt had twice uttered the expression: "I don't care a damn!" the Chairman replied that the words had not reached him, but, if used, they were "quite disorderly." Mr. Keir Hardie made his protest, no doubt, in all sincerity, in the interests of public morality. But here was a question for Professor Skeat. Why "quite disorderly"? Did it occur to nobody that the words, if used as spelt in the reports, were devoid of meaning? Mr. Hunt was probably unaware of the fact that what he said was, in effect: "I don't care a brass farthing!" A dam was an Indian coin with a Portuguese origin, the value of which was about the eighth of a penny. I was present in a Bombay Court some years ago when a lawyer defended the use of the phrase by a client—to the discomfiture of the judge.

It is refreshing to meet with an outward and visible sign of a great writer. Those who have travelled on the road of Robert Louis Stevenson will have felt this pleasure. But a work due to the inspiration of another master of style may be found nearer than on a South Sea island—in the University Museum at Oxford, where two skilled men are at present carving the capitals of the columns which surround the Central Court. Mr. Ruskin indicated the spirit of this decorative work in these words: "Your Museum at Oxford is literally the first building raised in England since the close of the fifteenth century, which has fearlessly put to new trial this old faith in nature, and in the genius of the workman who gathered out of nature the materials he needed."

As one stood by the side of one of these workmen and listened to his enthusiastic comments on his task, which is to carve on these capitals representatives of the natural orders of botany, one realised more fully Ruskin's idolatry of nature. On one side stands a sketch of a flower and its foliage; on the other is a tin containing a living specimen of the plant; out of the uneven Taynton stone grows a gem of imitation. The two men have forsaken conventional designs. Their favourite expression is "nature is soft." This softness they have tried with wonderful success to reproduce. Except the carvings over the door of the Chapter House in Southwell Minster we have seen nothing like it in England. Unlike their predecessors the O'Sheas, whose work sometimes reaches real genius, and at other times is very crude, the present sculptors have reached and keep a high stage of natural ornamentation. We can imagine Mr. Ruskin's delight if he could see the carvings of the Jasmine, the Dandelion or the Convolvulus. It is a work which will be a lasting monument to the inspiration of his writings.

The sale at Sotheby's on Tuesday next of the manuscript of "To Mary in Heaven" is naturally arousing widespread interest on the northern side of the border. A correspondent of the Glasgow Herald suggests that "an organised effort should be made by the 50,000 odd fervid Caledonians in London to purchase this precious relic of our national bard." Charles Mackay, in his "Thousand and One Gems," includes, as one would expect, "To Mary;" but "Highland Mary," a truer and in every way more characteristic lyric, which has a place both in Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" and in Mr. Quiller-Couch's Oxford anthology, Mackay rejected. As Mr. Holman Hunt reminded us lately, Tennyson remarked to Palgrave, while Burns was being considered for admission to the "Golden Treasury," that the refrain: "Hear'st thou the groans that rend his breast," had the ring of hysterical insincerity and bombast.

The manuscript of Dr. John Brown's Scottish idyll, "Rab and his Friends," which will be sold at the same time as the Burns holograph, consists of twenty-three pages of small quarto ruled paper, written on both sides, indicating apparently that the story was not originally prepared for the printer. At the end of the manuscript there are some lines, evidently for use when Dr. Brown lectured. "I have in my head," the unprinted words read, "a human and a dog moral, if thought advisable; but I prefer every one being his or her own moralist. J.B." "Rab and his Friends" was first read in his native village: "I read it to the Biggar folk," the author relates, "very frightened, and felt I was reading it ill, and their honest faces intimated as much in their affectionate and puzzled looks." "Rab" was included in the first issue of "Horæ Subsecivæ," a now scarce volume, published in 1858.

ACTIVE EYES

WHEN I happen to take up a novel, •
It gives me no little surprise
To read of the things which the heroes
And heroines do with their eyes.

We'll suppose the scene's laid in a ball-room,
The hero, young, handsome and tall,
Will let his eyes WANDER around him
Till they on the heroine FALL.

Then he'll FIX them upon her a minute,
Until, perhaps, feeling his glance,
Her eyes will MEET his: then the hero
Will ask her to give him a dance.

If the heroine's gifted with shyness
She'll DROP her eyes down, there's no doubt;
But if she's a modern young woman
She'll probably THROW them about.

There will certainly be an engagement,
An affaire de cœur, when, we'll say,
The heroine's eyes and the hero's
Will FOLLOW each other all day.

And of course, when the wedding is over,
Their eyes, that are SWIMMING with bliss,
Will be BENT on each other in rapture
As the four lips meet in a kiss.

We are always being told that our actors are inferior to the French actors, but any one who goes to Terry's to see A Judge's Memory will find good acting making a success of an indifferent play. Mr. Brandon Thomas's comedy ought to have been played as a costume piece, in the "costume" of the Bancroft-Robertson era at the Dusthole, or, better still, the "costume" of 1879, a far-off date which appears to be about the period of Mr. Thomas's ambition. Beyond a dear old plot and some dear old characters—like the good innocent boy who goes to prison to save his brother—we saw nothing in the play, as a play, to attract any one under sixty-five. But the acting is quite another matter. Here is Mr. James Welch—whom the public, forgetting The Man in the Street and other delicate studies in pathos, is too apt to regard as only an object for laughter—playing with his usual extraordinary cleverness a part in which simple pathos and sincerity hold the house entranced. Nearly every one else acts well (the old grand manner of Mr. Fernandez is a thing to study), and the pessimists should go and be convinced that the art is not dead in England.

A writer in the Revue des deux Mondes points out that if a madman is dangerous to society, a person who is half mad may be extremely useful and sometimes even a Superman. The life of Comte, for instance, was a succession of attacks of madness with intervals in which he was half mad and wrote his books. Saint Simon, the inventor of socialism, believed himself to be the Vicar of God, and was honoured one night when he was in prison by a visit from Charlemagne, who said that Saint Simon was as great a philosopher as he (Charlemagne) had been a warrior and a ruler. Most Russian writers have had some affinity with the lunatic. Gogol died, believing himself to be the Alpha and Omega of creation, and Dostoevsky, of whom Mr. Maurice Baring has been writing learnedly in the Morning Post, had like Mahomet, fits of epilepsy, which he declared to be delicious. Tolstoi was not wholly sane even in childhood. When quite young he was seized with a violent wish to fly, and jumped out of a window with disastrous results; his ruling passion in youth was to do nothing like anybody else. Introduced to three girls at once, he fell in love with one, thought it was another, and ended up by worshipping the third. Later, he put on a blouse and worked with the moujiks. What need to mention Tasso, Schumann, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, Edgar Allan Poe, Dr. Johnson, Collins, Cowper, Rousseau, Maupassant, and Zola, who as he walked along the street kept adding up numbers that he saw affixed to the backs of cabs?

The American Critic has commenced publication of the alleged "love-letters of Mme. de Staël to Benjamin Constant." The letters are, no doubt, genuine; but they are not love-letters in any sense of the word. The rupture between the lovers took place in 1808, when Constant married Charlotte von Hardenberg. It was confirmed, three years later, by Mme. de Staël's marriage to Rocca. The correspondence now printed, by Charlotte von Hardenberg's great grand-daughter, the Baroness de Nolde, only begins in August 1813, and is conducted with less warmth of expression than Mme. de Staël commonly employed when writing to the least intimate of her acquaintances. Why the members of the de Broglie family should, as the Critic says they do, object to the publication we are utterly at a loss to conjecture. All the letters to the publication of which they might reasonably have objected were handed to the Duchesse de Broglie by M. Charles de Constant in 1831. If they have not been destroyed, they are in safe custody in the Tower of the Archives at Coppet. The love-story which they tell, and on which much light is thrown by documents in the manuscript department of the Geneva Public Library, is, we understand, the subject of a work which Mr. Francis Gribble has nearly ready for publication.

At the Town Hall, Chelsea, on Monday afternoon, Professor Knight said that the readings he was to give from Browning and Tennyson were an experiment, in response to a wish addressed to him some time ago. He had lectured on the English poets for more than forty years; and written, he feared, too much on some of them. But he found that a feeling had arisen in certain quarters, with which he fully sympathised, that we had now too many oral lectures on our poets; especially since we had so large a library of admirable printed essays on them and endless discussions about them. He thought, with many others, that the time had arrived when sympathetic readings from the great poets might be made more educative and useful, more illustrative and informing, than any new lectures about them were likely to be. He began with Browning, before dealing with our late Laureate; because, if an hour devoted to the reading of Browning should dissipate the notion that he was an obscure thinker and writer, no difficulty would be felt with the poetry of Tennyson. The readings from Browning included the following: "Rabbi Ben Ezra," "Incidents of the French Camp," "Evelyn Hope," "Meeting at Night," "Parting at Morning," "The Guardian Angel," "May and Death," "Abt Vogler," "The Youth of Sordello," and other pieces.

The quater-centenary celebration of the foundation of the original University buildings in Old Aberdeen and the inauguration of the new extension to Marischal College are to take place next September. Bishop Elphinstone, ambassador to France under James IV. of Scotland, established the northern University, and invited Hector Boece, the Latin historian of Scotland, to preside over the College; and it was mainly through his influence that the first printing-press—that of Chepman and Myllar—was established in Scotland. A considerable amount of quater-centenary literature is in the press, and the students' contribution will be an edition of Neil Maclean's "Life at a Northern University."

The date of the first performance of the Literary Theatre Society has been changed to Sunday, April 1, when Mr. Sturge Moore's Aphrodite against Artemis will be performed at 8.30 P.M. Miss Florence Farr will take the part of Phædra, and the scenery and dresses have been designed by Mr. C. S. Ricketts. Tickets cannot be obtained at the door, but only on application to the Secretary, Miss M. Currey, 88 Philbeach Gardens, S.W.

The following are among the fixtures for next week :

Society of Arts, Monday, March 26, at 8 P.M. Cantor Lectures—"Fire, Fire Risks, and Fire Extinction." By Professor Vivian B. Lewes. Four Lectures. Wednesday, March 28, at 8 P.M. Ordinary meeting—"Coal Conservation, Power Transmission, and Smoke Prevention." By Arthur J. Martin, M.Inst.C.E.

LITERATURE

SIR RICHARD BURTON

(FIRST NOTICE.)

The Life of Sir Richard Burton. By THOMAS WRIGHT. 2 vols. (Everett & Co., 24s. net.)

THIS book is certain to give rise to a kind of controversy in which we prefer not to participate. At one and the same time it dethrones Burton from the place he has hitherto held in general estimation, and enthrones him as one of the most remarkable men of his time, although not on account of the translations on which his fame has hitherto been based. It was generally recognised that Lady Burton's Life was little more than an indiscriminate eulogy composed by a very loyal and not very clever lady writing in great feebleness of health. In place of this Mr. Wright has given us a detailed biography of one of the most striking figures in the nineteenth century. In this preliminary notice our intention is to deal only with the Life itself reserving our consideration of Burton's work for a future occasion.

Every man's life, if properly understood, would work out into a kind of harmony, and the success of a biographer lies in clearing away apparent discords so that the growth of a man may be truly explained. It is almost necessary to begin in the Scotch way with a short ell of pedigree, and Burton's ancestry to a considerable extent accounts for his idiosyncrasies. He loved to suppose himself descended from Louis XIV. and his biographer puts the fable in this way :

La Belle Montmorency, a beauty of the French court, had, it seems, a son, of which she rather believed Louis to be the father. In any circumstances she called the baby Louis Le Jeune, put him in a basket of flowers and carried him to Ireland, where he became known as Louis Drelincourt Young.

In process of time this baby's grand-daughter married the Rev. Edward Burton, Richard Burton's grandfather. Mr. Wright cautiously remarks that "a runnel of the blood of 'le grand monarque' tripped through Burton's veins." The name is a Romany one, and he seems inclined to the opinion of those who credited Burton with gypsy lineage. When we add that through his maternal grandmother he was descended from Rob Roy, Scotland's Robin Hood, it will easily be seen that his taste for wandering might be inherited. His parents were Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph Netterville Burton and Martha Beckwith, the daughter of Richard and Sarah Baker, of Barham House, Elstree, Hertfordshire. This Richard Baker was a country gentleman who might have walked out of one of the novels of George Meredith. "With his fat acres, his thumping balance at the bank, his cellar of crusted wine, and his horse that never refused a gate, this world seemed to him a nether paradise." One aspiration only remained for a long time unsatisfied, and this was "a grandson with unmistakably red hair." Of Burton's father we have this thumb-nail sketch :

The Burtons resided at Torquay, and Colonel Burton busied himself chiefly in making chemical experiments, of which he was remarkably fond; but the other members of the household, who generally went about holding their noses, appear not to have sympathised with his studies and researches. He was very superstitious—nothing, for instance, could induce him to reveal his birthday; and he fretted continually because he was not permitted to invest his wife's money and make a second fortune; which no doubt he would very soon have done—for somebody else.

Burton was born at Torquay on March 19, 1821, and to the joy of his kindred came into the world with hair of a fierce and fiery red. Old Mr. Baker was rendered almost speechless with joy, and vowed he would leave the whole of his fortune to the grandson who had so accurately fulfilled his aspirations in regard to hair. It may be said here that the intention of the old man was frustrated in a somewhat dramatic manner. He intended to have left the whole of his property, worth about half a million, to his grandson, but for a long time one of his female relatives, with an eye to her own interests, deterred him from making his will.

Three years passed away, but at last Mr. Baker resolved to be thwarted no longer, so he drove to his lawyer's. It was the 16th of September 1824. He reached the door and leapt nimbly from his carriage; but his foot had scarcely touched the ground before he fell dead of heart disease. So the old will had to stand, and the property, instead of going to Burton, was divided among the children of Mr. Baker, Burton's mother taking merely her share. But for this extraordinary good hap Richard Burton might have led the life of an undistinguished country gentleman; ingloriously breaking his dogs, training his horses and attending to the breed of stock.

In the meanwhile Colonel Burton, being subject to asthma, had gone abroad and had taken up his residence near Tours, and the family seem to have divided their time between Tours and Elstree. As he grew up, Richard's hair turned from its fiery obtrusive red to a jet black. In 1829 the Burtons came back to England, and Richard and his brother Edward were sent to a preparatory school at Richmond Green, where Richard did little work and in the playtime occupied himself chiefly with fighting other boys.

"On the first occasion," he says, "I received a blow in the eye, which I thought most unfair, and having got my opponent down I proceeded to hammer his head against the ground, using his ears by way of handles. My indignation knew no bounds when I was pulled off by the bystanders, and told to let my enemy stand up again. 'Stand up!' I cried, 'after all the trouble I've had to get the fellow down.'"

In these circumstances, it was, perhaps, no wonder that the boy grew up to hate England and to wish for his dear France. Nor was he long in getting back to it. His restless parents settled at Blois, where the three children gave themselves up to all sorts of wildness. We hear even at this early stage of premature love-affairs, reading in Paul de Kock, and the discovery by the boys of fresh vices while their father occupied his time mostly with the chemical researches which offended the nostrils of his kindred. We have a picture of the two boys playing the parts of Anacreon and Ovid, their heads crowned with garlands while they imitated the ancients by drinking wine. An almost inimitable picture is given of the pistol practice of the boys, and of the discovery of the, to them, new joys of opium-eating, "while their father made the house unendurable by the preparation of sulphuretted hydrogen and other highly scented compounds."

France and Italy unfitted the boys for the University life to which they were destined. Edward was placed under a clergyman at Cambridge and Richard was sent to Trinity College, Oxford, where the first of his troubles was that, having grown a splendid moustache, he declined to be shaved until the authorities of the college took the matter up. He spent his first months at the University not in study but "in rowing, fencing, shooting the college rooks, and breaking the rules generally." What the two young men, as they were now, thought of University life in England may be judged by the following description of a conversation between them:

If Richard was miserable at Oxford, Edward was equally so at Cambridge. After the polish and politeness of Italy, where they had been "such tremendous dandies and ladies' men," the "boorishness and shoppiness" of Oxford and Cambridge were well-nigh unendurable. Seizing an early opportunity, Richard ran over to Cambridge to visit his brother. "What is the matter, Edward," inquired Richard. "Why so downcast?" "Oh, Dick," moaned Edward, "I have fallen among epicures."

The nature of Burton's college life might have been foreseen. He broke the rules in order to attend race meetings, and, when had up before the dons, instead of listening to their wholesome lectures, lectured them himself, with the result that he was expelled.

On his arrival in London, Burton, in order to have an hour or two of peace, coolly told his people that he had been given an extra vacation, "as a reward for winning a double first." Then occurred a quite unlooked-for sequel. His father insisted on giving a dinner in honour of the success, and Burton, unwillingly enough, became the hero of the moment. At table, however, a remark from one of the guests revealed the precise truth—with the result of an unpleasant scene; but eventually it was deemed advisable to let Burton have his own way and exchange the surplice for the sword.

A commission was purchased for him in the Indian service, and finding himself ensign to the 18th Regiment, Bombay Native Infantry, "he applied himself vigorously to Hindustani under a dirty, smoky, Scotch linguist, named Duncan Forbes." Following the example of officers of the time, who formed irregular unions with the Hindoo women, he had his Bubu, but we think Mr. Wright is quite justified in his note upon this.

Still, he was no voluptuary. Towering ambition, enthusiasm, and passion for hard work trampled down all meaner instincts. Languages, not amours, were his aspiration, and his mind ran on grammar books rather than ghazels; though he confesses to having given whole days and nights to the tender pages of Euclid. Indeed, he was of a cold nature, and Plutarch's remark about Alexander applies equally to him: "For though otherwise he was very hot and hasty, yet was he hardly moved with lust or pleasure of the body."

It is a curious and noteworthy fact that many of those whose studies have, as it were by instinct, led to the setting forth of licence, have been of this cold and unimpassioned nature. During all this period it will be understood that Burton was exercising his extraordinary faculty for acquiring languages. He had begun to do so at Oxford, and, whatever else he was engaged in, he seems to have been ever acquiring new languages or perfecting his knowledge of those he had already attacked. In 1847 his mind was full of Camoens, in whose career he found a parallel to his own. We pass on to the year 1850, much of which was spent at Leamington and Dover. In the next year he crossed over to Boulogne where he prepared several books for publication.

Love of a sort mingled with literature, for he continued various flirtations, but without any thought of marriage; for he was still only a lieutenant in the service of John Company, and his prospects were not rosy. We said "love of a sort," and advisedly, for we cannot bring ourselves to believe that Burton was ever frenziedly in love with any woman. He was, to use his own expression, no "hot amorist." Of his views on polygamy, to which he had distinct leanings, we shall speak later. He said he required two, and only two qualities in a woman, namely beauty and affection. It was the Eastern idea. The Hindu Angelina might be vacuous, vain, papilionaceous, silly, or even a mere doll, but if her hair hung down "like the tail of a Tartary cow," if her eyes were "like the stones of unripe mangoes," and her nose resembled the beak of a parrot, the Hindu Edwin was more than satisfied.

One of his great ambitions was to visit Mecca; and this he was able to gratify in 1853. In order to reach his goal he disguised himself as a "muscular and powerful Mirza Abdullah, of Bushire." This is an important part of his biography but, as Mr. Wright says, his whole life was a preparation for the Arabian Nights. It is a fascinating chapter in his career, but we are obliged to hasten over it to 1856, when his spirit of adventure carried him to the Crimea. He resigned after the suspension of General Beatson and came back to England just in time to miss his brother Edward, whose fate was so pathetic that we cannot refrain from quoting the account of it:

During an elephant hunt a number of natives set upon him and beat him brutally about the head. Brain trouble ensued, and he returned home, but henceforth, though he attained a green old age, he lived a life of utter silence. Except on one solitary occasion he never after—and that is to say for forty years—uttered a single word. Always resembling a Greek statue, there was now added to him the characteristic of all statues, rigid and solemn silence. From a man he had become aching marble.

Burton, having been foiled in his ambitions to become a great soldier, turned his thoughts once more to exploration and quitted England for Bombay on his way to Africa in October 1856. We may sum up his African travels in the words of his biographer:

Although Fortune cheated Burton of having been the actual discoverer of the Source of the Nile, it must never be forgotten that all the credit of having inaugurated the expedition to Central Africa and of leading it are his. Tanganyika—in the words of a recent writer—"is in a very true sense the heart of Africa." If some day a powerful state spring up on its shores, Burton will to all time be honoured as its indomitable Columbus.

The next place in which we hear of him is at Salt Lake City, where he was introduced to Brigham Young and would have become a Mormon; but the high priest replied: "I think you've done that sort of thing once before, Captain." He believed in the theory of polygamy and said:

"Servants are rare and costly; it is cheaper and more comfortable to marry them. Many converts are attracted by the prospect of becoming wives, especially from places like Clifton, near Bristol, where there are 64 females to 36 males. The old maid is, as she ought to be, an unknown entity."

He himself received at least one proposal of marriage, and the lady, being refused, spread the rumour that it was the other way about, to which Burton returned: "Why, it's like

A certain Miss Baxter,
Who refused a man before he'd axed her.

Such in brief outline are the facts relating to the childhood and youth of this remarkable man. He was surely one of the most strenuous and romantic figures of his time, realising in his actual life many of the dreams of those who only in fancy behold the revival of the old romantic times. We see in him the development of a young man unused to discipline of any kind, either that which comes from the buffeting of fortune or that deeper kind which some natures inflict upon themselves.

The remainder of his career will be dealt with in a second article.

THE MAKING OF EGYPT

The Making of Modern Egypt. By Sir AUCLAND COLVIN, K.C.S.I., K.C.M.G., C.I.E. (Seeley, 18s. net.)

New Egypt. By A. B. de GUERVILLE. (Heinemann, 16s. net.)

SIR AUCLAND COLVIN'S book on Egypt is a valuable contribution to modern history. Well written, lucid and temperate, it sets before us the events of the last five and twenty years without prejudice and without favour. Nor is it the work of a mere student. Sir Auckland has played his part in the affairs which he chronicles, and he writes as an eye-witness, who has a first-hand knowledge of modern Egypt. And what a story it is! Not even Herodotus can match for wonder the tales which Sir Auckland Colvin has to tell. And there is a variety in the narrative, which should make it acceptable to the "general reader." The idle dreams of Gordon afford a strong contrast to the firm purpose of Lord Cromer, and there on the stage of Egypt are men of many nations, and many purposes, dominated one and all by the Englishman, who has devoted his life not to the pursuit of selfish policies, but to the regeneration of an alien race.

Indeed, it is the imperturbability of Lord Cromer, which dominates Sir Auckland's history. Disasters have disturbed the happiness of Egypt; the desert has taken its toll of her armies; statesmen have discussed her affairs with a sanguine interest; more than once it has been resolved to hand back Egypt to the Turks, or to renew a dual control, or to leave the country to its fate. And through it all Lord Cromer has kept upon his course with a single-minded purpose. He has heeded not the voice of the politician. When, for instance, Sir Henry Drummond Wolff was entrusted with the delicate mission of arranging the withdrawal of the English from Egypt, Lord Cromer continued his work of pacification and economy, as though he knew perfectly well that he would outlast the envoys of many governments. Nor does Sir Auckland put the case for Lord Cromer one bit too strongly in the following passage, which is worth quoting in full, as it strikes the note of the whole book:

The central figure throughout the period has been the British Minister and Agent. Cabinets in Paris and Cairo have come and gone; diplomatists have fretted their hour on the stage, and have faded into obscurity. Able and devoted subordinates have in turn assisted the British Agent; and, their term accomplished, have passed on to other labours. Lord Cromer alone has remained throughout; in him during more than twenty years, the life of Egypt has centred, and from him all energy has radiated.

In other words modern Egypt is essentially the work of Lord Cromer, whose achievement is the more admirable, because it has survived the machinations of politics and the timid infamy of public opinion. The British Agent, in fact, has done what he thought right, not what he hoped would be acceptable to the ignorant voter. It has been his good fortune not to conciliate a sentimental democracy. For a quarter of a century he has played the part of a benevolent despot to so fine a purpose that Egypt, which he found burdened with debt, is now rich and prosperous. The works which have been carried out under his auspices—such as the Assouan dam and the reservoir—are the realisation of projects many centuries old, and will confer a glory upon our age, when all the disputes of governments are forgotten. And that is why it is a pleasure to read Sir Auckland Colvin's book, which gives us an account not of views held and combated, but of wise deeds wisely accomplished.

But before Lord Cromer could set himself to the task of regenerating Egypt, there were many difficulties which he had to face. He had not long been appointed to his office, when it was determined to withdraw from the Soudan. The task was dangerous and delicate and unfortunately it was entrusted by the English Government to General Gordon, an intrepid officer, who was unfit by temperament to carry out the instructions of others. Yet at the moment the appointment seemed wise enough, and Gordon was asked to do no more than "to arrange for the evacuation of the Soudan, and the safe removal of the Egyptian employés and troops." But no sooner did he arrive in Egypt than he changed his views and revised his policy. He determined that the Soudan must be not evacuated but pacified, and he asked that Zebehr Pasha should aid him in the enterprise. So confident was he of ultimate success that he sent Colonel de Coetlogon, who had been left in charge of the dépôt at Khartum, back to Cairo, "because," as he said, "there was not the least chance of any danger being incurred in Khartum, which he considered as safe as Cairo. . . . He might rest assured that he left a place which was as safe as Kensington Park." The result is familiar. The English Government objected to the appointment of Zebehr, in spite of Lord Cromer's advocacy, on the ground that British public opinion would not admit the employment of a slave-dealer, and General Gordon was left alone to die. He was quite conscious of his own impracticability.

"I own to having been very insubordinate to Her Majesty's Government and its officials," thus he wrote in his journal. "But it is my nature, and I cannot help it. I know, if I was chief, I would never employ myself, for I am incorrigible."

And Sir Auckland Colvin accepts Gordon's own estimate of himself.

Directly guided, as he believed himself to be, by the finger of an ever-present Providence, his impulsive and emotional nature was beyond human control or comprehension. Years of solitary communings in the African deserts, long days and nights of exhaustion and fatigue, fevers, privations, wrestlings in prayer and spiritual strivings, had worked their inevitable effect on the texture, both of mind and body.

In other words, from one cause or another, Gordon was an idealist, for whom facts were immaterial. To such a man the desert meant death, and Gordon faced the inevitable, like the hero that he was. If he could not oppose the forces of the Mahdi, at least he could prove that death was no more terrible to a Christian than to the followers of the Prophet. Above all, he added to the history of Egypt a chapter of self-sacrifice and romance which will always heighten the effect of a practical, successful administration. For while Gordon was fighting a hopeless battle in the Soudan, the work of Egypt still went on. Under Sir Edgar Vincent's skilful management, the load of debt was removed from Egypt's back, taxes were abolished, and the corvée and kurbash were no longer employed. For this relief Egypt owes the Government of Great Britain a heavy debt of gratitude, and the result was not achieved without much self-abnegation. In 1887—to give one single instance—economies were being made in the Egyptian army, and to facilitate this policy, Colonel Kitchener, Colonel Hallam Parr, and other officers were willing to give up part or all of their command pay. In brief, as we read Sir Auckland Colvin's book, we understand the reason of the supremacy which England most unselfishly still holds in Egypt and her colonies, and we can imagine no better handbook of practical statesmanship than Sir Auckland Colvin's "Making of Modern Egypt."

Between Sir Auckland's serious history and M. de Guerville's amiable gossip there is the difference of two temperaments and two nations. M. de Guerville is gay, happy, and irresponsible. He regards Egypt as a sort of annex to the Boulevards and he enjoyed himself in Cairo after his own fashion—and with all his heart. If scandal is more amusing to his mind than politics, we do not blame him, for the scandal adds colour and merri-ment to his narrative. Nor should it be forgotten that his observation is as honest as it is quick. He has paid incidentally a high tribute to the success of Lord Cromer's rule, and the tribute, coming from a Frenchman, who expected to find in Egypt another grievance against the perfidious Albion, has the shining merit of a disinterested sincerity.

MR. LANG ON SCOTT

Sir Walter Scott. By ANDREW LANG. (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.)

It would indeed be a superfluous task to trace once more the pathetic and noble career of Scott as it is set before us by Mr. Andrew Lang. The latest biographer has qualifications such as few others can boast for the task he has taken in hand. He is himself a native of that Border country which Scott immortalised; in many a rhyme and many a fine piece of prose he has told us of the power it possesses alike for his heart and his intellect, and there are few of the present day who have lingered so lovingly and so carefully over the facts of Scott's life and assimilated the novels as Mr. Andrew Lang has done. He modestly proclaims at the outset that he has only tried to compress "as much as I may of the essence of Lockhart's great book into small space, with a few additions from other sources." In spite of that we venture to think that Scott's admirers will find much that is new and more that is freshly put in this biography, which is permeated by a sympathy and understanding of which praise would be an impertinence. There is only one aspect of the book to which we would draw attention, and that in the way of homologating rather than criticising what is said. In a noteworthy passage Mr. Andrew Lang shows that the present taste for imaginative literature is almost entirely due to Scott:

It was Scott, the greatest of readers, who inaugurated the reign of novel-reading, and very much chagrined he would be could he see the actual results: the absolute horror with which mankind shun every other study. It could never have occurred to Scott, that, within less than a hundred years, male and female novelists, often as ignorant of books as of life, would monopolize the general attention, and would give themselves out as authorities on politics, philosophy, ethics, society, theology, religion, and Homeric criticism. Scott's own tales never usurped the office of the pulpit, the platform, or the Press; and, if he did teach some readers all the history that they knew, he constantly warned them that, in his romances, he was an historian with a very large poetical licence.

Perhaps the conclusion ought to be to a certain extent modified. Before the day of Scott, Burns, the most acute observer of manners of his time, had put it on record that the Mauchline belles were addicted to their nouvelles, and at least the feminine part of the community from the time of Richardson downwards had always a large supply of more or less sentimental tales with which to satisfy their appetite for literature. But the enormous assimilative power of the public of to-day is partly due to the badness of contemporary criticism, a badness which Mr. Lang touches off with a wit that closely approximates to bitterness:

In an age when an acquaintance with Fitzgerald's Rubáiyát of Omar Kháyyám, an exhaustive ignorance of all literature of the past, and an especial contempt for Scott, whom Fitzgerald so intensely admired, are the equipment of many critics, we must be very cautious in praising the Waverley novels. They are not the work of a passionate, a squalid, or a totally uneducated genius. They are not the work of any Peeping Tom who studies woman in her dressing-room, and tries to spy or smell out the secrets of the eternally feminine. We have novels to-day—novels by males—full of clever spyings and dissections of womankind, which Scott would have thrown into the fire.

He is not by any means blind to the faults of his hero, and, indeed, places an unrelenting finger upon them in the following passage:

Far from being a conscientious stylist, Scott not infrequently proves the truth of his own remark to Lockhart, that he never learned grammar. I have found five "whiches" in a sentence of his, and five "ques" in a sentence by Alexandre Dumas, his pupil and rival. Dumas had more of the humour of Scott than Scott had of the wit of Dumas. Many parts of his tales are prolix: his openings, as a rule, are dull. His heroes and heroines often speak in the stilted manner of Miss Burney's Lord Orville, a manner (if we may trust memoirs and books like Boswell's Johnson, and Walpole's Letters), in which no men and women of mould ever did talk, even in the eighteenth century. But Catherine Glover, in The Fair Maid of Perth, usually speaks from stilts.

Those, therefore, who dismiss Sir Walter on account of criticism of this kind are voluntarily getting rid of some of the finest literature in our language, and the way to convince them of that is to take up any of their own idols. Here blemishes may be pointed out to which the faults of Scott are light by comparison, and they possess none of those magnificent qualities which in his case atone for so much. The humour at once so genial and yet so free from exaggeration and caricature, the sense of pathos that was all the more acute because it was restrained and even touched off with a laugh, the energetic conduct of the story when it was in full swing, all these are qualities which have been unequalled since Scott's time. Mr. Lang is justly angry with the harsh judgment of Carlyle, and we may conclude this brief notice with the following eloquent vindication:

Scott "fashions his characters from the skin inwards, never getting near the heart of them." Never near the broken stoical heart of Saunders Mucklebackit; of the fallen Bradwardine, happy in unsullied honour; never near the heart of the maddened Peter Peebles; never near the flawless Christian heart of Bessie M'Clure; or the heart of dauntless remorse of Nancy Ewart; or the heart of sacrificed love in Diana Vernon; or the stout heart of Dalgetty in the dungeon of Inveraray; or the secret soul of Mary Stuart, revealed when she is reminded of Bastian's bridal mask, and the deed of Kirk o' Field? Quid plura, Thomas Carlyle wrote splenetic nonsense: "he was very capable of having it happen to him."

THE EARLY ENGLISH DRAMA SOCIETY

The Dramatic Writings of John Heywood. The Dramatic Writings of Richard Wever and Thomas Ingelend. Anonymous Plays: 2 vols. The Early English Drama Society.

THE four volumes edited by Mr. John S. Farmer sent to us by the Early English Drama Society are neatly printed and of a convenient size, and, although their white backs are likely soon to soil, their present appearance is very attractive. From a prospectus which accompanies them we learn that "the Early English Drama Society was founded early in 1905," the first of its "general objects" being "to provide a corpus of Early English Dramatic Literature." In the prospectus, which is marked "proof" there is a blank left for the office of Honorary President, while as Hon. Vice-Presidents we have the names of four well-known and justly respected English scholars, Dr. Henry Bradley, Mr. A. H. Bullen, Dr. Furnivall and Mr. Sidney Lee, with two excellent American colleagues, Professors J. W. Bright and F. Ives Carpenter. It would be difficult to find six Vice-Presidents whose names would command more respect, but we are a little troubled by the abbreviation for "Honorary" prefixed to their title. It is not usual for the Vice-Presidents of a learned society to be paid, and we are reduced to wondering whether the adjective may not perhaps have been used as a synonym for Irresponsible.

The Society's editor, as aforesaid, is Mr. John S. Farmer: its secretary, Mr. W. W. Gibbins, we understand to be a publisher. In contradistinction to the Vice-Presidents, neither of these offices is marked as Honorary, but though we note the fact we hasten to add that we have not the smallest objection to editors and secretaries of learned societies being paid for their services, but on the contrary think that it is often advantageous, even in the case of not very rich societies, that all work should be adequately remunerated. From a subsequent page of the prospectus we learn that the Society started with the very respectable number of eighty-five subscribers, who have put down their names in all for one hundred and thirty-five ordinary copies and eighteen on Large Paper, the total number which it is proposed to print being two hundred and fifty of the former and sixty of the latter. This seems an excellent start, but it is distinctly surprising to find that of the eighty-five subscribers, only eleven are private book-lovers, all the rest being booksellers or institutions. The questions which we feel bound to ask, and to which we hope that at least one of the Hon. Vice-Presidents will provide an answer, are: Is this "Early English Drama Society" in the ordinary sense of the word a Society at all? Has it ever held a meeting? Has it elected its officers? Does it intend to publish a balance-sheet? Or is it an association of an enterprising editor and an enterprising publisher, to which six distinguished scholars have been led by their enthusiasm for the subject into lending their names? If it is such an association as this, or anything only slightly removed from it, then we venture to think that a very grave mistake has been made. We have only to recall what has been accomplished by the Early English Text Society, the English Dialect Society, the Chaucer Society, the Henry Bradshaw Society and many other similar bodies to realise how dependent learned literature is in England on society-work; and any association which confuses the public idea of this work, or takes away the little prestige which attaches to it, should be strenuously opposed on principle until it puts itself right by conforming to the ordinary procedure of good societies. No doubt the procedure even of good societies varies, and often the whole management drifts into the hands of two or three people. But that without any initial public meeting, or at least any that was fully advertised, an editor and a publisher should draw up a prospectus of a series of books, and dignify the booksellers and the few stray students who subscribe to it by the name of a Society, and that six distinguished scholars should countenance them in so doing—this surely is of very bad omen for English literature.

We pass on from the constitution of the Early English Drama Society to its programme. There is first of all the Early English Dramatists Series, divided into sets of twelve volumes at a subscription price of five pounds (or twenty pounds on large paper); then there is the Facsimile Series, which, though a section of the Drama Society, is to embrace "rare books and manuscripts in all departments of literature." These are to be supplied at twenty-five shillings net for a quarto volume, and double the price for a folio, a certain number of sets each year being "bound in real vellum with kid leather ties" (fancy an Early English Text Society book in such a garb!) for subscribers willing to pay ten guineas for such luxuries. Last there are the "Museum Dramatists" (what Museum?) "reprints of notable plays, each volume complete in itself, with introduction, glossary and facsimile title-pages, price per volume, one shilling and sixpence boards net, two shillings cloth." From the names of the plays in this last series we gather that an economy may perhaps be effected by printing texts from the plates of the Early English Dramatists Series.

We have noted in a manner unusual in a review some of the financial aspects of the Early English Drama Society's prospectus, because they seem to us, by their strong resemblance to an ordinary publisher's announcement, to explain the difficulty which we find in recognising this as really a society at all. We gladly acknowledge, however, that any society which presented its subscribers with twelve such neat little volumes as those we have before us in exchange for five pounds, if the contents of the volumes were satisfactory, would be giving a very fair return for the subscription. But we cannot imagine that any competent scholar will be found to affirm that the condition as to the contents is here complied with. At the outset a wrong start is made by the spelling being modernised. Now we are used to reading Shakespeare in modernised editions, and it may perhaps be thought that what is good enough for Shakespeare must be good enough for his humble predecessors. The reason that this is not so is that many of the plays here printed are from fifty to eighty years earlier than the earliest of Shakespeare's. Amid the metrical anarchy which, owing to changes of pronunciation, prevailed at the beginning of the sixteenth century, it is difficult to say what semblance of metre it is reasonable to expect in the older plays here printed. But it is quite certain that in numerous lines that semblance is very much disguised and obliterated when words like "kynnesman" and "mennes" are printed as "kinsman" and "men's," and it is no less certain that while "sotyle" is a passable sixteenth-century rhyme to "beguile," even the intention to rhyme is concealed by turning "sotyle" into "subtle."

Perhaps it may be said that the literary craftsmanship of these early plays is so faulty and rough, that no great harm is done if their defects are here and there exaggerated, so long as the general effect is preserved. We blush at the thought of putting such a plea into the mouth of any of the distinguished Hon. Vice-Presidents, but, even if the plea were admitted, it would not cover the faults of this edition. We know only one way of criticising such a book fairly, and that is by taking twenty consecutive pages of it and giving an honest account of the merits and demerits found within that space. When this is done, there can be no artifice such as that by which a spiteful reviewer hunts down every fault he can find, and quotes the total as a mere specimen of what he could adduce if he chose. Every sensible reader knows that faults are to be expected in every book, and if he knows within what area certain specified faults are found he can judge for himself as to what degree of care has been taken. For our twenty pages we have chosen the first twenty of Hickscorner: of this play a copy of the Wynkyn de Worde edition, from which Mr. Farmer gives a facsimile (apparently at second-hand), can be consulted at the British Museum. Here are our results.

Mr. Farmer starts badly by turning "bought" in the first line into "brought"; on his second page, we have "am I" instead of "I am"; on his third, Contemplation is made most inappropriately to walk in "wildness" instead of in "wilderness"; on his fourth, "I thank you" is turned into the incorrect "I thank ye"; on his sixth, the "she" whom Freewill beshrews for having, when they lay together, substituted a stone for a coin, has her name changed from the feminine "Jone" to the masculine "John"; on his eighth, the line "if they will me money tell" (i.e., if they will pay me money) is printed as "if they will be money tell"; on his tenth, "scused" is turned into "excused," spoiling the metre, "you" into "ye," spoiling a rhyme with "now," and the exclamation "How, how," into the quite different form "How now!" Starting for our second decade of pages, we find that on the eleventh page we have "he is a ship" for "he is in a ship"; and "Poyle," the old form of Apulia is humorously printed as "Pugle"; on page 13 "sotylte" is printed as "jollity"; on page 14 we find "right" instead of "aright" on page 15 an oath "by hym that was never born" is printed as "by Jis," obviously through a misunderstanding of the 3-like contraction used for m; also after a struggle "Imagination" is made to utter an unsportsmanlike threat to "bite" Freewill, where the original word is no worse than "bete." On page 16 in the form "pope-holy" (a hypocrite) by a whimsical obedience to Henry VIII's proclamation the word "pope" has been partly erased in the old edition, and Mr. Farmer prints it as "pure"! On the next four pages the divergences from the original are either trivial or susceptible of defence, save that (as we have noted) "sotyle" when it rhymes with "beguile" is spelt "subtle."

With the exception of a hyphen in one place instead of a comma the punctuation throughout our twenty pages is distinctly good, and the explanations of words in the Notes both to this and to the other volumes seem to us to deserve the same praise. But we think that the mistakes we have enumerated as occurring in these twenty pages are too many and too serious for the editor to escape censure. Whether the Hon. Vice-Presidents will consider these editorial shortcomings excused by the fact that each and all of the blunders we have named may be found also in Mr. Hazlitt's text of Hickscorner in the first volume of his reprint of Dodsley's "Old English Plays," printed in 1874, we do not profess to know. But if the Editor of the Early English Drama Society is reduced to acknowledging that, having taken over a thirty-year old text from Mr. Hazlitt, he grudged the three hours work necessary to collate it with the copy available in the British Museum, our own view of the ill-effect which this particular "society" is likely to exercise on English society-work as a whole will be considerably intensified.

YONE NOGUCHI

The Summer Cloud. By YONE NOGUCHI. (Tokio: The Shunyodo.)

YONE NOGUCHI is a young Japanese who went to America and wrote books, and worked on an extraordinary Japanese paper, lived for a time with the once famous Joaquin Miller and wrote more, and, in the autumn of 1902, came to England. Here he stayed in the south of London with Mr. Yoshio Markino, whose water-colours have won the attention of some of our finest critics and artists. The two Japanese lived for some months together, and during that time Mr. Noguchi published, from a boarding-house in the Brixton Road, a brown-paper leaflet of his verse that brought him compliments from many English men of letters, and made possible the publication of a larger volume, that included the first and many additional poems under the same title—"From the Eastern Sea." From England Mr. Noguchi returned to America, and thence to take an honoured position in Japan. Both the volumes called "From the Eastern Sea" are before us, and also a third book, "The Summer Cloud," newly come from Tokio. In all three Mr. Noguchi writes in English, in an English that is the language of his thought, and not an ill-fitting cloak of translation from the Japanese.

The poems that fill the books published in England are written in a loose metre that is a balancing of ideas rather than of rhymes or syllables. The author was not satisfied with the result, feeling that rhyme would be an improvement. But, as we remember hearing him say, to rhyme one needs to know so much of a language. It did not strike us at the time how much he already knew. It is really marvellous that an Oriental, with a tongue as far removed from our own as Greek, should be able to express in our language sentiment as fragile, as delicate as that which these words on "The Poet" hold in a gossamer net:

Out of the deep and the dark,
A sparkling mystery, a shape
Something perfect,
Comes like the stir of day:
One whose breath is an odour,
Whose eyes show the way road to stars,
The breeze in his face,
The glory of Heaven on his back.
He steps like a vision hung in air,
Diffusing the passion of Eternity;
His abode is the sunlight of morn,
The music of eve his speech:
In his sight,
One shall turn from the dust of the grave,
And move upward to the woodland.

It was naturally an easy transition from this form to that of prose. Indeed, if we write out the little poem we have just quoted, ignoring the line-divisions, we make a prose poem that loses none of the beauty of the original, and gains by no longer attempting too difficult a task. There were several who, when the poems appeared, suggested that prose, however poetical, cut into lines, lost by division.

It is no surprise, therefore, to find that in his new book Mr. Noguchi abandons the printed form of verse, no longer cuts his pieces into lines, and labels them simply "prose poems." Here is one of them:

Little Fairy, little fairy by a hearth, fligh in thine eyes, hush on thy feet, shall I go up with thee to Heaven by the road of the fire-flame?

Little Fairy, little fairy by a river, dance in thy heart, longing at thy lips, shall I go down with thee to "Far-Away" rolling over the singing bubbles?

Little Fairy, little fairy by a poppy, dream in thy hair, solitude under thy wings, shall I sleep with thee to-night in the golden cup under the stars?

They are all like that; very slight, very delicate, like the hokku of prose. Japanese hokku are very tiny poems suggesting a single beautiful thing. They are only seventeen syllables long, and fill that small space with poetical feeling, so that one of them is sufficient to colour a mood, and it is sacrilege to read two close together.

The diction of these prose poems is quaintly simple and direct, and its dainty, ethereal effects are perhaps only possible to Mr. Noguchi because, not being an Englishman, he has the courage to use our words as if they were coloured scraps of mosaic fresh put into his hand. Knowing enough of our tongue to use words in their own meanings, he is not so accustomed to it as to be able to use them only with the associations that others have made usual for them. The result is alive with surprise and charm, and supplies the best argument we know for writing in a language other than our own, or other than that of ordinary conversation. For, when we do so, every word is a new thing to us, a fresh clear note of music, a note of colour personal to itself.

THE AGE OF THE SALON

Madame Geoffrin: her Salon and her Times. By JANE ALDIS. (Methuen, 10s. 6d.)

THE abbreviation of Mademoiselle as "Mdle." is always a suspicious circumstance inviting a further inquiry. That inquiry, in the case of Miss Aldis's book, has brought to light quite a number of irregularities in the use of the French language: "en second nocés" for "en secondes nocés"; "valets de chambres" for "valets de chambre"; "langue mauvaise" for "mauvaise langue"; "amoureux" for "amoureux"; "nervreuse" for "nerveuse"; "le royaume" for "le royaume"; "blonde et blanc" for "blonde et blanche"; "fermiers-général" for "fermiers-généraux"; "harengs fraises" for "harengs frais"; "au dessus la porte" for "au dessus de la porte"; "dévoté" for "dévotés," etc. In some cases the responsibility may rest upon the printer, but he cannot be expected to bear the whole of the burden. The book, however, is by no means so bad as this list of "corrigenda" might seem to indicate. No doubt the author has a working knowledge, though not an exact knowledge, of French. She writes brightly, though not brilliantly; she has an interesting subject; she digresses agreeably even when she digresses into error. An example of such error may be found in the section on Madame Necker: "She had already been the queen of a small literary society which, years before, she and her young companions had formed while she was at home with her father, who was a pastor at Lausanne." M. Curchod's pastorate was not at Lausanne, but at Crassier, far away in the country, at the foot of the Jura. The only society which his daughter there enjoyed was that of the ministers who came to preach for him. The society to which Miss Aldis refers is evidently the Société du Printemps, or the Académie des Eaux—a debating club given to the discussion of such problems as "Does an element of mystery make love more agreeable?" or "Can there be friendship between a man and a woman in the same sense as between two women and two men?" Miss Aldis might have read of it, and so got her facts right, in Gibbon's "Autobiography," or in M. d'Haussonville's "Le salon de Madame Necker."

The mistakes, however, are mainly in excursions of this kind. The central story is well enough told, though in rather a rambling manner. Books about the French salons of the eighteenth century can always be made entertaining, though the best stories are apt to reappear in one of them after another. Madame Geoffrin, however, has one of the best stories all to herself. One of her guests had been absent on a journey, and came to see her on his return. "What," he asked, "has become of the old gentleman who always sat at the end of the table, and who never spoke?" "I know whom you mean," replied Madame Geoffrin. "It was my husband. He is dead." That is the first story which Miss Aldis tells, and it is eloquent of the spirit of the times, when all the marriages were "de convenance," but married women of wit and tact nevertheless wielded a sway which made them indifferent to the legal recognition of their equality with man. This conjugal aloofness, indeed, was typical of the salons of Paris, until Madame Necker, with a husband who was no nonentity, set the French capital the example of a public display of a homely Swiss affection; but there were other respects in which Madame Geoffrin, to her credit, was not so typical. She was much more human and generous than, say, Madame Du Deffand, having a veritable passion for discovering necessities and relieving them; and, in a lax age, she maintained a high moral tone. There is even a story of a fashionable abbé who was denied admission to her house because of the impropriety of his conversation. With such exceptions, however, she knew everybody: encyclopædists like Diderot and d'Alembert; painters like Boucher and Vernet; "salonières" like Mademoiselle Lespinasse; distinguished strangers like Horace Walpole and David Hume. In some ways her salon is historically less interesting than those of Madame Necker and Madame de Staël. It had not the same bearing upon politics, nor did the old and the new ideas clash in it to the same extent. But it was a good frame in which to set a picture of eighteenth-century manners; and the picture which Miss Aldis has set in it is lively and diversified. If we began by finding fault, we must certainly end by praising.

COLERIDGE AND THE WEDGWOOD PENSION

I

THE main facts relating to the Wedgwood Pension are familiar and plain enough. That in December 1797, there came to Coleridge from the brothers Josiah and Thomas Wedgwood—sons of Josiah Wedgwood the potter, of Etruria Hall, Staffordshire—an unconditional offer of a life-annuity of £150: this for example is, and, as a rare instance of disinterested munificence, well deserves to be, given a prominent place in every biography of the poet; but the circumstance is neither in any respect obscure, nor—at any rate as regards the younger brother—unparalleled. One incident in the later history of the pension, however, has puzzled many of the biographers. How came Josiah Wedgwood, in the autumn of 1812, to revoke his half of the £150? What led him to break an engagement into which he had entered voluntarily, and by which he was bound in honour, if not in law? On this question the Wedgwood family papers are silent. A story goes that, when one of his sons, long afterwards, inquired why the £75 had been cut off, Josiah answered: "I had ample reason for what I did," and refused to say more. This tells us merely that Josiah wished to avoid the subject—whether for Coleridge's sake, or for his own, does not appear. Coleridge, on his side, is equally reticent. "Mr. Josiah's half of the annuity has been withdrawn," he writes to Wordsworth on December 7, 1812; adding simply, "My reply, of course, breathed nothing but gratitude for the past"—words which seem to imply that, had delicacy permitted, Coleridge might with good cause have remonstrated with Wedgwood. Dykes Campbell ("Samuel Taylor Coleridge: A Narrative," etc., 1894, p. 192) does not hesitate to stigmatise the withdrawal as "a highhanded proceeding," and suggests that "Coleridge, though he must have been aware of this, made no complaint, owing to the painful consciousness that the benefaction had not been used for the high purposes which had led both to the granting and to the acceptance of it." But in other quarters the action has been viewed in a light prejudicial, not to the doer, but to the sufferer. Would Wedgwood, it is asked, have resorted to a course so harsh—so arbitrary, if you will; and would Coleridge have silently acquiesced; if there had not been, on the patron's side, a shocking discovery and, on the poet's, a guilty consciousness of some positive offence? Josiah Wedgwood was a strictly upright character—vir justus et tenax propositi; such a man, it is urged, simply could not recall his plighted word, had not some startling enormity on Coleridge's part at once cancelled all obligations, and called imperatively for a drastic measure of retribution. On the other hand, Coleridge himself—the procrastinator—the opium-eater—was, it is argued, capable de tout. Such is the view of the matter suggested in the late Mr. R. B. Litchfield's "Life of Tom Wedgwood, the First Photographer," which appeared about two years ago. "What Josiah's words ['I had ample reason,' etc.] meant," he writes, "will be for ever a secret. He probably knew much that we shall never know. With such a man as Coleridge, and a man in such a state, no imaginable possibility would be unbelievable." It is true that, after the scandalous insinuation here italicised, Mr. Litchfield continues: "I should not myself read Josiah's words as implying any specific misdoing on Coleridge's part." But, while thus apparently discouraging the spirit of prejudiced speculation which but a moment before he had raised in his readers, Mr. Litchfield explains Josiah's action in a manner detrimental to Coleridge only. He maintains that the annuity was cut off in order to deprive Coleridge of all excuse for indolence, and to rouse him from the state of apathy to which opium and (according to Southey) a "frightful consumption of spirits" had reduced him. Moreover, in his ignorance of the original documents bearing on the case, he stoutly insists that Josiah Wedgwood was entirely within his rights in reconsidering the matter and withdrawing the grant which he had volunteered in 1797. To regard the brothers' proposal as an offer to endow Coleridge irrevocably with £150 for life is, according to him, to put a false construction on the language employed by them. (What this language was, we shall presently see.) As to the charge of highhandedness, he is shocked that Mrs. Litchfield's grandfather should be subjected to so disrespectful an imputation. The bare suggestion is a sacrilege—an act of lèse majesté against His Highness "Josiah the Second," as in her simplicity the good Eliza Meteyard pompously designates the son and namesake of the famous potter. "Mr. Dykes Campbell's treatment of this incident," writes Mr. Litchfield, more in sorrow than in anger, "seems to me—I write it with regret, remembering what we owe to him—rather lacking in the care and judgment which are generally so conspicuous in his work." Now to the present writer, on the other hand, it seems that here, as in general elsewhere, Dykes Campbell is, so far as he goes, absolutely in the right—that, in point of fact, it is Mr. Litchfield's "treatment of this incident," and not Dykes Campbell's, that is conspicuously "lacking in care and judgment"—and, it must be added, in good taste and proper feeling as well. The grounds of this opinion shall now be laid before the reader: first, however, it will be necessary briefly to resume the circumstances under which the annuity was offered and accepted.

Towards the autumn of 1797 Coleridge had begun to realise the necessity of earning a regular income by regular work. Journalism and tillage, poetry, politics, and paying guests, had each been tried in turn; and all had failed. The young man had given hostages to fortune in the persons of wife and child; and now again his Sara, as with grim pleasantry he informs Thelwall, is "in the way of repairing, so far as in her lies, the ravages of the war." For the present they were domiciled in a small roadside house at Nether Stowey in Somersetshire, where under Poole's fostering eye they were subsisting partly on Coleridge's scanty literary earnings, partly on the contributions (amounting to some £40 a year) of a few of his admirers. Charles Lloyd's domestication—a third source of supply—had been interrupted by his illness in the spring, though he still came and went fitfully between Birmingham, London, Bath, and Stowey. Small wonder was it that, despite the encouragement of Poole and the stimulating companionship of the Wordsworths, Coleridge had many moments of anxiety, and some even of despair. He was harassed with a sense of his ignorance, and sighed for leisure and peace of mind that he might enter upon a course of encyclopædic study. Conscious of great natural powers, he dreaded the prospect of "fagging on in all the nakedness of talent, without the materials of knowledge or systematic information." Two plans offered: either to join Basil Montagu in a scholastic adventure, in which they should act as managing students; or to enter the ranks of the Nonconformist ministry. To the latter course Coleridge had been urged for months past by John Prior Estlin, a Unitarian pastor at Bristol; while the wealthy Wedgwoods, who knew and had befriended Basil Montagu, were understood to favour the project of tuition. At what date they had first met and become interested in Coleridge is uncertain—probably in the winter of 1796-7; but we know that in September 1797, Tom Wedgwood had passed five days (11th-15th) with the Wordsworths at Alfoxden, and that towards the close of the visit (13th) Coleridge had arrived on the scene. Ten weeks after this Coleridge's tragedy, Osorio, was rejected by Sheridan, and this crowning disappointment roused the poet to action. During the summer he had preached occasionally to the Unitarians of Taunton and Bridgewater, and now he learned that John Rowe, the pastor of that sect at Shrewsbury, was about to retire. He resolved to become a "hired preacher," and wrote offering to fill Rowe's pulpit for a few Sundays, "to see whether he liked the place, and whether the congregation liked him, and would endure his peculiar opinions." He tells Estlin on December 30, 1797:

I wrote to Montagu, that if indeed he should immediately procure the eight pupils at £100 a year, they boarding and lodging at their own expense (for this was his plan), I would join him gladly. But as I did not perceive the slightest chance of this, unless it were done immediately, I should accept some situation as Dissenting Minister, and that I had no time for delay or wavering.

The letter to Montagu was written early in December. On Christmas Day the post brought Coleridge an important communication from Josiah Wedgwood, who—probably either through Poole or through Montagu—had got word of the poet's position and intentions.

DEAR SIR [it ran], my brother Thomas and myself had separately determined that it would be right to enable you to defer entering into an engagement we understand you are about to form from the most urgent of motives. We therefore request you will accept the enclosed draft with the same simplicity with which it is offered.

A cheque for £100 accompanied the letter. To Coleridge, whose courage meanwhile had been dashed by somewhat chilling news from Shrewsbury, this windfall must have been a powerful lure to inaction; yet so sickened was he of the old, haphazard way of living—so weary of "chasing chance-started friendships"—that he debated with himself for three days before yielding. At length he did accept (December 28), only however to find himself thrown into fresh perplexity by the arrival that same evening of a cordial invitation from the flock at Shrewsbury, accompanied with "a very kind note from Rowe." Finally, after a storm of fluctuations, he returned the draft, with a long and characteristic letter in which, after minutely comparing the evils of the Press and of the Ministry considered simply as trades, or sources of regular income, he decides in favour of the Ministry as, on the whole, the less harmful in his own case. A permanent income, he adds, is essential to his peace of mind; "without it I should be a prey to anxiety, and anxiety with me always induces sickness, and too often sloth; as an overdose of stimulus proves a narcotic." He is setting out for Shrewsbury; and there—"if no new argument arise against the Ministerial office, and if the old ones assume no new strength—I shall certainly pitch my tent, and shall probably build up my permanent dwelling." Coleridge writes as one whose mind, after sore perplexity, is made up; the whole letter breathes an air of firm and cheerful resolution.

Perhaps never, before or after, did Coleridge come so near taking the steep yet salutary road to independence. One painful step remained—to turn his back on pleasant Stowey and take his way amongst strangers—and he would be fairly launched on what certainly was an honourable, and might well prove a congenial career. He was a born preacher; and the mild yoke and discipline of pastorship, with its round of regular duties, might have formed and fostered in him that habit of punctual attention to the day's work, from the lack of which he suffered so disastrously later on. One pastoral gift he possessed in an eminent degree—the power of comforting souls in sorrow. But whatever we may think of his qualifications, or of his chances of success, certain it is, first, that Coleridge had now finally made up his mind to embrace the ministerial calling, and had, so to speak, burnt his boats by returning their draft to the Wedgwoods; and, secondly, that he had received from the Unitarians at Shrewsbury a unanimous invitation to become a candidate for the pulpit vacated by Rowe. Whoever should intervene now, to divert him from his purpose, must needs incur a grave responsibility.

The draft had been returned on Friday, January 5, 1798. In the course of the following week (January 7-13) Coleridge travelled via Bristol to Shrewsbury, where he arrived on Saturday, and preached morning and evening next day (January 14). Meanwhile on receipt of Coleridge's letter enclosing the draft the Wedgwood brothers had written again—this time a joint letter, dated "Penzance, January 10, 1798." As the view we take of Josiah's subsequent action depends entirely on the construction we put on this letter, that part of it which relates to the annuity must now be quoted. The first paragraph is in the writing of Tom Wedgwood, the remainder in that of Josiah:

DEAR SIR,—In the absence of my brother who has an engagement this morning, I take up the pen to reply to your letter received yesterday. I cannot help regretting very sincerely that, at this critical moment, we are separated by so great a length of the worst road in the kingdom. It is not that we have found much difficulty in deciding how to act in the present juncture of your affairs, but we are apprehensive that, deprived of the benefit of conversation, we may fail somewhat in explaining our views and intentions with that clearness and persuasion which should induce you to accede to our proposal without scruple or hesitation—nay, with that glow of pleasure which the accession of merited good fortune, and the observation of virtuous conduct in others, ought powerfully to excite in the breast of healthful sensibility. Writing is painful to me. I must endeavour to be concise, yet to avoid abruptness. My brother and myself are possessed of a considerable superfluity of fortune; squandering and hoarding are equally distant from our inclinations. But we are earnestly desirous to convert this superfluity into a fund of beneficence, and we have now been accustomed for some time, to regard ourselves rather as Trustees than Proprietors. We have canvassed your past life, your present situation and prospects, your character and abilities. As far as certainty is compatible with the delicacy of the estimate, we have no hesitation in declaring that your claim upon the fund appears to come under more of the conditions we have prescribed for its disposal, and to be every way more unobjectionable, than we could possibly have expected. This result is so congenial with our heartfelt wishes, that it will be a real mortification to us, if any misconception or distrust of our intentions, or any unworthy diffidence of yourself, should interfere to prevent its full operation in your favour.

Thus far Tom Wedgwood; Josiah proceeds:

After what my brother Thomas has written, I have only to state the proposal we wish to make to you. It is that you shall accept an annuity for life of £150, to be regularly paid by us, no condition whatsoever being annexed to it. Thus your liberty will remain entire, you will be under the influence of no professional bias, and will be in possession of a "permanent income not inconsistent with your religious and political creed," so necessary to your health and activity.

I do not now enter into the particulars of the mode of securing the annuity, etc.—that will be done when we receive your consent to the proposal we are making; and we shall only say that we mean the annuity to be independent of everything but the wreck of our fortune, an event which we hope is not very likely to happen, though it must in these times be regarded as more than a bare possibility.

I am, very sincerely yours,
JOSIAH WEDGWOOD.

This letter reached Stowey on January 13—the very day of Coleridge's arrival at Shrewsbury. It was opened by Poole, who quickly despatched a copy after the poet, and himself wrote on the same sheet urging the acceptance of the proffered annuity. Coleridge meanwhile had, on Tuesday, January 16, walked out from Shrewsbury to pay his official respects to William Hazlitt, the Unitarian pastor of Wem. Here, on the morning of Wednesday, January 17, the fateful letter caught him up. This time there was little delay. Coleridge returned to Shrewsbury and, after an interview with Rowe, whose advice tallied with Poole's, wrote there and then to accept the Wedgwoods' offer. By the same post he announced his decision to Poole, and, either then or soon after, addressed to Estlin, who strongly opposed his abandonment of the ministry, an apologia from the terms of which we may gather his reading of the Wedgwoods' intentions. He informs Estlin that he has been offered an annuity of £150 for life, no condition whatever being annexed. Nothing can be clearer [he continues] than that I cannot accept the ministerial salary at Shrewsbury [£150] and this at the same time. For as I am morally certain that the Wedgwoods would not have thought it their duty . . . to have offered me £150 yearly, if I had been previously possessed of an £150 regular income, it follows indisputably that I cannot accept the first £150, with the determination to accept the latter £150 immediately after. . . . Now then, shall I refuse £150 a year for life, as certain as any fortune can be, for another £150 a year, the attainment of which is not yet certain, and the duration of which is precarious?

To the cause of Christianity and the promotion of the highest interests of mankind he solemnly devotes all his best faculties; but he cannot see any reason why his exertions on their behalf should be thought to depend on his becoming a stipendiary and local minister.

"To this add that the annuity is independent of my health, etc. etc.; the salary dependent not [only] on health, but on twenty caprices of twenty people." These extracts leave no room for doubt that Coleridge regarded the benefaction offered to him as tantamount to an absolute and irrevocable life-endowment.

T. HUTCHINSON,

(To be concluded next week.)

THE LAND-GRAVE

(Adapted from the Russian of Erick Schwieger)

THE Christmas night that Christ was born
They say that shepherds piped till morn
For Jews who danced upon the corn.

In Palestine the tender wheat
Can bend no more to the Hebrew feet;
A stranger sits in Moses' seat.

He has gone with a map and a motor-car
To where he can see the place from far,
To where the nesting pheasants are.

"Whose are the acres that I see?"
"Alack, Sir, they belong to me
In copyhold and simple fee:

"We have held the land for better or worse,
In spite of an ancient prior's curse
Which is now fulfilled in my empty purse."

"Of stocks and shares I have no dearth,
Pleasure was midwife at my birth;
What I yet lack is God's good earth.

"Though yellow men in mines to-night
Are bringing yellow gold to light
And diamonds yellow, bright and white;

"Though Afrikanders understand
That I can dance on Mine Deep Rand,
I'd rather dance on English land.

"So let me buy," the rich man said,
"My doggies' tongues are not more red
Than the red rays my motors shed.

"Yes, give me tithe and give me toll,
And God perchance shall heal my soul
And land shall make my body whole."

Back to London to float a mine,
To open a useless tramway line,
Then to the Carlton to rest and dine.

By terraces where peacocks stalk
He planted groves for gallant talk
And cool parterres for God to walk;

Where milking girls the kine would call,
Horses champed silver in the stall;
The Semite now was lord of all,

From fretted ceiling to parquet floor
The Titians glowed in the corridor,
But he looked on the land and wanted more.

He built him barns where the gold mice might Nibble the grain in the moon white light;
But God required his soul one night.

"Thy soul shall be required of thee,"
God said, "and whose shall these things be?"
God is a bitter mortgagee.

At the further end of the palm house stood
The tree of knowledge of evil and good
Which only the gardener understood.

It bears no fruit, but the servants say
It blossomed once on Christmas day—
The day the master passed away.

At Glastonbury St. Joseph's thorn
Blooms on the night that Christ is born,
While Jews are dancing in the corn.

ROBERT ROSS.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

NEW IDEAS FOR OLD

No class of educated man is perhaps so liable to lose the sense of proportion as that whose occupation it is endlessly to discuss the poetical productions of its fellows or the classics. Some weeks ago there was an astonishing debate carried on in the correspondence columns of this paper on the rival merits of Shelley and Wordsworth: one of those "questions insoluble by any positive method, since they cannot be answered by the facts, but only by our interpretation of them." On this interpretation these contenders seemed to be not only not agreed, but not yet centred—not yet at work. Now the author whom I have cited has written a book called "Interpretations of Poetry and Religion" (A. and C. Black), and I cannot help feeling that, if they were only made aware of his existence, he would stand in the relation of the Arabian Nights magician who offered "new lamps for old" not only to them, but to all those who spend much time in appreciating poetry of acknowledged standing.

The latest voice in this discussion sounded from India, and shed a vivid light on the need of general ideas and general agreement on them, in regard to the interpretation of the use and value of poetry. Asia tells us that Shelley in truth cannot be ranked with the "greatest poets of England or of Europe, but of the whole world." The other greatest poets of "the whole world" being not Homer, Dante and Shakespeare, but "Hafiz, Jelaludin Rumi," and "the great Sufi poets of Persia." This may be so; however, if it is, we who do not possess the languages in which these "greatest" wrote must be content with our own, and see Shelley not as Asia and the whole dumb world would see him, but as England and Europe see him. It is so easy to assume that we are backed by the whole dumb world, far easier than it is to listen when the comparatively small articulate world cries out to us and tells us we are wrong.

I myself am persuaded that critics should give over the bad habit (for such it has become) of using what are called "test lines" or "jewels five words long." Matthew Arnold set this fashion, but it is followed in a way that he would have deprecated and laughed at. Even supposing that there may be some magic relation between the length to which a memorable thought should run and a decasyllable line; that an idea is true is not enough, its application should be fresh as well. However, Arnold would have been amazed had you suggested to him that a poet's rank depended on the number of lines suitable for quotation that could be picked out of his work by some "little Jack Horner." He had fought all his life against mechanical tests in religion, in literature, in politics. In his essay on Emerson he points out that it is not the fact that a line lends itself to quotation, nor that it is quoted, which makes it a mark of a classic, but the fact that all lovers of English poetry so admire the author's work as to be necessarily familiar with such convenient phrase or line. This it is which makes its common use significant. His own use of quotation as a test of style makes no such appeal to what is widely quoted. He only chose short passages or single lines because they were convenient. He says: "short passages, single lines, will serve our turn quite sufficiently," not better than long ones save in being more convenient. Again he says: "have always in one's mind lines and expressions of the great masters. It is their accent of sincerity and of lofty import which he wishes us to note when our attention is directed to their matter, their accent of beauty in fluidity, in abundance, in rapidity, in power, when it is to their manner or style which we attend. Alas! he is already used by a crowd of critics as crowds of Christians use their Bibles, without understanding it and even without agreement with it. It was, perhaps, a pity that he, following Aristotle, said "high seriousness" instead of "sincerity," and "higher truth" instead of "greater veracity," because necessarily elevated poetry, when sincere, has high seriousness, and the words of those who attach a high value to truth are momentous or of lofty import. Whereas much beautiful poetry is sincere without being elevated, and veracious without being momentous. So that to have distinguished clearly between the essential qualities, sincerity and truth, and their greatest allies, elevation and momentousness, would have made his definitions still less ambiguous, though he safeguarded them in many other ways. The manner of poetry must always be beautiful, whatever other qualities may be added; this also he might have stated better alone by itself, apart from the other qualities that may go to a supreme poetic style. He did not seek out jewels of expression, as it is now assumed should be done, but was often content with lines that contained no complete thought or with level business lines. It was on qualities of style that he laid stress, not on serviceableness for quotation. However, his light, having been used so much and so wrongly, is now an old lamp, for which a new would be a grand exchange.

Now, it is my opinion that the only advance by a writer of English, since Matthew Arnold, capable of serving as a new lamp for the criticism of poetry has been made by the American, Mr. George Santayana (to whom I referred above) in an essay on the Poetry of Barbarism, dealing chiefly with Whitman and Browning. Not the brilliant essays of Professor Walter Raleigh on Milton and Wordsworth, nor the estimable work of Professor Bradley on the Four Great Tragedies of Shakespeare, nor Professor Murray's enthusiastic book about Euripides, in my opinion, mark such an advance. There is, perhaps, rather a confusing of the standard among them, or at least a failure to apply it with an equal ease and surety. Less remarkable critics are in these respects more strikingly at sea, and approach the confusion of the correspondence before referred to, or of Mr. Herbert Paul in his notorious volume on Arnold in the Men of Letters series.

"Discipline of the heart and fancy is always so rare a thing, that the neglect of it need not be supposed to involve any very terrible or obvious loss." Therefore, I am not hinting at any menaced decadence, but remark a slackening of the strings, a settling down in the chair, a tendency to yawn from the main interest or to smile asides to those who are not really concerned. The old maids of literature, who nurse delirium over their Lambs and FitzGeralds, we shall no doubt always have with us, as we shall always have the poor, even when we get a Labour Cabinet. Nature is responsible and not we ourselves. Still, there is what we might do, and Mr. Santayana has recently published a volume entitled, "Reason in Art" ("The Life of Reason." By George Santayana. Vol. iv.: "Reason in Art." Constable), in which he sets forth the bases of the standard he so deftly applied in his splendid essay on the Poetry of Barbarism. He may, perhaps, in some measure have weakened his position through being so explicit, but in any case he lays a deep debt of gratitude on us. We may study his book and his essay and refrain from the criticism of poetry till we have mastered them. This, at least, we may do. Of course, we might also read Arnold again, but I fear we know his words so well as to make it hopeless that we should ever get at his meaning that way. He is our greatest literary critic—a greater, I think, than Mr. Santayana is likely to prove; but, as this latter says:

To one who fixes his eye on the ideal goal, the greatest art often seems the greatest failure, because it alone reminds him of what it should have been. Trivial stimulations coming from vulgar objects, on the contrary, by making us forget altogether the possibility of a deep satisfaction, often succeed in interesting and winning applause. The pleasure they give us is so brief and superficial that the wave of essential disappointment which would ultimately drown it has not time to rise in the heart.

T. STURGE MOORE.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Phantastes," by Edward Stanley Robertson.]

FICTION

Giant Circumstance. By JOHN OXENHAM. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

MANY and strange are the devices of the modern novelist in search of material; but few are of such doubtful taste and art as that employed by Mr. John Oxenham in this novel. He takes the story of the death of the Prince Imperial in the Zulu War of 1879, changing a few names and facts; and the result is a poor imitation of the original narrative of Archibald Forbes. The novelist, however, insists that the subaltern who ran away did a braver thing than it was possible to do by staying with, or returning to, his superior officer. It is all very well to prate of moral courage and physical courage being on different planes, but it is a fortunate thing that Mr. John Oxenham's philosophy is not that of the good soldier; if it were so, the army would consist of men of prodigious moral courage always retreating. The death of Prince George of Saxe-Hohenburg-Reisenach, who in the novel takes the part of the Son of France, is only a sort of introduction to the fortunes of the hero, by name Challis—afterwards, owing to a legacy, Carrick—whom giant circumstance makes a worthy person. Having exhausted his stock of modern history, the novelist apparently turned to a report of the Lads' Drill Association, with the help of which he compiles a few chapters on the advantages of drill for gutter boys—Carrick appearing as the philanthropist who pays for the boys' club and instructors. From so commonplace a theme the reader is led on to incidents of treasure-hunts by Spaniards, delving for an Armada relic in Scotland, to the abduction by a Spaniard of Carrick's lady-love and her rescue at sea. This latter part of the book is in the most approved style of the cheaper kind of magazine, and quite unworthy of Mr. Oxenham. It is to be hoped that he will not again err from the paths of good taste by raking up events of modern history which are better buried in oblivion, since to many still living they are a source of unending sorrow and shame.

Folly. By EDITH RICKERT. (Arnold, 6s.)

WE read this story with a divided mind, trying honestly to look at the characters from the author's point of view and sometimes, but not always, succeeding. It would certainly not be fair to discuss the book from the conventional point of view, that will not tolerate any divergence from the accepted moral law. Folly, her husband, her lover, and the old lady, rather distressingly called "mater-kin," live in a cloud-world where accepted law can be set aside without offence or degradation. When people in real life act as these people did, we condemn them, either by our laughter or our censure; and, when a novel with this plot is written with any touch of coarseness or with any want of humour, we put it away. But it would be cruel to laugh at Folly or even at her husband; and it would be quite impossible to take umbrage at their "goings on." Yet it must be said that the author never carries you far enough from the real world to let you forget it; and it is only on the heights reached by great poetry and great music that love admittedly becomes a law unto itself, sublimated and divine. Every one understands that Cleopatra and Isolde are not to be judged by the standard that sends real sinners to perdition. They are children of air and fire, as incorporeal as the music of word and sound associated with their names. But in the novel before us the people are without much motive and unshaken by passion. They are decorous in an undecorous situation, and undutiful from a perverted sense of duty. Folly is a lovable woman and not so bloodless and shadowy as the two men. They are all people with some nobility of nature, but (the Philistine will say) without a grain of common sense.

Curayl. By UNA L. SILBERRAD. (Constable, 6s.)

"CURAYL" begins well with a picturesque scene in the old church, and the introduction of two exceptionally interesting people, and it rarely disappoints the promise of the first chapters. Here, as in former novels, the author gives us pleasant proof of her quality as a story-teller; but construction is not one of her strong points. The plot of "Curayl" is rather a patchwork of events, scenes and incidents, which have a way of repeating themselves not always in harmony with the progress of the story. The fever epidemic is worked out beyond the limits of its importance or its interest for the reader, and a dying man's request concerning a certain packet, which suggested romantic possibilities, has no particular bearing upon the course of events. Beatrice Curayl has married Sir William Goyte for his money and her father's convenience. She longs to break the bargain between herself and her despised and despicable husband, but is restrained by the advice of a stranger, Anthony Luttrell, who reminds her that "it is not gentlemanly for either party to cry off." Then comes the epidemic, and Sir William's refusal to help the tenants drives Beatrice to offer her personal assistance to the little band of volunteers who are fighting the fever. She finds Luttrell in command, adored and obeyed by all. Nothing new in all this, and Beatrice's and Luttrell's fate is a foregone conclusion; but the manner of it has nothing of commonplace. The developments of the finer side of Beatrice's nature, from the moment she realises that sordid motives alone prompted her to marry Sir William to the end of her purgation show that Miss Silberrad is capable of doing strong and skilful work, as wholesome as it is clever.

Tales of the Fish Patrol. By JACK LONDON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

TALES of this type, monotonous in theme and wholly without magic of style, have yet their recognised right to appeal to the large unlettered public that is content to find in excitement its adequate reward. Fairly exciting the stories certainly are; and they effectively show the peril that surrounds the life of a fish patrolman in his encounters with Chinese shrimp-catchers, Greek sturgeon-fishers, Mexican oyster-pirates and other ill-favoured poachers who set the fish laws of San Francisco Bay at defiance. The capture of Big Alec, the "King of the Greeks," is a neat piece of work; and it is evident that the writer, in his character of successful policeman, requires us to sympathise with him in his difficulties and applaud his skill. But unfortunately that is just what we cannot always do. Take such a story as this, of "The Lancashire Queen." A handful of desperate Italians in a skiff have successfully baffled the patrolmen for days. At last the latter by a ruse board "a four thousand horse-power pleasure-yacht" and ruthlessly chase the skiff. In the supreme moment of triumph, "Charley," the hero of this thrilling episode, points to the forty-five-miles-an-hour yacht and exclaims: "Look at that! Just look at it! If the invention of that is not imagination, I should like to know what is! Of course, it's the other fellow's imagination, but it did the work all the same." . . . It requires an American to admire this. Yet, for all that, "Charley" can do brave things; and his picturesque personality counts for much throughout the entire series of adventures. Indeed, "Charley's Coup," the fifth tale of the set, shows him at his best. It is the most diverting of them all.

Lady Sarah's Deed of Gift. By E. ACEITUNA GRIFFIN. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THIS is an amusing story with a good moral. The moral (for men) is that husbands must not be selfish and tyrannical: the moral (for women) is that, if wives run away from home, they will probably want to come back. The whole tone of the story is bright and innocent, and there is no guile in Joy's running away. On the contrary, we are delighted when a clever old lady provides her with money enough for the purpose. Toby was an excellent husband, no doubt, but he could not imagine that his lively, charming wife wanted anything more than he gave her: anything more than a roof to her head, enough to eat, and the constant unfriendly companionship of his dull mother and sister. When she tried to take more he put his foot down in his solid British way. That situation is always amusing when it is not tragic. You want to see how a man is going to enforce his rights in these days of equality and emancipation. Unless he can stop all supplies it is not easy, for to invoke the law is to acknowledge shipwreck. But social opinion is still on his side and will make things uncomfortable for a woman who has drifted from her husband without good reason. It must be said that Joy Archdale's reasons were not weighty, but her conduct was spirited and her adventures are entertaining. Toby has the qualities of his defects, and it was a foregone conclusion that his wife would be the one to give in. His British foot was rather heavy, but his British heart was in the right place. His loyalty to Joy and his faith in her were never shaken; and she certainly led him a pretty dance—just as pretty as he deserved.

The Paramor Papers. By FLORENCE POPHAM. (Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.)

THE startling and misleading title of this book gives no idea of its contents, and those who take it up in the hope of finding stories of plot and passion will be sadly disappointed. On the other hand, the reading of these humorous papers will give a good deal of pleasure to those who like their mental food to be light and easy of digestion. The author has quaint and original things to say about the minor matters of life, and she appears to come smiling out of most of her dilemmas and experiences. She is evidently one of those lucky people who can see the funny side of things, even if they go so far along the road of discomfort as losing their light luggage in a train or enduring the society of an extremely interfering and trying aunt by marriage. There is a delightful chapter on her attempt to teach her children the "Morte d'Arthur"; they insist upon her taking part in their dramatic versions of that noble book. She has the feminine weakness of moving house as often as it can be done and has amusing things to say about "our street" and "minor economies." In fact, there is not a dull page in this bright and pleasant little book.

Concerning Paul and Fiammetta. By L. ALLEN HARKER. (Arnold, 5s.)

CHILDREN are delightful little people, and Paul and Fiammetta are delightful children—especially Paul, with his mania for reading and his devotion to dogs, and to his friend Tonks. Tonks has no existence except in Paul's own imagination, but is the truest of true friends for that very reason. Paul likes to sit in window-seats and read, and his favourite window is in his mother's bedroom, for there he is unmolested. On one occasion, however, the book he was reading was rather dull (there are such books): his attention wandered to the telegraph-boy standing by the hall door, and the splendid plan leapt to him to empty the contents of the water-bottle quietly upon the telegraph boy's head. That is one of these sketches, twenty-one in all, and one of the most attractive. But it is not easy to choose between it and that which recounts Fiammetta's initiation into the joys of watching cricket, or the fishing-party, where with father's best split-cane the children angle with a pinktail for trout in the farm-yard and succeed in catching a farm-yard duck and a sound scolding which ends in premature bed. But their fly-fishing father sympathised. It is easy to imagine many parties both in the schoolroom and downstairs where these sketches will be read aloud and approved enthusiastically.

FINE ART

A HARDY ANNUAL

THE publishers of "The Year's Art, 1906" (Hutchinson, 3s. 6d.), intimate that they "will be greatly obliged to readers who can direct their attention to any inaccuracies or deficiencies." This announcement, it is true, is made with special reference to the "List of Fine Art Dealers in London and the Provinces," but we venture to hope that neither publishers nor editor will resent attention being directed to "inaccuracies and deficiencies" in other sections of what is already an annual of much utility to all interested in British Art.

To begin at the beginning, then, the calendar with its memorabilia calls for stringent revision. Here the birth-days of contemporary artists are recorded with profuse, perhaps too profuse, generosity, while the anniversaries of the most celebrated of the great masters are for the most part passed over in silence. Surely the births and deaths of Raphael, Michelangelo, Dürer, Rembrandt, Reynolds and Raeburn, for example, are as worthy of commemoration as the death of Mr. Du Maurier or the birth of Mr. C. W. Wyllie. Still more extraordinary is the following entry for January:

23. Tu. Leeds Receiving Day, Leeds.
A. C. R. Carter born, 1864.

Mr. A. C. R. Carter is the editor of "The Year's Art." On the same day in 1810 John Hoppner was born, in 1832 Edouard Manet was born, in 1883 Gustave Doré died, and in 1896 died Lord Leighton.

The brief survey of the art happenings of 1905 is a fairly efficient summary of events, though it is difficult to understand why, if the exhibition of the Rokeby Velasquez at Messrs. Agnew's be chronicled, no mention should be made of the exhibition of Titian's portrait of Pietro Aretino at Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi's and of The Letter by Jan Vermeer of Delft at Messrs. Sulley's. The Fantin-Latour exhibition at Messrs. Obach's was also well worthy of special mention.

Much valuable space is wasted by a list of the members of the Royal Academy from its foundation to the current year and by a complete list of the exhibitors at the Academy of 1905. The first is unnecessary, since it is to be found in many works of reference, while the official catalogue is a sufficient record of the second. In future editions we hope these will be omitted and the space gained might be devoted to a brief survey of the principal exhibits not only at the Academy but at the International, the New Gallery, the Old Water-colour Society, the New English Art Club, the Scottish Academy, the Glasgow Institute, and many other important exhibitions which go unnoticed. Space might also be found for some review of the Paris salons and other Continental exhibitions. In the section dealing with "Foreign Art Institutions" no reference whatever is made to the very fine collections at Berlin and Dresden. Indeed, those cities and the rest of Germany, with the exception of Munich, find no acknowledgment in this work.

The chapter dealing with the art sales of the year is certainly one of the best and most valuable in the book, but it cannot be considered authoritative, as the editor claims, when the sale of the portraits of the artist and his wife for thirteen thousand two hundred guineas is asserted to be a new Raeburn record. Apart from the fact that it is misleading to bracket together thus two works which were sold separately, Raeburn's portrait of Sir John Sinclair of Ulbster realised at Christie's three years ago a higher sum than the total of these two portraits.

"To the additional time and trouble taken in verifying and correcting" the Directory of Artists the editor attributes "the slight delay in publication" of his annual. This very useful feature may certainly be said to be complete, remarkably so in fact, since it contains the name and address in Paris of H. de Toulouse-Lautrec who died five years ago. Moreover, though complete, this directory, like its verification and correction, is not exhaustive. Illustrators especially seem to be neglected; among notable omissions are those of Messrs. G. D. Armour, Herbert Railton, and A. S. Forrest, R.I., while, if American artists be included, as they are, there can be no justification for leaving out the names of Mr. Alexander Harrison, Mr. Howard Pyle, and Miss Elizabeth Shippen Green.

Last, in the list of London dealers, the amalgamation of Messrs. Van Wisselingh and Van Hoytema is not noted, and the old addresses of both are given instead of their new one at the Dutch Gallery, 39 Old Bond Street. The list of Paris dealers, no doubt, does not pretend to be complete: still, there is no excuse for omitting so historic a firm as Messrs. Durand Ruel.

With a little more care and trouble in verifying and correcting, the utility of "The Year's Art" might be considerably increased, and since even in its imperfect condition it is without a rival, we have little hesitation in saying that it should be included in every art library.

SOME MASTERPIECES OF ENGRAVING AND ETCHING

THE little exhibition at Mr. Gutekunst's gallery, open during this month and April, is one which nobody who cares for fine prints should fail to visit. Five masters only are represented, and there is but a single example of Rembrandt, the portrait of Janus Sylvius; but of Dürer, Méryon, Whistler and Haden, there are considerable groups. The Dürers include such masterpieces as St. Eustace and The Knight, Death and the Devil in exceedingly fine impressions; The Knight, indeed, from the Fisher collection, is probably without a rival for brilliancy and perfect preservation. The Melancholia is not quite so good, but the heraldic plates and the Great Horse are fine. The Méryons are splendid throughout and include five of the impressions on green paper justly valued by collectors. The first states of La Morgue,

Le Pont Neuf and Le Pont au Change are especially noteworthy, and the rare first state of L'Abside de Notre Dame is interesting for its dedication in Méryon's autograph, though it is not so impressive as the memorable proof on green paper exhibited at a neighbouring gallery a few years ago. There are nine other etchings by Méryon, and all are good. Whistler is well represented by a number of the Venice etchings, two beautiful proofs of the Thames set, and a few less often seen, such as Lindsay Houses and The Damwood. Last, there are eight Seymour Hadens, all of remarkable excellence, which include the lovely Sunset in Ireland, an unusually fine Mytton Hall, and a trial proof of Shere Mill-Pond, washed in sepia by the artist. There are novelties in abundance to be seen just now in London, but when curiosity is sated it is pleasant to linger among acknowledged masterpieces of so high quality and interest.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have in the press a "History of English Prosody from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day," by Professor Saintsbury. It is to be in three volumes, and the first volume, which traces the history of prosody up to Spenser, will be published immediately.—Early in April Messrs. Macmillan will publish "Lady Baltimore," a new novel from the pen of Owen Wister; and a new edition of "Elizabeth and her German Garden," with coloured illustrations.—The same publishers have almost ready the first volume of the Complete Tennyson they are issuing, in five volumes, India paper, in the Pocket Classics series.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash will publish next week "Ten Tudor Statesmen," by Arthur D. Innes. The book deals with Henry VII.; Wolsey; More; Thomas Cromwell; Henry VIII.; Somerset; Cranmer; William Cecil; Walsingham; and Raleigh.—The same publisher has ready an interesting book from the pen of Alexander, Lord Lamington, entitled "In the Days of the Dandies," which has an introduction by Sir Herbert Maxwell.

An announcement of interest to sportsmen is "The Complete Cricketer," by Albert E. Knight, which Messrs. Methuen will issue immediately. The Leicestershire professional devotes chapters to the historical development of cricket and these are followed by chapters for young aspirants to honour. The final portion of the book is devoted to cricket in Greater Britain, the characteristics of Australian grounds, the preparation and peculiarities of their wickets, and a personal impression of a Test Match at Sydney.—Early in April Messrs. Methuen will add to their Little Guides Series "Northamptonshire," by Wakeling Dry..

Early next month Messrs. Alf. Cooke will publish "The Silvery Thames," by Walter Jerrold, with reproductions in colour of the Water-Colour Paintings of Thames Views, by Ernest W. Haslehurst, now exhibited at Messrs. Dickinson's Gallery.

Some time in April Mr. Unwin will publish Lord Hindlip's "Sport and Travel." Lord Hindlip here gives an account of a six months' expedition into Abyssinia, and of two sporting trips in British East Africa. In Abyssinia he was received by the Emperor Menelik, and his tour through the country was eventful both in sport and adventure. In the section devoted to British East Africa, Lord Hindlip describes his sport with elephant, rhinoceros, lion, buffalo, giraffe, leopard, etc.—The same publisher has in the press two books which should prove of interest: "Schiller's Dramas and Poems in England," by Thomas Rea; and "Old German Love-Songs," by F. C. Nicholson, translated from the Minnesänger.

Messrs. Constable will publish in a few days a novel from the pen of Mr. G. Harold Spender. The theme of "The Arena" is the part played by women in politics.—Another novel announced for early publication by the same firm is "Mr. John Strood," by Percy White.

An interesting addition to the reference library—"The Green Room Book, or Who's Who on the Stage"—is announced for publication to-day by Mr. T. Sealey Clark. The new annual is illustrated, and nearly four hundred pages are devoted to condensed biographies of prominent actors and actresses, managers, authors, composers, critics, vocalists, etc., connected with the British, American and Continental stage. A series of genealogical tables, setting forth the origin and descent of about twenty of the best known theatrical families is given, together with information concerning the licensing of the London theatres and halls, a list of plays of the year (giving dates of production and withdrawal), descriptions and details of the leading theatrical clubs, charities, and other professional associations, a list of theatres, music and concert halls of the United Kingdom, and digests of theatrical law cases.

Mr. John Lane will publish on March 28 "The Newell Fortune," by Mansfield Brooks, a new novel by a new author. On the same date he announces "Love's Testament," a sonnet sequence, by G. Constant Lounsbury, and a reprint of Anthony Trollope's "The Small House at Allington."

Mr. J. A. Bridges's book, "Reminiscences of a Country Politician," is nearly ready, and will be published by Mr. Werner Laurie. One of the non-political reminiscences concerns the author's experiences with the East Kent Militia during the Crimean War.

Messrs. Bell have in the press a book on Steam and Water Turbines, in which the theory of the subject is developed concurrently with its history, in such a way as to make it readily intelligible to the general reader. It will contain many illustrations.—Messrs. Bell are also about to publish a new and cheaper edition of what is perhaps Abbot Gasquet's best-known work, "Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries." The present edition has a new preface by the author.

Mr. Elliot Stock has in the press "Returned with Thanks," a new story founded on modern literary life, by Mrs. Maxwell Prideaux.

Messrs. George Newnes, Limited, will shortly issue in their Sixpenny Series "My Friend Prospero," by the late Henry Harland, who was, unquestionably, a writer of exquisite English.—The same firm announce the next volume of the Merriman Series of Sixpenny Editions: "From One Generation to Another."

"The Salvation Army and the Public," by John Manson, which Messrs. Routledge announce for immediate publication, is a critical examination of Salvationism in its religious, social, financial, and other aspects. While showing the interdependence of the different parts of the complicated Salvationist machine, the author draws attention to evils, abuses, and dangers which, he maintains, are at present concealed by the Army's autocratic constitution and methods of publicity, and suggests certain reforms.

Mr. Elkin Mathews announces for early publication a new volume of verse entitled "Dramatic Lyrics" by John Gurdon.

CORRESPONDENCE

HEROIC ROMANCES OF IRELAND

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am sorry that your Reviewer's letter compels me to return to the charge, but there are questions involved the importance of which must excuse my pertinacity.

Your Reviewer originally urged that the work was deprived of value for scholars because the translations in vol. ii. were free paraphrase. I pointed out that vol. ii. likewise contained literal versions so that the scholar's interests were cared for. He now accuses Professor Leahy of inconsistency because vol. i. does not likewise contain literal versions. As a simple matter of fact, Professor Leahy originally intended issuing literal versions with vol. i. likewise. Questions of size and cost determined their exclusion. But I cannot see that the procedure adopted involves inconsistency. The versions in vol. i. are literary, not literal; but they are faithful, as faithful, say, as Jowett's Plato. The versions in vol. ii. are not, in this sense, faithful; they are avowedly paraphrases. Vol. i. is thus of value to the student of Middle Irish speech without the literal version; vol. ii., lacking the literal version, would be of little value. It is thus quite legitimate to include it in one case and omit it in the other. Your Reviewer further finds fault with Professor Leahy for not having harmonised the discordant forms in which the Serglige Conculainn has come down to us. It never occurred to Professor Leahy to commit such an unpardonable sin; had he designed it I should certainly have refused to countenance him. The text is quite one of the most valuable remains of Irish mythico-heroic sagas. As it has come down to us it represents the fusion rather of two independent legends than of two faulty transcripts of the same legend. To have obscured this fact would have been to deprive this portion of the book of all interest in the eyes of those who want to know what early Irish literature is. The omission of what is an obvious afterthought, perhaps intended as some sort of link between the legends which the redactor of the Yellow Book of Slam maladroitly jumbled together, seems to me perfectly defensible.

As regards the scribal confusion between the two Eochaias left uncorrected in the text although noted in the Notes, your Reviewer is evidently unaware that Professor Windrich has drawn critical conclusions from this very fact. With these conclusions Professor Leahy does not agree; all the more did he think himself bound not to obscure any fact that at first sight seemed to tell against him. The "higher criticism" of Medieval Irish Literature is as yet in its infancy. An indispensable prerequisite is accurate presentation of facts, whether in texts or versions. Among such facts are scribal errors.

Editors and Publishers of Irish literature are between the devil and the deep sea. If they bear in mind the requirements of scholarship, they are accused of pedantry and their work is ruled out of court as lacking all interest to the general public. If they avow their appeal to the latter, any withholding of the mint and cumin and anise of the most rigidly strict scholarship is cast in their teeth. The object of comment seems to be to discourage rather than to encourage, to drive editors into the Scylla of unsaleability or the Charybdis of unscholarliness.

Speaking with some experience, I would demur to this attitude as unnecessary. The public, Irish or English, requires no inducement to turn aside from the study of Irish literature. Far from it. The work of essaying to arouse public interest is thankless enough without its being needlessly hampered by superfluous captiousness.

ALFRED NUTT.

THACKERAY, NOT ANOTHER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have just read Mr. William Archer's interesting column (in one of the daily papers) in which he cleverly argues against my ascription to Thackeray of the authorship of the review of the "Crimes" of Dumas. It is quite true that my reasons for including the essay in "The New Sketch Book" are very briefly given in my introduction. I might easily have filled a page with them—but I had eleven essays to deal with in a very few pages.

Mr. Archer's three points are these: (1) The "respect" the anonymous reviewer appears to have for Dumas and the disrespect which Thackeray is thought to have felt for him in 1842. (2) The reviewer's possession (or affectation of possession) of a good deal of historical knowledge. (3) The style in which the review is written.

As to (1) Mr. Archer, I think, overlooks the fact that Thackeray's hostile criticism of Dumas as shown in the earlier writings was directed against plays. Mr. Archer can scarcely have read Thackeray's essay on Dumas's "Travels on the Rhine" which appeared in the same number of the Foreign Quarterly, the "Celebrated Crimes" at p. 36 and "The Rhine" at p. 105. No one would venture to challenge Thackeray's authorship of the latter essay and no one who reads it could fairly say that Thackeray was without respect for Dumas. I agree that he had none for his plays either in 1842 or at any time.

(2) As to independent historical knowledge, I scarcely follow Mr. Archer's reasoning. Thackeray (I assume that the writer was Thackeray) was engaged by the editor of an important Quarterly to write a lengthy essay on an important book. Surely it was the reviewer's duty to get up a little history. Why, in his letter to Edward Fitzgerald, written in 1842 and quoted in my introduction, Thackeray wrote that he had been reading "scores of volumes of history in the most owl-like solemn way." I conjecture that these volumes and the resulting essay are to be associated with the getting up of history the better to grapple with the "Crimes" of Dumas.

(3) As to the style in which the essay is written, this every student of Thackeray must judge for himself. Like most other authors, Dumas included, Thackeray, when writing with a pencil between his teeth and a score of open volumes scattered around him, failed to preserve all the individuality of his style.

It has not occurred to Mr. Archer to ask himself what the reviewer meant by writing in the opening paragraph of his essay on the "Crimes": "We cannot but grieve that it will occur to us before even our present number closes to throw some less flattering light on his remarkably prolific style."

I suggest, Sir, that the critic alluded to the essay on the "Travels on the Rhine" at p. 105 of the same number of the Foreign Quarterly and to show (if I can) that both essays were written by the same pen I quote from the latter essay the sentences that follow:

"But with a protest as to the length of the volumes it is impossible to deny that they will give the lover of light literature a few hours amusing reading; nay, as possibly the author will imagine, of instruction too. For here he is again, though less successfully than in his Crimes Célèbres, the minute historian; and again we are bound to say with perfect success, the pure dramatic romancist. He says he makes 'preparatory studies' before visiting a country, which enable him therefore to go through it 'without a cicerone, without a guide, and without a plan' (see how the book-maker shows himself in this little sentence; any one of the phrases would have answered; but M. Dumas must take three!) and would have us believe like M. Victor Hugo, whose tour over part of the same country we noticed six months back, that at each place he comes to be in a position to pour out his vast stores of previously-accumulated knowledge, to illustrate the scene before his eyes."

And again:

"For the telling of legends, as already shown in the notice of M. Dumas's book about Crimes in a former part of this Review, the dramatic part of the traveller's mind is by no means disadvantageous."

And yet again:

"However, to do the dramatist justice, he is by no means so bloody-minded now as he was in his earlier youth; and he has grown more moral too and decent, so that ladies, skipping such Borgian temptations as are noted in a former part of this Review, may, on the whole, find it possible to read him."

Now, Sir, this seems fairly convincing, and in default of absolute proofs to the contrary, I think most people will agree with me in thinking that Thackeray wrote the three essays, that on Hugo's "Rhine Letters," that on Dumas's "Crimes" and that on Dumas's "Travels on the Rhine."

So excellent a critic is Mr. Archer that I should shrink from setting my opinion against his were the question to be resolved on internal evidence alone. Yet I am a little surprised that the reference to Dumas's play "Kean" in the "Crimes" essay (Thackeray nearly always alludes to "Kean" when writing of Dumas—yes, sure enough there is an allusion to it in the essay on "Dumas on the Rhine" also) did not help Mr. Archer to detect Thackeray's authorship.

R. S. GARNETT.

March 13.

THE LIFE OF WALTER SCOTT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Though I hold a strong view as to the undesirability, as a general rule, of authors replying to their reviewers, I feel impelled to make an exception in the case of the ACADEMY.

I must really protest against your description of my "Life" as "a collection of literary gossip," and still more, against the statement that I "propose to make an attempt to supersede Lockhart." I should be only too glad, on the contrary, if I could think that, nowadays, people could be induced to read that fine biography, and I can assure your reviewer that the "stern revision" he desiderates has already been made, and that one of the effects of it is the very passage he singles out for animadversion. But I fail to see how "revision" can avail to change opinion.

G. LE GRYS NORGATE.

March 17.

[We owe an apology to Mr. Le Gry's Norgate. The printer changed no into an and the passage should read "he makes no attempt to supersede Lockhart." We characterised as literary gossip (without any objectionable intent) Mr. Norgate's attempts to find in real personages the models from which the characters of Scott are drawn; and literary gossip it is. For the rest, he misappropriates to himself a piece of criticism applied to Sir Walter, which shows that a reader is as liable to be careless as is a printer.—ED.]

"HOURS WITH RABELAIS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I be permitted to suggest that the review of my "Hours with Rabelais" that appeared in your columns on Saturday last was written under some misapprehension of the avowed scope of the work?

The book does not profess to be an expurgated edition of the "Gargantua" and "Pantagruel," but is, as its title implies, an "anthology," comprising, to quote the preface, "nearly all that is best" in the works of Rabelais.

I submit, therefore, that your Reviewer is not justified in assuming that I have omitted certain passages (which he specifies), because with a hateful prudishness, I discern non-existent "grossness" in them.

The episodes in question were omitted merely to leave room for others that, rightly or wrongly, I deem of more interest and importance.

F. G. STOKES.

March 18.

[Our review of Mr. Stokes's "Hours with Rabelais" was written under no misapprehension. We were content to accept his own account of his work. Here are the opening sentences of his preface: "A well-known commentator—M. Jean Fleury—has recorded his opinion that the grossness which characterises (and, as many a good Pantagruelist will admit, sullies) much of the work of the great Frenchman, forms no essential part of his book. . . In this volume of selections from the Gargantua and Pantagruel, an attempt has been made to remove the blemish here referred to." In other words the text of Rabelais has been expurgated, and, with whatever motive he was inspired, Mr. Stokes has done his work so thoroughly, that "Hours with Rabelais" may be safely read aloud in a mixed school of girls and boys. We are therefore justified in assuming, as we do, that certain passages were omitted by Mr. Stokes, on account of the "grossness" which he discerned in them.—Ed.]

A CURIOSITY OF LITERATURE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I enclose a copy of a letter in "The Remains" of Lord Verulam which I happened to notice in Lord Ellesmere's Library a few days ago.

The final words are rather curious in view of the Bacon-Shakespeare Controversy, and you may perhaps think it worth while to print the letter.

March 20.

STRACHAN HOLME,
Librarian to the Earl of Ellesmere.THE REMAINS OF THE R.H. FRANCES LORD VERULAM, ETC.,
London, 1648.

A Letter to Mr. Davies then gone to the King at his first entrance.

MR. DAVIES,—Though you went on the suddain yet you could not go before you had spoken with your self to the purpose whereof I will now write. And therefore, I know not, but that it was altogether needlesse save that I meant to shew you, that I was not asleepe. Besides I commend my self to your love, and to the well using of my name, as in reposing and answering for me if there be any biting and bibbling at it in that place, as in impressing a good opinion of me chiefly in the King of whose favour, I make my self comfortable assurance, as otherwise in that Court; and not only, but generally to perform to me all the good offices, which the vivacity of your wit can suggest to your mind, to be performed to me, in whose affection you have so great sympathy, and in whose fortune, you have so great interest: So desiring you to be good and concealed Poets, I continue.

Yours etc.

"A GENTLEMAN"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Algernon Ashton's recent claim to have been the originator of a certain retort reminds me that in 1878 or 1879 I was told the following of the late Rev. H. C. Moxon, then studying for holy orders. He had been attacked with some acerbity by a fellow student on account of sundry Church views. The calm and smiling amiability with which he bore the fiercest onslaughts produced at length the irrelevant remark: "You call yourself a gentleman." Moxon, who had the rare grace of never losing his temper in argument, quietly replied: "I didn't call myself a gentleman."

Literary celebrities who may be inclined to accuse others of plagiarism might do well to ponder the natural history fact that similarity of environment has repeatedly occasioned the evolution from very diverse organisms of what look like imitative forms.

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

March 12.

"HYACINTH"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I waited for a week in order to let some one else protest against the review of "Hyacinth, by George A. Birmingham" in your issue of March 5. I have not read the book myself but the review of it is the most ill-informed thing of the kind I have ever seen in what ought to be a first class literary journal.

If your Reviewer had taken the pains to inquire he ought easily to have discovered that "George A. Birmingham" is the assumed name of the Rev. J. Hannay, Rector of Westport, Co. Mayo, an Irishman born and bred, and the author of one of the most interesting pictures of this country presented to the public these many years—I mean "The Seething Pot." Your Reviewer would then have been saved from the glaring blunder that "it appeared to us that Mr. Birmingham had visited Ireland, talked with a number of Protestants, jumped to several wholly erroneous conclusions, hit by accident on a few truths, and decided to make a book on the strength of it." Perhaps he will now admit that the author knows a little more about Ireland than his Reviewer. I do not know the Rev. Mr. Hannay; with some of his opinions I might not agree; but that he is a keen observer of things Irish few will refuse to admit. He is also a well-known member of the Gaelic League.

As I have not read "Hyacinth" I cannot quarrel with your Reviewer's opinion that it is "a novel without a backbone; lacking a plot, lacking an ending, and lacking a purpose." It would perhaps not be quite fair to judge the trustworthiness of this opinion by the value of the succeeding statement: "Mr. Birmingham has little knowledge of Irish history (he speaks of Castlereagh evidently confused by a tourist's recollection of Lough Rea)."

If "Mr. Birmingham has little knowledge of Irish history" your Reviewer has less of Irish Geography. Castlereagh is a tolerably well-known town in Co. Roscommon, Loughrea is a town in Co. Galway,

Lough Ree is one of the expansions of the River Shannon, but where may I ask your Reviewer is Lough Rea?

I think also that Mr. Birmingham does probably "know the difference between the brogue and the brogues." Your Reviewer need have no uneasiness on that score.

Finally let me hope that all your reviews of books are not written with the same cock-sure ignorance that this unfortunate notice displays.

W. H. WELPLY.

Our Reviewer replies:

(1) If Mr. Welply has not read "Hyacinth" he is not in a position to arrogate to himself the right to decide whether or no my review is a "most ill-informed thing."

(2) I am, and was, perfectly well aware of the identity of the author of "Hyacinth." I was aware of his identity when I reviewed—not for the ACADEMY—"The Seething Pot." It is nothing to me. If Mr. Hannay assumes the name of Birmingham, it is my province to treat him as Birmingham not as Hannay.

(3) "The Seething Pot" was not "one of the most interesting pictures of [Ireland] presented to the public these many years." It was not at all interesting and betrayed a very superficial knowledge of Ireland.

(4) I was guilty of no "glaring blunder" when I said that "it appeared to us that Mr. Birmingham had visited Ireland, talked with a number of Protestants, jumped to several wholly erroneous conclusions, hit by accident on a few truths, and decided to make a book on the strength of it." It did appear to me that Mr. Birmingham had done these things. It still appears so to me. An intelligent tourist would have gained a wider knowledge of Ireland in a few months than Mr. Birmingham possesses.

(5) I do not admit that "the author knows a little more about Ireland than his Reviewer." He knows nothing of the real Ireland—or if he knows anything of it he does not exhibit his knowledge in his books. Mr. Birmingham, if he be a "keen observer of things Irish," does not profit by his observation.

(6) Mr. Welply's last paragraphs are hardly worth attention. He has not read "Hyacinth," yet he assumes to give me information and advice! I have as perfect an acquaintance as any, I think, with Irish geography. Unfortunately for Mr. Welply's display of knowledge, when Mr. Birmingham mentioned "Castlereagh" he was dealing not with the town, but with a man whose name was not Castlereagh.

(7) Rea is merely an alternative spelling for the "expansion of the Shannon" which Mr. Welply calls Ree.

AN EMENDATION OF HERODAS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—On our common national Saint's day, I see your collaborateur, Dr. Tyrrell, on "Herodas," p. 257 of your paper, does not acknowledge my priority of claim to the translation of Mime iii, 61.

As far back as November 11, 1905, in the ACADEMY, I said the reference was to what "French schoolboy's" jargon calls "la lune." The Doctor appropriates the view in these words: "an ingenious idea is to read . . . in the sense of pueri nates," without giving my name. And yet I also am, as is he, an "ingenious" Irishman, and claim the "p. n." The Doctor is not "frugi consumere nates."

H. H. JOHNSON.

Rennes University, March 17.

[Mr. Johnson is quite correct in his facts, but we consider it hardly fair to suggest that Professor Tyrrell "appropriates" his suggestion. The words Mr. Johnson quotes from Professor Tyrrell's article show that of themselves.—Ed.]

TWO POINTS OF GRAMMAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—"Tell it not in Gath" lest "The Philistines" rejoice; that on page 267 of this week's journal appears this incorrect paragraph: "Owing to pressure on our space a number of letters is held over."

Even an erudite editor of a literary journal is apt to inadvertently overlook a grammatical error, in a notice set up by an illiterate compositor.

O, ye gods of Tavistock Street! The inerrancy of even literary journalists is invalid thereby. Thanks all the same for your valuable journal which is microscopically perused each week.

T. H. ASHELFORD.

March 17.

[We are prepared to defend our grammar; but are there no instances of even clever correspondents being apt "to inadvertently overlook" a grammatical error?—Ed.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Wessely. Painted by Walter Tyndale; described by Clive Holland. 9×6½. Black, 20s. net.

Voysey, C. F. A. Reason as a basis of Art. 6½×4½. Pp. 29. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.

[A plea for the expression of the higher individuality in art—especially in house-building—by the architect who builds those beautiful white country-houses with green roofs.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- A Friend of Marie-Antoinette* (Lady Atkyns). Translated from the French of Frédéric Barbey. Preface by Victorien Sardou. 9 x 6. Pp. xix, 252. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.
- [Charlotte Walpole, the daughter of Robert Walpole, made her first appearance on the stage in Love in a Mist, at Drury Lane, on October 22, 1777, and married Sir Edward Atkyns in June 1779. After a short residence in England Sir Edward and Lady Atkyns removed to Versailles, arriving there probably just before the first revolutionary troubles broke out. She became a close friend of Marie-Antoinette, and was instrumental in the matter of the Dauphin's escape. The book lacks an index.]
- Lang, Andrew. Sir Walter Scott. Literary Lives Series. 8 x 5½. Pp. 258. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d. (See p. 280.)
- Wright, Thomas. The Life of Richard Burton. 2 vols. 9½ x 6. Pp. xxv, 582. Everett & Co. (See p. 277.)
- Robert Browning and Alfred Domett*. Edited by F. G. Kenyon, with portraits. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xii, 161. Smith, Elder, 5s. net.
- [Letters from Browning and from Joseph Arnould, afterwards the well-known Indian judge, to Alfred Domett, the "Waring" of Browning's poem, written between March 1840, and April 1877. Preface, introduction and notes by Dr. Kenyon. Index.]
- Fitzgerald, Percy. Sir Henry Irving, a Biography. 9 x 6. Pp. xvi, 319. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.
- [A new and revised edition, bringing the story to Sir Henry Irving's death and funeral. Well illustrated. Index.]

DRAMA.

- Early English Dramatists. Anonymous Plays. 3rd Series. Pp. 302. The Dramatic Writings of Richard Wever and Thomas Ingelend. Pp. 140. Both edited by John S. Farmer. Each 7 x 4½. Privately printed for subscribers by the Early English Drama Society, 18 Bury Street, Bloomsbury. (See p. 280.)
- [The Anonymous Plays comprise Jack Juggler, King Darius, Gammer Gurton's Needle, New Custom, Trial of Treasure, and both volumes have the Note Book and Word List.]

EDUCATION.

- Gilman, Daniel Coit. The Launching of a University and other Papers. A Sheaf of Remembrances. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 386. New York: Dodd, Mead, $2.50.
- [Dr. Gilman is President Emeritus of the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, U.S.A. Some of the articles of which his book is composed have appeared, sometimes in a shorter form, in American magazines. The University he helped to launch was the Johns Hopkins, founded in the 'seventies under the will of a wealthy merchant of that name. The book is full of matter of great interest, especially to those practically or theoretically concerned in education.]
- The Medea of Euripides*. Edited by Harold Williamson. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xxviii, 159. Blackie, 2s.
- [In Messrs. Blackie's "Illustrated Greek Series," under the general editorship of Professor R. Y. Tyrrell. The editor has consulted principally the editions of Wecklein, on which he has drawn freely for illustrative quotations, and of Verrall. Introduction dealing with (1) Greek Tragedy contrasted with Modern Drama; (2) The Life of Euripides; (3) The Story of Jason and Medea; (4) Synopsis of the Plot. Notes (65 pp.); and an Appendix: On Some Idiomatic uses of Particles in the Medea.]
- Precis Writing for Army Classes, Civil Service Candidates, etc.* Compiled and edited by H. Latter, M.A. Second series. 7½ x 5. Pp. 214. Blackie, 3s. 6d.
- [Contains a fresh selection of exercises, mainly diplomatic correspondence. They are, on the whole, easier than those in the first book.]
- A Selection from the Discourses Delivered to the Students of the Royal Academy by Sir Joshua Reynolds*. Edited, with introduction, by J. J. Findlay. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 216. Blackie, 2s. net.
- [Two-thirds of the Discourses: those which, for various reasons, have been omitted are the fourth (latter half), fifth, eighth (latter half), ninth, tenth, and fourteenth.]
- Thouaille, Albert. First Steps in Colloquial French. 7½ x 5. Pp. 228. Blackie, 2s.
- [The first of a series of books for the study of colloquial French by the psychological direct method.]
- Cann, Alfred L. Helps to the Study of Milton's Paradise Lost (1-11). 7½ x 5. Pp. lxx, 100. Ralph Holland, 2s.
- [Introduction, full text, notes, examination questions, index to notes.]
- Welch, G. E. Chemistry Lecture Notes. 7½ x 5. Pp. 63. Blackie, 1s. 6d.
- [Notes such as would be taken during a course of lessons on State ii. Inorganic Chemistry.]
- The Teacher's Black-Board Arithmetic*. Part ii. By "Tact." 7½ x 5. Pp. 96. Blackie, 1s. 6d.
- Tales from the Norse*. A selection from the translation of G. W. Dasent. 7½ x 5. Pp. 223. Blackie, 1s.
- Told to the Children Series. Swift's Gulliver's Travels in Lilliput and Brobdignag. Told to the children by John Lang; pictures by F. M. B. Blackie. Thackeray's The Rose and the Ring. Abridged by Amy Steedman. Each 6 x 4½. Each, 1s. 6d. net each.
- Ohlson, E. E. In the Days of Chaucer. A pastoral interlude in two scenes. 5½ x 3½. Pp. 38. Blackie.

FICTION.

- Mackay, William. A Mender of Nets. 7½ x 5. Pp. 343. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
- Trafford-Taunton, Winefride. Igdrasil. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 309. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- Healy, Chris. Mara: the Story of an Unconventional Woman. 7½ x 5. Pp. 356. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
- Oliver, Lætitia Selwyn. The Expiation of Lady Anne. 7½ x 5. Pp. 257. Drane, 6s.
- James, Geoffrey. At Break of Dawn. 7½ x 5. Pp. 158. Drane, 6s.
- Lillie, Arthur. The Workshop of Religion. 7½ x 5. Pp. 338. Swan Sonnenschein, 6s.
- Sinclair, Upton. The Jungle. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 413. Heinemann, 6s.
- Sedgwick, Anne Douglas. The Shadows of Life. 7½ x 5. Pp. 324. Constable, 6s.

- Field, Elsie. Evelyn's Quest. 7½ x 5. Pp. 231. Glazier, 4s. 6d. net.
- Dane, John Colin. The Hidden House. 8 x 5½. Pp. 376. Cassell, 6s.
- Lubbock, Basil. Jack Derringer, a tale of deep water. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 328. Murray, 6s.
- Pistorius, Fritz. Doctor Fuchs und seine Tertia: heitere Bilder von der Schulbank. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 234. Berlin: Trowitsch. M. 2.40 and M. 3.
- [Stories of school-life in the third class of a "Gymnasium." A sort of pendant to a very popular book, Luise Koppen's "Heitere Bilder aus dem Bodenstedter Pfarrhause."]
- Fuller Maitland, Ella. Blanche Esmead, a story of diverse temperaments. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Methuen, 6s.

HISTORY.

- Vambéry, Arminius. Western Culture in Eastern Lands. 9 x 5½. Pp. 410. Murray, 12s. net.
- [A comparison of the methods adopted by England and Russia in the Middle East.]
- Vincent, John Martin. Municipal Problems in Mediaeval Switzerland. 9½ x 6. Pp. 44. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 50c.
- [Series xxiii, Nos. 11, 12 of the Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science.]
- Sell, Rev. Edward. Islam: its rise and progress. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 94. London: Simpkin, Marshall. Madras: S.P.C.K., 9d. net.
- [A simple and popular account based on Dr. Sell's larger works.]
- Diehl, Charles. Figures Byzantines. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 343. Paris: Colin, 3f. 50.
- [Studies in Byzantine history and biography before the Crusaders; revealing especially the importance of the place held by women in society and politics. The sections are: La vie d'une impératrice à Byzance; Athénais; Théodora; L'impératrice Irène; Une bourgeoise de Byzance au VIII. siècle; La bienheureuse Théodora; Les romanesques aventures de Basile le Macédonien; Les quatre mariages de l'empereur Léon le Sage; Théophrasto; Zoé la Porphyrogénète; Une famille de bourgeoisie à Byzance au XI. siècle; Anne Dalassène.]

LITERATURE.

- Mackail, J. W. The Progress of Poesy. An inaugural lecture delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre on March 10, 1906. 9½ x 6. Pp. 29. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1s. net. (See p. 275.)
- Publications of the Modern Language Association of America*. Edited by Charles H. Grandgent. New Series. Vol. xxi, No. 1, March, 1906. 10 x 6½. Pp. 278. Cambridge, Mass.: Published by the Association, $1.00.
- [Contents: Three "Lapland Songs," by F. E. Farley; F. Schlegel and Goethe, 1790-1802, by J. W. Scholl; Nash and the Earlier Hamlet by J. W. Cunliffe; The English Fabliau, by H. S. Canby; Montaigne: the average man, by R. W. Trueblood; Italian Fables in Verse, by K. M'Kenzie.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Nisbet's Golf Year-Book, 1906*. Edited by John L. Low. 7½ x 5. Pp. 482. Nisbet, 3s. 6d.
- [Contributions by Horace G. Hutchinson, Harry Vardon, R. E. Foster, and others.]
- Saleeby, C. W. Individualism and Collectivism. Four lectures. 7½ x 5. Williams & Norgate, 2s.
- [Apparently the first of a series of books on Constitution Issues. The Lectures were delivered during the General Election, 1906, for the British Constitutional Association, and are "an attempt to expound the principle that the State is only secure in so far as it conserves the liberty and responsibility of the individual.]
- Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench, 1906*. Fortieth Annual Edition. Illustrated with 800 Armorial Engravings. Revised by Members of Parliament, and by Judges of the United Kingdom and of the Colonies. 8½ x 6. Pp. 464. Dean, 7s. 6d. net.
- Sociological Papers*, vol. ii. By Francis Galton, P. Geddes, M. E. Sadler, E. Westermarck, H. Höffding, J. H. Bridges and J. S. Stuart-Glennie. 10½ x 7. Pp. viii, 307. Macmillan, 10s. 6d.
- [The papers read before the Sociological Society and the discussions thereupon, written communications and replies received, between October 1904, and June 1905. Mr. Galton on Eugenics (Restrictions in Marriage); Studies in National Eugenics; and Eugenics as a factor in Religion; Professor Geddes on Civics: as applied Sociology; Professor Sadler on The School in some of its relations to social organisation and national life; Dr. Westermarck on The Influence of Magic on Social Relationships; Professor Höffding on The Relations between Sociology and Ethics; Dr. Bridges on Some Guiding Principles in the Philosophy of History and Mr. Stuart-Glennie on Sociological Studies. Index.]

POETRY.

- Poems by Aurelian*. With an introduction by G. T. W. 6½ x 5. Pp. 64. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.
- Keohler, Thomas. Songs of a Devotee. The Tower Press Booklets—ii. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 40. Dublin: Maunsell, 1s. net.
- de Lima, Archer. Vision du Calvaire: poème dramatique, en vers. 7½ x 5. Pp. 20. Paris.
- [By a well-known Portuguese poet. Taken from a forthcoming volume of poems.]
- Boyd, Thomas. Poems. 8 x 5½. Pp. 99. Dublin: O'Donoghue and M. H. Gill, n.p.
- Divall, Edith Hickman. The Way of Victory: from the Lord's entry into Jerusalem to the Resurrection. 5½ x 4½. Pp. 24. Sunday School Union, 6d. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- The Venetian Series III.: The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. By Samuel Taylor Coleridge. 5 x 4. Pp. 37. E. Grant Richards, 6d. net.
- The Works of William Shakespeare*. Edited by Sir Henry Irving and Frank A. Marshall (The Henry Irving Shakespeare). Vol. i. With many hundred illustrations. 9½ x 6½. Pp. lxxxix, 176. Gresham Publishing Co. The set in fourteen volumes, £3 3s. net.
- [A re-issue in a more handy form of this admirable work. New features of this edition are an appreciation of Sir Henry Irving by Mr. Bram Stoker; an entire volume containing a description by Mr. Harrison Jerome of The Shakespeare Land, richly illustrated; and a series of reproductions in each volume of pictures by eminent Academicians. The volume before us contains the original prefaces. Mr. Stoker's article on Sir Henry Irving, Professor Dowden's General Introduction and Life of Shakespeare, with its appendices; a note on Shakespeare as a playwright by Sir Henry Irving, and the following plays: Love's Labour's Lost, The Comedy of Errors, and Two Gentlemen of Verona, each with its separate introduction, notes, and list of "words peculiar." There are also five full-page engravings and a coloured frontispiece, besides very many smaller illustrations.]

- Red Letter Library: The Psalter in English Verse. Introduction by His Grace the Archbishop of Armagh. 6½ x 4½. Pp. xlii, 444. Blackie, 2s. 6d. net.
- Red Letter Shakespeare: Poems. Vols. i. and ii. Edited by E. K. Chambers. Each 6½ x 3½. Pp. 279. Blackie, 1s. 6d. net.
- Hutchinson, Horace. Bert Edward the Golf Caddie. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 257. Paper covers. Murray, 1s. net.
- Methuen's Standard Library. More, Sir Thomas. Utopia and Poems. Pp. vii, 194. Introduction by Sidney Lee. Law, William. A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life. Pp. xv, 242. Introduction by C. Bigg. Southey, Robert. The Life of Nelson. Pp. xi, 194. Introduction by Sidney Lee. The Republic of Plato (Sydenham & Taylor, revised). Pp. xvi, 243. Introduction by Ernest Barker. Each 7½ x 5½. Cloth bound, 1s. net each. Methuen.
- Methuen's Standard Library. The Little Flowers of the glorious Messer St. Francis and of his Friars: done into English by W. Heywood. Pp. xv, 173. Introduction by Langton Douglas. 6d. net. The Poems and Songs of Robert Burns. Pp. xxxix, 500. Introduction by Andrew Lang. 1s. net. Gaskell, Mrs. Cranford. Pp. xxv, 138. Introduction by E. V. Lucas. 6d. net. Each 7½ x 5. Paper bound. Methuen.
- R. P. A. Cheap Reprints. No. 25. Arnold, Matthew. God and the Bible. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 130. Watts, 6d.
- The Muse's Library. Lyra Germanica, translated by Caroline Winkworth, with a Preface. Pp. xx, 235. Poems by Jean Ingelow. Pp. 239. The Poetical Works of Arthur Hugh Clough, with a memoir by Francis Turner Palgrave. Pp. xxiv, 278. Each 6½ x 4. Routledge, each 1s. net.
- Ruskin Treasuries. Art. 4½ x 2½. Pp. 65. Allen, 6d. net.

SCIENCE.

- Be'l, Robert. Ten Years' Record of the Treatment of Cancer Without Operation. 7½ x 1½. Pp. 107. Dean, 2s. 6d. net.
- [The author holds that a successful result can never be obtained by the use of the knife in a case of real cancer. It has been his experience that whenever the knife has been employed the disease has recurred with increased virulence and the suffering of the patient has been intensified.]
- Hutchinson, Jonathan. On Leprosy and Fish-Eating: a statement of facts and explanations. 8½ x 6. Pp. xxiv, 420. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.
- [Dr. Hutchinson's book is intended not for the medical profession only, but for the public. His main thesis is that the fundamental cause of true leprosy is the eating of fish in a state of commencing decomposition; his subsidiary theses that the malady is not contagious by touch; that segregation is not of much use for prevention, and that a liberal use of salt is the best preventive in all countries where cured fish is eaten.]
- A Treatise on Zoology. Edited by E. Ray Lankester. Part v, Mollusca, by Paul Pilsener. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 355. Black, 12s. 6d. net and 15s. net. [Illustrated. Index.]

SPORT.

- Marston, E. Fishing for Pleasure and Catching It. With Two Chapters on Angling in North Wales, by R. B. Marston. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xiv, 152.
- Millard, F. W. The Gamekeeper's Guide. 7½ x 5. Pp. 121. Everett, 1s. 6d. net.
- [The daily work, month by month, throughout the year.]

THEOLOGY.

- Jack, J. W. After His Likeness. Thoughts on the Christian Ideal. 7½ x 5. Pp. 200. Allenson, 3s. 6d.
- [A little book of Addresses on outstanding graces in Christ, designed as "a help towards the realisation of the Divinely human Ideal which has been given in Christ."]
- Matheson, George. Rests by the River: Devotional meditations. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xvi, 367. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.
- [Meditations reprinted from Saint Andrew. Dr. Matheson divides each into two parts, the first containing a thought (for "devotional moments" are not "moments of vacuity"), the second either an invocation or a prayer. There are 104 of them, and few occupy more than three pages.]
- Walker, Rev. Dawson. The Gift of Tongues and other Essays. 8½ x 6. Pp. x, 248. Edinburgh: Clarke, 4s. 6d. net.
- [Essays in support of more conservative positions in regard to the writings of St. Paul and St. Luke. Contents: The Gift of Tongues; The Legal Terminology in the Epistle to the Galatians; St. Paul's visit to Jerusalem as recorded in the Acts and in the Epistle to the Galatians; The Date of St. Luke and the Acts.]
- Robinson, Father Paschal. The Writings of St. Francis of Assisi, newly translated into English with an Introduction and Notes. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xxii, 208. Philadelphia: The Dolphin Press, 2s. net.
- [Father Robinson, of the Order of Friars Minor, gives a scholarly introduction on the characteristics of the writings, the early MS. collection and the editions and translations. Then comes a literal translation of the complete works from the Quaracchi edition, the order being occasionally altered and the "Canticle of the Sun" added. The original MS. authorities have been consulted. Appendix dealing with lost, doubtful and spurious writings. Index.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Salmon, Arthur L. Literary Rambles in the West of England. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 339. Chatto & Windus, 6s. net.
- [The rambles of a pilgrim who knows the West Country and its literary associations better than most people, and writes of them very pleasantly. Index.]

THE BOOKSHELF

We receive with much pleasure the first volume of a new and cheaper issue of The Henry Irving Shakespeare (The Gresham Publishing Co.). It is a work which, in the original form, has already proved itself indispensable to people who are not Sidney Lees or Furnivalls, but take an intelligent interest in Shakespeare, and, when they see a play, like to know all about it before they go. We say, of set purpose, see a play; for the feature of this edition which renders it unique is that throughout it Shakespeare is regarded not as a dead body over which commentators may wrangle, but as a writer of plays whose work may be seen on the stage to this day. Shakespeare, the playwright, not Shakespeare the poet or the philosopher, was first and foremost the object of the late Sir Henry Irving's most arduous studies, and it is as the literary expression of those studies that Mr. Frank A. Marshall's work, reinforced as it is by his own ripe scholarship and sound judgment, makes its appeal. But we must guard at the outset against a possible misconception. Every one knows that the text of Shakespeare, for representation on the stage, is "cut." There is no cutting in the Irving Shakespeare. Every word the poet wrote is given from the best sources; but by a system of simple marks, which there is no mistaking, the passages which may or must be omitted in reading or performance are shown at a glance. The book is thus invaluable to Shakespeare Reading Societies and other such bodies. Any one who has prepared a play for such reading must have realised how extraordinarily difficult it is to cut it down, however roughly, without losing the continuity of the story. How much more difficult to do what Sir Henry Irving did for this edition—cut down every play so as to preserve to the full its artistic proportions, its independence of character, its light and shade, the subtleties which are woven into a close network by the dramatist and go for so much in the proper understanding of his work! We are convinced that if the existence of this edition were more widely known—as it must shortly be—the initial trouble of Shakespeare Readings would be diminished by more than half, and the enjoyment doubled. It is a book which no Shakespeare Reading Society can afford to be without. That is not all. It is a book which gives in very handy compass a mass of accurate and interesting information about each play and about Shakespeare's work as a whole. Mr. Marshall has had the co-operation of a number of leading scholars, Mr. Arthur Symonds, Mr. Joseph Knight, Canon Beeching, Dr. Garnett and others; and the result is a commentary which, as we know from experience, gives matter which it is sometimes very difficult to obtain elsewhere. Each play has its own introduction giving its literary history and a critical note, and including a most interesting and unique section on the theatrical history of the play—who acted it and when—while each is followed by copious but not tedious notes; and the introductory critical and biographical matter, by Dr. Dowden is as thorough and accurate as all that great scholar's work. The many pictures, too, all taken from the works of famous Academicians, not to consider their beauty, are of the greatest interest to all who intend to act Shakespeare at school, at home, even on the stage. In fact, for the general reader, the Shakespearean Society, the school class and the amateur actor, this is par excellence the edition of Shakespeare's Works. Special features of the new edition are an astute and sympathetic appreciation of Sir Henry Irving by Mr. Bram Stoker, additional illustrations (including a large photograph of the portrait of Sir Henry as Hamlet by Mr. Edwin Long, R.A., to be presented to subscribers on completion) and a volume containing Mr. Jerome Harrison's description of the Shakespeare Land, richly illustrated. The price of the whole set of fourteen volumes is only £3 3s.

The Fancy, by John Hamilton Reynolds. Prefatory and Memoir Notes by John Masefield (Elkin Mathews).—The chief attraction of this little volume lies in the memoir of Reynolds by Mr. Masefield, and in Reynolds's memoir of Peter Corcoran, the supposititious dead man upon whom Reynolds fathered the poems. The former is a masterpiece of sympathetic biography on a small scale. Mr. Masefield glories in his hero's enthusiasm and extravagance, his many interests, his lusty talent for life. Reynolds's own semi-autobiographical retrospect affects merely to deplore the follies and excesses of his early years, which he feels have told on his health and impaired his prospects; but it is also clearly his last youthful utterance, the regretful sigh of a man who has made up his mind to become respectable, to associate only with people of his own class, to make the conventional distinction between day and night. His best and most poetical work was produced about 1816–17, under the influence of the close and constant companionship of Keats. The poems in the present volume were composed a year or two later, when that influence was withdrawn, after he had become a lawyer and was engaged to be married. Finally persuaded of the necessity of "settling down," he still found it in his heart to write "The Fancy," drawing his inspiration entirely from those past years wherein he devoted himself to wandering about London in quest of experience, when his main object in life was to witness all the fights between the best pugilists of the day. There is so much that is attractive in the personality of Peter Corcoran, the youthful Reynolds, as seen in the two excellent Memoirs, that we turn to the poems with an interest which is doomed to be considerably disappointed. It is shocking to find a friend of Keats writing like Hood, to see him rejoicing in the mournful vulgarity of puns, making an execrable stanza in parody of the beautiful and solemn "Ar hyd y nos," wallowing in slang "come porci in brago." Scattered here and there are many good lines and much good poetical material. These are to be found where the author is writing genuinely from his own experience, as in some passages of the Beppo-like "Fields of Tothill," and especially in the vigorous lines entitled "What is Life?" But he often failed to take advantage of an excellent opportunity. There is real humour in the idea of poor Corcoran incurring the serious displeasure of his lady-love by appearing before her with two black eyes after "a casual turn-up" on the previous night. Yet when Reynolds comes to write of the incident he makes little out of it but a series of depressing puns. Perhaps the most humorous touch in the piece is partly unconscious: he promises that, if she will forgive him he will never wear boxing-gloves in future!

The Museums and Ruins of Rome, by Walter Amelung and Heinrich Holtzinger, English Edition revised by the authors and Mrs. S. Arthur Strong, L.L.D., 2 vols. (Duckworth, 10s. net).

Rome: a practical guide to Rome and its environs. By Eustace Reynolds-Ball. (Black's Guide-books, 2s. 6d.).

There has long been wanted a small but full work on the remains of classical Rome. There is, of course, Helbig. There is the invaluable Hare, edited and revised by Mr. St. Clair Baddeley, and there are other useful works like Mrs. Burton Brown's admirable little book on the Forum. But Hare is something curt and something of a jumble, and Mrs. Burton Brown only takes a fragment of the subject. There has been nothing quite like Amelung and Holtzinger, and not only visitors to Rome, but students of classic art and history who stay at home should be grateful to Mrs. Strong for giving them the book in English. The first volume, The Museums, is by Dr. Amelung, the second, The Ruins, by Dr. Holtzinger. These books are not guide-books. They do not describe things just as you happen to meet with them in the course of a walk: they—and especially Dr. Amelung—take a connected view of the works they treat of, showing their development and place in the history of the art, so that under their guidance a visit to the Baths of Diocletian or the Capitol or Vatican Museums is not a series of bewildering leaps from style to style and period to period but a consecutive study of the subject. Every statue or bust is treated also from the point of view of the "human interest." Its intention and significance, besides its place in art history, are pointed out. Take, for instance, the admirable exposition of the statues of Demosthenes in the Vatican: even the scampering tourist, if he has this little book in his hand, must appreciate and remember it far better than he otherwise would, while there is nothing merely sentimental or likely to offend the serious student, who uses this book as a little work of reference. Dr. Holtzinger, in his volume, treats architecture as an art rather than a matter of history, though history, of course, crops up continually, as it must in any worthy consideration of architecture. He does not enter deeply into controverted points (e.g., his description of the "Stadium of Domitian" on the Palatine occupies only nine lines, and there is no discussion of its purpose), but he gives a clear and consecutive idea of all the classical ruins of Rome. More than that; by means of carefully selected illustrations (very different from some of the sensational things one sees in Piali's windows), he gives a clear notion of what some of the buildings were like in their perfect state; and of both these volumes it may be said that the illustrations and plans are a very valuable feature. Altogether, these little books are without their match, and no one should go to Rome without them. Mr. Reynolds-Ball's little book, though briefer and cheaper than the bulky Hare, is, so far as we have tested it, accurate (he cannot be called inaccurate for ascribing the little round temple on the Tiber near Sta. Maria in Cosmedin to Mater Matuta, for no one knows any better) and clear. It has three good plans and thirty pages of sound practical information besides eight illustrations after Mr. Pisa's beautiful water-colours. A very useful book for tourists who want to see only the best and that quickly.

The Tradition of Scripture: its origin, authority and interpretation, by the Rev. William Barry, D.D. (Longmans, Green and Co., 3s. 6d.) This is a volume of the "Westminster Library," a series intended for the use of "Catholic priests and students," presumably ecclesiastical students. It would, therefore, be unjust to criticise it from the lay standpoint. The author's preoccupation is theological, not scientific; and, in his treatment of critical questions, he inquires, not what are the conclusions established by the evidence, but what proportion of those conclusions can be reconciled with the pronouncements of Roman authority. The question is one which he doubtless is, and we certainly are not, competent to answer; we can but state the result of his inquiry, which is that the conclusions of criticism are largely accepted in the case of the Old Testament, and mostly rejected in the case of the New. This position, which would be absurd in the case of a scientific critic, is consistent enough in the case of a writer who regards questions of date, authorship and the like as matters which ecclesiastical authority is competent to settle. The book is no doubt well adapted to those for whom it is intended, many of whom will learn from it much that they do not know, particularly about the Old Testament; and it will serve well enough as material for sermons. But priests and students will be well advised not to rely on Dr. Barry's treatment of the critical problems of the New Testament, should they ever be called upon to discuss those problems with persons having a real knowledge of them.

Rembrandt, a Memorial, 1606-1906. Part I. (Heinemann, 2s. 6d. net.) The city of Leyden is celebrating in July the tercentenary of the birth of Rembrandt, and four publishers in England, France, Germany, and Holland—Mr. Heinemann being the English representative—are publishing simultaneously a Record, of which Part I. of the English version lies before us. The author of the letter-press is M. Emil Michel, than whom no one better could be found; he attempts no detailed study of Rembrandt's biography, but endeavours to "emphasise the main features of his great personality." But, of course, the real point of the publication is the plates. Of these there are seven in the part before us: The Study of an Old Man (the chalk drawing in the Louvre); the pen-and-wash drawing of Tobias and his Family in the Albertina, Vienna; Mr. Heseltine's pen-and-wash drawing of The Woman at the Window; the Portrait of the Artist in the National Gallery; The Syndics of the Cloth Hall (Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam); Christ appearing to Mary Magdalen, in the King's collection; and the Portrait of a Lady in the Liechtenstein, Vienna. The first three are in colours, are produced in Paris, and are mounted on the text-paper of the work, which, we are delighted to see, is not plate-paper, but a very fine rough-surface; the last four are Rembrandt photogravures—a process which has now established itself as the very finest possible; and they are certainly superb pieces of work. The decorations are appropriately taken from the publications of the great Plantin Press at Antwerp. There will be ten parts, each with the same number of illustrations, and those who subscribe for the whole work before April 6, will receive in addition a photogravure plate measuring 14 inches by 10 of Rembrandt's portrait of himself in the National Gallery. The printing of the book is the work of Messrs. Ballantyne, and is not the least beautiful part of what promises to be a superbly beautiful production.

Sale by Auction

RARE AND VALUABLE BOOKS.

MESSRS. HODGSON & CO. WILL SELL BY AUCTION at their Rooms, 115 Chancery Lane, W.C., on Thursday, March 29, and following day, at 1 o'clock, rare and valuable BOOKS and MANUSCRIPTS, comprising a beautiful Twelfth-Century Evangelium; Two Fifteenth-Century Horæ with Illuminations, and other MSS. on vellum; Early Printed Books from the German and Italian Presses; Specimens of Stamped Leather and Old Morocco Bindings; a Collection of scarce Americana; curious Black-Letter Books; Seventeenth-Century Tracts, and rare volumes in old English Literature, many in contemporary bindings; Cotton's Scarronides, with MS. Dedicatory Verses, and other Autograph Presentation Books; a fine Set of Jesse's Historical Works, Original Editions, 21 vols.; handsomely-bound Sets of Library Editions of Carlyle, Froude, Motley, Strickland, and others; a fine and complete Set of the Palaographical Society's Publications; Dickens's Works, Edition de Luxe, 30 vols.; Scott's Tales of my Landlord, First Series, 4 vols., boards; uncut, and other First Editions of Lamb, Carlyle, Thackeray, Dickens, FitzGerald, etc.; Bury's Coloured Views on the Liverpool and Manchester Railway; and other Books with Coloured Plates; Autograph Letters from Wordsworth, Landor, Bernard Barton, and Charlotte Brontë to W. M. Thackeray; also a magnificent Set of Cannon's Historical Records of the British Army (sold by order of the Executor of the late Miss Sophia Cannon), 67 vols. in the Original Morocco Bindings, and a Collection of the Original Water-Colour Drawings of the Colours, Uniforms, and Battle Scenes, by W. Heath and others, used to illustrate the volumes. Catalogues (containing facsimiles) on application.

SIX NEW MUSICAL WORKS

- Over 400 pages. 8vo, cloth, 10s.
- (1) GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT OF MUSIC Described in Chapters on the Study of Musical History. With Annotated Guide to Music Literature. By E. DICKENSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net (or paper covers, 1s. 6d. net).
  - (2) CHOPIN AS REVEALED BY EXTRACTS FROM HIS DIARY. By Count TARNOWSKI. From the Polish by N. JANOTHA. Portraits. Crown 8vo, boards, 5s.
  - (3) THE ITALIAN SCHOOL OF FLORID SONG, Observations on the Florid Song and Ancient and Modern Singers and Singing by P. F. Tosi. Useful for all Performers Instrumental as well as Vocal. Reprint of this celebrated work as translated by Galliard in 1743. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
  - (4) THE DEEPER SOURCES OF THE BEAUTY AND EXPRESSION OF MUSIC. By JOSEPH GODDARD. With many Musical Examples. 2 vols. Crown 8vo, cloth, 10s.
  - (5) LIFE AND LETTERS OF CHOPIN. By M. KARASOWSKI. NEW AND REVISED EDITION. Translated by E. HILL. With Extra Portraits and Facsimile. 8vo, sewed, 1s.
  - (6) THE PLACE OF SCIENCE IN MUSIC. By H. SAINT-GEORGE.

W. REEVES, 83 Charing Cross Road, W.C.

THE LIFE OF SIR RICHARD BURTON

By THOMAS WRIGHT,

Author of "The Life of Edward FitzGerald," etc. etc.

Two vols., demy 8vo, 24s. net. With 64 Plates.

SECOND IMPRESSION IN THE PRESS.

LONDON: EVERETT & CO., 42 ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered
gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated]

[A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents
Everywhere.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER
FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM
YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the "Westminster Gazette.")

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS
THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND
MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1769

MARCH 31, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

HEAD MASTER REQUIRED (after Summer vacation) for Westminster City School. Subject to provisions of Scheme the Governors will proceed to fill this vacancy early in May. Candidates must be graduates of a University in the United Kingdom and be under 45 years of age. On present attendance the stipend and fees offered will amount to about £600 a year, exclusive of superannuation fund, and good unfurnished house, rent and rate free, coals and gas. Send addressed foolscap envelope for printed particulars. Applications must reach the undersigned not later than April 19.

C. SPENCER SMITH,
Clerk.

Office:
53 Palace Street,
Westminster, S.W.

EDUCATION IN ENGLAND AND ABROAD. SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Prospectuses and every information supplied to Parents FREE OF CHARGE. State Requirements.—UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS BUREAU, 122 Regent Street, W. Established 1858.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL, WEST KENSINGTON.

AN EXAMINATION will be held at the above School on Tuesday, April 3, 1906, and on the following days for filling up about seven vacancies on the Foundation.

Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Bursar.

ST. PAUL'S GIRLS' SCHOOL, BROOK GREEN, W.

AN EXAMINATION for Foundation Scholarships, open to Girls under sixteen years of age, will be held at the School on April 3, 4, and 5. These Scholarships exempt the holders from the payment of Tuition Fees.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Headmistress at the School.

SEDBERGH SCHOOL SCHOLARSHIPS, 1906.

SIX ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, varying in value from £50 to £25 per annum, will be OFFERED for COMPETITION on April 25 and 26.—For particulars apply to the HEAD-MASTER, Sedburgh, R.S.O., Yorkshire.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

AN EDITOR IS REQUIRED for one of the leading papers in the East. To an able man of Education who is acquainted with the Politics of the Far East and who has also had first class Journalistic experience the Directors are prepared to offer liberal terms.—ORIENT, Academy Office, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING WANTED.—MSS. and all Literary work executed accurately and promptly. 10d. per 1000 words. Carbon copies.—Mrs. BRAMBLES, 26 Clarence Road, Windsor.

TYPEWRITING BY A GRADUATE, 8d. 1000 words. MSS. of all descriptions accurately typed and promptly returned. Translations 3s. 1000.—CONWAY, 14 Primrose Terrace, Gravesend.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

LEIGHTON'S

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of EARLY PRINTED and other INTERESTING BOOKS, MANUSCRIPTS, and BINDINGS.

OFFERED FOR SALE BY
J. & J. LEIGHTON, 40 Brewer Street, Golden Square, W.

Thick 8vo, 1738 pp., 6200 items, with upwards of 1350 Reproductions in Facsimile.

Bound in art cloth, gilt top, 24s.; half morocco, gilt top, 30s.

GLAISHER'S

Remainder Book Catalogue.

APRIL SUPPLEMENT NOW READY.
Comprising all most recent Purchases.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
263 High Holborn, London.

Also Catalogue of Popular Current Literature, and New List of French Novels, Classics, etc.

SURVEY OF WESTERN PALESTINE.

Memoirs, 3 vols., Arabic and English Name Lists, Topography, etc. Jerusalem, Fauna of Palestine, General Index, 8 vols., 4to., cloth and maps in 2 Portfolios. Issued by Palestine Exploration Fund, £7 7s. Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net for 35s., 1902-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LTD.

Every month MUDIE's publish a fresh list (classified and annotated) of their English and Foreign 'Surplus Books and New Remainders.' The list contains popular works on Travel, Sport, Army and Navy, Biography, Theology, Arts, Philosophy, Economics, and Fiction.

List sent post free on application.

30-34 NEW OXFORD ST.; 48 QUEEN VICTORIA ST.
241 BROMPTON ROAD, LONDON.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

AFRICA (South), Any Volumes, or Series of Plates relating to

Agnes Grey, vol 3, 1847
Agrippa (C), Trattato di Scientia d'Arme, 4to, Roma, 1553
Ainsworth (W. H.) Rookwood, 1836 or 1851, illustrated
Rookwood, 3 vols, 1834
Jack Sheppard, 3 vols, 1839
Ditto, 1 vol, 1840
Tower of London, 1840, or any old parts
Old St. Paul's, 3 vols, 1841
Ditto, 1 vol, 1847
Guy Fawkes, 3 vols, 1841 or 1844
Ditto, 1 vol, 1857
Miser's Daughter, 3 vols, 1842
Ditto, 1 vol, 1848
Windsor Castle, 1843
Court of St. James, 3 vols, 1844 or 1846
James the Second, 3 vols, 1848
Crichton, 1837, 3 vols
Ditto, 1 vol, 1849
Lancashire Witches, 1849, 3 vols
Ditto, 1 vol, 1854
Flitch of Bacon, 185
The Star Chamber, 1857
The Spendthrift, 1857
Mervyn Clitheroe, 1858
Combat of the Thirty, 1859
Ovingdean Grange, 1860
Auriol, first edition, uncut, 1845

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Art

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFREY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

HUGUENOT PEDIGREES IN GREAT BRITAIN, and prior to emigration from France. Genealogical guide to French families, and some thousand pedigrees, mostly MS. and private sources. Also French Canadian pedigrees.—C. E. LART, Charmouth, Dorset, and London.

Recent Books Published by GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.

Art Galleries of Europe.

Uniform with "NEWNES' ART LIBRARY." 3s. 6d. net.
By post 3s. 10d.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF LONDON:
THE FLEMISH SCHOOL.Recent Volumes of Newnes' Thin Paper Classics.

BYRON'S POEMS. 3 vols. The Shorter Poems;
The Longer Poems; The Dramas and Satires

ESSAYS OF ADDISON.

LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.

PLAYS AND POEMS OF CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE.

Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; Cloth, 3s. net per volume.
Postage, 3d. extra.

GOLF FAULTS ILLUSTRATED. By G. W. BELDAM and J. H. TAYLOR. Large 8vo, illustrated, 5s. net. By post, 5s. 4d.
The cheapest and most authoritative work upon this popular game.

Some Recent Volumes of Newnes' Art Library.

GIOVANNI BELLINI. With an Introduction by EVERARD MEYNELL. With 65 Full-page Plates, including Photogravure Frontispiece.

FRA ANGELICO. With an Introduction by EDGCUMBE STALEY. 64 Full-page Reproductions and a Frontispiece in Photogravure. 3s. 6d. net each. By post, 3s. 10d.
(Newnes' Art Library.)

CORK CONSTITUTION.—"To those who know the painter's work this volume will be delightfully reminiscent and a pleasant possession."

Other Volumes.

Each volume contains about 64 full pages in monochrome, and a Frontispiece in photo-gravure. These are in many cases made from works which have not previously been reproduced.
Each volume also contains a list of the principal works of the artist. 3s. 6d. net, by post, 3s. 10d.

BOTTICELLI. By RICHARD DAVEY.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. By A. L. BALDRY.

CONSTABLE'S SKETCHES. By SIR JAMES D. LINTON, R.I.

VELASQUEZ. By A. L. BALDRY.

GOZZOLI. By HUGH STOKES.

RAPHAEL. By EDGCUMBE STALEY.

VAN DYCK. By HUGH STOKES.

G. F. WATTS. By DR. R. PANTINI.

TINTORETTO. By MRS. ARTHUR BELL.

PAOLO VERONESE. By MRS. ARTHUR BELL.

BURNE-JONES. By MALCOLM BELL.

FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. KONODY.

EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. By MALCOLM BELL.

PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By ARSENE ALEXANDRE.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. By ERNEST RADFORD.

LATER WORK OF TITIAN. By HENRY MILES.

THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By J. E. PHYTHIAN.

Studio.—"Messrs. Newnes' now celebrated series devoted to the Great Masters . . .
excellently reproduced, and apparently considerable trouble has been taken to secure reproductions of some of the least known and less accessible of the painters' chief works."

THE SPOILERS. By EDWIN PUGH. Illustrated by
C. E. BROCK. 6s. By post, 6s. 10d.

SCOTSMAN: "It is a story revealing a good deal of knowledge of the life of people who prey upon others. It is a picture of a not very pleasing phase of life, but it is painted by a man who has evidently studied, closely the ways of burglars and resisters, and gives an account of their doings in a manner which suggests an atmosphere of reality."

HASTINGS AND ST. LEONARDS ADVERTISER: "The story is an admirable sketch of the low life of to-day, while there is also plenty of comedy."

THE CHINESE AT HOME. Adapted from the French of EMILE BARD. By H. TWITCHELL. With numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. By post, 7s. 10d.

STANDARD: "M. Bard's pictures of this singular people are bright, entertaining, and at the same time instructive; they help up us to see the Chinese at home, and appreciate their better qualities."

SCOTSMAN: "The book as a whole is both an attractive and instructive one for any reader curious as to the present state of China."

Great Etchers.

Uniform with Drawings by Great Masters.

CHARLES MERYON. By HUGH STOKES.

VAN DYCK. By FRANK NEWBOLT.
7s. 6d. net, each. By post 7s. 10d.

Library of the Applied Arts.

JUST READY.

FRENCH POTTERY. By HENRI FRANTZ. With 86
Full-page Plates, of which several are in colour, 7s. 6d. net. By post
7s. 10d. (Library of Applied Arts.)

This volume also contains a comprehensive list of marks and monograms on falence and porcelain, and a list of the prices realised at auction since 1852.

Other Volumes.

DUTCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By W. PITCAIRN KNOWLES.

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE. By FREDERICK FENN.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY. By A. F. KENDRICK.

ENGLISH TABLE GLASS. By PERCY BATE.

OLD PEWTER. By MALCOLM BELL.

SHEFFIELD PLATE. By B. WYLLIE.

THE DRAWINGS OF DAVID COX. With an Introduction by A. J. FINBERG. 7s. 6d. net. By post, 7s. 10d.
(Modern Master Draughtsmen.)

Other Volumes of "Modern Master Draughtsmen" Series.

Uniform with "Drawings by Great Masters." 7s. 6d. each net. By post, 7s. 10d.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. BURNE-JONES. By T. MARTIN WOOD.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A. By MALCOLM BELL.

DRAWINGS OF ROSSETTI. By T. MARTIN WOOD.

DRAWINGS OF J. M. SWAN, R.A. By A. LYS BALDRY.

DRAWINGS OF MENZEL. By DR. HANS SINGER.

Newnes' Pocket Classics.

Super royal 24mo. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net.
Postage, 2d. extra.

THE CAVALIER IN EXILE. Being the Lives of the first Duke and Duchess of Newcastle. By the DUCHESS.

GOETHE'S FAUST. A Dramatic Mystery. Translated by JOHN ANSTER, LL.D.

THE POEMS OF THOMAS GRAY AND WILLIAM COLLINS.

A JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR. By DANIEL DE FOE.

SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS AND SONGS.

POEMS OF GEORGE WITHER.

SONGS FROM THE DRAMATISTS OF THE XVI, XVII and XVIII.
CENTURIES.

POEMS OF MICHAEL DRAYTON.

Newnes' Devotional Series.

Uniform with Newnes' Pocket Classics. Super royal 24mo; lambskin, 2s. 6d. each net; cloth, 2s. each net. Postage 2d. extra.

LYRA GERMANICA. Translated from the German by CATHERINE WINKWORTH.

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS A. KEMPIS.

THE CHANGED CROSS. And other Poems.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

THE LIFE OF SIR RICHARD BURTON

By THOMAS WRIGHT,

Author of "The Life of Edward FitzGerald," etc. etc.

Two vols., demy 8vo, 24s. net. With 64 Plates.

"We may say with confidence that it is the definitive biography of Burton."—THE LITERARY WORLD.

"Leaves one with a sense of profound astonishment, and with an almost exciting sense of admiration for Burton's prodigious personality."—TRIBUNE.

SIX NEW MUSICAL WORKS

Over 400 pages. 8vo, cloth, 10s.

(1) GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT OF MUSIC Described in Chapters on the Study of Musical History. With Annotated Guide to Music Literature. By E. DICKENSON,

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net (or paper covers, 1s. 6d. net).

(2) CHOPIN AS REVEALED BY EXTRACTS FROM HIS DIARY. By Count TARNOWSKI. From the Polish by N. JANOTHA. Portraits.

Crown 8vo, boards, 5s.

(3) THE ITALIAN SCHOOL OF FLORID SONG, Observations on the Florid Song and Ancient and Modern Singers and Singing by P. F. TOSI. Useful for all Performers Instrumental as well as Vocal. Reprint of this celebrated work as translated by Galliard in 1743.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

(4) THE DEEPER SOURCES OF THE BEAUTY AND EXPRESSION OF MUSIC. By JOSEPH GODDARD. With many Musical Examples

2 vols. Crown 8vo, cloth, 10s.

(5) LIFE AND LETTERS OF CHOPIN. By M. KARASOWSKI. NEW AND REVISED EDITION. Translated by E. HILL. With Extra Portraits and Facsimile.

8vo, sewed, 1s.

(6) THE PLACE OF SCIENCE IN MUSIC. By H. SAINT-GEORGE.

W. REEVES, 83 Charing Cross Road, W.C.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER
FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM
YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

(Issued by the "Westminster Gazette.")

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&amp;

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SMITH, ELDER & CO'S LIST

6/- A NEW NOVEL BY 6/
MR. & MRS. EGERTON CASTLE

Ready on April 2, with 20 Illustrations

By LANCELOT SPEED

IF YOUTH

A story which recalls one of the authors' former works—"Young April"—of a man who, having experienced in his youth one of those overpowering sorrows which irremediably change the course of life, has become a wanderer on the face of the earth.

BUT KNEW.

By the same Authors.

6/- ROSE OF THE WORLD SEVENTH IMPRESSION 6/-

TWO Novels ready to-day.

6/- MR. BAXTER, SPORTSMAN 6/-

By CHARLES FIELDING MARSH.

Author of "God's Scholars."

6/- OLD MR. LOVELACE, A SKETCH IN FOUR PARTS, 6/-

By CHRISTIAN TEARLE.

Author of "The Vice-Chancellor's Ward," etc.

Two Novels in the Second Impression.

6/- BROWNJOHN'S. Pub Feb. 28 6/-

By MRS. PERCY DEARMER.

GUARDIAN.—"It is not often that we come across a novel which gives as much real pleasure as this."

3/6 DICK: A Story Without a Plot. 3/6

By G. F. BRADBY. Published February 20.

THE TIMES.—"Those who do not laugh at 'Dick: a Story without a Plot, must be hopeless agelasts."

THE VICTORIAN CHANCELLORS. Vol. I.

By J. B. ATLAY, Barrister at-Law, Author of "Sir Henry Wentworth Acland, Bart., K.C.B., F.R.S.; a Memoir," etc. With Illustrations Demy 8vo., 14s. net.

SKETCH.—"There is always something very 'fruity' about legal stories . . . Mr. Atlay has long been known for his interest in what may be called the human side of law and lawyers."

*.* The work will be completed in a Second Volume.

SEVENTY YEARS' FISHING.

By CHARLES GEORGE BARRINGTON, C.B., formerly Assistant Secretary to the Treasury. With a Frontispiece. Small demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net. [Just published.]

WITH MOUNTED INFANTRY IN TIBET.

By MAJOR W. J. OTTLEY, 34th Sikh Pioneers.

With 48 pages of Illustrations. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Just published.]

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING IN HER LETTERS.

By PERCY LUBBOCK.

With a Portrait. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

STANDARD.—"Lovers of the work of the Brownings should certainly not miss this book."

ROBERT BROWNING AND ALFRED DOMETT.

Edited by F. G. KENYON, D.Litt., F.B.A.

With Portraits. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"This delightful book. . . Small as the volume is, it will outweigh, in the estimate of book-lovers, many of the season's far larger tomes."

London: SMITH, ELDER &amp; Co., 15 Waterloo Place S.W.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE WOMAN IN THE ALCOVE

By ANNA K. GREEN, Author of "The Leavenworth Case." [April]

RED RECORDS

By ALICE PERRIN, Author of "East of Suez," etc. [May]

THE FERRY OF FATE:

A Tale of Russian Jewry. By SAMUEL GORDON, Author of "Sons of the Covenant." [May]

HARLEY GREENOAK'S CHARGE

By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of "The Gun-Runner," etc. [May]

LOVE AND LORDSHIP

By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The Heart of a Girl."

IN THE ROARING FIFTIES

By EDWARD DYSON, Author of "The Gold-Stealers."

MARA:

The Story of an Unconventional Woman. By CHRIS HEALY, Author of "Heirs of Reuben."

A MENDER OF NETS

By WILLIAM MACKAY, Author of "The Popular Idol."

FOR LIFE—AND AFTER

By GEORGE R. SIMS ("Dagonet"). SECOND IMPRESSION.

THE FREEMASONS

By L. S. GIBSON. SECOND IMPRESSION.

MAURICE

By JOSEPH KEATING, Author of "Son of Judith."

CASTE AND CREED

By F. E. PENNY, Author of "The Sanyasi." SECOND IMPRESSION.

DILYS

By F. E. PENNY. SECOND IMPRESSION.

HUGO:

A Fantasia on Modern Themes. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "The Grand Babylon Hotel."

THE WATERS OF DESTRUCTION

By ALICE PERRIN, Author of "The Stronger Claim," etc. SECOND IMPRESSION.

THE SPECULATIONS OF JOHN STEELE

By ROBERT BARR, Author of "A Prince of Good Fellows," etc.

THE AMETHYST BOX

By ANNA KATHARINE GREEN, Author of "The Millionaire Baby."

NATURE'S VAGABOND

By COSMO HAMILTON, Author of "Duke's Son," etc.

A THIEF IN THE NIGHT

By E. W. HORNUNG, Author of "Stingaree," etc.

MR. SWINBURNE'S TRAGEDIES. COLLECTED LIBRARY EDITION, in 5 crown 8vo vols., bound in buckram, 30s. net for the 5 vols.

MR. SWINBURNE'S POETICAL WORKS. COLLECTED LIBRARY EDITION, in 6 crown 8vo vols., bound in buckram, 36s. net for the 6 vols.

THE POCKET GEORGE MACDONALD. Being a Choice of Passages from his Works, made by ALFRED H. HYATT. In 16mo. cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt top, 3s. net.

LIFE IN MOROCCO. By BUDGET MEAKIN, Author of "The Land of the Moors." With 24 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH SEAS. By CLEMENT L. WRAGGE, F.R.G.S. With 84 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

LITERARY RAMBLES IN THE WEST OF ENGLAND. By ARTHUR L. SALMON. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

CHEAP EDITIONS.—Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

EAST OF SUEZ. By ALICE PERRIN, Author of "The Waters of Destruction." [Shortly]

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By HAROLD BINDLOSS. [Shortly]

LOVE—OR A NAME. By JULIAN HAWTHORNE. [Shortly]

BEN-HUR: a Tale of the Christ. By LEW WALLACE. [Shortly]

THE CRUISE OF THE 'BLACK PRINCE' PRIVATEER. By Commander CAMERON. With 2 Illustrations by P. MACNAB.

COLONEL THORNDYKE'S SECRET. By G. A. HENTY. With a Frontispiece by S. L. WOOD.

NO OTHER WAY. By SIR WALTER BESANT. With 12 Illustrations by C. D. WARD.

A CRIMSON CRIME. By G. MANVILLE FENN.

THE PRINCESS AND THE KITCHEN-MAID. By DOROTHEA DEAKIN.

CLOCLO. By GYP. Translated by NORA M. STATHAM.

CHILDREN OF TO-MORROW. By WILLIAM SHARP.

FOUR NEW VOLUMES OF THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY

Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net per vol.; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net per vol.

TAINÉ'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Translated by H. VAN LAUN. POCKET EDITION in 4 vols., with 32 Portraits.

NEW SIXPENNY COPYRIGHT NOVELS

THE GRAND BABYLON HOTEL. By ARNOLD BENNETT.

MADAME SANS-GENE. By E. LEPELLETIER.

ARIADNE. By OUIDA.

BEYOND THE PALE. By B. M. CROKER.

EVE. By S. BARING-GOULD.

THE DOUBLE MARRIAGE. By CHARLES READE.

FETTERED FOR LIFE. By FRANK BARRETT. [Shortly]

THE MONKS OF THELEMA. By BESANT and RICE. [Shortly]

MR. VERDANT GREEN. By CUTHBERT BEDE, B.A. With 65 Illustrations. Post 8vo, 1s.

* * This Edition contains the Three Parts in One Volume. I. Verdant Green as an Oxford Freshman. II. as an Undergraduate. III. Married and Done For.

LONDON: CHATTO AND WINDUS, 111 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	301	Conversion at the Royal Court Theatre . . . . .	311
Literature:		Fine Art:
Sir Richard Burton . . . . .	303	The late Charles Wellington
A Popular Book on Evolution . . . . .	304	Furse . . . . .	311
Elizabeth Barrett Browning . . . . .	305	The Rising Generation . . . . .	312
Coleridge and the Wedgwood		Music:
Pension—II . . . . .	306	The Oxford History of Music—
An End in Itself . . . . .	308	V. . . . .	313
A Literary Cause:		Forthcoming Books . . . . .	314
Phantastes . . . . .	308	Correspondence . . . . .	315
Fiction . . . . .	309	Books Received . . . . .	316
The Drama:		The Bookshelf . . . . .	317
"Captain Brassbound's

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

"SPARE US OUR ILLUSIONS!" is the cry we feel inclined to put up to biographers, publishers of correspondence, and others, after reading Dr. F. G. Kenyon's "Robert Browning and Alfred Domett," in which he prints the letters that passed between Browning and Domett and Joseph Arnould and Domett. Who was Domett? Why! "Waring." And it is that which shatters our illusions. Waring did not steal away like a ghost because he was prouder than the devil and grew tired of passing up and down the streets of London town. He did not go to the East, nor to Moscow, nor to Spain. No one ever saw him under a lateen sail off Trieste, wearing a great grass hat. He went to New Zealand, because he was a briefless barrister who wanted to make a career—and he made it. A month ago Waring was Waring, a romantic figure, about whom the imagination weaved wonderful stories: to-day he is Alfred Domett, the Colonial Secretary of New Munster, the Civil Secretary of New Zealand, the Commissioner of Crown Lands.

The letters, interesting in a small measure as they are, are no return for the lost illusion. Browning was very fond of Domett, and wrote to him pretty regularly until he married Elizabeth Barrett, sending him affectionate letters which show the enthusiasm of a friend for a friend's works and contain one or two fine dashing statements and criticisms. But we do not feel that we know Browning much better after reading them than we did before. "I will [do much], if I live. At present, I don't know if I stand on head or heels; what men require I don't know;" thus he wrote when he was thirty. In the same year, on the publication of the 1842 edition of Tennyson's poems, he is of opinion that the alterations show "some woeful mental infirmity in the man." Dickens he finds "uproarious and disgusting in his Pecksniffs" and Macaulay's "Lays" he considers "a kind of revenge on that literature which so long plagued ours with Muses and Apollo and Luna and all that."

"Here," he writes, "everything goes flatly on, except the fierce political reality (as it begins to be). Our poems, etc., are poor child's play," a comparison on which we should like to have Miss Barrett's opinion. Indeed, it is strange that any poet should write thus of poetry and politics. And he atones for it later in speaking of the way in which the Reviews have treated his works: "There is no hiding the fact that it is of the proper old drivelling virulence with which God's Elect have in all ages been regaled." Quite the most interesting passage in the whole book occurs in a letter of 1846, Browning being then 34. Domett had taxed him with obscurity and imperfect expression. He replies, in effect, by saying that he could not help it; that he had done his best; that the poems had to be "tumbled out" as they came, and that now, having made a clearing, he is looking about for the real work to come. Here is his profession of poetical faith: and momentous it is. But a poet's poetry is always more interesting than his views of poetry; and we would have spared this letter if we might have kept our Waring.

In Germany they are more attached to archaism in theatrical matters than we are in England. Here, good men and theatre-goers are pretty well agreed that the productions of the Elizabethan Stage Society, for instance, were interesting, but at the same time showed a wilful renunciation of opportunities for legitimate and even necessary dramatic effect. People do not, and are not meant to, bring their historic sense to the theatre—if they have any; and to say that the "Elizabethan" manner is the only right way of producing Shakespeare is to say, in effect, that Shakespeare is not a classic, i.e., one who can be interpreted in modern methods and offer a new message to each generation. We have before us a note on a recent production by the German Shakespeare Society at Weimar of King Richard II. without intervals and with a Zwischenvorhang to distinguish the principal from the secondary scenes; and on April 24 they are going to play Massinger's The Duke of Milan in the same manner. Such productions are always interesting, and peculiarly appropriate in the case of a literary society of such distinction as this. But we should be sorry to hear that Mr. Tree's Shakespeare week next month was going to be conducted on these lines.

The interest in Shakespeare in Germany is very strong indeed, as Londoners learned anew the other day from Professor J. Schick of Munich. Eight hundred and twelve performances of twenty-eight different plays on one hundred and forty-six stages is a better record, probably, than England, America and the Colonies together could show for one year. Bismarck was a great Shakespearean. One of his earliest published letters was written to an Englishman asking for copies of King Richard III. and Hamlet. And among the qualities which the Germans value most highly in the poet whom they regard, according to Professor Schick, as the flower of the Teutonic race, is his "old Teutonic reverence for women."

What form that reverence took in early days in the case of erring women, we know from the "Annals" of Tacitus. It has, no doubt, reached a higher stage of development in the Teutonic mind by now. But is it true that Shakespeare revered women? In a sense, of course, Shakespeare revered woman, just as he revered man and all created things, because he understood her; but we must guard against imagining that he set woman on a pedestal of sentimentality. She was not the hausfrau, to do the domestic work and bear children; equally, she was not a spotless being of different clay from man. Let us remember, in talking of Shakespeare's reverence for women, Goneril and Regan, Emilia, The Lady Anne, Lady Macbeth, Titania (a very woman), Katharine, Anne Boleyn, Queen Gertrude, and others, and we shall not be likely to confuse him with those of his contemporaries whose unhealthy worship of women it needed the early Stuart reaction with Lovelace and others—even the no less unhealthy Restoration view of them—to correct.

Our census of the services rendered to literature by the Universities needs to be supplemented by reference to the case of the historians. The lists for the two principal Universities are as follows:

OXFORD:

John Fox
William Camden
Lord Herbert of Cherbury
Earl of Clarendon
Edward Gibbon
William Mitford
Charles James Fox

CAMBRIDGE:

Francis Bacon
Conyers Middleton
William Coxe
Lord Macaulay
Charles Merivale
Thirlwall
A. W. Kinglake

Henry Hallam
Thomas Arnold
Sir J. G. Wilkinson
Sir George Cornwall Lewis
Dean Milman
James Anthony Froude
Samuel Rawson Gardiner
Bishop Stubbs
E. A. Freeman
John Richard Green
Mandell Creighton
John Morley
Goldwin Smith
John Addington Symonds
Yorke Powell
W. R. Morfill
Herbert Paul
C. H. Firth
Arthur Hassall
Andrew Lang
William Hunt
Richard Lodge
C. A. Fyffe
C. W. C. Oman
James Bryce
J. E. C. Bodley
Viscount Saint Cyres
Sir George Cox
Montagu Borrowes
H. Morse Stephens
W. H. Hutton

Sir W. Stirling Maxwell
Sir George Trevelyan
George Long
Sir John Seeley
Sir Edward Creasy
G. M. Trevelyan
A. D. Innes
Oscar Browning
W. H. Wilkins
J. K. Laughton
A. W. Ward

Arnold Toynbee
William Wallace
Edward Caird
F. H. Bradley

Sir Frederick Pollock
Charles Austin
A. J. Balfour

Here it is easy enough to generalise. The speciality of Cambridge is to be in close touch with the natural sciences, and there are no Oxonians worthy to be placed in the same class with Newton and Darwin. Cambridge, on the other hand, has no political economist of the rank of Adam Smith, and no metaphysician comparable with any of three or four Oxonians who might be named. In the matter of metaphysics, indeed, Oxford is the constructive and Cambridge the critical and destructive University. To compare T. H. Green with Henry Sidgwick or William Wallace with Mr. Balfour is to perceive the moral difference between the two points of view.

Of the other Universities, Edinburgh makes the best display, claiming Hume, Dugald Stewart, Thomas Brown, Sir James Mackintosh; the Dublin names are those of Berkeley and Burke; while Aberdeen boasts of Alexander Bain. There also remain Shaftesbury, the two Mills, James Martineau, Herbert Spencer, and Mr. Benjamin Kidd to represent non-academic philosophy. There are people who consider Herbert Spencer the greatest philosopher of all; but Jowett, who called him "the Martin Farquhar Tupper of philosophy," expressed the common Oxford view of his contributions to metaphysical speculation.

It will hardly be denied that Oxford has here the moral as well as the material majority. The actual figures are thirty-eight to eighteen; and though it would be feasible to lengthen the Cambridge list, the further names that could be inserted would not do a great deal to strengthen it. The relative position of the two Universities is pretty much the same whether we regard history as a branch of literature or as a branch of science. On the former theory Clarendon, Gibbon and Froude outweigh Macaulay, Seeley, and Kinglake; on the latter Cambridge is quite unable to match the achievements of Stubbs, Creighton and Gardiner. Oxford is distinctly the historian's University. Edinburgh makes a show not greatly inferior to that of Cambridge with the names of David Hume, William Robertson, Sir James Macintosh, Fraser Tytler, Sir Archibald Alison and Thomas Carlyle. Dublin has four representatives: W. E. H. Lecky, Professor Bury, Douglas Hyde and J. P. Mahaffy. Aberdeen has two: Bishop Burnet and Hill Burton. Glasgow has John Knox.

Among non-University historians, the most notable names are those of Daniel Defoe, Smollett, Sharon Turner, Lingard, William Godwin, Sir William Napier, James Mill, Buckle, Grote, Finlay, Mure, Hepworth Dixon, Justin McCarthy, Kaye, Malleson, Lord Acton, Sir Henry Howorth, Major Martin Hume, Nisbet Bain and Sir Spencer Walpole. Only one name—that of Grote—belongs quite certainly to the first class; though claims might perhaps be made, on purely literary grounds, for the inclusion of Defoe and Napier. In this branch of literature, however, the University lists are, from every point of view, the stronger.

In conclusion—and in order that we may dismiss the subject with an easy mind—we may set forth the Universities of the writers distinguished in moral, metaphysical, economical and political philosophy. Thus:

OXFORD:

Thomas Hobbes
John Locke
Bolingbroke
Bishop Butler
Adam Smith
Sir William Blackstone
Jeremy Bentham
Archbishop Whateley
William Nassau Senior
Sir William Hamilton
Benjamin Jowett
Dean Mansel
T. H. Green

CAMBRIDGE:

Francis Bacon
Henry More
Sir Isaac Newton
Dr. Samuel Clarke
William Paley
R. T. Malthus
F. D. Maurice
Sir John Herschell
William Whewell
Charles Darwin
Leslie Stephen
Henry Fawcett
Sidney Buxton

Mr. H. Farr, deputy librarian, Cardiff, raised a question of great importance at the last meeting of the Library Association held on Monday at the London School of Economics. Although it was not proposed to include London at the present time, a resolution, drawn in general terms only, was passed, instructing, in effect the Legislation Committee of the Association to prepare a bill giving County Councils power to adopt the Library Acts for the rural districts of the county areas. Voluntary effort has done much to relieve the monotony of village life, but it can never succeed in more than a small way; and the County Councils, with all the complex machinery of the educational system at their disposal, are the only authorities capable of undertaking the work of providing good libraries for the villages, and county reference libraries to supplement the studies of students. This in a great measure would stem the steady tide of migration to the towns. Mr. H. J. Tennant, M.P., who will take charge of the Bill in the House of Commons, presided at the meeting and laid his finger upon what has been realised for a long time as the key to the future success of public libraries—the inculcation of a love of the best reading in the children.

The love of reading in too many cases has not grown in the children as they themselves grew up, and it is a matter of doubt whether the rural parts of the counties are ripe for any sweeping action of the kind proposed. (The Bishop of Hereford.) The experiment of voluntary effort has been tested very liberally in Hereford and might be tried in other counties before making the question one of legislation, as the response in that city is only about one third of what might have been looked for. In the diocese boxes of books are circulated from farmhouse to farmhouse and distributed amongst the cottages. Another series of boxes circulates amongst the elementary schools of the county. Amongst other places Yorkshire has a well-organised scheme of village libraries, and Sir C. Seeley's plan in the Isle of Wight provides a small reference library in one of the schools in every village of the Island in connection with the library at Newport.

Perhaps some of the want of success is due to the fact that these efforts are voluntary. In the public library as it exists the democratic basis is the cause of its success.

And the efforts of individual parishes promotes an enthusiasm and a spirit of emulation which the control of the County Councils would kill. (Sir E. Verney.) There are four villages of Claydon. The smallest of these has a population of two hundred, but it has a library stocked with more than three thousand volumes, and issued one thousand eight hundred and sixty books during the past year.

Although it did not enter into the business of the evening, Dr. Garnett's request that the Library Association should undertake the selection of the hundred best books for prizes for children of the following grades: Infants; children from seven to ten years of age; from ten to twelve, and from twelve upwards, was one of the utmost interest. There were one hundred and forty-five thousand prizes distributed in London elementary schools last year, and there is no doubt that these books, if selected with that end in view, would do very much to promote an appreciation of good reading.

The Vasari Society for the Reproduction of Drawings by the Old Masters has been in existence for less than a year, but its subscribers already number nearly four hundred and fifty. They will shortly receive the second instalment of Reproductions for the current year, which will include drawings by Lorenzo di Credi, Pontormo, an unknown sculptor of the Sienese School of the fourteenth century who designed a pulpit for Orvieto, Mantegna (?), Montagna, Tintoretto (?), Guardi, Dürer, Hans Holbein II., and Claude. About half the drawings are in the British Museum; the remainder in the collections of the Opera del Duomo at Orvieto, of the Berlin Museum, and of Messrs. A. E. Gathorne-Hardy, Edward Holland, and George Salting. The Committee have thus been able to fulfil their promise to draw more largely on private collections than they were justified in doing before the success of the Society was assured.

Lord Rosebery's pungent criticism of the Edinburgh statues at the Stevenson memorial meeting in the Scottish capital ten years ago may have had an inimical influence on the proposal put forward at the centenary of his birth to secure in Edinburgh an adequate monument of Thomas Carlyle. At any rate the funds subscribed for this object were insufficient to permit of the acceptance of Lord Rosebery's suggestion of a replica of Boehm's Chelsea statue, of which he possesses the original in marble, for Edinburgh. The committee, consisting of Professor Masson, who in his old age has a striking physical resemblance to Carlyle, Mr. Taylor Innes, and Mr. Hew Morrison discussed various projects the other day, and came to the conclusion that a medallion or a brass in St. Giles's Cathedral might be aimed at. It should be stated that, unlike the case of the R.L.S. memorial, no world-wide appeal has been made for the commemoration in Edinburgh of the author of "Sartor Resartus," whose signature, inscribed in a clean, firm, boyish hand, close on a century ago in the matriculation album of the University, can still be seen. His alma mater, it may be stated, received as a gift some time ago Woolner's fine bust of her gifted pupil.

As we go to press, we receive a telegram from the Bodleian Library stating that it has secured the "Turbutt" folio of Shakespeare.

The following are among forthcoming events:

A special matinée by the students of the Academy of Dramatic Art will be given on Tuesday afternoon next (April 3) at His Majesty's Theatre in aid of the Referee Children's Dinner Fund. The programme will consist of the Trial Scene from The Merchant of Venice, rehearsed under the direction of Mr. J. Fisher White; a selection of dances taught by Mr. Louis Herve d'Egville; the complete wordless play, L'Enfant Prodigue, under the direction of Mme. Cavalazzi; in regard to which item of the bill it is interesting to note that Mr. Landon Ronald has kindly consented to play the important pianoforte part in the orchestra; for it will be remembered that he played it originally in London when Mlle. Jane May played the part of the Pierrot, and has played it with her in the cast on over five hundred occasions; and the first act of Mr. Pinero's comedy The Times, rehearsed by Mr. Frederick Kerr. Tickets may now be obtained at His Majesty's Theatre at reduced prices. On the occasion of the performance the gold medal annually presented by Sir Squire and Lady Bancroft for the best dramatic performance will be competed for, the judges being Mr. John Hare, Mr. Pinero and Mr. E. A. Bendall.

On April 8, 9 and 10, the Stage Society will perform Brieux's Maternité, translated by Mrs. Bernard Shaw.

The Collection of pictures by Corot formed by the late Mr. Staats Forbes will be exhibited at the Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square, for a few weeks from Saturday, March 31, when it will be dispersed. The Exhibition will include, in addition to twenty-two choice examples of Corot's art, a large number of representative pictures by the other painters of the Barbizon School—Daubigny, Diaz, Jacque, Dupré, Rousseau and Troyon.

University of Cambridge. Local Lectures Summer Meeting, 1906. A Meeting of University Extension Students and others will be held at Cambridge from Thursday, August 2 to Tuesday, August 28, 1906. The Meeting will be divided into two parts. The first part will last from August 2 to August 15 and the second part from August 15 to August 28. The principal study will be "The Eighteenth Century," especially the period 1714-1789. The inaugural lecture will be given at noon on August 2 by his Excellency the Ambassador of the United States of America. It will deal with "The Rise of the United States in the Eighteenth Century and the tendencies of its Development." The Courses at present arranged are History; Literature; Art; France; Science; Education and Social Reform; Courses mainly for foreign Students, on the Sounds of modern English, and English Institutions; Theology. Further details may be obtained of the Rev. D. H. S. Cranage, M.A., Syndicate Buildings, Cambridge. Letters should be endorsed "Summer Meeting."

Society of Arts. Monday, April 2, at 8 P.M. (Cantor Lecture.) Professor Vivian B. Lewes, "Fire, Fire Risks, and Fire Extinction." (Lecture IV.) Wednesday, April 4, at 8 P.M. (Ordinary Meeting.) Mrs. Ernest Hart, "Ramie and its Possibilities."

Linnean Society. The next General Meeting will be held on Thursday, April 5, 1906, at 8 P.M. Exhibition: Mr. Clement Reid, F.R.S., F.L.S. "Some Plants new to the Preglacial Flora of Great Britain." Papers: (1) Mr. Spencer Moore, F.L.S. "A Second Contribution to the Flora of Africa.—Rubiaceae and Compositae, Part II." (2) Mr. E. J. Schwartz, F.L.S. "The Anatomy of the stem and leaf of Nyssia floribunda, R. Br." (3) Mr. B. Hayata. "Taiwanites, a new genus of Coniferae from the Island of Formosa." (Communicated by Dr. Maxwell T. Masters, F.R.S., F.L.S.)

At the London Sociological Society's next meeting, to be held at The Compositors' Hall, St. Bride Street, on April 4, Mr. Robb Lawson will contribute a paper on "The Drama as a Sociological Factor."

The Dante Society. Wednesday, April 4, 1906, at 8.30 P.M., at 45 Harley Street, W. Professor A. J. Butler, M.A., will give a lecture on "Dante and the German Mystics." The Bishop of Southwark in the Chair.

LITERATURE

SIR RICHARD BURTON

(SECOND NOTICE.)

The Life of Sir Richard Burton. By THOMAS WRIGHT. 2 vols. (Everett & Co., 24s. net.)

THE second volume of Mr. Wright's work is largely taken up with criticism. Burton's early life had been given to travel and adventure, and he retained the old restlessness to the end; but, in studying his life, we feel that, as years advanced, much of the force of it was spent, and so we have him more or less settling down to literary work. And here we do not find him quite so admirable as he was in the character of the romantic traveller. Few people realise the voluminousness of his writings. Probably the majority have tried one or two of his books and found them, to speak the truth, extremely dull. Burton had very little of the instinct of a writer. His besetting sin, as his biographer candidly points out, is prolixity. "His books laid one on the top of another would make a pile eight feet high." Those who have travelled over the same ground bear testimony to the accuracy of his descriptions—a quality not very readily realised by the arm-chair reader. This carefulness about scenery and events was combined with a curious inaccuracy in regard to historical facts. Mr. Wright tells us that to his dying day he was under a wrong impression as to his birth-place.

Scores of his letters have passed through my hands and nearly all are imperfectly dated. Fortunately, however, the envelopes have in almost every case been preserved; so the postmark, when legible, has filled the lacuna. At every turn in his life we are reminded of his inexactitude—especially in autobiographical details. And yet, too, like most inexact men, he was a rare stickler for certain niceties. He would have defended the “h” in Meccah with his sword; and the man who spelt “Gypsy” with an “i” for ever forfeited his respect.

In his attempts at translating poetry he suffered from a complete lack of inspiration, while he had a fancy for using obsolete words that made simply ridiculous what in any circumstances would have been poor. His treatment of Payne is simply indefensible. Mr. Wright shows without the shadow of a doubt that he made dishonest use of the version of his predecessor. The truth seems to be that he had as little faculty for translating prose as verse. The value of his version of the Arabian Nights lies chiefly in the notes, and we cannot help regretting that his thirst for information lay almost entirely in one direction, and that far from being a desirable one.

No other man could have written these notes; no other man, even if possessed of Burton's knowledge, would have dared to publish them. Practically they are a work in themselves. That they were really necessary for the elucidation of the text we would not for a moment contend. At times they fulfil this office, but more often than not the text is merely a peg upon which to hang a mass of curious learning such as few other men have ever dreamt of.

That their publication should alarm Mrs. Grundy was no more than was natural. We say this not without a good deal of sympathy with the view of Burton. Much of the mock modesty and unnatural reticence of the nineteenth century was more prurient than the broadest writing of the eighteenth century; but in trying to redress the balance Burton swung the pendulum to the opposite extreme, and in the end his appetite for filth was nothing more nor less than a disease. The story of “The Scented Garden” is certainly a pathetic one—the old man writing and writing, outpouring his singular knowledge, while page after page of it was to be destroyed by his wife. Mr. Wright gives a description of the work, and there are few who will disagree with him when he declares that the world lost nothing very valuable when Lady Burton placed it in the fire.

After carefully weighing the pros and cons we have come to the conclusion that the loss could not possibly have been a serious one. That Burton placed a very high value on his work, that he considered it his masterpiece, is incontrovertible, but he had formed in earlier days just as high an opinion of his Camoens and his Kasidah; therefore what he himself said about it has not necessarily any great weight. We do not think the loss serious for four reasons: First, because the original work, whatever its claims on the anthropologist, has little, if any, literary merit; secondly, because Sir Richard Burton's “old version” of The Scented Garden is public property, and has been reprinted at least three times; thirdly, because only half was done; and fourthly, because the whole of the work has since been translated by a writer who, whatever his qualifications or disqualifications, has had access to manuscripts that were inaccessible to Sir Richard Burton.

It is to be regretted that Burton's avid thirst for information should have taken the form it did.

Now for a few words in regard to the general opinions held by this remarkable man. In regard to religion we are told that:

Burton had in early life, as we have seen, leaned to Sufism; and this faith influenced him to the end. For a little while he coquetted with Roman Catholicism; but the journey to Mecca practically turned him into a Mohammedan. At the time of his marriage he called himself an agnostic, and, as we have seen, he was always something of a spiritualist.

Lady Burton's fancy that he had embraced Roman Catholicism was little more than a delusion. In regard to social questions the opinions of a man like Burton are of more weight than on religion. That he was no saint we know from the facts of his life and from his own admission, but there is the saving grace that he found what he thought to be his task in this world and he did it with his might. He may be pardoned much on the principle enunciated by Browning:

Win but the race. Who shall object?
He tossed three wine cups off and just at starting Lilith kissed his lips.

Physique was everything to him, and he believed that the poor should be obliged to limit their families. Indeed, he went so far as to approve the law of Lycurgus which forbade a child, male or female, to be brought up unless approved of by public officers appointed for the purpose of deciding. The rest of his opinions will be fairly evident, even from the brief account that we have given of him. It is difficult to sum up such a life. One can only take it on the historical side. It occurred under natural circumstances and therefore it is interesting; but, if we were asked what is there to learn from it, what to imitate, we should be perplexed to find an answer, unless it were in the homely old proverb that it takes some of all kinds to make a world. The fuller the world is, the more interesting.

A POPULAR BOOK ON EVOLUTION

Evolution: the Master Key. A Discussion of the Principle of Evolution as illustrated in Atoms, Stars, Organic Species, Mind, Morals, and Society. By C. W. SALEEBY, M.D. (Harper, 7s. 6d..)

WHEN a great scientific generalisation is carried over by specialists into many departments of inquiry and there made the subject of highly technical discussions, the ordinary layman is in danger of losing sight of the essential principles on which it rests and the larger developments of thought concerning it. The field of his vision is obscured by a multitude of detailed questions and controversies, and he finds himself in the position of one who can no longer see the wood for the trees. This is what has happened within recent years in respect of the doctrine of evolution. We encounter it in every domain of knowledge and speculation. But the specialist now takes its main principles for granted, and passes on to the consideration of the countless problems which it helps to solve, or to which it gives rise, in his own particular province; and thus, though we hear much of special developments of evolutionary theory in chemistry, astronomy, physiology, botany, sociology, ethics, and a dozen other subjects, it becomes increasingly difficult to get a clear view over the evolutionary field as a whole. It is in the light of this fact that the utility of Dr. Saleeby's book becomes apparent. He undertakes within the limits of a volume of moderate compass to set forth and discuss the general principles of evolution, both in their broader scientific aspects and in some of the more important of their practical implications.

Evidently there is place for such a survey as this, and the book will fulfil its chief purpose in leaving the reader with a clear idea of where we stand in regard to the doctrine of evolution in these early years of the new century. The work, it is true, exhibits certain defects perhaps unavoidable in so comprehensive a scheme. Some of the chapters are too brief to do anything like justice to the vast topics of which they treat. We feel in places that Dr. Saleeby has made the mistake of trying to get too much into his space; in the division devoted to super-organic evolution, for example, he deals with the evolution of mind, religion, and morality, the test of truth, the human will (including the vexed question of freedom and determinism), the origin of our ideas, evolution and marriage, evolution and education, and the principles of conduct, all within the scope of a hundred pages. Manifestly such an undertaking is calculated to tax an expositor's skill to the utmost, since the very object of the book demands that condensation shall not be attained at the expense of the popular element. If, therefore, the chapters seem sometimes a little sketchy, if important points (such as the controversy about the transmission of acquired characters) are too lightly touched upon, or even left out altogether, we can hardly be surprised. But on the whole we are struck by the fact that the defect is far less conspicuous than might have been anticipated. Dr. Saleeby has many qualifications for his difficult task. A trained scientist and an enthusiastic evolutionist, he has so thorough a mastery of his material that he is able to present it in broad outlines from many different sides; and he writes in a pleasant, colloquial style which, if occasionally smacking a little too much of journalistic over-facility, is simple, clear, and readable. His success in stripping his discussions of unnecessary technicalities in thought and phraseology is particularly noteworthy.

Dr. Saleeby is, by his own confession, a loyal disciple of Herbert Spencer, and one valuable point about his book is its exhibition of Spencerian doctrine in the light of the immense progress which science has made in many directions in the forty-five years since the first pages of the "Synthetic Philosophy" were penned. Since a rather common habit to-day is to assume, as a matter of course, that a great part of Spencer's philosophy is already getting out of date, Dr. Saleeby has done very good work as a disciple in making clear in how many ways his teacher anticipated the further developments of science, and how various quite recent discoveries, such as those in atomic evolution, seem simply to fill up gaps in the Spencerian system and thus to help in supporting its general edifice. But, doubtless, the portions of the book which will be perused with the greatest interest by the general reader are those in which the author deals with the bearings of evolution on questions of human life and destiny, society, conduct, religion; and this, not only because these are matters which "come home to men's business and bosoms," but also because it is upon these that Dr. Saleeby has most to say that is fresh and suggestive. Though evolution is in the very air of our time, and though we do practically all our serious thinking with reference to it, it will, we suspect, surprise many readers to learn of its manifold applications to living issues, and to note with the author how many are the problems of to-day immediately concerning us all to which it does indeed furnish a "master key."

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING

Elizabeth Barrett Browning in her Letters. By PERCY LUBBOCK. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE word that best describes Mr. Percy Lubbock's life of Mrs. Browning is felicitous. He begins in a spirit of affectionate fault-finding which succeeds at once in winning the confidence and attracting the interest of the reader. It is felt from the first line that he is thoroughly inspired by his subject and is able to look at all flaws in the image without abating one jot of his admiration. This might seem paradoxical or even a little cynical, but it is absolutely true to life. It is the more or less shallow and very egoistical person who takes a friend to his or her heart and defends him against the world as perfect and flawless. At the bottom, perhaps, the old prayer: "defend me from my friends," was based on the over-zeal of such people. A rarer and deeper affection can look steadily at all the shortcomings of its object and yet remain bright and undimmed. That this is Mr. Percy Lubbock's feeling with regard to Mrs. Browning is evident, and no better tribute of praise can be offered than to point it out. The reputation of Elizabeth Barrett Browning as a poet has not endured. Except for a few fragments and very short pieces, her work has got out of touch with the present generation. As Mr. Lubbock says, "much of her most characteristic work has lost its brightness for us. . . . Our present standard in these matters is very different from Mrs. Browning's." His condemnation goes so far as to declare, and as we think with absolute truth, that she was not finally and instinctively an artist. Now the usual exordium of a work in biography is a pæan of praise, and we greatly welcome this healthy deviation from the usual. Mr. Lubbock is not very long in showing us that in spite of all this Mrs. Browning's will always remain a most interesting and lovable personality. Yet it is a personality very difficult to disentangle. As is very truly said in the opening chapter:

The intimate regions of her life were jealously guarded long after her death, in the mood, half tenderness, half a kind of defiance, which was so characteristic of her husband.

Now from the letters it is possible to make a kind of portrait; yet of the letters as little is said in praise as of the poetry.

They are not brilliant letters; they have not the special qualities of humour, of lightness of touch, of pungent individuality, that in certain hands make this accidental form of literature so charming. Their value is not that they reveal genius in themselves, but that through their perfectly unpretentious simplicity we see, as closely as can now be seen, the fragile woman and undaunted genius behind them. No one will read them for their literary merit. Their charm is that a personality of a singularly gracious and lovable kind moves through them, breathing no remote atmosphere, too rare for ordinary minds, but faced with familiar joys and sorrows, and responding with acute sensitiveness to both; possessing the incalculable gift of genius, yet wearing no pontifical robes, arrogating no special immunities, a Vestal tending the flame in secluded places, but with no sacrifice of human ties and associations; a gentle, affectionate, eager woman, whose emotions and interests were like those of a hundred others, only intensified by the fire that had touched her lips.

With the help of a little imagination, however, the biographer has extracted from these documents the materials of a study which, we think, is deserving of a place in English literature. As frontispiece the book shows the fine portrait of Mrs. Barrett Browning made in the winter of 1858-9 by Miss Fox, afterwards Mrs. Bridell-Fox, and the charm and candour of the face are well interpreted in the pages that follow. Like many another extraordinary character, Mrs. Browning was born into a very curious sort of home. Her mother, who only emerges indistinctly like an old faded photograph, appears to have been amiable, but not gifted with that force of character which has frequently been observed in the mothers of genius. Her father seems to have been something of a rough diamond; at least we are quite sure of the roughness, though whether it belonged to a diamond or not is a matter of doubt. Elizabeth Barrett Browning was born on March 6, 1806, at Coxhoe Hall, Durham, and some three years afterwards the family removed to Hope End, in Herefordshire, where her impressions of English scenery were garnered. Unfortunately, it is as difficult to reconstruct her childhood, as it is to realise that of Robert Browning himself. The scholarship which figures perhaps too largely in her poems had its foundation in the acquisition of a copy of Pope's translation of the Iliad. Her other English reading may be learned from an instructive passage in one of her letters:

Papa used to say . . . "Don't read Gibbon's History—it's not a proper book. Don't read 'Tom Jones'—and none of the books on this side, mind!" So I was very obedient and never touched the books on that side, and only read instead Tom Paine's "Age of Reason," and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary," and Hume's "Essays," and Werther, and Rousseau, and Mary Wollstonecraft . . . books, which I was never suspected of looking towards, and which were not "on that side" certainly, but which did as well.

Her younger brother, who gave her "the odd, pretty nickname of 'Ba,'" was her companion, and it was through him that she gained her knowledge of the classics.

A tutor of Edward's, who came to prepare him for Charterhouse, offered the first opportunity. Elizabeth much preferred her brother's lessons to her own. She joined him at his work, dashing first at Greek, as she says, and then at Latin as a help to Greek, tearing the meanings out of words, and riding lightly over the impediments of grammar, determined somehow or other to see her authors face to face.

Another influence that came into her life was that of Mr. H. S. Boyd, a blind scholar then living at Malvern. Under his guidance she "read Greek," she says:

As hard under the trees as some of your Oxonians in the Bodleian, gathered visions from the dramatists, and ate and drank Greek, and made my head ache with it.

The English poetry that she read was that in the grand style, though she added Byron and Coleridge to Pope. All this had the result of causing many books to come into existence prematurely. Yet she seems from the first to have believed that she had a calling to be a poet. While all this was going on, the fortunes of Mr. Barrett seemed to have fluctuated a good deal. His property in the West Indies was depreciated by the abolition of slavery, and the changes of residence that took place were generally more or less actuated by economy. In 1835 the family were once and for all transplanted to London. Already Elizabeth Barrett had won some reputation as a poet, and her letters afford glimpses of literary figures mostly brought to Gloucester Place through the agency of John Kenyon, a sorte de Mécène bon enfant. Among others whom she saw was the poet laureate of the time, of whom we get this sketch:

No, I was not at all disappointed in Wordsworth, although perhaps I should not have singled him from the multitude as a great man. There is a reserve even in his countenance, which does not lighten as Landor's does, whom I saw the same evening. His eyes have more meekness than brilliancy; and in his slow even articulation there is rather the solemnity and calmness of truth itself, than the animation and energy of those who seek for it. As to my being quite at ease when I spoke to him, why how could you ask such a question? I trembled both in my soul and body. But he was very kind, and sate near me, and talked to me as long as he was in the room—and recited a translation by Cary of a sonnet of Dante's—and altogether, it was quite a dream!

Her health was not good. In childhood she seems to have been quite robust and active, but about fifteen she began to suffer, whether owing to a fall from a horse or for some other reason is not very clear, and in Gloucester Place she "grew gradually weaker and more incapable of taking part in any occupations outside the house." In 1838 her health seems to have been precarious.

¶ One lung is very slightly affected [she wrote later], but the nervous system absolutely shattered, as the state of the pulse proves. I am in the habit of taking forty drops of laudanum a day, and cannot do with less, that is, the medical man told me that I could not do with less, saying so with his hand on the pulse.

To add to her troubles, when she was down at Torquay trying to recuperate in the autumn, her brother was drowned in a storm, having been out in a sailing-boat with two companions. For five years, 1841–1845, that is until her marriage, Elizabeth Barrett never left London, and rarely left the house. We are told:

She worked incessantly at her poetry, and accepted with patient resignation the family view that her youth was past, and that she could look for nothing more from life but a certain amount of academic reputation.

There is much that is interesting in the letters of this period, but we would confine ourselves to selecting a single passage, and that because it has a bearing on a movement of our own time, directed as it is against Ossian.

It is many years ago since I looked at Ossian, and I never did much delight in him, as that fact proves. Since your letter came I have taken him up again, and have just finished "Carthoon." There are beautiful passages in it, the most beautiful beginning, I think, "Desolate is the dwelling of Moira," and the next place being filled by that address to the sun you magnify so with praise. But the charm of these things is the only charm of all the poems. There is a sound of wild vague music in a monotone—nothing is articulate, nothing individual, nothing various. Take away a few poetical phrases from these poems, and they are colourless and bare. Compare them with the old burning ballads, with a wild heart beating in each. How cold they grow in comparison! Compare them with Homer's grand breathing personalities, with Æschylus's—nay, but I cannot bear upon my lips or finger the charge of the blasphemy of such comparing, even for religion's sake . . .

All this has to be realised before an understanding can be arrived at of the singular love-story that was shortly to be unfolded. It began with the well-known letter from the poet Robert Browning, then a man of thirty-three, who so far had formed no very intimate friendship, and in fact, then, as ever, saw his fellow men not as real breathing people, into whose joys and sorrows he could enter as if they were his own, but only as figures reflected in a looking-glass. Yet this reticent, thoughtful and somewhat egotistic poet puts aside all his reserve and writes to the unknown author:

I do, as I say, love these books with all my heart—and I love you too. Do you know I was once not very far from seeing—really seeing you? Mr. Kenyon said to me one morning, "Would you like to see Miss Barrett?" then he went to announce me,—then he returned . . . you were too unwell, and now it is years ago, and I feel as at some untoward passage in my travels, as if I had been close, so close, to some world's wonder in chapel or crypt, only a screen to push and I might have entered, but there was some slight, so it now seems, slight and just sufficient bar to admission, and the half-opened door shut, and I went home my thousands of miles, and the sight was never to be?

The history of this true love has been so often told before that we feel greatly inclined to end our comments at this place. This is not because Mr. Lubbock's work ceases to be interesting. On the contrary, he carries it on with verve and discrimination to the end; but the romance of Miss Barrett's life, though in a sense it endured to the end, lost its vitality at her marriage. The letters are not in themselves extremely attractive, but become so only when one is intent on pursuing the amiable personality of the author.

COLERIDGE AND THE WEDGWOOD PENSION

II

WHAT, in point of fact, was the nature of the benefit proposed to Coleridge in the joint letter of January 1798? Did that letter, or did it not, leave the brothers free to reconsider and recall their gift? According to the terms of the document the annuity was to be "for life," no condition whatsoever being annexed; it was to be "independent of everything except the wreck of the donors' fortune"; and it was to be "secured" to the grantee. Mr. Litchfield, of course, demurs: "Josiah alludes, indeed, to securing the annuity to Coleridge, but by this he can only have meant arranging for its payment through a bank or otherwise." We submit that Josiah "can only have meant" what he actually says—that the pension was to be "secured," i.e., appropriated, assigned, made over to, or settled upon, Coleridge for life. On February 17, 1798, Josiah consulted his lawyers how he could best charge his copyhold estate with an annuity of £150—a fact which decides the meaning of the word secured. "But," argues Mr. Litchfield, "the annuity was given for a purpose, and the purpose necessarily made a condition, vague, but substantial." The annuity was indeed given for a purpose—that of removing the monetary cares which had hindered Coleridge's exertions on behalf of mankind. But this purpose, while implying the donors' belief that Coleridge, once rid of his anxieties, would exert his talents for the ends desired by them, assuredly neither made nor implied a condition that he should employ them in any specific manner. The time and the mode of employment were left to Coleridge's discretion; and who will dare to say that Coleridge's life, on the whole, was not a life of labour in the service of humanity?

But we do not know that the obligation he undertook was not something of a specific kind. For we have not before us all that passed between him and the brothers in January 1798. The most important sentence in Josiah's letter begins: "After what my brother Thomas has written . . ." That imports Tom's letter into the offer: but what Tom had written we do not know, nor do we know what Coleridge wrote in accepting the offer.

Here, at last, Mr. Litchfield betrays the hopeless extent of his ignorance touching the transaction which he has rashly presumed to discuss. He never saw the original documents, he is unaware that the letter of January 10 was written jointly by Tom and Josiah, and he positively takes the words: "After what my brother Thomas has written" to imply that, at some date prior to January 10, Tom Wedgwood had addressed a letter on his own account to Coleridge—a letter in which, he fancies, some specific condition may have been imposed; and this, before the subject of the annuity had ever been mooted! Need it be said that these "most important" words of Josiah refer simply to the preceding paragraph of the letter, and that they "import" absolutely nothing into the offer but what that paragraph contains? That we have not Coleridge's final letter of consent before us is, unluckily, true; but seeing that Coleridge tells Wordsworth that he had accepted the annuity "on the presumption that I had talents, honesty, and propensities to perseverant effort," and moreover adds: "If I have hoped wisely concerning myself, I have acted justly," we may take it that his reply did not contain, any more than the Wedgwoods' letter contains, any bargain, stipulation, or condition whatsoever.

It remains for us to examine whether any evidence exists to show what Josiah's motives for revoking his share of the pension really were. In or about September 1807, Coleridge informed his friend Wade that recently he "had had reason to fear for the continuance of the annuity." At this time a separation was pending between the poet and his wife: and it is probable that Southey, who strongly opposed the step, had privately disclosed the position of affairs to Wedgwood, urging him to notify to Coleridge that, in the event of his deserting his family, Josiah's part of the annuity should at once be withdrawn. But, apart from the domestic rupture, Josiah had grounds for displeasure with Coleridge, who had failed to respond to his demand for materials for a "Life" of Tom Wedgwood, supposed to be in preparation by Mackintosh. The request was for many reasons difficult and distasteful to Coleridge, who cannot be blamed for his reluctance to deal with the subject of Tom Wedgwood's supposed "discoveries" in the field of metaphysical speculation, seeing that the deceased man's papers had been entrusted to Mackintosh, and by him carried out to Bombay. But some desultory reminiscences at least might and ought to have been furnished by Coleridge. His hapless condition of mind and body and, still more, perhaps, his dislike of hasty composition, must account for a silence which cannot but have seemed heartless and ungrateful to Josiah.

The events of 1808 were not calculated to conciliate the patron or to restore his shaken confidence; but in 1809 the founding of The Friend awakened kindlier and more hopeful feelings. For a time things promised well; but The Friend, like The Watchman, was foredoomed to failure. On June 6, 1810, Josiah wrote to Poole:

It seems The Friend is at an end. I fear Col is a lost man. I do not think any intercourse is likely to take place between him and me. . . . I do not know him now. I see the wreck of genius with tender concern, and without a hope. . . . I am so circumstanced that my time and my thoughts are pretty exclusively employed on my own objects, and it would be idle to regret what cannot be altered. Nor am I sure that a different state of things would be really for my advantage.

Josiah, plainly, was now convinced that the end on which he and Tom had staked their money was lost—forefeited through the indolence of the trustee. For ten years and more Coleridge had drawn the pension, yet he had nothing tangible to show for it—no poem, nor philosophical treatise, nor system of moral or political doctrine. He had proved—so it seemed to the offended patron—a slothful and unprofitable servant, from whom should be taken away even that he had. Just four months after the letter above quoted was written, Coleridge arrived in London (October 26, 1810) from Grasmere, where for two years he had been living apart from his family under Wordsworth's roof. In London he stayed for fifteen months, lecturing occasionally, and writing for The Courier. Then for the last time he revisited Keswick (February 1812), whence, after a brief stay, he returned, for good and all, to the city. This time it must have been clear to everybody at Greta Hall that the poet had turned his back for ever on the Lakes.

For some years back the Wedgwoods' business had languished for want of a continental market. Buonaparte maintained a strict blockade, and the trade with Holland and Northern Germany was, for a time, wholly suspended. Property, moreover, had been heavily taxed of late, and wealthier men than Josiah Wedgwood were finding it necessary to look into their expenditure. Josiah's ambition to figure as a "county gentleman" had led him into a profuse outlay, and he began to cast about him for some means of reducing his expenses.

At his death in 1805 Tom Wedgwood, it was found, had bequeathed the residue of his estate to his three sisters and two brothers, in fifths. He had also devised annuities to Coleridge and John Leslie the physicist: to Coleridge seventy-five pounds for life, to Leslie a hundred and fifty pounds, until his income from other sources should exceed two hundred pounds a year. In 1803 he had formed a company of eighty volunteers from amongst the "statesmen" of Patterdale, clothing and arming them as riflemen. The annual cost of this body (about eight hundred pounds) he had defrayed till his death, and after that event Josiah, as his executor, had provided the captain's pay and other expenses of the corps. Now it is a remarkable coincidence that, at the very time when Josiah revoked his grant to Coleridge, he ceased to pay Leslie's pension, and discontinued the annual subsidy to the "Wedgwood Mountaineers." Leslie's pension might, one suspects, have been dropt before, since the stipend of his Edinburgh professorship, added to his gains as an author, must have exceeded two hundred pounds a year. Why Josiah ceased to subsidise the volunteer corps we are not told, any more than why he withdrew the seventy-five pounds from Coleridge. But we may fairly assume that his motive in each instance was one and the same, namely, the desire to curtail the outgoings of the family estate. With Tom's bequest to Coleridge he could not meddle—that must still be paid, whether he liked it or not. But with the Leslie bequest and the subsidy to the volunteers the will empowered him to deal; and both these charges he extinguished.

And what of his own part of Coleridge's annuity—had he power to extinguish that? Well, he could not be forced to continue it, for it had not been made enforceable by law. To be sure, there was his promise, written and signed by himself, that the pension should be "for life." But here, on the other hand, was Southey saying that the pension only served to facilitate Coleridge's neglect of his family, and that Coleridge ought to be made to return to them and to work for their support: It was insufferable that he—Josiah—and his children should be straitened by the payment of an annuity which in truth was only doing harm by rendering possible a scandalous dereliction of marital and parental duty. . . . Suppose that, for once, to do a great right he does a little wrong? Indeed, for the matter of that, his fortune might be said to be wrecked—in a manner—through the tactics of that villain Boney. And then, Coleridge is not the man to make a fuss. If the seventy-five pounds is withdrawn he will simply acquiesce. Or stay! What if a stinging letter be written to him, such as shall make him an active party in the business by inducing him to propose surrendering the pension? Some such train of thoughts must, it is to be feared, have passed through Josiah's mind, and led up to the correspondence which took place between him and Coleridge in August or September 1812. Set out thus on paper it wears a nasty look; but ugly as it may appear, it is profoundly human, and Josiah Wedgwood was but a man after all. In justice to Josiah let it be said that, to any one so entirely estranged from the poet as at this time he must have been, there could not seem the remotest likelihood of Coleridge's one day reforming his ways and setting to work to redeem lost opportunities. Still, there was his promise: how might that be broken consistently with honour? And besides, there was the responsibility which, in voluntarily proposing the annuity, he had incurred towards Coleridge and his family. Leaving the promise altogether aside, we say that this responsibility alone should have sufficed to ensure the continuance of the annuity. But neither sense of honour nor sense of responsibility availed with Josiah against the tempting opportunity to lessen his expenditure. When through the mischievous though doubtless well-meant interference of a third party an occasion seemed to offer, Josiah yielded to "the false utilitarian lure," and—broke his word.

We may believe Coleridge when he says that his feeling, on hearing of the withdrawal, was that of relief. "I feel my mind rather lightened," he wrote to Stuart, "and am glad that I can now enjoy the sensation of sincere gratitude towards him [Josiah] for the past, and most unfeigned esteem and affection, without the weight that every year seemed to accumulate upon it." But it was inevitably otherwise with Mrs. Coleridge, who for many years past had had the whole annuity at her disposal. "I have no right to complain," she wrote to Poole; "but—if Mr. Wedgwood had but once seen these children!"

It will be asked: Why rake up this old story at this time of day? The reply is: because it has never yet been told fully and faithfully, and also because, within the last three years, it has been distorted by a prejudiced and ignorant writer to Coleridge's disadvantage. One knows not how it is, but for some time past there has seemed to be a general tendency to assume that, in every difficulty or dispute in which he was involved with his contemporaries, Coleridge was invariably, and, so to speak, necessarily in the wrong. The truth of the homely adage, "Give a dog a bad name," etc., has never been more powerfully exemplified than in the well-nigh uniform unfairness with which questions implicating Coleridge's moral character have been handled in the journalism and the ephemeral literature of the day. Whenever his conduct comes under discussion the case is prejudged before the evidence is even cited; and the man becomes the victim of his ill report before the world. Surely nothing can be more unjust, nothing more fallacious or more futile than Mr. Litchfield's preposterous way of talking—reasoning it cannot be called—which consists simply in substituting a conjecture based on prepossession for a conclusion founded on evidence. Josiah Wedgwood was, as all the world knows, a man of unblemished fame—therefore he could not have acted unworthily in the matter of the annuity; Coleridge, again, was, as all the world knows, a frail and erring mortal—therefore in this instance he, and not Josiah, must have been to blame! Such a pretended solution of the mystery does wrong incidentally to the poet's biographer, Dykes Campbell, whose version of the affair is, so far as it goes, entirely consistent with all that we can discover relating to it; but in a far greater and graver degree it does wrong to the poet himself, whom it makes the scapegoat for the fault of his patron. Coleridge, heaven knows, had errors and weaknesses enough of his own to answer for—who, indeed, ever confessed his mistakes more ingenuously, or bore with such patient dignity the tremendous penalties they brought upon him? Let us not wrong his gentle memory by imputing to him a misdeed that properly belongs to another. Why speak of his faults at all, when what concerns us to-day is his priceless, his imperishable gifts to the world—the treasure of his profound and illuminating criticism, the boon of his divine and unapproachable song?

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
Of princes, shall outlive his powerful rime.

He anticipated, and surpassed, all the greatest of his successors—Byron, Shelley, Keats, Tennyson—for he laboured in many forms of poetry, though in none has he left us more than three or four examples—in some, alas! but one. Yet wherever he tries, there he triumphs, and his thoughts in their melodious setting are like apples of gold in pictures of silver. Let us turn indignantly away from those who would fain peep and pry upon his frailties—the cravings of a weak and unmanageable body; and "say grace for the lovely things we have received at his hands, enjoy them, love them, and honour the poet."*

T. HUTCHINSON.

* Stopford Brooke: "The Golden Book of Coleridge," p. 59.

AN END IN ITSELF

ON brink<sup>o</sup> of fierce-eyed morn and shadowless way
I passed a spring pure-brimmed as flower-clipt dew,
Nor then durst pause or drink, but since I knew
My steps must thitherward turn at close of day,
I bade that loveliest image with me stay,
And evermore my desert journey through
From thought thereof my heart's best solace drew,
While yet the burning hours between us lay.

And when I stood thereby with weary feet,
Lo, trampling herd to baulk my dear desire
Had trod the limpid crystal into mire.
Yet how from henceforth chide the hope's deceit
That cheered my path o'er leagues of drowth and heat,
And slaked full many a shaft of noon-launched fire?

JANE BARLOW.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

PHANTASTES

How long is it since I first read "Phantastes"? My own old copy bears date 1858, and I believe it is an editio princeps. But it is not the copy in which I read the Faerie Romance first—that was lent me by a friend. The date matters very little, except that it was very near the first publication of the book.

And now I find myself in possession of the most recent edition, issued by the author's son, Dr. Greville Macdonald, and illustrated by the author's friend, Arthur Hughes. I hope I am not ungrateful, but though I admire Mr. Hughes's illustrations, on the whole, I prefer my own old plain copy. Methinks the reader should illustrate his "Phantastes" for himself; the mental picture is better than the material one. But this is probably an instance of that troublesome abstraction, the personal equation.

It is a pity that the author did not translate the passage from Novalis which he has prefixed to the book. Even in these days of culture, not every one knows German. Yet the passage quoted is, in a manner, a key to the whole work. It tells us of narratives which are like dreams, without consistency yet not without association: poems of which one stanza at a time is intelligible, but whose sense is unconnected—wild music like the strains of the Æolian harp. Such a dream story, such music, is "Phantastes." Most assuredly it is not an allegory—yet there is the strongest temptation to read allegory into it. Has the adventure of Anodos with the Lady of the Alder Tree any hidden moral? Does it symbolise the human weakness which Matthew Arnold called lubricity? There is somewhat to suggest this interpretation—and yet, mere allegory or symbolism seems vulgar and out of place. Even if we conjecture that the Alder Lady only signifies false Art—true Art being typified by the White Lady of the marble cavern—yet imagination is repelled by the commonplace of allegorical interpretation.

Nevertheless, there is one theme which seems to dominate the entire story, and to demand treatment from a symbolical point of view. What does the Shadow mean? Assuredly it has a meaning—the reader feels that it must have, from the moment when the Shadow finds Anodos in the Ogre's cottage to the moment when Anodos is able to say:

Thus I, who set out to find my Ideal, came back rejoicing that I had lost my Shadow.

And yet, what is that meaning? Sometimes one is tempted to think that it is neither more nor less than Self-Consciousness—the spirit, perhaps, of analysis, which must needs subject beauty and goodness as it were to chemical tests. Here is an episode, which supports that conjecture:

Once, as I passed by a cottage, there came out a lovely fairy child with two wondrous toys, one in each hand. The one was the tube through which the fairy-gifted poet looks when he beholds the same thing everywhere: the other that through which he looks when he combines into new forms of loveliness those images of beauty which his own choice has gathered from all regions wherein he has travelled. Round the child's head was an aureole of emanating rays. As I looked at him in wonder and delight, round crept from behind me the something dark, and the child stood in my shadow. Straightway he was a commonplace boy, with a rough broad-brimmed straw hat, through which brim the sun shone from behind. The toys he carried were a multiplying glass and a kaleidoscope. I sighed and departed.

Does not this read as if the Shadow were meant to symbolise the power of seeing "the seamy side of things" and the tendency to look at it? Again, the Shadow comes between Anodos and the Knight of the Rusty Armour, just at the moment when Anodos is about to confide in the Knight and to seek his friendship. But most significant of all is the following:

The most dreadful thing of all was that I now began to feel something like satisfaction in the presence of the shadow. I began to be rather vain of my attendant, saying to myself: "In a land like this, with so many illusions everywhere, I need his aid to disenchant the things around me. He does away with all appearances and shows me things in their true colour and form. And I am not one to be fooled with the vanities of the common crowd. I will not see beauty where there is none. I will dare to behold things as they are. And if I live in a waste instead of a paradise, I will live knowing where I live."

And then follows the sad adventure of the Maiden with the Crystal Globe, which discloses to Anodos the true character of the haunting spectre. The narrative is too long to quote, and, indeed, no quotation can convey either the enthralling interest of the story or the charm of the author's style. I am constrained to say here, that although the volume contains a great deal of melodious verse, the prose is more musical still. When I say this, I except the refrain of the ballad of Sir Aglovaile. Everybody knows it, even those who have never seen the book, and know nothing else about it; and yet I cannot help quoting it once more.

Alas, how easily things go wrong!
A sigh too much, or a kiss too long,
And there follows a mist and a weeping rain,
And life is never the same again.

Alas, how hardly things go right!
'Tis hard to watch on a summer night,
For the sigh will come, and the kiss will stay,
And the summer night is a winter day.

One must needs seek out the best in Shelley, or Keats, or Coleridge to surpass these lines; and, indeed, the whole poem in which they occur is a masterpiece of melody as well as of fancy.

I will extract just one more fragment of verse, because it seems to me a more representative exemplar of the author's style than the poem of Sir Aglovaile, and especially than the lovely refrain. The following lines are only part of a poem which is itself part of a greater whole, the latter portion, however, merging into prose.

Through the realms of the monarch Sun
Creeps a world whose course had begun,
On a weary path with a weary pace,
Before the Earth sprang forth on her race:
But many a time the Earth had sped
Around the path she still must tread,
Ere the elder planet, on leaden wing,
Once circled the court of the planets' king.

There in that lonely and distant star,
The seasons are not as our seasons are;
But many a year hath Autumn to dress
The trees in their matron loveliness;
As long hath old Winter in triumph to go
O'er beauties dead in his vaults below;
And many a year the Spring doth wear
Combing the icicles from her hair;
And Summer, dear Summer, hath years of June,
With large white clouds and cool showers at noon;
And a beauty that grows to a weight like grief,
Till a burst of tears is the heart's relief.

Children, born when Winter is king,
May never rejoice in the hoping Spring;
Though their own heart buds are bursting with joy,
And the child hath grown to the girl or boy;

But may die with cold and icy hours
Watching them ever in place of flowers.
And some who awake from their primal sleep,
When the sighs of Summer through forests creep,
Live and love and are loved again;
Seek for pleasure and find its pain;
Sink to the last, their forsaken sleeping
With the same sweet odours around them creeping.

This is fine verse, but not up to the mark of the Refrain. And, as I said, the prose is even more fascinating than the verse. I despair of quoting—not because I could not find plenty of fine passages, but because, to speak plainly, I should not know where to stop. Or, to put it in another way, I could find no "purple patch;" for the whole robe is of pure purple, and to seek for a pattern were to rend and to deface it. So perhaps I had best desist. After all, this is a Causerie—and my French dictionary tells me that a Causerie is a Chat. I have chatted about a book which for the greater part of half a century has had a singular fascination for me, and I hope that I have suggested, at least, the reasons which have led me to think that "Phantastes" is one of the greatest works of pure imagination to which the Victorian era has given birth.

Must I confess that I have read very little of George MacDonald's besides "Phantastes?" What I have read is far from being up to the mark of the Faerie Romance—although in all MacDonald's work the fascination of his style must needs be felt. I refer to his other works merely to explain, if possible, why "Phantastes" has always especially appealed to me. The others (such, at least, as I have read) are "stories with a purpose." The good people are always made to come out all right, and the naughty people are at least compelled to "say they are sorry." Indeed, this is about the severest punishment which befalls most of them, for our author is an optimist and something more. I will not say that this disposition of his does not show itself in "Phantastes"—in fact, in the concluding chapter there is an optimistic pronouncement which might almost be called crude. But taken as a whole, the Faerie Romance is a faerie romance pure and simple—it is the kind of tale described in its German foreword—and if there may be symbolism or allegory to be discerned here and there, assuredly there is no purpose, in the sense in which "purpose" may be found, for instance, in the "Annals of a Quiet Neighbourhood." This, by the way, is the latest of MacDonald's books which I have read, and as I said, I am acquainted with but few of his numerous novels. I only mentioned the "Annals" to illustrate my remark that many of his later writings are obviously stories with a purpose. I am tempted to say, a somewhat crudely and inartistically displayed purpose—but this Causerie is about "Phantastes," and "Phantastes" only. Were it not for this, I might be tempted to compare the Faerie Romance with Goethe's "Märchen"—but to do so would lead me too far afield.

EDWARD STANLEY ROBERTSON.

[Next week's Causerie will be "An Early University Calendar," by C. B.]

FICTION

The Man of Property. By JOHN GALSWORTHY. (Heinemann, 6s.)

WE experienced the same keen pleasure in reading Mr. Galsworthy's book as a connoisseur in wine, whose palate has often been affronted by inferior vintages, would feel as he inhaled the fragrance of a fine claret. There is plenty of the bon petit vin, there is a good supply of ordinaire, but the real thing seems to become more rare, and by its rarity more precious. Let us at once record our homage. Wine leads infallibly to "the large infidel," Omar Khayyam, who knew wine as he knew books, and in him we find the end of the metaphor in the lines:

The subtle Alchemist that in a Trice
Life's leaden Metal into Gold transmutes—applicable alike to the function of good art or good wine. But too often, even when it is Life's metal that is handled, it remains unconscionably leaden, a dull transcript without a gleam of gold. A little of the feu sacré is needed to bring about the change, and a little of this transforming quality Mr. Galsworthy possesses. Leaden enough in all conscience is the material upon which he works. The Forsyte family are rich and respectable members of the upper middle class. We see the whole family grouped in all its massive unimportance; and yet we feel that each member of it is a separate human being, and we become strangely intimate with their several peculiarities. In front of this perfect background move the figures of Philip Bosinney, the architect, who is engaged to June Forsyte; Soames Forsyte, who is the man of property; and Irene, his wife. Bosinney is an artist, and the antithesis of Forsytedom. The tragedy lies in the fact that he and Irene come into conflict with it and are overwhelmed by its weight. The skill and delicacy with which the story is told is equal to the fineness and distinction of the character-drawing. There is no effort; and no difficulty is shirked. Certain moments live vividly in the mind; as when Soames hears the cry of the peacocks at dawn, or when George follows Bosinney as he rushes wildly through the fog, or when Irene returns to her husband. The book is remarkable: it has strength without the least taint of sensation; and is written with a finish which is both rare and delightful. Two points only are there to which we take exception: that Mr. Galsworthy at times lingers unnecessarily over the Forsytes; and that he has, in one passage at least, mistaken brutality for strength. The book is an extraordinary advance upon his former work, and is as far above the level of the average novel as The Voyage Inheritance is above a Tom Taylor comedy.

The Pathway of the Pioneer (Nous Autres). (Methuen, 6s.)

DOLF WYLLARDE is an "up-to-date" novelist who knows how to attract public attention by her choice of subject and title, and it is regrettable that her latest work deals inadequately with a phase of life which is fresh in literature and of much interest. English women of birth and breeding have been working for their living in other than the ancient ways for nearly a score of years past, but their history has remained practically unwritten. Their historian will speak when their story is made, but Dolf Wyllarde's novel, by its title, its flamboyant dedication, its pointed quotations, its recurring insistence on "we others" showing "the way to them" and so forth, presents in the stories of seven girls a premature picture which is almost a libel. The book gives a fateful incident in the life of each girl in turn, and between each little history is sandwiched a chapter describing a meeting of "Nous autres" with much characteristic chatter. Of the seven, one is an actress in comic opera: one a member of a Ladies' Orchestra: a third is a music-mistress: two are journalists, one a telegraphist, and the seventh is a typist. The last four are the only "pioneer" professions for women of those represented, but that might pass if the women themselves were representative. The mischief lies in the fact that Dolf Wyllarde's heroines, with one exception, are not pioneers at all. They are pitiful waifs on the road of life, and little women, whose emotions, unfairly pressed, prove their undoing; but their difficulties are not those of the new working woman, who is essentially the woman of refinement and breeding finding her place in fresh and inimical surroundings. The lives of Dolf Wyllarde's "pioneers" are made or marred by the opposite sex. The all-important incident she narrates is, in each case, a love-affair. That, of course, is a possible happening to any one, but it is not one characteristic of the professional woman. She has less trouble in "walking with clean feet through the streets of experience" (a phrase occurring many times in Dora Wyllarde's pages) than most of her sex, because of her absorption in the vital question of her work and her alienation in thought and feeling from those amongst whom her life is passed. She has no illusions, but she has nearly always much-cherished ideals. In only one of Dolf Wyllarde's heroines do we find her faint resemblance—in the seventh "pioneer," Flair Chaldecott. But Dolf Wyllarde tells us nothing about Flair, except that she dies of heart disease from a weak constitution and over work. The author does not know her only "pioneer" or else cannot describe her.

The House by the Bridge. By M. G. EASTON. (Lane, 6s.)

SHOULD this be a first novel, the author should be encouraged to proceed in the art of novel-writing. The book shows great promise of better things to come. Like many modern novels, it has far too much plot: nearly every character in the book has a story of its own, which is a little bewildering. Most of the people appear either to have mated with the wrong person or suffered troubles of the heart. The heroine is a charming girl who brings sunshine wherever she goes, as all nice girls should do. She even wins the love of her stern and acrid aunt Mrs. Chantry (aunt Ezekiel, as she calls her on her first introduction). There are some wise words said about the effect of the gloomy old house and its inhabitants upon the sensitive and reserved nature of the little heroine. She is taken from the land of sunshine that she loves, the home of her dead father and his regiment where she has been petted and loved and, as a very young child with her ayah, arrives at her new home to be made acquainted with gloom and mystery and silence, morose people and the horror of dark lonely nights in a house that has a "mystery." The secret of that mystery is well kept-up until the last chapters and comes quite as a surprise, although it is difficult to believe that a girl would live so many years of her life there and not find it out. The story grows more melodramatic towards the end, and a scene where the aunt has gone mad and tries to murder her niece is particularly blood-curdling. But there are many delightful men and women in the book, and we are glad to find the heroine left with a prospect of enduring happiness.

My Cornish Neighbours. By MRS. HAVELOCK ELLIS. (Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d.)

"THERE's good and bad and medium here as elsewhere," says Mrs. Pengilly, when the lady from uplong exclaims that the village is ideal and the people kind and charming in every way; and the lady's sketches show that on the whole Mrs. Pengilly was right. The neighbours were not always neighbourly. They suspect one "uplong" of drinking, because they find her Salutaris bottles and take Salutaris to be a Roosian speerit. They tell the lady herself when she leaves them that she has been one against all, "for it do take years with we to treat a stranger like one of our own." The stranger always gets the worst of it when it comes to a bargain: whether he is an artis' chap who gives ten shillings for cups that have cost sixpence or a young woman who gives six pounds for goats which the owner, if she had only known it, would have paid her to take away. Yet the general impression left by these sketches is of a kindly, law-abiding folk, rather lazy, clannish, honest, set in their own ways, clinging to old superstitions and ideas. They are used to village life and think town life both sinful and uncomfortable: they are at once quarrelsome and united: quarrelsome every day and united in emergency. They talk, as Cornish folk do, with a quaint disregard of grammar and some picturesque phrases which we hope the Board Schools will not drive away. But hope is vain. Education will teach the children of these people the proper use of pronouns and the improper use of many a word which their parents use to-day with musical and vigorous effect. So we may be grateful to Mrs. Havelock Ellis for preserving the talk of to-day in these charming sketches and for giving us pictures of a peasantry that is neither arcadian nor bestial but good and bad and medium, here as elsewhere.

THE DRAMA

"CAPTAIN BRASSBOUND'S CONVERSION" AT THE ROYAL COURT THEATRE

SOME years ago the Stage Society gave a performance of Captain Brassbound's Conversion, and our memory of that performance is very pleasant. That was in the days when Mr. Shaw's plays were given tentatively and needed the spice of adventure which then belonged to Sunday evening playgoing in England. Since then our education in Shaw has had opportunities; and his attitude and intention in the light reflected from his later (and in our thinking incomparably finer) work have become less enigmatical. We are no longer deafened by the tub-thumping which was at first necessary to attract our attention: we have even seen plays of Mr. Shaw without having been able to read disconcerting prefaces of his own explanation, containing a ridiculous admixture of truth, more baffling than any lie. For a man's opinion of himself means nothing until we have something of an opinion of our own as to what he may be. The effort of self-expression conduces to contortions in most men, and most men strive to keep them in the background. Mr. Shaw did not. He writhed in public; and kept an inimitable commentary running on every twist, so that they seemed intentional, studied almost; moreover so swift and bewildering were they that they distracted attention from what he was achieving. What we then thought the ebullitions of a clever man, we are now inclined to consider the mistakes of a genius. We were right to be impressed by Captain Brassbound's Conversion: it was far more interesting than the average play, and still is; but we have seen John Bull, and Major Barbara, and The Voysey Inheritance since that adventurous Sunday.

Most men want to escape from reality: it is soothing to have something other than facts to look in the face. The little cockney Drinkwater managed by the help of Sweeney Tod and The Skeleton Horseman to elude the realities of the Waterloo Road, and he continued to treasure his "lawbrary" in Mogador, when its actual necessity was no longer pressing. This was inverted in the case of Brassbound. He needed the newspaper cuttings recounting his uncle's good deeds to counteract the effect of his picturesque bandit's life, and to help him to build a splendid romance of revenge around the sordid facts of his childhood. He must play the leading part in his own romance, and he does so with fatal persistence, until he becomes the hero of his dreams. Brassbound is not a villain in a melodrama, but a melodramatic man in a comedy, which laughs at the tendency of all men to take themselves in melodramatic earnest. "All men are children in the nursery," says Lady Cicely, and proves her point with every man in the play, but especially with the chief baby, Brassbound, and even with his uncle, Sir Hallam, though he, so far from being the villain of his nephew's dreams, is eminently respectable and accordingly succumbs last. Mr. Shaw is nothing if not chivalrous. But his treatment of Brassbound is confused: the exposition is cumbrous and unenlightening, with a strange mingling of melodrama and farce, and it is only half-way through the great scene in the second act, where Lady Cicely is mending Brassbound's coat, that the play is forced up to the level of comedy with a supreme effort that is not wholly successful, for the audience has been in no way prepared for the change of attitude. The dark hints of Brassbound to his uncle which make the curtain to Act I, concerning the wild justice of the mountains, are too much in the manner of the conventional villain to be taken as seriously as they are meant to be. And it is this confusion of treatment which makes it peculiarly difficult—almost impossible—to portray the character of Brassbound with any semblance of reality.

Mr. Frederick Kerr grappled courageously with the difficulties. But his Brassbound lacked valiancy and dash,

He was inclined to over-emphasise the sinister and lowering side of the Captain. That made his act of vengeance seem mere treachery, and untouched by any of the glamour, which it would gather from the colour of a life-purpose. We did not feel that for years he had been waiting for his vengeance, and the moment of its fulfilment did not seem a great moment. That lessened the effect of his loss, and made his surrender to the influence of Lady Cicely's charm less accountable. Mr. Kerr was handicapped by the fact that Miss Terry had not been able to master her words—more handicapped than was Miss Terry herself. By sheer skill and that marvellous personal charm of hers she carried through her part successfully and at times rose to her former greatness. Mr. J. H. Barnes was excellent as Sir Howard: he controls his features and modulates his voice with all the precision of an actor of the old school. A very clever performance was given by Mr. Gwenn as Drinkwater. His exit—shouldered shrieking to be washed—was memorable; but he seemed to be a little over-anxious to make his points and emphasise his dialect. Mr. Shaw's points are not the better for forcing nor his dialect for emphasis.

We were able to pay a second visit to the Court on the Tuesday following the play's production. We came away more than ever convinced as to how much Mr. Shaw is indebted in this instance to his interpreters. The most noticeable improvement was in the first act, which was played far more quickly and almost saved from being dull. But it is a clumsy act. There is a little piece of character-acting, with which we were more than ever impressed: it is in its small way perfect: namely, Marzò, the Italian from Hatton Garden, played by Mr. Michael Sherbrooke.

H. DE S.

FINE ART

THE LATE CHARLES WELLINGTON FURSE

SINCE Charles Furse was cut off early in life, it is impossible to say whether he might not in time, possibly in quite a short time, have become more conscious of, and more distressed by, a lack which his work showed in common with that of almost all of his contemporaries, an indifference to the beautiful qualities of the material he handled. He was so intelligent, so keen and ardent in spirit, and his high aims were so justified not only by his talents but by his opportunities, that one is bound to think that his development, being on true lines of independence and courage, would have led to that refinement which we miss. Everything else was there—largeness of vision, original composition and vigorous colour, dignity, character—but no hint of exquisiteness or tenderness. Some critics have coupled his name with Whistler's. A more inept comparison cannot be conceived. If Whistler was not exquisite to the verge of the precious, he was nothing.

The lack of delicacy, of elegance, in Furse's work was not one which was likely to be supplied under the influence of Mr. Sargent, which was considerable in most of the later work. Furse was strong enough himself, and the emulation of a yet stronger painter was quite unnecessary. His sense of colour developed surely and rapidly. The Lilac Gown, now on exhibition with other of his works at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, is a brilliant and original study of colour, spoilt, however, to some extent by the streaky, smeary painting. The same fault occurs in the portrait of Mrs. M. B. Furse, otherwise a work of some charm. Beautiful quality excuses everything, but a sky like the blue in this portrait, which is not only false in tone but also abominable as pigment, is "horripilant."

Of the several portraits and sketches of Earl Roberts, the most satisfactory is the very complete and accomplished small version which was exhibited at the

New English Art Club some years ago. Here Furse was working on traditional lines, and although, of course, Velasquez is a long way ahead, still the painter was on the road. I have little doubt that he would have returned to this road, if he had lived. His grasp of character was admirably shown in the portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Leaf, painted in 1903, and technically it was his best work in its combination of vigour and dexterity. But his more ambitious attempts, the portrait groups of huntsmen, have a special and touching interest in the evidence they supply of his predilection for open air, life and movement. The feeling of procession in Cubbing with the York and Ainsty, with the merry children looking jauntily down from their high horses on the small spectator, is most exhilarating. It is a pity that his first ambitious essay in this line, the portrait of R. Allison Johnson, M.F.H., exhibited at the New English Art Club in 1893, is not included in the present exhibition. The mere planning out of such a work on such a scale was an astonishing performance for a young man of twenty-five, and it was carried out with unflagging verve. I well remember the portraits of the hounds, Gayless, Flourish, Spangle, etc., and their air of bustle and movement. The portrait of Philip Crossley, M.F.H., is grand in design, but Furse evidently was ill at ease in the smaller scale. Another open-air picture, Diana of the Uplands, which was a great favourite when it was exhibited at the Royal Academy, has movement and vigour, of course, but of a rather melodramatic and sensational kind, besides being hard and fierce in colour. The small sketch gives the essentials with more satisfaction. His love of the open air is significant of the whole man, as shown by his detestation of cliques and coteries, of snobbery and jobbery; and therefore his early death means not only the loss of a remarkable artist, but of a vigorous and independent personality, whose influence could not have failed to be salutary for any body with which he was connected.

B. S.

THE RISING GENERATION

To those who are acquainted with the autumn salons the collection of "pictures and drawings from the Paris Salon d'Automne 1905" at the Lafayette Art Gallery (178 New Bond Street) will suggest a tail without a dog. Carrière, Renoir, Cézanne, and the other heads of the impressionist school whose work was the attraction of the Paris exhibition are here represented, not by their works, but by those of their followers. Genuine Carrières, Renoirs and Cézannes are absent, but imitations abound, and these do not equal, however they may flatter their originals. Inasmuch as the younger painters of France—with the exception of M. Henri le Sidaner, whose beautiful paintings of Venice have just been shown at the Goupil Gallery—are practically unknown to the British public, the broad-minded critic will welcome an exhibition which contains examples of such artists as Charles Milcendean, A. Chabanian, Abel Truchet, and A. Guillaumin. Moreover, though many paintings seem so violent in colour as to incur suspicion of having been painted pour épater le bourgeois, the dominant note of the exhibition is sincerity. It is this very sincerity, perhaps, which makes the exhibits strange to British eyes. For to the young painters of France it is not enough to imitate something; something must also be expressed. It is the painter's duty to present as well as to represent, and consequently he is apt to ignore all facts in Nature save the one which he is momentarily engaged in presenting.

As a contrast to the more florid exhibits there are a few reticent pieces, such as André Allard's The Canal at Harfleur, quiet and true, while H. Marrett's Depôt de Machines is able and personal, a Monet subject without servile imitation of Monet's vision and technique. In some respects the most interesting of the exhibits are a species of lithographs in colour which attracted much attention in Paris. Maurice Neumont's poetic Twilight, Bois de Boulogne and Felin's clever character-study, Dormeuse, are admirable examples of the soft but brilliant effect of which this medium is capable.

On first entering the Grafton Galleries, where the Ridley Art Club is holding its twentieth exhibition, one might suspect that here also the subtle influence of the French Impressionists had been at work. The grey seascapes of Messrs. James E. Grace and Philip F. Walker which greet one in the ante-room are pleasantly reminiscent of Boudin. But on entering the larger gallery the suspicion proves unfounded. Whistler has obviously inspired some of the portrait painters, but to little effect; Monet, no doubt, has to some extent influenced Mr. Moffat Lindner, possibly also Messrs. Terrick Williams and Julius Olsson, and the marines of these three are the most distinctive paintings here—paintings, be it said advisedly, for otherwise they would have to reckon with the dignified, bigly seen landscapes in chalk by Mr. Claude Shepperson. Some statuettes and reliefs by Mr. Gilbert Bayes and a fan by Mr. Conder well-nigh exhaust the major interests of the exhibition. Mr. Louis Grier's nocturne, The Pool of Sleep (36), the Constable-Steerish landscapes of Miss Beatrice Bland, and the Pastoral of Mr. Cecil Rea deserve a word of praise, but, excepting Mr. Shepperson, one cannot find here an artistic individuality so strong that it promises to force its recognition from the public.

To discover the painters of to-morrow, however, it is more necessary to search in the provinces and departments than the capitals; and of this one is reminded by the excellent exhibition of modern paintings now open at the Royal Institution, Liverpool. The portraits by Mr. Gerard Chowne here prove him to be more variously gifted than one could tell from the flower-pieces which alone represent him in London, while Mr. Hamilton Hay is revealed not only as the inimitable painter of curling waves and flat foam-flecked foregrounds whom the International has taught us to admire, but as the subtle observer and deft recorder of the light-effects which beautify mean streets in the hour of dusk. Mr. W. Alison Martin's Fêtes champêtres and landscapes reveal a sparkling colourist of wonderful quality, who, if he continue as he has begun, should revivify the glorious tradition of glowing colour which began with Titian and ended with Monticelli. Some intensely virile drawings by Miss Enid Jackson gave us something of that shock of power and original observation which was afforded by our first glimpse of the work of her master, Mr. Augustus John, from whom she has learnt to be strong without sacrificing the tenderness that belongs to femininity.

MUSIC

THE OXFORD HISTORY OF MUSIC—V

MOST people know pretty well what they mean when they describe a work of art, a piece of furniture, a dress or a custom, as "eighteenth-century," and the expression used adjectivally may be appropriate quite apart from the particular date which the substantive implies. The phrase connotes something very pompous, very formal, very dreary. Look a little deeper and we see with the author of this volume that this impression is largely due to the remarkable "combination of lavish display with an almost barbarous discomfort," which was a characteristic of the century. Take Bach and Handel, or perhaps only Bach, out of the first half of the century and we see how thoroughly consonant was the music of the period with this outlook upon other departments of life. The year 1750 did this; Bach died, and music was left to be represented at its best by the sententious and anglicised oratorio of Handel, at its worst by the debased opera of the Italians. How bad that worst was, Mr. W. H. Hadow lays bare in a vivid opening chapter "On the general condition of taste in the Eighteenth Century." Of this the reader of the fourth volume has had some glimpses; here it is summed up with force and terseness, and with a sense of humour which is almost epigrammatic. Bach had so little to do with his own time that he could have no immediate successors; with his death music died and had to be born again. Nor is this a mis-statement in view of the fact that it received its new life from Bach's son, Carl Philip Emanuel. Educated by his father, he was still not his successor in the sense of continuing his tradition; he was the parent of a new music, which was nurtured and developed by Haydn and Mozart, and which arrived at full manhood in the sonatas and symphonies of Beethoven. This, like the music of Cavaliere and Monteverdi, a century and a half earlier, was a revolt from servitude. Theirs had freed music from the service of the church, this from the service of the great ones of the earth. Musicians of the eighteenth century wore the liveries of their masters and wrote operas or masses as might best please the capricious taste of their patron archduke or archbishop. Handel might have worn a livery, Haydn did, but imagine Beethoven in one! The movement towards artistic freedom, then, was nothing less than the development of the most abstract form of music, one not designed to minister either to the sense of devotion or the desire for amusement of distinguished patrons, as was the church and stage music of the time, nor yet, like the concerto of the virtuoso, designed for the display of personal achievements, but one undertaken simply to find the most perfect expression for the highest musical thoughts—in short, the Sonata form as exemplified in works of that name and in quartets, concertos, symphonies.

The rise and growth of this movement is the main subject of this volume, but there are various side issues which require detailed attention, and which no historian could afford to overlook. A school of church music having for its highest point Beethoven's colossal mass in D may well claim to be important in the history of the art, and Glück's reform of the opera, incomplete though he left it, and the later school of opera of which Mozart was the chief ornament, and which led the way to Beethoven's Fidelio, can only be classed as side issues at all because of the overwhelming importance of this other movement which was taking place concurrently with them. Mr. Hadow deals with opera first, and in recounting the well-known story of Glück's campaign in Paris he makes clear, by description of the state of contemporary opera and by quotation from Glück's Iphigénie en Tauride, what were the real points at issue, and what Glück attained. His music seems polite and formal enough to us now, but contrasted with that of his contemporaries it is amazingly vivid. Opera, as Glück found it, was neither music nor drama; as he left it, it was both, the imperfect fusion of the two elements in itself testifying to the strength of their separate existence. One of them, the music, Mozart developed in the next generation, but for the furthering of its dramatic side opera had to wait till the next century. Mozart's position with regard to opera is well summed up when the author, speaking of Cosi fan tutte, says:

On each successive event is concentrated everything that music can do, every appropriate device of rhythm and figure and orchestration; there is not a motion, not a gesture that is not illustrated by voice or instrument, there is not a shade of feeling which lacks its actual expression. The scene is always laid in Cloud Cuckoo-town but it maintains the laws of its kingdom.

Fidelio, Beethoven's only opera, is compared with Mozart, and it is shown that, whereas in Mozart's work "the dramatic ideal is more compatible with the melodic, in that of Beethoven it is commonly subordinated." Hence the complete isolation of Beethoven's work. "To call it a dramatic symphony would overstate the case, but it is a drama conceived and executed upon symphonic lines." In the same way with church music as exemplified in the Mass, Beethoven said the last word with his Missa Solennis in D. To apply the term "church music" to this work at all sounds absurd; it knows no such limitations as the word implies. As it belongs to what is generally known as the third period of Beethoven's work and Fidelio to the second, so, as Fidelio is symphonic, the Mass has passed beyond the confines even of that restriction and cannot be classified.

But to return; with chapter seven, headed "C. P. E. Bach and the growth of the Sonata," Mr. Hadow takes up the main thread of music's history in the second half of the eighteenth century. It is so often a difficulty that the name Sonata long precedes the existence of the type of work we mean by that name, that it should be very helpful to many to have the development traced and the connection shown between the so-called Sonatas of Corelli and Domenico Scarlatti and those of Mozart and Beethoven. This Mr. Hadow does by quoting examples and analysing the various types of "binary" and "ternary" movement as found in the works of these composers and of J. S. Bach, and shows how their gradual extension approached very nearly to what we now know as "first movement" form. Never quite, however, since they never arrived at a second subject as distinct from the first. C. P. E. Bach went further and arrived at what is practically the complete outline of sonata form, though with him the exact divisions of first and second subject are still indeterminate. On this point Mr. Hadow says:

This absence of distinctive themes is not a mark of deficient melodic invention, for C. P. E. Bach had a very remarkable gift of melody, nor of inexperience, for he had been engaged in Sonata writing since 1732. It was simply an inherited tradition, which, occupied with clearing the outlines of his form, he did not think it worth while to discard. His main business was to mark out the ground and lay the foundation.

Two other points of incompleteness are noted in C. P. E. Bach's work, the rudimentary character of the "development section," and the unsatisfactory management of keys in the restatement of the first part. The first could not be rectified until the subjects had become sufficiently definite to merit a more consistent treatment, the latter was a problem which only continual practice in the new form could solve. The question as to definiteness of subject, however, was settled once for all by Haydn. He was gifted with a power of melody too spontaneous and overflowing to be checked by conventions of "serious" composition, and, besides his natural gift, Mr. Hadow conclusively shows that he was indebted for the freshness of his rhythms and metres to Croatian folk-song, his native inheritance. This infusion of folk-song into the music of Haydn, thereby influencing the course of all instrumental music through Sonata form, is one of the most striking instances of popular music coming to the aid of scientific music, and giving to it the breath of life without which it must have languished. We have seen how popular music marched ahead of the scientists of the fifteenth century in its feeling for euphony, how in the seventeenth the song and the dance tune occupied the attention of musicians and how the Cantata and the Suite resulted. The melodies of Haydn, coming straight from the heart of a people whose speech was song, have each that individuality necessary to assert that principle of contrast, which alone was wanting to sonata form to make it thoroughly articulate. The form being complete, its individual treatment by Haydn and Mozart in quartet and symphony, and its further modification by Mozart to apply it to the clavier concerto, receive interesting treatment in this volume, the examples chosen for quotation being particularly happy. What better illustration of Mozart's method of combining and contrasting subjects could be found than the development section of the first movement of his G minor quintet?

Then comes Beethoven. Of this chapter one can only say that the author has had to pass from the piano trios of Op. 1 to the Choral Symphony in some thirty pages which include quotations, and that he has done so in such a way as to give a glimpse of the work of Beethoven, which is not a catalogue of his compositions but a hint of that extraordinary development which is almost unparalleled in a single life in all artistic history. To do so he employs a striking simile, with a quotation from which I must conclude:

Beethoven's last period is like the second part of Faust. There is no music in the world more difficult to understand, none of which the genius is more unearthly, more superhuman. It contains passages to which we can no more apply our ordinary standards of beauty than we can to the earthquake or the thunderstorm; it contains phrases, like the moments of cynicism in Goethe, which, till we comprehend them better, we can only regard as harsh or grim or crabbed; at times it rises into melody the like of which the world has never known and will never know again.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

FROM Mr. Bertram Dobell, of Charing Cross Road, the editor of the poems of Thomas Traherne which were eagerly welcomed some time ago, we receive news of a scheme he has prepared for publishing by subscription a number of volumes of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century literature. The readers for whom they are intended are the "fit though few." Mr. Dobell will be satisfied with a hundred and fifty subscribers, and the prices are to be low. The proposed books are as follows: "Centuries of Meditation," a prose work by Traherne, of which there will be two editions, one at 7s. 6d. net, uniform with the Poems, and one at 5s. net. If this book is well received, it will be followed by Traherne's "Christian Ethicks." Next comes "The Poems of William Strode" (1602-1644; an almost totally forgotten poet), now first collected from manuscript and printed sources, together with his play entitled The Floating Island, now first reprinted from the only edition (1655). The price of this will not exceed 7s. 6d. net. "Gleanings from Manuscripts," being poems and dramatic works of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries now first printed from manuscripts, most of which are in Mr. Dobell's possession, will consist of three or four volumes, to be issued at intervals of about six months, at not more than 6s. each. The contents will consist partly of unknown poems by unknown or little known poets—Nicholas Oldisworth, M. Johnson, John Champernoune, Sir T. Nevill, J. Warmestrie, Bryan Duppa, Roger Conyers, William King, J. Mason, Sir T. Rowe, Alexander Gill, etc., together with some anonymous pieces; partly of works by well-known poets of which Mr. Dobell possesses manuscripts that differ in interesting details from the accepted texts. He has, for instance, manuscript copies of Spenser's "Mother Hubbard's Tale," and Beaumont's Letter to Ben Jonson, which differ from the printed copies, and the other writers that come under this heading include Alabaster, Herrick, Cartwright, Donne, Carew and Mrs. Katherine Phillips. "The Letters, Speeches and Poems of Sir Nicholas Bacon," now first printed from the original manuscript, will be 7s. 6d. to subscribers; and The Partill Lawe, a tragi-comedie (c. 1620-30), which, Mr. Dobell claims, is an unknown and unprinted play, will be issued in a limited edition at 5s. The plot is founded on the story of Ariosto from which Shakespeare, through Bandello, drew the plot of Much Ado About Nothing.

Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop has written a book on "English Civil Costume," to be issued by Messrs. Black in four sections, which will eventually be combined in one book. The first section, "Early English," is to be published this month, the second, "The Middle Ages," in April. The other two—"Tudor and Stuart" and "Georgian"—will be issued in the autumn. The book is illustrated with colour plates and numerous thumb-sketches in the text.

Mr. John Lane will publish on April 3, "Bombay Ducks," by Douglas Dewar—"an account of some of the everyday birds and beasts found in a naturalist's El Dorado," with numerous illustrations reproduced from photographs by Captain Fayrer. A "Bombay Duck" is a time-honoured expression in India, and Mr. Dewar thinks that as the animals dealt with in his volume are all to be found on the "Bombay Side," they have an equal right with pieces of dried fish to be called "Bombay Ducks." Captain Fayrer's series of remarkable photographs from life should render the work attractive.

"The Life, Letters and Art of Lord Leighton," by Mrs. Russell Barrington, is promised by Mr. George Allen for the autumn. Mrs. Barrington knew Leighton for thirty years, and she has been assisted in her task by his sole executor, by other members of the family and by his brother Academicians and friends. The book will contain the diaries and letters written by Leighton, covering a period of fifty years. There are letters from George Eliot, Ruskin, Browning, Henry Greville and Charles Dickens.

Messrs. Jack are about to publish a series of volumes on the great English poets. Mr. Oliphant Smeaton is to be general editor. Spenser will be dealt with by Mr. W. B. Yeats, the Shelley volume has been assigned to Professor Churton Collins, Herrick to Canon Beeching, Byron to Mr. Charles Whibley, and Browning to Mr. Augustine Birrell; while Professor Saintsbury will be responsible for the volume on Longfellow.

Dr. Douglas Hyde is publishing next week with Mr. T. Fisher Unwin a work on "The Religious Songs of Connacht." The book, which is a companion to Dr. Hyde's "Love Songs of Connacht," is a collection of poems, songs, ranns, charms, prayers, orthas, and curses, with which are interspersed prose stories of saints, miracles, healing-wells, etc., collected during the last twenty-five years from the Irish-speaking natives of Connacht. It is printed in the original Irish on one side of the page with a literal and often also a poetical translation on the other.

Messrs. Sisley announce the publication, on April 12, of a new series of reprints—The Panel Books—the first volumes of which will be "The Memoirs of Count Grammont"; "Don Juan"; "The Life of 'Beau' Nash"; "Silas Marner"; "Decisive Battles of the World," by Sir Edward Creasy; "The Devil on Two Sticks," by Le Sage; "Sheridan's Plays"; and "Oliver Twist." Each volume is to be printed on antique paper, with frontispiece, decorated title-page in colour, end-papers, and full gilt edges.

Probably the first book to be published on the Royal Tour in India will be Mr. G. F. Abbott's "Through India with the Prince," which Mr. Edward Arnold announces for April 6. Mr. Abbott accompanied the Royal Party as Special Correspondent of the Calcutta Statesman.

Bishop Westcott is the subject of the next volume in the series of "Leaders of the Church, 1800-1900," edited by Mr. G. W. E. Russell and published by Messrs. Mowbray. The book will be published immediately after Easter.

On April 2 Mr. Unwin will publish "The Continental Outcast," by Prebendary Carlile, Chief Secretary of the Church Army, and his son, Mr. Victor W. Carlile. The book contains an account of visits paid last summer to the famous Labour Colony of Morxplas in Belgium, and similar institutions in Holland, Germany and Denmark, together with a number of practical suggestions for the improvement of our English methods of dealing with the unemployed, tramps and beggars.

Under the title "Six Years at a Russian Court," Messrs. Hurst and Blackett will publish shortly an interesting book of personal reminiscences by Miss M. Eagar, who had charge of the children of the Czar till the outbreak of the war with Japan, when, suspected of being a Japanese spy, she had to leave St. Petersburg.

Messrs. Frederick W. Wilson and Co. have in the press "Holiday Glasgow: or, Ardkinglas, the City's Highland Estate," by Mr. John Orr, M.A. The book gives a brief description and history, from an early period to the present time, of Glasgow's newly-acquired Highland estate, and shows ways in which this playground of the citizens of St. Mungo may be developed. It will be illustrated by Messrs. J. and A. Kinloch.

Mr. Werner Laurie has in the press a volume entitled "Modern Medicine for the Home," by Dr. Ernest Walker. Dr. Walker's book endeavours to convey to the unskilled reader in a few simple sentences the best way to act in all emergencies.

CORRESPONDENCE

AN EMENDATION OF HERODAS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I distinctly intimated that the ingenious suggestion was not my own. Of course I should not have called it ingenious, had it been my own. I missed Mr. Johnson's paper in the ACADEMY—strangely, because I am a diligent reader of the ACADEMY. The suggestion was communicated to me by a postcard written in Latin by a foreign scholar, who could not remember where he had seen it, and did not claim it as his own. He liked the note and so did I. I think I may claim to have used complete candour in my communication to the ACADEMY.

I know Mr. Johnson to be a masterly writer of Greek and Latin verse. Yet his very obscure Latin joke would seem to show that he does not know the quantity of nātes.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Professor R. Y. Tyrrell writes me: "The note was communicated to me on a postcard by a correspondent, who had forgotten where he saw it. I never saw the papers in ACADEMY to which you refer." I, therefore, begged the doctor's pardon by letter, and do so again now, in your columns, if you are kind enough to publish this.

H. H. JOHNSON.

Rennes University, March 24.

THE EARLY ENGLISH DRAMA SOCIETY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is right that your readers should know that after reading the excellent article in your issue of March 24, I have directed that my name should be removed from the list of "honorary vice-presidents" of the Early English Drama Society.

For my error of judgment in allowing my name to be used I am unable to find any excuse that I can myself regard as completely satisfactory. In partial extenuation, I may say that a portion of Mr. Farmer's edition of Gammer Gurton's Needle, which was sent to me in proof, appeared to me to contain some excellent work. The editor had, if I remember rightly, corrected one or two slight inaccuracies in the text of my own edition of the play, and had discovered some interesting facts which I should have been glad to use in my introduction if I had known them. Although I have no great fondness for modernised texts, I consider that if the series as a whole had been equal to the sample presented to me, the undertaking would have been well deserving of encouragement. I fully admit, however, that before allowing the use of my name in the prospectus I ought to have taken some pains to assure myself that the "Society" had other than a nominal existence.

I may add that I have not seen any of the volumes that have been issued in the name of the "Society."

HENRY BRADLEY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Thank you for your number showing up the Early English Drama Society. I didn't like giving my name to it, but did give it to help Mr. Farmer whom I trusted to print accurate texts. I now withdraw my name, as my friend Dr. H. Bradley does his.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

March 26.

THE DUTCH LANGUAGE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am informed that the ACADEMY recently credited me with disparaging remarks anent the Dutch language. I have not seen the paragraph, but if it said anything of the kind, it committed an utter and complete mistake which has caused unreasonable annoyance in Holland. I do not abuse my native language, and whoever thought he heard me do so must have misunderstood or even "mis-heard" entirely. So entirely, that I should not have reverted to this unimportant incident, had I not been urgently requested to do so.

MAARTEN MAARTENS.

Mentone, March 24.

[We can only express to Mr. Maarten Maartens our sincere regret that he should have been credited in our columns with a remark which he never made. The fact that his countrymen are wonderful linguists remains, though the reason for it given in the paragraph referred to may be untrue.—ED.]

A CURIOSITY OF LITERATURE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The point of the letter from Bacon's Remains in your yesterday's issue is lost by a misprint in the last line. It should read "to be good to concealed poets," and is I think written so in the copy I sent you, but possibly the roughness of my copy led to the error.

March 25.

STRACHAN HOLME.

HOURS WITH RABELAIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am much obliged to you for publishing my letter on "Hours with Rabelais" and replying to it.

I regret, however, that—as it seems—I expressed my meaning so imperfectly. I had not the faintest desire to dispute the indisputable.

In my preface I boast of having expurgated the Master, and I glory in my shame. But when your reviewer implies that everything that is omitted in my selections is omitted because I think it nasty, he inadvertently misrepresents the facts.

To cite an instance—he asks, "Why are we told nothing of Gargantua's games?" The answer is twofold. First, that we are told of them (p. 24); and secondly, that I considered a bare list of two hundred and fourteen games (the meaning of three-fourths of them being quite unknown) was not unlikely to "bore" the general reader. Again, to say that I try to prove Rabelais "a teetotaler" because I omit, for brevity, a passage in Book iii., and not to state that I give the glorious praise of wine (Prol. Bk. i.) in its entirety, is, to say the least of it, misleading.

F. G. STOKES.

March 26.

[We are quite willing to believe that to remove "grossness" was not Mr. Stokes's sole object in omitting large portions of Rabelais's works; but that does not alter our opinion that no fair idea of Rabelais can be gained from the study of selections.—ED.]

THINGS IN GENERAL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the discussion as to the respective merits of Wordsworth and Shelley, the latter is seriously handicapped, because the advocates of Wordsworth can produce more tit-bits. This method of criticism might also be applied to art. For instance you could point to a hundred little gems of imitative art in Gerard Dow's pictures, and say: "Can you find such a number of beautiful things in Rembrandt's works?" Ergo —. Shelley is also handicapped by the fact that Palgrave was of a sentimental temperament, and hence in his collection of tit-bits he paid twice as much attention to Wordsworth as to Shakespeare. For Palgrave to get Tennyson to assist him in compiling the "Golden Treasury," was very much like Rossetti asking Burne-Jones to help him in the selection of some modern pictures for a public gallery, or like Bradshaw seeking the aid of Cromwell in the preparation of a history of the Stuarts. In poetry and painting, where all opinions do not converge, as in respect to Shakespeare and Raphael, criticism is much a matter of temperament. The people who favour Browning also hold fast by Whistler. Both are high priests of the inexplicable. The followers of Wordsworth are also the followers of the manufacturing and the sentimental artists; the former represented by Metsu, Dow, and Mieris, and the latter by those of the moderns who paint pictures of "The Last Rose of Summer," or of animals with human eyes expressing human emotions. But it is as a manufacturer that Wordsworth was supreme. He even wrote a sonnet on the sonnet, to express the difficulty of making one. Dow showed the difficulty of painting, by taking three days to paint a broom handle, but it was a perfect broom-handle. Wordsworth could describe a valley so that you could not possibly mistake it for anything else, even if he did not mention that it was a valley. Pope set himself on a pedestal of sentiment when he was young, but he jumped off when he grew up, and was proud of the feat. Wordsworth on the contrary, put a flagstaff on his pedestal, and died on the top of it. I should like to say a lot more, but then some one might accuse me of not being a critic, and compel me to refer to Mr. Ashton's reply to the cabman. This reminds me of an instance which I culled from an Australian paper some years ago, where a somewhat similar observation and retort were made. It seems that in the 'eighties one of the members of the South Australian Parliament was Mr. Patrick Cogle, who was chiefly remarkable for the great number of long words he used in his political addresses. One day during a heated debate in Committee, an opponent of Mr. Cogle remarked of him: "He calls himself a gentleman, and can't spell the words he speaks." To this came the immediate reply: "I didn't call myself a gentleman, but whatever I am, I am not an assimilator of paradoxical incongruities," referring to the partiality of his adversary for mixed metaphor.

MAN IN THE STREET.

Florence, March 12.

UNIVERSITY POETS AND NOVELISTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It seems a pity that your remarks should be based on data so imperfect. One can hardly accept as representative of Cambridge a list which omits: Wyatt, Gascoigne, Day of the exquisite "Parliament," the dramatist Fletcher, the Spenserian Giles Fletcher (known to Milton at any rate), the Platonist More, Cleveland, Buller (?), "Rehearsal" Buckingham, the maligned Shadwell, Cumberland, and Smart; and among translators (if Cary is to swell the Oxford list) Fairfax, Broome and Fenton. Of course, there are omissions in your Oxford list, but I doubt whether Cambridge has cause to fear an exhaustive comparison.

Among Cambridge novelists the following writers should have been included—Marion Crawford (cf. his "Tale of a Lonely Parish"), Max Pemberton, Hugh Benson, Anstey of the not unknown "Vice Versa" and "Giant's Robe," and Henty (since you rank Hughes as a novelist).

The main fact which emerges is that Oxford has produced but one poet (Shelley), and no novelist of absolutely the first rank. And the plangent poverty of her case is not bettered by placing Matthew Arnold and William Morris beside Spenser and Milton, or Reade and Blackmore in the same "class" as Sterne and Thackeray.

V.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Isherwood, Grace. Monumental Brasses in the Bedfordshire Churches. With illustrations drawn by Kitty Isherwood from rubbings by the authoress. 9x5½. Pp. 68. Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.

[The parishes are arranged alphabetically, and a brief account of existing brasses given under each, with a short introduction. 8 Plates.]

The Cathedrals of England and Wales: their history, architecture and associations. With a series of Rembrandt Plates and many illustrations in the text. Part I. 11½x8½. Pp. 32. Cassell, 7d. net.

[The first number of a new enterprise, to be complete in about twenty-four fortnightly parts. This part deals with Canterbury and begins York Minster. The frontispiece is a fine "Rembrandt" reproduction of a photograph of Canterbury Cathedral, and there are forty-two other illustrations and plans, many of them full-page. The letter-press is interesting and the whole promises a very good popular work.]

Rembrandt: A Memorial. Part II. 14½x10½. Pp. 4. 7 Plates. Heinemann, 2s. 6d. net.

[See the ACADEMY for March 24, p. 294. The plates in this number are Study of a Couchant Lion (Lord Brownlow); Life Study of a Young Man (Bibl. Nat., Paris); Portrait of a Woman Seated (Heseltine); Portrait of Rembrandt (Liechtenstein); Portrait of Saskia (Cassel); The Night Watch (Rijksmuseum); Portrait of a Rabbi (Buckingham Palace).

Atlay, J. B. The Victorian Chancellors. In two vols. Vol. i, with Portraits 9x6½. Pp. xi, 466. Smith, Elder, 14s. net.

[Contains Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, Lord Cottenham and Lord Truro.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Lubbock, Percy. Elizabeth Barrett Browning in her Letters. 7½x5½. Pp. 382. Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net. (See p. 305.)

Home Life with Herbert Spencer. By Two. 7½x5. Pp. 234. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 3s. 6s.

[Details of Spencer's domestic life by two ladies with whom he lived for some years.]

DRAMA.

Welcker, Adair. A Dream of Realms Beyond us. 9x5½. Pp. 39=78. Ninth separate American edition. San Francisco, 214 Pine Street. 40s.

EDUCATION.

Boyer, Paul and Spéranski, N. Russian Reader, adapted for English-speaking Students by Samuel Northrup Harper. 9½x6½. Pp. x, 386. Luzac, 13s. 6d.

[For students who have some elementary knowledge of Russian grammar and pronunciation: its object being to present a faithful and adequate picture of spoken Russian. The readings are all from Tolstoy, and all but one from his stories written for children. Very full grammatical notes; appendix of commentary; Index and Vocabulary. Mr. Harper has had the assistance of Mr. Ellis H. Minns, Russian Lecturer at Pembroke College, Cambridge.]

Boyer, Paul, and Spéranski N. Manuel pour l'étude de la Langue Russe. 9½x6½. Pp. xiv, 386. Paris: Colin, 10fr.

[This is the original of the English edition preceding.]

Herodotus IV. Melpomene. Edited by E. S. Shuckburgh. 6½x4½. Pp. xxiii, 315. Cambridge University Press: The Pitt Press Series, 4s.

[Prepared on the same plan as the other books of Herodotus published by Dr. Shuckburgh about fifteen years ago. Introduction, historical and geographical; Notes on the text; Text; Notes, grammatical and interpretative; historical and geographical Index; Index.]

Tebbutt, J. H. The Education Imbroglio: An easy way out of it. 7½x5. Pp. viii, 93. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s. net.

[A plea for simplification, centralisation and religious teaching, including a scheme for the management of all schools on simple lines.]

Who built our Schools? Words to Mothers. By a Mother. 6½x4½. Pp. 31. S.P.C.K., 1d.

FICTION.

"Q." The Mayor of Troy. Second Impression. 7½x5. Pp. 300. Methuen, 6s.

Benson, E. F. The Angel of Pain. 7½x5½. Pp. 340. Heinemann, 6s. Jones, Constance Evan. A Matter of Temperament. 7½x5½. Pp. 319. Nisbet, 6s.

Wallace, Helen. Hasty Fruit. 7½x5½. Pp. 253. Elliot Stock, 6s.

Mack, Louise (Mrs. Creed). Children of the Sun. 7½x5. Pp. 302. Melrose, 6s.

Galsworthy, John. The Man of Property. 7½x5½. Pp. 376. Heinemann, 6s. (See p. 310.)

Gallon, Tom. Jimmy Quizote. 5½x8. Pp. 344. Hurst and Blackett, 6s.

Boothby, Guy. The Race of Life. 5½x7½. Pp. 352. Ward, Lock, 5s.

Grey, Cyril. A Manse Kose. 7½x5½. Pp. 258. Cassell.

Bell, Lillian. Caroline Lee. 7½x5½. Pp. 352. Boston: Page.

HISTORY.

Gale, F. Holderness. The Story of Protestantism. 8x5½. Pp. 344. Cassell, 6s.

[A history of the Reformation based on the late Dr. J. A. Wylie's "History of Protestantism," but embodying results of the researches of the thirty years that have elapsed since that author's death.]

LITERATURE.

Descriptive Catalogue of Books in the Lending Department at the Borough of Hampstead Central Library. Compiled and annotated by W. E. Doubleday. 9½x6½. Pp. xxii, 517. Published at the Central Public Library, Finchley Road, 2s. 6d. (to borrowers and ratepayers, 1s.) (See p. 317.)

MILITARY.

Ottley, Brevet-Major, W. J. With Mounted Infantry in Tibet. With portraits, illustrations and plans. 8½x6. Pp. xiii, 275. Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.

[The Tibet Mission is the first occasion on which Native Mounted Infantry have been employed on active service on or beyond the Indian frontier in Asia. The regiments employed were the 32nd Sikh Pioneers (Major Ottley's regiment), the 23rd Sikh Pioneers, and the 8th Gurkha Rifles. Appendices, including General Macdonald's Report. No Index.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Historic Dress, 1607 to 1800. With an introductory chapter on dress in the Spanish and French Settlements in Florida and Louisiana. By Elizabeth McClellan. Illustrated in colour, pen and ink, and wash drawings by Sophie B. Steel. Together with reproductions from photographs of rare portraits, garments, etc. 11½x8½. Pp. 407. Lane, 42s. net.

[Index and a glossary.]

Hocking, William John. Catalogue of the Coins, Tokens, Medals, Dies and Seals in the Museum of the Royal Mint. Vol. i. Coins and Tokens. 10x6½. Pp. viii, 460. Printed for H.M. Stationery office. London: Wyman; Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd; Dublin: Ponsonby. 10s.

[The contents of the Museum at the Mint, which began to be formed nearly a century ago, were re-housed and re-arranged about four years ago; and this Catalogue has been prepared by the Assistant-Superintendent of the Operative Department. Much new knowledge is included, especially in reference to British Colonial coinages. Roman coins struck in Britain are added. Brief historical notes and memoranda are given after each coin, and there are appendices of tables on Maundy Money and an alphabetical list of coin-legends or mottoes with translations. Index.]

Science in Public Affairs. Edited by the Rev. J. E. Hand. 7½x5½. Pp. 291. Allen, 5s. net.

[Preface by the Right Hon. R. B. Haldane. Papers on Science and Physical Development; Science and City Suburbs; Science in National Education; Science and Colonial Development; Science and Industry; Science and Administration; and Science and Citizenship. Index.]

Martin, Cecil A. "Without Prejudice": or, the case for foreign Missions simply stated. 6½x4½. Pp. iv, 95. S.P.C.K., 6d.

Representative Church Council. Report of Proceedings: Sessions November 22, 23, and 24, 1905. 8½x5½. Pp. 73. S.P.C.K., 6d.

Vaughan, John. The Wild Flowers of Selborne, and other Papers. 7½x5½. Pp. 247. Lane, 5s. net.

[Papers reprinted from Longmans, The Cornhill, Temple Bar and other monthlies.]

Tolstoy, Leo. The One Thing Needful. Pp. 55. A Great Iniquity. Pp. 39. Each 7½x5. The Free Age Press (Thomas Laurie), each 4d. net.

[Both translated by V. Tchertkoff and I. F. Mayo, with a note in each by the latter. The frontispieces are two portraits of Tolstoy.]

The Shire and Cart Horse: Their points, defects and ages. By a Veterinary Surgeon. The Hackney Roadster or Harness Horse: points, defects, and age. Illustrated. By a Veterinary Surgeon. Each 4½x4½. R. A. Everett, The Equine Series, 1s. net each.

[Each a single large sheet folded in a cover.]

Barton, F. T. The Horse-buyer's Guide. 8½x5½. Pp. 32. R. A. Everett, 1s. 6d. net.

NATURAL HISTORY.

The Fauna of British India, including Ceylon and Burma. Edited by Lt.-Col. C. T. Bingham, and published under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Rhynchota.—Vol. iii. (Heteroptera—Homoptera), by W. L. Distant. 9½x5½. Pp. xiv, 503. Taylor & Francis, 20s.

[The first volume of this series to be published since the death of Dr. Blandford, its original editor. Carries the account of the Rhynchota to the end of Fulgoridæ. Illustrated. Indexes, systematic and alphabetical.]

PHILOSOPHY.

Husik, Isaac. Judah Messer Leon's Commentary on the "Vetus Logica", a study based on three MSS. with a glossary of Hebrew Logical and Philosophical terms. 9½x6½. Pp. ix, 118. Leyden: late E. J. Brill, m. 6.

[Messer Leon was an Italian Jew of the fifteenth century, one of the last of the Averroists and of the mediæval Jewish philosophers. His commentary on Aristotle's work was based on a Hebrew Text. The basis of Dr. Husik's book was his dissertation in the University of Pennsylvania, 1903.]

POETRY.

Granville, Charles. Broken Lights. 7x4½. Pp. 48. Basle: Tanner, n.p.

[The longest poem describes the passage of the author's mind from Christianity through a kind of Pantheism to belief in a future state and a beneficent Creator. The verse is often good, and some of the shorter lyrics very charming, if not free from obvious blemishes.]

The Rush-Light. By Seosamb mac Cathmhaoil. 7½x6. Pp. 66. Dublin: Maunsell, 2s. 6d. net.

- Gibson, Elizabeth. A Little Book of Saints. 6 x 3½. Pp. 21. Fiffeld. Cyrus, the Great King. An historical romance. By Sir Edward Durand. 8½ x 7½. Pp. 395. Appleton, 10s. 6d. net.
- Holden, E. M. Argemone. 7 x 5. Pp. 46. Fiffeld, 9d. net.
- Doughty, Charles M. The Dawn in Britain. Volumes i. and ii. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 450. Duckworth, 4s. 6d. net. per vol.
- Ingleby, Holcombe. Poems and Plays. 9 x 6. Pp. 580. Kegan Paul, 7s. 6d. net.
- A Southern Flight*. By Frank Dempster Sherman and Clinton Scollard. 8 x 5½. Pp. lix. Clinton, N.Y.: Browning, $1.25 net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Hindu Manners, Customs, and Ceremonies*. By the Abbé J. A. Dubois. Translated from the Author's later French MS. and edited, with notes, corrections, and a biography, by Henry K. Beauchamp. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xxiv, 741. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 6s. net.
- [Third edition. Prefatory note by the Rt. Hon. F. Max Müller, portrait of Dubois and full index.]
- White, the Rev. Gilbert. The Natural History of Selborne. Re-arranged and classified under subjects by Charles Mosley. 7½ x 5½. Pp. vii, 266. Elliot Stock, 6s. net.
- [The original letters are cut up and distributed, still in chronological order, under subject headings, e.g. Meteorology, Birds, etc. The frontispiece is reproduced from that of the first edition. Index.]
- The Song of Songs*. A lyrical folk-play of the ancient Hebrews, arranged in seven scenes by Francis Courts. With illustrations by Henry Osipov. Flowers of Parnassus series. 5½ x 4½. Pp. 65. Lane, 1s. net.
- Laws for the Million*, by a practical lawyer. Second edition. 8 x 5½. Pp. 288. The News of the World office and Simpkin, Marshall, 1s. 6d. net.
- [A legal handbook containing information required for ordinary purposes. The subjects are arranged in alphabetical order. Index.]
- Neale, the late Rev. J. M. Hymns for the Sick; a reprint of the edition of 1849. 5½ x 4½. Pp. 64. S.P.C.K., 6d.
- Anstey, F. The Brass Bottle. Fourth impression. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. The Waterloo Library. Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d.

SCIENCE.

- Noteworthy Families (Modern Science)*. "An index to kinships in near degrees between persons whose achievements are honourable, and have been publicly recorded." By Francis Galton and Edgar Schuster. Vol. i. of the Publications of the Eugenics Record Office of the University of London. 9 x 5½. Pp. xlii, 96. Murray, 6s. net.
- Bigg, Heather. An Essay on the General Principles of the Treatment of Spinal Curvatures. Illustrated by the author's photographs and sketches. 9 x 6. Pp. 240. Churchill, n.p.
- [Sections: I, Primary Principles and Definitions; II, Evolution of the Principles of Treatment, 400 B.C. to 1800 A.D.; III, Evolution of Appliances for Treatment, 1768 to 1870; IV, Adjunctive Treatments at 1870; V, Author's own Methods of Treatment, 1870 to 1905; VI, A Review of other Methods of Treatment, 1870 to 1905; VII, A Particular Analysis of the Gymnastic Treatment. Dr. Heather Bigg is the champion of the mechanical treatment.]
- Hall, A. The Turn of the Tide. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 4. Printed by Harbert & Mizen, 17 Crouch Hill, N. n.p.
- [Astronomical Leaflets, No. 5. With the leaflet comes a card bearing a "Simplified Calendar" for any year. Mr. Hall gives us a thirteenth month, "Christember"; each of his months has twenty-eight days; New Year's Day is called "Alpha" and not counted; and once in four years comes "Omega," or Leap-Year's Day. The plan is certainly simple.]

THEOLOGY.

- Inge, William Ralph. Studies of English Mystics. St. Margaret's Lectures, 1905. 8½ x 5½. Pp. vi, 239. Murray, 6s. net.
- Saint Mary the Virgin*. By René-Marie de la Broise. Translated by Harold Gidney. The Saints series. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xiv, 265. Duckworth, 3s.
- [Under three aspects: the historical events of Mary's life; her mind and inner life; the part assigned to her in the divine scheme of the Incarnation and Redemption.]
- "Z." A Soul's Wayfaring: a series of interviews with "Romanus" formerly an Anglican rector. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 299. Bristol: Arrowsmith. n.p.
- [Romanus, now a Roman priest, is interviewed by Z, the reporter of the Psychological Examiner, and recounts his passage from Protestantism to Roman Catholicism.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Aubin, Eugène. Morocco of To-day. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 399. Dent, 6s. net.
- [Crowned by the French Academy. The book consists of letters written by M. Aubin partly under canvas in the course of his wanderings in Morocco, and partly in an orange-garden at Fez. Two maps and index.]
- Crooke, William. Things Indian. Being discursive notes on various subjects connected with India. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 546. Murray, 12s. net.
- [One of the series of books which includes Dr. Ball's "Things Chinese" and Professor Chamberlain's "Things Japanese." The author deals only with quaint things and customs which are not specially considered in books of reference.]
- Belloc, H. Esto Perpetua: Algerian Studies and Impressions. 7½ x 5½. Pp. viii, 191. Duckworth, 5s. net.
- [Illustrated by the author with little sketches and one water-colour.]
- The Story of Brussels*. By Ernest Gilliat-Smith. Illustrated by Katharine Kimball and Guv Gilliat-Smith. 7 x 4½. Pp. 383. Mediæval Towns series. Dent, 4s. 6d. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

Admissions and Asides, by A. St. John Adcock (Elkin Mathews 1s. 6d. net). Mr. Adcock says in one of his admissions: "We grow to love our enemies when they become old enemies. They have all the glamour of our early years about them, and when they die we feel as if we were the poorer by a friend." And in one of his asides: "It is only after a man has used up his stock of dreams that he becomes a pessimist. If I could have my way in life, I would live young for eighty years, and then die suddenly of my first grey hair." In "Admissions and Asides" there are some descents into platitudes which the author avoided entirely in his "London Etchings"; but it is the work of an essayist with the charm of a poet and the wit and sense of a delightful prose-writer.

A Memoir of Archbishop Markham, 1719-1807. By his great-grandson Sir Clements Markham. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s.) The Markham family is happy in having its records so carefully preserved by one of its most distinguished members, the late President of the Geographical Society, who has now written a life of the Archbishop of York, the father of that Admiral whose life was published some twenty years ago under the title of "A Naval Career during the Old War." The life of a man who was born in 1719, was headmaster of Westminster, Dean of Christ Church, Bishop of Chester, preceptor to the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York, who as Archbishop of York was accused in the House of Lords, by Chatham, of preaching the doctrines of Atterbury and Sacheverell, was the friend of Warren Hastings, and had to run before the Gordon rioters with his purple covered by a layman's greatcoat, was certainly worth the telling. Sir Clements Markham was the obvious person to do it, and we can complain of nothing except that he gives no index to the book and for frontispiece reproduces one of the less pleasing portraits of his ancestor. Dr. Markham was the last but one of the "prince archbishops," and his family of thirteen was one of which a prince might be proud. His eldest son was secretary to Warren Hastings, the second was First Sea Lord of the Admiralty, another was Dean of York, another Archdeacon, another was killed in a gallant assault on Port-au-Prince. There is certainly reason for his numerous descendants of the present generation to cherish the memory of this patriarch. He has been called pompous by one writer, but he lived in an age of pomposity, and the epithet seems quite inappropriately applied to an Archbishop who was willing to make up a set to dance reels with his children. It has been said that he showed a partiality for his father's profession of the army, but even so it could not have been said of him, as it was said of a certain Bishop of London, that he was fitter to be a bombardier than a bishop. It is interesting to note that Dr. Markham's tastes were extremely varied, and Dr. Parr left it on record that one of the Archbishop's discourses on a geographical subject was "so able, so instructive, and so elegant both in thought and language" that it was thought worthy to be printed. Sir Clements might object if the epithet "elegant" were applied to his own geographical work, but here is at any rate a splendid case of a gift inherited in the third generation.

Catalogue of Modern Etchings and Aquatints of the British and American Schools in the National Art Library, Victoria and Albert Museum. (H.M. Stationery Office, 2s. 6d.) This useful catalogue, like the preceding volume devoted to the foreign etchings, has been compiled by Mr. Martin Hardie. Only original work is included. The term "modern" is not defined, but the period covered seems, practically, to begin with the nineteenth century. We notice, however, that Angelica Kauffman is included, though the date of her latest etching is 1780. We wish Mr. Hardie had been at a little more pains to ascertain the date of birth in the case of living artists; many such dates not yet included in the dictionaries could easily have been ascertained from the artists themselves or, in the case of Knights and Academicians, such an accessible source as "Who's Who." Philip Hermogenes Calderon is entered as if still living. The name of Mr. Frank Laing does not occur in the present volume, but we found him banished to the foreign schools as the penalty of publishing a plate in Austria. For the arrangement of the catalogue itself we have nothing but praise. Such publications as "English Etchings," "The Etcher" and "The Etching Club" are briefly described under the general heading, and their contents are then given in detail under each artist's name. There is no reference, however, on either system to Messrs. Macmillan's publication, "The Artist Engraver" (1904), which can hardly have been excluded from the library. Proofs of Mr. Strang's etchings in Belgium are catalogued separately, but it is not stated that they belong to Mr. Binyon's "Western Flanders." The catalogue shows that the South Kensington collection is fairly large and representative and contains many valuable things, though it follows from the constitution of the library that etchings published in sets or in book form predominate largely over the single pieces which very often show the artist at his best.

From the Hampstead Central Public Library—where, by the way, there is a capital Reference room—we have received an excellent catalogue of books in the Lending department: some eighteen thousand. The catalogue consists of five hundred and eighteen pages, including an appendix of books added ("The Portreeve," "The New Thackeray Sketch Book," and "The Major of Troy" among the number!) while the work was in the Press, and a list of magazines, reviews, etc., which may be seen in the Reading rooms. Volumes are entered under author, title and subject, and to the majority descriptive notes are added defining the scope and aim of the book and the author's standpoint. We have tested several of these and find them, for the most part, sufficient, and accurate and trustworthy. The catalogue has been compiled and annotated by Mr. W. E. Doubleday and his staff, and furnishes a good example of the care and industry with which our public libraries are conducted.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO
Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered
gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-P
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

THE CLERGY LIST for 1906

Thoroughly Revised and Corrected to the latest Date.

Price 12s. 6d. Now Ready.

THE TIMES says: "The 63rd issue of Kelly's Clergy List for 1905 is well up to the standard of this very useful hand-book."

THE ATHENÆUM says: "The Clergy List for 1905 (Kelly's Directories) is an admirably complete and accurate record."

THE WORLD says: "The Clergy List for 1905 maintains its reputation."

TRUTH says: "The new edition of Kelly's Clergy List, just to hand, makes an invaluable addition to my books of reference. During the year I am frequently indebted to this publication for the completeness, the accuracy, and the admirable arrangement of its information."

THE YORKSHIRE POST says: "The Clergy List for 1905 is a carefully compiled volume."

THE GRAPHIC says: "The Clergy List for 1905 is as trustworthy and accurate as its predecessors."

ESTABLISHED OVER SIXTY YEARS.

London: KELLY'S DIRECTORIES, Ltd., 182-184 High Holborn.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER

No. 350. APRIL.

The Future of Anglo-German Relations: A Reply to Lord Avebury. By J. ELLIS BARKER

Is the British Empire Safe?—A Note on National Service. By Sir ROBERT GIFFEN, K.C.B.

Parliamentary Procedure:
(1) By THOMAS BURT, M.P.
(2) By FREDERIC HARRISON

Enlargement of the House of Commons (with Plan and View). By the Late CHARLES BARRY, F.R.S., F.R.I.B.A.

Wanted! an End to Political Patronage. By J. HENNIKER HEATON, M.P.

Chinese Labour in the Transvaal: A Justification. By Sir WILLIAM DES VŒUX, G.C.M.G.

The Chinese Army. By the Rev. E. J. HARDY (Late Chaplain to H.M. Forces, Hong Kong)

Admiralty Policy and the New Naval Estimates. By Sir WILLIAM H. WHITE, K.C.B. (late Director of Naval Construction)

My Grandfather's Reminiscences of Eton. By the Right Hon. LORD MONSON.

Some Recent Books. By WALTER FREWEN LORD

The Papal Attack on France. By ROBERT DELL

The New Fire-Protection for London. By A. MARYON WATSON, A.R.I.B.A.

The Insularity of the English: A Colonial View. By ARTHUR H. ADAMS

Education for Country Children. By R. G. WILBERFORCE

The Government and the Empire. By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart.

The Political Situation. By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD.,
5 NEW STREET SQUARE

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 15s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PRE-PAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Publishers' Media.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes.
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of All Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W. C.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."
Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co.,
57A Coleman Street, London, E.C.
Special Rates for a Series will be quoted.

Ask for the April Book Monthly 6d. net

The BOOK MONTHLY is a beautifully illustrated Record, Guide, and Magazine for everybody interested in books. It gives full information about coming books, and a careful, classified catalogue of those published during the previous month, besides a variety of articles on current books and literary subjects. To the General Reader, wishing guidance as to the new books of the day, the BOOK MONTHLY is especially valuable. It is published at the beginning of each month, price 6d. net, by Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., 4 Stationers' Hall Court, E.C.

Back Numbers are still available, and a Specimen copy will be sent free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

MEMOIRS OF ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE.

By SEVEN FRIENDS.
Edited by E. G. SANDFORD,
Archdeacon of Exeter.

With Photogravure and other Illustrations.
In 2 vols. 8vo, 36s. net.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

BY
WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL, M.P.
With Portraits. In 2 vols. demy 8vo, 36s. net.

HENRY SIDGWICK

A MEMOIR.

By A. S. and E. M. S. With Portraits.
8vo, 12s. 6d. net

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"A journal intime of profound interest, presented with the utmost skill and discretion by the two biographers."

NERO.

By STEPHEN PHILLIPS. Crown 8vo,
4s. 6d. net.

Second Part Now Ready.

THE DYNASTS.

A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars, in 3 Parts, 19 Acts, 130 Scenes.

By THOMAS HARDY.

PART SECOND. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.
* * Previously published, Part I. 4s. 6d. net.

GUARDIAN.—"Unquestionably an exceedingly remarkable and powerful piece of work, as full of ideality as it is of storm and stress, and it is impossible not to delight in the consummate artistic skill with which the poet has treated the most striking episodes of the great war."

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE SOUL OF A PEOPLE."

A PEOPLE AT SCHOOL.

By H. FIELDING HALL. 8vo, 10s. net.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"For completeness of knowledge, sympathetic insight, kindly humour, and vivacity of style it is unique of its kind, and we may safely say that no better book has ever been written about Burma."

EVERSLEY SERIES.—New Vol.

A MEMOIR OF JANE AUSTEN.

By her Nephew, J. E. AUSTEN LEIGH. To which is added "Lady Susan," and Fragments of two other Unfinished Tales by Miss Austen.
Globe 8vo, 4s. net.

MEDIÆVAL RHODESIA.

By DAVID RANDALL-MACIVER, M.A., F.R.G.S. Fully illustrated. Demy 4to, 20s. net.

DAILY NEWS.—"Dr. Maciver has placed the whole matter on a different footing than it had before he began his fruitful investigations. . . This copiously and beautifully illustrated volume is not the least noteworthy result of the late visit of the British Association to South Africa."

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual subscription, 16s.
The APRIL Number Contains:—

A WEEK AT WATERLOO. Scenes During and After the Battle. The Remarkable Narrative of Lady De Lancey, wife of Colonel Sir William H. De Lancey, of Wellington's Staff, now brought to Light. With hitherto unpublished letters from Sir Walter Scott and Charles Dickens.

HISTORIC PALACES OF PARIS. IV. Hotel de La Rochefoucauld - Doudeauville. By Camille Grankowski. Pictures by Andre Castaigne, Jules Guerin, and Harry Fenn.

And Numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CADBURY'S COCOA

"Has stood the test of Time"

"The good old English Cocoa"

CADBURY'S
COCOA ESSENCE
REGISTERED
Guaranteed Absolutely Pure Cocoa

Absolutely Pure therefore Best.

Sold only in Tins & Packets.

CADBURY'S
COCOA ESSENCE
REGISTERED
GUARANTEED TO BE GENUINE COCOA

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1770

APRIL 7, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

ELDER GIRLS.—London.—Mrs. POOLE, King's Hill, Dursley, Gloucestershire, warmly recommends a LADY, who receives FOUR GIRLS for finishing lessons and masters, with whom her nieces are now studying. Address as above.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL. See Staff (housersmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

SEDBERGH SCHOOL SCHOLARSHIPS, 1906.

SIX ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, varying in value from £50 to £25 per annum, will be OFFERED for COMPETITION on April 25 and 26.—For particulars apply to the HEAD-MASTER, Sedbergh, R.S.O., Yorkshire.

Sale by Auction

The Library of the late Rev. W. BEGLEY, M.A. of Greencroft Gardens, N.W., formerly of East Hyde Vicarage, Luton, Beds.

MESSRS. SOTHEY, WILKINSON & HODGE will SELL by AUCTION at their House, No. 13 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C., on THURSDAY, April 19, 1906, and Two following Days, at 1 o'clock precisely, the LIBRARY of the late Rev. W. BEGLEY, M.A., of Greencroft Gardens, N.W., formerly of East Hyde Vicarage, Luton, Beds., comprising rare Chronogrammatic, Anagrammatic, and Epigrammatic Books and Tracts, and other Singular Literary Productions—interesting and scarce Works on Witchcraft, Sorcery, Demonomania, Alchemy, and other Occult Subjects—Writings of Ultra-Religious Sect Founders—Original Documents by and connected with Joanna Southcott, Mormonism, Swedenborgianism, Quakerism, Anabaptists, Millenarians, Spiritualists, etc.—Collections of Ex-Libris—Early Printed Books—a large number of Scarce Tracts, Manuscripts, etc.

May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

GLAISHER'S
Remainder Book Catalogue.
APRIL SUPPLEMENT NOW READY.
Comprising all most recent Purchases.

WILLIAM GLAISHER,
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
263 High Holborn, London.
Also Catalogue of Popular Current Literature, and New List of French Novels, Classics, etc.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.
School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

HERALDRY, THE ART OF, by A. C. Fox-Davies, folio, bound in buckram, 106 full-page Illustrations in Colour, and 1100 Text Illustrations; only 700 printed. Offered at £6 6s. Published by Jack, 1904.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

TO BOOKBUYERS and Librarians of Free Libraries.—The April Catalogue of valuable Second-Hand Works and New Remainders, offered at prices greatly reduced, is now ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net, for 35s., 1902-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

LITERARY MEN and others DESIRING RETIREMENT in quiet and comfortable quarters in a picturesque country town, bracing air and pretty country, 1½ hours from London, apply Crown Hotel, Brackley, Northants.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LTD.

Every month MUDIE'S publish a fresh list (classified and annotated) of their English and Foreign Surplus Books and New Remainders. The list contains popular works on Travel, Sport, Army and Navy, Biography, Theology, Arts, Philosophy, Economics, and Fiction.

List sent post free on application.

30-34 NEW OXFORD ST.; 48 QUEEN VICTORIA ST.
241 BROMPTON ROAD, LONDON.

STORY-WRITING, ARTICLE-WRITING, VERSE-COMPOSITION.—YOUNG WRITERS should send stamped envelope for full prospectus of "LITERARY TUITION per post."—Address Professor HARRIS-BICKFORD, Redruth (England). * * * Long and short works criticised, corrected, and commented on, privately, for press. Literary advice.—(Mention ACADEMY.)

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. rod. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING WANTED.—MSS. and all Literary work executed accurately and promptly. 10d. per 1000 words. Carbon copies.—Mrs. BRAMBLES, 26 Clarence Road, Windsor.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TO AUTHORS.—ISABEL H. CAINE (Certificated Cambridge) undertakes all descriptions of TYPING at 9d. per 1000 words; with Carbon Duplicate, 1s. Excellent references.—The Hollies, Durrington, Worthing.

AUTHORS having MSS. typed at Miss LONGLEY'S, 467 Mansion House Chambers, 20 Bucklersbury, E.C., at 10d. per 1000 words, receive carbon copy free. Established 10 years.

Art

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

TO ARTISTS AND DESIGNERS.—A PRIZE of £10 is OFFERED for the BEST IDEA for a POSTER advertising RAY'S SOAP and BLUE.—For particulars apply MANAGER, Rays Co., Cyfarthfa Street, Cardiff.

THE PANEL-BOOKS

are a series of sumptuous Classics de Luxe produced with care and artistic taste. They are books that will grace your bookshelf or table, and that you can handle and read with real delight. As their name implies, they are of a handy panel shape. Richly bound and printed in large clear type, on permanent antique paper with ample margins, THE PANEL-BOOKS recall the charming editions of the Eighteenth Century; and every accessory to a good book which the book-lover appreciates is to be found in this new series—a frontispiece, decorated title-page in colours, tastefully ornamented end-papers, silk book-mark, gilt-edges, embossed and 22-carat gold stamped cover, and, what is an entirely new departure, giving an added distinction to the series—a specially designed Heraldic Book-Plate is affixed to the inside of each cover. On this the owner of the book can inscribe his or her name. The book-plate, end-papers, decorations, cover and title-page, have been designed for THE PANEL-BOOKS by Mr. Edgar Wilson.

¶ From this short description it will be seen that THE PANEL-BOOKS have a character of their own. Elegant in format, tasteful to look upon, with paper and type that are restful to the eye, they are ideal companions for the spare hour at home or on travel—books you want to live with on terms of intimacy; books that are beautiful in every sense of the word.

¶ The titles chosen for THE PANEL-BOOKS are of infinite variety to please differing tastes. Fiction, Memoirs, Poetry, History, Biography, Folk-Lore, Choice Extracts, the Drama, Humour, Travel, Devotion—all find a place in the new series. For example, these are the first books.

THE MEMOIRS OF COUNT GRAMMONT.

By ANTHONY HAMILTON.

DON JUAN. By Lord BYRON.

THE LIFE OF "BEAU" NASH. By OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

SILAS MARNER. By GEORGE ELIOT.

DECISIVE BATTLES OF THE WORLD. By Sir EDWARD CREASY.

THE DEVIL ON TWO STICKS. By ALAIN RENÉ LE SAGE.

SHERIDAN'S PLAYS. By RICHARD BRINSLEY SHERIDAN.

OLIVER TWIST. By CHARLES DICKENS.

¶ As to the price of THE PANEL-BOOKS, for a series of such exceptional quality it is extremely low. Bound in Art Vellum, embossed and stamped in 22-carat gold, with full gilt-edges, it is 2s. 6d. net for each volume; in Half Leather, 3s. net; in Full Lamb-skin, 3s. 6d. net; and in Real Persian Leather, 5s. net. The bindings in each style are rich, ornate, and in superb taste.

¶ Most booksellers keep a stock of THE PANEL-BOOKS, and every bookseller can obtain them for you. If you want to build up a choice library that will give you pleasure for years to come you should commence collecting THE PANEL-BOOKS at once.

May we send you a full Prospectus free?

SISLEY'S, LTD., 9 DUKE STREET, CHARING CROSS, LONDON.

LONDON LIBRARY

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING. President—The Right. Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P. Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; GEORGE MEREDITH, Esq.; ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Esq., F.R.S. Trustees—EARL of ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; HENRY YATES THOMPSON, Esq.

Committee—Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., LL.D., Dr. J. H. Bridges, Horace T. Brown, Esq., F.R.S., Prof. Ingram Bywater, Prof. Lewis Campbell, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Esq., LL.D., Sydney Gedge, Esq., Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S., Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B., F.R.S., Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D., Mrs. J. R. Green, Rev. W. Hunt, M.A., Litt.D., Sir C. P. Ilbert, K.C.S.I., Sir C. M. Kennedy, K.C.M.G., C.B., Sidney Lee, Esq., Litt.D., W. S. Lilly, Esq., Sidney J. Low, Esq., Sir Frank T. Marzials, C.B., Sir F. Pollock, Bart., Rev. J. H. Rigg, D.D., H. R. Tedder, Esq., Rev. H. Wace, D.D., Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B., A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D., LL.D.

The Library contains about 220,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 3s. a year, with an entrance fee of £1 1s.; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. The NEW CATALOGUE (1626 pp. 4to, 1903) is now ready, price £2 2s.; to members, 25s.

"One of the most sagacious and judiciously liberal men I have ever known, the late Lord Derby, said there was a kind of man to whom the best service that could be rendered was to make him a life member of the London Library."—W. E. H. LECKY.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

Messrs. BELL'S NEW BOOKS

Catalogue sent post free on application.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION, with a New Preface.

Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

HENRY VIII. AND THE ENGLISH MONASTRIES. By the RIGHT REV. ABBOT GASQUET, D.D., O.S.B.

OTHER WORKS BY ABBOT GASQUET

Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

HENRY III. AND THE CHURCH: a Study of his Ecclesiastical Policy and of the Relations between England and Rome.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION

6s. net

THE EVE OF THE REFORMATION. Studies in the Religious Life and Thought of the English People in the Period preceding the Rejection of the Romish Jurisdiction by Henry VIII.

JUST PUBLISHED. Small 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND IN WALES, in or about the Years 1536-1539. Extracted from his MSS., Arranged and Edited by LUCY TOULMIN SMITH. With a Map.

The remainder of the work, "The Itinerary in England," is in the press.

"Better company than this Tudor itinerant one could not wish for in Wales; and he could hardly be better edited."—TRIBUNE.

THE ART GALLERIES OF EUROPE.

With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.

THE ART OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY. By JULIA DE W. ADDISON.

THE ART OF THE VENICE ACADEMY. By MARY KNIGHT POTTER.

PREVIOUSLY ISSUED

The Art of the Vatican. The Art of the Pitti Palace. The Art of the Louvre.

Post 8vo, 6s. net.

STUDIES IN POETRY AND CRITICISM.

By J. CHURTON COLLINS.

"We heartily commend this work for a serious study. Prof. Collins regards both criticism and poetry more seriously than is at present the fashion, and he deserves the warm thanks of all who desire to see those arts placed on a higher plane of thought. This book should certainly do much to bring about this end."—EDUCATION.

NEW VOLUMES OF BOHN'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

Post 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

HAZLITT'S A VIEW OF THE ENGLISH STAGE; or, a Series of Dramatic Criticisms. Edited by W. SPENCER JACKSON.

EMERSON'S WORKS. A new Edition in 5 Volumes, with the Text Edited and Collated by GEORGE SAMPSON.

[Ready April 11.]

THE YORK LIBRARY.

A NEW SERIES OF REPRINTS ON THIN PAPER.

Small 8vo, 2s. net in cloth, and 3s. net in leather.

LATEST VOLUMES.

FIELDING'S TOM JONES. 2 vols.

GESTA ROMANORUM; or, Entertaining Moral Stories invented by the Monks. Translated from the Latin by the Rev. CHARLES SWAN. Revised Edition by WYNNARD HOOPER, M.A.

GOETHE'S FAUST. Translated by ANNA SWANWICK, I.L.D. Revised edition, with an Introduction and Bibliography by CARL BRUEL, Litt.D., Ph.D.

MONTAIGNE'S ESSAYS. Cotton's Translation. Revised by W. C. HAZLITT. Three vols.

PLUTARCH'S LIVES. Translated with Notes, and a Life. By AUBREY STEWART, M.A., and GEORGE LONG, M.A. Vol. I.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS,
Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	323	A Literary Canserie:
Literature:		An Early University Calendar . . . . .	332
"The Man for Galway" . . . . .	325	Fiction . . . . .	335
The Victorian Chancellors . . . . .	327	Fine Art:
Nature Notes . . . . .	328	Water-Colours by Mr. D. S.
Browning as Theologian . . . . .	329	MacColl . . . . .	336
A Bazaar of Poets . . . . .	329	Music:
The Authorship of the Tract		The Pied Piper of Hamelin . . . . .	336
"On the Constitution of		Forthcoming Books . . . . .	337
Athens" . . . . .	330	Correspondence . . . . .	338
Grey Grisold . . . . .	331	Books Received . . . . .	340

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

AMERICAN criticism of poetry is a plant that has not yet fully blossomed; there will be more of it in the course of another hundred years or so. Americans for the moment are, perhaps, too busy in building up the dry bones of that enormous and wonderful country of theirs to give the best of their intellect to such a subject as literary criticism. And there is no reproach conveyed in these remarks. In our own country great critics have been few and far between. They can be counted on the fingers of a single hand. In this department of literature we do not compare very favourably either with France or Germany. If we leave out Matthew Arnold, it would be difficult to find as many as four other critics who can be mentioned in the same breath with, say, Sainte-Beuve. We would have to fall back on Addison, who belongs to an age that seems to us very far away, or on lesser men.

All this lends additional interest to a little volume, "The Poetry of Life," which has been sent out by an American poet, Mr. Bliss Carman. It perhaps errs on the side on which we would, prima facie, be least likely to expect error; it deals to a great extent with the abstract. The second essay is called "The Purpose of Poetry," and probably he who "sings but as the linnet sings" would think that the phrase conveyed contradiction in terms. But we are less concerned with the doctrines set forth by Mr. Carman than with certain information as to the ideas current in his own country. He tells us that the fine arts have no hold on the Americans as a people. "We have no wide feeling for them, no profound conviction of their importance." For an American writer to say that, is a much better sign than if he were to assert the contrary. Its very modesty bears a certain appeal. In the essay on "How to Judge Poetry" Mr. Carman strikes the nail on the head when he describes the ignoramus who admits that he "doesn't know anything about art, but he knows what he likes." It is an absurd saying; yet how often do we hear it repeated as an excuse for tolerating rubbish!

In speaking of individual poets, Mr. Carman is certainly instructive. He places Longfellow on a higher pedestal than would be given him in Europe, singling out for special praise "Hiawatha" and the lines "To the River Charles." Our experience is that Longfellow is the poet of girlhood, but he does not wear well. There is a strong eulogy of Emerson; but it is followed by a paper on Mr. Riley's work in which adjectives are employed with equal fervour. Of the extracts he gives, the following four lines are to our mind the best: yet they are not without a certain trickery, and the appeal in them is just a little to the gallery:

"Little Haly, little Haly," cheeps the robin in the tree;
 "Little Haly," sighs the clover; "Little Haly," moans the bee;
 "Little Haly, little Haly," calls the kill-dee at twilight;
 And the katydids and crickets hollers "Haly" all the night.

Mr. Carman appears to think that the day of Mr. Swinburne is over. "He fills the air without feeding the mind," and for that reason he accords him a place below Tennyson, Arnold, Morris and other giants of the Victorian age. All this is extremely interesting, and the book seems to hold forth promise of a higher criticism than we have yet received from America.

On our table at the moment is another volume of American criticism, "Poetry and the Individual," by Mr. Hartley Burr Alexander. It is somewhat in the nature of an attempt to apply the methods of physical dissection to the fine imaginings of the poet. The very chapter headings convey this. The first is "Impulse and Song," with the sub-divisions "Poetic Mood," and "Poetic Attitude and Essence." We are afraid that the field is not a very fruitful one to cultivate. To our mind the most interesting chapter in the book is that on "Nature and Poetic Mood," and the most alluring passage is that in which the author shows how the immemorial music of poetry floats through the minds of primitive people. As an example he quotes a native Australian song arranged by Mr. Andrew Lang.

We go all!
 The bones of all
 Are shining white
 In this Dulur land!
 The rushing noise
 Of Bunjil, our Father,
 Sings in my breast,
 This breast of mine!

The theme, which is just touched upon here, might with advantage have been expanded.

The correspondence which we publish in the present number touching the "Early English Drama Society" needs some comment besides the reply appended to the letters of that "Society's" publisher and editor. The undertaking planned by the "Society" is one which has our heartiest approval. A corpus of our early dramatic literature is needed: the scheme proposed by the "Society" is a good scheme, and, as our reviewer pointed out, has, in some respects, been well executed up to the present. We still hope that, under whatever name, the issue of these texts will be carried on; and there is no reason why, now that initial mistakes have been pointed out, careful correction of the first four volumes and scrupulous accuracy in the preparation of the texts of all future volumes should not ensure both pecuniary and literary success for the series. But, until the editor of it replies to, instead of evading our charge, and gives good guarantee against the continuance of such slipshod and unscholarly methods of work as we have exposed, the series will not merit support.

We are, however, tempted to comment very strongly on the misguided attempt to lend dignity to an enterprise, which surely had sufficient dignity of its own, by adopting the name without the essence of a society. Nothing—not even a few extra subscribers—was to be gained by it; everything—once the bubble was pricked—was to be lost by the necessary withdrawal of distinguished scholars from a position they found to be equivocal. That Drs. Furnivall and Bradley are right in removing their names from the list of Vice-Presidents and Mr. Bullen in being glad that his has been removed for him, there can be no question: the "Society" was not what it claimed to be (and Mr. Gibbings's assertion that it does not intend to publish a balance-sheet strikes us as one of the most surprising instances of callous indifference to recognised procedure that we have ever met with), nor was the work done of a quality which these gentlemen could for a moment countenance. Whether, in consenting to lend their names to an enterprise the conduct of which they had insufficiently investigated, they acted with due regard for the literary principles which have made their own work what it is, is a question which we need not press.

Not long ago a contributor to the ACADEMY complained that the official notification of interesting additions to our national art collections left a good deal to be desired. They are occasionally, but not always, mentioned in one or two of the leading daily papers; but they appear there in such a form that the eye might easily pass them over. What we want is an official publication like the admirable "Bulletin" lately started by the Metropolitan Museum of New York. "The Bulletin" is published monthly at ten cents. It contains articles of special interest, notes on the more important recent acquisitions, the reports of regulations and proceedings, and complete list of "accessions" for the month by loan, bequest and purchase, stating the class, the nature of the object, and the source. On the last page is a list of officers (we must congratulate New York on having persuaded Mr. Robinson to come from Chicago as Assistant to Sir C. Purdon Clarke) and other details, and the "Bulletin" is illustrated with reproductions of newly acquired objects. Why should not the National Gallery and the Tate Gallery follow this example? If New York takes our good men (Sir C. Purdon Clarke and Mr. Roger Fry both appear on that last page of the "Bulletin"), we should take their good ideas. Such a publication would pay its own expenses and be of the greatest assistance to all lovers of art. Perhaps the new Director, if he be appointed before the Sack of London, will see to it.

The artistic is not the only aspect from which such a proposal should be considered; there is the commercial as well. Twenty millions annually is spent, says Sir Herbert Maxwell in the Nineteenth Century by visitors to this country; and the writer of a very able article in the Burlington Magazine points out that much of this comes from people who visit us for the sake of our art treasures. Anything that can excite their curiosity and induce them to come in greater numbers is "good business." And the same writer points out that the purchase of a Rokeby Velasquez (shall we add: of a Turbutt Shakespeare?) is a business investment. That it is not always an investment yielding the best value for the money, is the fault, in many cases, of those in whose hands we put the management of our affairs. They wait till the stock has gone too high to be remunerative instead of keeping an eye on the market and buying in at a low figure. But the one or two sharp lessons we have had lately will teach us wisdom for the future.

How many pins set on end it would take to reach the moon, or what the numerical proportion is between the number of cabbages sold daily in Covent Garden and the number of subjects on which Dr. Emil Reich is prepared to lecture is a form of inquiry which is extremely popular to-day and is promoted far and wide. We read these things with as much enjoyment as any one; but are unhappily quite unable to remember them. One such piece of information, however, we have succeeded—perhaps because it touches us home—in retaining. We discovered it not long ago in that admirable publication, the Library World. There are 30,000,000 books in the world, excluding manuscripts; and every year 500,000 new ones are added, besides 50,000 or 60,000 periodicals with their monthly, weekly or daily issues.

These figures are fairly easy, but the writer goes on to make a few calculations concerning the cost and so on of a "central catalogue of the world's literature." There would be 30,000,000 cards, to begin with, occupying 2840 statute miles." "Stocked in tiers eight feet high . . . this would occupy 118 statute miles," and, as the writer justly remarks, it would need a motor-car to get from A to M. When in need of severe exercise, we often go to the British Museum Reading Room for an hour's hunting in the catalogue, and find that there is nothing like it for developing the muscles of the legs, back and arms. But

Mr. Swan Sonnenschein himself would quail before the task involved in searching a "central catalogue." And the cost of it would be—roughly—some eight millions of pounds.

The question whether the copy of "Auld Lang Syne" recently sold by Messrs. Sotheby be or be not the original one has provoked other questions equally interesting: How many copies of "Auld Lang Syne" are in existence? and which is the best? In a contemporary a correspondent points out that at least four are known to have been written out by Burns. The first was sent in a letter to Mrs. Dunlop in December 1788, and the first stanza and chorus run:

Should auld acquaintance be forgot
And never thought upon?
Let's hae a waught o' Malaga
For auld lang syne.

For auld lang syne, my jo,
For auld lang syne;
Let's hae a waught o' Malaga,
For auld lang syne.

The second was sent to James Johnson and appeared in the "Scots Musical Museum," vol. v. 1796. The manuscript is not known. The third—written about 1791 or 1792—is that in the "Interleaved Scots Musical Museum," and Burns himself says that it is "by much the best set of the words of this song." The first stanza and chorus run:

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to mind?
Should auld acquaintance be forgot
And days o' auld lang syne?

And for auld lang syne, my jo,
For auld lang syne,
We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet,
For auld lang syne.

The manuscript is in America. The fourth copy was sent to George Thomson about September 1793, and was published in "Scotish Airs" in 1799. In this version what is stanza ii. of other copies—"And surely ye'll be your pint stoup!"—is the concluding stanza. The manuscript is at Brechin Castle. It seems obvious that Lord Rosebery's copy is the missing one sent to Johnson about 1789 and published in the "Scots Musical Museum."

Any one who wishes to see how a certain trick in verse ought not to be done may turn to the Cornhill for April and read this by Mr. Godley:

They tell me of a bright To Be
When, freed from chains that tyrants forge
By the Right Honourable D.
Lloyd-George,
We shall by penalties persuade
The idle unrepentant Great
To serve (inadequately paid)
The State,—

but whoever would like to see the trick really well done ought to turn to his Anti-Jacobin:

Sun, moon, and thou vain world, adieu,
That kings and priests are plotting in;
Here doom'd to starve on water-gru-
-el, never shall I see the U-niversity of Gottingen!
-niversity of Gottingen!

If the Auld Brig of Ayr has been respited for a time, the Bridge of Barskimming is not so fortunate, for its demolition has been decided on. Barskimming is on the river Ayr, not far from Mauchline, the centre of the Burns country, and near the "wild romantic grove" of which the poet speaks in "the Vision." Here too are the famous braes, which he celebrated more than once in song, inspired by the sight of Miss Alexander, the lady whom he has immortalised as "the lass of Ballochmyle." It was when he was near the bridge that he composed the poem, "Man was made to mourn," a dirge suggested by his thoughts upon what he conceived to be the saddest sight on earth—a man seeking work. Burns, however, was not in that state himself at the moment, for he was really supposed to be looking for one of the belles of the district who had gone off in search of a missing cow.

Old readers of Good Words, and their number is still considerable, will hardly regret, as the time is past for this, that with the current number the once popular periodical appears for the last time as a monthly. Established in 1863 by Mr. Alexander Strahan, who began shortly after the publication of its companion periodical, the Sunday Magazine, Good Words was edited for a longer period by one editor, Dr. Donald Macleod, who succeeded his famous brother, Dr. Norman Macleod, than has been the case with any other English monthly. Altered tastes in reading have adversely affected both magazines, which passed, about a couple of years ago, from the publishing firm which succeeded the original proprietors to Messrs. Pitman and Sons, and a short time ago, it will be remembered, they became the property of the Amalgamated Press. Of the early group of contributors to Good Words Mr. John M. Ludlow, C.B., is the only survivor.

The Villa Palmieri, which is to be offered for sale on May 1, has considerable interest for the student of literature, for of all the villas about Fiesole it has perhaps the best claim to be associated with the Decameron. It is of course possible that Boccaccio drew upon his imagination, when he wished to describe the scene where the tales in the Decameron were told, but a long tradition assigns the honour to the grounds of the Villa Palmieri. They are situated at the required distance from Florence, and the region round is known as the valley of Fair Ladies, while, in addition to this, there are two water-mills in the vicinity, just as the Decameron requires. One of the rambles, taken by the fair personages in the poem was to a little lake in a forest, the lake perhaps that is near Landor's Villa, of which the wayward genius sang, when he described his Florentine home:

Here by the lake Boccaccio's fair brigade
Beguiled the hours and tale for tale repaid.

A miscellaneous sale of books, but one which lovers of standard editions will rejoice in, takes place at Messrs. Sotheby's on the 6th, 7th, 9th and 10th inst. Extra illustrated books are numerous and there are many first editions. Amongst the most interesting are Meredith's Poems, 1851, Peacock's Crotchet Castle and other works, Smollett's Adventures of an Atom and Roderick Random, Fielding's Joseph Andrews, Lithgow's Nineteen Years Travels through the World (1682), Lord Byron's The Age of Bronze (1823), Ainsworth's Tower of London (1840), Pickwick Papers with autograph of Dickens, and Addison's Cato (1713). Other notable books to be sold are some Royal Academy Exhibition Catalogues (including the first three, 1760, 1761, 1762), and an early example of an illustrated book published in Mexico, Tratado Elemental de la Destreza del Sable, by S. de Frias, Mexico, 1809.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Zoological Society: The next meeting of the society for scientific business will be held on Tuesday, April 10, at 8.30 P.M. Communications: (1) Mr. C. Tate Regan, F.Z.S.—The Freshwater Fishes of the Island of Trinidad, based on the collection, and notes and sketches, made by Mr. Lechmere Guppy, Jun. (2) Professor J. Arthur Thomson and Mr. W. D. Henderson.—The Marine Fauna of Zanzibar and British East Africa from collections made by Cyril Crossland in the years 1901-2. Alcyonaria. (3) Dr. J. F. Gemmill.—Cyclopa in Osseous Fishes. (4) Dr. J. F. Gemmill.—Notes on Supernumary Eyes, Local Deficiency and Reduplication of the Notochord in Trout Embryos.

Royal Colonial Institute. Meeting at the Whitehall Rooms, Hotel Metropole, Whitehall Place, S.W., on Tuesday, April 10, at 8 P.M. Paper on Australian Immigration, by Walter James, K.C., Agent-General for Western Australia.

Royal Geographical Society. Evening Meeting, Monday, April 9, at 8.30 P.M., at the Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W. (1) Presentation by H. E. the American Ambassador, of the Gold Medal of the American Geographical Society to Captain R. F. Scott, C.V.O., R.N., Commander of the National Antarctic Expedition. (2) Paper on Recent Exploration and Survey in Seistan, by Colonel Sir Henry McMahon, K.C.S.I., C.I.E.

The British Empire Shakespeare Society. Antony and Cleopatra at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock Place, at 3 P.M., April 19.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge. Sale of the libraries of the late Mr. Thomas Reader and others. Friday, April 6, to Wednesday, April 11, at 1 P.M.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge. Sale of the library of the late Rev. W. E. Begley, comprising rare books and tracts, works on witchcraft, sorcery and other occult subjects, writings of sect-founders, original documents by and connected with Joanna Southcott; Mormonism, Swedenborgianism, Anabaptists, etc.; ex-libris, etc. Thursday, April 19 and two following days at 1 P.M.

Handford Lodge, Ipswich. Sale by Messrs. Robert Bond and Sons of collections of Mr. W. H. Booth, including furniture, paintings, silver, Lowestoft and other china and porcelain, books, playbills, manuscripts, etc. Wednesday, April 18, to Monday, April 23, at 10.30 A.M.

International Philatelic Exhibition, at the Royal Horticultural Society's Hall, Vincent Square, Westminster. Opens May 23. Free days (admission by ticket to be obtained from the hon. secretaries or the leading stamp dealers) May 26 and May 30. Among the prizes are a gold and a silver medal for lady collectors, presented by the Prince of Wales, President of the Society. Banquet at the Imperial Restaurant, Regent Street, on May 25.

The Munich Wagner Festival will begin on Monday, August 13, and continue till Friday, September 7. The operas to be performed in the Prinzregenten Theater are The Meistersinger, Tannhäuser, and The Ring, the conductors being Herr Mottl and Herr Franz Fischer. The Mozart Festival begins on Thursday, August 2; Don Giovanni will be played on that evening and on August 8; Figaro on August 4 and 10; and Così fan tutte on August 6 and 12, in the Residenz Theater. For prices and particulars apply to Hugo Gorlitz, 119 New Bond Street, W.

LITERATURE

"THE MAN FOR GALWAY"

The Novels of Charles Lever. 6 vols. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. each.)

Charles Lever: His Life in His Letters. By EDMUND DOWNEY. 2 vols. (Blackwood, 21s. net.)

THERE are very few writers to whom the sick, the weary, and the languid owe more than to Charles Lever. No one would think of classifying him with those great masters of imaginative art who seem to have known or divined the deepest thoughts and emotions of their fellow men, but in his own sphere he is alone and inimitable. The unceasing flow of good spirits, the drollery of his humour, the eccentricity of his characters and the oddity of their adventures make up a dish before which dullness is impossible. One would think it were an impossible feat to write a dull life of such an author, and yet, we fear, it has very nearly been accomplished by Mr. Edmund Downey. In the first place his Life is too long; where a single volume would have remained readable for all time, the same material elaborated into double that length necessarily means a great proportion of dull pages. Perhaps Mr. Downey is less to blame than is the fashion of the day, which runs strongly in favour of what is called completeness. Among the new letters included in the biography are many which we should not like to have missed. They are of the very essence of Lever; but others are little more than business notes or the friendly epistles that any undistinguished man might have written to his friends. As an example of the former we might quote this letter from Brussels to Mr. Alexander Spencer:

You will be sorry to learn that Wright's failure has let me in for a loss which, however small, is something to one still smoked. His correspondent here, a Mr. Berry (?) King, took the opportunity of failing offered by the great man's break up, and failed accordingly. He was my banker, which doubtless was another predisposing cause for a mishap. You may remember how a very small credit I once opened with the bank in Coleraine made them close in a week. However, as some one remarked with much good nature, "It's only another book"—and so I feel it. Meanwhile I am very hard up, as this is the season of yearly accounts being sent in. With Curry I am in advance, for unluckily, to oblige this confounded Berry King, I gave him my booksellers' bills when drawn—which he has since appropriated.

Forgive me, my dear friend, all this long story of worry and annoyance, which, now that I have told it, has relieved my mind considerably.

But, after all, I have found it a hard task and sore test of my courage for the last five weeks to go on daily bolting the egotism, selfishness, and sordid meanness of my sick world, and at night writing till one or two or three o'clock every imaginable kind of nonsense, with a heavy heart and an aching head—for means, ay, for means—only to continue the same dull drudgery somewhat longer. This is a confession only for a very dear friend.

My loss with the rascal is about £280—but it is all lost, for however Wright may come round my friend is most genteely cleared out.

I have written a squib for the D. U. M.—"The Chateau de Vandyck." Look at it.

Here you have Charles Lever in epitome. It is full of his own humour and his own jests, even though they are jests at ill fortune. We see, too, the thriftless, generous nature of the man, always with his purse open for his friends and scarcely out of difficulties himself. But of course the most poignant passage is that in which he describes himself worried with the dust and turmoil of the day yet writing on with unconscious bravery to the early morning hours, and producing what was so well calculated to add mirth and cheerfulness to his readers. The letter was written in 1840, when he was in the prime of life and had still many long years in which to struggle on. But the circumstances of his birth and upbringing prepare us for what was to happen. It is curiously characteristic of the man that he allowed it to be stated in the hand-books of his time that he was born in 1809, whereas his birthday really was dated in 1806. He was a native of Dublin, and came of a family that was of long pedigree, but apparently had fallen on evil times in the latter half of the eighteenth century. His father, James Lever, had gone to Ireland in 1787, being then about twenty-seven years of age. He had been apprenticed to the joinery business and was occupied after the novelist's birth in building operations, out of which he made money and saved some of it. Thus he was able to give his son a better start than he had himself. Charles Lever was sent to a private school and afterwards to Trinity College, Dublin. The scenes enacted in "Charles O'Malley" by the hero of the story and Frank Webber are, no doubt, founded upon his memory of life there. One of his escapades is thus described:

Even at the early period of his career—though so far he evinced no powers of story-weaving and was not burdened with a desire "to commence author"—he had a great love for ballads and ballad-writing. On one occasion he attired himself as a mendicant ballad-monger, singing in the streets snatches of political verses composed by himself. He was accompanied by some college friends, who luckily were at hand when certain unpopular sentiments in his doggerels provoked a street row. It is stated that he returned from this expedition with thirty shillings in coppers, collected from admirers of his minstrelsy.

This reads like a paragraph from one of his own stories. After his college career closed he seems to have oscillated between two ambitions, one for the army and one for medicine; but before settling down to any profession he made a journey to Canada, and to his friend Canon Hayman he gave a narration of his landing at the St. Lawrence and of his rapid passage from the civilised districts to the haunts of the red man:

He was eager to taste the wild freedom of life with an Indian tribe. Lever, according to himself, found no difficulty in being admitted to Red-Indian fellowship, and for a time the unrestrained life of the prairie was a delightful and exhilarating experience. The nights in the open air, the days spent in the pine-forests or on the banks of some majestic river, were transcendently happy. He was endowed by the sachem with "tribal privileges," and he identified himself as far as possible with his newly-made friends. Ere long, however, he grew weary of the latitudinarianism and of the ingloriousness of barbaric life, and he began to sigh for the flesh-pots of the city. He contrived to hide his feelings from the noble red man, but a noble red woman shrewdly guessed that the pale-face was weary, discontented, homesick. This woman warned the young "medicine man" that if he made any overt attempt to seek his own people he would be followed, and one of his tribal privileges would be to suffer death by the tomahawk. Lever dissembled, and (somewhat after the manner of the as yet uncreated Mrs. Micawber) he asseverated that he would never desert the clan.

How he escaped and returned to Ireland is told to the same correspondent. On his return, from 1830 to 1837, he busied himself with preparing to become a doctor. In 1832 Ireland was visited with Asiatic cholera, and Lever applied to the Board of Health for an appointment, and was established at Kilrush, Co. Clare:

Notwithstanding the gloom which pervaded the district, the young doctor contrived somehow to infect it with a little of his own high spirits. Physicians who worked with him through the awful time declared that wherever Lever went he won all hearts by his kindness, and kept up the spirits of the inhabitants by his cheerfulness. Some of his associates were driven to account for his wondrous exuberance, even after he had been sitting up night after night, by supposing that he was "excited in some unknown and unnatural manner."

However, he did not seem to make much progress with medicine, and, owing in some measure to the example set by his friend Maxwell, had been gradually, during the course of his studies, drifting into literature, writing to magazines and so forth. In 1837 he settled in Brussels, and the account of his life there may be gleaned from a series of his letters. It would not be very profitable to follow him through all the incidents of his life on the Continent. It is interesting chiefly because it shows how he gained the knowledge that he used to such purpose in describing the events of Wellington's wars. We seem to picture him always out of funds, always entertaining new ideas, full of rollicking fun, and acting as an attraction to the kindred spirits that he met, so that his mind became full of such lore as could be imparted by officers who had served under the great Duke in his campaign against "Boney." It is, in fact, the material out of which his brilliant romances were woven and his biography bears a kind of resemblance to them. The novels do not depend for their charm on a finely conceived and well-worked-out plot, like that of "Tom Jones," but on a succession of amusing occurrences strung together on a very slight thread of narrative. In "Charles O'Malley," for instance, we often forget that the hero is in love with Lucy Dashwood, and, though the consummation of their hopes occurs pleasantly and naturally at the end of the book, the reader has very little anxiety about it from the beginning. Even in that splendid preliminary incident, the great ride in which Charles is pitted against Captain Hammersley, it is not who shall win Lucy's favour that we think of but of the excitement of the incident itself, and so with the various characters that figure in the book. Billy Considine would by a greater novelist have been welded into the tissue of the story, but as treated by Lever he is simply an unmatched picture of the Irish duellist, whose proceedings have only a remote bearing on the narrative. So with Mickey Free and the other characters. What they do or say is never calculated in the slightest degree to deepen the general interest of the romance; and the effect produced is much the same as that which comes from reading a collection of amusing short stories. So with Lever's fine and thoughtless life there is little of set purpose and achievement to record, but from day to day life is lived and seldom fails to yield something that has an interest on its own account. The end was inevitably sad. Though Lever's wit seemed bright enough in company, he lost the art of writing stories, and the final books from his pen were not anything like so good as the first. The worst of it was that he was conscious of this, though he never lost his ability to laugh at it. In one of his letters to Mr. John Blackwood he breaks forth into rhyme, of which the following lines may suitably close this inadequate notice:

But the truth is, I feel if my book is unsold,
That my fun, like myself, it must be—has grown old.
And though the confession may come with a damn,
I must own it—non sum qualis eram.

THE VICTORIAN CHANCELLORS

The Victorian Chancellors. By J. B. ATLAY. Vol. I. (Smith, Elder, 14s.)

It is not easy to justify the practice of including in one work the biographies of men, whose only common point is that in the course of their careers they held the same office. Why should Bishops or Chancellors be driven into the same pen? Enemies, or at least opponents in life, they have every right to object to a posthumous and irrational proximity. But in the matter of Chancellors, Lord Campbell has set the fashion, and Mr. Atlay may at any rate quote a distinguished precedent for his enterprise. Nor can we complain of the composition of this first volume, which brings together two statesmen so profoundly interesting and withal so diverse in temperament and attainments, as Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham.

If Mr. Atlay had pursued the method of Plutarch, he could not have hit upon two more appropriate heroes. Only he would be forced to conclude his biographies not by a parallel but by a contrast. The single link between the two men was the link of friendship. They were separated many leagues one from the other by sentiment, sympathy, and opinion. In Parliament they took opposite sides, and they were antagonists in the most notorious case in which either of them was ever engaged. Yet when Lord Lyndhurst died at the age of ninety-one, Lord Brougham, who was already eighty-five, and proof, one would have thought, against emotion, was crushed by the blow.

For a quarter of a century [says Mr. Atlay] they had lived together in affectionate intimacy; the admiration of each for the great qualities of the other was genuine and unbounded. Every afternoon Brougham would drive round to the house in George Street when his senior lay crippled with gout, and cheer him with gossip and bavarderie; and in the dark days after Lyndhurst's death, when his own mental powers were fast fading, he would still rouse himself to be driven there, and it was with pain and difficulty that the hopeless nature of his quest could be explained to him.

There is a pathos in the friendship of these two veterans, which we are not wont to associate with them, and the pathos is deepened by the fact that the friendship had outlived the strife of the senate and the court.

The career of Copley was triumphant from beginning to end. He achieved the highest distinctions which his University could confer. Called to the bar, he speedily won the reputation of a sound and persuasive lawyer. "Not brilliant or showy," as Abraham Hayward wrote, he mastered his case with care and thoroughness, and his marvellous memory prevented him from overlooking a single point, or from forgetting so much as a single figure. "His strength lay in his clear, strong, subtle intellect"—again it is Hayward who speaks—"and his highest forensic qualities were of the judicial order." Above all, as a friend put it, "he had no rubbish in his head," and it is not strange that he attracted the notice of Lord Liverpool, who in 1818 offered him a seat in Parliament. Copley accepted without hesitation, and was returned for Yarmouth in the Isle of Wight. Like many another great man, he encountered at his entrance into Parliament a vast deal of undeserved obloquy. Though Lord Liverpool made no conditions and exacted no promises, Copley, the representative of a Government borough, naturally threw the weight of his eloquence and authority into the Tory scale. For this he was denounced—most unjustly—as a political profligate. Hitherto he had taken no part in public affairs; he had expressed upon a public platform no opinion. What he had chosen to think and to say in the Temple or on circuit did not touch either his colleagues or the people. Like most other strong-witted, clear-sighted men, Copley had not all his life been constant to one set of views. In his youth he may have been a Jacobin; he may have attended a banquet of the "Friends of the People"; he may have talked sedition to Campbell. But it is ridiculous to hold a man bound to words lightly spoken at a circuit mess, and when once Copley had embarked on a political career he was as sound a party man as any of them. By temperament and habit he was a thorough aristocrat, and, if it suited his high spirits to shock the pedant Campbell, it is inconceivable that Copley should ever have professed the smallest sympathy with Lord Grey and the Whigs.

No one [said Hayward] who knew him after his entrance into public life could discern a sign, a feature of the democrat. The Ethiopian must have changed his skin, and the leopard his spots. The mind of the alleged convert seemed to have been formed in a Tory mould; all his habits of thought were Tory, and if ever a man became a Tory from conviction, it was this man who is accused of having pretended to become one with a view to personal advancement.

But, cast as he was in a Tory mould, he was not one of those who would sacrifice themselves for a principle. He carried into Parliament something of the advocate. He could present a case, if required, on either side. The worst blot on his career—his sudden change of opinion on the subject of Catholic Emancipation—was not altogether his own fault. He did but turn his coat when Wellington and Peel turned theirs; nor was he so piously committed as they by energy and persistence to the cause of Protestantism. Why should Copley be condemned while Peel and Wellington, whose inconsistency was yet more flagrant, are excused? Why, then, should he not also plead in extenuation that he changed his mind that the king's Government might be the better carried on?

So also in the stormy days of Reform Lyndhurst played a politic part. Though he was no friend of popular government, he would, if he could, have dished the Whigs, and he was prevented from achieving his purpose only by the unexpected firmness of Peel, who, with a fateful irony, "talked of the advantage to the country that public men should maintain a character for consistency and disinterestedness." Little did he think when he spoke these words of the sudden gyration he was to make in 1846! But when he made that gyration Lyndhurst was ready to turn with him. Once again the Chancellor yielded to force, and, Tory though he was in temper, held opportunism the safer policy. With the quick intelligence of the advocate he could see what was advantageous in any course which his friends followed. And unto the end he kept an open mind. New ideas had no terror for him. Though he grew up in the days of Pitt and Fox, he yet hailed the rising star of Disraeli and did more than any other man to encourage that enterprising and imaginative statesman. Above all, he was a man of the world. The profound lawyer and the acute politician yielded always to the high-spirited host, to the reckless talker, who retained to his last days a boyishness of thought and tone, to the great gentleman who could, when he would, impress all the world by the austere elegance of his manners. Such was the great Chancellor, of whom Mr. Atlay has given us an admirable biography, less partial than Sir Theodore Martin's, infinitely juster than Campbell's, and so well-proportioned that it does not contain a single superfluous page.

And then by way of contrast he has sketched Lord Brougham, a man opposed in every respect (save, as we have said, in friendship) to Lord Lyndhurst. The one quality that they shared was energy—energy both of mind and body. But there was a difference, even here, between the two: in Lyndhurst the energy was guided and controlled, in Brougham the energy was wasted on immaterial projects. History cannot show a parallel to Brougham. He was successful and was yet distrusted by partisans and opponents alike. He was a Chancellor, who did not win the respect of lawyers. He was a man of letters, who wrote upon everything, and had a clear understanding of nothing. With many subjects he had a superficial acquaintance; there was scarcely one of which he could discourse with accuracy. He translated Demosthenes's "De Corona" without a knowledge of Greek, and he wrote his own "Life" with so little regard for truth, that it can never be cited without corroboration. And not even a heavy load of years could check his love of rhetoric and self-advertisement. He delighted in his perorations, which caught the popular ear, even when they hindered the purpose of advocacy. He had as keen a joy in mischief as a schoolboy. Once he carried to the Times the news of Melbourne's enforced resignation, merely to watch the embarrassment of his colleagues. On another occasion he sent to London news of his own death, that he might have the pleasure of reading his obituary. But his pleasure was curtailed by the wisdom of Barnes, the editor of the Times, who knew Brougham well enough to doubt the news, and published his obituary only when Brougham acknowledged himself to be alive again. And what is left of Brougham to-day? Like Cyrano de Bergerac, he lives by his nose. Nobody will ever read his diffuse contributions to periodical literature. Not one echo is heard to-day of his famous perorations. The work which he did for the cause of education is no longer associated with his name. But the caricaturists have made his nose immortal, and until his nose be forgotten he must share this immortality. However, he was not wholly unconscious of his shortcomings. "I would give you some of my walking power," he once said to Lyndhurst, "if you could give me some of your brains," and it is not surprising that Mr. Gladstone should have regarded this "as the highest compliment he had ever known paid by one human being to another." In conclusion, to measure two men, so dissimilar in character, opinion, and temperament as Lyndhurst and Brougham, with an equal hand is no small achievement, and Mr. Atlay deserves all the commendation that we can give him.

NATURE NOTES

Notes from Nature's Garden. By FRANCES A. BARDSWELL. (Longmans, 6s. 6d. net.)

IN her latest book, "Notes from Nature's Garden," Mrs. Bardswell shows us that she is as well acquainted with the ways of wild flowers as we already knew her to be with those of garden plants. With wild animals also she has more than a nodding acquaintance, and her observations of their lives and ways she tells with a charming carelessness of mien, not as of one who says: "I know much more than I care to tell," but of one who says: "I know so little," and then recounts many interesting things as though they were of poor account. One of her most suggestive essays is written on "The Railway Cutting," a theme on which, did we all believe absolutely in Ruskin, there would be little to write of beauty or grace. Mrs. Bardswell tells us, however, that the despised cutting is in reality a harbour for wild life of every description.

Whatever opinions [she says] human beings may hold about railway cuttings, there is no question as to the favour they are held in by all manner of wild-fowls, animals and plants. To such the railway cutting has become an oasis of safety, a city of refuge, where they may rest secure from the ravages of boys, or the dread visits of field and natural history classes, well intentioned, but not infrequently destructive. Bird-lovers are telling us that, if it were not for the safety and seclusion of the railway cuttings, some of our English birds would be in a fair way of becoming extinct. It is not only the quiet that attracts them—wild creatures easily get used to harmless noises—but they will always flock to any place where there is water, and water is generally to be found in cuttings.

That it is also a paradise for weeds and wild flowers all flower-lovers are well aware who have been ruefully rushed past unattainable treasures—near and yet so far. Chapters like that on "Dangerous Wild Flowers" make the book a useful one to have on the shelf of the "week-end" cottage; townchildren and nurses are often woefully ignorant on the subject of edible berries. A few more plates such as that illustrating the woody nightshade would have added considerably to the value of this particular chapter. Mrs. Bardswell's sympathies are wide; flowers and weeds, butterflies and moths, animals, domestic and wild, are all her friends: even the homely scarecrow she does not wholly despise, but gives him (or her) a chapter wherein the different characteristics of those quick and dead are humorously commented on. Before we make an end we will confess to liking Mrs. Bardswell best when she is among the flowers—garden or wild—especially when she takes a single blossom, such as red valerian or a sprig of woodruff, and makes a chapter about it, in which gleanings from quaint herbals, the lore of ancient cottagers, the learning of the naturalists and her own observations are all to be found. It is a method that often fails, but Mrs. Bardswell uses it charmingly.

BROWNING AS THEOLOGIAN

Browning and Dogma: Seven Lectures on Browning's Attitude towards Dogmatic Religion. By ETHEL N. NAIISH. (Bell, 4s. 6d. net.)

THIS volume adds one more to the rapidly growing list of unnecessary books about Browning. We will give the author full credit for the various elementary merits which she displays as an interpreter. She takes half a dozen poems—"Caliban upon Setebos," "Cleon," "Bishop Blougram's Apology," "Christmas Eve and Easter Day," and "La Saisiaz"—and subjects them to minute running analysis. It is quite evident that she has studied these poems very carefully, and she discourses about them pleasantly enough, though with a frequent tendency to wordiness and platitude. But, admitting this much, we can find no sufficient justification for the publication of her volume. In all her two hundred pages there is no note of freshness or originality, and she has nothing of importance to contribute to our knowledge either of the special works selected or of Browning's poetry in general. What she says is on the whole sound, but we have had it many times before, and hardly want to hear it all over again. As a matter of detail, we may remark that she falls at times into the loose way of talking characteristic of minor students of Browning, whose discipular bias prevents them from recognising the limits of the master's art; as where she insists upon his power of absolutely "merging his personal identity" in that of Pippa, and "completely" identifying himself with Caliban. That Browning was a great dramatic poet is, of course, undeniable, and it is perfectly right to lay stress upon the impersonal element in his work. But to speak of Pippa as a true dramatic creation is surely a trifle absurd; while as for Caliban—well, if we want to feel the essential difference between dramatic identification which is complete and that which is only partial, we have but to compare Browning's ratiocinative monster with the Shakespearean original.

The chapters composing the volume were, a prefatory note informs us, delivered in the first instance as lectures, and as such we can well understand that they were acceptable and useful. It is a well-known fact that people will flock to public lectures, and listen with every sign of genuine interest to endless talk about books which they will not read, or, at any rate, will not grapple with, on their own account. Miss Naish's work seems admirably adapted to meet the requirements of an average audience of fairly cultivated persons, delighted to absorb knowledge at second-hand, and to be relieved of the necessity of hammering out an author's meaning for themselves. But it is time to protest against the current confusion of the functions of the spoken and the written word—of the lecture and the book. Such confusion was illustrated on a far more considerable scale quite recently by the publication of Mr. Stopford Brooke's lectures on "Ten Plays of Shakespeare." A lecture, while not infrequently it may be little better than a mild form of mental dissipation, may at its best prove stimulating and helpful by sending listeners here and there direct to the books discussed, and putting them at the right point of view for reading them. The factor of personal contact with an enthusiastic and magnetic teacher is also one not to be overlooked. But it is not therefore to be rashly inferred that everything that has proved useful as a lecture will have any special value in the form of a book.

Even more serious objection must be made to the whole basis of Miss Naish's volume as proclaimed in the sub-title, "Browning's Attitude towards Dogmatic Religion." Dr. Berdoe, some years ago, set the sad example of treating the poet's work as a mass of material out of which it was the critic's chief business to construct a definite and formal system of theology. Miss Naish follows his lead, and exhibits the evil of a now far too common practice, both in her effort to reduce poetic thought to the exact expressions of abstract philosophy and in her tendency to pick out and dwell upon precisely those passages in which the crude intellectual element is most prominent and which have least of the essential value and virtue of poetry. Such unfortunate pre-occupation with the more perishable parts of her author's output is inevitable in a student whose main concern is not with Browning's poetry as poetry, but with his various opinions on questions of "dogmatic religion." Browning is at present in danger of suffering seriously at the hands of such zealous disciples, who are anxious, before all things else, that the world should recognise the master as a great religious philosopher. Browning did, of course, deal much with religious problems; and of his many utterances on such subjects, some were fused by the fire of his genius into great and enduring poetry, while some remained intractable and prosaic—dry argument thrown into verse. But the first and last thing to remember is that the living Browning was, after all, a great poet; and not the least regrettable point about a book like the present is, that it fixes attention upon the less vital components of his work, and thus leads the reader away from its true strength and meaning.

A BAZAAR OF POETS

Echoes from the City of the Sun. By C. R. ASHBEE. (Essex House Press.)

The Last Poems of Richard Watson Dixon, D.D. (Frowde, 3s. 6d. net.)

Lays of the Round Table. By ERNEST RHYS. (Dent, 3s. 6d. net.)

Godfrey's Quest: A Fantastic Poem. By Lady LINDSAY. (Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d. net.)

Shadow and Gleam. By LILIAN STREET. (Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d. net.)

At Intervals. By B. W. HENDERSON. (Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.)

Indian Poetry. Selections rendered into English Verse, by ROMESH DUTT. (Dent, 1s. 6d. net.)

Valerius Catullus. Selected Poems. By L. R. LEVETT. (Heffer & Sons.)

AMID the shouts and cat-calls of the General Election, the voice of the minor poet continued to arise—scarcely audible, but unabashed. Now that the excitement is over, and we know the best and the worst, let us take what comfort we may from Mr. Ashbee's chant:

I sing of England, at whose feet
In one majestic triumph meet Future and past, of England where Her children, heaven-blest, prepare
In pious plenitude to grace
The Treasure Temple of the race;
Of England in her aureole
Of ocean grandeur, whence the soul
Drawn forth by some diviner will
Of ceaseless love, is labouring still
At the great loom the Lord hath planned
To honour this his chosen land.

Since optimism is refreshing, we will quote further from Mr. Ashbee (scene, Whitechapel):

God, God is in all things, for God is in man,
Then smite you the face of the Christ if you can;
The over-soul, star-clothed, shall yet ride the storm
In power and in speed and in splendour of form.

It fires the express as it breaks through the night
Like an arrow of flame in its fury of flight,
It spins with the lamp down the shaft of the mine,
And the ironclad bears it along through the brine,
The whirl of its thunder is borne on the brain
In the fierce red-lit underground storm of the train,
In the silver-streaked tram-rails it fades as they bend,
On their long trailing curve by the booths of Mile End,
In the violet light of the vanishing tram
In man's soul crying mist-bound, I am that I am.

The above lines will show that the author of "Echoes from the City of the Sun" is sound at heart, even though his inspiration be uncertain and his style not over-masculine. The volume consists of "songs of experience," grave and gay, pleasingly printed and bound.

More of vigour, if less of variety, meets us in the Last Poems of Dr. Dixon—selected and edited by Mr. Robert Bridges, and somewhat vehemently prefaced by Miss Coleridge. The first piece, a tale of Roman friendship, is indeed unsuccessful, but the more intimate poems have a directness which at once arrests attention, e.g.:

Much I complain of my state to my own heart heavily beating,
Much to the stars I complain: much to the universe cold.

This, of course, is no uncommon mood—but the following words on Death possess the homely and surprising touch of Blake:

And do we cry in hope and fear
"Then shall we know as we are known"?
How are we known then? Who knows here
Each thought, each word, each pain, each groan?
And who shall say the future life
Shall end such things for evermore?
Is not the ghost-world filled with strife
Shall not all be as heretofore?

Though this little volume holds the last gleanings of a poetic field, the ears of corn are firm and sound.

In "Lays of the Round Table" is much talk of the Haut King, Sir Ector, Sir Launcelot, and the rest; and we hear it all as through a telephone which will not carry to us rightly the voice of a friend. The tone is subdued, as are the pigments of many of our young painters, who grow so much enamoured of the old that they anticipate the grime of centuries. Much more to our liking than these somewhat mouldy Arthurianisms is the mood of "Keri's Daughter":

Now on the windy hill-top, her hair like wafted smoke
Draws all the darkness after her, to be her beauty's cloak.

I feel it brush upon my cheek, I grasp at my delight;
The morning star looks cold on me, across the tops of night.

* * * * *
If she should see us ride behind, or the sun sit on his height—
Know, she would range no longer in her mysterious night.

Then I should keep the white-limb'd girl within my ordered house,
And let her hunt no longer, with her black cloak flying loose.

* * * * *
Oh, it is well to follow, but not to overtake,
The maiden in her mystery, for the white spirit's sake.

Lady Lindsay weaves a pleasing, if unsubstantial, tale ("Godfrey's Quest"). The hero wanders away from home in search of the ideal world, which he expects to find somewhere behind the sunset; and, after many experiences as shepherd, carpenter, fisherman, and habitant of some purgatorial island, returns, a blind and chastened man, to his home and to the care of his aged sister. The blank verse flows smoothly for the most part, but the diction is at times inconsistent. For instance, the conversational is followed by such lines as:

She was not quite forgot—poor Marjorie!

And shaped his path unto the western hills . . .

He did himself apprentice for a space
Unto a carpenter

To tell a simple little story in blank verse is, we allow, almost as difficult as to mould macaroni out of steel bars.

Miss Street ("Shadow and Gleam") is less ambitious, and therefore more successful. Her Shakespearean sonnets are well balanced, as the following will show:

MUSIC.

When sorrow grips the heart we turn aside
From music's underpassion, wild or sweet;
'Tis agony to hear those strains that chide
Our coward soul, because we would entreat
Poor ruined dreams to sleep. . . . There is no spell
So wonderful as music's cruel power
To lead the soul to torture and to hell.
And yet, O yet, the rhythm of the flower
Concerting with the tender twilight breeze;
The homing thrush sending his golden psalm
To mingle with the murmur in the trees:
These are the songs that lend a lovely calm
To memories august, till all the pain
Is softened, and the past is blessed again.

The numerous short pieces which make up the body of the book are tastefully phrased, though never quite warming up to the lyric glow-point.

There is no need to dwell on Mr. Henderson's little book. It consists chiefly of Oxford Magazine sketches and parodies, and a dose of the serious to end up with—the whole, we take it, more or less consciously ephemeral.

Anything but slight, anything but ephemeral, are the "Rig Veda" and the "Upanishads," from which, amongst other less ancient Indian poetry, Mr. Romesh Dutt has selected passages for translation. The short trochaic line adopted throughout causes a monotonous effect, and yet gives an impression of simplicity and directness. Let us quote two characteristic passages:

He the Father,—made us all,
He the Ruler,—hears our call,
He the Feeder,—feeds each nation,
Every creature in its station;
Names of many Gods he bears,
He is one,—we seek by prayers!

and again, from the recognition-scene in the "Bridal of Uma" (Siva in disguise has spoken slightly of himself):

Refuge of the wide creation,
Ruler of Immortals' fate,
Doth he brook our mortal customs,
Pomp and pageantry and state?
Void of wealth,—but source of riches,
Homeless,—ranging earth and sky,
Wild of mien,—his grace pervadeth,
Who can comprehend the High?
Wearing gems or coiling serpents,
Brodered lace, or skin and skull,
Who can guess his real image,
Glossed in worlds, pervading all?

* * *
Turned away the damsel
From the stranger guest,—
Through the bursting wild bark
Heaved her angry breast!
Smiling he embraced her,
All disguise removed,— Uma gazed in wonder,
Twas her lost and loved!

This "Bridal of Uma" is clearly a fine poem in the original, and we are grateful to Mr. Dutt for giving us in his naïve verses some glimpse of its quality.

Catullus is indeed a rod for the translator's back: his studied simplicity is as stubborn as Heine's lyric ease. To transform is almost inevitably to deform. Mr. Levett's versions have the merit of moving smoothly for the most part, and they will serve well the needs of any non-classical reader. We like to shake hands across the centuries with a real "good fellow" such as Catullus, and to pray once more that he has quite forgotten Lesbia. Hear his last cry (in Mr. Levett's version):

O Caelius, friend, methinks 'twas known to thee
How Lesbia once was all my joy and pride.
My Lesbia, my sweet Lesbia, who to me
Was more than kindred, yea and all beside,
For whose dear sake I willingly had died.

And now to hear that she
What she so hardly would bestow
On poor Catullus, though he loved her so,
She'll sell to any scoundrel that may come,
A common harlot in the streets of Rome.

THE AUTHORSHIP OF THE TRACT "ON THE CONSTITUTION OF ATHENS"

IN the ACADEMY of March 17 we intimated our disbelief that we have a genuine work of Aristotle in the very ancient, valuable and interesting essay on the Constitution of Athens, published for the British Museum by Dr. Kenyon in 1891. The weight of modern critical judgment is certainly on the side of its authenticity. But the disbeliever may without audacity express his doubts, seeing that those doubts have found lodgment in the minds of such scholars as Rose, Herwerden, Cauer, van Leeuwen, Droysen, Ruehl, Schwarcz.

The upholders of the Aristotelian authorship rely solely on internal historical evidence, refusing to open their minds to the evidence afforded by style. They urge that the latest limit of its composition must be B.C. 307, because the writer speaks of the Athens of his time as having only ten tribes, whereas in that year the number was raised to twelve. Dr. Kenyon's conclusion from various pieces of internal evidence is:

This work was therefore written, or at least revised, at the earliest in the last seven years of Aristotle's life, and at the latest in the fifteen years after his death.

But does the fact that it mentions no incident after B.C. 307 show that it must have been composed before that year? Inferences of this kind overlook the possibility that there may have been many successive editions in the century following Aristotle and even later of a (real or supposed) treatise by Aristotle on the Constitution of Athens. Each successive editor would be careful not to refer to any institution posterior to Aristotle, which would, of course, betray a post-Aristotelian origin. This would be no very difficult task to a pupil of Aristotle or to one who had read a clever pupil's notes of the philosopher's lectures, and who was well acquainted with the institutions of Athens up to the date of his death. But such an editor might, and probably would, have been quite incapable of reproducing the characteristics of the style and diction with which readers of the "Ethics," "Politics," "Poetics" and "Rhetoric" are familiar. Let us suppose that a minor politician of our own time wished to pass off an essay of his own as the work of Hallam, he would be careful not to refer to the "one man one vote" agitation or to that for taxation of ground-rents, tariff reform, devolution, or other political cries which have arisen since Hallam's time. But he might be quite incapable of achieving Hallam's manner of writing. Modern words and phrases would "crop up"; he would speak of "proving up to the hilt," he would use expressions like "with the result that," and he might even "avail of" the split infinitive. This is just what the author of the treatise under consideration has done. He has used a plainly post-Aristotelian diction, though he never refers to a post-Aristotelian institution. To make good our point we must give a few, perhaps the most striking, of such words and phrases which elsewhere occur only in later writers (references are to Dr. Kenyon's edition):

A.—WORDS:

- P. 14. ἔλεγεια "a poem in elegiac verse" (found in that sense first in Plutarch and Strabo.)
P. 17. καταφάτιζεν, "to declare in public" (Plut.).
P. 32. μεμψιουργία, "fault finding" (Lucian and Cic. Epp.).
P. 36. διαφημισμός, "a proclamation" (Dion. Hal.).
P. 65. ἐξαπορεῖν, "to be in great want" (Polyb., Dion. Hal., Diodorus).
P. 90. συναρτίσκεσθαι, "to be pleased with" (Sextus Empiricus).
P. 95. μανίαν, "to be mad" (Josephus).
P. 111. ἡμέρα ἀφέσιμος, "a holiday" (Aristides).

B.—PHRASES:

P. 33. ἀρχαίαν ἐποίησαν, which looks like a translation of antiquare, "to annul."

P. 65. οὐδενὶ δόγματι, "without any decree."

P. 76. ἡτῶτο δίδοναι, "he was not equal to giving."

P. 100. ἐπὶ πέρας ἤγαγε τὴν εἰρήνην, "he concluded the peace."

P. 109. πράγμασι συμμειγνύσθαι, "to be mixed up in affairs."

Perhaps the most remarkable post-classicism in the treatise is the appeal to the reader, as in διαγνώθε ὅπως, "observe how," in p. 29. Compare διασκόπει in Plutarch ("Solon" xix.) and the similar use of ὅρα in late writers. But no mere list of words and phrases can really convey the impression produced by the style as a whole. It is quite post-classical and redolent of the time of Diodorus Siculus.

In addition to the evidence of diction, the treatise by its matter and contents lends weight to the hypothesis that there were various tracts called Aristotle's "Constitution of Athens" in circulation in the ancient world. Some of the fragments quoted as from Aristotle's "Constitution of Athens" differ from the treatise as we now have it. Zenobius tells us that Aristotle related in the "Constitution of Athens" how Callicrates greatly increased the pay of the dicasts. Our treatise, though telling a good deal about Callicrates, does not mention this, nor does it appear likely that such a statement found a place in the missing beginning or end. Heraclides Ponticus wrote a work of a character similar to the tract before us. He admitted it to be a compilation from his master's works. Plutarch undoubtedly had a "Constitution of Athens" by Aristotle, from which he often quotes. But there is strong reason to believe that is not the "Constitution of Athens" edited by Dr. Kenyon in 1891. The tale about the request of Pisistratus for a body-guard is told by Aelian in a way which suggests that he had our tract before him; no such similarity is to be found in Plutarch's version of the same affair. Aristotle ("Pol." ii. 12) implies that the Areopagus was an institution of Solon; the "Constitution" places it earlier than Draco; Plutarch combats the view of the "Politics," but does not quote the "Constitution," in support of his own. Plutarch, as well as Harpocration, ascribes the Council and the property qualification to Solon; the "Constitution" makes them Draconian. But the most remarkable proof that Plutarch's "Constitution" was not the one now in our hands is that the latter teems with new illustrations of the address and craftiness of Themistocles, to which Plutarch does not even allude in his life of Themistocles. Could the most anecdotal of biographers have refrained from recording incidents so congenial to his principle of biography and so confirmatory of his view of the wily Athenian's nature? But the general impression which the whole manner and style of the tract conveys is, as we have said, more powerful than any list of words or phrases. There is none of that generalisation so characteristic of the Stagirite. There is uncharacteristic false perspective, as in the diffuse account of the Four Hundred. We do not meet a single one of those profound thoughts which so often startle us in the "Politics," "Ethics," "Rhetoric" and "Poetics." The nearest we come to a comment on human nature is that procrastination is a common trait. There is more original thought in the recognition of the characteristic clemency of democracy (p. 59) and the remark (p. 79) that "though a mob can be cajoled easily enough, it is apt to vent its hatred afterwards on those who have led it astray." But the Aristotelian plummet sounds far deeper than these.

In connection with the precious find of the British Museum it is interesting to note how individualistic, even grandmotherly, the municipal legislation of ancient Athens was. Sky-signs were prohibited, and no such structure as the Temple Bar of a quarter of a century ago would have been permitted. Much attention was devoted to the relief of disabled paupers and the exposing of fraudulent applicants for state aid. There was a stated fare for the hire of female dancers and musicians. There was ample provision for the inspection of weights and measures, the prevention of adulteration and the regulation of street traffic. One by-law rehabilitates a doctrine of our childhood, which subsequent learning was supposed to have invalidated. Hall doors opening on the street were forbidden; hence we may infer that crepuerunt fores and such expressions really did refer to the tap on the inside of the door to warn passers-by that the door was about to be opened, and not merely to the sound made by the door in opening, as Becker, Guhl and Koner and others will have it. The treatise testifies to the truth of what used to be considered a joke of Lucian's ("Hermotimus," c. 64), that the Areopagus sometimes held their meetings by night so that they might only hear the arguments on both sides and might not be misled by the appearance or demeanour of the speakers. We heartily subscribe to the judgment of Herwerden (which we translate from the Latin) in his edition of 1891:

Even supposing it should be proved by further investigations of learned men that the "Constitution of Athens" is utterly unworthy of so eminent an author as Aristotle, yet nobody will be disposed to deny that the newly discovered treatise is from many points of view valuable for the study of ancient Athens and of Greek literature.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

GREY GRISOLD

ALL on the misty mountain
In the driving rain,
There saw I Grey Grisold
Bowed under his chain.
The fairies have bound him
With his knees up to his chin,
All in the grey weather
Weeping for his sin.

He lives on the lone mountain
Sitting on a grey stone,
Where the wind pipes sadly
O'er the moorland lone.
I saw his gnarled fingers
And his bent bald crown,
I heard his tears falling,
Falling endless down.

They have fallen so long
To a stream they have grown:
They have worn two furrows
In the grey stone.
Through the rocks and the heather
They go flowing down,
Where the plovers fly wailing
Over bog-lands brown.

Grey Grisold was taken
From his bags of gold—
The red gold he got
For the soul that he sold.
To a grey stone they bound him
With his knees up to his chin,
All on the high mountain
Weeping for his sin.

C. FOX SMITH.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

AN EARLY UNIVERSITY CALENDAR

MOST annual publications seem to be the reverse of Peter Pan. While he never grew up, they appear never to have been young. Take, for instance, the Cambridge University Calendar. Who, on regarding this cold, correct publication, would dream that it had ever been aught but a dull recorder of University life? And yet it was once a timid, diffident creature, apologetic to obsequiousness, and painfully anxious to obtain the approbation of the grave and reverend signors who formed the close oligarchy holding sway over the republic of learning that extended for a mile every way round Great St. Mary's.

The copy before us, though not a first edition, is still within the age-limit of Herod's innocents. It is dated 1802, and the name of the Editor appears on the title-page. There is a dedication to H.R.H. Prince William of Gloucester in the best eighteenth-century manner, beside which the most fervid products of the modern art of writing testimonials seem pale.

Should [says the author] the compilation but afford, at a vacant hour, the smallest gratification or amusement to your ROYAL HIGHNESS, the expectations of the Editor will be more than answered, and his labours required.

This discourse, which we might describe as an address to the Upper House, is followed by another to the faithful Commons. It dilates on past and prospective favours:

Through the polite permission of the Rev. and Right Worshipful, the Vice-Chancellor, the several names in the Triposes have been again compared with the Subscription Book in his possession; yet, notwithstanding the precaution, the capricious manner in which some living characters have therein been subscribed with regard to the spelling of their names, renders, in some few instances, accuracy an impossibility:

a curious comment on the state of University orthography of the period.

An Introduction follows. The author has a short and pleasing way with that new-fangled creature, the Archæologist. In a note on the foundation of the colleges, he informs us that "those who wish to dabble in the mud of Antiquity and Monkish fiction, in order to stamp HONOUR upon our establishments, we refer to Dr. Caius." Having thus consigned to the scrap-heap the refounder of Caius and Gonville College and all his works, our historian passes to a detailed description of the intricate constitution of the University, with its checks and counter-checks, which seems to have been specially devised for preventing the passage of any kind of reform, and which was finally swept away by the great revolution of about thirty years ago. Among the numerous officials appear two Taxors, whose function was "to regulate the markets, examine the assize of bread and the lawfulness of all weights and measures, and to call all the abuses and defects thereof into the Commissary's court." Their duties appear to have been especially exercised at the time of the Midsummer and Sturtich fairs. The latter name is a shortened form of Stowerbridge, as it is now, indeed, spelt and pronounced. We have here, in fact, an interesting case of the influence of the written word on the hitherto accepted pronunciation, an influence which came in with the nursery governess and has been intensified by the self-educator revival of learning. We might remark that the pronunciation of many English place-names, which locally have often been shortened and abbreviated, has, during the last twenty years, been revised and fixed by that arbitrè elegantiarum, the railway porter. He has replaced Hunston by Hunstanton, Lowstoff by Lowestoft, Cicester by Cirencester; while the 'bus-conductor talks of Hole-born and, if you ask for a ticket to Tibbald's Road, replies, "The-o-bald's Rowd? Yes, sir."

The college deans do not seem to have ranked very high in these close preserves of the established religion. Under the name of Conducts, they are described as nothing more than hired chaplains, to perform the drudgery (!) and some of the duties of the college chapels. The chapels themselves appear to have met with equally scanty reverence. We read that "Compositions, Latin or English, are weekly delivered by the Pupils, either in writing or viva voce in their respective chapels."

A convenient backdoor to a degree was provided for those clergy who had the wherewithal to pay the necessary fees. After ten years inscription and three terms residence they could purchase the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. Of these "ten year men," however, our author remarks: "There are none such in Oxford: and they acquire little esteem here."

The section of Studies and Exercises deserves to be quoted entire. We are told that the ordinary course of study preparatory to the degree of A.B.:

is very judicious and calculated to form the mind both for science and taste. It may be considered under the three heads of Natural Philosophy, Moral Philosophy, and the Belles Lettres. . . . A superficial knowledge of Natural Philosophy, the smattering obtained by skimming over a variety of books, or attending a vast variety of lectures, are here held in no estimation.

It is a little disconcerting to find in a later passage that the bare minima for a degree comprised no more than the first book of Euclid, Arithmetic, Vulgar and Decimal Fractions, Simple and Quadratic Equations, and Locke and Paley; and that this mince baggage of knowledge had only been compulsory for the preceding three years. Locke and Paley, of course, belong to the course of Moral Philosophy, which, we learn, is no less judicious. A beginning is made with the former, plus Logic. In the second year the student takes up Paley (now the only survivor in the Little Go of the many learned doctors whom our author enumerates)—Hartley, Burlamaqui, Rutherford, Clarke, Butler, Law. In addition, what we should call Biblical archæology is studied in Beausobre and other writers. In some colleges, however, sad to relate, these Scripture lectures "are strangely neglected and the course is either very meagre or very irregular." Belles Lettres includes an Oration of Demosthenes, Lysias, Isocrates, a Greek play, Longinus, Cicero, Quintilian, and select portions of the Historians. One cannot fail to note the overwhelming amount of prose in comparison with the scanty allowance of verse. But what is more surprising is to find, as may have already been noticed, compulsory Mathematics and Paley, but no compulsory Greek, not even compulsory Latin. Many people will be surprised to learn that, while Cambridge University is several hundred years old, compulsory Greek has yet to attain its centenary—which possibly it may never do.

At the beginning of January the names of intending candidates are collected by a bull-dog and handed to a moderator who transcribes them into a book with appropriate marks given him by the several Tutors, such as "reading," "non-reading," etc. The men are then called up to take part in regular syllogistic disputes or "wrangles" in the Senate House. Each Respondent is pitted in turn against three Opponents. The Moderator acts as umpire and assigns each man a particular mark. οἱ πολλοί, generally "non-reading" men, only appear one or twice in these verbal duels, and on some of them a descendās or order to quit the box is inflicted. . . . This, however, is not very frequent; whenever it does happen, however, the stigma is indelibly fixed upon the unfortunate subject.

The disputants having been classified, the Examination proper begins on the first Monday in Lent:

Immediately after the University clock has struck eight, the names are called over and the Absentees being marked, are subject to certain fines. The classes to be examined are called out, and proceed to their appointed tables, where they find pens, ink and paper provided in great abundance. In this manner, with the utmost order and regularity, more than two-thirds of the young men are set to work within less than five minutes after the clock has struck eight. . . . The young men hear the Propositions or Questions delivered by the Examiners; they instantly apply themselves; demonstrate, prove, work out, and write down fairly and legibly (otherwise their labour is of little avail) the answers required. All is silence; nothing heard save the voice of the Examiners, or the gentle request of some one who may wish a repetition of the enunciation. It requires every person to use the utmost dispatch, for as soon as the Examiners perceive any one to have finished his paper and subscribed his name to it, another Question is immediately given. A smattering demonstration will weigh little in the scale of merit; every thing must be fully, clearly and scientifically brought to a true conclusion, and though a person may compose his papers amid hurry and embarrassment, he ought ever to recollect that his papers are all inspected, by the united ability of six Examiners, with coolness, impartiality and circumspection. No one can anticipate questions; for in the course of five minutes he may be dragged from Euclid to Newton, from the humble arithmetic of Boneycastle to the abstruse analytics of Waring. Printed problems are delivered to each person of the first and second class; these he takes with him to any window he pleases, where there are pens, ink and paper prepared for his operations. It is needless to add that every person now uses his utmost exertions and solves as many Problems as his abilities and time will allow.

Copying, cheating and the like were evidently all in their infancy. The whole thing recalls a parlour game.

At nine a halt is called for breakfast. At half-past nine the examination begins again and lasts till eleven. Two hours are assigned to lunch. After another space of two hours the Senate House is cleared for half an hour, during which the Proctors regale some of the dons and superior undergraduates with tea and coffee. The examination is once more resumed and continued till five. Even then all is not over. At seven o'clock "the first four classes go to the Senior Moderator's rooms, where they continue till nine to solve Problems; and are treated with wine and fruit." Quite a family party! The programme is the same for the succeeding day, not forgetting the "entertainment" at the senior Moderator's. Thereafter Mathematics give way to Logic and Religious Evidences. Some of the questions subjoined reveal that the system of cramming up scraps and snippets of knowledge goes back a long way in University Education. We have such five minutes' conundrums as:

From whence do you know that you exist?
Prove there is a God, independent of Revelation.
Has the fœtus in the womb any idea?
What is the distinction between a Madman and an Ideot?

The examination concludes at five o'clock, but the fatigue of the Examiners is by no means diminished; for during the whole of this as on the preceding nights they have a multitude of papers to inspect, and to affix to each its degree of merit, according to which a new management of the classes is made out, called Brackets, which practically give a man his place. Sometimes two or three are found to be so deficient, "in which case they are PLUCKED": i.e., turned over to Ash Wednesday (Dunce's Day). So little "is required of these low men . . . compassion is totally out of the question." Those who have passed are divided into Wranglers, Senior Optimes, and Junior Optimes. The rest are called oi πολλοι, or the Multitude. The last Junior Optime obtains the appellation of the wooden spoon.

The last three or four of the oi πολλοι who are hard run for their degrees are arranged alphabetically, and usually obtain some distinctive title; such as the Alphabet, Elegant Extracts, Rear-guard, Invincibles, etc., or sometimes their titles are deduced from their number and concurring circumstances of the day as The Twelve Judges or Apostles, the Consulate, the Executive Directory or Septimvirate, etc.

The authorities formerly had the right to insert four names in the list, none however are "so ridiculous to accept" at present "this cobweb Plumage."

Those who fall ill before the final trial are allowed to pass a trifling Examination and appear in the list as aegroti . . . But an indulgence of this sort naturally introduces abuses; a Nervous Fever, the Scald of a Tea Kettle, and a Bruise on the Hand frequently put a period to the expectations of their Friends.

Lectures, as a rule, do not appear to have been very much run after. The students in Medicine were not required to attend any courses at all. We also read that the Hebrew Professor's lectures are discontinued for lack of suitable encouragement, that the Lady Margaret Professor's were likewise relinquished for want of a sufficient audience, and that another gentleman who attempted to give a course on Political Economy met with a similar neglect. On the other hand, the Professors had a wide latitude of choice. The holder of the chair of Chemistry, finding the ordinary field of study already occupied, took for his subject practical mechanics.

Having provided himself with a number of Brass Wheels of all forms and sizes, such that any two of them could work with each other, the Cogs being all equal; and also with a variety of Axles, Bars, Screws, Clamps, etc., he constructs at pleasure, with the addition of the peculiar parts, Working Models of almost every kind of Machine. He explains, particularly, the agency of Steam, which is the GREAT cause of the modern improvement and extension of Manufactures.

We have here an embryo of the School of Engineering that was only really established some sixty years later.

The foot-notes to the lists of former Triposes provide some entertaining information. A certain Rosenhagen of St. John's is credited with being the supposed author of the Letters of Junius. Another student is described as the Secretary of a Humane Society for the clergy, not indeed to prevent cruelty to parsons, but to provide for their relief. Another's fame consists in his having been inhumanely murdered by the Natives of Owyhee, while the Librarian of the University is distinguished "for a prize he obtained when travelling bachelor at Antwerp against a numerous body of candidates, for a conspicuously accurate anatomical Drawing."

In the good old glorious days of fat, not to say obese, abuses, it is interesting to note the printed list of tips and pourboires which neither high nor low were ashamed of taking. For the A.B. not only did the college and University officials receive a fee, but there was a regular scale of backsheesh for the porter, cook and butler, gentlemen of property being mulcted at a still higher rate than the others. As for "drunks," they ranged from two shillings and sixpence for ale for the college servants, to a sovereign for the Fellows in the case of the A.M., which was spent on the incepting wine, followed by a further call for three pounds for Wine and fruit at the Commencement dinner. A still higher standard of conviviality was demanded of the Bachelor of Divinity. He had to pay his footing by a breakfast to the Fellows, wine in hall, and supper. The same high tariff was imposed on those who wished to take their D.D. Well may the critics of the period have spoken of fleshly divines. These ephemeral orgies, however, were nothing to the Saturnalia which lasted for the twelve days following December 25, for which the lay fellows specially came from London. The author complacently indicates that these seasonable hospitalities were especially conspicuous at his own college.

The book concludes with a list of the college servants. It expressly states that it merely contains the names of those who hold the principal offices. "A considerable number more are engaged in the less honourable departments." Among those who figure on the table of honour are the Butler, Cook, Porter, and Chapel Clerk, Barber and Jips (gyps). Of these only the Barber seems to have fallen from his high estate.

C. B.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Growth of a Poem," by R. L. Tyrrell.]

FICTION

The Mayor of Troy. By "Q." (Methuen, 6s.)

"Of course, if you don't know Troy," says "Q," as he champs at the restraining bit of his Prologue. Not know Troy! Dear Troy Town. We have known and loved it by repute ever since the "astonishing history" was given to the world, and that must be nearly a score of years ago; while as for "Q," he has, we suppose, known and loved it just as long as Mr. Quiller-Couch has known Fowey in the Delectable (lately pronounced as Dialectible) Duchy. But even in "Q's" knowledge there were, it seems, lacunæ;

for one of these was filled up the other day when there came into his hands a manuscript concerning a certain famous Mayor of Troy, a very king in the land a century ago, who, going involuntary to France in the war time, came back ten years later to find that his subjects, despite the statue they had raised to his memory, had forgotten the very face of Troy's chief magistrate. What wonder that "Q" is exhilarated at his find? "Listen! Stretch out your hands," he cries. "Open your mouth and shut your eyes!" For "It is a draught of Troy's own vintage that I offer you: racy, fragrant of the soil, from a cask this hundred years sunk, so that it carries a smack, too, of the submerging brine." Now perhaps the most remarkable thing about this salty beverage (if so we may call it) is the wonderful effect it has had upon the historian himself. It has affected him with a sense of the ludicrous. Under its influence the very spirit of the mock-heroic rides him for a while willy-nilly. Only a recollected incident surcharged with pathos enables him to shake it off. Of that incident later. At the start we are in the midst of the great volunteer movement of 1804; surrounded, as it were, by the "Royal Reds" (103 men and 5 uniforms), the Mevagissey Battery (nomen and 121 uniforms); the Looe Diehards and the Troy Volunteer Artillery. They are all mock-heroic (why not? the French did not come, so why be serious?) and most mock-heroic of all is the worshipful Solomon Hymen, Mayor of Troy, and major in command of the gallants of Troy. In every aspect of egregious pomposity we see him, now lording it at home over a mixed retinue, now delivering judgment; and now at last (blindly approaching fate) leading a night expedition by sea, to test the defences of Talland Cove. Alas! behind the patriotic design lay one darkly doubtful, connected with "Guernsey merchandise." That was the beginning of the end for the gallant major. We must pass over the miserable betrayal of the men of Troy by an irascible squire; the freaks of fortune which passed their potentate by way of a dirty fish-pond and the gallery of a Plymouth theatre to the deck of his Majesty's bomb Vesuvius as a pressed seaman, preferring to linger a moment upon what we conceive to have been the turning-point in his record. In Troy Major Hymen's resemblance to the Prince Regent was considered quite remarkable. It so happened that one fine morning His Royal Highness himself inspected the squadron at Portsmouth, and as he was rowed round the Vesuvius, a frantic figure besought him from her deck to obtain justice for an unlawfully kidnapped dignitary. "What a damn funny-looking little man," said the Prince. At the contemplation of this unkindest cut of all, the historian's merry jocosity fails him, and a different spirit perceptibly succeeds it. He shows poor Solomon, the sport of fate, flipped, as a man might flip a beetle into the night. He is capsized, imprisoned, crippled: the trappings of his vanity peel off him like a skin, but, beneath it all, real courage and tenacity of purpose protect him with an unsuspected armour. He is no longer egregious in the modern, but egregius in the classic sense. Here lies the true word that underlies the jest, and in the account of his return we are very near real life with its ironies and changes. Only, we should have preferred taking leave of him in the musty uniform which he donned for a moment in the deserted precincts of a little museum containing relics of his fame. Impossible, no doubt, to say what would have happened had he been discovered in it. But the impossible is often solved in life and fiction.

Traffic. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON. (Duckworth, 6s.)

WE sometimes meet with novelists who are so eager to prove the inevitability of the trend of their stories that they quite forget to weigh them in relation to the general scheme of life. Of such, to judge by his latest essay in fiction, is Mr. E. Temple Thurston, and we can only regret that he should have treated so pitiful a subject as this "story of a faithful woman" in so inexorable a manner. We say inexorable, for Mr. Thurston seems throughout to usurp the function of those pitiless Gods, who in the case of Nanno Troy were not "cheated of their game." When the goose girl in the fairy-tale marries Prince Charming, we wish her joy, just because it is a fairy-tale, without bothering our heads as to how many goose girls might expect to share her fine fortune. But when, on the other hand, a pure, sweet-natured Irish peasant girl, burdened with illegitimacy, is made, on that score, the sport of a malign fate, and headed off at every turn towards disgrace and ignominy, common humanity (which is a kindlier thing than it is represented in these gruesome pages) instinctively searches for loopholes of escape from such a triumph of the devil. Now, we do not believe that the revelation of the facts of her birth would have broken down at one blow Nanno's refusal to marry an irredeemable blackguard; still less do we believe that, when (contrary to the advice of one priest) she had escaped from him to London, she would (on the advice of another) have sent for him again. Why, too, when she had turned a fresh page of life in a London shop where her history was unknown, should she have been confronted everywhere by people of both sexes determined to ruin her? Why should her one ally, a man of the world who loved her and knew her story, have proved incompetent to protect her till the situation had become so hideous as that described in the last chapters? Mr. Thurston's reply is implied in his title and illustrated everywhere in his book. He presents his story, not as an abnormal instance of outrageous fortune, but as an ordinary instance of the operations of the law of "traffic." He takes it for granted that animalism is the most potent factor in the heart of man. When the solitary man awaits the approach of a solitary woman—"There is some instinct which is almost primæval—certainly animal—which stirs in his mind." What nonsense this is! And again: "The working man gets drunk on Saturday night; on that day on which his salary is paid the young clerk gratifies his appetites." In any general sense that is about as true as that, if you surround yourself with the handiwork of men's fingers, the fact that a sky exists will be beyond your comprehension. In matters of detail, Mr. Thurston spares us nothing. We really wish he would try his hand at a goose girl and a fairy-prince.

Hilligenei. Von GUSTAV FRENSSSEN. (Grote'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung.)

A NEW book by the most popular writer in Germany—for so, since the success of "Jörn Uhl," Gustav Frenssen may be called—is somewhat of a literary event. "Hilligenei" is a story of the Holstein coast—a story of fishers and farmers and parish schoolmasters: it pictures the life of a simple, hardworking community that has many points of resemblance to that described by the late George MacDonald in his Scottish peasant stories. The charm of this book, as of its predecessors, is in its atmosphere, and the naïve freshness of its feeling and description. The author is a realist, but his realism is as tender as that of Rembrandt when he painted his mother reading her Bible. There is the same instinct for the pathos and poetry of hard and humble life in some of these sketches. Note the return of Piet Boje, the prosperous sailor, to his home, when he takes the knitting-machine away from his old widowed mother, and says she shall never again toil at it for daily bread. But in the evening, when she thinks she is unobserved, she creeps back to it:

"You took it away so quick . . . I could not think what I was doing . . . I cannot think when I am not sitting at the machine . . . I always used to think of you and your father when I was working at it. . . ." And she sobbed bitterly.
"Well," he said, "be quiet, mother. Come . . . be still. You shall work at it two or three hours a day . . . not more. . . Come, now."

Yet the movement of modern ideas is very perceptible in this primitive community, the revolt against long accepted conventions very definite. Hilligenei means "Holy Land" and the little town was of old the home of a sect of enthusiasts who looked for the speedy coming of the Heavenly Kingdom. This old enthusiasm under a different form burns in the heart of the youth whose personality gives a kind of unity to the rather straggling story. Kai Jans has been trained for the Lutheran pastorate, but Lutheranism, as established by law, is far from satisfying him. He ponders the Gospel story in the light of the "higher criticism" and arrives at what he considers the essence of Christianity, as discovered by the "wise and brave German men" who, "unsatisfied by the cold and repellent lore of the Church," undertook "to investigate the Book as though it were an ordinary book."

Just as once in Luther's day a new warm interest awoke in "God's Word" and a new love of him, so in these our days there has flamed out a new love of the modest hero who has been hidden away under all sorts of wonderful disguises. . .

He was a Man. There is proof enough of it. First, he said so. Secondly, he was in his thought a child of his time. Third, he possesses an individual character. Fourth, he had a development. Fifth, his nature was not quite free from evil. Sixth, he was mistaken, especially in this, that he did not come again, and the Kingdom of God did not come either. . . However good and wise and brave he was, he went neither in deed nor thought beyond the measure of men. But he has brought to us out of his beautiful human soul, the belief in the divine dignity and worth of every human soul.

There will be nothing new in this to any one who has studied the recent developments of German theology, but it is always somewhat of an epoch, when ideas of this kind descend from the lecture-rooms of learned professors and become incorporated in the popular literature of a country. The divinity student dies, having thrown his ideas into a pamphlet for private circulation, which we are given to understand is to be the seed of a new Reformation. As a story "Hilligenei" in spite of many passages of great interest and charm, will not bear comparison with either "Jörn Uhl" or "Die Drei Getreun" but as an illustration of the trend of thought in Protestant Germany it is worthy of notice.

A Dreamer's Book. Being Fantasies and Daydreams. By J. H. PEARCE. (Bullen, 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS well-intentioned little book is most moral, most melancholy. It is made up of sixteen or seventeen parables, brief allegorical tales mainly drawn from life, all highly fanciful, but all in one tune, or rather, we should say, all accompanied by the drone of one sad moral. Such joys as life affords are but illusions, happy while undetected, but like the flowers of the field in the land of the Psalmist: a wind passeth over them and they are gone. For illusion, disillusion, death, or some impersonation or prophecy of death moves through all of these fantasies, and all tend to the grave. Reading them one after another is like listening to the old chime:

We must all die:
All die we must;
Die must we all
Die all we must.

Therefore it is not a cheerful little book; neither a book for a rainy day, nor for a day of sunshine. Not a book for the little ones (though it has a look of it), for it would haunt their dreams; not for youth, who could not endure ten pages of it; nor even welcome to age, which, however much or little, has its own memories. What, then, can be said of "The Dreamer's Book"? There is much fancy in the writing of it: here and there a fine conceit, and again and again a touch of poetry, and therewithal good intention. But the reading of it is to be thought of as well as the writing; and we are compelled to say, though with sincere reluctance, that though there may be many who might like its melancholy for their own perusal, there are few to whom it could be offered as a gift without risk of unkindness.

The Divine Gift. By R. M. LEWIS. (Lamley, 5s.)

THE freshness of the conception and the delightful keenness with which this book is written, go a very long way towards extenuating certain faults both of phrasing and construction. They are, to use a hackneyed expression, the defects of the author's qualities, and they are defects which experience will certainly eradicate. The Luciverians have found the secret of immortality; they are able to prolong their physical existence interminably, by the power of will and intellect and the help of certain drugs. From fire alone are they not immune. In the first book we learn how this secret was discovered, how mortals gradually have died and how intellect rules with these immortals, who neither eat nor drink nor beget children, and for whom everything is done by machinery. To them comes one who, centuries before, had left them, journeying in quest of a new race. His arrival creates unprecedented excitement among the Luciverians, who have become dull, thin-voiced, listless, with the exception of a girl Avis, in whom a vague hope lingers—of what, she does not know. He tells them that he has indeed found a new race, and they are called the Vitians or Living Ones: they have developed from pigmy men, to whom they minister, by cultivation of the soul; death comes to their bodies, and without great sorrow. Two Vitians, Astro and his brother, have guided the Luciverian back to his land. Astro sees Avis and loves her. When he returns to his people he cannot dismiss her image from his mind, and at last he leaves his people and goes to her. Then Avis finds out what hope has supported her through the long centuries. But Astro gradually becomes ill and she takes him back to the Vitians, only to be repudiated by them and to die. There is much in the thought of the book that is suggestive: but it is a mistake to insist, as the author is inclined to insist, upon material details. The machines for dressing and undressing, for arranging furniture, for grafting roses, might with advantage be omitted. They tease credulity and are out of the real picture, which is fantastic and charming.

Loaves and Fishes. By BERNARD CAPES. (Methuen, 6s.)

WE have always understood that the British public has an invincible objection to short stories, and we wish to begin by assuring it that it will lose a varied entertainment if it objects without trial to these. There are twenty-two stories in the volume and every one of them has an idea, in nearly every case a good one. Now, a great many long novels appear that have no ideas at all, and very few have twenty-two in one cover. In reading these stories, to be sure, the mind must move quickly from Napoleon in Spain to Charles II. in England, from sleeping girls to burglars, backwards and forwards between farce and tragedy. But no effort is involved. The author has a light touch, a fertile invention and a vivid style. Sometimes, to quote from himself, his nerves seem to be jangled into disorder inclining him to imaginative hyperbole. He likens thunder clouds to electric tramcars and a man's fingers to red radishes—similes that jar the imagination instead of helping it. Once or twice, too, he journeys over the border in search of the horrible and the macabre. At any rate, we recommend people to read the quaint, tender story of a Sleeping Girl called "The Ravelled Sleeve"; and a fancy as elusive and vibrant as air called "A Ghost Child." But they had better pass over "The Soul of the Professor" sandwiched in between. We know that in the days of Burke people were smothered with pitch-plasters and brought to the dissecting-room, but most of us do not want these abominations dished up again in stories.

Blanche Esmead. By ELLA FULLER MAITLAND. (Methuen, 6s.)

THE "Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre" was one of those rambling books that derive their charm from the author's personality. We cannot remember that it left an impression of neuralgia of the soul or of the anæmic refinement that is really a superficial refinement because it can be tortured almost to death by the wrong furniture and other people's wrong clothes. We concede that a man who is "cheery and genial" must be a tiresome companion, and that a husband who talks of "the wife" should marry a woman who would like it. It is impossible to imagine two people less suited to each other than John and Blanche Esmead, and we sympathise with them in turn: with Blanche when her husband speaks with awe of "the aristocracy," and with John when his wife lies about in flame-coloured tea-gowns instead of helping him with his parish. Mrs. Fuller Maitland cannot really believe that because women are refined they are quite defenceless and incapable; yet she gives that impression in this novel by her presentment of Zéphine and Blanche. One lady lets herself be bullied by two insufferable step-daughters, whose rudeness makes her heart beat; and the other is so backboneless that the possibility of changing a grate that will not burn and a Mary Ann who cannot cook never occurs to her. In fact Blanche marries a man who is quite patently ill-bred and, as a matter of course, his speech and manner jar on her. But if she had not been sick of soul she would have stirred herself a little more to make the best of things. She might have improved the house, dismissed the cook, and threatened John with divorce if he called her "wife" in public. But the only occasion on which Blanche shows any sense of humour is when she comes to life because John tells her she is going to die. It is, we need hardly say, poor John who dies. His execution was a foregone conclusion necessary to the complete cure of his wife's neuralgia.

FINE ART

WATER-COLOURS BY MR. D. S. MACCOLL

WHILST Mr. MacColl is known to the general public as an eminent art-critic, and to some of us pre-eminent—MacColl first and the rest of us nowhere—his own work as an artist is less familiar. Therefore Messrs. Carfax have done well to collect some of his water-colours, to criticise which will be a chastened joy. Some of them are quite charming: the subject, unusual for him, called Théâtre de Verdure, which was exhibited at the New English Art Club; the perfect Anemones, remarkably full in tone for water-colour; the capital Stormy Venice, and best of all, the exquisite Harbour, Dieppe. It seems to me that his best work is that in which a little gouache has been used, as in these and in the two interiors of Our Lady of the Waves. Yet the majority of these pictures are drawings, tinted in pure water-colour. There is some charm in the untroubled wash of colour laid once for all on the paper and never touched again. Whistler used it incomparably, but to some moderns—Mr. MacColl, I am afraid, among the number—it is a fetish. After all, Turner, the greatest water-colourist of all, worried his work into beauty; and if the right colour cannot be struck at the first shot—of which feat Mr. Brabazon alone among moderns is capable—then that particular charm should be sacrificed. Mr. MacColl's drawing is excessively summary—not slight, for by slightness is suggested flexibility, evanescence, sensitiveness; and his drawing has none of these qualities. It is not sensitive and tremulous with feeling, as all fine drawing is, but hard, dashing and impatient, a series of telegraphic dashes, long and short, which too often convey no message, or a very coarse one. Coarseness is not necessarily a blemish in water-colour; Turner was often coarse, Girtin almost invariably. But their coarseness arose from saying very little with simplicity, truth and deliberation as far as it went, not in saying a great deal impatiently and incorrectly. The washes of colour, too, often convey no message. Ruskin quotes Turner's word for finishing a picture—"carry forward." In what way does the colour of A Belfry at Dinan carry forward the drawing, supplement it, that is to say, add some fact of which the ordinary beholder is not already aware? That bricks are red, and trees green, we know already. There is a tree on the right of this picture indicated in a few lines, and on the top of these lines is laid a single wash of viridian. If the artist had painted it prussian blue or rose madder, I should have been excited and interested; if he had painted it the true colour of nature, I should have been respectful; as he has only stated that the tree was green, he has added nothing to his drawing. If these touches of local colour were in harmonious relation, their untruth would not be disturbing. The beautiful nonsense of Mr. Conder, for instance, is acceptable.

One quality Mr. MacColl's work has to perfection—the spacing and arrangement of the whole in the frame. The views of Honfleur are excellent in this respect, La Lieutenantance, The Post, Honfleur (morning), St. Catherine's Quay. The accidents and blemishes in a water-colour sketch have a charm of their own, but they should not form the raison d'être of the picture. Thus, the repentirs of a great draughtsman are no blemish, being inevitable, and in their nature full of intense meaning; but a drawing which is composed of repentirs, which is all corrections, and yet is not correct, is unsatisfying. Again, water-colour on smooth paper is apt to run into hard edges. Turner used this characteristic when it was wanted, and in painting a distant mountain would turn his paper upside down, so as to get this hard edge as sharp as possible. But neither Turner nor any other artist up to a few years ago, would have allowed hard edges in the modulation of a cloud.

The examples I have seen lately in pure water-colour have convinced me that it is a dead art and cannot be revived. It requires the conventional eye and habit of mind; whereas gouache, or water-colour in which white is used, however sparingly, is peculiarly adapted to modern vision, as is proved by Mr. Brabazon and by the few examples of Mr. MacColl to be seen here. The grand style of Prout and Girtin had an excellent exponent in the late L. J. Wood, some of whose works are now on view at the Modern Gallery, but he was born in 1813. The picture of Dietz on the Lahn, one of the finest, belongs to its own period, and is no more to be emulated with sincerity than Cimabue or Mabuse.

Mr. MacColl avoids the pitfall of archaism, but proves himself a modern handling an archaic medium.

B. S.

MUSIC

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN

It does not seem a hard problem to select two choral works of sufficient length to make an evening's entertainment of sufficient homogeneity to avoid the incongruous, yet to judge from the rarity of the achievement is to conclude that the task is more difficult than at first sight appears. Mr. Fagge and the London Choral Society have resorted to various expedients, when a single work was not long enough to fill the programme, of which the most unhappy was that of following the Brahms Requiem and "Vier Ernste Gesänge," with Cliffe's "Ode to the North East Wind," while the happiest was letting Cowen's rollicking "John Gilpin" succeed the rather pompous ending of Elgar's "Caractacus." One feared, however, lest Sir Hubert Parry's "Pied Piper of Hamelin" would be similarly used as restorative after the insufferable tedium of Saint Saëns's "Samson and Delilah" at their last concert, and probably most people were glad to find that it was assigned the first place, and that the audience were allowed to enjoy it while in possession of their full faculties; for, truth to tell, when Samson smothered the Philistines in his last effort, he pulled the roof about the ears of the audience to such purpose as to rob most of us of the power of any further listening to music, for one night at any rate. As it was, the "Pied Piper" received a spirited performance and a spirited hearing too; for both performers and audience entered heartily into it. The comedy is perfect because the music exactly clothes the words aright. Those who heard the first London performance without previous knowledge of the work might easily miss many of its most subtle points, because its salient features are broad, striking, and of course expected. One knew exactly how Sir Hubert Parry would treat the bustling chorus where the rats of all shapes and sizes tumble from the houses and follow the Piper to the river's brink, and there perish, and it is both vivid and funny at the same time, just like Browning's words; but much of the poem is harder to set to music, and it is in dealing with words which look as though they could and would not be done into music, that Sir Hubert Parry is triumphant where a lesser man would have failed. For, instance, these lines look impossible at first sight:

The Piper's face fell, and he cried,
 "No trifling! I can't wait! beside,
 I've promised to visit by dinner-time
 Bagdat, and accept the prime
 Of the head cook's pottage, all he's rich in,
 For having left, in the Caliph's kitchen,
 Of a nest of scorpions no survivor.

Here is the chance for a dull moment or else that over-attention to a small point which annoys us in the declamatory passages of many modern writers. Sir Hubert, however, carries it through with such a perfect accentuation that instead of appearing an awkward digression it takes its place, as in the poem, as an element contributing towards the climax which it precedes, when the Mayor defiantly cries:

Blow your pipe there till you burst.

Again a delicate feeling for accent helps him to deal successfully with Browning's difficult double rhymes. The lines:

You hope, because you're old and obese,
 To find in the furry civil robe ease?

show Browning at his worst and Parry at his best in this respect. By the way, these lines are omitted from the words as printed at the beginning of the vocal score, which perhaps suggests that the composer at first discarded them. Such points would become failures if they were heard or noticed in performance, but together they all contribute to the general impression that the words have dictated every note, in fact that this is the music that belongs to them. Then, the orchestra has its own comment on each situation, sometimes adopting the leit-motif principle, more often supplying the necessary rhythmic element which the choral declamatory passages lack, occasionally indulging in purely descriptive freaks which are the more effective because only rarely used. The best of these, perhaps, is that which illustrates the squeaking of the rats in "fifty different sharps and flats." A cadence, which was to have been in D major, is interrupted by the bass being forced up to A sharp, from which the fiddles scurry away with a rapid cadenza passage over B flat harmony and one almost seems to catch sight of a tail disappearing down a hole. The Piper, of course, has his piquant little theme, or rather group of themes which suggest alike his character and his piping and the civic dignity of the Mayor is splendidly expressed by his recitative consisting of passages at once pompous and commonplace, which, if examined closely, prove to be largely built on the arpeggios of common chords. This skill in characterisation is to some extent the common property of modern composers. Richard Strauss would have alternated the grotesque capers of the rats with the heavy respectability of the Mayor and Corporation with a bolder sense of contrast; Elgar would have painted the quaint red and yellow of the Pied Piper's costume in richer colours, but there is one element which is constant throughout and which is all Parry's own, namely the music. Too much modern music sets up as its only end the reflection, if not the imitation, of the many changing moods of the words or the subject. While, as I have tried to show, Sir Hubert Parry succeeds better with his words than most people, there is throughout this delightful work something more than humorous declamation and clever illustration.

It is built upon a definite though very elastic musical plan. The themes fall roughly into two groups, which one may call the "Hamelin" and the "Pied Piper" groups. The first, which includes the people, the Mayor, the rats and the children, is all of a bustling, energetic order; the latter is a set of little melodies of a whimsical kind, in which the eerie colour of the oboe is always prominent in the score. These groups are contrasted and developed in a way suggestive of symphonic form, and perhaps it is this which gives to the listener a sense of continuity which is always lacking in a purely illustrative work. Whether or not it can be assigned to so formal a cause it is certain that over and above the fun of the "quips and cranks and wanton wiles" of Browning and Parry together, there is something akin to what in cant phrase is called "absolute" music, which makes it worth hearing for its own sake.

The London Choral Society's performance has been highly praised, and I think it deserved it. From where I sat, one of those unfortunate places in the stalls of the Queen's Hall where everything seems to become dis-integrated, the orchestra sounded noisy and rough and often spoilt the ensemble; moreover the rapid alternations of solo and chorus, such as:

"Bless us (solo)," cried the Mayor (chorus), "What's that (solo)?"

did not "come off" as they should. If there was anything more in this than the acoustic imperfections of the hall—and I am inclined to think there was—it is just one more argument for more combined rehearsal of chorus, orchestra and soloists. We trust far too much to our soloists knowing their business and to our orchestral players being first-rate readers, while the chorus is drilled unmercifully in things which cannot be made perfect without complete rehearsal. The difficulties of getting this are immense and are generally thought to be insuperable; if, however, it could be made a usual practice, when producing a new or little-known work, to call one complete rehearsal three or four weeks before the performance, in addition to the final one, it would so increase the value to both conductor and chorus of their subsequent work by showing them where and how to direct their energies, that the level of first performances would be very much raised, a far more perfect ensemble being obtained. As it was, however, Mr. Fagge and his performers did their best, and it was a good "best." The clever singing of Mr. Arthur Winckworth and Mr. Henry Brearley, in the parts of the Mayor and the Piper respectively, added point to the Comedy without intruding themselves upon it; they contributed a fair share towards a success which it was by no means easy to win.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

ARRANGEMENTS for the publication of the Cambridge Mediæval History have now been made by the Syndics of the University Press. The first volume will be published soon after the appearance of the last volume of the Cambridge Modern History, with which it will be generally uniform, and the work will be completed in eight volumes. The Cambridge Mediæval History has been planned by Professor J. B. Bury, and will be edited by Professor H. M. Gwatkin, Miss M. Bateson, Fellow and Lecturer of Newnham College, and Mr. G. T. Lapsley, Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall promise some time this month a new Life of Jean Jacques Rousseau. The author, Mrs. Frederika Macdonald, holds that the manuscript from which history has drawn its estimate of Rousseau has been subject to erasures and corrections which, to a certain extent, prove a deliberate attempt by his enemies to misrepresent his whole career.

A work on "Greek Theories of Elementary Cognition from Alcmaeon to Aristotle" by Professor John I. Beare, is about to be published by the Oxford University Press.

The author's object has been to glean and put together systematically, from Aristotle himself and his predecessors, whatever may explain or illustrate the parts of his writings essentially concerned with empirical psychology.—An essay on "The Nature of Truth" by Mr. H. H. Joachim is announced by the same Press. In it an examination is made of certain typical notions of truth, one or other of which—whether in the form of a vague assumption, or raised to the level of an explicit theory—has hitherto served as the basis of philosophical speculation. Mr. Joachim maintains that every one of these notions fails to maintain itself against critical investigation.

The Chiswick Press will issue shortly a book on "The Old Stone Crosses of Dorset," by Alfred Pope. It is to be printed on Dutch handmade paper, with thirty-three photogravures, and the work will consist of an Introduction and sixty-one descriptive articles on old stone crosses and ancient stones existing in the county of Dorset. A folding sketch-map of the county will be given, with the positions of the various crosses indicated in red ink.

A new book of stories by "M. E. Francis" (Mrs. Francis Blundell) will be published this month by Messrs. Longmans. It is entitled "Simple Annals," and consists of stories which deal chiefly with the lives of working women.

Mr. Robert Dell's translation of M. Paul Sabatier's "Disestablishment in France" will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin on April 9.

Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy's new novel, "The Flower of France," will be issued shortly in England by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett, and in America by Messrs. Harper Brothers.

Messrs. Pitman have in the press a book on "Whistler and Others," from the pen of Mr. Frederick Wedmore.

The keen watchfulness of our foreign trade rivals has never been better illustrated than by the large orders which are reaching Messrs. Newnes from Germany for the first issues of their great Atlas of the World's Commerce which is now appearing in sixpenny numbers. Many people think it almost a pity that the exportation of such a work of reference as this cannot be prohibited, on the ground that it puts our competitors in possession of valuable commercial information, of which they sometimes make better use than ourselves. Others would deplore the national apathy which would be so ready to admit that we were not so wide awake as our neighbours.

"The Challenge to Christian Missions," by the Rev. R. E. Welsh, M.A., is announced by Messrs. H. R. Allenson, Limited, for publication shortly in their Sixpenny Series. They have also in the press two other volumes in the same series: Dr. John Young's "The Christ of History"; and R. W. Emerson's "English Traits."

Messrs. Everett and Son, Garrick Street, Covent Garden, W.C., are publishing early in April a libretto for grand opera entitled "The Corsair," by W. V. Herbert (Capt. F. W. von Herbert), based on Byron's "Corsair" and "Lara."

CORRESPONDENCE

EARLY ENGLISH DRAMA SOCIETY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—On belatedly reading your review I at once wired to Drs. Furnival and Bradley (who had written to me) informing them that the attack on this Society was misleading and unjustified; that a full reply was forthcoming; and asking them to suspend judgment and action till they had heard the other side. However, their letters of withdrawal appeared before either the secretary or myself had had an opportunity of replying!

I regret this ex parte and hasty judgment. I am convinced that ultimately they will acknowledge just as publicly in their usual whole-souled impetuous English way that, at all events, the Early English Drama Society is not so black as your reviewer has painted it.

Still, so far as the question of hon. vice-presidentship goes, that ends public interest; those remaining have been informed of the facts, and been asked what they wish done. All I will say is they were all fully cognisant of the constitution of the Society.

Now, for what remains of public interest in the larger question of our objects, and the means taken to adequately obtain our ends. But first to clear the ground as regards the text of Hickscorner.

Having an eye to the animus displayed by your reviewer, and the obvious objective of his attack—the discrediting of the Society in the eyes of those who had showed their sympathy, and, I believe, personally still retain that sympathy for its objects—having this in view, and with my own inner knowledge of the why and wherefore of the attack, I will engage to meet him point by point if he will emerge from his anonymity so that I may know officially, as I know unofficially, who it is that I am engaging. I will then frankly acknowledge my own mistakes; but, at the same time, I shall not hesitate to gibbet him, and give chapter and verse for the contention I now advance that, in his "results," he is not only misleading, but carelessly inaccurate in four of his instances; and that he suppresses (or does not mention) material facts in other three cases. For the rest, some are obvious misprints; and in some cases I have, as I have said, inexcusably (I think) blundered myself. As to the general question of Hazlitt's text and how far I have followed it, I will go into that matter when I can meet my opponent in the open.

I will now touch upon the objects and methods of the E.E.D.S. Here are the pertinent points:

It is notorious that all our "learned" (printing) "societies" have been more or less in straightened circumstances for decades: their work cramped, delayed, and oftentimes abandoned. The chief causes are apathy and £ s. d.

We have put our finger on the weak spot; and, putting our views into effect, have been justified by results.

In our Early English Dramatists Series we are doing work which badly wanted doing; work which no editor or publisher, no matter how "enterprising," has hitherto cared to attempt. Is it "such a grave mistake" to show the way where others have failed? Unlike subscribers to "learned" societies, we don't even ask ours to take books: they come to us, and, if they don't want them, they need not take them. With the societies of which your reviewer speaks it is: "Give us your subscription," and then (practically) "Open your mouth, shut your eyes," etc. However, our results are satisfactory, and before passing to outlining our real object I may state, as regards "texts," that since the initial volumes our scheme has naturally grown; and experience and research has materially, though gradually, modified our own method of work. In the same way that double the number of plays will be given in the Second Series, as compared with the First Series, so also, for very sound reasons, have we, and are we, increasingly adopting the practice of photographing the original texts (I enclose you a sample) upon which I work direct. A modern orthography may be "a wrong start." We doubt it. There is no object whatever in placing difficulties in the way of the ordinary student of English literature. He wants to get at the author's meaning; and neither that, nor his construction, is obscured by changing the antique, obsolete orthography for the current spelling, always provided that an editor is careful to conserve the spelling and form (even a word itself) here and there in cases where justice to the author requires it; or the rhyme demands it; or the interest attaching to the use of an obsolete or obscure word seems to render such a course desirable. A text thus dealt with (and "noted") satisfies all but those whose business or inclination concerns them with "the higher criticism," textual or otherwise.

To continue. The Early Dramatists Series by its success has enabled us to bring our real objective within the range of practical politics—viz., our Facsimile Series, which is the only part of our scheme intended for those who are, as I have indicated, concerned with the higher textual criticism. For such we hold no reprint, however carefully done, is adequate. Errors must occur while an infallible printer (to say nothing of the infallible editor!!) are wanting. For these facsimile is "the only wear": facsimile, too, of the most exact kind; no "touching up" of "blemishes," "restoration" of blurred words, or other mechanical manipulation of the original must be allowed or attempted. A "note" is all that in such a case is allowable.

On lines such as these is our Facsimile Series planned. If that will not be a boon to scholarship it is difficult to conceive what is wanted. Moreover, it was with this section of our work in view that our hon. vice-presidents were approached. I wanted their advice, based on their larger experience, as to the real needs of the world's scholarship in this direction. I am certain they will all do me the simple justice to admit that I have sought their advice; that I have taken it as regards the initial texts; that I accepted it as regards the best editors (to be invited on "business principles") for such texts; and that, as a matter of fact, one of our retiring honorary vice-presidents has been good enough to undertake to edit our initial volume of the series. Moreover, I have sought an expression of opinion from the subscribers to this series as to the works most acceptable for "continuations." Is not all this, sir, legitimate and good work?

My letter is already too long. All I will add is that we are content to abide the final judgment of unbiassed scholars as to the ultimate value of our work.

JOHN S. FARMER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your reviewer, in his notice of four volumes sent by the Early English Drama Society, before beginning the legitimate part of his review, goes out of his way to make certain strictures on the Society itself.

These strictures are, in my opinion, quite gratuitous, made possible only by wilful misunderstanding and supported only by innuendo.

The E.E.D.S. has a regular constitution, duly formed under a legal document, providing, inter alia, power to change its publishers, to dismiss its secretary, to appoint another editor, and also to join as Hon. Vice-Presidents, scholars or others of eminence who are in sympathy with the aims of the Society. It need hardly be said that these latter have no more responsibility for the editing than the Vice-Presidents of a Hospital have for the acts of its surgeons.

It is a publishing society and has not claimed to be a "learned" society, and although it has already been favoured with a request for income-tax, it has not and does not intend to publish a balance-sheet; it has not asked for or received any public money to call for that formality, indeed, the Society has studiously avoided taking cash except as payment for goods delivered.

I shall be sorry to dispense with the list of Hon. Vice-Presidents but it may be said, at once, that the subscribers direct, or through the booksellers, have been attracted by the subject, and not by the names on a proof prospectus sent to the Press. Less than forty sets of the small paper remain for other subscribers—and if they are constant to us they need not doubt but that the whole scheme, will be carried to the end.

The work the Society has set itself is of considerable magnitude, is in my humble judgment worthy of support and its execution will I doubt not, taken as a whole, obtain the benediction of the ACADEMY.

WM. W. GIBBINGS.

18 Bury Street, April 2.

[We must decline to gratify Mr. Farmer's desire to know the name of our reviewer. The difference between a signed and an unsigned review is that the former is written on the authority of the reviewer with the acquiescence of the Editor; the latter carries with it the full authority of the paper. It was desired that the article in question should appear with the full authority of the ACADEMY. It was therefore published anonymously, and will remain anonymous, though it is obvious that our reviewer has taken no pains to conceal his identity.

In opposition to Mr. Farmer's imputations of "animus" we desire to say that the books were not asked for by our reviewer, but were sent to him in the ordinary course as a person qualified to pass a fair judgment on them. Our reviewer on his own behalf disclaims absolutely and unreservedly any ill-feeling against Mr. Farmer. But he felt bound, when the opportunity was offered to him, to protest against what appeared an attempt to use the word "Society," and the prestige given by the names of six eminent scholars, in an undesirable manner. Mr. Gibbings regards strictures on this point as outside the "legitimate" function of a reviewer. But the point is surely a matter of public concern and as such was rightly commented on in a notice of the first publications of the Society.

On the question of responsibility our reviewer dissents emphatically from the view that the vice-presidents of a hospital are not responsible for the acts of its surgeons. He is also of opinion that a hospital which refused to publish a balance-sheet would have no right to vice-presidents at all, and that its use of the name "hospital" would be injurious to the institutions conducted on the usual public lines.

Our reviewer remarks that it is interesting to know that the Society has "a regular constitution"; it would be still more interesting if Mr. Gibbings would allow the ACADEMY the privilege of publishing it. At present it would appear from Mr. Gibbings's letter that the Society has some kind of existence apart from the subscribers, from whom it "has studiously avoided taking cash except as payment for goods delivered." If, however, this is a wrong impression and the subscribers really possess the powers which Mr. Gibbings describes, some curiosity may be forgiven as to what machinery exists for enabling them to take any initiative in such matters.

As regards Mr. Farmer's strictures on "learned" societies, we have no desire to defend these as against Mr. Farmer. But the strictures only make it more difficult to guess for what reason those responsible for the Early English Drama Series have called their rather mysterious association by so discredited a title. An ordinary critic might have thought that in calling it a society they desired to make it appear more "learned" or more disinterested. According to Mr. Farmer they can only have desired to dispel any idea that it should be too efficient.

In conclusion, we note that, under a plea which would prevent any review from carrying with it the full authority of the paper in which it appears, Mr. Farmer evades any answer to our reviewer's proof that the text of Hickscorner printed by the Early English Drama Society contains numerous grave errors, and that these grave errors appear to be taken over bodily from Mr. Hazlitt's edition of 1874. The rest of his letter appears to be intended as an advertisement of his series, hardly germane to the question at issue.—ED.]

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My connection with "The Early English Drama Society" is (as your reviewer surmised) merely of a complimentary nature. I read a proof of the prospectus, corrected some errors, and made some suggestions; and I was waiting for a "revise" when I observed—from the review in your columns—that two volumes (which I have not yet seen) have been actually issued by the "Society."

The idea of publishing a corpus of old English plays is, I think, good; and your reviewer's animadversions will doubtless induce the editor to make every effort to secure accuracy in later volumes.

In the bookselling world to-day the term "Society" is (I agree with your reviewer) too loosely used. If Mr. Gibbings and Mr. Farmer will dub their series simply "The Early English Drama" I am sure that their spirited venture, to which I wish every success, will not suffer. There is no need for "hon. vice-presidents." I accepted the position with reluctance, and am glad to hear from Mr. Gibbings that the names of the "hon. vice-presidents" will be withdrawn from future prospectuses.

A. H. BULLEN.

P.S.—Of course, Mr. Farmer is not a Bentley; but do Oxford and Cambridge, when (at rare intervals) they give us texts of the old dramatists, satisfy the fastidious?

AN EMENDATION OF HERODAS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Allow a German to re-establish "l'Entente cordiale" between the Irish-English scholar, Professor Tyrrell, and the French Professor, H. H. Johnson, of Rennes University. Monsieur Johnson is wrong, verbis et factis. Professor Tyrrell knew the emendation, τὴν Ἀκίσσων σελήνην, in the sense of pueri nates, before he could have seen the Frenchman's letter in the ACADEMY of November 11, 1905, p. 1181. For I myself wrote to Professor Tyrrell at Dublin directly after having received the ACADEMY of November 4, 1905 (on November 6 or 7): "Years ago I noted this sense of the phrase in my copy of Herodas, without knowing where I have found it." Professor Tyrrell immediately answered, and writes me (Dublin University Club, November 11): "The more I think of your explanation of Herodas iii. 61, the more I believe in it. It was the full moon that satisfied Akisaeus, and that is a very apt expression for a foedus nudatus." I find that on p. 257 of the ACADEMY, Professor Tyrrell had no opportunity, nor was he obliged, to quote an authority for this explanation, which I had communicated to him. Also months ago I gave the explanation to Mr. Nairn, after having seen his edition.

DR. MAX MAAS.

Munich, Bavaria, March 29.

NON-UNIVERSITY HISTORIANS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In dealing with the statistics of the University training of authors, you are again unlucky with your selection of typical "non-University historians." Not to insist further on Smollett, who once more figures as never having been at any University, it seems necessary that somebody should make protest against James Mill, George Finlay, and Colonel Mure being classed with the rankers. Mill was not a great historian, but the fault was not in his lack of University opportunities. Sent to Edinburgh University in 1790 at the comparatively mature age of seventeen, he got all that the Arts and Theology faculties could give him in eight years of strenuous hard work there. He was not merely distinguished in Dugald Stewart's classes, but had such a record in Greek that in 1818 he was advised to stand for the Greek chair in Glasgow University.

George Finlay, the historian of Greece, had not such a normal academic course as Mill. But resolving to go to the Scottish bar, he continued at Göttingen University his law studies begun in Glasgow, reading hard (but miscellaneously) for some two years; and after a campaign with the Greek revolutionary army in the Morea, resumed his legal studies at Edinburgh University, passing the examination in civil law required for the bar.

Colonel Mure of Caldwell came from Westminster School to Edinburgh University and completed his studies at the University of Bonn—so that his wide knowledge of Greek literature was not acquired by accident, or picked up during his tour in Greece.

And as to the philosophers and economists, surely it is notorious that Adam Smith owed more to his four sessions at Glasgow, and to the stimulus he derived from such teachers as Francis Hutcheson and Robert Simson than to all the academic prelections or instruction he received at Oxford.

Sir William Hamilton, born within the College of Glasgow, was the son and grandson of Glasgow professors, and in the four years he spent at Glasgow University (not to speak of one at Edinburgh) before he went to Oxford, was already so well equipped for his life-work that at Balliol his tutor left him to manage his studies in his own way.

And as you expressly include among historians those who practise the art as "a branch of literature," surely Goldsmith should be named with the alumni of T. C. D.?

U. J. D.

UNIVERSITY POETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of the 31st ult. you included a letter from "V." criticising the list of Cambridge poets which appeared in the ACADEMY of the 3rd ult. May I point out some omissions from the list of Oxford poets, as "V." doubts whether they are so serious as those from the Cambridge list? Nicholas Breton, Sir Edw. Dyer, Sir W. Raleigh, Geo. Chapman, Thos. Watson, Sir J. Davies, J. Donne, Robert Burton, Lord Herbert of Cheshire, J. Ford, Hy. King, Bishop of Chichester, Wm. Browne, Hy. Vaughan, Sir C. Sedley, Earl of Rochester, Wm. Wycherley, J. Norris, Wm. Walsh, Wm. Somerville, T. Tickell, Thos. Percy, Bishop of Dromore, Hon. W. R. Spencer, T. L. Beddoes, Sir Francis Doyle, Lord de Tabley.

It were possible, indeed, to give the names of yet another fifty Oxonians of the past whose lyrics are still well known to us.

BATHURST WALKER.

LOST ILLUSIONS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of March 31st you say as follows: "A month ago, Waring was Waring, a romantic figure about whom the imagination weaved wonderful stories: to-day he is Alfred Domett," etc. As a matter of fact, the Philistines—and among them on this occasion, unless I am sadly mistaken, we must class Mr. Birrell—have spent the best part of their careers in endeavouring to identify Waring with Tom, Dick, and Harry. These literary coroners are cousins-german to those masters in lunacy who solemnly hold weekly sittings on the question of Hamlet's sanity. Their lack of insight into the true spirit of their own game is, however, remarkable. They have hitherto failed to perceive the obvious fact that Waring is not a concrete personality at all, but a presiding Oversoul, the chief of whose representatives now on Earth is Mr. Winston Churchill.

April 1.

R. NANKIVELL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your note on biographers and shattered illusions you say: "A month ago Waring was Waring, a romantic figure, about whom the imagination weaved wonderful stories: to-day he is Alfred Domett, the Colonial Secretary of New Munster." I remember seeing, about twelve years ago, "The Poems and Poets of the Century," edited by Mr. A. H. Miles. One of the ten volumes contained a selection of the poems of Mr. Alfred Domett, and the introduction to the selection contained the information you refer to. As I had never read the poem, "Waring," I do not recall being greatly disturbed by the identification; but it is perhaps better to have lost an illusion than never to have had it at all.

J. S. LUSCOMBE.

WILL NO ONE TELL ME WHAT IT MEANS?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I may be a Philistine all complete, but I must confess I have been simply astounded by the frequent appeal to the line:

Will no one tell me what she sings?

in Wordsworth's "The Solitary Reaper" as a supreme instance of lyrical expression. Let us consider for a moment. The words imply that the poet is at the time possessed with a desire that some one should inform him what the song is about. The inference is that there is no such informant at hand; and the poet is therefore justified in indulging in his own speculations. The question is merely introductory to the surpassing beauty of the rest of the stanza, and to single it out for supreme laudation—excellent and natural as it is as a connecting link—is to mistake its subsidiary function, and to confer upon it an elevation, which, I submit, was far from the intention of the poet. Such is my view of the line, but others apparently find more in it than I do, and a statement of their view of its significance would be welcome.

Having ventured thus far, I may perhaps be allowed to mention two things in Wordsworth that have always irritated me, especially as they occur in two poems which are undoubtedly among his masterpieces.

Why does he inform us that the Thrush, whose song gives rise to the Reverie of Poor Susan, "has sung for three years"? The only answers I can suggest are (1) that, though the bird has sung for three years in the thick of London, its song has power to revive rural impressions in the listener; but, then, there would appear to be little virtue in the number "three," and "it has sung there for years"—a conjectural emendation which will perhaps be offered after the lapse of a few centuries—might be preferred; or (2) possibly it may be a fact of natural history with which I am unfamiliar, that the thrush's song is not fully developed until it attains the age of three. Neither of these hypotheses seems to me quite satisfactory from the poetical point of view.

Again in perhaps the noblest division in the Ode on Intimations of Immortality, what is the significance of the line "Nor Man nor Boy," which I never read without asking myself, why not "Nor Woman nor Girl"? It is very ungallant of me, no doubt; but I cannot bring myself to feel that the poet meant here to flatter the female sex. I have tried to regard him as referring to manhood and boyhood as typical stages of growth in the course of which "the vision splendid" fades "into the light of common day." I wonder if this interpretation is tenable.

March 17.

ALFRED E. THISELTON.

EPITHETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As the discussion about the "immortal phrase" seems to have closed, will you allow me to observe that, if we are to measure the greatness of poets by purely verbal tests of this nature (a proposition to which I emphatically demur), the epithets which they use will supply a much simpler and more conclusive test? Take, for instance, a few hundred lines of Milton's "Comus," and consider his use of the following epithets: "white-handed Hope," "violet-embroidered vale," "the vocal air," "the empty-vaulted night," "the raven dawn of darkness," Scylla's "barking waves," "home-felt delight," "low-roosted lark," "usurping mists," "her unpillowed head," "the unsunned heaps of miser's treasure," "some ill-greeting touch," "squint suspicion," "with unblended majesty," "the huddling crook," "flaunting honeysuckle," "the drowsy-flighted steeds that draw the litter of close-curtained sleep," "solemn-breathing sound," "the pillared firmament," "the unexempt condition," "vizedorn falsehood."

Or take the poet who is the very soul of poetry, as musicians tell us that Mozart is the very soul of music, and consider Keats's use of the following epithets, which occur within a less space than Milton's: "full-throated ease," "sunburnt mirth," "beaded bubbles," "purple-stained mouth," "viewless wings of poesy," "the murmurous haunt of flies," "easeful Death," "hungry generations," "Ruth . . . stood in tears amid the alien corn," "mossed cottage trees," "the winnowing wind," "barred clouds bloom the soft-dying day," "an azure-lidded sleep," "from silken Samarcand to cedar'd Lebanon," "with glowing hand," "in woofed phantasies," "moan forth witless words," "at these voluptuous accents," "like a throbbing star," "in the besieging wind's uproar," "along the gusty floor."

If it be true that a single head of Phidias and Praxiteles supplies an indisputable proof of the genius of those great sculptors, I venture to think that the poets who could write the few words I have quoted, even supposing that all the rest of their poetry had been lost, would be visibly stamped in the eyes of discerning critics with the seal and superscription of the Muse. And I believe that, if the one-sided admirers and advocates of Shelley and Wordsworth will take the trouble to apply this test to them, they will be constrained to say with Virgil's shepherd:

"Et vitula tu dignus, et hic."

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

A CURIOUS DISSENTING ENDOWMENT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In "The Church and Her Story" I have described the curious dissenting endowment at Little Maplestead, where the Sabbatarians or Seventh Day Baptists, are the owners of the great tithe and four hundred acres of land, and are also patrons of the living, which "living," by the way, is worth £60 a year! As I am now preparing a new edition of "How Dissent is Established and Endowed," I shall be grateful if any reader of the ACADEMY can send me particulars of any Dissenting Endowments of which they happen to possess knowledge, and also especially to learn if any similar case exists where Nonconformists are patrons of a church living and devote the tithe to other than Church purposes.

G. H. F. NYE.

35 Chapel Street, Belgrave Square,

March 30.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY.

Annual Progress Report of the Archaeological Surveyor, United Provinces and Punjab, for Year ending 31 March 1905; and Photographs and Drawings Referred to in the Annual Progress Report. Camp Branch, Govt. Press, United Provinces.

ART.

William Strang: Catalogue of his etched work. Illustrated with 471 Reproductions. With an introductory essay by Laurence Binyon. 10½ x 6½. Pp. xvii, 211. Glasgow: MacLehose, 42s. net.

[The reproductions are two or three to a page; opposite each is the title, date, process, size, and number of proofs. Indexes.]

The National Gallery, London.—The Flemish School. Introduction by Frederick Wedmore. Art Library. 9½ x 7. Pp. xxv. Plates lxx. Newnes, 3s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY.

Thompson, J. Arthur. Herbert Spencer. English Men of Science series. 7½ x 5. Pp. 284. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Innes, Arthur, D. Ten Tudor Statesmen. 9 x 6. Pp. 402. Eveleigh Nash, 15s. net.

[Deals with the characters of Henry VII.; Cardinal Wolsey; Sir Thomas More; Cromwell; Henry VIII.; Somerset; Cranmer; William Cecil (Lord Burghley); Sir Francis Walsingham; and Sir Walter Raleigh.]

Eagar, M. Six Years at the Russian Court. With numerous illustrations. 8 x 5½. Pp. 283. Hurst & Blackett, 6s. net.

[Miss Eagar was appointed in 1898 to take charge of the Grand Duchesses of Russia, and has written a pleasant, sensible and entertaining book about the home life of the Russian Court. It is neither sentimental nor scandalous; indeed, the author is rather scornful of the rumour-makers. She mentions Father John and other interesting people, and adds chapters on Social Life in Russia and kindred subjects.]

Lamington, Lord. In the Days of the Dandies. Introduction by Sir Herbert Maxwell. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 212. Eveleigh Nash, 3s. 6d. net.

[A reprint, in book form, of the series of papers under the above title, which began to appear in Blackwood's in 1890.]

Downey, Edmund. Charles Lever: His Life in his Letters. With Portraits. In 2 vols. 9 x 6. Pp. xi, 808. Blackwood, 21s. net. (See p. 325.)

CLASSICS.

- Bacchylides.* The text edited by Sir Richard C. Jebb. 7×4½. Pp. viii, 56. Cambridge University Press, 1s. 6d.
[This is the text prepared by the late Sir Richard Jebb for his annotated edition (Cambridge, 1905).]

DRAMA.

- Dillon, Arthur. The Maid of Artemis. 6½×5½. Pp. 68. Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d. net.
[A poetic drama of Ancient Greece. In six scenes.]
Paradise Lost. A drama in four acts, adapted from John Milton's epic poem. By Walter Stephens. 9¼×6¼. Pp. 48. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s. net.

ECONOMICS.

- Lange, M. E. Local Taxation in London. With a preface by Lord Welby. 8½×5½. Pp. xii, 46. Published for the London Reform Union by P. S. King & Son. 1s. net.
[Three chapters, dealing with the relation of London to the Imperial Exchequer; the financial relations of different parts of London to the whole; and the relative positions of land and of buildings.]

EDUCATION.

- Watt, A. F., and Hayes, B. J. Matriculation Latin Construing Book. 7×5. Pp. viii, 70. University Tutorial Series. Clive, University Tutorial Press, 2s.
Our Planet. 7½×5. Pp. 256. Round the World Series. Jack, 1s. 6d.
[Astronomy, Physical Geography, Ethnology, Religions, Zoology, Commerce, Communications, etc. etc. In fact, all about our Planet, with illustrations, etc.]
The Three Term Algebra. Book iv. 7×4½. Pp. 86. Jack, 6d.
[A Systematic Course of Preparation for the Oxford and Cambridge Locals.]

FICTION.

- Castle, Agnes and Egerton. If Youth but knew! With illustrations by Lancelot Speed. 7½×5½. Pp. xvi, 348. Smith, Elder, 6s.
Ward, Mrs. Wilfrid. Out of Due Time. 7½×5½. Pp. 379. Longmans, 6s.
Crockett, S. R. Kid McGhie. With four illustrations. 8¼×5½. Pp. 400. James Clarke & Co., 6s.
Tearle, Christian. Old Mr. Lovelace. 7½×5½. Pp. 342. Smith, Elder, 6s. net.
Marsh, Charles Fielding. Mr. Baxter—Sportsman. 7½×5½. Pp. 346. Smith, Elder, 6s.
Warden, Florence. Love and Lordship. 7½×5. Pp. 397. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
Campbell, Frances. Dearlove: The History of Her Summer's Makebelieve. 7½×5½. Pp. 370. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
Little, Mr. Archibald. A Millionaire's Courtship. 7½×5. Pp. 309. Unwin, 6s.
Jones, Dora M. A Maid of Normandy. A Romance of Versailles. 8×5½. Pp. 349. Blackwood, 6s.
Gorst, Mrs. Harold E. The Light. 8×5½. Pp. 355. Cassell, 6s.
Harris, J. Henry. A Romance in Radium. 7½×5. Pp. 235. Greening, 3s. 6d.
Harris, A. L. The Sin of Salome. 7½×5. Pp. 245. Greening, 3s. 6d.
Osbourne, Lloyd. Wild Justice. 7½×5. Pp. 296. Heinemann, 6s.
Danby, Frank. The Sphinx's Lawyer. 7½×5. Pp. 387. Heinemann, 6s.
Lanyon, H. Sant Martin. The Married Bachelor. A farcical romance. 7½×5. Pp. 388. Greening, 6s.
Sims, George R. The Mysteries of Modern London. 8×5½. Pp. 192. Pearson, 2s. 6d.
[A collection of articles such as appear in the columns of Answers and similar papers.]

HISTORY.

- Besant, Sir Walter. Medieval London. Vol. i.—Historical and Social. Illustrated. 11½×9. Pp. 419. Black, 30s. net.
English Historians. Introduction by A. J. Grant. 7½×5½. Pp. lxxxvi, 251. Blackie, 2s. 6d. net.
[An attempt to show the different forms that English written history has assumed at different periods by giving: (1) Passages to illustrate the view taken by different historians of the objects and methods of History; (2) Passages illustrative of the method and style of different historians.]
Salus, Edgar. Imperial Purple. 7½×5½. Pp. 213. Greening, 3s. 6d. net.
[Vigorous and sensational studies of the Emperors and the social life of Rome from Cæsar to Heliogabalus. We dislike such forms as "Antonin," "Claud," "Tigellin"; but there is no denying that the work presents a vivid picture of the corruption which ruined Rome.]

LAW.

- Leage, R. W., M.A., B.C.L. Roman Private Law. 9×5½. Pp. 429. Macmillan, 10s. net.
[An attempt to meet a want which the author has felt in teaching Roman Law at Oxford: viz. "some book which is content to give, as simply as possible, the subject-matter of the Institutes of Gaius and Justinian, following, in the main, the original order of treatment."]

LITERATURE.

- The Oxford New English Dictionary on Historical Principles, founded mainly on the materials collected by the Philological Society. Edited by Dr. James A. H. Murray. Matter-Mesnalty (Volume vi.) By Henry Bradley. 13½×10½. Pp. 127. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s.
Greg, Walter W. Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama. A literary enquiry, with special reference to the pre-Restoration stage in England. 9×6. Pp. 464. Bullen, 10s. 6d. net.
The Legend of St. Juliana. Translated from the Latin of the Acta Sanctorum and the Anglo-Saxon of Cynewulf by Charles William Kennedy. 7×5½. Pp. 60. Princetown (U.S.A.): The University Library, n.p.
[The Latin version was used by Cynewulf as a basis for his poem. Mr. Kennedy, who is Scribner Fellow in English Literature at Princeton, has followed the Anglo-Saxon and Latin texts printed by Strunk in the Belles-Lettres edition of Cynewulf, the Latin text being Bolland's.]

- Alexander, Hartley Burr. Poetry and the Individual. 7½×5. Pp. 240. Putnam's, 6s. net. (See p. 323.)
[“An analysis of the imaginative life in relation to the creative spirit in man and nature.”]
The Journal of Philology. Vol. xxx, No. 59. Pp. 160. Macmillan, 4s. 6d.
Contents: “The British Museum Papyrus of Isocrates ἱεροκλῆς,” By H. I. Bell; “Some Emendations of Propertius,” By H. W. Garrod; “Elision in Hendecasyllables,” By H. W. Garrod; “The Alphabet of Ben Sira,” By C. Taylor; “Conjectural Emendations in the Silvae of Statius,” By D. A. Slater.
Matthew Arnold's “Merope,” to which is appended “The Electra of Sophocles,” translated by Robert Whitelaw. 7½×5. Pp. 169. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d. net.
[“An attempt to introduce and to bring home to modern readers who are not Greek scholars, Attic tragedy in its most perfect form.”]

MEDICAL.

- Drinkwater, H. Food in Health and Disease. With a preface by T. R. Bradshaw. 6×4. Pp. vii, 174. Dent: The Temple Primers, 1s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Harris, J. Rendel. The Cult of the Heavenly Twins. With 7 Plates. 9×5½. Pp. 160. Cambridge University Press, 6s. net.
Journal of the Continental Congress 1774-1789. Edited from the original records in the Library of Congress by Worthington Chauncey Ford, Chief of Division of Manuscripts. Vol. iv., 1776. January 1-June. Washington: Govt. Printing Office.
List of Cartularies (Principally French) Recently Added to the Library of Congress. Washington: Govt. Printing Office.
American Journal of Mathematics. Edited by Frank Morley. Vol. xxviii.—No. 1. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press.
Smithsonian Institution.—Bureau of American Ethnology. Haida Texts and Myths. Skidegate dialect. Recorded by J. R. Swanton. Twenty-third Annual Report, 1901-1902. Washington: Govt. Printing Office.
U.S. Geological Survey.—Dept. of Interior. Water-Supply and Irrigation Papers 123, 125, 157, 129, 130, 131, 133-147, 149, 151, 152. Bulletins 247, 251, 256, 263, 266, 268, 270, 271, 276. Professional Papers, 34, 36-38, 40-42. Washington: Govt. Printing Office.
U.S. Geological Survey Monographs. xlviii—Parts i. and ii. Washington: Govt. Printing Office.
Williamson, J. S. Anglo-Saxon Amity. 9×6½. Pp. 15.
[The speech delivered before the Canadian Club, Boston, on December 4 last by the editor of the Toronto News. Reprinted by a strong committee at the suggestion of Sir James Gowan.]
“Lato.” So-Called Skirts. 7½×5. Pp. 124. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s. 6d. net.
[Or, why girls should not wear rationals.]
Wagner, Charles. Courage. 7½×4½. Pp. 288. Unwin, 1s. net.
[Uniform with “Toward the Heights.”]

POETRY.

- Austin, Alfred. The Door of Humility. 7½×5½. Pp. 174. Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.
Nykat Ki. Patriots All. 6¼×4. Pp. 18. Printed by Alexander Moring, 3d. net.
[A poem in spirited but sometimes crabbed verse urging Britons to adopt the proposals of Lord Roberts.]
Lounsbury, G. Constant. Love's Testament: a Sonnet Sequence. 7½×5. Pp. 135. Lane, 3s. 6d. net.
A Wreath of Remembrance. By M. Y. W. 7½×5. Pp. 260. Drane, 3s. 6d.
Folliott, Thomas. The Quantock Hills. Stanzas written in the neighbourhood of Holford. 7×4½. Pp. 37. Fifield.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Anthony Trollope's Small House at Allington. New Pocket Library. In 2 vols. Each 6×3½. Pp. 576 and 578. Lane, 1s. 6d. net per vol.
New Universal Library.—Bullfinch's The Age of Fable; Walt Whitman's Specimen Days in America; Landon's Imaginary Conversations (Classical); Alexander Smith's Dreamthorp (Country essays); Reynolds's Discourses; Francis Jeffrey's Essays on English Poets and Poetry; Phillimore's translation of Lessing's Laocoon; Macaulay's Literary Essays; Borrow's The Roman Rye; Oliver Wendell Holmes's The Professor at the Breakfast Table; Peacock's Headlong Hall, Melincourt, Nightmare Abbey, Maid Marian (in one vol.); Mrs. Gaskell's Life of Charlotte Brontë; Routledge, cloth, 1s. net; royal blue leather, 1s. 6d. net.
Everyman's Library: The Plays of Euripides, translated by Shelley; Dean Milman, Potter and Woodhull (in two vols.) vol. i. Burnet's History of My Own Times, abridged by the Rev. Thomas Stackhouse; The New Testament (A chronological arrangement by Principal Lindsay); Strickland's Life of Queen Elizabeth; Gulliver's Travels (illustrated by Arthur Rackham); The Lyrical Dramas of Æschylus, translated into English verse by John Stuart Blackie; Lady Montagu's Letters, 1709 to 1760; and A Child's Book of Saints, by William Canton. Each 7×4½. Dent, 1s. net cloth; 2s. net leather.
Official Handbook of the Church of England, 1906. 8½×5½. Pp. xxxviii, 726. S.P.C.K., 3s.
Geen, Philip. Fishing in Ireland; and Fishing in Scotland and the Home Counties. Each 9×5½. Pp. 190 and 348. Unwin, 3s. 6d. net each.
Dumas's The Three Musketeers (2 vols.); and Twenty Years After (2 vols.). 7½×5. Pp. about 450 per vol. Dent, 2s. 6d. net each.
[An English issue of sheets printed in America and published in 1888 and 1893.]
Harland, Henry. My Friend Prospero. Newnes' Sixpenny Illustrated Novels.
Marshall, Emma. The Young Queen of Hearts. Seeley, 6d.
Bullen, Frank T. The Log of a Sea-waif, being recollections of the first four years of my sea life. 7×5½. Pp. xii, 349. Smith, Elder. The Waterloo Library, 3s. 6d.

Van Dyke, Henry. Manhood, Faith and Courage. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.

[Sermons written for a church in which there are a great many young men, and afterwards preached in college chapels at Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and elsewhere. This edition contains a new chapter on "Christ Fundamental."]

Stall, Sylvanus, D. D. What a young boy ought to know. New Revised Edition. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 193. The Self and Sex Series. The Vir Publishing Co., 4s. net.

De Flagello Myrteo. CCCLX thoughts and fancies on Love. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 95. Elkin Mathews.

The Life of Christ. By Dean Farrer. With a preface by the Bishop of London. Cheap edition, paper covers. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 318. Cassell, 6d. net.

Sinclair, Archdeacon. Unto You Young Men; Unto You Young Women. Each 7 x 4½. Pp. 258 and 228. Melrose, 2s. 6d. net per vol.

Gibbon, Percival. Souls in Bondage. 8½ x 5. Pp. 164. Blackwood, 6d.

SCIENCE.

Bose, Jagadis Chunder. Plant Response as a Means of Physiological Investigation. Illustrated. 9 x 6. Pp. 781. Longmans, 21s.

Scientific Memoirs by Officers of the Medical and Sanitary Departments of the Government of India. On the Standardisation of Anti-Typhoid Vaccine. By Capt. G. Lamb and Capt. W. B. C. Forster. Issued under the Authority of the Govt. of India. Calcutta: Office of Supt. of Govt. Printing, 6 annas (7d.).

Seaman, Louis Livingstone. The Real Triumph of Japan: the Conquest of the Silent Foe. 7½ x 5½. Pp. viii, 291. Appleton, 6s. net.

[The real triumph of Japan lay, according to Surgeon-Major (U.S.V.E.) Seaman, in the medical and sanitary departments of her army. He visited the Japanese hospitals and is of opinion that his own country has everything to learn from the Japanese medical methods and organisation.]

SOCIOLOGY.

Carlile, the Rev. Wilson, and Carlile, Victor, W. The Continental Outcast. Land Colonies and Poor Law Relief, with a preface by the Bishop of Southwark. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xiii, 143. Unwin, 1s. net.

[An account of a recent visit paid to the Labour Colonies of Belgium, Holland, Germany and Denmark, to acquire information that might be of use in the social work of the Church Army. Mr. Carlile finds the lack of personal influence a defect in the Land Colonies of other nations, which seldom lead to permanent reclamation. In clearing roads and towns of loafers, etc., they are of great value.]

Swift, Morrison I. Marriage and Race Death. The Foundations of an intelligent system of marriage. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 270. New York: The Morrison I Swift Press, $1.10.

[A savage attack on capitalism and the established order by a thorough-going revolutionary. So long as the caste-system continues, says Mr. Swift, the better sort of women will remain childless and the race degenerate. What would happen in the matter of love and marriage if the caste-system were removed, Mr. Swift will show in a future volume.]

THEOLOGY.

The Book of Job in the Revised Version. Edited, with introductions and brief annotations by S. R. Driver. 8 x 5½. Pp. 133. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d. net.

[“An attempt to explain the Revised Version of the Book of Job in such a manner as to make the poem intelligible to an ordinary educated reader.”]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Meehan, J. F. More favourite houses of Bath and District. Being the second series of that work. With an introduction by Egerton Castle. Illustrated with 50 reproductions of original drawings and rare prints in the possession of the author. 10½ x 6½. Pp. xvi, 248. Bath: B. J. F. Meehan, 12s. 6d. net.

[This second part of Mr. Meehan's beautiful and interesting work appears, at a first glance, to be as good as the first; and that is high praise.]

By-Paths in the Balkans. By Captain F. W. Von Herbert. 9 x 6. Pp. 296. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.

[Four of the ten papers in this volume have appeared in different periodicals. The papers are the result of a sixteen-months journey in the Balkan countries, 1903-1905.]

Maughan, William Charles. Picturesque Musselburgh and its Golk Links. With illustrations by R. Gemmell Hutchinson. 7½ x 5. Pp. 108. Paisley: Gardner, 1s. net paper, 1s. 6d. net cloth.

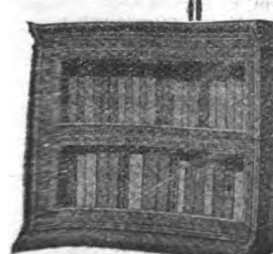

[A brightly written “golfy” book about a famous old town.]

A HOME FOR BOOKS.
Treat your books as your best friends. They will be true to you when all others fail. In other words treat yourself to a

“GUNN”

Sectional Bookcase

Your books will look well in it; they will always be handy, and its specially made doors will keep them free from damage. Built up in sections of any required size, the whole looking like a solid, handsome piece of furniture. Always complete, yet always growing. Full particulars, prices, and name of nearest Agent, post free. Write for “Booklet No. 23” to WM. JANGUS & CO., Ltd., 44 Paul Street, London, E.C.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY, illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net. By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of “Wood and Garden.” Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations. 21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of “The Garden.” 12s. 6d. net. By post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450 Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each. By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS, V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,

and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of “The Garden,” Author of “Trees and Shrubs,” etc. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Published at the Offices of “COUNTRY LIFE,” Ltd.
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

If you want a weekly paper which never fails to please and satisfy, order from your newsagent the

Saturday Westminster

(Issued by the "Westminster Gazette")

The Yearly Postal Subscription is 6s. 6d. Inland, and 8s. 8d. abroad. Shorter Periods pro rata.

Send a Postcard Request for Specimen Copy

THE "SATURDAY
WESTMINSTER,"
Tudor Street, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A Weekly Review of Literature,
Science, and Art.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION:

Inland - - - - - 15s. 0d.
Foreign and Colonial - - - 17s. 6d.

SUBSCRIPTION FORM

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of the ACADEMY,
SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

MSS. MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, invite writers to send them MSS. of ORIGINAL STORIES: (1) for BOYS of 10-14, addressed Mr. JOHN LANG,
BOYS' EDITOR; (2) for GIRLS of 10-14, addressed Mrs. JOHN LANG,
GIRLS' EDITOR; (3) for CHILDREN of 6-10, addressed Mrs. LOUEY CHIS-HOLM, CHILDREN'S EDITOR; extent, 40,000 to 50,000 words. All MSS. (which should be sent in any time before September 30—typewritten preferred) will be acknowledged, and returned if not suitable.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes,
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art,
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen

AND THE

Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co.,
57A Coleman Street, London, E.C.
Special Rates for a Series will be quoted.

DEIGHTON, BELL & CO. CAMBRIDGE.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

PETRONII CENA TRIMALCHIONIS.

Edited, with Critical and Explanatory Notes, and Translated

By W. D. LOWE, M.A.

Pembroke College, Cambridge; Junior Censor, University College, Durham.

"This edition has been prepared to enable readers of Latin authors to realise first-hand for themselves the ordinary conditions of social life under the Empire, as depicted by the Arbiter Elegantiæ himself."—PREFACE.

"By far the best part of the novel of Petronius is the banquet of Trimalchio, where we have a precious sketch, unique in Latin literature, of society under the Roman decadence. . . . Mr. Lowe's scholarly edition and translation of a work not hitherto edited in England."

Prof. R. Y. TYRRELL, in the ACADEMY.

"It will prove invaluable to students struggling unaided with the Latin language. The notes are copious and scholarly, and the translation is admirably adapted to its advertised purpose."

PUBLISHER AND BOOKSELLER.

"For the scholar the original text is beautifully printed by the Cambridge Press. The foot-notes are useful and very full, occupying half the book. There is an adequate introduction, an index of proper names, and another of subject-matter."—PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR.

"A book to which we offer a warm welcome."

OXFORD MAGAZINE.

"The translation is, we are glad to find, not tied down by pedantic literalness, and should give ordinary readers an excellent idea of the freedom and naturalness of Petronius. The indexes are another good feature."

ATHENÆUM.

"Mr. Lowe has steered clear of the literalness of the pedant, and thanks largely to German erudition, has been able to supply many illuminating parallels in his notes, which are printed in the best possible place for the student, at the bottom of the page. We hope that Mr. Lowe's very capable editing will increase the readers of a most enlivening record, which is almost a little guide to Roman antiquities."—NOTES AND QUERIES.

"We have here a sound up-to-date text, based on Buecheler, some excellent elucidatory notes, and a free but faithful English version which will be of great value and interest to any who may wish to wander down this curious byway of Latin literature."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

FIFTH THOUSAND, REVISED, with 2 Photogravure
Plates, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE RISEN MASTER.

A Sequel to "Pastor Pastorum."

By HENRY LATHAM, M.A.,
Late Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

TWELFTH THOUSAND, crown 8vo, 6s. 6d.

PASTOR PASTORUM;

Or, the Schooling of the Apostles by Our Lord.

FOURTH THOUSAND, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A SERVICE OF ANGELS.

NOW READY, crown 4to, cloth, 12s. net.

THE PSALMS IN THREE COLLECTIONS.

Translated, with Notes, by E. G. KING, D.D.

Also in Three Parts, sewed.

FIRST COLLECTION, PSALMS I.-XLII., 6s.

SECOND COLLECTION, PSALMS XLIII.-LXXXIX.
5s.

THIRD COLLECTION, PSALMS XC.-CL., 5s.

Cambridge: DEIGHTON, BELL & CO.
London: GEORGE BELL & SONS.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated]

[A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S

"J.G." & "WELCOME" PENS.

The "J.G." is rapidly superseding the old "J." It is the best broad-pointed pen ever made. The "Welcome" is one of the new metal pens, with a special point, soft in touch, and very suitable for rapid, flowing handwriting.

Joseph Gillott's Pens in Sixpenny and Gross Boxes, of Stationers, etc. Sample Card of Pens free on receipt of Penny Stamp for Postage and Address. Sample Box of Thirty Pens, assorted, for testing, Seven Stamps.—JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS, (Dept. 3) 37 Gracechurch Street, London, E.C. (also at Birmingham).

NEW MUSICAL WORKS

Over 400 pages. 8vo, cloth, 10s.

- (1) GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT OF MUSIC Described in Chapters on the Study of Musical History. With Annotated Guide to Music Literature. By E. DICKENSON, Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net (or paper covers, 1s. 6d. net).
- (2) CHOPIN AS REVEALED BY EXTRACTS FROM HIS DIARY. By Count TARNOWSKI. From the Polish by N. JANOTHA. Portraits. Crown 8vo, boards, 5s.
- (3) THE ITALIAN SCHOOL OF FLORID SONG, Observations on the Florid Song and Ancient and Modern Singers and Singing by P. F. TOST. Useful for all Performers Instrumental as well as Vocal. Reprint of this celebrated work as translated by Galliard in 1743. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
- (4) THE DEEPER SOURCES OF THE BEAUTY AND EXPRESSION OF MUSIC. By JOSEPH GODDARD. With many Musical Examples

W. REEVES, 83 Charing Cross Road, W.C.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.,
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1771

APRIL 14, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL. See Staff (honourmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

SEDBERGH SCHOOL SCHOLARSHIPS, 1906.

SIX ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, varying in value from £50 to £25 per annum, will be OFFERED for COMPETITION on April 25 and 26.—For particulars apply to the HEAD-MASTER, Sedburgh, R.S.O., Yorkshire.

THERE'S A SHORT ROAD even to short-hand. New Method of Postal Tuition by Britain's highest honourman. Send stamp for explanatory Booklet S 12.—ALSTON'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

CLERGYMAN and WIFE (assisted by competent Governess) are desirous of receiving into their home, in healthy part of Derbyshire, after Easter, for first school, two or three Children (boys or girls). Highest references. Terms, etc., on application.—Address, "VICAR," Beighton, Derbyshire.

WANTED, POST AS JUNIOR MASTER IN BOYS' SCHOOL, Classics, Mathematics and General English Subjects.—W., 30 Cambridge Road, Bromley, Kent.

Art

EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS IN OIL OF HORSES, MOUNTAIN and MOORLAND PONIES, DOGS, CATS, etc., by Miss LILIAN CHEVIOT.

LANDSCAPE PAINTINGS IN OIL, by V. DE VILLE, and EXHIBITION OF SKETCHES by the MEMBERS of the LONDON SKETCH CLUB.

GRAVES' GALLERIES, 6 Pall Mall, S.W. Admission, including Catalogue, 1s.

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

HUGUENOT PEDIGREES IN GREAT BRITAIN, and prior to emigration from France. Genealogical guide to French families, and some thousand pedigrees, mostly MS. and private sources. Also French Canadian pedigrees.—C. E. LART, Charmouth, Dorset, and London.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING WANTED.—MSS. and all Literary work executed accurately and promptly. 10d. per 1000 words. Carbon copies.—Mrs. BRAMBLE, 26 Clarence Road, Windsor.

AUTHORS having MSS. typed at Miss LONGLEY'S, 467 Mansion House Chambers, 20 Bucklersbury, E.C., at 10d. per 1000 words, receive carbon copy free. Established 10 years.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP, Secondhand Bookseller, 100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

GLAISHER'S Remainder Book Catalogue. APRIL SUPPLEMENT NOW READY. Comprising all most recent Purchases.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER, 263 High Holborn, London. Also Catalogue of Popular Current Literature, and New List of French Novels, Classics, etc.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net for 35s., 1902-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

HERALDRY, THE ART OF, by A. C. Fox-Davies, folio, bound in buckram, 106 full-page Illustrations in Colour, and 1100 Text Illustrations; only 700 printed. Offered at £6 6s. Published by Jack, 1904.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

FOR SALE.—TO COLLECTORS.—A BREECHES BIBLE, perfect, 1606, original binding, brass clasps. What offers?—Address E. C., Bay View, Castletown, Isle of Man.

BERTRAM DOBEL L, SECOND-HAND BOOKSELLER, AND PUBLISHER, 77 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C. A large Stock of Old and Rare Books in English Literature, including Poetry and the Drama—Shakespeareana—First Editions of Famous Authors—Manuscripts—Illustrated Books, etc. CATALOGUES free on application.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LTD.

Every month MUDIE'S publish a fresh list (classified and annotated) of their English and Foreign Surplus Books and New Remainders. The list contains popular works on Travel, Sport, Army and Navy, Biography, Theology, Arts, Philosophy, Economics, and Fiction.

List sent post free on application.

30-34 NEW OXFORD ST.; 48 QUEEN VICTORIA ST. 241 BROMPTON ROAD, LONDON.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

AINSWORTH (W. H.) Sir John Chiverton, a Romance, 1826
Any of his novels in 3 vols
Any odd parts or vols
Alaric at Rome, a pamphlet, Rugby, 1840
Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude, and other Poems, 1816
Aldine Poets (line), 53 vols, 1839-46, or any Alice in Wonderland, 1866
A Letter to Lord Ellenborough, Barnstable, 1812
Alken, Analysis of the Hunting Field, 1846
Alken (Henry) National Sports, 1821, 1823 or 1825
Moments of Fancy, 1822
Series of Driving Discoveries, 1817
Shooting, 6 plates, 1823
Symptoms of being Amused, 1822
Illustrations of Popular Songs, 1823
Seven Ages of the Horse
Ideas Accidental and Incidental to Hunting, a series of 42 plates
Notions, a series of 36 plates
Hunting, or Six Hours' Sport, by Three Real Good Ones, 1823
Life of a Racehorse, 1848
Any books illustrated by him
Any set of prints or separate ones by him
Alpine Journal, set, or any numbers or volumes
Alps, the High, without Guides, 1870
Alps, any books on
Alton Locke, 2 vol, 1850

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

MSS. MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, invite writers to send them MSS. of ORIGINAL STORIES: (1) for BOYS of 10-14, addressed Mr. JOHN LANG, BOYS' EDITOR; (2) for GIRLS of 10-14, addressed Mrs. JOHN LANG, GIRLS' EDITOR; (3) for CHILDREN of 6-10, addressed Mrs. LOUEY CHISHOLM, CHILDREN'S EDITOR; extent, 40,000 to 50,000 words. All MSS. (which should be sent in any time before September 30—typewritten preferred) will be acknowledged, and returned if not suitable.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

LORD CURZON IN INDIA.

Being a Selection from his Speeches as Viceroy and Governor-General of India, 1898-1905.

With a Portrait, Explanatory Notes and an Index and with an Introduction by SIR THOMAS RALEIGH, K.C.S.I. 8vo, 12s. net. [April 20.]

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

By WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL, M.P.

With Portraits. In 2 vols, demy 8vo, 36s. net.

MEMOIRS OF ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE.

By SEVEN FRIENDS.

Edited by E. G. SANDFORD, Archdeacon of Exeter.

With Photogravure and other Illustrations. In 2 vols. 8vo, 36s. net.

HENRY SIDGWICK: A Memoir.

By A. S. and E. M. S. With Portraits, 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE DOOR OF HUMILITY.

By ALFRED AUSTIN, Poet Laureate.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"There is throughout this nobly religious Poem a real wish on the part of the writer to help his time. . . . The Poem flows with music from first to last, and the lines are so inevitable, there is such absence of all's raining after effect, such terseness in many of the verses, as obliges me to hold them in memory as one holds in memory so many of the lines of Wordsworth."—CANON RAWNSLEY IN THE "TRIBUNE."

IDOLA THEATRI.

A Criticism of Oxford Thought and Thinkers from the standpoint of Personal Idealism.

By HENRY STURT. 8vo, 10s. net.

[April 20.]

OWEN WISTER'S NEW NOVEL.

LADY BALTIMORE.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

[April 20.]

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

TWO NEW NOVELS FOR THE HOLIDAYS

Love and Adventure in London.

ROUGE. 6s.

By HALDANE MACFALL and DION
CLAYTON CALTHROP.

A Cowboy's
Life.

The Sunset Trail. 6s.

By A. H. LEWIS, Author of "Wolfville Days."

OTHER NEW BOOKS

HERE AND THERE. H. G. Keene, C.I.E. 10s. 6d. net.

CHRISTOPHER DEANE. E. H. Lacon Watson, 3s. 6d.

THE BENEFactor. Ford Madox Hueffer. 6s.

THE LADY NAVIGATOR. Edward Noble. 6s.

A DAUGHTER OF THOR. Helen Maxwell. 6s.

REFLECTIONS OF A HOUSEHOLDER. E. H. Lacon
Watson. 3s. 6d.

BROWN, LANGHAM & CO., Ltd., 78 New Bond St., W.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,

and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRURY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	347	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		The Growth of a Poem . . . . .	356
After Tennyson . . . . .	349	Fiction . . . . .	358
William Cowper . . . . .	351	The Drama:
Five French Women . . . . .	352	Archer v. Artemis and Another . . . . .	359
Exmoor . . . . .	353	Fine Art:
Records of the Borough of		Suffolk Street and the Institute . . . . .	360
Leicester . . . . .	354	Music:
Two Observers . . . . .	355	The Bach Festival } . . . . .	361
The Task . . . . .	355	Correspondence . . . . .	362
Brother Body . . . . .	356	Books Received . . . . .	362
The Bookshelf . . . . .	363

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

MILTON, as every one knows, had at one time an idea of writing a great tragedy. He made, between 1640 and 1642, a list of subjects that might be suitable, some taken from the Bible, some from British history. At the head of that list, which is now in the library at Trinity College, Cambridge, comes Paradise Lost. He sketched out four scenarios and wrote the first ten lines: the passage beginning: "O thou, that with surpassing glory crowned," which now appears as lines 32-41 of Book IV. That he abandoned the idea of making a tragedy of the theme is, like what goes before in this note, a commonplace of literary history. In 1658, when the political troubles and labours that had occupied the intervening years were over, he began to write his epic.

The obvious inference is that he did not think he could make a good tragedy of the subject, or, at least, that he could make a better epic. That is not enough for Mr. Walter Stephens, the author of a book now before us: "Paradise Lost, a Drama in Four Acts adapted from John Milton's Epic Poem." Mr. Stephens is convinced that Milton was only prevented by his blindness from writing his tragedy. Why, if a blind man can write an epic—and so learned an epic as "Paradise Lost"—cannot he write a tragedy? But Mr. Stephens has a "conclusive" argument to adduce. Milton would have made more money out of a tragedy: he only received some £23 for the epic. (The sum, in fact, was £18.) Is Mr. Stephens aware what sort of fees playwrights received in the seventeenth century? That up to 1642, when the theatres were closed, the highest price paid for a play was some £20? And where was Milton to get his tragedy acted? It was, according to Mr. Stephens's own argument, only between 1652 and 1658 that he was prevented by blindness from writing it. During those years the only theatrical performances in London were Davenant's "operas" in Blackfriars and the surreptitious productions at the Red Bull, and even those for only part of the period.

It must be clear enough to most people that Milton did not write a tragedy of "Paradise Lost," because he considered that it would not do; because he realised, being a mind of something more than the usual dignity, that the appearance of Satan and the Angels on the stage was impossible in an age so far removed as his from the naïveté of the Miracle plays. He abandoned the idea because he was afraid of it. With his usual rashness, Dryden, in spite of Milton's sneer and Marvell's wise warning, made a play of "Paradise Lost"—but even Dryden did not wish The State of Innocence acted. Mr. Stephens is here to repair the effects of Milton's and Dryden's timidity, to rush in where they feared to tread. The style of "Paradise Lost," he is good enough to inform us, "is throughout great," and this is how he treats it. Milton wrote:

O Prince, O Chief of many thronè Powers
That led the embattled Seraphim to war
Under thy conduct, and, in dreadful deeds
Fearless, endangered Heaven's perpetual King,
And put to proof his high supremacy,
Whether upheld by strength, or chance, or fate!
Too well I see and rue the dire event
That, with sad overthrow and foul defeat,
Hath lost us Heaven, and all this mighty host
In horrible destruction laid thus low,
As far as Gods and Heavenly Essences
Can perish:

Mr. Stephens writes:

O mighty Chief of many throned Powers who daredst
Fearless to endanger th' universal ruler
And put to proof his high supremacy,
Too well we see and rue this dire event,
That with sad overthrow and foul defeat
Hath lost us Heaven, and all this mighty host [turns and peers around]

In terrible destruction laid thus low,
As far as gods and ethereal essences
Can perish.

It appears to be wrong to talk of "Heaven's perpetual King," but right to mention Heaven. Why? Approval of the play has been expressed by a clergyman, who is of opinion that Mr. Stephens has "succeeded admirably in preserving Milton's rhythm and diction." To us it appears that the action of the censor, in refusing his consent to the public performance of the play, was wise but quite unnecessary, and that Mr. Stephens's timid device of (sometimes) substituting ethereal (which does not scan) for heavenly (which does), and so forth, does nothing to suit his work for performance on any stage. What pleasure it will give to the reader we have quoted enough to show.

We have referred to "Paradise Lost" as a learned work. Except Burton's Anatomy it is probably the most learned work in the English language: for one thing that Milton resolved to do so early as 1640-42, when he was laying plans for a great poem, was to increase his learning for the purpose. And of that learning it has often been complained that we find too much in "Paradise Lost." Milton wants a simile; he finds, not one, but a hundred; he gets started, so to speak, and continues references, allusions, instances for a whole page, many of which none but a man as learned as himself could elucidate in footnotes. The sound of this grand roll of instances is always superb: no lover of Milton's majesty would sacrifice a line of it; but it is not easy or "affecting" reading.

It is not, certainly, the kind of reading that a peasant would be expected to enjoy; and that makes the statement lately repeated by Mr. Maurice Baring in the Morning Post all the more surprising. Mr. Baring has said before and says again that the Russian peasant is very fond of "Paradise Lost." He reads it regularly—would read it more, if it were one of the books which the censor (who does not actually prohibit it) allowed to be included in the lists of the school libraries. Before we allow our surprise to be too great, however, it would be well to know whether the translation read by the Russian peasant (which, we learn, is in prose) is complete or not. Very possibly a good deal that is most Miltonic is omitted, and the peasant is able to read the work without being brought up short by—so to speak—the Catalogue of Ships.

If that is so, and if the epic is presented in a shortened and simplified form, we can understand to some extent how it is that the Russian peasant finds, as Mr. Baring says he does, that it is "near to the heart; it speaks; you read and a sweetness comes over you." It is, as we need not say, under its trappings of learning, a simple, moving story on broad lines; a story that must touch every man; since every man has been at one time in Paradise and been ejected through his own fault. We remember that "Little Arthur's History of England" told us (we must have been about the age of five) that we ought to be proud to be born a countryman of John Milton's. Little Arthur was quite right; and the wonder aroused by his statement was, in our own case, to be satisfied soon after by the gift from an old, old lady of an old, old copy of the poem. It was to be "put by" until we were "old enough" to read it. We judged ourselves old enough at—if we remember rightly—the age of seven. The Miltonic line was intoxication then: it has never lost an iota of its influence.

There are some capital stories in a very delightful book recently published—the late Lord Lamington's "In the Days of the Dandies." Some of the best concern Lord Palmerston. Is it known who was the author of the following parody, made on the subject of the Prime Minister's vanity?

When some gay viscount old and jolly,
Thinks that his hair becomes too grey;
What charm can chase the tempus molle,
What art can drive his years away?

The only art his years to cover,
To hide his age from every eye,
And be the young and tender lover
We used to know him, is to dye!

We have ventured to make a slight alteration in the third line of the first stanza from the form in which it appears in Lord Lamington's book. But the verses remind us of a saying by one of the wittiest of living men. A friend, who used the same art as Pam to conceal the ravages of time, was under discussion—and was declared to be "not so black as he is painted!"

There are good stories, too, of Urquhart, the strange would-be Oriental, whose feud with Palmerston was the talk of the day. Urquhart had been secretary at Constantinople during Lord Ponsonby's embassy, and brought home—to Watford, of all places, where he had an "Eastern palace"—the Oriental habits he affected there. Lord Lamington once went to stay with him, and on his arrival was informed by the Eastern servant: "Family all in bath." In a moment "a small child, with only a little linen cloth on and all dripping wet, entered the room, made a low salaam, kissed my hand, pressed it to his forehead, and said, 'Papa and mamma leave bath soon.'" Presently "a procession such as was seldom seen in the West, appeared. It was headed by Mr. and Mrs. Urquhart, in turbans and large white sheets, fringed with gold embroidery, thrown over them. They were followed by three or four young men in similar costumes, only not quite so magnificent. These, I learnt subsequently, were the private secretaries; then followed a large retinue of servants, some still in a very moist condition. No word was spoken."

The bath, of course, was a Turkish bath; but the story makes one glad that our Anglo-Indians and others do not now bring home from the East affectations of this kind. Readers of "Mrs. Perkins's Ball" will remember Thackeray's vicious portrait of the Nabob—and Thackeray had good reason to know what an Anglo-Indian was like. On the shores of Torbay may be seen a round house, built by one Smith, a retired John Company man, in which comfort and appropriateness were both sacrificed to a desire for a resemblance to an Eastern temple. Nowadays, except for an occasional "pukka" and a dread of catching cold, there is nothing to distinguish an Anglo-Indian from any other servant of his country.

There came into our hands recently a novel, one chapter of which was devoted to the description of a hunt—and the inevitable accident. The victim was a gentleman. We turned to the illustration: the horse responsible for the catastrophe carried a lady. In a novel we read years ago, we remember an illustration showing two gentlemen in the act of "taking" a fence. One wore a beard and moustache, the other a moustache. Two pages further on the hero lay prostrate on the ground, his faithful friend bending over him and administering restoratives: both were clean-shaven. There have been innumerable instances of text and illustration being at variance, and Dickens, of all authors, has probably suffered the most.

Some time ago we referred to the "Oliver Twist" poster, in which the steps where Nancy met Mr. Brownlow and Rose Maylie were on the eastern side of St. Saviour's Church, instead of on the western. In "Barnaby Rudge" Phiz gives Joe Willet first a right arm only, then a left: Dickens does not mention which he lost in the defence of the Salvagners. In the sedan chair incident in "Pickwick" Mr. Winkle is depicted holding a candle, though Dickens states that it had been thrown away. In "Dombey and Son" stress is laid on the fact that Dr. Blimber took only ten pupils at a time; yet Hablot K. Browne, in the illustration of "Dr. Blimber's young gentlemen as they appeared when enjoying themselves," gives sixteen—without Paul. Again, we are told that Captain Cuttle was "a man with a hook instead of a hand attached to his right wrist." Phiz gives him six times with the hook attached to the right wrist and twice with the hook attached to the left. And when David Copperfield, with certain credulous Middlesex magistrates, visits Pentonville, we are shown Uriah Heep and Steerforth's valet, both convicted felons, in ordinary costume.

The blunders of authors themselves have been greater, and often more amusing, than those of their illustrators. We mentioned not long ago the Count who walked up and down the drive, with his hands behind his back, reading his newspaper, and the gentleman whose hands were cold and clammy, like those of a serpent. Trollope's Andy Scott comes whistling up the street with a cigar between his teeth; and the hero of Jules Verne's "Round the World in Eighty Days" arrives at his club just as the clocks of London are striking ten minutes to twelve. Shakespeare makes Hector quote Aristotle and puts a billiard table into Cleopatra's house; but his mistakes have been too often dwelt upon. Don Quixote in one chapter bemoans the loss of his ass; a little later he mounts it. Thackeray kills off Lord Farintosh's mother in chapter lvi. of "The Newcomes" and brings her to life in chapter lix. The same author is responsible for the description of Barry Lyndon's horse as by its dam out of its sire. In "Vanity Fair" Amelia, on the occasion of her marriage to George Osborne is said to have "sporting" a gold watch, the gift of Captain Dobbin; and less than a hundred pages further on we are told: "Mrs. Osborne had no watch, though, to do George justice, she might have had one for the asking." It would be interesting if readers of the ACADEMY could give similar instances of errors of well-known authors.

Mr. Michael Monahan is the editor and chief contributor of an American journal called The Papyrus, which reaches us regularly and is always read with interest. In fact, Mr. Monahan is The Papyrus. He has lately collected into a very handsome book, "Benigna Vena," some of the papers which, we believe, have appeared in his periodical, and one of them concerns "Literary Folk." Mr. Monahan is an outspoken person. He finds that women authors are nearly all ugly, and all regret it; that George Eliot "would gladly have bartered her literary genius for a good face," and "shows her spite in her own works and, in true womanly fashion, resents step-dame Nature's unkindness to herself by giving a bad end to every character whom she has endowed with personal beauty."

If we quoted more of Mr. Monahan on this subject, it would be clear to all that he is not only "outspoken" but occasionally very rude. How do they like this in America, the land of all others where the worship of women is carried to its highest point? And it is not altogether true. We know a number of women writers, and many of them are very good-looking—much better-looking, at any rate, than men writers, whose appearance, as Mr. Monahan has realised, is very seldom as attractive as their works.

We find ourselves more in agreement with him when he remarks on the facility with which women write. The lady of his acquaintance who "exuded sonnets at every pore" is no rara avis. As a rule, women write far more easily than men and find writing as pleasant as men find it painful. But even there we must not generalise. A writer of our acquaintance will sit down to his type-writer and rattle (in both uses of the word) an article—and sometimes a good article—straight off without a correction. And some acquaintance with the works of our young male poets has proved to us that they, too, find writing very easy. So it is. Borrow a thought from Rossetti and a metre from Mr. Swinburne, and there is no reason why such stuff as these poems are made of should not trickle out a line to the minute.

In the April number of the Danish review, Tilskueren, Niels Möller, a well-known poet and essayist, reviews the first instalment of Dr. Georg Brandes's autobiography, "Childhood and Youth." Brandes's marvellous memory, Möller maintains, is responsible—paradoxical as it may sound—for much unconscious misrepresentation. "He possesses that excellent, but dangerous, quality, a retentive memory. His recollections crystallise into a shape whose definite precision dazzles, and is moreover rounded off with well-defined details. They seem so vivid and exact, that it never occurs to him to doubt their accuracy. . . . The better the memory people possess, the more readily they permit themselves to be duped by the Nixies behind the illuminated surface of consciousness. Sympathies and antipathies colour their reminiscences without their being aware of it."

The reviewer remarks on Brandes's claim to the traits of reverence and piety, which astounded many of his readers. Yet "to those who have read his writings with a certain amount of care, this will be no new thing. . . . Brandes's high standing as a writer is partly connected with the reverence for intellectual power, which in his case is bred in the bone. It is the indispensable condition of his sympathy with the personages he describes, of his searching penetration into their spiritual world, his vehement endeavours to pluck the very soul out of their secret."

Niels Möller thinks that Brandes's power of passing through varied phases was foreshadowed in his childhood. "He was for ever longing to go farther, away from the territory he had conquered, onwards towards new worlds. 'Last year, when I was little, the hobby-horse amused me,' he said, as he rode his rocking-horse in wild delight. . . . Yet he preserved a pious memory of that hobby-horse." Finally Möller sums up the whole volume thus: In Brandes's recollections "one is able to trace the manner in which he was welded into a man, by his times and by life itself, by his disposition, his studies and acquaintances, by his external and inner experiences. It is this that gives the book its greatest value."

On the 19th, 20th, and 21st inst. Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge will sell, at their rooms in Wellington Street, the library of the late Rev. W. E. Begley, of Hampstead, and formerly of East Hyde Vicarage, Luton. Mr. Begley was the author of the work, "Nova Solyma," which he attributed to Milton. The collection is of a most unusual character and is justly described by the faithful cataloguer as "a collection of rare books and tracts chronogrammatic, anagrammatic and epigrammatic." It includes many works on witchcraft, sorcery, demonomania, alchemy, and other occult subjects, the writings of ultra-religious sect-founders and original documents connected with Joanna Southcott, Mormonism, Shakerism, Swedenborgianism, Quakerism, Anabaptists, Millenarians, and Spiritualists.

The first of the three local conferences which the Council of the Library Association were instructed to arrange at the last Annual Meeting, at Cambridge, will be held at Birmingham, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor of the City, on May 3. These local conferences are the outcome of a motion by Mr. Councillor Abbott (Manchester), and resulted from Mr. Ballinger's (Cardiff Libraries) paper on "Library Politics." Practically the whole of the subjects of the proposed omnibus library bill, of which Mr. H. J. Tennant, M.P., will take charge, will be brought under discussion; viz., the removal of the rate limitation, the extension of the Acts to county areas, and public libraries and public education. All the Education Authorities of a very large district round Birmingham have been invited to send delegates.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Microscopical Society.—The next meeting of the society will be held on Wednesday, the 18th instant, at 8.0 P.M., when there will be an Exhibition of Lantern Slides of Plant Structure, prepared by Mr. A. Flatters, F.R.M.S.

The arrangements for Mr. Tree's Shakespeare week at His Majesty's Theatre are as follows: Monday, April 23, The Tempest; Tuesday, April 24 (evening) and Wednesday, April 25 (morning) King Henry IV.; Wednesday, April 25 (evening), Twelfth Night; Thursday, April 26 (evening) and Saturday, April 28 (morning), Hamlet; Friday, April 27, The Merry Wives of Windsor, with Miss Ellen Terry in the cast (Miss Terry's night); Saturday, April 28 (evening), Julius Caesar.

Mermaid Society.—A translation of Maxim Gorky's play The Bezzemennous will be performed by the Mermaid Society at Terry's Theatre on the afternoons of Monday, April 23, Thursday, April 26, and Friday, April 27, at 2 P.M. Tickets may be obtained either from the offices of the society, 3 Old Palace Chambers, Whitehall, or from the box-office at the theatre.

H.H. Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein has given her patronage to the forthcoming unique Exhibition of Handicrafts to be held at the Grafton Galleries from April 19 to 27 inclusively. Numbers of well-known patrons have added their names, and the scheme is already attracting great attention. Many craftsmen and crafts-women of note are exhibiting, and will, in each case, be seen actually at work. There will be daily and hourly demonstrations in jewelry-making, wood-carving, weaving and spinning, lace-making, marqueterie, basket-making, pottery modelling, glass-blowing, metal repoussée work, and many other crafts.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Sale of the library of the late Rev. W. E. Begley, of Beechcroft Gardens, April 19, 20, and 21.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson.—Sale of the libraries of the late Surgeon Major-General W. F. de Fableck and others, including first editions of Sterne, Dickens, Scott, Rowlandson, Stevenson, Lytton and others, Thursday and Friday, April 19 and 20.

LITERATURE

AFTER TENNYSON

The Door of Humility. By ALFRED AUSTIN, Poet Laureate. (Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.)

IN this book Mr. Alfred Austin has followed very closely on the lines of his predecessor's "In Memoriam." His poem is an echo of Tennysonian thought, often conveyed in Tennysonian phrase. Even in the introductory verses we find a curious mixture of the two voices. It is Mr. Austin who says:

We are not framed to understand
The How and Why of such as He [sic];

and the last verse is pure Tennyson:

Until our finer sense expands [sic],
And we exchange for holier sight
The earthly help of voice and hands,
And in His light behold the Light.

The Arthur Hallam, whose death was the inspiration of "In Memoriam," is replaced here by a lady called Monica. Yet there is a marked difference in the treatment of the theme by the two writers. It is scarcely necessary to say that the mind of Tennyson had a much wider range, and the doubts that he put forward were the gravest and the most solemn that ever touched humanity. He shuddered at Nature "red in tooth and claw." He saw that the scheme of the universe seemed to include a care for the type, an utter disregard for the individual. There were moments when the whole universe seemed to be the outcome of blind chance and the destiny of man to be all oblivion or a blank; but Mr. Austin is more concerned with smaller things and propounds such problems as whether it be true or no that Love is blind. Moreover, many of the finest passages—and there are many fine passages in the poem—are blurred by the singular infelicities of speech which often remind us of the stock phrases of the daily journalist. Even where this is not so the language is often unhappy. There is a lyric beginning: "Bound, runnels, bound, bound on, and flow," in which this is strikingly exemplified. It is a prosaic fact that the runnel does not bound, and certainly Tennyson would have hesitated to use the word in this connection. His Brook sparkles and hurries, it chatters and frets, it winds, but it is unthinkable that Tennyson should ever have made it "bound." Yet Mr. Austin's lyric is not without merit of its own. Another difference may be pointed out between him and his predecessor. Tennyson was in the best sense of the word the most intensely modern of poets. It is doubtful whether any other singer has succeeded so well in giving expression to the thoughts, feelings and aspirations of his contemporaries. In the pages of "In Memoriam" we find him constantly avoiding the trivial and the obsolete, while his pictures of life are drawn with close realism from what he sees about him. Mr. Austin follows a method that is almost the exact contrary. He forsakes his own time for a period that he considers to have more poetic quality. In a picture of Sunday, for instance, that is very far from being without merit, this verse occurs:

No flail beats time on granary floor,
The windmill's rushing wings are stayed,
The children's glee rings out no more
From hedgerow bank or primrose glade.

How long is it, we wonder, since flails beat time on granary floors? At any rate, people are not usually threshing their corn at the time when children are gathering primroses. The real picture of country life just now, stated without poetry, is that in autumn the travelling threshing-machine emits no smoke from its funnel, and on a fine day in spring the becalmed hamlet is visited by an unending stream of bicycles and motor-cars. This, no doubt, Mr. Austin would dismiss as being criticism prosaic to the verge of Philistinism; yet it is undoubtedly a function of poetry to see the spiritual underlying the material garb that conceals it from the common eyes, and the mind of to-day, perplexed as to what it should believe and asking, as Mr. Austin does in the accents of Tennyson:

Dear Lord! Why longer shut me in
This prison-house of ignorance!

would, we venture to say, receive little comfort from the results of his pilgrimage. He goes to Florence and in a vision beholds again "Dante's awful frown," and "Leonardo's mystic smile." He calls up, as it were, Savonarola and Buonarroti from the grave; and the conclusion he arrives at is that art brings peace, itself is peace, but only after the mind is schooled to know:

That gusts subside and tumults cease
Only in sunset's afterglow.

He goes on thus:

Life's contradictions vanish then,
Hush'd thought replacing clashing talk
Among the windy ways of men,
'Tis in the twilight Angels walk.

The adoption of Tennyson's very phrase is curious, especially if we remember the context:

Fill the can, and fill the cup:
All the windy ways of men
Are but dust that rises up,
And is lightly laid again.

His next journey is to Rome. Of Rome he gives a romantic picture, in which it is difficult to recognise that vulgarised, tourist-haunted remnant of antiquity. The reflection with which he is inspired is that for upwards of a thousand years men in those same streets prayed to Jove and Juno and Venus and Minerva. Here altars smoked to gods and goddesses.

And did they hear and heed the prayer,
Or, through that long Olympian reign,
Were they divinities of air
Begot of man's fantastic brain?

In Roman halls their statues still Serenely stand, but no one now
Ascends the Capitoline Hill,
To render thanks, or urge the vow.

The religion of that time has been thrown aside like a garment that has become old, but Mr. Austin finds comfort in the belief that, whatever else may happen:

Secure will last the tender tale
From Bethlehem to Calvary.

Throughout this world of pain and loss,
Man ne'er will cease to bend his knee
To Crown of Thorns, to Spear, to Cross,
And Doorway of Humility.

But the man whose spirit is modern will say: "Is that so indeed?" This is no place in which to discuss the question, and yet no good can come of shutting one's eyes to the fact that a great number of men have ceased, not from carelessness but from change of belief, to kneel to the Cross, even though they recognise the eternal fact lying behind many of the symbols referred to by the poet, and know that the Doorway of Humility, by whatever name it be called, is still the only strait gate. At Constantinople the poet listens to the Muezzin proclaiming from his minaret tower: "There is no God but God!" and has not much to say, or at least much that is pregnant, about the endurance of that belief. His wandering steps carry him next to Athens, where he might have spared us the harvest of Hymettus. It would, perhaps, be unkind to hint that the book is somewhat of a Cook's excursion into the realms of thought and imagination, but the reader will begin to think so when we carry him off to Delphi to seek what comfort may be had from the oracle there. In truth we are glad to get back with the poet to England and to the conclusion of the whole matter. He returns to the village church, and the ending is perhaps the finest part of the poem:

Mutely I knelt, with bended brow
And shaded eyes, but heart intent,
To learn, should any teach me now,
What Life, and Love, and Sorrow meant.

And there remained until the shroud
Of dusk foretold the coming night;
And then I rose, and prayed aloud,
"Let there be Light! Let there be Light!"

We have glanced at the matter of the poem, and the reader will be in a position to judge for himself to what extent we are entitled to repeat the opinion with which we began—that accent and thought are an emanation from Tennyson. Mr. Austin has read his "In Memoriam" too lovingly, and in this poem, at least, has not been able to rid himself of the domination of the great mind and to stand on his own feet. This result is rendered the more conspicuous and deplorable by the thick sowing of the text with phrases that can only be described as journalistic. They might pass in a leading article, but in a poem of reflection they seem jejune and belong to the category of the sham artistic.

WILLIAM COWPER

The Poems of William Cowper. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by J. C. BAILEY. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)

As a rule, we are not friendly to the preliminary appreciation. Too often it bears the stamp of being written to order; and the spectacle of a literary man-of-all-work thrusting himself, in the character of Mr. Showman, between his author and the public, is neither edifying nor exhilarating. But to every rule there is an exception, and from our general ban on the critical foreword we gladly except Mr. Bailey's Introduction to the poems of Cowper. Mr. Bailey writes with sincerity, persuasiveness and an intimate knowledge of his subject. He is open with the reader, and declares himself a hearty "admirer and lover" of Cowper's verse. But he is far too candid, and withal too shrewd, to dream of ignoring or attenuating Cowper's faults. On the contrary, he begins by confessing them all round and to the fullest extent; and, having thus (as he says) "won the confidence of the jury by admitting the minor charges," he next pleads forcibly and successfully in defence of his client's poetical life. He establishes Cowper's claim to survive—vindicates his client's right to a permanent place on the roll of English poets. Moreover, he conducts his case with such studied moderation, and yields so generous a recognition to the claims of others, that he carries along with him even the most sceptical and reluctant member of the inquest.

As a sample of Mr. Bailey's critical work, we quote his comparison of Cowper and Thomson (Introd. p. xlvii.):

No one was ever less abstract [than Cowper]. Of things in themselves he knows nothing, and has nothing to say; his tale is always of things as he has heard, seen, experienced, above all, felt them. That is really the essence of the difference between him and Thomson, over so much of whose ground he travels. Cowper is the master of personal experience and detail: as Sainte-Beuve says, at the end of the second of his appreciative essays, "il a l'exactitude presque minutieuse." On the other hand, "il y a des masses chez Thomson." Thomson has indeed many great qualities. He is a poet of greater mental range and power than Cowper; he has more sustained energy; and he gets and uses the full benefit of a wider life and a broader creed. When he preaches or moralises it is as a man, not as an Evangelical sectary. But he is almost entirely without Cowper's note of direct sincerity, of personal feeling. He will take us through a catalogue of descriptions borrowed from works of travel or science, such as "Dr. Mead's elegant book on that subject," dressing up for us the usual lions, crocodiles, and the rest, in the established rhetorical manner. Cowper, on the other hand, needs no books, for he never leaves the field of his own experience. He talks of Olney, not of Africa; of hares and sheep, not of serpents or hyenas; of the Ouse, not the Nile. And this close clinging to his own life and haunts must have helped to bring out the best of his gifts, that in which he so far surpasses Thomson, the intimacy and tenderness of his sympathy. Compare, for instance, his snowstorm in "Winter Evening" with that of Thomson. Both descriptions have been eclipsed in vividness by the wonderful "London Snow" of Mr. Bridges: but why, of the two, does Cowper carry us with him so much more completely than Thomson? The answer must be, I think, that it is because Thomson is, on the whole, outside his subject, and Cowper is entirely and absolutely a part of his. Thomson's snow falls on the haunts of imaginary shepherds; Cowper's on the fields between Olney and Weston. . . . He makes us his companions all the while. And, admirable as is the passage which follows in Thomson, with the labourer-ox and the fowls of heaven, the robin and the hare, has it ever the note of personal feeling which Cowper found for the animals? or . . . has Thomson ever the secret of that tenderness with which Cowper speaks of the earth lying warm and quiet under the protecting snow? The fact is, Cowper's heart lies open in every line he wrote; we do not often get behind Thomson's mind. He is a poet who means to show the town how well he can write; and, while he gains by knowing, what Cowper scarcely knows, that poetry demands a certain heightening, a something above the thoughts and feelings of the common hours of commonplace people, he loses at times by the very effort to act on that knowledge. If Cowper suffers sometimes by not taking himself and his work seriously enough, Thomson equally suffers by too great a sense of the importance of the Seasons and their poet. Art and industry are with him too all-pervading, too incessant; he cannot lie still in Nature's hands, as Cowper can in his best moments, letting her take the pen from him and write in his place.

On particular poems Mr. Bailey comments with discernment, and at times with felicity of phrase. Of the homilistic vein in the satires he observes:

Cowper fails altogether to understand that the moral quality of good poetry is an invisible though an invariable accident in its nature. "If a poet has as high a soul as Sophocles," said Goethe, "his influence will always be moral, let him do what he will." That is the truth, but it is one of which Cowper knew nothing. He never had anything of the temper of an artist, and he probably died without realising that the passages in his work which had really moved people in the direction he wished to move them, were just those in which he made no open effort to influence them at all.

On the descriptive passages in "The Task" he writes:

Nothing quite like them existed before in our own, or, so far as I know, in any other language. They are, as Cowper claims, absolutely sincere; he has himself, with his own eye, seen everything he describes: it is a great deal more than other men see; and he has found a great deal more in it. And not only his observation, but his feelings are entirely his own; the whole is what the French call vérité; the personal note is everywhere, though linked, as it must be in all art that is to count, with the note of the universal.

Again, "The Shrubby" is characterised as "a voice of accepted and uncomplaining agony brought from the depth of despair, too small and quiet to tell all its tale at once, but more moving each time we return to it." On "The Poplar Field" Tennyson's praise is cited: "People nowadays hold this style and metre light; I wish there were any who could put words together with such exquisite flow and evenness." And, last, of Cowper's lines on his mother's picture—"which the same great poet told Palgrave he scarcely dared to read for fear of breaking down"—of these one can only ask whether the rhymed couplet has ever been handled so softly and warmly, ever put to such tender use? . . . It is really impossible to overpraise the lines. They are perfect in a vein which is Cowper's own, that of the quiet home affections, where he leaves Wordsworth far behind, though Wordsworth was brother, husband, and father, and Cowper hardly the first, and the two last not at all.

We have lingered so long over the Introduction because we regard it as, on the whole, the most satisfactory portion of Mr. Bailey's work. He has evidently expended a vast amount of labour on the text, yet we cannot but think that here he might have done better had he gone to work on a different plan. In his Introductory Note (p. 663) Mr. Bailey writes: "We have plenty of evidence that Cowper carefully corrected the proofs of both his first and second volumes [1782 and 1785], while, after an examination of his letters during the years 1786 and 1787, I have not discovered the slightest suggestion that he made any corrections for the editions of 1787 or 1788." That Cowper never saw a proof of any of the "collected" editions—in which, be it said, he had resigned all rights to his publisher—may be fairly inferred from the fact that a "literal" of 1785—the dropping out of the "l" in "lumber" ("The Sofa," l. 58)—remained unrectified between the years 1785 and 1799, through eight successive editions. Not till 1800 does "lumber" appear, and then only in an errata slip. This being so, one naturally asks: Why not have reprinted the volumes of 1782 and 1785, of which alone the sheets are known to have passed under the author's eye? Instead of this Mr. Bailey has painfully picked out a text of his own, in which, though he mostly follows the earlier, he occasionally relies on the later editions. In other words, where the later reading commends itself to Mr. Bailey's judgment, he adopts it, on the chance that it may perhaps have been substituted on the authority of the author; and this, although the evidence, as he himself assures us, is strong against the contingency of Cowper's having had anything to do with the correction of the later editions! Such a course was bound to land the editor in occasional perplexities. While we readily admit that in many places Mr. Bailey has restored Cowper's text, in others he has undoubtedly admitted a reading destitute of proper authority, and, on the face of it, inferior. Again, had Cowper's own text been reprinted, the reader would, so to speak, have known where he was; as it is, he must turn to the notes at the end, before he can tell whether what lies before him is the text of the editio princeps or that of some later—perhaps, much later—edition.

Mr. Bailey has recorded many of the more important variants, but in this respect his work is by no means—indeed, it does not claim to be—exhaustive, and in some places, perhaps, it is scarcely adequate. His note on the "Poplar Field" gives but a very partial account of the changes effected in the text of this carefully finished lyric. He cites the alternative stanza v. (described as a later revision in a foot-note of ed. 1803, whereas it is, as Mr. Milford—"Oxford Cowper," p. 362, note—shows, the editio princeps of the lines), and the first line of the poem in its earliest shape: "The poplars are felled, and adieu to the shade"—voilà tout. There are, however, at least a dozen minor alterations besides, some of them important. The second stanza, as first printed (The Gentleman's Magazine, January 1785), began:

Twelve years had elapsed since I last took a view
Of my favourite field, etc.

—and the passage, in this shape, may well be historical, for in a letter dated May 1, 1786, Cowper tells Lady Hesketh that for years past he and Mrs. Unwin had walked "every day in the year" to Weston Park, which lies in the opposite direction to the Poplar Field. "Of Weston," he continues:

we are never weary, and for many years it has prevailed to win us away from all the others. There was, indeed, some time since, in a neighbouring parish called Lavendon, a field, one side of which formed a terrace, and the other was planted with poplars, at whose foot ran the Ouse, that I used to account a little paradise: but the poplars have been felled, and the scene has suffered so much from the loss that, though still in point of prospect beautiful, it has not charms sufficient to attract me now.

The field in question, known as Lynch Close, lies near Lavendon Mill, a good mile outside Olney, and between two and three miles from Weston Lodge. It may well be, therefore, that Cowper had never visited it between 1772 and the close of 1784, when these lovely stanzas were written. The other changes do not affect the sense, but are of great interest as showing the diligent heed paid by Cowper to the melodious and rhythmical flow of his lines. How many students of the "Golden Treasury," we wonder, have noticed that in the first edition the final stanza of Cowper's poem is made up from different texts—lines one and two from the text of 1800, lines three and four from that of 1785? In the second edition the whole stanza follows the text of 1785, to the detriment, as we cannot help feeling, of the total impression. Surely the grave simplicity of the lines of 1800:

'Tis a sight to engage me, if anything can,
To muse on the perishing pleasures of man, is more in keeping with the subdued melancholy of the whole than the version of 1785:

The change both my heart and my fancy employs,
I reflect on the frailty of man and his joys, with its "clever" antithesis of fancy and feeling, and its somewhat stilted second line.

To the discernment of his friend Mr. Bruce Richmond, Mr. Bailey is primarily indebted for the restoration of a passage in "Yardley Oak" which, as it stands in the received text, is destitute of meaning. The discovery, communicated to the editor before, and subsequently confirmed by, his collation of the manuscript original in the Cowper Museum at Olney, is of sufficient importance to merit particular notice here. In every edition prior to this, lines 60-71 appear as two paragraphs: the one comprising lines 60-68, the other lines 69-71 inclusive. But of these two passages the first, when taken by itself, yields no sense; it consists of a series of subordinate clauses, while the principal sentence on which they should depend is wanting. For this confusion Hayley, who found and first (1804) printed the poem, is responsible. In Cowper's manuscript the twelve lines (60-71) constitute but a single sentence:

While thus through all the stages thou hast pushed
Of treeship, first a seedling, hid in grass;
Then twig; then sapling; and, as century rolled
Slow after century, a giant-birth

Of girth enormous, with moss-cushioned root
Upheaved above the soil, and sides embossed
With prominent wens globose, till at the last
The rottenness, which time is charged to inflict
On other mighty ones, found also thee;—
What exhibitions various hath the world
Witnessed of mutability in all
That we account most durable below!

Hayley, whom every succeeding editor but the last has followed, put a full stop after "thee" (line 68), and indented the following line. The silent perpetuation of so palpable an error through edition after edition of the poems, speaks ill for the degree of intelligence and care formerly brought to bear on the task of re-editing the text of Cowper. Apparently, what was good enough for Hayley and Southey was—so their successors thought—good enough for them and the public they were catering for.

The illustrations, twenty-seven in number, including two original designs—Winter and Evening—by William Blake, form an attractive feature of Mr. Bailey's volume. There are portraits of Thurlow, Colman, Warren Hastings, and William Hayley; of Mrs. Unwin, Lady Hesketh, and the "Frogs"; of Lady Austen—a charming sketch—and Anne Bodham. Four portraits of Cowper are given—the paintings by Lawrence and Lemuel Abbott, the crayon drawing by Romney, and a miniature after this by Blake. The picture by Romney in the National Portrait Gallery is not included, as there is, in truth, no sufficient reason for believing it to be a portrait of Cowper. (See a letter from Mr. W. Roberts to the Athenaeum, February 17, 1900.) Lemuel Abbott's painting shows Cowper as he was in the happy days when, as Newton puts it, he "associated with gay people, wore a green coat, and became an archer." He is painted in the costume of the Archery Club, and looks out from the canvas at us, to quote the words of his editor, "in pleasant but comparatively commonplace serenity." Last, there is the picture of Cowper's mother, painted by Heins and immortalised by the poet; and, besides all these portraits, there are landscapes of Weston and its vicinity, reproduced from the plates of a hundred years ago in "Cowper Illustrated by a Series of Views," and engravings of the poet's seal, of his horse and his dog, and of the animals which, no doubt, "good Mr. Teedon" many a time designated as "your leporine favourites"—the pet hares, Puss, Tiny, and Bess. Reader, if these delights thy mind may move, they shall be thine for the modest consideration of half a guinea.

FIVE FRENCH WOMEN

Five Famous French Women. By Mrs. HENRY FAWCETT, LL.D. (Cassell, 6s.)

THE history of France abounds in instances of feminine influence; not merely the caprices of frivolous favourites, but the steady force of women of intellect, who were born to hold the reins of power, and who took to political intrigue as ducks take to water. Mrs. Fawcett gives us four studies of women who influenced France during the Reformation. The essays have evidently been meant to stand alone, but they would have been considerably improved had they been merged into one, thereby avoiding the repetition in the last of much matter incorporated in the first. Their real centre is the reign of Francis I., and they deal with his mother, Louise of Savoy, his sister, Margaret of Angoulême, his sister-in-law, Renée of France, and his niece, Jeanne of Navarre.

The period was a troubled one; the Reformation had led to the Inquisition, and Europe was in fear and insecurity between the two; religion and politics were inextricably tangled; Francis and Charles V. were engaged in a long trial of strength, with the added necessity of keeping a watchful eye on Henry of England. Francis, who possessed most of the known failings of human nature and a good many of its vices, was worshipped as a god by his mother and sister. From the time of his birth Louise of Savoy devoted her life to him and his ambitions. She lacked the courage to be a Catherine de' Medici; but the temper of her mind was that of Lady Macbeth. She was shrewd and far-sighted, and to a high degree "proud, vengeful, ambitious." Her daughter, Margaret, had the same qualities, with an added gentleness; and, even more than Louise, she worshipped Francis with a blind passion, an adoration, which it would be difficult to parallel. Had her brother been a hero arrayed in all the virtues, it would even then have been remarkable.

As it was, it remains one of the mysteries of woman's affection, of which there are so many. Francis was treacherous, dishonourable, fickle and cruel, yet his mother and sister accepted all he did as indubitably right, and even displayed the same qualities at his command. Margaret married twice, but her husbands mattered nothing to her. When her child was about to be born she wrote to Francis: "I cannot think that my child will presume to be born without your command." Poor little Jeanne did so presume, however, and entered a life of trouble and lovelessness without the permission of the uncle who was so to plague her. Margaret at his wish abandoned her little daughter; later, she had her literally thrashed into marriage with the Duke of Cleves. All this time she was tending the children of Francis with the same devotion she showed their father. Their mother had nothing to do beyond bringing them into the world; as soon as this was done they became the property of their father and aunt. When Queen Claude died, Brittany devolved on her younger sister, Renée. This did not suit Francis, so he married her to the Duke of Ferrara, who was both too weak and too distant to look after his wife's claim. In Italy Renée found herself as much perplexed between Rome and Protestantism as she had been at home. She was forced to submit to the Pope, but as a widow she came back to France and made a refuge for the Calvinists at Montargis. This was after Francis had broken his promise to marry his second son to his niece Jeanne, and had married him to Catherine de' Medici.

With her arrival, Margaret's star began to wane, and the influence she had exerted over Francis waned too. She had always induced him to leniency towards the reformers, for her religious conviction was the one powerful factor in her life apart from her worship of him. Her mother, Louise of Savoy, was dead, and Francis was under the sway of Catherine. The Inquisition gathered power, and when Margaret died it must have been with a consciousness of failure. Mrs. Fawcett tells us she was gentle and delicate in her tastes; but she does not shine out very well, nevertheless. Her blind passion for her unworthy brother had wrecked her sense of virtue and justice, and after his death she soon sank.

Her second husband was the King of Navarre, and this kingdom, perilously disposed between two such growling mastiffs as Spain and France, she bequeathed to her neglected daughter. Jeanne had a strong character, nurtured in loneliness, and it is not surprising that her loveless life had hardened her. Yet she was a fine woman; she defended her kingdom and her faith not only against the rival Powers, but against the indiscretions of her weak and foolish husband. Mrs. Fawcett gives us a vivid picture of restless Europe at that time, and great names stud her pages—Guise, Bourbon, Condé, Vendôme. The studies suffer from weak construction, but they are interesting. The first essay deals with Joan of Arc. Mrs. Fawcett is a fine partisan; her enthusiasm is so great that she more than once compares Joan with Christ.

The style is clear, with a certain cheerful colloquialism which is rather unexpected. Francis behaving dishonourably is "hard to beat"; some one "had bade" some one else farewell. The illustrations are good and interesting, although the portrait of Francis I. does not convey the "personal splendour" with which Mrs. Fawcett credits him.

EXMOOR

The Blackmore Country. By F. J. SNELL. (Black, 6s. net.)

EXMOOR is the last country that stands in need of "faked" interest and false sentiment to heighten its charm. The traveller who follows up the gradual ascent of the Barle or Exe Valleys from the south, or climbs the steeper hills above the Bristol Channel, forsakes, as he rises, the comfortable, sheltered, cosy life, the life of hedgerows and of hedgerow thoughts, which is the typical life of England, and, emerging on the great purple curves of the moor, opens up a wider horizon both to eye and mind. All creatures here partake of this ampler nature. Stay-at-home rabbits and foxes give place to wandering red-deer, whose lurching, unhurried gallop crosses these monotonous ridges much as the beat of an albatross's wing crosses the leagues of a South Atlantic swell. Blackbirds and thrushes, our garden singers and the pensioners of our strawberry beds, domesticated as ourselves, and full of the knowing, nervous ways of civilisation, make way for far-flighted blackcocks, or curlews wheeling in the clouds and uttering the melancholy cry which seems the very voice of this wild landscape. Even the wind itself, fresh off the Atlantic and rushing straight and steady across the heather, is of a widely different character from those feeble and fitful draughts which dodge among the lanes and farmyards of the valley.

It is this primitive, virile, bracing quality in Exmoor scenery which is its real attraction, which differentiates it in character and influence from other English scenery, and which is precisely the quality which the novelist, Blackmore, entirely ignored. "Lorna Doone" contains a great deal of more or less effective detail, but it does not contain one line which marks the writer's consciousness of the unique power of that scenery in which the story is cast. Even Whyte-Melville—not a great writer, certainly, but one with a touch of poetry running through him—could learn more of this quality of western landscape from a week's visit than Blackmore's years of familiarity brought him, and there is more appreciation of the moor in many a half page of "Katerfelto" than in all "Lorna Doone."

What Blackmore did was to use the moor for his own purposes, to make of its wildness a warrant for a tale of impossible adventures and impossible romance, which he proceeded to palm off on a willing public as a genuine west-country product. The results have been in keeping with such an origin. Lorna and Jan Ridd supply the desired gush for the tourists and visitors who invade the moor during the summer months. They are the heroine and hero of trippers and picnic-parties, and afford names to coaches and boats, and a vehicle for advertisement to hotel proprietors and tea-house keepers. To west-country people themselves they are names associated with a certain maudlin sentiment and empty ginger-beer bottles.

In these circumstances, an indication of the inevitable shortcomings in Mr. Snell's book is contained in the name of it. "The Blackmore Country" is not the West Country at all. It is a country of petty detail and small observation, quite lacking in the masculine grandeur of western scenery. Mr. Snell follows his hero about with a patient assiduity that is not without pathos. He catches his manner. He unravels the relationship between Jones and Brown, and fathoms the depths of cottage gossip. The material of "Lorna Doone," the places and characters and names, are traced and discussed with unquestioning devotion. In a word, the book is built upon Blackmore, and aspires to no more than such a reflected interest as Blackmore and his novel together can cast upon it. To a large section of the public this claim may perhaps be sufficient, and Mr. Snell's volume may find a place in the wagonettes that daily in summer set out towards the moor from Dulverton and Lynmouth. But with another and, as we venture to think, a more discriminating section, it will not pass muster, not for deficiencies of its own, but because it is founded on a reputation which is itself insecure.

RECORDS OF THE BOROUGH OF LEICESTER

Records of the Borough of Leicester. Being a series of extracts from the archives of the Corporation of Leicester, 1509-1603. Edited by MARY BATESON. Vol. III. (Cambridge: University Press, 25s. net.)

It is only in recent years that we are becoming aware of the large amount of historical material there is in the records of the English boroughs. For a long time the papers of the different corporations were regarded as of comparatively little importance, and it is thanks mainly to the work of the Historical Manuscript Commissioners that we are at last beginning to realise what important light these records shed on English history. Some of the corporations have gone to the cost of having their records thoroughly and properly calendered, and it is only by such a process that we are really able to say what is and what is not of importance. As to Leicester, Miss Bateson has now prepared a Calendar up to the accession of the House of Stewart, and this volume, the third that Miss Bateson has compiled, contains the records for the period the House of Tudor occupied the Throne. Leicester had been governed by a body consisting of a mayor, twenty-four brethren, and forty-eight comburgesses, who had been authorised by Henry VII. to act on behalf of the whole body of the inhabitants of the town. This body, by a Charter of Elizabeth in 1589, was formed into a body corporate styled "the mayor and burgesses of the town of Leicester."

Most English boroughs were in close relation with some local magnate. Leicester was dependent on the family of Hastings. This great family, the present representatives of George Duke of Clarence, were stewards of the Honour of Leicester. As such they were the legal leaders of the men of Leicester in time of war, presided over the musters and collected the subsidies payable to the Crown. The third Baron Hastings was created Earl of Huntingdon, so the Earls of Huntingdon were the real Lords of Leicester, not Robert Dudley, Elizabeth's favourite, who was only the titular Earl.

The position of the lord, whatever may have been his precise legal authority over the borough, was of great practical importance. He had a voice in the appointment of the borough officers. In 1599 Lord Huntingdon wrote to the mayor saying that there was a vacancy in the office of weighing wool, and adding: "My desire is that you would make choice of the bearer hereof to execute the said place." The borough did not obey, another candidate "claimed the place by a former promise"; this was overruled, but Lord Huntingdon's candidate was not appointed. Still the mayor promised they would be ready "to pleasure him in a place better suiting with his degree and more answerable to his training." In 1592 the earl wrote to the mayor that he heard the Recorder intended to resign, and recommending a successor. The mayor replied that the earl was misinformed; the Recorder had no intention to resign, and they did not want to use the Recorder worse than "the carter his horse, who, although he die under his load yet is well provendered in his life."

The records give rather a curious picture of the condition of Parliamentary representation under the Tudors. Leicester was under the influence of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Chancellor of the Duchy claimed—and his claim seems to have been recognised—to have the right to nominate one of the members. Sir Ralph Sadler, when he was Chancellor, went further and claimed to nominate both; this the town would not admit, and he was allowed one only. Lord Huntingdon also claimed a right to recommend if not to nominate a member, and in 1597 he wrote to the mayor complaining that he was very hardly dealt with in not having his nominee elected. The town at times resented this dictation, but, on the whole, so far as Leicester went, the Duchy and the Earl were the most potent factors in elections. Doubtless the Chancellor of the Duchy acted in other boroughs as he did at Leicester, and having regard to the large estates of the Duchy throughout England and Wales, we realise what a power it gave the Crown in controlling elections, probably far greater than that of the Stannaries, of which Hallam made so much.

There is a trace (it is not much more) of the way in which the popular interest in the politics of the day was dealt with. It is difficult for us to realise that three and a half centuries ago anything like public discussion of current events was a criminal offence. William Gibson was charged by Robert Molton, surgeon, with using seditious words: "A little while the King loved my Lady Ann and should be in prosperity." These do not appear so very bad a statement of the case between Henry VIII. and Ann Boleyn. Yet they were treated as an affront. An embroiderer named Sanford said if the Queen of Scots were put to death there would be great trouble in England—a fairly safe prophecy, yet punishable. More dangerous is the prophecy of Merlin that Elizabeth should be forced to flee into Wales for her safeguard. Then shall "a dead man come and restore to every one his own wife and his land and set all at quiet." Travellers in those days had to be careful. George Witham, a Nottinghamshire publican, came to Leicester and spoke his opinion freely; he said among other things "bad and lewd words against Lord Burleigh and Sir Robert Cecil, saying the Cecils would have all." He was committed to prison and kept there for two days. Walter Barlow, alleged to be a Romanist, was examined in 1599. He was asked how long he had had certain beads found on him and replied: "Peradventure since he was born"; he denied that they, his handkerchief or linen were hallowed or were for any other use than handkerchiefs. On being asked whether the Pope's authority heretofore in England was complete, he replied: "he knoweth not."

One of the most interesting subjects in the records is that of the corporation finance. The security usually offered for loans was the borough lands, but the lenders wanted further security and would not take the conveyance of land from the corporation, but required the personal security of members of the corporation as well both for principal and interest. In one case the mayor and another burgess bound themselves to pay £100 borrowed by the corporation; for their security the Town Hall was conveyed to them. As far as can be seen the borough was heavily in debt; and—either from jobbery, of which there appears to have been some, as there were continuous complaints about the management of the town lands, complaints which had to be silenced by a by-law providing that any one who disclosed any spoken part or matter at any common hall shall forfeit £5, or from the expenses of the borough increasing at a greater rate than the income—the financial outlook was far from cheerful. The expenditure in 1518 was £23. It had increased in 1560, and was £39, in 1580 £135, and in 1601 £381. Even a modern corporation with education rates could hardly show a higher rate of increase.

Then, as now, the borough was not responsible for all its expenditure. Duties were cast upon it by the central authority, which it had to discharge, and a refusal to discharge the duties in those days meant imprisonment for the mayor. Being on the main road to the north, Leicester had to find post-horses for the King's service. In 1541 there is an entry for shoeing the post-horses and mending the town harness. At first the town was liable to find four post-horses; afterwards the number was raised to six, with additional ones when occasion required, as, for instance, sometimes special horses were needed to convey messengers from Leicester to Wingfield, Sir Ralph Sadler's house, where Mary Queen of Scots was residing. Turreyam was also a heavy charge on the town. One of the regular payments which formed a considerable item in all the accounts is "gifts of wine." The Corporation never lost a chance of imbibing when a visitor came, whether it was the King's Messenger, or the Bishop, Lord Hastings or his family, or the town business, all were utilised as occasions for drinking wine.

The records as to education are curious. It might be difficult at the present day to get the Leicester Corporation to make a by-law in the terms of that of 1580:

That every child from the age of 8 years upwards shall be taught the Lords Prayer, the articles of their belief, and also to answer to certain points of the Catechism upon a penalty to the parents and master of every one to the contrary (being not idiots) of 3d. a piece [members of the Corporation paid more] or 3 days imprisonment at Mr. Mayor's pleasure. To begin at Christmas next coming.

Then, as now, the question of teachers' salaries arose. The parish of St. Mary's petitions for an increase of salary to the priest or curate. He only got £8 a year, and for that sum a learned man could not be procured, so they had to be served with unlearned ministers unable to instruct, so that divers of the younger sort are become "very undutiful and disordered."

We have not space to go into various points of interest, such as the regulations for trade, the licensing question, even the excessive number of alehouses then complained of, and proposals made for their suppression without compensation, the early closing regulation and the black list. In 1523 common brewers were ordered to brew with no hops from that day forth under a penalty of 3s. 4d. the first, of 6s. 8d. the second, and 10s. the third offence. Nor the host of other points which illustrate the local life of the time. No one can really understand what is called the "good old times" without carefully studying these records of the life that was then forced upon the townsmen of our boroughs. With the pressure of the Crown and the Crown agents, with the influence of the local lord, with the jobbery of the members of the corporation, even in Tudor times the life of a burgess could not have been all we are usually told it was. The more the real records of mediæval life are studied, the clearer it appears that there was not much to choose between the country life under the feudal lord and the town life under the local corporation. In each there was tyranny, and it is quite possible that the ordinary man enjoyed more freedom from vexatious restrictions in the country than in the town.

A few words should be said in praise of the way in which Miss Bateson has done her work. It is no easy task to arrange and classify the records of a borough like Leicester, but the way Miss Bateson has done it in this and the preceding volumes shows that Newnham students are taught the essentials of historical study and enabled to contribute works of permanent value to English History.

TWO OBSERVERS

Ways of Nature. By JOHN BURROUGHS. (Constable, 5s. net.)
Nature in Eastern Norfolk. By ARTHUR H. PATTERSON. With twelve illustrations in colour by F. SOUTHGATE, R.B.A. (Methuen, 6s.)

THESE two books represent what is best in popular natural history to-day. Mr. Burroughs's reputation is thirty years old and he continues to strengthen it. Mr. Patterson, then unknown and with no advantages of style and no peculiarity save his merit, in 1904 published "Notes of an East Coast Naturalist," which has now reached a second edition.

Mr. Burroughs is one of the few naturalists who are precise and can yet be read with ease by a scrupulous man. His object has always been simply the recording in an unambiguous way of what he sees; but by a naïve good taste he has succeeded in making his work effective as none but a first-rate artist could. He is an independent observer, and until now he could be connected only with the school of those who use their eyes. In his latest book, then, his observations are new and described with freshness and point. For their sake alone, it will appeal to every one who likes "Wake Robin" and "Fresh Fields." But to us the book is also interesting because it contains much criticism of the modern American school of "romantic naturalists"—the biographers of bird and beast and fish—men like Messrs. C. G. D. Roberts and Long. As criticism it is perhaps not very valuable, since it is based on a belief that those writers are naughty heretics who corrupt men's views of the animal world. Whether those writers are imaginative and sincerely impressed by animals and capable of uttering their impressions, is certainly a legitimate question. But their aims, surely, are honest enough. They are descended from the poets and painters who have given us the horses of Achilles, the hound of Ulysses, the leopards of Bacchus, the Sensitive Plant and many more. Mr. Burroughs, however, objecting to the humanisation of animals, makes his objection the starting-point for much expression of opinion concerning instinct. In almost all his essays in this book he uses such phrases as—"an unthinking habit formed in their ancestors under the pressure of hunger"—"Nature looking out for her own"—"instinctive imitation"—"unconscious communication"—a "universal or cosmic intelligence which makes up by far the greatest part of what animals know." As a clever and experienced man, he commands our respect for these opinions; his illustrations are always interesting and his own. But he seems to us to forsake his old position of an observer sometimes, and to use such words as we have quoted without fully realising that "instinct" and so on explain nothing but are merely the trappings of a convenient assumption which may be of quite temporary importance. Probably the attitude which it expresses was in its origin anthropomorphic, and due to some comparison of animals with children. It is dangerous because, as in Mr. Burroughs's case, it is apt to support a feeling between pity and contempt for creatures whom it is perhaps more profitable to consider as different rather than inferior. It is possible to imagine a race standing towards ourselves as we to the animals, and having eyesight of corresponding inferiority. Of these a few would roughly generalise about us in a limited portion of their time, so as to spread the belief that we have not noticeably changed since the Stone Age, though they should only have begun to observe us two hundred years ago. But though some of us might grant that such generalisations were amusing, not many would think them adequate. Yet are not the popular modern conclusions about animals of a similar kind?

Mr. Patterson draws no conclusions. He has abandoned himself heartily to the use of his eyes and ears, with interesting results. His catalogue and concise accounts of the birds, fishes, mammals, reptilia, amphibia, stalk-eyed crustacea, and mollusca, of Eastern Norfolk, are of the kind that will be invaluable a hundred years hence, in spite of the fact that Norfolk has been studied by other excellent naturalists. His general observations are among the best of their class. They are haphazard, brief paragraphs, full of gusto, about the birds and broadsmen as he has seen them, or as he has heard of them, during his lifelong watchings on the Yarmouth shore. The coarse, hearty life of the men is faithfully, bluntly, recorded along with that of the birds which they love as the angler loves the worm. At the beginning is a short autobiography of Mr. Patterson, which reveals an astonishing, whole-hearted devotion to observation, pure and simple, in spite of many obstacles of station and luck. Mr. Southgate's pictures of shore birds are good.

THE TASK

My work was finished: what comes next,
I wonder, and long time perplexed
Vainly I ponder plan on plan:
Till presently there comes a man
True to himself, and then I see
My task is to be such as he.

HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

BROTHER BODY

BROTHER, I cannot think that you were born
Merely to be my raiment till, outworn,
I fling you down to perish in the mire:
Rather you seem the flesh of some Desire,
Older than I, and mystical to me:
You were not wrought so wondrous well to be
The creature of my fancy: you are part
Of that Eternal Being at whose heart
The infinite pure purpose of the Earth
Waits, until Man Himself shall come to birth.

HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE GROWTH OF A POEM

AN eminent critic said of Dante Gabriel Rossetti that he was too poetical for a painter and too pictorial for a poet. This is at first sight plausible enough, but, after all, it lacks the one thing which makes a paradox worth anything—namely, an underlying truth. The epigram would have been much truer, and therefore better, if the critic had said that Rossetti was too pictorial not to be a poet, too poetical not to be a painter. Is it possible to be too pictorial in poetry or too poetical in painting? The two arts are so allied that the more the one can be imported into the other, the happier is likely to be the result.

And the result of Rossetti's poetical efforts must be acknowledged by every one to be supremely happy. He possesses in a signal degree the two essentials of great poetry—an ear for the musical part of it and an eye for the scenic. He did not, however, enjoy these attributes in equal parts. He made his appeal primarily to the eye of the imagination, just as Tennyson appealed most powerfully to the ear. I do not, of course, say that Tennyson neglects the scenic element, as perhaps we may call it—for want of a better phrase—or that Rossetti is careless of music; I merely mean that, though the two qualities are present in both poets, the musical is more characteristic of Tennyson and the scenic is more pre-eminently Rossetti's demesne.

In "The Blessed Damozel," however—the masterpiece of Rossetti, though it was the work of nonage—the language is curiously perfect, and has a magic fascination. This very perfection encourages one to trace the changes introduced into the poem by its author during twenty years, a lapse of time which for most people means the translation from the callow to the mellow. But Rossetti's inspiration knew no callowness. His alterations were neither numerous nor radical, but profoundly interesting as exhibiting the artistic genesis of an exquisite poem. There is many a genius like Byron and Balzac, whose manuscripts were corrected and recorrected, written and rewritten in the proofs, before their authors sent them out into the world. On the other hand, there are facile workmen like Scott whose manuscripts were pictures of neatness, and poets who have struck off poems, like "Kubla Khan," hot from the anvil of inspiration.

Happy the feeling from the bosom flung,
In perfect shape.

Rossetti belonged to neither of these classes. His brother, William Michael, has said of "The Blessed Damozel" that Dante Gabriel "heedfully revised" it; and, if we examine the alterations successively made, we shall have to allow, I think, that with slight exceptions this heed tended towards the ultimate perfecting of the work.

Before closely considering the successive revisions, it may be interesting to refer to the poem which Rossetti declares to have first suggested to him the theme of "The Blessed Damozel." This was none other than Poe's

"The Raven." Voltaire said that, if Virgil was the creation of Homer, he was Homer's masterpiece, c'est son plus bel ouvrage: one might pay a similar compliment to the genius of Poe as being the source from which Rossetti derived inspiration. It is curious that "The Blessed Damozel" should have been evolved from a source prima facie so alien, but the explanation is simple. Rossetti admired with all the ardour of his eighteen years Poe's "The Raven," then recently given to the world, and he considered that the poem expressed to perfection the feelings of the lover on earth for his mistress in heaven. Rossetti, reversing the relation, was fired to portray the attitude of the Blessed Damozel towards the lover who dragged out an unwilling existence still on earth, a lover for whom she yearned so pathetically and so patiently withal:

"I wish that he were come to me,
For he will come," she said,
"Have I not pray'd in Heaven? on earth
Lord, Lord, has he not pray'd?"
Are not two prayers a perfect strength,
And shall I feel afraid?"

After this analogy in theme has been pointed out, all comparison between the two poems ceases. Poe's has all the curses of modernity. Its American jinglings and liltings and its alliterations lend an insincerity to it, an artificiality that almost persuades one to believe Poe was serious when he wrote that solemn nonsense, "The Philosophy of Composition." The word-juggling of the "Raven" is skillful, but whether one counts atmosphere or diction, upon how much a lower plane of art it rests than Rossetti's chef d'œuvre!

From the point of view of mere words, even Rossetti is not so perfect as some modern poets. For example, in the very first verse we feel a discord:

The hair that lay along her back
Was yellow like ripe corn.

Here the staccato effect of the two like monosyllables in immediate juxtaposition jars on the ear. Would "Yellowing like corn" be better? Later we find:

The light thrill'd t'wards her fill'd
With angels in strong level flight.

The first of these lines is very much packed, and the assonance of "thrill'd" and "fill'd" is ugly. Another slight verbal blemish appears in what is one of the most beautiful verses of the poem:

"Alas we two, we two thou say'st?
Yes, one wast thou with me
That once of old. But shall God lift
To endless unity,
The soul whose likeness with thy soul
Was but its love for thee?"

Here the close proximity of one and once is a defect, but too slight, perhaps, in consideration of the beauty of the stanza, to deserve notice. Slight though it is, I do not think Tennyson would have allowed it to stand.

The stanza quoted above is one of the three parenthetical verses in which is contained the human side of the poem. They are introduced in beautiful contrast to the other verses, wherein a mystically supernal note is struck in depicting the other world. It was with regard to this verse that Rossetti made the largest alteration. Originally there were two stanzas, which have since been merged into the verse we now have. They ran thus:

Alas to her wise simple mind
These things were all but known;
Before they trembled on her sense
Her voice had caught their tone,
Alas for lonely Heav'n, Alas
For life wrung out alone!

Alas and though the end were reach'd?
Was thy part understood
Or borne in trust? And for her sake
Shall this too be found good?
May the close lips that know not prayer
Praise ever tho' they would

What a pity that Rossetti discarded the first of these verses! It is far too beautiful to be dispensed with. Mr. W. M. Rossetti described it as a "highly noticeable" stanza, and said that "Alas for lonely Heav'n" was one of the "most moving audacities" in the poem. As for the second verse, its meaning seems obscure, and therefore I agree contentedly to its erasure.

Rossetti's brother remarked that Dante Gabriel thought the stanza out of tune with the general tone of the poem in that it implied "a certain sceptical tendency in the lover, a germ of disunion between himself and his beloved in matters of faith." This explanation is hardly satisfactory inasmuch as the verse afterwards substituted is open to a similar objection, where the lover expresses the doubt:

But shall God lift
To endless unity
The soul whose likeness with thy soul
Was but its love for thee?

Besides, there is an easier solution. There is a previous verse incompatible with the words:

May the close lips that know not prayer,

in which the Blessed Damozel asks:

"Have I not pray'd in solemn Heav'n,
In earth has he not pray'd?"

or as the version has it now in an intenser form:

"Have I not pray'd in Heav'n, on earth
Lord, Lord, has he not pray'd?"

There is another verse, too, which has suffered undeserved exclusion in the revised text. It is as follows:

"Yea verily; when he is come
We will do thus and thus
Till this my vigil seem quite strange
And almost fabulous:
We too will live at once one life
And peace shall be with us."

This stanza is one which, in the early version, rounded off the set which preceded it, in which the Blessed Damozel revolved in anticipation the heavenly experience she and her lover would share together when they should be at last reunited in the bliss of Paradise. It forms a beautiful climax; one is almost emboldened to pit one's judgment against the author's and plead for the inclusion of the stanza in our modern versions.

The poet's pruning-knife has been applied to another stanza equally good—for what reason it is difficult to guess. At any rate it is well worth quoting here, in order that those who have only a casual acquaintance with the poem may be made aware of its existence. It appeared as the seventh verse in the original copy, and runs:

But in those tracts with her, it was
The peace of utter light
And silence; for no breeze may stir
Along the steady flight
Of Seraphim, no echo there
Beyond all depth and height.

Beside these omissions, there is only one other passage where any really radical alteration has been made by the poet's mature judgment. It occurs in a verse which used to read:

Heard hardly, some of her new friends,
Playing at holy games,
Spake gentle-mouth'd among themselves
Their virginal chaste names,
And the souls mounting up to God
Went by them like thin flames.

Rossetti altered the whole sense of this stanza. It would seem as though he thought something of the ludicrous would attach to the playing of games in heaven. Nausicaa, it is true, played ball with her maidens, but then she was mortal; and it is difficult to suggest what kind of games the gentle-mouthed Virgins would engage in. On the other hand, it ought to be mentioned that other pursuits of theirs were comparatively mundane:

Into the fine cloth, white like flame,
Weaving the golden thread,
Fashioning the birth-robcs for them
Who are just born, being dead.

While there is no authority for celestial games, there is abundant poetical precedent for industrial manufacture in the supernatural world. The Nymphs in Homer and Virgil weave the hyaline wool, and the Maiden of the Lake in Tennyson fashions King Arthur's sword Excalibur:

Nine years she wrought it, sitting in the deeps
Upon the hidden bases of the hills.

The fact is that the verse was quite good enough to stand, but Rossetti preferred the more elaborate:

Around her lovers newly met
'Mid deathless love's acclaims
Breath'd evermore among themselves
Their heart-remember'd names.

In remodelling, he had to sacrifice his old picturesque idea, and substitute the sense above. In a retouch, which he subsequently gave to his new version, he made a curious change. He altered the last line into: "Their rapturous new names," which introduces a wholly new idea, directly opposed to that which "heart-remember'd" would convey. I wonder, are the "five sweet symphonies" examples of these "rapturous new names"?

"We two," she said, "will seek the groves
Where the Lady Mary is,
With her five handmaidens, whose names
Are five sweet symphonies,
Cicely, Gertrude, Magdalen,
Margaret and Rosalys."

If we except the undesirable omissions quoted, it must be allowed, I think, that Rossetti's revisions were nearly all refinements of the old readings. One or two changes are doubtful, and one or two are for the worse. For instance, is not the original:

From the fix'd lull of Heav'n she saw
Time, like a pulse, shake fierce Thro' all the worlds better than:

From the fixed place of Heav'n she saw . . . ?

It might be said that one word altered is a small thing, and Rossetti thought it worth while to make the change; but is it an improvement? And here is an instance of a verse which Mr. W. M. Rossetti thought gained nothing in the altering, though we may be excused, perhaps, for questioning his view:

"We two will stand beside that shrine
Occult, withheld, untrod
Whose lamps tremble continually
By prayer sent up to God;
And where each need, reveal'd, expects
Its patient period."

Surely the fifth line is unmusical and clumsy, and surely nothing could surpass the delicacy of the simile contained in the existing version;

"And see our old prayers, granted, melt
Each like a little cloud."

There are other very distinct and noticeable improvements. In the very first verse we find two revisions. In its earliest form it used to read:

Her blue grave eyes were deeper much
Than a deep water even,

One may well suppose that Rossetti was dissatisfied with the strange use of even, which, as well as being unpoetical, looks as if it were adopted for the sake merely of rhyme. He accordingly altered it to:

Her eyes knew more of rest and shade
Than waters still'd at even, thereby introducing a new and very poetical image, but sacrificing the lovely reference in the original version to the depth of her eyes. The last revision combines the two ideas in perfect form:

Her eyes were deeper than the depth
Of waters still'd at even.

In this going on unto perfection we can see the stages through which the poet's mind progressed towards the goal which a perfect taste unerringly attained. Another instance of this progression can be observed in the three versions of what is now the eighth stanza:

And still she bow'd herself and stoop'd
Into the vast waste calm
Till her bosom's pressure must have made
The bar she lean'd on warm.

In this there is an objectionable rhyme, technically called "cockney," and a prosaic phrase—"her bosom's pressure." Rossetti amended it thus:

And still she bow'd above the vast Waste sea of worlds that swam,
Until her bosom must have made
The bar she lean'd on warm;

leaving the faulty rhyme, but rectifying the other defect. Finally he blotted out both faults, and combined the excellences of both versions in:

And still she bow'd herself and stoop'd
Out of the circling charm,
Until her bosom must have made
The bar she lean'd on warm.

Can any one doubt that the third attempt achieved perfection?

But there is one verse that, more than all the rest, has gained by remodelling. It was stiff and jerky as it first appeared, and quite faulty in other ways too. In fact, this is the only stanza which betrays the inexperience of the youthful poet:

"There will I ask of Christ the Lord
This much for him and me;
To have more blessing than on earth
In nowise, but to be
As then we were, being as then
At peace. Yea verily."

It is not necessary to point out the crudities of this verse. One has only to look at the stanza as emended to appreciate the desirability of revision:

"There will I ask of Christ the Lord
Thus much for him and me,
Only to live as thus on earth
At peace; only to be,
As then a while, for ever now
Together I and he."

These alterations, when enumerated, seem a formidable enough array, and yet it speaks well for Rossetti's youthful genius that the changes which have been introduced from first to last do not really modify the conception of the poem, nor raise it into a higher sphere of art. The fact is that genius was present to the boy, and maturity could add to it nothing save what the experience of any literary man could have supplied. The alterations are nothing more than finishing and polishing touches—a tuning up of the poem, as it were, which, however, does not detract from its human simplicity, and its atmosphere of ineffable exaltation.

R. L. TYRRELL.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Primitive Plagiarism," by J. A. MacCulloch.]

FICTION

If Youth but Knew! By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THOSE familiar and accomplished collaborators, Mr. and Mrs. Egerton Castle, bring to their craft methods peculiarly their own. No other contemporary writers of fiction lead us so willingly into the same old-world associations; well-bred, gay, graceful and artificial. Even at the most tragic moments the natural man rarely shows himself; disasters are met courteously, with a bow or the deft handling of a fan. Wise reflections there are too, delicate contempt for vice and folly conveyed in ornate and elaborate word-settings, that perhaps owe something of their accepted fascination to comparison with the manners of our own ruder day. From the opening pages of the present story the stage and its machinery are always in sight—not for the first time in these authors' books, but a little disappointingly in this instance; for "Rose of the World," with its strong human interest, aroused hopes of what we might find in "If Youth but Knew!" But once accept the book as a glorified libretto of a romantic opera, clever, dainty, delicately treated, and all runs smoothly and delightfully to the end. The scenes are laid in Westphalia, when Jerome was king, when reckless frivolity reigned at the mock Versailles court, and corruption ruled in every department of that unhappy kingdom. It comes about that a haughty Anglo-Austrian aristocrat falls in love with and marries Sidonia, heiress of a goodly slice of Westphalia. But Sidonia has an ogreish uncle and guardian, the Burgrave, and a light-minded aunt, each with an end to gain, and Jerome to propitiate—at the risk of Sidonia's honour. All goes wrong with the young couple for awhile, despite the unceasingly watchful and kindly intervention of "fiddler Hans," a tramp, but yet a noble of the old régime. To his fiddle all the countryside dances, weeps, or fights, but vainly he teaches Youth the things it does not know, the things to which it will remain deaf and blind to the end of time. And, after all, who may declare youth less wise than its elders in their day? Of fiddler Hans—who has called himself by many another name since he was first discovered—we see and hear too much. His instinct for playing appropriate airs at the psychological moment is quite credible, but comes out a little too often. Sidonia is really charming. It is she who holds our eyes and our minds until the curtain falls and the play is done.

Hauntings. By VERNON LEE. (Lane, 3s. 6d. net.)

THESE four curiously interesting stories have a weird fascination quite unlike any others of their order. We can well believe that any one living entirely alone in Italy and imbued with the spirit and history of the country would grow to imagine that his dreams took on bodily shape. How could one help living in a dream-world in Italy, where opposing forces, Christian and Pagan, fight for mastery in the mind, and the ghosts of victims and martyrs jostle each other on the same death-place? It may be madness, but it is better than some states of sanity. In "Amour dure" the professor meets his death happy in his dreams; and what more can a human being want when he comes to die? The second story, "Dionea," is the study of a beautiful and imaginative girl who owns no kindred and who brings tragedy and ruin on every one she meets with. Here the attraction of the artist to perfect beauty is shown with terrible force. The scene of the third story, "Oke of Okehurst," is laid in England; it is almost the weirdest of all. The effect of a fantastic temperament in the wife on the nerves of a healthy and normal-minded young English squire leads, as it must, to tragedy. The character and temperament of Alice Oke are not at all those of an English woman; she, too, might be taken from a land of fancy. Can it be Egypt? There is something of the sacred cat about her. Her vivid imagination is seized upon by the most romantic and ill-starred character in her family history, and the two evil minds work together to deal death and destruction. In the last and fourth story, "The Evil Voice," the result of the haunting is again evil. Surely all these four spirits were in league with the great Evil Maker, and were allowed to roam the world trying new ways of gathering in their harvest of souls. Vernon Lee has a dream-world of her own; it is a tragic world, but we may envy her ability to live apart from the sordid and unromantic world of to-day.

Jack Derringer. By BASIL LUBBOCK. (Murray, 6s.)

MR. BASIL LUBBOCK'S tale of deep water—a pendant to his "Round the Horn before the Mast"—may conveniently be considered qua (1) sea life and (2) sea literature. With regard to its actuality he has attempted, as he tells us in a very modest and winning little preface, "to paint sea-life as it really is . . . without glossing over the hardships, the hard knocks, the hard words and the continual strife of it all"; and his presentment carries conviction with it. His typical "hell-ship," the Silas K. Higgins, is detained in San Francisco Bay for want of the crew which her notoriety makes it impossible to ship except by foul means; and when at last she sets sail with a kidnapped complement of all nationalities, some of whom have never been to sea before, we follow day by day, almost watch by watch, through fair weather and foul, the struggle of a pair of brutal mates under the eye of a callous captain to knock discipline into this dangerous material. The result is a series of incidents so simply and forcibly described that it is easier to imagine oneself a wretched member of the "shanghaied" crew than to step back from the picture and regard it as a whole. If this be done, however, and especially if a touchstone be applied, such as Mr. Joseph Conrad's best work, it will readily be seen that Mr. Lubbock has not "composed" his picture at all. There is little perspective about it, and the very energy and knowledge which he brings to bear upon every detail sometimes confuse the general effect. His characters soon become stereotyped through a too generous use of their peculiar metaphors and vocabularies, and Derringer himself is perhaps rather too polished a specimen of the "rolling stone." Of the romance with which Part II. is chiefly concerned it would be ungenerous to be over-critical in face of Mr. Lubbock's modest apology for it. At any rate we never dreamed of skipping it, and, as Bucking Broncho might, or might not, have said, "it considerable thrilled us."

La Mia Carovana, avventure di Vangelo Famiglio, filosofo. By CESARE FACCHINI. (Bologna: Zanichelli, 1.2:50.)

THIS is a light-hearted and entertaining book of a type which we are accustomed to regard as peculiarly suitable for summer reading. It relates the affairs of the heart, or rather a series of more or less amorous incidents compressed into single scenes, which happened in the life of the hero from his early student days to the time when he determined to put away childish things and get married. Though written in the first person, containing little in the way of narrative, reflection or explanation, and consisting almost entirely of dialogue, these stories give a distinct and convincing sketch of the personality of the protagonist. Sufficiently impressionable to be easily led on, sufficiently artistic to be fastidious, sufficiently talkative and excitable to be momentarily carried away by his own words and attitudes, and sufficiently analytical to pause at a crisis to consider eventualities or question the real value of his emotions, Vangelo Famiglio finds himself in a number of laughable, emotional or risky situations, from which he issues disillusioned, perhaps, but apparently quite ready for the next opportunity of gaining experience, having done little harm to himself and none to any one else. The stories in themselves are slight, and their effectiveness lies entirely in the telling of them. We do not fear for the body or soul of Vangelo; but he is bright, discursive and not unlearned, and we listen willingly to hear what he will say at each successive turn of events. The author's touch is light and sure, his humour is not too obvious, and he is never dull. "La Mia Carovana" must also be commended for a virtue which is unfortunately rare in modern books of the kind. It is intensely Italian, both in language and style. We do not remember noticing one foreign word in its two hundred pages. Too many Italians at the present time cultivate literary cosmopolitanism to an extent that almost results in loss of nationality; and it is comparatively seldom that we come upon a volume of stories like this, wherein the richness of the Italian language, both in words and phrases, is so happily exemplified.

THE DRAMA

ARCHER v. ARTEMIS AND ANOTHER

IF I had the pen of Mr. Algernon Ashton, I would have addressed a letter to the Tribune last week in the following terms:

"Dear Mr. William Archer, about twelve years ago the old custom of possessing confession albums was revived. I do not know whether it was due to the advance of ritualism or the practice of auricular confidences in the Anglican Church, but a pretty old habit with certain improvements on the primitive conventions held sway for a few years. Instead of being asked: 'What is your favourite eatable?' 'What is your favourite drinkable?' the questions addressed to the social penitent were of a more intellectual description. The other day a lady no longer young, now very near and dear to me, embarrassed me by bringing forth from a Sheraton bookcase one of these crumpled rose leaves which had turned from a toy to a relic. Opposite the question: Who are your favourite artists? with that alliteration so dear to youth, I had written, Burne Jones, Blake, and Botticelli; my favourite dramatists were Ibsen and Maeterlinck, and, to cut a long and uninteresting confession short, opposite the salient question: Who is your favourite critic? I had written in purple ink (we were very purple in those days) the name of William Archer. A hot tear has dropped on the page of that dull little book, and your name, my dear sir, I cannot say is blotted out, but is smeared for ever. You must forgive the egotism of this letter, because you taught me that the personal note in criticism was of greater value than the editorial 'we.' In those days editors were getting out of fashion, and, indeed, their very existence was canvassed; one of the first articles of mine to be rejected by the ACADEMY of that day was: 'Editors, their cause and their cure'; but now something like a Russian Duma has been established in Fleet Street, the egotist and altruist can live side by side. A gentleman is said once to have complained to Mr. George Meredith that he recognised himself in the character of Willoughby Patterne. 'Willoughby is all of us,' replied the veteran novelist. It would be truer to say we have all become Willoughby; but you taught me, dear Mr. Archer, something equally valuable over and above the personal note in criticism. You taught me the value of 'pioneering'; you made me realise that what may seem ridiculous to the majority is possibly, if not necessarily, a new note in art. You, who have fought with beasts, if not at Ephesus, at least in Fleet Street, should not plant this thorn in the side of Artemis. I can only say in the words of Sir Willoughby to Letitia: Are you quite well? Have you consulted Dr. Osler? Have you passed the grand climacteric that you write thus of Mr. Sturge Moore's play produced by the Literary Theatre Club a fortnight ago? I write this letter under the seal of publicity, and I ask whether you have paid your subscription, and urge you and others to do so, whatever your views of Mr. Sturge Moore's poetry. If I remember rightly, you spoke in the same brazen Tribune, some weeks ago, with indulgence, with plenary indulgence, of that dismal twaddle, Nero; you called it a 'fine chronicle play.' You swallowed the Crystal Palace and you strained at an uncut diamond. The passages which you quote from Mr. Sturge Moore's play do not seem to me more vulgar nor more harsh than passages in Homer, Shakespeare or Browning, and I find in its simplicity and directness, in its coarseness if you will, something primitive, something strong, something I do not find in the confectionery of

Mr. Stephen Phillips. But we must allow for the margin of taste, and I am prepared to nail myself to the mast of Mr. Sturge Moore, to hoist the black flag, while you can cling to the spar and wreckage of more popular and pretentious drama. I think I could have understood your point of view if you had not expressed the opinion that the (to me) very wonderful and dramatic scene between Hippolytus and Phædra was "improper." O Archer! O Ichabod! you are young enough to know better! Do you forget what they used to say about Ibsen? Your favourite, Mr. Gilbert Murray (in his "History of Greek Literature," page 35), has pointed out, you will remember, how vulgar the Greek deities seem to our modern view. They were by no means the calm abstractions which you admire in Lord Leighton's pictures, for example; they were terribly human, and there is much to be said for Milton's criticism (and Milton, like yourself, was an amateur of "Euripides"):

Ill imitated while they loudest sing
The vices of their deities, and their own,
In fable, hymn, or song, so personating
Their gods ridiculous, and themselves past shame.

I shall look forward to discussing in private (at the "Trencher") the poems of Mr. Sturge Moore, because at present you are battling with a more distinguished opponent than I can claim to be. I shall try to convert you to Hippolytus Unveiled, and, if the Furies seize me, I shall say:

βᾶτε δόμῳ . . . Νυκτὸς παῖδες ἀπαιδεῖς, ὑπ' εὐφροσύνῃ πομπῇ.

Believe me to be, dear Mr. William Archer, your surprised but always obliged admirer."

P.S.—I hardly know to which of the actors I should accord the apple of discord; Miss Gwendolen Bishop and Miss Wheeler as Aphrodite and Artemis were certainly more Olympian than the others, whose performance you had to take with attic salt. You wondered how two such delightful divas could have differed at all. Miss Bishop always seems to speak her lines out of sheer literary pleasure and never in a professional capacity. You forget the actress in a fascinating personality; while no one could suggest an improvement in Miss Wheeler's Artemis. The Phædra of Miss Florence Farr, one of our most distinguished and least recognised artists, seemed to echo the Phèdre of Racine rather than the heroine of Euripides or Sturge Moore. I expected Hippolytus all the time to say:

Madame, oubliez-vous
Que Thésée est mon père et qu'il est votre époux?

And Miss Farr to reply:

Et sur quoi jugez-vous que j'en perds la mémoire,
Prince? Aurois-je perdu le soin de ma gloire?

I hope the Literary Club will consent to print their next programme in a more orthodox fashion (not the Ave atque Vale method). It was rather puzzling to make out the kind of play we were going to see. We wondered instinctively which side, that of Aphrodite or Artemis, Mr. C. S. Ricketts would take, and if Scene and Stage Manager were characters in the play.

ROBERT ROSS,

FINE ART

SUFFOLK STREET AND THE INSTITUTE

THE exhibitions at Suffolk Street and at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours must rouse melancholy reflections in any person of taste. Not so much because the vast majority of the three hundred and ninety-two pictures in the former and of the five hundred and fifty-three in the latter must of necessity be quite negligible as works of art, but because so much of it is so well meaning, so careful and observant, so humble and sincere, that criticism of any standard whatever seems harsh and cruel. The pathetic futility of it all! It is a pleasure to tilt at the puffed up, the ungodly, the pretentious and affected. In working round the Royal Academy the critic feels at least that when he hits he is hitting somebody of his own size, or bigger, and his chastened reluctance is best expressed by the poet:

"I weep for you," the walrus said,
"I deeply sympathise."
With sobs and tears he sorted out
Those of the largest size.

The pot-boiler awakes the devil in most of us, but what pot can by any coaxing be made to boil with such feeble, timid little flames as we see here?

One can remain complacent whilst recognising the popularity of thoroughly bad work or the unpopularity of thoroughly good; but the justifiable, yet cruel unpopularity of work that is excellent yet not eminent—that is tragic, afflicting. There has been a marked change in the temper of most minor exhibitions of recent years, and I hardly know whether we are to be congratulated on it. The facetious, the hilarious, the anecdotal and historical, the Heatherley and Wardour Street, are being gradually eliminated; we are mostly serious and earnest now.

No doubt the facetious picture is like the facetious arm-chair of a Swiss Inn, on the seat of which was painted a view of Lucerne, and when you sat down on the picture the chair played "God save the Queen." It is an offence, but I would rather be offended than depressed.

The Society of British Artists is the better exhibition of the two and shows a marked improvement on the last. Even the section of water-colours is far superior to the Institute, which is, of course, entirely composed of pictures in that medium. The special beauty of water-colour lies in the possibilities of tender gradation, which are usually neglected. Mr. Wallace Rimington's A Pearly Morning is exquisite in this respect, and is so sober and peaceful in colour that it will probably not attract attention. The scene appears to be on an Italian lake, and there is much of the sweetness of our old masters, although it is by no means a pastiche.

An Italian Fishing Village, Early Morning, by Mr. Forbes Witherby, is the same class of work, but a little feeble and lacking in conviction. I have never seen anything of Mr. Lentestey's quite as good as The Crown of the Hill. This crisp and sparkling bit of sunshine is almost worthy of Constable. Mr. Haité's cleverness would be amazing in such a picture as his Autumn Morning, if mere cleverness were a very uncommon thing. Mr. Southgate's Widgeon Pitching is not a pleasing example of water-colour, but the study of action and the minute finish of the plumage is so thorough that interest is roused merely by the workmanship displayed.

Among the oils, Mr. Walter Fowler's At Lewiston, N.B. is a fine piece of sombre colour. There is some ability and a good deal of "cheek" in Mr. J. D. Fergusson's pictures. His portraits will not do at all, but the Brass Kettle, a study of still life, is tolerable. Fireworks are not in themselves works of fine art and are associated in our minds with the guffaw of the Hooligan. Mr. Fergusson's Dieppe, July 14, 1905, will certainly not remove that impression, which is the more to be regretted since Whistler showed his exquisite taste in his treatment of them. Mr. Murray Smith and Mr. Spenlove-Spenlove are dealerish in their clever canvases. Some of the studies by Mr. Tom Robertson in the vestibule are charming and truthful in colour, but his use of oils is rather too smeary and painty. He is much happier in water-colour: On the French Coast has very sweet, rosy colour, and other good things are On the Lagoon and On the Shore, Brodick.

There is much earnest work and thought to be found in the exhibits at the Institute, but, except in a very few instances, they are futile. Most of the members seem to have no conception of the meaning of water-colour, and direct all their energies to obliterate and quell the medium. When this is not the case, the cunning of the "old hand" is apparent in pastiche. Mr. Orrock is the doyen of archaic painters, and his Durham is as clever as usual in its reminiscence of Constable and De Wint. Something of the large style of De Wint and Girtin is traceable in Mr. Joseph Knight's A Bend of the Thames, Evening. All of Mr. Bernard Evans's water-colours are a relief, in their strangeness, from the hopeless mediocrity of the surroundings, and in the Fern Harvest, Cannock Chase, Staffordshire, he strikes a grand note, suggestive, perhaps, of our old masters, but not in any sense to his own detriment. The tree stems especially are perfect examples of sound drawing and delicate modulation. Mr. Terrick Williams shows himself, as usual, a thorough artist: A Cloudy Day, Concarneau, is spirited and true in colour. The charcoal outlines, however, are to be deprecated, as more appropriate to fresco on a large scale than to the delicate medium of water-colour. Mr. Haité is again well to the fore, but his forte is rapid sketches, and the more finished style of A Venetian Fruit Stall leaves the eye no resting-place and no centre of interest. With these exceptions there seems to be nothing that calls for remark.

B. S.

MUSIC

THE BACH FESTIVAL

THE festival of the works of J. S. Bach, undertaken last week by the Bach Choir conducted by Dr. H. Walford Davies, was of the smallest dimensions which could justify the title, since it consisted of two concerts only. Our provincial festivals have led us into a popular misuse of a term which has never been very clearly defined. We connect it with the idea of a very large dose of music imbibed in an incredibly short space of time; a Bach cantata is placed cheek by jowl with "The Apostles," "Ein Heldenleben" jostles the "Messiah," and a selection from Parsifal is sandwiched into an odd hour. Even when a festival consists of the works of one man and this sort of incongruity is avoided, the overdosing too often continues in the attempt to give a thorough representation. In the case of the Bach festival this mistake was very nearly avoided; not quite, however, since the first concert was just too long for a single programme. The two church cantatas, "Erschallet, ihr Lieder" and "Liebster Gott, wann werd' ich sterben?" illustrate very different types of religious feeling and naturally employ different musical forms for their expression; then, the solo cantata was represented by the sublimely simple "Schlage doch, gewünschte Stunde," to which Miss Ada Crossley gave ideal interpretation, while the concerto in D minor for two violins, played with delightful freshness by the Misses Isabel and Eldreda Watt, was an excellent example of Bach's instrumental style. Organ music must, of course, find a place in a miscellaneous Bach programme, and Dr. H. P. Allen of New College, Oxford, played the great E minor prelude and fugue and the beautiful choral vortrag, "O Mensch, bewein', dein' Sünde gross," which was first sung by the choir as harmonised by Bach himself. This would have been enough to form a thoroughly representative programme; but the addition of two items, each in their different way so fine that one would have been sorry to lose either, made the whole too long. Miss Gleeson-White sang the lovely though long aria "Süsser Trost" from the Christmas cantata of that name, and the concert ended with the splendid chorus which forms the climax of the cantata: "Ich hätte viel Bekümmerniss." The great Mass in B minor occupied the second concert: the performance of this alone would almost justify the use of the word "festival," so colossal are its proportions and momentous its substance.

Taken together, the two concerts strikingly illustrate the two sides of Bach's musical character. On the one hand we see his genius so strongly influenced by his own restricted surroundings that it has been maintained by some to the present day that Bach's music is, after all, local in its appeal, produced in a small German town by one who spent his life there, and entirely coloured by a type of religious emotion which the dwellers in other countries or in later times can never fully share. The chorale, as sacred to Lutheran Germany as plainsong to Catholicism, dominates alike the joyful utterance of the cantata, "Erschallet, ihr Lieder," and the introspective musings of "Liebster Gott, wann werd' ich sterben?" In the former the first chorus, which is repeated at the end, is, indeed, free from the chorale, but the feeling is summed up by the tune, "Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern," in simple congregational manner, and the duet, "Komm lass mich nicht länger warten," the most complete movement in the whole cantata, is built upon another chorale, which is used as a Canto fermo, upon which to place the most intricate counterpoint. The second cantata, "Liebster Gott," is even more completely founded upon the chorale, since its whole subject-matter is suggested by the hymn of which one verse forms the first chorus and another the last. This first chorus is one of the most beautiful examples of Bach's "figured" chorale. The accompaniment, scored for oboes, flutes and strings, is an exceptionally fine interweaving of tone colour, and on this is superimposed, line by line at intervals, a very graceful and flowing version of the tune in four parts. The arias and recitatives which follow, expand and illustrate the thought of the preparation for death, and lead up to this noble outburst in simple yet beautiful harmony:

Herrscher über Tod und Leben
Mach' einmal mein Ende gut,
Lehre mich den Geist aufgeben
Mit recht wohl gefasstem Muth!

On the same subject, yet revealing such a serene aspect of it that it is separated from this last as complete attainment is from struggle, is the cantata for alto solo, "Schlage doch, gewünschte Stunde." In this work, as in the Mass on a much larger scale, Bach shows that he was in no way mastered by his environment. The chorale finds no place here; everything in the nature of contrapuntal device, the complexity of texture so dear to the Teutonic mind, he laid aside, and with a single voice accompanied by strings with the occasional impressive throb of the bell, he produced a piece of pure melodic expression, which, if not unrivalled, ranks with the very highest of its class. One is inclined to compare it to Handel's greatest aria, "I know that my Redeemer liveth"; curiously enough they are in the same key, E major. This brings us to the other side of Bach's musical character, the deeper side which makes his music great for all time and for all peoples, and which, underlying all his work, saved his hundreds of Church Cantatas from being mere "Capellmeister" music. When, as in the B minor Mass, Bach chooses to shake off the external influences of his surroundings, to refuse the phraseology of his local Protestantism, the breadth of his thought and the world-wide appeal of his music become apparent at once. It was impossible for him temporarily to exchange his Protestantism for Catholicism, to slip off Lutheran theology and assume the trappings of Rome; his setting of the Latin words of the Mass, necessarily without that intimate and personal tone which was the life of his own religion, and which shines out in his cantatas and "Passions," became instead a universal expression of the most fundamental principles of man's religious hopes. The strenuous cry of the first "Kyrie Eleison" chorus and the sublime confidence of the "Dona nobis pacem" fugue which ends the work are, as it were, two opposite poles between which there lies an immense range of expression. There is the ecstasy of the "Gloria," which reaches to the highest heaven with the fugal treatment of the words "Cum Sancto Spiritu, in gloria Dei Patris, Amen," and within this the exquisite pathos of the "Qui tollis peccata mundi" chorus. This is equalled, if not excelled, by the "Et incarnatus est" and "Crucifixus" of the "Credo." In such places the performance of the Bach choir was particularly successful, the chorus under Dr. Davies being very sympathetic towards the expressive side of the work, while in the great choruses of the "Gloria" and the tremendous climax of the "Confiteor" which ends the "Credo," the effort was too great for complete success.

To describe the Mass here would be impossible as well as unnecessary; but, while speaking of the "Credo," I cannot refrain from calling attention to the passage which introduces the words, "Et expecto resurrectionem mortuorum," since it is one of those places where Bach uses harmonic resources which are often supposed to belong to a later and more daring age. From the key of D major he breaks loose through a chord of E flat minor chromatically introduced, a marvellous chord on the word "expecto," which opens a vista of limitless possibilities; and not content with this he presses his point further with a series of such chromatic progressions, until for the moment he almost carries his hearers beyond the restrictions of key into an unknown land. Here he shows himself the prophet.

We are given too few opportunities of hearing the Mass; whether performed well or ill it should be ever with us, since it shows in its fulness a great side of Bach's work which even the "Kommt ihr Töchter" of the Matthäus Passion only suggests. Till we know it thoroughly and intimately we cannot understand all the spirit of Bach; once it is known his greatness stands revealed in his smaller works.

H. C. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

AN EMENDATION OF HERODAS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

MONSIEUR,—M. le docteur Max Maas cherche-t-il une querelle d'Allemand? Mais, en Bavaois bien instruit, il connaît le proverbe, "Great wits jump," et nos esprits à nous tous, Allemands, Irlandais, Français, sont (sautent) d'accord sur σέλῃναι. Donc plus de dispute possible. (En parenthèse, M. le prof. Tyrrell me soupçonne de ne pas savoir scander la première syllabe de παῖτες; pourtant, il y a déjà pas mal d'années que j'en ai appris la valeur métrique.) En terminant, je me fais un devoir, en même temps qu'un plaisir, de présenter à M. le docteur Maas (pour son parrainage) ma leçon nouveau-née:

ἐπ' ὤμων δαλζοῦρες (= δαλζοῦρες),
"pour lactérer au vif."

Veuillez agréer, Monsieur, l'assurance de mes sentiments de la plus haute distinction.

H. H. JOHNSON.

Rennes, April 8, 1906.

A SIMPLIFIED CALENDAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It was certainly very good of you to notice my slight effusion as a new publication under "Science," and one asks: is your verdict, of "simple," a compliment or a rebuke? Let me explain that I, and others, suffer from the need of reference to settle the week-day of a certain Christmas, passed or to come; so my object is to enforce regularity, so that every month-day should accord with its own week-day; and my notion of "simplicity" is to annihilate doubt thereon.

A. HALL.

102 Highbury Hill, N.
April 9.

[We are happy to state that our use of the word "simple" was intended to convey a compliment without a shade of rebuke. The only people likely to rebuke Mr. Hall for his very ingenious scheme are, possibly, the astronomers (who may have arguments against it with which we are insufficient to grapple), and certainly the calendar-printers, whose occupation would be gone when once the world had grown accustomed to the change.—Ed.]

THE MAN WITH A HOE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The Funk and Wagnalls mutilated edition of Poe, edited by Mr. Edwin Markham, suggests the following;

There once was a "Man with a Hoe,"
Who worked in the garden of Poe;
But, alas, it was found
That in digging the ground
He had cut up the roots by the row.

JOHN B. TABB.

March 15.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Rembrandt, A Memorial, 1606-1906. Part iii. 14½ × 10½. Pp. 6. 7 Plates. Heinemann, 2s. 6d. net.

[See the ACADEMY, March 24, 1906. Three of the plates in this number are in colour, the Portrait of a Man in red and black chalk (late Holford); the Study for "The Philosopher" in the Louvre, in red chalk (Berlin Print Room) and The Return of the Prodigal in pen and bistre (Teyler). The four "Rembrandt" photogravures are Rembrandt's Mother (Imperial, Vienna), a particularly fine Anatomy Lesson (The Hague), the Portrait of Bruyninck (Cassel) and the Young Girl at a Window (Dulwich). The work increases in interest and value as it progresses.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Bülsche, Wilhelm. Haeckel: His Life and Work. With an introduction and supplementary chapter by the translator, Joseph McCabe. 9 × 6. Pp. 336. Unwin, 15s. net.

[The frontispiece is a coloured reproduction of Franz von Lenbach's portrait of Professor Haeckel (1899) and there are other portraits and illustrations. Index.]

Van Dyke, Paul. Renaissance Portraits. 8½ × 5½. Pp. xii, 425. Constable, 10s. 6d. net.

Oliver, Frederick Scott. Alexander Hamilton. An Essay on American Union. Portraits and a map. 9 × 5½. Pp. 502. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.

[A Life of Alexander Hamilton, of whom Mrs. Atherton gives a vivid picture in "The Conqueror." The author of the present work does not claim that his book is exhaustive.]

DRAMA.

Ridout, Reginald J. Ecce, Somnator Venit! Drama in three Acts. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 130. Drane, 2s. 6d. net.

[The story of Joseph, Potiphar's wife and Asenath. In very, very irregular "blank" verse.]

Rivers, Amélie (Princess Troubetzkoy). Augustine the Man. With a frontispiece from a drawing by the Marchioness of Granby. 7½ × 5. Pp. 83. Lane, 5s. net.

[A drama in blank verse in four parts: Augustine in Carthage; Augustine in Milan; Augustine at Cassiciacum; Augustine at Tagaste.]

EDUCATION.

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage. Cantos iii. and iv. Edited with notes and an introduction by J. H. Fowler. 6½ × 4½. Pp. xiv, 136. Macmillan: English Literature for Secondary Schools. 1s.

[Mr Fowler's notes are brief, accurate and to the point, and his introduction is wise in its handling of Byron's character and sound in its criticism.]

FICTION.

Whithard, Philip. George's Whims. 7½ × 5. Pp. 311. Allen, 5s.

Cutting, Mary Stewart. Little Stories of Married Life. 7½ × 5. Pp. 260. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.

Whitehead, Miller. Caleb Troon. 7½ × 5. Pp. 196. Drane, 6s.

Holstein, Alexandra de; and Montefiore, Dora B. Serf Life in Russia. The childhood of a Russian Grandmother. 7½ × 5. Pp. 240. Heinemann, 3s. 6d.

Emanuel, Walter. Paris: a frolic. 7½ × 4. Pp. 64. Library of Humour. Illustrated. Sisley, 1s. net.

Howard, Keble. Our John, M.P. 7½ × 4. Pp. 77. Library of Humour. Illustrated. Sisley, 1s. net.

Hocking, Silas K. The Squire's Daughter. Illustrated by Arthur Twidle. 8 × 5½. Pp. 397.

HISTORY.

Comyn-Platt, T. The Turk in the Balkans. 7½ × 5. Pp. 176. Alston Rivers, 6s.

[Mr. Comyn Platt has resided in Turkey for some two and a half years, and travelled in Macedonia. His book attempts merely to "throw some light on the path of Eastern politics, to the advantage, it is to be hoped, of future travellers."]

State Trials of the Reign of Edward the First, 1289-1293. Edited for the Royal Historical Society by T. F. Tout and Hilda Johnstone. 8½ × 7. Pp. xlvii, 262. Offices of the Royal Historical Society. n.p.

[When Edward I. returned to England in August 1289, after three years' absence, he found that the justice of the country had fallen into gross abuses. Within two months he had appointed a commission to inquire into the delinquencies of his officers. The proceedings of the commission are contained in two assize rolls now in the Public Record Office. The present volume contains selected cases from the smaller of the two, and a full analysis of both, together with the text of the "Passion of the Judges," a mediæval satire on the proceedings. The Introduction is the work of Miss Johnstone. Index.]

Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science: Spanish-American Diplomatic Relations Preceding the War of 1898. By Horace Edgar Flack. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 95. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press.

LITERATURE.

Andreas and The Fates of the Apostles: two Anglo-Saxon narrative poems edited with Introduction, Notes and Glossary by George Philip Krapp. 8½ × 5½. Pp. lxxxi, 238. Ginn. The Albion Series, 8s. 6d.

[The Albion Series will comprise the most important Anglo-Saxon and Middle English Poems in editions designed to meet the wants of both the scholar and the student. Of the two poems in this volume—both traditionally attributed to Cynewulf—"Andreas" is reprinted for the first time since Grimm, 1830: "The Fates of the Apostles" has never before been edited entire and with comment. The critical apparatus of the book is very complete. It consists of a long introduction dealing with the question of authorship, source, and all other points of interest; a bibliography, variae lectiones, grammatical and metrical notes, and glossary.]

Massis, Henri. Comment Emile Zola composait ses Romans: d'après ses notes personnelles et inédites. 7½ × 4½. Pp. xii, 346. Paris: Charpentier, 3 fr. 50.

[The time has come, in M. Massis's opinion, when Zola's work must be extricated from the tangle of mistaken theories and systems with which he wrapped it round. Zola, not as theorist but as artist, is his subject, and he has gone for his material to the mass of Zola's dossiers and manuscripts deposited by Mme. Zola in the Bibliothèque Nationale, of quotations from which the bulk of the book consists. Part i. deals with the general conception and growth of the roman naturaliste. Part ii. with a specimen case, "L'Assommoir."]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Lemmoir-Cannon, Henry. Modern Sewage Disposal (a popular handbook). Being a brief and simple outline of some of the Principal Methods which have been, and are, employed to deal with the Sewage of Communities. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 104. Drane, 1s. net.

Abeille, Léonce. Marine française et marines étrangères. Politique navale des grandes puissances; les organisations maritimes et les flottes actuelles; économies et réformes. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 368. Paris: Colin, 3 f. 50.

[M. Abeille is Captain of a frigate, and Sous-Directeur of the Ecole Supérieure de Marine. He has written a very learned and exhaustive, but at the same time vigorous book, which is calculated to spur the French nation to making more of their Navy.]

The Picture Postcard Annual and Directory, 1906. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 96. Rotherham: The Philatelic and Cartophilic Printing Co., 6d.

[Contains the Names and Addresses of Picture Postcard Collectors, Dealers. Magazines, Exchanges and Societies in all parts of the World, British Publishers, Printers, Engravers, Colourists, Jewelling Manufacturers, Album Publishers, Illustrated Review of Postcards, Selection of suitable words in French, German and Spanish, for corresponding with Foreign Collectors, also useful information for Picture Postcard Collectors.]

Wilkinson, R. J. Malay Beliefs. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 81. Luzac, 2s. net.

[Designed to help Civil Service Cadets studying for that part of their examination which deals with the Malay people—as distinct from the tests in the Malay language.]

Hyde, Douglas. The Religious Songs of Connacht. A collection of Poems, Prayers, Curses, Satires, etc. 2 vols. 8 × 5½. Pp. 824. Unwin, 10s. net.

Hardy, G. F. Memorandum of the Age Tables and Rates of Mortality of the Indian Census of 1901. 13½ × 8½. Pp. 66. Calcutta: Office of Supt. of Govt. Printing, India, 12 annas, or 1s. 2d.

POETRY.

Home-made History from Unreliable Recipes by Hansard Watt. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 96. Alston Rivers, 2s. 6d. net.

[Humorous poems on The Ancient Britons; The Roman Invasion; Alfred; Kanute; William the Conqueror; Elizabeth; and Guy Fawkes; and an address to The Critic. Illustrated.]

POLITICS.

Noel, Conrad. The Labour Party: what it is and what it wants. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 180. Unwin, 2s. net.

[The manifesto of the labour party, with appendices.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Impressions of America. By Oscar Wilde. Edited, with an introduction, by Stuart Mason. Keystone Press, Sunderland.

Grant Allen's Historical Guides: Florence. New edition, revised and enlarged by J. W. and A. M. Cruickshank. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 303. E. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net.

Allcroft, A. H., and Masom, W. F., The Tutorial History of Rome. Third edition revised and in part rewritten by J. F. Stout. 7 × 5. Pp. vii, 437. The University Tutorial Series. Clive: University Tutorial Press. 3s. 6d.

[Most of the sections dealing with constitutional history have been entirely rewritten, and a section on the development of the Army has been added.]

Warren, Henry. The Story of the Bank of England. A History of the English Banking Movement and a Sketch of the Money Market. Second edition. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 251. Everett & Son, 3s. 6d. net.

Rhys, John; and Brynmor-Jones, David. The Welsh People. Fourth edition. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 678. Unwin, 5s. net.

[Chapters on the origin of the Welsh, their history, laws, language, literature, and characteristics. Maps.]

Gasquet, Abbott, D.D., O.S.B. Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries. 8½ × 6. Pp. xl, 495. Bell, 8s. 6d. net.

[A reprint of the "Revised Popular Edition" of 1899, in which the references to documents etc. were altered to accord with Dr. Gairdner's then newly issued Calendar of Papers. This "cheaper revised popular edition" of what is now a standard and indispensable work contains a new preface, in which Abbot Gasquet explains and holds to the position he at first adopted, and which succeeding investigation only proves more and more fully to be just and historically correct.]

Mitchell, Rev. A. F. How to teach the Bible. Being suggestions as to the next way of teaching the Bible in view of modern knowledge of the Bible and of the child mind. Three forewords by the Dean of Ely, Sir Edward Russell and Professor W. H. Woodward. Second and Revised Edition. 7½ × 5. Pp. 151. Williams & Norgate, 2s. 6d. net.

[Four lectures. The Reform of Bible Teaching; The Bible and the Imagination; The Bible and Moral Thoughtfulness; The Bible and the Affections and Will. The titles sufficiently indicate the aim of the book, which contains also a List of Books suggested to Parents and Teachers.]

Roscoe, E. S. Rambles with a Fishing-Rod. Illustrated. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 233. Edinburgh: Morton, 5s.

[A second edition of Mr. Roscoe's book of Rambling Continental fishing excursions, with seven new papers. Index of place-names.]

MacStodger's Affinity. Written and illustrated by David Whitelaw. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 141. Greening, 1s.

THEOLOGY.

Hankey, Wentworth Beaumont. Holy-Week Addresses. Edited by W. J. Birkbeck. Short memoirs by Viscount Halifax. 5½ × 3½. Pp. 131. Mowbray, 1s. net.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Cassell's Guide to London for 1906. With 10 plans and numerous illustrations. 6½ × 5. Pp. 196. Index. Cassell, 6d.

THE BOOKSHELF

Le culte d'Apollon Pythien à Athènes. Par G. Colin. Paris, 1905.—Among the monuments discovered at Delphi by the French School at Athens one of the most interesting is the Athenian treasure-house, which M. Colin thinks will ultimately be restored as completely as the temple of Nike Apteros. A considerable part of its walls is covered with inscriptions, among which the fullest and most numerous refer to the Pythiads, as they were called, or Theoriae, the sacred missions sent by Athens on certain occasions to Delphi. We read of one of these in connection with the death of Socrates, whose execution was postponed till the sacred embassy should be completed. It is these inscriptions which M. Colin has collected, edited, explained and illustrated. The work contains thirty-nine engravings and two plans. The learning displayed by the writer is wide and deep, and the light touch characteristic of the French essayist relieves, as far as possible, the dullness of the theme. It is a pity that of all the inscriptions which he has printed only one is anterior to Roman times, so that no light is thrown on Athens in her days of greatness. The documents which M. Colin has put before us do not tell us the route followed by the Sacred Procession, the periods at which it was undertaken, or the reason of its institution and prolonged maintenance. M. Colin has gathered all the evidence which can be brought to bear on the answers to these questions, but it cannot be said that he has arrived at any striking or even definite conclusions.

We have before us specimens of three separate series of reprints of classical or semi-classical literature: Messrs. Dent's Everyman's Library (1s. net per volume); Messrs. Methuen's Standard Library (6d. net and 1s. net per volume), and Messrs. Routledge's New Universal Library (1s. net and 1s. 6d. net per volume). It is no part of our purpose to weigh one against the other and to say which is "best"; they are all good, and we prefer to try to point out the distinguishing characteristics of each series. Of the Everyman's Library there are now one hundred volumes published, dainty little books, but serviceable and strong. The purpose and scope of this series we explained in the ACADEMY of February 17 in discussing the first fifty volumes; and in the second fifty we find the same variety and comprehensiveness. One book of particular interest just issued is Principal Lindsay's New Testament, "arranged in the order in which its parts came to those in the First Century who believed in Our Lord." Principal Lindsay does not vouch, of course, for the exact chronological accuracy of his arrangement; but he follows what "a consensus of conservative scholarship" is inclined to accept as the true order; and his "Prologue" consists of the matter common to the Synoptics stated in the words of St. Mark. This is a book that many will value and consult with advantage. Another volume we are glad to see is Mr. William Canton's A Child's Book of Saints, prettily illustrated. From the classical section of the Library we have before us Professor Blackie's translation of Aeschylus, with his introductions and preface, and vol. i. of the Plays of Euripides, translations chosen from Shelley (Cyclops), Potter, Milman, Woodhull and others, with a brief introduction by V. R. R. This is the only instance of the "literary preface"; and it is a mild one. The rest of the volumes before us are prefaced only by what is necessary and right, a very short biographical and bibliographical note. In History and Biography we have the Misses Strickland's Queen Elizabeth, an abridged Burton's History of his own Times, and the Letters of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, with a sufficient biographical note by Mr. Brimley Johnson; and the list is closed by a good little Gulliver's Travels, with Mr. Arthur Rackham's pictures. For the rest of the fifty we refer our readers to the prospectus which Messrs. Dent are willing to send on application. For ourselves, we feel that we should like to have every one of these neat, pleasant, sound little volumes. And more, the list not only shows things that we have long wanted, but suggests new ideas of things we did not know we wanted. This we regard as a valuable feature, the preservation in the public mind of books which we cannot afford to see "crowded out" by the prevailing competition of the day.

Messrs. Methuen's Standard Library is not so comprehensive in scheme as Everyman's Library. It moves more slowly, and shows more of the deliberation of the scholar. For, without being held to imply that Messrs. Dent's series is in any way unscholarly, we can point to a specially important feature of Messrs. Methuen's—an immaculate completeness and accuracy of text. The spelling, it is true, is modernised; but that—even in the case of very early works—is a process that can, with due care and knowledge, be performed in a scholarly manner; and, after a good many tests applied, we have come to regard the Standard Library as, for practical purposes, an absolutely safe guide. The page is larger than that of Everyman's Library; these are not books for the waistcoat pocket, though they go very comfortably into the side-pockets of a great coat. The type is clear and the cloth-binding simple and handsome. We have a few new issues before us: A complete Burns for a shilling, the text revised by Mr. T. F. Henderson from his Centenary edition, with the inclusion of several songs from the "Scots Musical Museum," and the exclusion of certain spurious pieces foisted on Burns by previous editors; in fact as good a text as can be had for any money: Paradise Lost, from the text of 1667, with certain readings from the text of 1674 which are duly noted when made, Milton's peculiarities of spelling, punctuation and the use of capitals being preserved "where they seemed to be of special significance"; Southey's Nelson, from the text of 1830, collated with that of 1813; Law's Serious Call from the first edition, and a new translation by Mr. Ernest Barker of Plato's Republic. The Standard Library keeps to the critical introduction: in some cases, Mr. Barker's, for instance, it is well done; and its presence may be forgiven when a strictly accurate text follows.

In Messrs. Routledge's New Universal Library we have a scheme and a series that deserve to be better known than, we fancy, they at present are. Universal is a big word; but its use comes very near to being justified in the present case. It appears to us that this series of friendly, comfortable, square little books will in time contain everything that readers can possibly want of books classical, semi-classical, undeservedly forgotten, half-forgotten, accessible elsewhere, or accessible nowhere else. We have before us a row bound in blue leather; on our shelves are dozens in green cloth, and the range and catholicity of choice make them a valuable possession. Bulfinch's Age of Fable, Jeffery's Essays from the "Edinburgh Review", Thompson's Leopardi, Tyndall's Glaciers of the Alps, Adamnan's St. Columba, Alexander Smith's Dreamthorpe, are books chosen at random from the set, which are outside the run of the usual reprint and yet thoroughly deserve to be put within the reach of all. To people who cannot find what they want the safest advice is: "Try Routledge's New Universal Library."

A Book of Verses, by Arthur L. Salmon (Edinburgh and London: Blackwood). Mr. Salmon's is—and quite deservedly—a name that stands out amongst the names of present-day poets. He has that very pleasant thing, "temperament": with the aid of that other essential power, that of self-criticism, he would have achieved a very much more considerable position than is his to-day. The long poem in dramatic form: "The Parson and his Clerk," at the end of this volume is perfectly satisfying within its self-imposed and restrained limits. It has its story to depend on for interest and it is well executed. But almost every one of the shorter poems here printed fails because of its "filling up." That is to say that every one of the poems would have been a perfect thing could the author but have printed it with lacune—with long gaps. The one called "Pleading" might, for all the value that the succeeding lines add to the whole, have been printed:

Will you come homeward from the hills of Dreamland,
Home in the dusk?

The rest of the poem is of no particular account:

... and speak to me again.

Tell me the stories that I am forgetting,
Quicken my hope and recompense my pain?

and the remaining two verses have no very individual value. Any one else could have written them just as well: the phrasing is not very exact, since "Tell me" should surely have been "Re-tell and 'recompense my pain' is almost meaningless. The first line and a half are, however, really valuable on account of a certain music in the phrase and a certain justified simplicity of dialect. As much might be said of poem after poem:

The time will come when one of us shall lie
In the cold ground—when one of us shall come [Among the flowers and grass to linger nigh
Craving a word from lips for ever dumb.]

Here the lines in brackets are ineffectual because of a lack of inevitability. "Among the flowers and grass" is just makeweight: a better image of a place would have been attained to by writing: "Among grey monuments," or "Beneath the shadowy yews," and "to linger nigh" is of no particular value or significance: the half-line might just as well have been employed further to strengthen the feeling of place. It is neither trifling nor captiousness that leads us thus to pick to pieces Mr. Salmon's verses. For it is along these lines that Mr. Salmon himself must proceed with a self-criticism that will give to his poems a positive level of attainment. Mr. Salmon is a poet, not of passions but of moods: he has not the semi-epic, semi-lyric touch that can carry him and his reader over weak places in their stride. By a certain fine and scrupulous pensiveness he challenges the criticism of his hearers: having challenged that he must equip himself with that still greater scrupulousness that renders the really poignant poems of the English anthologies absolutely proof against meticulous proings. This scrupulousness Mr. Salmon undoubtedly has "in him": here are four very fine lines:

The phantom gold of far-spread dawns, the thing
The night winds pray for when they smite the pines
In restless passion—goal for which the waves
Climb with perpetual purpose to the shore.

That is real poetry.

The Secret of Popularity, by Emily Holt (Methuen, 3s. 6d. net). Mrs. Holt believes that popularity can be won by anybody who chooses to seek it. She has carefully and correctly noticed a great number of the characteristics of popular people, and suggests that to copy them is the way to social success. We think not. Mrs. Holt addresses her book to the unpopular. Let us test it by following an ordinary, unpopular person obeying her rules. We must first remind ourselves that the unpopular lady has nearly always a resentful knowledge of her neglect. She cannot obliterate, by an instant resolve, an important characteristic of her nature. She would go forth after popularity like a lioness after her prey. Her attitude would be aggressive. She would wear the hunting face, and with it the anxious look that invites defeat. Now let us watch her, following the rules. To begin with, she "gives way easily and heartily to a cheerful and appropriate expression of mirth." No matter that it is impossible to laugh easily when carefully adjusting "the expression of mirth" to the situation. Poor lady, hesitating dismally between a smile in the major key, and a laugh in the minor! She is to assume, next, "as her companion speaks, that she is deaf to the rest of the world." We know that stare of strained attention: do we welcome it? She is to "talk on deliberately," in order to arrange her ideas. We have met her at dinner more than once! She is to write numerous and careful notes. We can imagine those notes—each calling before the eyes of its recipient a picture of the would-be-popular lady struggling to say the right and pleasing thing, a very bad-tempered portrait indeed. Then she must decide to have, and to become, a friend. She is "to signify by sweet commonplace little words and deeds, that she feels a hearty interest in her companion." Imagine the surprised companion hopelessly discomfited. Instead of being her natural self, and winning at least some little consideration in return for acid contributions to gossip, she must confine herself to saying a nice thing about every person mentioned. See her pumping them up, and making all the gossips feel uncomfortable. Did Lady Sneerwell's guests love Maria? In order to be a good neighbour, she must call on everybody, and go to houses where any one is ill, "with something in her hand that may be of use." Impertinent meddler! All this is very well, and we do not smile overmuch until we reach the chapter that is to teach her to be "the woman admired by men." Man is to be attracted "by the genuinely interested little fashion in which she draws aside her frills to make a place for him on the sofa." How often have we fled from that "genuine" interest! Last, to make herself popular as a guest, she is told to learn to "recite gay tender and sweet bits of verse and dialogue by the popular modern authors and poets." That caps all. Mrs. Holt's book does not contain the secret of popularity, but only popularity's characteristics. Walter Pater we believe, wore a sage green tie. The tie was characteristic of Pater. But, if any one else, for that reason, wore a sage green tie, it would not mean that he had the Paterian spirit, but its opposite, the spirit of imitation. Be yourself and somebody is sure to like you; take Mrs. Holt's advice and nobody will. And yet it is not fair to laugh at a little volume so well meant as this, so brightly written, so pleasantly printed and bound. But its title should have been "The Secret of Unpopularity."

A Summary Catalogue of Western Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library by Falconer Madan, M.A. Vols. 5 and 6, pt. 1 (Oxford: Clarendon Press). A somewhat longer period has preceded the appearance of the fifth volume of Mr. Madan's Summary Catalogue than was the case with the third and fourth volumes, which were published five and seven years respectively after the inception of the Catalogue in 1890. The present volume concludes the cataloguing of manuscripts received between 1695 and 1890, and is mainly devoted to those acquired singly during those years. Volumes i. and ii., which are now in preparation, will form a new edition of the old printed catalogue of 1697. No separate collections of any importance are to be found in the present volume, but there are several isolated manuscripts of great interest, among them being the Codex Dunelmensis of Terence, which was received by donation in 1704 and then in a manner lost because some eighteenth-century official forgot to enter it in the Library indexes. It was not until 1878 that it was re-discovered, and then only by the pertinacity of Mr. T. W. Jackson, who, having failed in his first search at the Bodleian as well as at other libraries for the famous Codex, luckily inquired again at the Bodleian for a Terence "with pictures," and so recalled the volume to the mind of Mr. Cox, who was librarian at that time. Another important volume with a similar history is No. 28798, which seems to have been originally the private property of a former librarian, and afterwards passed into the library's possession under some informal application of the Statute of Limitations. It had existed in the library for many years as a "dirty parcel, tightly rolled up, at the bottom of a small box" before it was discovered to contain autograph letters of Henry Savile of Eton, Anne of Denmark, Prince Rupert, and other desirable persons. The most interesting acquisition of modern times is the little Gospel Book of S. Margaret of Scotland—the identical manuscript described by her contemporaneous biographer as "a book of the Gospels ornamented with the figures of the four Evangelists, painted and gilt," for which S. Margaret "always felt a particular attachment, more so than for any of the others which she usually read." It is most surprising that such a treasured volume should have been bought at public auction for £6. With volume v. of the Summary Catalogue is also published the first part of volume vi., containing the accessions received from July 1890 to 1904. The only collection of importance is that of the Shelley manuscripts, presented by Lady Shelley in 1893. The purchases recorded bear ample testimony to Bodley's poverty, no manuscript of the first rank appearing. A number of modern manuscripts are presented every year, some of them of considerable antiquarian value, but a few seem quite unworthy of Bodley's Library. For instance on p. 153 there is gravely catalogued an Irish postcard dated December 3, 1897, and a "notice posted in W. Long's shop at Ballyferriter, Kerry, September 1897, chiefly in English." We venture to doubt the wisdom of mentioning separately such ephemera. Something may also be said against the inclusion of typewritten books, facsimiles, and negatives in a catalogue of manuscripts. Surely typewriting is printing, and is only associated with writing by an accident of name. As regards facsimiles and photographs of manuscripts we quite agree that their mention may be useful to students, but it is always difficult to treat such works with any degree of uniformity. Doubtless Mexican scholars will be glad to have their attention called to the valuable facsimiles of Mexican manuscripts issued by the Duc de Loubat; they will, however, look in vain for the still more valuable facsimiles published by Lord Kingsborough. Still, small inconsistencies such as these in no way affect the value of so painstaking a piece of work, which, when complete, will form a fitting monument to the accurate scholarship and palaeographical learning of Mr. Madan.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER.

ESTABLISHED 1808.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

"The Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE*RED

DRINK THE

WHITEDELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&amp;

BLUEIn making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

IS YOUR PENCIL A
KOH-I-NOOR
OR ONLY AN IMITATION?

There are no better pencils made than L. & C. Hardtmuth's Koh-I-Noor Pencils. Many Manufacturers have tried to equal this wonderful pencil—all have failed. The merit lies in the lead, in the selected wood, and in the workmanship. Using a Koh-I-Noor is like drawing silk over paper—so smooth.

Koh-I-Noor Pencils are one price everywhere—4d. each, or 3s. 6d. for one dozen. Of Stationers, Photographic Dealers, and Artists' Colourmen. Dainty Booklet on Pencils post free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, 12 Golden Lane, London, E.C.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS
THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND
MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR
SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMYA WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

“There’s for you, 4/6
and there,
4/6
and there!”
4/6

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE

NEW EDITION

Edited by SIR HENRY IRVING & FRANK A. MARSHALL

Is the ideal Edition, dealing not only with the famous Dramatist's Works, but also with his Life, Surroundings, and Associations. It is at once a complete Literary and Stage History, and a Critical Analysis of each Play dealt with.

The greatest interpreter of “Shakespeare” in recent times, the late Sir Henry Irving, took an important part in the compilation of this important Work.

The publishers believe, with no undue exaggeration but in the spirit of honest satisfaction, that they have not come short of their own ideal: and that they have produced for all—the scholar, the general reader, and the judicious book buyer—a Work that cannot be swept away in the advancing tide of successive books, but will justly take its place as the Edition which the widest class of readers will desire to possess for reading, use, and reference.

The illustrations are of the highest order, and have been specially drawn for this Work: they comprise 550 designs embodied in the text, together with a large number of full-page etchings. In addition there is a series of fine reproductions in colour from Shakespeare's Works, after pictures by Daniel Maclise, R.A., Sir J. E. Millais, Bart., P.R.A., Ford Madox Brown, Charles R. Leslie, R.A., J. Northcote, R.A., Sir E. J. Poynter, P.R.A., W. Holman Hunt, Sir John Gilbert, R.A., &c.

Where so many have combined, it is confidently maintained that departmental excellence has been reached.

By special arrangements with the Publishers we are able to offer this unique Work at a price well within the reach of all. We are not offering this Work on the Instalment Plan, but by a simple arrangement it has been decided to send each subscriber one volume per month as issued from the Press. The first volume is now ready.

There will be fourteen volumes in all, and the price of each volume is only 4s. 6d., which works out at practically only 1s. per week. All we ask is that a Postal Order for 4s. 6d. should be sent us, together with instructions to send the remaining thirteen volumes as published, one each month, and the volume can be paid for on delivery. All carriage is paid, but no order can be accepted except for the complete set. The Work is printed on a paper of fine surface, especially made to give the best results with the hundreds of pen and ink and half tone illustrations scattered throughout its pages. It is beautifully bound in artistically decorated cloth boards, with an ornamental coloured design in gold by Mr. Talwin Morris. The size of each volume is 9 inches by 7 inches.

On completion of the Work, a Handsome Souvenir in the shape of an impression of the admirable Portrait of Sir Henry Irving as Hamlet, from the painting by Edwin Long, R.A., executed in Photogravure, will be presented to each subscriber.

The size of the engraved surface is 18½ by 13½ inches, with margin suitable for framing. This Portrait has been sold regularly for One Guinea net.

We respectfully intimate to subscribers that all orders will be executed in rotation.

It can truly be said that it is
AN EDITION
FOR ALL
TIME.

TO MANAGER OF
THE ACADEMY
20 Tavistock Street,
London, W.C.,

Please send me, carriage paid, the first volume of the New “Henry Irving Shakespeare,” for which I enclose 4s. 6d., I agree to accept the remaining 13 volumes at (4/6 each net) the rate of one each month.

Name.....
Address.....

The ATHENÆUM says:

“On the care with which the text itself of the plays has been prepared we have nothing but praise to bestow. . . . The general result of this care and labour is . . . so good that we must congratulate all concerned in it. . . . It is profusely illustrated by Mr. Gordon Browne, whose charming designs, executed in facsimile, give it an artistic value superior. In our judgment, to any illustrated edition of Shakespeare with which we are acquainted.”

The SPECTATOR says:

“This handsomely printed edition aims at being popular and practical. Add to these advantages Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations, and enough has been said to recommend an edition which will win public recognition by its unique and serviceable qualities.”

The ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE says:

“Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are amongst the most perfect things of the kind we have ever seen.”

The World We Live In

THERE frequently come times in the life of every commercial man when reference to an Atlas or a Geography is positively imperative. If he does not possess these himself, he borrows them, and then more often than not they are unreliable and out of date. While a good Atlas and a good Geography are of the highest importance to Merchants, Professional Men, and general readers of various kinds, how much more indispensable are they to Teachers and Students!—In fact, no one nowadays can afford to be without either.

A CHANCE FOR EVERY ONE

who wishes to acquire

A GOOD ATLAS and A GOOD GEOGRAPHY.

On payment of 2/6 down,

you can have sent to your home IMMEDIATELY

THE BEST ATLAS and THE BEST GEOGRAPHY that can be had for the money.

THE ATLAS: THE XXTH CENTURY CITIZEN'S ATLAS OF THE WORLD (edited by J. G. Bartholomew, F.R.G.S.) is in many respects more complete than some Atlases at four times the price. Every name is clear and distinct; the plates are beautifully engraved and coloured—the maps have been reduced from the latest surveys, and are up to date and reliable—perfect works of art.

The Press is unanimous in its praise. Some of the highest Geographical Authorities have pronounced it THE BEST STANDARD ATLAS FOR POPULAR USE.

Not a village or hamlet has been omitted from the Map of England. The Atlas as a whole is as complete as it can be made for all the uses of general reference. It contains 156 large crown folio pages of Maps and Plans, with 210 pages of indices and descriptive text—including a valuable descriptive Gazetteer.

The Atlas forms a very handsome volume—is sumptuously produced—and may be had either in Strong Art Canvas Binding or in Half Morocco. (See Terms below.)

THE GEOGRAPHY: A splendid acquisition to any one; a treasury—a store-house of all that is worth knowing about the world, its peoples, places, customs, commerce, etc. In short, an authoritative summary of THE WHOLE OF GEOGRAPHY. Edited by Hugh Robert Mill, D.Sc. Neither technical nor elementary, it is engagingly written and comprehensive in the subjects it embraces.

Contributed to by

SEVENTY DIFFERENT AUTHORS of Various Nationalities, each specialising in the territory with which he is most familiar.

1088 PAGES. 489 ILLUSTRATIONS.

Beautifully printed in good clear type. Handsomely bound in heavy covers

THE TERMS

These two beautiful books—this store of knowledge—will be sent (POST FREE) to your own home AT ONCE on receipt of 2s. 6d. down. The balance of £1 15s. is payable in 14 monthly payments of HALF A CROWN.

The Geography is issued in Cloth only, but the Atlas is published in Two bindings—Art Canvas, and Half-Morocco. For the better binding (Half-Morocco) an extra charge of 4s. is made, payable with the first or second instalment.

IF YOU WANT THE ATLAS ONLY

or the Geography only, the publishers have arranged to supply either separately on the instalment principle particulars of which will be sent on receipt of a post-card.

Fill in the accompanying Order Form now, and secure these two valuable works. This offer is not to be had every day.

ORDER FORM.

To Messrs. GEO. NEWNES, Ltd.,
3—12 Southampton Street, Strand, London.

Please send me "The XXth Century Citizen's Atlas of the World" and "The International Geography," for which I enclose the first instalment of 2/6. I undertake to pay the balance in fourteen equal instalments of Two Shillings and Sixpence, on the first of each month, and not to dispose of the volumes until all the instalments have been paid.

Name.....

Cheques and Postal Orders payable to Geo. Newnes, Ltd.

Address.....

Date.....

ROYAL EXCHANGE Incorporated] ASSURANCE [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY have the pleasure to announce that they have now made arrangements under which they are enabled to publish Autotypes of a number of the more important of the Works of the late Mr. G. F. WATTS, R.A.

The Reproductions are made in Permanent Carbon, and include the following:

"Hope."	"For He Had Great Possessions."
"Love and Life."	"Dawn."
"Love and Death."	"Fata Morgana."
"Good Luck to Your Fishing."	"Time, Death and Judgment."
"Orpheus and Eurydice."	"Thetis."
"Paolo and Francesca."	"Britomart and Her Nurse."

etc. etc. etc.

Published in two sizes—

About 18 ins. by 14 ins., 12s.; and 10 ins. by 6 ins., 5s. each.

Or, framed complete—

From 21s. for the large size, and
10s. 6d. for the small size.

The first three on the list are also published in a larger size, about 27 ins. in height. Price £1 10s.; or framed complete, £2 15s.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
FINE ART GALLERY, 74 NEW OXFORD STREET,
LONDON, W.C.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD, SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO
Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 450 Full-Page Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 13/- each.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.,
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1772

APRIL 21, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

COLLEGE OF PRECEPTORS.

(Bloomsbury Square, W.C.)
The Council of the College of Preceptors will shortly proceed to the appointment of additional EXAMINERS in ENGLISH LANGUAGE, ENGLISH HISTORY, SCRIPTURE HISTORY, GEOGRAPHY, FRENCH, and GERMAN. Candidates must be Graduates, and should have had experience in teaching. Applications (twenty copies), stating age, degree, experience in teaching and examining, etc., should be addressed to the DEAN of the College not later than May 31. If testimonials are sent, they should be not more than three in number, and twenty copies of each should be forwarded.

C. R. HODGSON, B.A., Secretary.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June. Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.
See Staff (honourmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION. FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

SECOND CLASS ASSISTANT ACCOUNTANTS in the Army Accounts Department, and Examiners in the Exchequer and Audit Department (18-20) May 24.

The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, London, W.

MSS. MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, invite writers to send them MSS. of ORIGINAL STORIES: (1) for BOYS of 10-14, addressed Mr. JOHN LANG, BOYS' EDITOR; (2) for GIRLS of 10-14, addressed Mrs. JOHN LANG, GIRLS' EDITOR; (3) for CHILDREN of 6-10, addressed Mrs. LOUEY CHISHOLM, CHILDREN'S EDITOR; extent, 40,000 to 50,000 words. All MSS. (which should be sent in any time before September 30—typewritten preferred) will be acknowledged, and returned if not suitable.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Books for Sale, etc.

JUST PUBLISHED—B. H. BLACKWELL'S MONTHLY LIST OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS for APRIL, containing a considerable number of items dealing with Music, Instrumental and Vocal; Musical Biography and History, Psalmody, etc. Poetry and Verse and Miscellanies. Also Monthly List of New Books (English and Foreign) published during March.
50 and 51 BROAD STREET, OXFORD.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

GLAISHER'S
Remainder Book Catalogue.
APRIL SUPPLEMENT NOW READY.
Comprising all most recent Purchases.

WILLIAM GLAISHER,
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
263 High Holborn, London.
Also Catalogue of Popular Current Literature, and New List of French Novels, Classics, etc.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net for 35s., 1902-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

SHAKESPEARE'S WORKS.—The "Cambridge" Edition, edited by W. Aldis Wright, in 40 vols., imperial 8vo, cloth; hand-made paper copy, only 500 printed, good condition; Macmillan, 1893-95, £9.—Walker, 37 Bridgegate, Leeds.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LTD.

Every month MUDIE'S publish a fresh list (classified and annotated) of their English and Foreign Surplus Books and New Remainders. The list contains popular works on Travel, Sport, Army and Navy, Biography, Theology, Arts, Philosophy, Economics, and Fiction.

List sent post free on application.

30-34 NEW OXFORD ST. : 48 QUEEN VICTORIA ST.
241 BROMPTON ROAD, LONDON.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING WANTED.—MSS. and all Literary work executed accurately and promptly. 10d. per 1000 words. Carbon copies.—Mrs. BRAMBLES, 26 Clarence Road, Windsor.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—8d. 1000 words (Remington). Novels, Plays, Duplicating Circulars, etc.—Miss WILLARD, Beaufort House, Osborne Road, Southville, Bristol.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS having MSS. typed at Miss LONGLEY'S, 467 Mansion House Chambers, 20 Bucklersbury, E.C., at 10d. per 1000 words, receive carbon copy free. Established 10 years.

PITMAN'S SHORTHAND. Assured proficiency under Britain's highest honourman. Failure impossible. Theory and Reporting. Send stamp for Illustrated Booklet S. 13.—ALSTON'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

SEARCHES AT BRITISH MUSEUM and other Libraries in English, French, Flemish, Dutch, German, and Latin. Seventeen years' experience.—J. A. RANDOLPH, 128 Alexandra Road, Wimbledon, S.W.

Art

R.W.S. — ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East (near the National Gallery). 138TH EXHIBITION NOW OPEN.
F. W. HAYWARD BUTT, Secretary.

CHATTO AND WINDUS, PUBLISHERS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE WOMAN IN THE ALCOVE

By ANNA KATHARINE GREEN, Author of "The Leavenworth Case."

[April 26]

LOVE AND LORDSHIP

By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The Heart of a Girl."

"Our readers need no reminding of the excellences of Miss Warden's latest (one is tempted, candidly, to say best) book, 'Love and Lordship.' This admirably-contrived story of a jewel robbery, love, and mystery reads even better as a complete, compact novel than as a serial. It has no delays, no inadequacies or lame subterfuges. Miss Warden is a surprising author. She writes many books, but maintains in all a constant level of accomplishment, and sometimes even rises above her own high standard as in this novel, 'The House on the Marsh,' and one or two others. Her regular readers ought to be handsomely augmented in number by the publication of 'Love and Lordship.'"—MORNING LEADER.

A MENDER OF NETS

By WILLIAM MACKAY, Author of "The Popular Idol."

"An event in the world of fiction . . . simple, tender, austere, intensely human, with absorbing interest. . . A novel as uncommon in design and in execution as it is welcome and sure of appreciation."—WORLD.

"A trenchant sketch. It has a touch of just that sort of satire to be found in Ibsen's 'Saviour of Society.'"—OUTLOOK.

IN THE ROARING FIFTIES

By EDWARD DYSON, Author of "The Gold-Stealers."

"A vivid and entertaining picture."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"A capital story."—STANDARD.

"Since the appearance of 'Robbery under Arms,' there has not been written so craftsmanlike an Australian book."—BRITISH AUSTRALASIAN.

MARA: An Unconventional Woman

By CHRIS HEALY, Author of "Heirs of Reuben."

"It is not too much to say that if there are half a dozen authors living who could have written 'Mara,' we should remain satisfied with meeting only one of them."—SPEAKER.

"A sympathetic figure."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"A vigorous novel."—TRIBUNE.

"A capital story, admirably told."—EAST ANGLIAN TIMES.

RED RECORDS. By ALICE PERRIN, Author of "East of Suez," etc. [Early in May.]

THE LOST EARL OF ELLAN. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED. [May.]

THE FERRY OF FATE: a Tale of Russian Jewry. By SAMUEL GORDON, Author of "Sons of the Covenant." [May.]

HARLEY GREENOAK'S CHARGE. By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of "The Gun-Runner," etc. [May.]

FOR LIFE—AND AFTER. By GEORGE R. SIMS ("Dionet"). SECOND IMPRESSION.

THE FREEMASONS. By L. S. GIBSON. SECOND IMPRESSION.

CASTE AND CREED. By F. E. PENNY, Author of "The Sanyasi." SECOND IMPRESSION.

DILYS. By F. E. PENNY. SECOND IMPRESSION.

HUGO: A Fantasia on Modern Times. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "The Grand Babylon Hotel."

THE WATERS OF DESTRUCTION. By ALICE PERRIN, Author of "The Stronger Claim," etc. SECOND IMPRESSION.

THE SPECULATIONS OF JOHN STEELE. By ROBERT BARR, Author of "A Prince of Good Fellows," etc.

NATURE'S VAGABOND. By COSMO HAMILTON, Author of "Duke's Son," etc.

THE POCKET CHARLES DICKENS. Being a Choice of Favourite Passages from his Works, made by ALFRED H. HYATT. In 16mo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt top, 3s. net. [Immediately.]

MR. SWINBURNE'S TRAGEDIES. COLLECTED LIBRARY EDITION, in 5 crown 8vo vols., bound in buckram, 30s. net for the 5 vols.

MR. SWINBURNE'S POETICAL WORKS. COLLECTED LIBRARY EDITION, in 6 crown 8vo vols., bound in buckram, 36s. net for the 6 vols.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH SEAS. By CLEMENT L. WRAGGE, F.R.G.S. With 84 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

LITERARY RAMBLES IN THE WEST OF ENGLAND. By ARTHUR L. SALMON. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

LIFE IN MOROCCO. By BUDGETT MEAKIN, Author of "The Land of the Moors." With 24 Full-page Illustrations. Demv 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

CHEAP EDITIONS.—Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

EAST OF SUEZ. By ALICE PERRIN, Author of "The Waters of Destruction."

BEN-HUR: a Tale of the Christ. By LEW WALLACE.

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By HAROLD BINDLOSS.

LOVE—OR A NAME. By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

THE CRUISE OF THE 'BLACK PRINCE' PRIVATEER. By Commander CAMERON. With 2 Illustrations by P. MACNAR.

A CRIMSON CRIME. By G. MANVILLE FENN.

COLONEL THORNDYKE'S SECRET. By G. A. HENTY. With a Frontispiece by S. L. WOOD.

NO OTHER WAY. By SIR WALTER BESANT. With 12 Illustrations by C. D. WARD.

FOUR NEW VOLUMES OF THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

In POCKET SIZE, pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net per vol.; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net per vol.

TAINÉ'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Translated by H. VAN LAUN. POCKET EDITION in 4 vols., with 32 Portraits.

THE LAWS AND PRACTICE OF CHESS. With an Analysis of the Openings. By HOWARD STAUNTON. Edited by R. B. WORMALD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s.

THE MINOR TACTICS OF CHESS: a Treatise on the Deployment of the Forces in obedience to Strategic Principle. By F. K. YOUNG and E. C. HOWELL. Fcap 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE HASTINGS CHESS TOURNAMENT. The Authorised Account of the 230 Games played Aug.-Sept. 1895. With Annotations by PILLSBURY, LASKER, TARRASCH, STEINITZ, SCHIFFERS, TEICHMANN, BARDELEBEN, BLACKBURNE, GUNSBURG, TINSLEY, MASON, and ALBIN; Biographical Sketches, and 22 Portraits. Edited by H. F. CHESHIRE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

NEW SIXPENNY COPYRIGHT NOVELS.

THE GRAND BABYLON HOTEL. By ARNOLD BENNETT.

MADAME SANS-GENE. By E. LEPELLETIER.

ARIADNE. By OUIDA.

BEYOND THE PALE. By B. M. CROKER.

EVE. By S. BARING-GOULD.

THE DOUBLE MARRIAGE. By CHARLES READE.

FETTERED FOR LIFE. By FRANK BARRETT.

THE MONKS OF THELEMA. By BESANT and RICE.

MR. VERDANT GREEN. By CUTHBERT BEDE, B.A. With 65 Illustrations. A NEW EDITION.

Post 8vo, 1s. net.

•• This Edition includes the Three Parts in One Volume.—I. Verdant Green as an Oxford Freshman. II. As an Undergraduate. III. Married and Done For.

LONDON; CHATTO AND WINDUS, 111 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	371	Fiction . . . . .	381
Literature :		The Drama :
The Art of Émile Zola . . . . .	373	Mr. Arthur Symonds's Morality . . . . .	383
Mater Dolorosa . . . . .	374	Fine Art :
A Question of Text . . . . .	376	Staats Forbes and others . . . . .	384
Pastorals . . . . .	377	Recent Acquisitions in the
La Reine Malheureuse . . . . .	377	South Kensington Museum . . . . .	384
The Call o' the Desert . . . . .	373	Music :
Burbankitis . . . . .	379	The Oxford History of Music
The Lament of the Friendless		—VI . . . . .	385
Old Men . . . . .	380	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	386
A Literary Causerie :		Correspondence . . . . .	387
Primitive Plagiarism . . . . .	380	Books Received . . . . .	387
The Bookshelf . . . . .	389

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

IN Dr. Richard Garnett literature has lost a man who has hitherto not been valued as he should be. We say literature, not learning. His services to learning—and especially to other people's learning—were notorious. From the days when, on his first joining the staff of the Museum, he used to master the contents of books in the time which other men took to master their title-pages, to the days when, a profitable "ghost," he revisited the haunts he had laboured in, he was an invaluable servant or master of the Library, a man of prodigious knowledge, accurate memory, and unflinching courtesy. Perhaps he made things too easy. His great work, the printed catalogue, was supplemented by that greater work, his own mind. One got into the habit of saving oneself trouble. "Ask Dr. Garnett" was an easy way out of all difficulties; however trifling the difficulty or foolish the inquirer, Dr. Garnett always treated both as if they were worthy of his attention. It became a habit. People used to ask him questions long after he had ceased to sit in the ring. He would look up from investigations of his own to reply with bland indulgence and a smile on his Socratic countenance.

It has been truly said of him that he regarded his own learning as held by him in trust for the public. He never refused, on principle, to give the public the advantage of it, whether the public were represented by a troublesome inquirer at the Museum or the readers of English Classics who wanted an introduction to the text. Work which men of a different temper might have considered "beneath" them appeared to him to be an opportunity of fulfilling his trust; and time which he might have spent adding to his fame as an original writer was often given to humbler but, in his view, perhaps, therefore higher tasks. It fell to us once to take—outside the Museum—his style and address. "LL.D., I think?" he was asked. "Yes," he smiled. Then the smile widened. "And C.B.," he added. "Let us put on all our frills." The idea of Dr. Garnett, the most modest of men, putting on frills will appeal to all who knew him. But perhaps if he had put on more frills as an author, if his original work had not been placed second to what he considered his duty to the public service, the author of "The Twilight of the Gods" would be rated to-day more nearly as he will be twenty years hence. That unique book is known and valued by a few as one of the choicest things on their shelves and in their minds. Learning there is in it, of course; but there are other things as well; fresh, whimsical, tender imagination; poetry, that somehow expressed itself better in that form than in his professed poems; and a certain boyishness of heart that lasted till the end, and kept the long life sweet and vigorous to the last.

Many of our readers may know the sonnet that follows. It has been chosen out of the collected edition of Dr. Garnett's poems (Mathews and Lane) for inclusion in more than one anthology, but its appropriateness and its beauty are excuse enough for giving it here:

I will not rail, or grieve when torpid eld'
Frosts the slow-journeying blood, for I shall see
The lovelier leaves hang yellow on the tree,
The nimbler brooks in icy fetters held.
Methinks the aged eye that first beheld
The fitful ravage of December wild,
Then knew himself indeed dear Nature's child,
Seeing the common doom, that all compelled,
No kindred we to her beloved broods,
If, dying these, we drew a selfish breath;
But one path travel all her multitudes,
And none dispute the solemn Voice that saith:
"Sun to thy setting; to your autumn, woods;
Stream to thy sea; and man unto thy death!"

That Dr. Garnett was no Dryasdust may be gathered from the fact that it was he who only a month or two since introduced to the world the poems of Miss Rosalind Travers, with a particularly sympathetic and wise preface to her volume, "The Two Arcadias." And while we write we find that the first article in the first number of a new review, The Twentieth Century Quarterly, is headed "A New Poet," and is an examination by Professor Dowden of the work of the same Miss Rosalind Travers. Seldom does a young poet find two such names to back her first volume; but seldom does a young poet so deserve the honour. It is not only that Miss Travers can turn a lyric which has the true fire in it, the "little more" which is not much but all. She has what too few young poets have nowadays—something to say. Her Arcadia is no mere "pastorality": it stands for the dignity of good manners and simple lives, which the motor-cars and excursion trains and building estates and city ways of our own day are rapidly destroying.

She idealises, of course. No country village is Arcadia: in proportion to the population there is as much brutality, vulgarity and offence in the village as in the town. But we are not to read her literally. Arcadia, to Miss Travers, is really a state of mind or of being; the calm, self-contained, proper pride of the old days, before the scurry and competition and greed of to-day came to ruin our nerves, our tempers and our manners. The general note of this remarkable book is an appeal for Sparta against Athens, for simplicity and restraint against laxity and excitement—an appeal that is made sometimes by graphic description, sometimes by biting satire, sometimes by pure and lofty eloquence. The circle of Miss Travers's admirers is widening and her book deserves all the praise it receives.

In the same review, The Twentieth Century Quarterly (the publishers are Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall), we find an article in defence of Froude by Mr. A. W. Evans, inspired by Mr. Herbert Paul's "Life of Froude," a book which did much to restore its subject to the position he ought to hold. But Mr. Evans's advocacy seems to us to go a little further than wisdom would have counselled. "No man ever valued truth more highly" is an extravagant phrase to apply to a man of Froude's temper and methods. He honestly believed that his side of the case was the just one, but he was the advocate, not the philosopher. The one is quick to seize the points that tell for his side: the other keeps a constant and eager outlook for anything that may tell against his view, and when he discovers it considers it as if his dearest wish were to find his view wrong. Mr. Evans, in fact, is defending Froude on the wrong lines. One of the clearest proofs of his marvellous ability is the fact that he was, on the whole, accurate in spite of, not because of, his methods and ideals.

For the rest, the new Review devotes a good deal of its space to theology in theory and practice, and has articles also on political and military questions of the day, and a good sheaf of reviews—mainly theological—at the end. All the articles are signed, and the publication is finely printed and pleasant to hold.

The minor poet most frequently finds it difficult to discover a fresh name for his booklet, but the difficulty has been brilliantly overcome by one of the latest of the bards, Mr. Arthur Lewis to wit. He calls his tiny volume "Thirty Rhymes," and thus ought to solve the difficulty for many others. The next poet might call his thirty-one, and so on to, say, a million; while we suppose that when that point is reached the series could be begun over again by using a letter of the alphabet as they do in numbering motor-cars. "Verses A 40" would be a splendid title.

Mr. Lewis also indulges in the luxury of a colophon, as thus: "Here ends this book of rhymes, which, be they what they may, are to be sold only by Elkin Mathews in Vigo St. London W." He sends us by the same post a long poem called "A Pompeian Episode," to which also he has affixed a colophon. It reads: "Put into print in the winter of this year one thousand nine hundred and six and is to be sold by Elkin Mathews in Vigo Street London West." This gives a pleasant air of antiquity to his productions, which are further distinguished by a neglect of the convention that each line of verse should begin with a capital letter. Concerning the merits of the poem, no doubt our verse-taster will have something to say anon.

It is with regret that our readers will hear of the death of a gifted woman of letters in the person of Mrs. Nora Chesson. She died last Saturday of heart failure, following the birth of her baby about a fortnight previously. For about fifteen years Mrs. Chesson has been before the public, to whom she was probably better known under her maiden name of Nora Hopper. In later days her poetry had lost some of its freshness, but on its first appearance it attracted the attention of those who love good verse by its fine melody and the obvious sympathy and interest of the writer. She did not confine her attentions to verse, but was also a good prose writer, doing a considerable amount of reviewing and other journalistic work. About a year ago she published her first novel, "The Bell and the Arrow." It met with a very friendly reception, and, as at the time of her death she was only a little over thirty, there was good reason for hoping that it was only the beginning of a series. Mrs. Chesson, who was of Irish-Welsh parentage, wrote with such feeling for, and apparently intimate acquaintance with, Ireland, that it will come as a surprise to many to learn that she visited that country for the first time only recently. The visit gave her great pleasure, and she returned even more filled with enthusiasm for Ireland than before. She was a very brave and resolute woman, who carried on her writing under circumstances that might well have daunted a less courageous heart. She will be sincerely mourned by a large circle of literary friends and acquaintances.

We are not surprised that the Times reporter who took down Canon Hensley Henson's Easter Sunday sermon wrote "soulless" when the preacher said something else. What else? Soulish! Was there ever a more hideous word? To see it in print is to want to rhyme it either with "ghoulish" or "foolish." Canon Henson is unable to translate σῶμα ψυχικόν without it: the very test of a translator is his ability to express the meaning of his original in the accepted words of his own tongue. Science, we know, has long been unable to express itself in the English language; is the craze for "scientific" theology to result in a corresponding barbarism? Preachers should remember that, since many people go to hear them who never read books, they are, with the liturgy and the Bible, among the most important guardians of good English.

A correspondent writes, complaining that a recently published volume of short stories is issued in such a manner as to suggest that it is a novel. The title-page says nothing about "and other stories;" the list of stories is numbered with Roman numerals as if the titles were chapter-headings: and the title of the first story, which is also that of the book, appears as head-line on the left hand page throughout. This is not the first instance that has come under our notice of a practice against which the buyer of books has, we think, a right to complain. But the point is a nice one. It may happen that the title of the first story represents, in a manner, or gives the key-note of all the stories in the volume; in which case the publisher has just—but only just—the right to give that title on the title-page alone, and continue it through the book as a head-line. The use of Roman numerals opposite the titles of the stories in the list is, also, defensible by a publisher who cared to defend it. A publisher of the first rank, however, would probably be very careful to avoid all appearance of misleading the public by making it very clear in every possible manner that the work was not a continuous narrative. Those who consult the "Books Received" in the ACADEMY will usually find that a volume of short stories is so designated in the notes to that list.

The sale has just been effected in Venice of the Palazzo Rezzonico, the palace where Robert Browning died in 1889, and which for so many years has been connected with his memory and considered almost as a hallowed spot by many whose cult for the great poet extends to all that was in any way linked with his name. The palace never belonged to the poet; it was bought by his son and daughter-in-law, and it was while on a visit to them that Robert Browning contracted his last illness and died under their roof, tended to the last by loving hands, and with the echoes of the success of "Asolando" winging their way from England. The palace contained many relics of Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning, but these have now been all removed, and the vast building, shorn of these precious memories, has passed into the hands of Count Lionel de Hirschel di Minerbi, of a rich Jewish family of Trieste. The price paid for it is said to be 700,000 francs—about £28,000.

The Rezzonico palace, built from the designs of Longhena in the seventeenth century, contains a fine ceiling by Tiepolo and two splendid statues by Alessandro Vittoria, besides boasting of one of the finest and largest bedrooms in all Venice. It also possesses a lovely mezzanin or entresol, in which the rooms known as the Pope's rooms (from Eugenius IV., who was a member of the Rezzonico family) are beautifully decorated with stucco-work. In these rooms some two years ago Mrs. Humphry Ward wrote the chapters in "The Marriage of William Ashe" of which the scenes are laid in Venice.

Among the pious pilgrims who assembled in their thousands at Stratford-on-Avon on Monday, one party of motorists so distinguished themselves that it is to be regretted their identity cannot be disclosed. It was an imposing car, and the proprietor was clearly proud of it and of himself and in no mood to brook any delay in getting through the ceremony of inspecting the register of Shakespeare's birth and death, which had to be "done" while the car panted. All other pilgrims were, therefore, remorselessly elbowed aside, while the party ranged themselves round the glass case containing the records. Triumphantly pointing out the entries with their distinguishing marks, the proprietor of the car explained:

"You see he couldn't write, so made his mark." "But, papa," interposed his daughter, "you couldn't expect him to write when he was only two days old or after he was dead." "Nonsense," replied Paterfamilias testily, "my remark was perfectly reasonable. It is well known that in those days few people could either read or write."

Mr. George Eyre-Todd, in the second edition of his interesting volume, "The Glasgow Poets," first published three years ago, includes short biographies and specimens of the poetical work of William Freeland, author of "A Birth Song, and other Poems," and Robert Ford, a verse-writer and collector of oral and written songs in several of the Scottish counties, who died last year. There are no fewer than sixty-six Glasgow makars included in Mr. Eyre-Todd's anthology, among the number being Smollett, Thomas Campbell, Motherwell, Pollok, Alexander Smith, David Gray, and Robert Buchanan—names that give a distinction to Glasgow as a literary centre which we do not usually accord the Second City.

A Festival entirely devoted to the works of Beethoven and Berlioz is to be held at the Theatres de l'Opera et du Chatelet, Paris, beginning April 20, and ending May 1, organised by M. Gabriel Astruc. Six concerts in all are announced, four of which are devoted to the works of the Bonn master. Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" is to be performed with Mlle. Breval, M. Van Dyck Delmas and Nivette in the caste. The Concerts will take place on the afternoons of April 20, 23, 25, 27, and 29, and one evening Concert on May 1, when Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be given. Mr. Felix Weingartner will be Conductor, and the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Oratorium Vereeniging of Amsterdam Chorus will be under his direction.

The following are among forthcoming events:

During the first week in May, which is the second week of his Shakespearean Festival, Mr. F. R. Benson will perform at Stratford-on-Avon the three parts of King Henry VI. It is more than a century since the first part was played in England, and neither of the first two parts has been played before by this company. Particulars may be had of the Memorial Theatre, Stratford-on-Avon.

Two works new to Covent Garden will be produced during the coming Royal Opera season. They are Cornelius's Barber of Bagdad and Poldini's The Princess and the Vagabond. Dr. Richter will conduct. The season opens on May 3 with Tristan und Isolde.

Messrs. D. Heinemann of Munich will hold an Exhibition of German Art during the season in the Grafton Galleries from May 2 till July 10. All the artists belonging to the different Munich Schools are contributing.

The London Shakespeare League.—Commemoration Programme, 1906. April 23, Monday. Meeting of the Council and members of the League at the Hall, Clifford's Inn, Fleet Street, at 8.30 P.M. Shakespearean Songs. April 24, Tuesday. Performance of Love's Labour's Lost by the English Drama Society, at the Bloomsbury Hall, New Oxford Street, W.C., at 8 P.M. April 25, Wednesday. Performance of Love's Labour's Lost by the English Drama Society, at the Bloomsbury Hall at 3 P.M. and 8 P.M. April 27, Friday. Recital of Richard II. by Mr. J. H. Leigh, at the Steinway Hall, Lower Seymour Street, W., at 8.30 P.M. May 4, Friday. Address by Mrs. Craigie. May 5, Saturday. Educational Conference: "Shakespeare and the Schools" at University College, Gower Street, W.C., at 4.30 P.M. Followed by a dinner at the University. Particulars on application to Mrs. G. Laurence Gomme, 24 Dorset Square, N.W. May 9, Wednesday. Reception at the Mansion House by the Rt. Hon. the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, 8.30 to 10.30. Mr. T. Fairman Ordish, has kindly consented to conduct a ramble to places of Shakespearean interest in London. Members who wish to join the ramble are requested to communicate with Mr. Ordish, 2 Melrose Villas, Ballard's Lane, Finchley. An Exhibition of Shakespeareana will be on view at the British Museum during Shakespeare week and until further notice.

Handicrafts Exhibition under the Patronage of H.H. Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein, organised and directed by Mrs. Charles Muller. Grafton Galleries, April 19 to 27 inclusive. Daily and hourly demonstrations will be given in jewelry-making, Glass-blowing, Lace-making, Basket-making, Bookbinding, Wood-carving, Metal Repoussée, Water-gilding, Spinning and Weaving, Rug-making, Enamels, Embroideries, Tapestries, Mosaics, Marqueterie, Leather Work and many other handicrafts.

Royal Institution of Great Britain, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.—The Friday Evening Discourse next week (April 27 at 9 o'clock), will be delivered by Professor John W. Gregory, D.Sc. F.R.S. The subject is "Ore Deposits and their Distribution in Depth." Afternoon

Lectures next week. On Tuesday April 24, at 5 o'clock. Professor G. Baldwin Brown, M.A., on "Greek Classical Dress in Life and in Art." (Lecture I.) On Thursday April 26, at 5 o'clock. P. Chalmers Mitchell, Esq., M.A. D.Sc., on "The Digestive Tract in Birds and Mammals." (Lecture I.) On Saturday April 28, at 3 o'clock. Professor Charles Waldstein, Litt.D., Ph.D., on "English Furniture in the Eighteenth Century." (Lecture I.) On Friday May 4. The Hon. C. A. Parsons on "The Steam Turbine on Land and at Sea." On Friday May 11. Professor J. P. Poynting on "Some Astronomical Consequences of the Pressure of Light."

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Sale of the third and concluding portion of the collection of engravings and drawings of the late Edward Truman, Esq., April 23–28 inclusive. The collection includes topographical views, many relating to London, early engraved portraits, mostly English historical prints, mezzotint portraits, drawings and water-colours by old masters and the English schools, and a large number of the works of George Shepherd, including a series of his original sketch-books.

LITERATURE

THE ART OF ÉMILE ZOLA

Comment Émile Zola Composait Ses Romans. Par HENRI MASSIS. (Bibliothèque-Charpentier, 3 fr. 50 c.)

It can hardly be said that M. Henri Massis has added much to our knowledge in this book, and yet few people who are engaged in the work of literature will fail to read it with close attention. As Zola recedes into the distance it becomes easier to find his place in the gallery of writers. It is claimed for him that he invented his own formula and made his own convention, and it is of the greatest interest to examine the grounds on which this claim is put forward. It is praise that cannot be afforded to very many authors. The one writer to whom it is indisputably due is Cervantes. "Don Quixote" set up a model that was kept, with variations, by some of the greatest writers of imaginative literature. In France his idea was adopted by Le Sage and in England the most illustrious exponent of his method was Henry Fielding, whom Scott appropriately designated as the father of the English novel. Now, it seems to us that the relation between Fielding and Cervantes was very similar to that between Zola and Balzac. Fielding made no pretence of imitating the subject dealt with by his model. "Joseph Andrews" and "Tom Jones" are English, and of the time in which their author lived. Their pages form, in fact, a mirror of country life in the eighteenth century as it was seen through the cynical, good-humoured eyes of Henry Fielding. There is not an English Don Quixote in either of these stories, and if Partridge be a variation of Sancho Panza he still was a creation and not a copy. In principle, all these remarks can be applied to all the English novelists who accepted Fielding as the highest master of their craft. Scott dealt with him as he had done with Cervantes. He too rested chiefly on his portraiture of human nature, and for the most part wrote of it as it had come under his own eyes in his native Scotland. In making choice of the period of "Waverley" he simply went far enough back to obtain a flavour of romance and not so far but that he could adapt the manners of his own time to the necessities of his dramatis personæ. In the same way Thackeray worked, although, like the great artist he was, he remained true to his own personality and tried to give us his own vision of things. This, too, was the attitude of Zola to Honoré de Balzac. The scheme of the Rougon-Macquart Family was that of the Comédie Humaine. We have the author's own words on it:

"Avant moi, il n'y a que Balzac; le premier il assigna au roman la mission de peindre la société contemporaine sans souci de moralité, ni de beauté; il fut l'initiateur, l'homme de science qui a tracé la voie à tout le XX<sup>e</sup> siècle. Comme Balzac, je peindrai des hommes de classes différentes; je ferai les bourgeois, les financiers, les ouvriers, les prêtres, les artistes, les filles, etc. Il a montré la Comédie Humaine, je suivrai son exemple." L'idée de Balzac [adds M. Massis] ne le quitte point; c'est toujours à lui qu'il revient.

But Zola was no imitator. He recognised what was the spirit of his century, a century likely to stand pre-eminent in all time as the period of scientific research and discovery.

Zola's naturalism, his materialism, his application of the doctrine of heredity, his laborious study and still more laborious note-taking were results of the scientific spirit of his age. We may not altogether like the result, but that is not because Zola chose his part unwisely but because he developed the least attractive trait of the French character and missed its fine grace and elegance and gaiety. To read one of his novels is like entering into some filthy and disordered congregation of ill-doing men and women. One reads with a sense of rebellion, because of an inborn consciousness that life is never so squalid and degrading as he pictures it, that out of it rise high resolves and hopes, and joyousness that comes from life itself and cannot be entirely quelled and driven back by circumstances. Then, again, as has been said, he accentuates certain of the less alluring features of the French character, and of course this puts him a little out of sympathy with the average Englishman. On this side of the Channel there is a greater sense of decency than on the other, and by decency we do not at this moment mean simply the concealment of sexual relations. For an example of this difference in national character we would rather appeal to death than to passion. The prevailing desire of Englishmen at the moment of death is for quiet and privacy. Our country graves are placed away in a secluded churchyard, and as often as not concealed from public view by the yew trees that have been cherished there for centuries; but any passenger by a French railway cannot fail to be struck by the tendency of that nation to place their cemeteries on hill-sides close to the line, so that every one who passes may behold their monuments of woe. The manufacture of crosses and other emblems of grief is one of the finest of the French fine arts. So anxious are the people to display their grief for the death of a relative that they use the most sombre and black-bordered envelopes to announce the decease, and so many of the family don mourning that a casual observer might be forgiven for imagining that a large proportion of the French women at any given time were widows. The ostentatious meetings and partings, salutes, kissings and so forth are all parts of the same character, and would be described as indecent, at any rate by the older-fashioned generation of our countrymen. Unfortunately, the aspect of life which the imagination of Zola seized upon was not this, but the passion of love; and he has described its manifestations with a repellent minuteness such as is equalled in no other literature. And these notebooks show that in all this he imagined himself to be closely following a scientific system. Amongst the most curious pages of the volume are the brief notes on heredity, in which he reduces the speculation of physicists to hard statement. Thus, he thinks that a child born in Normandy of a Norman woman is Norman whatever the father might be. This possibly might often be the case. Again he will have it that accidental modifications are hereditary, and that mutilated infants come from mutilated parents. Those who, until a few years ago, were accustomed to dock the tails of terriers would at once furnish him with an argument against this. The truth is that in all this Zola's science was unsound. It is true, no doubt, that every quality possessed by a human being is derived from ancestors, but then marriage brings in so many different families, so many different lines of ancestors, that no one can tell even approximately what the product will be. Nor was Zola working here on very original lines. Novelists from mere instinct have always had a tendency to make their characters the children of such parents as were likely to produce them. Even Smollett, who was the last man to claim to be a scientific novelist, took care that, when he wanted a Count Fathom, the mother of his hero should be one of those earthly deities who hovered over the field of battle despatching the slain and relieving them of their goods, while the father is veiled in an appropriate obscurity. Scott's heroes usually show just enough diversion from the ancestral type to cause uneasiness to the family. It would serve little purpose to insist on all this, were it not for the fact that this doctrine of heredity in reality hampers the action in the novels of Zola. As M. Massis very well says :

Après tout, Zola ne fait que substituer à la Némésis antique, à la Grâce de la littérature janséniste, la fatalité héréditaire. Vous me répondrez que c'est plus scientifique.—Assurément, mais il importe assez peu. Phèdre n'a pas la grâce, et est torturée par les feux d'une passion incestueuse. Étienne a une hérédité d'alcoolique, et est un "monomane de l'assassinat." Ne vous semble-t-il pas que c'est à peu près la même chose ? Le mot seul est changé.

Inevitably we are forced into a comparison between the French naturalistic movement, of which Zola was the head, with its crowd of imitators who cram the French bookstalls with novels full of the filth but empty of the genius of Zola, and the movement that was contemporaneous in England with his lifetime. George Eliot had made a move towards science, but with such results that she secured few imitators. On the other hand, we had a school of romantic fiction that seems now to have been a very frail flower indeed. Led by Stevenson, a host of writers came into existence only too ready and eager to adopt what they thought was the popular formula of the hour, a young man with a taste for duelling, a more or less beautiful young woman, two or three other characters in the background, the whole picture bearing a much closer resemblance to a scene in opera bouffe than to actual life. Indeed, there was very little attempt made to render human nature in hard, clear, and yet vivacious lines. The skill of the writer was exerted solely in the invention of adventures. The characters who went through the adventures were the merest puppets. A few years pass, and these books in their tons of paper lie as dead as Egyptian mummies in their cerements. The only virtue on which we can plume ourselves is that all this stuff, if futile, was innocuous. No young person can get the slightest harm from wading in it up to the elbows, nor, we may add, the slightest good. But undoubtedly Zola had a truer and stronger conception of the greatness of imaginative art. He was an admirer of Flaubert, and there was no real reason why he should not have improved his own work by giving it some of the attention to verbal felicity on the attainment of which Flaubert wasted his life. Nor was there any need that he should have devoted so much of his work to the portrayal of passion and its effects. But that, as Frederick the Great said, is "a much overrated form of amusement," and though it may engross the energies and almost the life of one sex, it does not count for so much in that of the other. From the time of prehistoric man the male has in one form or another been taught to hunt for food, until age after age passing away has engendered out of labour a religion.

What strikes one most in this instructive book is that Zola trusted far too much to documents and toil. After all, the first essential of the work of fiction is that the characters should be living, breathing, acting, feeling men and women. Zola's nature is most adequately, though not very eloquently, described by the word "stodgy." We are told that his ideas on most things were obscure and dull. Only by incessant labour did he bring clearness into them. It is a strange fault to find in a countryman of Molière, Dumas and many another laughing philosopher, but so it was. A little brightness, a little humour, a little more tact in writing, and he could have said what he meant without arousing the feeling of disgust and have left behind him something not unlikely to prove immortal.

MATER DOLOROSA

The Madonna of the Poets. An anthology of Poems in Our Lady's praise gathered by ANITA BARTLE. (Burns & Oates, 2s. 6d. net.)

RIGHTLY considered, by Catholic or Protestant, by believer or unbeliever, by scientific philosopher or peasant of untroubled faith, High Mass forms probably the most pathetic spectacle that ever has been deliberately placed before the eye and ear of man. Here we seem to see all humanity represented, from the stately and aged priest to the smallest acolyte, and in the wailing cry that comes from them, "Ora Pro Nobis," is the essence of the Christian religion. For, as has been pointed out by philosopher and poet, it is the one creed whose chief doctrine is sadness. In the springtime of the world man sends the reflection of his own joyousness up to heaven, and the deities of antiquity make their Olympic halls ring with Homeric laughter. It was left to a generation of longer and deeper experience to adopt a religion that had "a Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief" for its chief object, whose virtues were self-sacrifice and self-denial, and whose disciples abjured "the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh." It is sometimes said that under the evolutionary epoch in which we live the Virgin Mary is floating far into the dim distance, to take her place beside Venus and Proserpina and Ceres and the others, round whose names the most beautiful legends are woven. Yet hers will ever remain the most touching and interesting of all traditions. She was human life incarnate, troubled with its griefs and comforted by its highest hopes. Looking back we see that her personality has had a strange history. At what period people began to worship her is somewhat doubtful, but during the age of chivalry she it was to whom the knight devoted himself, even when he had a leman of flesh and blood. For a while during the Reformation her name became almost abhorrent to the new religionists as being associated with what they called Romish idolatry, or what was later known as Mariolatry. Then the Virgin Mother became once more a pathetic human figure to the imagination, no longer supernatural, no longer a figure to be kneeled at and adored, but a weak and suffering mother full of a mother's troubles and sorrows. And now, as we have said, the question arises whether she be not passing away into that land where so many beautiful myths lie embalmed. We ask this, chiefly because the doubt arises from a perusal of the little book before us. It is an anthology of poems and prayers addressed to or concerning the Madonna, and whether the compiler looked upon her task as one of piety or whether she was actuated solely by literary considerations it is somewhat difficult to determine. We have in the book a very curious mingling of pieces. The place of the introduction is taken by a quotation from Ruskin in which that versatile genius said that "every brightest and loftiest achievement of the art and strength of manhood has been the fulfilment of the poor Israelite maiden's: 'He that is mighty hath magnified me.'" It is the saying, be it remembered, of a Protestant, and must be incredible even to the Roman Catholic. Many a noble and great achievement has to be laid to the account of those who neither cared for the Israelite maiden nor her hymn. However, that is neither here nor there, except as showing that the compiler of this anthology was forced to go to a writer who was almost a pagan in essentials for a broad view of the Virgin Mary. The contributors to the volume form a curiously mixed company, beginning as they do with an anonymous Greek writer and ending with the late Mr. Lionel Johnson. Generally speaking, we feel that the poems would have been better in Latin, which somehow seems to be the appropriate language in which to address the Virgin Mary. Probably enough, this feeling is a matter of association. In Latin the Roman Catholics have enshrined their hymns and litanies, while our own writers have scrupulously refrained from what may savour of Virgin worship. Any one will see what we mean by comparing the "Stabat Mater Dolorosa" with the translations of it given here:

Stood the Maiden-Mother weeping,
By the Cross her sad watch keeping,
Near her dying Son and LORD;
Woes wherewith the heart is broken,
Sorrows never to be spoken,
Smote her, pierced her, like a sword

Even in Old English, which is much better than modern prose, we do not get quite the same feeling as in the stately periods of the Romish Church. The best poem quoted in the book is an anonymous carol.

I sing of a Maiden
That is makeless;
King of all kings
To her Son she ches.
He came also still
There His Mother was,
As dew in April
That falleth on the grass.
He came also still
To His Mother's bower,
As dew in April
That falleth on the flower.
He came also still
There His Mother lay,
As dew in April
That falleth on the spray.
Mother and Maiden
Was never none but she;
Well may such a Lady
God's Mother be.

Crashaw is himself in his "Sancta Maria Dolorum," but scarcely in the vein that a Catholic ecclesiastic would sympathise with.

In shade of Death's Sad Tree Stood doleful She;
Ah, She! now by none other
Name to be known, alas! but Sorrow's Mother.
Before her eyes,
Hers and the whole world's Joys,
Hanging, all torn, she sees, and in His woes
And pains her pangs and throes.
Each wound of His from every part
All more at home in her own heart.

Of Henry Vaughan—no Roman Catholic, but a seventeenth-century English churchman, and therefore instinct with traditional feeling—we have the following somewhat "metaphysical" poem, called "The Knot":

Bright Queen of Heaven! God's Virgin Spouse!
The glad world's Blessèd Maid!
Whose beauty tied life to thy house,
And brought us saving aid.

Thou art the true Love's-knot; by thee
God is made our ally;
And man's inferior essence He
With His did dignify.

For coalescent by that Band
We are His body grown,
Nourished with favours from His hand
Whom for our Head we own.

And such a Knot what arm dares loose,
What life, what death can sever?
Which us in Him, and Him in us,
United keeps for ever.

Of the moderns, Aubrey de Vere probably entered more fully than any other into the spirit of Virgin worship, as witness the following:

Say, who is she, serenely blest,
That walks the dustier ways of life
With foot immaculate as her breast?
That woman maid, the Christian wife!

Her love, a full-blown rose, each hour
Its snowy bud regerminates;
The star of Eden lights her bower;
The angel, Reverence, guards its gates.

Yet half she is, that wife—still bride—
Owes to that Vestal never wed,
As homes through Him are sanctified
Who had not where to lay His head.

Both Mysteries sleep in one, secure:—
Like twins in one white cradle laid,
The life detached and marriage pure
One mother boast—the Mother-Maid.

To many of the other poets in this volume she is but a thing to write verses on. There seems to be something extremely jejune in addressing an Envoy at the end of a poem to the Virgin, as does Mr. Francis Thompson, while George Herbert and Herrick are merely quaint. The anthologist gives Herrick's:

To work a wonder God would have her shown
At once a Bud and yet a Rose full-blown;

and there is also included Herbert's ingenious play upon her name:

Ana { MARY } gram
      { ARMY } gram
How well her name an Army doth present
In whom the LORD of Hosts did pitch his tent.

There is much else in the volume that is good as verse, but would scarcely be considered of great account in the sentiments of those who in single-hearted piety repeat the prayer:

Regina Prophetarum,
Regina Apostolorum,
Regina Martyrum,
Ora pro nobis.

A QUESTION OF TEXT

The Works of Beaumont and Fletcher. Variorum Edition.
Vol. ii. (A. H. Bullen, 10s. 6d. net.)

The Works of Beaumont and Fletcher. Vol. ii. (Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net.)

COMPARISONS are proverbially odious. Hazlitt out-paradoxes paradox by explaining why the proverb is correct which says so, and his explanation is convincing and fits our purpose nicely by showing when a comparison is pertinent. His two hundred and twenty-third characteristic runs as follows:

Comparisons are odious because they reduce every one to a standard he ought not to be tried by, or leave us in possession only of those claims which we can set up, to the entire exclusion of others. By striking off the common qualities, the remainder of excellence is brought down to a contemptible fraction. A man may be six feet high and only an inch taller than another. In comparisons this difference of an inch is the only thing thought of or ever brought into question. The greatest genius or virtue soon dwindles into nothing by such a mode of computation.

Exactly: it is that inch (as valuable as an inch of land in the City) that is the rub in the present predicament, as we sit before the two editions, now being issued, of the works of Beaumont and Fletcher. The volumes, one tall and slate blue, the other stoutish and red, have the common quality of being written by those "gemini of witt": it is a matter for comparison—of text really—once the thought of the tall long line Mr. Bullen's edition would make on the shelf has assumed its proper proportion. The bookseller's indifference to the task of such a decision is cold-blooded and amazing:

B. and F. Bullen, vol. ii. 10s. 6d. net.
Do. do. Cam. Univ. Press. 4s. 6d. net. } on appro.

is his whole comment upon the situation. Outrageous! Why cannot we be left to chant in peace:

Beauty clear and fair
Where the Air
Rather like a perfume dwells
Where the Violet and the Rose
The blew Veins in blush disclose
And come to honour nothing else.

And that has landed us in the very thick of the question! Note the fifth line of the verse and the first word. The word is "the," the reading in the folios and quartos, and in the red Cambridge edition. Slate-blue has "their," and without comment of any kind, which is surprising in an edition with Variorum printed conspicuously on its handsome back. We prefer the sound of Fletcher's line with its slightly halting accent and gentle emphasis on the blue (of sense and sound) to Mr. Greg's clever emendation. Sheets could be written on Fletcher's reason for writing "the."

The song occurs in The Elder Brother. That leads to another point. The play has been printed both as prose and as verse: modern editors have inclined to fit the whole—in passages violently—into verse. The Variorum edition gives the verse version, with a long discussion in the preface. The Cambridge edition has solved the difficulty by following the prose of the 1679 folio, of which it is a reprint, and giving the verse version in its entirety in the Appendix. Gradually our textual sense (a curious sixth sense possessed by some people) became aroused, and, ivory paper-knife in one hand marking place, we read on line by line and discovered—many things, among which were:

(1) That the Variorum edition cut up the acts into scenes and gave hypothetical localities.

(2) That the Variorum edition inserted stage directions, sometimes on its own initiative without confession, and occasionally changed, sometimes with comment, sometimes without, the place of stage directions in the old text. For example, Humourous Lieutenant, act i. scene i. ll. 278, seq. read:

Ant. . . . they must not leave ye.
Sec. Gent. Never till life leaves us, sir.

Enter Leontius with Attendant.

whereas the folios and quartos and manuscripts read, as the Cambridge text reads:

Ant: . . . they must not leave ye.

Enter Leontius.

2. Gent. Never till life leave us, Sir.

It is noteworthy, too, that the Variorum has changed the mood of the verb "leave" without comment.

(3) That where all the old editions are unanimous in one reading, but that reading is to modern editors inexplicable, the Variorum edition does not hesitate to change it, e.g., Wit Without Money, act ii. 99 (where Valentine is lauding the advantages of a girl over a widow, the tamer evil). The Variorum reads as follows:

With one man satisfied, with one rein guided
With one faith one content one bed agreed
She makes the wife, preserves the fame and issue.

whereas the Cambridge edition reads, with 1679 folio and Q. 2:

With one man satisfied, with one rein guided, with one faith, content, one bed, aged she makes the wise, preserves the fame and issue.

This makes excellent sense ("thee" being frequently printed "the" in Elizabethan times), is far stronger, and has the added advantage of being backed by the old authorities, except Q. 1, which reads wife, probably a misprint.

(4) That the Variorum collated the manuscript of The Humourous Lieutenant, a manuscript of extraordinary importance, from the Dyce reprint, which is quite untrustworthy; and the Cambridge edition had recourse to the manuscript itself.

Ex pede Herculem—and we need not set forth our comparison at full length. And so slate-blue went back, and red stands on the shelf. True, its old spelling may influence our orthography and hold us up to the ignorant derision of friends and correspondents. But anything that helps to preserve the old atmosphere of these old plays is of more value than all the notes and directions and modernisations that were ever written, for the proper understanding of an old dramatist, who had his own rules of technique and rules of what he could and could not do, and his own effects to make. At the least we know what we are reading.

PASTORALS

Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama. A literary inquiry, with special reference to the pre-Restoration stage in England. By WALTER W. GREG. (Bullen, 10s. 6d. net.)

BIBLIOGRAPHY and the gift of literary appreciation do not often go hand in hand, and it is pleasant, therefore, to find Mr. Greg. to whose "List of Plays and Masques" students of the English drama are deeply indebted, making his mark in a study of pastoral poems and plays distinguished by a breadth of treatment and sanity of view worthy of the best traditions of English criticism. Mr. Greg's main concern being with the English pastoral drama, he has treated the pastoral in France and Spain somewhat cursorily; but for Italy, where the tradition was set, and for England, his study is as full as could be desired. Beginning, as in duty bound, with Theocritus, about whom he has a very pretty passage, he traces the history of the Latin eclogue from the time of Virgil until it lost its last semblance of freshness in the involved allegories in which the scholars of the Renaissance took so much pride. After sketching the rise of the vernacular eclogue in Italy and noting how the greater risk in religious or political allusions in a vulgar tongue saved it from the worst excesses of allegory, Mr. Greg goes back to Boccaccio's "Ameto" to take up the story of the pastoral romance, and then makes a flying visit to Spain and France. For the history of pastoral poetry in England ample space is allowed, and Mr. Greg shows that the English pastoral, though it never rivalled its Italian model in fertility, yet evinced an individual and versatile quality which we seek in vain in other countries. We have the evidence of the Shepherd Plays in the great Miracle Cycles, more especially the two in the Towneley collection, and also some scanty remains of poems and ballads, to prove that the natural, homely shepherd had left his mark on our literature before the classical and Italian tradition intervened; and, when the tradition came, it was open to the individual poet to blend the conventional shepherd life with such more natural touches as his inclinations and skill dictated. The privilege brought with it a risk of confused ideals, on the part both of the poets and their critics, but when it was successfully used it helped to give the English pastoral the greater variety which Mr. Greg claims for it.

After thus tracing the history of pastoral poetry Mr. Greg makes a fresh start with the Italian drama, beginning with the mythological plays, sacre rappresentazioni on pagan themes, which came into fashion towards the close of the fifteenth century. Before the end of that century there is definite evidence of the eclogue having assumed a dramatic form, and thenceforward they can be arranged in something approaching a natural sequence of dramatic development, until in 1573 the lines of the pastoral play were definitely fixed by the brilliant success of Tasso's Aminia. Both of this and of its equally famous rival, Guarini's Pastor Fido, Mr. Greg gives a full analysis, and he does full justice to the charm of the Aminia in a passage which will bear quotation:

The effect produced is one and whole, that of a perfect work of art, and the same impression remains with us afterwards. Smooth limbs, soft and white, that shine through the waters of the spring and amid the jewelled spray, or half revealed among the thickets of lustrous green, a slant ray of sunlight athwart the loosened gold of the hair—the vision floats before us as if conjured up by the strains of music rather than by actual words. This kinship with another art did not escape so acute a critic as Symonds as a characteristic of Tasso's style. But the kinship on another side with the art of painting is equally close; a thousand pictures arise before us as we follow the perfect melody of the irregular lyric measures. The white veil fluttering and the swift feet flashing amid the brambles and the trailing creepers of the wood, bright crimson staining the spotless purity of the flying skirts as the huntress bursts through the clinging tangles that seek to hold her as if jealous of a human love, the lusty strength of the bronzed and hairy satyr in contrast with the tender limbs of the captive nymph, the dark cliff and the still mirror of the lake reflecting the rosebuds pressed artfully against the girl's soft neck as she crouches by its brink,

Backed by the forest, circled by the flowers,
Bathed in the sunshine of the golden hours,

the armed huntress, the grey-coated wolves, and the white-robed chorus—here are a series of pictures of seductive beauty for the brush of a painter to realise upon the walls of some palace of pleasure.

No "sour shepherd" could write such a passage as this, and Mr. Greg's combination of this ready appreciation of the pastoral grace with a steady eye for its essential defect is the best possible equipment for its critic. What that essential defect was is tersely indicated in the three words "love in vacuo" which he lets fall, almost casually, on the last page of his book. The shepherds and shepherdesses who come upon the scene have, indeed, their pastoral occupations, and to make some graceful allusions to them was one of the rules of the game, but long before d'Urfé and Fontenelle it was felt that "ces Bergères necessiteuses, qui pour gagner leur vie conduisent les troupeaux aux pastourages," or of whom it could be said that they "sentent trop la campagne," had no place on the stage. Positively or negatively, the one occupation of every shepherd and shepherdess is "love," and the one form of love which is least often depicted is that in which it is a healthy and human passion. The unwholesomeness of the nymphs who brood all day long on their chastity is as offensive as the brutality of the satyrs who would deprive them of it, and this sickly attitude is so characteristic of the pastoral tradition that Milton himself could not escape from it. As Mr. Greg remarks, the spectators of Comus could have had no prejudice otherwise than favourable to the Lady Alice Egerton, and yet the child is made to take the first opportunity of informing them, "with much earnest protestation, of her quite remarkable purity and virtue, implying as it were a naïve surprise at having arrived unsullied at the perilous age of thirteen."

It is necessary to emphasise, as we have done, how languid and enervating are the breezes that blow softly over the sheepdowns of the pastoral drama, or it will be easy to do injustice to the author of any particular play, as Dr. Ward and other critics, for instance, have borne over hardly on Randolph's Amyntas for not representing the true "simplicity" of pastoral life. As Mr. Greg remarks, the fact may be lamented by such as love to shed bitter tears because the sandy shore is not a well-swept parquet (the simile had been better reversed!), but when the type of the pastoral play had been fixed more than half a century earlier by the success of Tasso's play of the same name, it is absurd to blame Randolph for conforming to it. It is true that in The Sad Shepherd, unhappily left as a fragment, Jonson took a more original course, with the result that the broad humour and burlesque of some of his rustic characters has brought down on him the censure of Mr. Swinburne for his "barbarism." As we have seen, it is one of the merits of Mr. Greg's book that he distinguishes the more natural and human vein which may be found in English examples both of the pastoral poetry and of the pastoral drama as compared with foreign work, but Dr. Ward's censure of Randolph and Mr. Swinburne's of Jonson are eloquent of the risk of confused ideals of which we spoke. Mr. Greg himself vigorously upholds both plays, while, on the other hand, he regards the success of Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess as a triumph of poetic charm over very serious faults of construction and characterisation due to the "antagonism between Fletcher's own sympathies and the ideal he set before him." The whole of his chapter on these "Three Masterpieces" seems to us quite admirable, and in tracing the growth of the pastoral drama in England, and its handling by the lesser men as well as the greater ones, he is equally successful. His book will certainly take its place at once as a standard work.

LA REINE MALHEUREUSE

The Life of Queen Henrietta Maria. By I. A. TAYLOR. Two volumes. (Hutchinson, 24s. net.)

ENTHUSIASM for the Stuart period will hardly die, and most nooks and crannies, however carefully searched, will bear to be explored again. Alone, perhaps, amongst protagonists, the little bright-eyed Queen has never been substantially presented by historians. The shadow which she cast has never been materialised, and vaguest obloquy has been her portion. To remove this stigma, to bring her into the full light of day, has been Miss Taylor's task, and the thought was in itself a worthy one. Moreover, our author is a careful writer, a cautious sifter of plain evidence no less than of ingenious theories: a keen, clear-sighted observer, never a special pleader to any marked degree. Greatness of character is the only factor to be counted in history, as it is the only real influence in human life, yet something of greatness is supplied to the weakest of characters by mere strangeness of circumstance. If this be true of Charles I., it is not less true of Henrietta, who does not deserve violent censure any more than she deserved the bitter hatred which was her lot in life. The most that can be said against her is that her zeal outran discretion. Frivolous and meddlesome she has been called, selfish and tyrannical, and these things are true enough in their degree; to which Miss Taylor brings in reply the suggestion that to be meddlesome was simply to be eager and interested, while the more serious complaint is met by proofs of wifely devotion. As to the greater question, she strove "rashly and with unpractised hands to build a dyke against a deluge." This is cleverly said. But would it not be truer to say that before she could attempt to build anything an irresistible current had swept her away?

When the bride arrived in England, a child of fifteen, events of which she knew little and understood less were already in train for outbreak. It was the June of 1625. Buckingham was the real King of England. Henrietta was no stranger to violent happenings. She knew that she had been sent to England to be the good providence of English Catholics. But every precaution known to statecraft had been taken to prevent the exercise of any grace she might have possessed, so that neither her own toleration of liberal thought nor her husband's of Catholicism had the slightest chance of surviving; and yet there is clear evidence that both existed. For the rest, it was certainly the period, to use Lord Acton's phrase, when dogmatic convictions rose to be the centre of universal interest, and if these were not rationally born in those who were "dressed in a little brief authority," they were very easily assumed.

Assumed they were in Henrietta's case, and we see her henceforward the antitype of the lath of statesmanship, painted to look like iron. What gives a human pathos to her struggles, her renewals of effort, her desperate denials of plain fact, is the place she had as mother and wife from 1627 onwards. Buckingham was gone, and with him as many dangers to France as to herself. The pack of foreign monks and minions was departed; domestic peace had arrived on their heels. All was ready, in fact, for the reign of comparative happiness. The Queen herself was of a disposition happy and gay. There is no resisting the bright side of the picture as Miss Taylor shows it. Yet warnings were in the air. Possibly a superstitious dread, instilled by her mother, accounts even more than religious scruple for the Queen's refusal to be crowned; but be that as it may, the English people never forgave her for this. They had hailed with joy the failure of the Spanish match, and now wondered cynically enough whether there was anything gained by a French one. Meanwhile, a strange commentary on the futility of opposing the onrush of victorious principle was provided for Henrietta by the rise and fall of Strafford. Her own safety, so it seemed at one time, was safeguarded by his death. But Charles himself, apart from active folly, would neither understand nor learn.

Here came the fight for mastery between king and people; a story, complicated though it be, which is universally known. It was one thing that Charles should try to save his wife, but another that between them they should defy everything that could have preserved the State. From the moment that Charles took the fatal step which precipitated the Civil War—the arrest of the five members, for which Henrietta must receive no blame, even if she counselled it, since the act was his—from that moment Henrietta herself became, as it were, merely a side-issue. In the long years following, nothing she could do is to be considered of the first importance. She did a great deal, it is true, enough to bring down anathemas on her head from contemporary critics, but not enough to warrant the indignation of sober historians. Her flight to France, her intrigues with foreign powers, her hazardous speculations, her marshalling even of armed forces: all these furious ventures count for very little in the court of history. Henrietta was the victim of circumstance. In her character there is no touch of greatness from first to last. Burnet declared that she was ever bad at contriving and much worse in execution. She had no business, of course, to contrive; and even those of her own day who blamed most freely would have pitied as readily, had they once realised her unimportance to any material issue. How does she stand, then? She was the wife of one, and the mother of two Kings who failed. This remains true in face of the half-success of the Restoration. And the indirect value of such studies as these is due to the fact that the sum of these very failures is vital to history. But history is not affected by her own. The Queen's appreciation of the truth implied affords fitness to the name she gave herself: la reine malheureuse.

If, then, we dismiss the unfortunate Queen as a real factor, there still remains one subject on which a good deal of speculation has long been naturally rife, and which invests her name with peculiar interest. What were her relations with Jermyn, Earl of Saint Albans? The slander to which some historians, some gossips, some diarists have given currency is idle enough, and Miss Taylor rightly treats it with disdain. But the question of the alleged marriage (she declares) is still undetermined by history. We are not so sure about that. Weighing the pros and cons we must be guided by evidence. But character is the best evidence. Greatness apart, character Henrietta most certainly possessed. From the Queen's letters, freely quoted here, and quoted more wisely than they are apt to be in the footnotes of orthodox histories, the impression only of wifely devotion can be gleaned. Tyranny, even, was one way of love with her. That she suffered much, and therefore is to be forgiven much, is hardly to be gainsaid. But we ask for better proof of character, and that is to be found. Enough has been said, perhaps, to indicate the lines upon which the book is written. The last word to the author must be one of sincere congratulation.

THE CALL OF THE DESERT

The Voice of the South. By GILBERT WATSON. (Hurst & Blackett, 10s. 6d. net.)

It is difficult to know where to begin in praise of this book. Perhaps the reader's first pleasant surprise is gained by realising that the work is free from all those sordid details and tiresome preliminaries and excrescences which generally tend to rob books of travel of their unity. We find Mr. Gilbert Watson at Biskra, in Southern Algeria, and at Tougourt we leave him; and for whoever likes to read the impressions of a singularly alert and sympathetic observer, to feel the influence of elemental nature and untouched antiquity, to come under the spell of the romance of a little-known country and the soul of a strange people, the book is a rich store of enjoyment.

Above all, we would recommend "The Voice of the South" to all who have a taste for good prose. To define or describe good style is always difficult; but in this particular case it is chiefly apparent in the simple and adequate narrative, and in the descriptive passages, which, without being either pre-Raphaelite or impressionist, make us see sufficiently all the important detail, and at the same time realise the effect of the whole. The analysis of the mental equipment of Abdullah, the camel-driver, is a good instance.

... he possessed imagination, for he was a firm believer in the supernatural; nor was he deficient in humour, for a broad or practical joke tickled him at times to the point of tears, and metamorphosed his serious countenance to such an extent that his very ears might be said to participate in his smiles. But these were pardonable relapses from the paths of gravity and were more than atoned for by long hours of unmitigated depression.

Abdullah interested me, although I neither grew to understand nor care for him as I did for Athman. He did not lay himself out to gain my friendship, nor had he any of the companionable traits of my dusky guide. He was a strange character, taciturn and loquacious by turns, yet on the whole much given to contemplation. He thought slowly and laboriously. The suspicion of ignorance darkened his mind. He groped vaguely in a chaos of elementary thoughts, connected in his more lucid moments with camels. Glimmerings of reason came to him at times, but they rarely found their way into words. Give him the bright sun overhead and the burning desert underfoot, the wind behind and the camels before him, 'twas all he asked.

It would be a pleasure to quote many passages describing the different aspects of the desert, at dawn, in the heat of the day, and at dusk, or the equally interesting and un-northern scenes afforded by the streets, squares, mosques, and market-places of the little desert towns to which the narrative leads us. Rarely do we find a traveller who sees so clearly and describes so well, who has so much knowledge, who seems so fully in sympathy with all that surrounds him, animate and inanimate, and who has so easy a mastery over the English language.

During the course of the narrative the author has kept himself as far as possible in the background, and the chief personal interest of the story is centred in Athman, with whose name the book opens and with whose departure it ends. He is introduced in his rôle as guide, but as his character gradually unfolds itself we see that his profession is really the least important and indeed the most incongruous fact in his life. Not but that he fulfilled his duties excellently, but he was so much more. He seemed at once the paragon of guides, the ideal of travelling companions, the perfection of piety both filial and divine, the soul of poetry and music, a strict observer of the laws of etiquette and courtesy, full of sympathy and consideration, with all the exuberance of youth, and in his heart as simple as a child. We hear him discoursing on the beauty of his desert home, the holiness of his Marabout ancestors, and the fascination and danger of love, which he had never known, playing on his flute, singing Arab songs, telling old tales and reciting his own poems. We see him eager to tend the sick and help the aged, almost strangling a man whom he found torturing a toad, cherishing a baby fox and trying to bring it up on camel's milk, grieving over it when it died, and burying it with all solemnity. This is Athman as we know him on the march from Biskra to Tougourt, and thus he would probably have remained had Tougourt not held in store for the travellers certain unexpected experiences. But here the Voice of the South penetrated Athman's soul: passions strong enough to overbalance the rest of his nature were aroused in him and plunged him into states of misery and tension hitherto unexperienced. What happened to Athman at Tougourt we shall not say: it must be told in Mr. Watson's own words. Whether it was indeed Fate, or a sudden awakening to maturity, or a youthful excess, will never be known. But the irresistible call lured him Southwards, and with his disappearance the story naturally reaches its close.

BURBANKITIS

New Creations in Plant Life. An authoritative account of the Life and Work of Luther Burbank. By W. S. HARWOOD. Illustrated by photographs. (The Macmillan Co., 7s. 6d.)

READERS of periodicals can, during the last year or two, scarcely have failed to notice constantly recurring paragraphs and articles with reference to the wonderful results in the way of plant-breeding achieved by a Mr. Luther Burbank, of California. The appellations "Wonder Worker" and "Wizard of the West" have been freely accorded him, and the plants he has produced have been commonly referred to by the high-sounding title of "creations." Among the many marvels credited to Mr. Burbank were the production of a thornless edible cactus, guaranteed to transform deserts into smiling, fertile lands, and of some entirely new fruits, including the "plumcot" and the "pomato." Indeed, in the United States, so great has been the curiosity and interest aroused by this Press campaign that a new word has been coined, to wit Burbankitis.

By any one possessed of a practical knowledge of horticulture most of these Press stories could be regarded only as amusing fables. Remembering, however, the generally accredited saw: "Where there is smoke there is fire," we found our interest in Mr. Burbank aroused, and for some time we have been diligently endeavouring to obtain authentic information concerning his performances. The quest has proved an elusive one. Somewhat strangely, until lately the British gardening papers have had little or nothing to say upon the subject, and from inquiries made of eminent horticultural authorities little was gleaned beyond the perhaps significant fact that they too would like information. The mystery deepened. A search for these wonderful new plants in the catalogues of the leading British, American, and Continental nurserymen proved unavailing, and even the perusal of a letter elicited from Mr. Burbank by the authorities at Kew did not enlighten. "The Press has gotten hold of my work too soon," he wrote, but, alas! he did not enter into the question of what there was to be gotten hold of. Amidst all this disappointment, however, one fact stood out prominently. It was that the Carnegie Institution of Washington, "founded to promote original research," had thought fit to make Mr. Burbank a grant of 10,000 dollars a year for ten years, to relieve his mind from care as much as possible, and allow him to apply all his energies to the inception and development of further experiments and ideas. This indeed was a solid testimonial to the value of Mr. Burbank's work.

It was therefore filled with interest and expectation that we took up the book under notice. It is entitled "An Authoritative Account." Frankly, Mr. Harwood has greatly disappointed us. He has abundant interest in and enthusiasm for his task, but obviously he is neither a man of science nor a practical gardener, and to deal satisfactorily with his subject he required to be both. The book is far too popular in style and indefinite to be of real value to those seriously interested in plant-breeding, and it contains very little information meet to be absolutely accredited by the impartial observer. Despite, indeed probably because of, these faults, the latest advices inform us that "New Creations in Plant Life" has "gone" with the American public. Therefore, from a material standpoint at any rate, Mr. Harwood's mission has not ended in failure. But we are still left wanting to know.

Finally we must enter a word of protest against Mr. Harwood's gushing tone. He would have us believe that his hero, Mr. Burbank, is almost superhuman. Two brief quotations will exemplify this. A chapter is devoted to explaining how sadly Mr. Burbank is overwrought by work, and of the amazing expedients he is driven to adopt to keep out the besieging hordes of the curious; after this it is a surprise to read that he counts no day completed in which he has not said a cheery good morning to his aged mother, now faring near the century line, looked after her with the utmost devotion during all its hours, and tenderly kissed her good night at the going down of the sun.

We are further informed that

No man who has ever lived has laid out such a scheme for the adornment of the world; indeed it may airily be stated that not all the plant-breeders who have preceded him have ever done so much to ennoble floral life.

Considering that, from the results to hand, in British expert opinion the "Californian Wizard" has yet to win his spurs at hybridisation, this is indeed a trifle "tall"!

THE LAMENT OF THE FRIENDLESS OLD MEN

THE sad gale is sighing,
The sick year is dying,
The aspen is sere and the roses are dead ;
And Winter's chill rigour
Has palsied our vigour,
And frozen our life-blood and frosted our head.

False Hope's die is broken,
Faith is but a token
Debased and defaced and half eaten with rust.
Life grows mean and meagre,
E'en Earth's self seems eager
To resume with a miser's impatience our dust.

How sad the repining
When forced to resigning
The duties to which we were fettered as slaves !
And oh ! when the neighbours
Forgot our long labours
'Twas as if we beheld the grass grow on our graves !

The sport of the groundlings,
In our second youth foundlings,
Whom they herd in a spital, whose muscle and brain
Have outlasted their cunning,
Whose life's sands are running
From a glass that can ne'er be replenished again.

The young grass pushes
Aside the rushes
Grown sere that bend to the earth their bier ;
We, old masqueraders
Of life, the crusaders
Of Death, each are seeking our own Sepulchre.

Youth's broad road is haunted
By Zephyrs and planted
With myrtle and laurel and white may bloom ;
But Age's highway
Dwindles to a bye-way,
And cypresses close o'er the path to the tomb.

Grim Death walls up slowly
Each sense ; shut in wholly,
To those standing without we no longer can call ;
Till at length every blind
In the death-darkened mind
Is drawn for the body's sad funeral.

CLOUDESLEY BRERETON.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

PRIMITIVE PLAGIARISM

THE problem of Folk-tales, their origin and transmission, is one of the most difficult which the student of folk-lore has to face. In a recent work I have tried to show that folk-tales did not all come from India or from the East. There must have been many centres of story-invention ; many places from which tales set out on their long Wanderjahre through the world. Such tales are composed of a number of separate incidents, skilfully woven together by the art of the story-inventor, but each of which might have been invented a hundred times over, in a hundred different places. It is when we find the same combination of incidents, in the same order, with, often, one unique incident occurring regularly in all, in stories, say, from Europe, India, China, Melanesia, and Canada, that the crux is felt. "Borrowed or transmitted, of course !" cry many folk-lorists, forgetting that though "God made man upright, he has found out many inventions." Theirs is certainly an easy way out of the difficulty ; but, for one thing, how did a story common in Europe reach Melanesia, reach Canada, reach Peru, before the advent of white men ? It argues either that the tales in question have enormous antiquity, and have been carried about the world in long past ages when early man went on his restless questing, or that they have been invented separately. One would be loth to insist upon such marvellous coincidental invention, but we must not regard it as a Bluebeard's chamber into which good folk-lorists may not look. The more folk-tales are studied in the light of what their contents mean, viz., a reflection of actual belief and custom, the more their separate invention more than once becomes a vera causa. The similar order of incidents, the presence of a unique incident, are another matter. But here, too, it may be found that borrowing or transmission need not always be supposed.

An excellent example of a unique incident, one which defenders of the borrowing theory will at once say could not have been invented twice, occurs in certain stories of the Jack and the Beanstalk class. These I have shown in "The Childhood of Fiction" to be of universal occurrence as a result of man's firm belief in whither, by skill, or craft, or favour of the "ones above," he might go and return again. The ways of reaching that world are various. Mr. Chadband's aspirations to soar and fly were checked by Mr. Snagsby's exclaiming : "No wings." Early man knew better. He climbed a tree, or ascended a mountain, or swarmed up a spider's thread, and so reached the world above. That might occur to any one anywhere. But in three tales from places quite remote from each other, and, indeed, from all other lands where similar tales are told, a curious method of reaching the sky is found.

A world above his head, to let him see How boundless might his soul's horizons be ;

The first is from Australia. Two girls were persecuted by the unwelcome attentions of Beereun, but fled from him and, with the help of a dead relation, became stars. Beereun threw a spear up till it struck the sky and hung shaft downwards. Another spear was thrown and stuck in the shaft ; many others followed until he had made a rope of spears up which he climbed to the sky, where he still pursues the star-maidens. Next, in Melanesia the following tale is told. Qat's wife was a sky-woman who, like the European swan-maidens, discovered her wings and flew away heavenwards. Qat shot an arrow into the air till it reached the sky, like Beereun's spear. Then a succession of arrows was fired at it, each one sticking into the one before it, until Qat was able to climb to the sky and recover his wife. But in descending he fell heavily to the earth and was killed. Both of these are separate tales. But among the Haida Indians a similar incident is found forming part of a long and involved cosmogony. A male slave, created by the god of darkness, having stolen the sun and a fire-stick from his master, their original thief, wandered off. One night he shot an arrow at the moon. Next night he shot another into the notch of the first, and so on for three hundred and sixty-five nights. (The arrows were transformed into days and nights and finally became the days of the Haida year.) Up this ladder he climbed and passed through the moon into heaven. There he saw a beautiful woman swimming in a lake and, having captured her, returned to earth. But his master met him, took the woman, and changed him into a spirit who looks after life and growth and is worshipped by the Haidas.

In all three incidents the pursuit and capture of a woman is concerned ; in all the sky is reached in the same way. Have the incidents been invented separately, or have Melanesians and Australians borrowed from each other ? Allowing this latter supposition to be possible, whence did the Haidas obtain the tale ? The place which it occupies in their sacred cosmogony proves it to be of ancient date, as does the fact that the hero is one of their worshipful spirits. If they borrowed, it must have been long ago. But how did a story current in Melanesia or Australia reach North America? We are almost driven to conclude that in each case the story has been invented separately: the incident of the method of reaching the sky is unknown in European tales and no version has yet been reported elsewhere. This conclusion has all the more vraisemblance since the raw material out of which the tale has been fashioned is of universal occurrence. Mortals are enamoured of immortal women in "all the mythologies," and these immortals are "gey ill to live wi'," and, in fact, are always trying to return to the sky. Once they have escaped, how is the hero to recover them? Various methods are known; but Melanesians, Australians, and Haidas all hit upon the same method, that of shooting arrows or throwing spears one into another till a chain was formed by which the distressed husband or lover might rise heavenwards. We would suggest that this feat may have been one familiar to all these (and other) peoples—to shoot an arrow at an object and then try to shoot another into the notch of the first, and, possibly, a third into that of the second. This feat is introduced with much effect into "Ivanhoe" by that great romantic, Sir Walter. The savage novelist also made use of it as an ordinary incident of life, and at the same time, like his great successor, gave it a marvellously imaginative setting.

Thus a story of several incidents, one of which seems unusual enough to suggest invention once for all, can be shown to have been invented three times over. This may quite well have happened with other even more elaborate tales, though it need not necessarily have done so. All that we argue for is the possibility of separate story-invention even where much similarity occurs. Until folklorists fully admit that possibility, there is something lacking in their science.

The incident of choosing the worst and getting the better and vice versa is a common formula of Märchen. Outside Europe and South Asia it occurs in Japan, among the Navajoes, with the Ashantis in West Africa, and the Wagogo of East Africa. Has it been invented separately, e.g., by Navajoes and Africans? We are inclined to think so. The Wagogo use it to explain the origin of fire. Blundering man went to heaven to get fire and was told to choose among several vases. He selected the finest, but it contained only ashes. Woman was more clever and chose the commonest vase, in which there was fire. Here the incident, if borrowed, has been used as a mythic explanation of origins. But both Ashantis and Navajoes make it into a Fall-myth, explaining why the world is so evil. Here again, if the incident is borrowed, it has been treated in an original, and yet in precisely the same way, by two races. Independently, for Navajoes did not borrow from Ashantis, or vice versa. On the whole, we conclude that all three invented not only the treatment, but the incident itself.

As a final instance we might refer to the Bowditch Island tale of Tasi and his nine brothers. The names of these ten little nigger boys were those of the numerals, Tasi's being the tenth, only now they are in reverse order, Tasi being number one. Thereby hangs the tale. The sister of the youths was carried off by a demon in his canoe. Next morning their parents gave each son stone axes, ten to the eldest and so on in decreasing numbers till poor Tasi had only one, bidding them make canoes (unknown before) and go off in pursuit. The wasps, who weave their nests, made sails for them, and from their method women learned to make mats (in West Africa and among the Algonkins weaving is learned by watching spiders—independent invention from natural causes!). All now started off: Tasi was left far behind. But he called to the canoes: "Let the waves wash you back," and each at once stood still, while his own was wafted onwards to the ogre's island. The ogre, suspecting a rescue, had tied a cord to the girl Hina's wrist, keeping the other end in his hand, while he remained in his underground cave. Tasi found her wandering about, and together they planned the escape, when, tug! she was called back to the cave. Like other heroines in similar situations, she made an excuse to her captor—the cave was so hot and he was so sleepy, she would go for a stroll. When she reappeared, Tasi slipped the rope off and tied it to a tree (a similar incident occurs in a West Highland tale), and when the giant awoke he drew in, not Hina, but the tree. Meanwhile the other brothers had pulled back, but were once by one upbraided by their parents for their lack of success. When Tasi arrived with his sister, he was as naturally praised, and told that whereas he had hitherto been last and least of his brothers now he would be the first. So the meanings of the numbers were changed in his honour.

This tale is said by the natives to be an old one. It must be so, since some of its incidents involve mythical explanations—a sure test of antiquity—and much of it is metrical. It is thus quite possibly older than the advent of white men. Its motif is a common one in tales of the Clever Youngest Son type; he alone of his brothers rescues the abducted sister. Has it been borrowed, has it reached the island like driftwood from an alien shore? Two things are certain; it is purely native now, and it contains fewer incidents than similar European tales. We cannot say that primitive plagiarism must here have been at work. But those who are blind to the marvellous inventiveness of the savage will still be unconvinced.

J. A. MACCULLOCH.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Sick-room Fiction," by M. E. Francis.]

FICTION

The Angel of Pain. By E. F. BENSON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

MR. BENSON has been hiring an angel—the Angel of Pain—and working him uncommonly hard. He has required him to exhibit the need of his presence for beneficent ends in human affairs through manifestations of his power in three cases specially prepared for him. After his passing in each case Mr. Benson says in effect: "There you are, you see!" But the worst of it is, we don't quite see, or see rather less than we did before. Let us take the cases. First comes Philip Home, a dominantly successful stockbroker of considerable cultivation, rather hard in the grain, but a good, straight fellow, with a tender place in his heart for two intimate friends, Tom Merivale and Evelyn Dundas. All he wants to round off his prosperity is a happy marriage, and of this he has just secured the promise from a girl whom he loves with every fibre (though she tells him honestly that she doesn't quite love him), when Evelyn Dundas, a meteoric, light-hearted young painter with a sweet, irresponsible nature, gives way to his passion for Madge, who utterly reciprocates it, and carries her off from under Home's very guns. For a while the double shock infuriates and brutalises him, but eventually, in great part through the gentle and healing influence of Tom Merivale, he conquers himself and not only forgives but befriends the two who have wounded him. A well-worn theme, no doubt; but Mr. Benson with his unflinching power to interest makes a very pretty story of it. Moreover, nobody would deny that Philip's chastening did him good. So there is one to the Angel of Pain. Now take the case of the friend who robbed Philip. Evelyn's marriage bids fair to crown a radiantly happy career with complete success. Society, after some wavering, pronounces his action justified by his and Madge's love for each other, and the two are staying with Lord and Lady Dover in Scotland when a shooting accident blinds and permanently disfigures Evelyn. Here, surely, is a great opportunity for Mr. Benson's austere angel. One can imagine him indicating long vistas of suffering and self-discipline, consecrated and made endurable by the devotion of a wife who would certainly never have failed Evelyn. But no. Dundas cannot face it and drowns himself, or at least allows himself to be drowned; and, indeed, if we were left to make the inference that the Angel of Pain may sometimes prove too strong for weak natures, there would be nothing more to be said. But Mr. Benson will have it that Evelyn died "complete," and there we entirely disagree. The third case is even less satisfactory; moreover, from an artistic point of view, it seems to us entirely out of keeping with the rest of the book. For here the Angel of Pain executes a quick change, appearing for the occasion as the great God Pan himself. Tom Merivale was one who (as Professor Raleigh has said of Wordsworth) had acquired the art of the naturalist, the art of remaining perfectly motionless until the wild and timid creatures of his mind came about him. He lived alone in the New Forest, and in an exquisite sense of the joy of Nature found almost complete happiness. But because he shut his eyes to the sorrow of Nature, Pan, as he had anticipated, came and revealed it to him so hideously that he died of the initiation. We fail to see that any one benefited by this piteous consummation, except perhaps Pan himself, who seems to have enjoyed it. Is not all this symbolism a little clumsy, besides being anachronistic to its environment? Imagine the young Wordsworth (haunted by the cataract as by a spirit) killed by a Goat-God by the marge of Grasmere! The Angel of Pain, we think, finishes "one down." And that, too, when no one who thinks at all would dream of questioning the necessity of Pain.

The Face of Clay. By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL. (Murray, 6s.)

WE have read Mr. Vachell's story with a curious sense of wandering through a lovely and gracious region to the accompaniment of tragic music. To that music we did not always lend an exclusive ear—perhaps because of the beauty of the landscapes and seascapes about us and the interest of things seen by the way. But whenever it became insistent we listened with growing apprehension lest a string should snap at the critical moment as the result of extreme and continuous tension. We are still not quite sure whether this actually happened; if so, we gladly concede that Mr. Vachell, like a dexterous musician, has covered up the catastrophe with a skilful manipulation of pathetic chords, and we end after all upon a safe note. Yet the suspicion remains when all is said—that Michael Ossory, the protagonist, is not quite equal to the strain put upon him. In suggesting this we are far from disregarding a setting from which the tale draws its inspiration in quite a peculiar degree. Brittany, the cradle of many a fable and romance, is more than a background here, and Mr. Vachell goes far beyond the mere description of the azure and rose and green of her summers, of her mists, so full, too, of colour, and of the storms of her terrible coast. He shows us intimately her hamlets, ports and villages, the girls, gay, demure with their sweet dignity and their instinctive good taste, the men with the light-winged imagination, ready for flight within their sturdy frames—a population whose religion has been engrafted upon paganism, and which cherishes many a quaint belief and primitive superstition. Had Michael Ossory, the painter and genius, been a Breton of peasant ancestry, one might have accepted without demur the undying remorse for the mysterious "crime" of his youth which haunts and makes a "lost" man of him. But in making him an Englishman of education (even a Cornishman, saturated with Celtic sympathies), Mr. Vachell fails to convince us that he would have renounced not only his art, but a girl to whom he had been absolutely true, because another whom he had persuaded to sit to him for the figure had fallen in love with him, and, as he believed, committed suicide in despair. This is not quite all the story, and, while human nature remains what it is, one need not dogmatise. We only say that the events of this book take place ten years later and exhibit his culminating penance and forgiveness for that pitiful maid's tragedy. Téphany Lane ("Bretonne Bretonnante," as she describes herself), Michael's girl-love who returns to help him in his distress, seems to us admirably felt throughout, while the repetition with variations of the older story, through which Clinton Carne receives his baptism of fire, something more than successfully eludes the difficulties that beset it. And Mr. Vachell scores a further success with several lifelike and sympathetic little sketches of subsidiary characters, both gentle and simple.

Out of Due Time. By MRS. WILFRID WARD. (Longmans, 6s.)

READERS of Mrs. Wilfrid Ward's "One poor Scruple" and "The Light Behind," will expect the good things of literature at her hands; and in her latest book, "Out of Due Time," they will not be disappointed of them. Here is the simple, direct style—the outcome of natural distinction under fine culture—the serene, benignant attitude towards matters of controversy; the loftiness of thought that marked her former work. The book is on a high plane; of love-making in the ordinary sense of the word there is practically none, though two sets of engaged couples occupy the centre of the stage. The period is the early 'eighties and the theme the never-ending conflict between old and new presentments of eternal verities; in other words between faith and reason, the Church and Science. The upshot of it all is a counsel of patience and an object-lesson in the danger of hasty, premature action. Paul, Comte d' Etranger, born and educated a Roman Catholic, passes through a stage of infidelity and re-embraces the faith from a purely intellectual point of view. His religion was not, as his sister puts it, one "that men should die in, a religion of the heart." He foresees the inevitable conflict between modern critical methods and ancient statement of Catholic doctrine and tries to force the hand of Rome in the direction of liberty. Rome does her best to save him, but he persists; and the result is his condemnation and immediate recantation of faith. He ultimately returns to the Church, having learnt the lesson of patience and humility, and ends as a Dominican. He is a genius of a rather inhumanly cold and lofty type, and it is a little difficult to believe in his dominant fascination for the other three characters, whose lives are all sacrificed in some measure to his. His sister Marcelle, a noble, lovable woman of jealous southern temperament, is a much more vivid and compelling person. Some of the minor characters are admirably drawn, notably Miss Mills, the Bishop and the nameless ecclesiastical personage who calls on Paul just before his condemnation. There are many wise, deep things of the soul in the book and in its spiritual atmosphere the worldliest reader must find himself calmed and uplifted. The language is throughout restrained and dignified, and the scene-painting, though perhaps a little grey in tone, always delightful. The Catholic reader, be he Roman or Anglican, will thank Mrs. Ward for graving more deeply in his heart the motto of her heroine in regard to the faith: "Loyal je serai durant ma vie."

Salted Almonds. By F. ANSTEY. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

IN a preface as delightful as any of the stories which go to the making of the volume, Mr. Anstey explains that the name of the first story is not the reason for the name of the book; but that the name is symbolic of the volume's contents. It is—exactly. In spite of Mr. Anstey's warning we ate them all greedily at one sitting, and found no ill-effects, so excellently salted were they and with such a perfect flavour. But perhaps it would have been advisable to take them, as he suggests, one by one; to cherish them. That has often been a matter of debate—of brief debate, we confess—in the eating of almonds; but in this case we can vindicate the hastiness of our temperament, by the knowledge that these stories, unlike almonds, which may alas! only be eaten once, can be enjoyed a second and a third time. They are all so good that it would be hard to make a choice: who, for instance, could choose between the story, "At a Moment's Notice," of a young man about town who loses his consciousness in a cab accident, on his way to lunch at a club in Pall Mall, "and as it is obvious that anything, even when lost, must be somewhere or other, his consciousness got mislaid for a while inside a monkey"—and the story of the staid solicitor who, by gazing into a snowstorm crystal in a toy shop, becomes transported to a castle, where a princess is at the mercy of a wicked guardian, and there slays the fearful dragon by offering him a "piece" thick with black-beetle polish, stuck at the end of his umbrella? And these stories are told by Mr. Anstey, which is as much as to say that they are told perfectly. Each one is a little masterpiece of construction and of fine writing. Study them for their workmanship, read them for their delicate ingenuity, or laugh over their neat wit and fund of humour; which ever way you are pleased to take them, they are an irresistible delight.

The Sphinx's Lawyer. By FRANK DANBY. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THE lady who writes under the name of Frank Danby produced some years ago a book called "Pigs in Clover," and discovered at a stroke her métier, which she is discreet enough not to abandon. The animals have been driven home by this time, and the atmosphere is redolent of the sty. One turns away from it instinctively with a gasp of disgust. The book is irredeemably vulgar: vulgar in design, vulgar in execution. It dabbles in depravity with a kind of luscious gusto, that is too second-rate even to be amusing. It tries to endow vice, which is weak at the knees, with a halo (an endeavour that would amuse, if it did not sicken by its perpetual obtrusiveness). And through all this unsavoury slush runs a purpose—in such bad taste that it would be incredible if it were not clearly stated in the dedicatory letter—to awaken pity for a man of genius, whose personality is thinly veiled under the name of Algernon Heseltine. This purpose might be merely ridiculous; circumstances make it offensive; and the treatment manages to be shocking, although it is beneath contempt.

THE DRAMA

MR. ARTHUR SYMONS'S MORALITY

SOME weeks ago I prophesied that Mr. Arthur Symons would explode my views about Morality plays. It is very seldom that a dramatic critic lives or lasts long enough to see his predictions fulfilled in so short a space of time. I do not know whether The Fool of the World brought the scent of mediæval hay over the footlights, but I have seldom been more moved. Mr. Symons has chosen to be deliberately modern in his presentation of time-worn symbols, so that the effect produced on the audience is precisely the same as a Morality must have produced on the more intelligent spectators of the middle ages. Death is no longer the bogey of Holbein's Dance; he has become a fool in motley. The Spade, The Coffin, and The Worm are still the hideous realities that they were to a less sophisticated generation, but they have attained through the verse of Mr. Symons a new psychological interest, just as the vulgar gods of Greece become for us new entities in the poetry of Mr. Sturge Moore. Mr. Symons was fortunate in obtaining the assistance of Miss Amy Sawyer for the dressing of his Morality, which I would have called a Mystery. The general level of merit displayed by his interpreters was remarkable, with the single exception of Mr. John Bate, who seemed quite unable to think of The Spade as a spade, and comported himself like a gawky artist's model.

The Fool of Miss Louise Salom evinced that literary appreciation of her part which I have so often remarked among amateur artists, and there is always a certain pleasure to me (pace Mr. Bernard Shaw) in seeing amateurs act, because of their enthusiasm and enjoyment.

It is particularly valuable in plays of this kind. Miss Salom can hardly be called, however, an amateur, owing to her wide experience in many difficult parts always sustained with admirable reserve. Although the words apportioned to Old Age seemed fewer than were given to Youth and Middle Age (and here I find fault with Mr. Symons in his symbolism), the part was rendered with marvellous skill by Mr. F. Stanley Smith, who by a paradox very common on the stage was the youngest of the performers. I have heard him compared, not inaptly, with the child actor, Salathiel Pavy, immortalised by Ben Jonson. Elizabethan experts will remember the pretty conceit by which Ben Jonson has explained his early loss. I hope that Mr. Stanley Smith may be seen and heard, not only in Elizabethan drama, in which he has already distinguished himself, but again in modern plays such as The Fool of the World, where the adequate rendering of small parts counts for so much. I cannot praise sufficiently the appearance of Mr. Hardy as the Coffin, though to say that he looked the part seems hardly a compliment, and I should be sued for libel if I said that pretty, talented Miss Millicent Murby resembled a Worm.

From this remarkable poem, which I hope may be published before long, I recall the following words, in order to give those who were not privileged to witness the performances some idea of its haunting magic:

All these praise me and kneel about my knees,
The Glories of the World bow down
When the bells chatter in my crown.
I am the Fool of the World, come follow,
As your hopes, are my bells hollow.

The production of Villiers de Lisle Adam's La Révolte on the same evening was not very satisfactory. To render the subtle character of Elizabeth was going beyond the capacity—I do not say of Miss Millicent Murby, but of any member of The New Stage Club. The play is rather like very dry champagne. On principle, you are very much impressed. As a literary duologue it is a great work of art, but it is not dramatic; it bored me when I saw it performed in French, and its interest from a stage point of view is archæological. The wonder is how Ibsen, if indebted to it at all, could have made these dry bones live.

It seems to me a great pity that the Stage Society should not amalgamate with the New Stage Club, The Literary Theatre Club and all the better dramatic societies. I am in favour of imperialism on the stage, if not elsewhere. The Illicit Theatres Limited would be a good name for the company. For the romantic symbolist and poetic drama they would obtain the services of that Cecil Rhodes of art, Mr. Charles Ricketts, and those Jameson raiders of poetry, Mr. Sturge Moore, Mr. Laurence Binyon and Mr. Arthur Symons. A powerful committee, consisting of two persons (with power to reduce their number), should decide as to plays and the committee would resign after each performance and not seek re-election, in order to be spared the pain of knowing what other members thought about them. The Stage Society, with its wealth and prestige, could be depended upon not to give us too much poetry and art for our money and would leaven the more romantic tastes of the other clubs. I have just written a morality play myself, prohibited by the County Council and the Censor, whom it satirises severely. It combines the poetry of Mr. Arthur Symons with the actuality of Brioux's Maternité and will satisfy, I hope, the aims and ambition of all these associations. The play will be performed at the Bijou Theatre, William Archer Street, Bayswater. Admission Free. No tickets are necessary, but every one must bring a copy of the ACADEMY of NEXT Saturday, and this will form the voucher, with date of performance. The play is entitled Every Householder, A Mystery, by

ROBERT ROSS.

FINE ART

STAATS FORBES AND OTHERS

How extensive was the late Mr. Staats Forbes's collection of pictures by modern French and Dutch artists is being gradually revealed to the public. When a selection from his acquisitions was exhibited at the Grafton Galleries last summer it was rumoured that more remained behind, but how much more we are only beginning to realise by the exhibitions of fresh works from this collection which keep opening in Bond Street and thereabouts. At the Leicester Galleries the exhibition of the Millet drawings has been succeeded by a selection from the paintings by Corot and others of the Barbizon group. Twenty-one paintings by Corot, representing all phases of the painter's art, from the very early Near Auvergne (18) with its precise, academic drawing, to such melting visions of his matured genius as The Lake (20), form the bulk of this exhibition, which also includes an interesting Marine (15), painted by Daubigny when he was obviously much under the influence of Courbet, two sumptuous little forest scenes (37 and 50) by Diaz, another Diaz-like forest scene (33) by Troyon and a glowing Monticelli (24), a masterpiece of tone and colour, with a lady's yellow dress miraculously contrasted against light foliage.

At Messrs. Hollander and Cremetti's galleries, 30 Old Bond Street, is another fascinating selection from Mr. Staats Forbes's modern French and Dutch pictures, also containing many works which were not shown at the Grafton Galleries, as well as some of the gems from that collection. Here is the early and almost commonplace Monticelli, A Lady Reading (30), painted during the artist's brief enjoyment of popularity and Court favour, and here also is one of the magical kaleidoscopes of jewelled colour, The Garden Party (70), which it was necessary for genius to starve in order to achieve. Here, too, is Rousseau's complete though unfinished Forest Scene (59), with the strongly drawn trees merely outlined on a golden brown ground—an admirable example for the student to study; and here, in addition to many other paintings by Rousseau's companions, is a whole gallery filled with water-colours and drawings by other French and Dutch artists. Of the former the most conspicuous, perhaps, are the contributions of Isabey, whose water-colours are apt to be more thoroughly satisfying than his oils; while among the latter Mesdag is represented by breezy seascapes, Boshoom by his inimitable church interiors, and J. Maris by The Little Artist (13), masterly in modelling, free in brush-work, and charming in sentiment.

Corot, Jacque and others of the Barbizon group figure largely in the exhibition with which Messrs. Arthur Tooth and Sons have opened their new galleries at 175-6 New Bond Street. But the gem of this collection is the magnificent early Mathew Maris, The Girl at the Well (23), as flawless in expressive drawing as it is soothing in harmonious colour. A portrait of a peasant boy, Pas Mèche (30), by Bastien-Lepage, curiously reminds one of Mr. Stanhope Forbes, while M. Lhermitte's more richly painted Harvesters (43) prepares one for the delightful collection of his pastels and drawings exhibited in the splendidly lighted gallery on the next floor. Though taking for his subjects scenes so akin as to be nearly identical with those chosen by Millet, M. Lhermitte never degenerates into a mere imitator, and, while he stamps each work with his own artistic personality, his renderings are so faithful to nature that they could only confirm Keats in his conviction that Beauty and Truth are one.

RECENT ACQUISITIONS IN THE SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM

THE Museum has recently purchased a pair of candlesticks of cast brass of the seventeenth century, decorated with floral designs on a black and white ground. They have very large circular plates between the stems and the bases, which seem to have been a characteristic feature of the period. There are two plain candlesticks of brass of this type in the Museum, and in the Kremlin at Moscow there is a very large specimen in hammered silver-gilt bearing the English hall-mark for 1663-4. These candlesticks are exhibited with the other English enamelled objects in the Prince Consort's Gallery.

In two of the cases opposite the Leighton fresco of the Arts of Peace is a small collection of drawings in black and white by G. J. Pinwell and J. W. North, A.R.A.; they were prepared for the most part to illustrate the "Poems by Jean Ingelow," published by Messrs. Longmans in 1867. With them is shown a very interesting pen-and-pencil drawing by T. White of Pinwell himself at work; it is dated 1862.

In an adjoining case are some wood blocks upon which F. Walker, G. Du Maurier, Miss Edwards, Linley Sambourne and H. Furniss have drawn, but which have in some cases never been engraved. No print from the large cut block by Pinwell was ever published.

Five cases near the door of the Art Library contain a large collection of illustrated printed books on architecture, chiefly of the sixteenth century.

In the Architectural Court is the recently-acquired cast of the bronze monument of Archbishop Ernst of Magdeburg (1464-1513), executed by Peter Vischer in 1497, six years before the prelate's death.

Some important additions have been made to the collections of architectural details in carved stone, through the generosity of Mr. J. H. Fitzhenry, who has presented four examples of French origin dating from the time of Francis I. (1515-1547). They are exhibited at the north-west corner of the North Court. The most striking of them is a complete dormer window, standing some twenty feet high, from the Château de Montal, a ruined manor house situated on the high ground overlooking Saint Céré in the Department of Lot. This château was built for Jehane de Belsac, dame de Montal, and was begun in 1523; it is thus contemporaneous with the better known edifices at Blois and Chambord.

It was from one of these dormer windows, perhaps from this very one, that, as the story goes, Rose de Montal, forsaken by her lover, Roger de Castelnau, flung herself with the cry "Plus d'espoir," a motto which is engraved on the pediment of the window now in the Museum. The sculptured ornament includes a beautiful frieze of scrolls, demi-figures and amorini disposed symmetrically on either side of a central cartouche; on the pediment, besides the inscription, are two projecting busts and the figure of a headless warrior holding his skull in his hand. The arms of Montal and Balsac are carved below.

Next to it is the upper part of a similar dormer window evidently dating from the same period, as the crowned salamander in flames, which forms so striking a piece of ornament on this pediment, was a favourite device of Francis I.

Below is placed a portion of an arch-soffit from the Château de Bonnavat, situated some twenty miles from Poitiers, and built by Guillaume de Gouffier, Amiral de Bonnavat, a favourite of the same king.

The fourth example is a canopy for a statuette formerly in the church of St. Etienne du Mont at Paris. It is composed of delicate Renaissance work, betraying in its disposition traces of the Gothic style which even at that period were still apparent in French architecture. It is enriched with beautifully modelled figures, scrolls and shields of arms. Replicas of these shields may still be seen on the tall columns and brackets at the back of the high altar of St. Etienne.

We give these details, which have been officially communicated, in full, because it is only a week ago that we made a complaint of the lack of such news as they supply. We are still convinced of the need of a "Bulletin" dealing with all the public museums and art galleries in London and the provinces.

MUSIC

THE OXFORD HISTORY OF MUSIC—VI

WITH the development of the sonata in its completeness as exemplified in the works of Beethoven, the technique of composition arrived at maturity in all directions, for the principles which underlay the structure of this form were found to be of wider application, and the laws of balance and contrast first discovered in connection with pure instrumental music became to some extent the basis of all musical utterance from the operas of Weber to the songs of Schubert. For the future, composers, whether they elected to write in accordance with the formal precedent of Beethoven, as did Mendelssohn, or whether they set before themselves other ideals, as did Berlioz and Liszt, could not choose but build upon his foundation, in so far as purely structural considerations influenced them. In the next generation, individuality had, except in a few rare instances, to find its expression in some other direction than the formal one, and this may perhaps be taken as the strictly musical cause of the Romantic Movement. But Mr. Dannreuther shows in this volume that its main cause was the influence of contemporary thought in literature, reacting on the art of music, which was now for the first time fully susceptible to such influences through having just attained to a perfection of technique. Two hundred years previously the Italian renaissance in art and literature had had so potent an effect upon music as to revolutionise its technique, but, owing to the narrow limits of sixteenth-century music, it could do no more. Now, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, this new movement found in music a soil prepared for its seed, one which should yield a manifold fruitage. Or, as Mr. Dannreuther puts it:

Romantic music is, in some sense, an off-shoot of literature; a reflex of poetry expressed in musical terms; a kind of impressionism which tends to reject formality, and aims at a direct rendering of its object; a desire to produce musical effects suggested by natural phenomena; an art, eager, sensitive, impulsive, which seeks its ideal of beauty through emotional expression.

Mr. Dannreuther is careful to point out that this romanticism was by no means new in the nineteenth century, and he quotes instances of it in the works of such early writers as Buxtehude and J. S. Bach. Beethoven was himself the greatest of "romanticists," and his later contemporaries, Schubert and Spohr for example, are hard to classify, so strongly is the romantic movement prefigured in their works of classical form. But it was with the second quarter of the nineteenth century that this influence from without overspread the whole art of music, and, even where its acceptance did not supersede the established principles of form, it became of such paramount importance as to modify those principles and often to obscure their presence.

Mr. Dannreuther has followed the plan of volumes iii. and iv., and has treated the various forms of music, opera, symphony, piano music, song, etc., separately; examining the influence of the poetic ideal with regard to each of them. In no case was this so beneficial as with opera, which of all forms requires the greatest elasticity of musical treatment, and more than any other had been bound by the shackles of convention. With Der Freischütz Weber inaugurated the new era by attempting and attaining an appropriateness in the music to the action and character, as well as what one may call musical scenic effects, which were closer and more consistent than anything hitherto achieved; and from this point onwards through the operas of Marschner and Schumann, until this movement found its eventual realisation in the romantic operas of Wagner, the story is carefully and sympathetically told. It is, in fact, his sympathy which makes Mr. Dannreuther's volume so successful. His task was infinitely more difficult than that of the earlier writers, since a great mass of the work he had to deal with is even now a matter of controversy, and its ultimate position in the history of music is not wholly determined. This is particularly so with orchestral music, which was influenced by the romantic movement to such widely different ends as the overtures and symphonies of Mendelssohn and the symphonic poems of Liszt or the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Berlioz. He draws a distinct line, and the distinction is a useful one, between music which, like the first-named works, seeks to "express the prevailing emotion, the mood of some particular poem or story, or of some particular aspect of nature," and "programme" music, which, connecting certain phrases with definite facts, is only intelligible through a knowledge of the "programme," as is the case with Liszt and Berlioz and certain later writers, whose works do not fall within the range of the romantic movement. The first is beautifully exemplified by Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture, which is evolved on purely musical lines despite its pictorial significance; the latter receives very full demonstration in a special chapter, in which Liszt and Berlioz are weighed in the balances. Though he calls programme music a "curious hybrid," "music posing as an unsatisfactory kind of poetry," Mr. Dannreuther's ardent sympathy with all artistic effort has saved him from onesidedness in this chapter, and throughout he is ready to do ample justice to the genius of both; but his closing words show what is his position with regard to the tendencies which their work embodies, and it is a position still worthy of consideration.

No doubt Liszt sincerely believed in the symbolical efficiency of his representative themes as Berlioz believed in the dramatic significance of "L'Idee fixe" and "La Mélodie caractéristique." Both the great illustrators were convinced that a close union of instrumental music and poetry is possible and desirable. Both masters may have erred in their method: and programme music, as they conceived it, may in the end prove to have been a dubious hybrid of insufficient vitality.

The short chapter on oratorios and cantatas rather chronicles the production of various works than offers any new criticism upon them. Of Mendelssohn's many works of this kind it would be well-nigh impossible to add any new comment, and Schumann's choral works were very unequal. "The huge posthumous publication entitled 'Scenen aus Goethe's Faust' is, in fact, a mere conglomeration, having no more real coherence than can be claimed for its rival, Berlioz's 'Damnation de Faust.'" More illuminating is Mr. Dannreuther's treatment of religious music in the following chapter, in which again Liszt and Berlioz become the two most prominent figures. The effect of romanticism upon church music, or at any rate upon music written to the words of the Catholic liturgy (not quite the same thing), was described by Liszt in a letter to the Gazette Musicale (1834):

For want of a better term we may call the new music Humanitarian. It must be devotional, strong, and drastic, uniting—on a colossal scale—the theatre and the Church, dramatic and sacred, superb and simple, fiery and free, stormy and calm, translucent and emotional.

It will occur [to most readers that of these pairs of epithets only one in each is generally applicable to the church music of Liszt and Berlioz; it is dramatic rather than sacred, and more stormy and emotional than calm and translucent. In discussing the "Requiem" of Berlioz, a short excerpt from the score is here quoted which shows his use of no less than eight pairs of kettle-drums and brass in proportion. Liszt's oratorio—"St. Elizabeth"—a work unknown in this country, is described as "something like an opera sacra," and neither it nor his "Christus" appear to shed any fresh light upon the hitherto unsolved problem of the oratorio form, though the descriptions and quotations are of great interest.

It was in piano music and in solo song that the best and most characteristic work of the romantic movement was done, for in song its very essence is that the music should reflect as nearly as possible the poetic idea and colour of the words, and in piano music the application of these ideas proved able to produce specially appropriate and distinctive musical forms, of which the characteristic pieces of Schumann and the elaborated dance forms of Chopin exhibit an almost endless variety. With this phase of the movement Mr. Dannreuther has dealt with special success, as might be expected, since here he united with his musicianship the special knowledge of the pianist.

With a summary of the work of lesser men, including a notice of the Russian school, and a very generous tribute to the two Wesleys of English fame, the Oxford History of Music is for the present brought to a close; but as one closes this, the latest volume, one feels that it is not the last. No attempt has been made to bring it up to date. The fact that Brahms has only received incidental mention has been commented on as a "curious omission," and it is certainly proof positive of incompleteness. But Brahms holds a unique position; his music, though romantic in the best sense, is governed by deeper principles than those which actuated the enthusiasts with whose names this movement is most intimately connected. In the music of the present day one sees, or seems to see, almost as many new movements beginning as there are earnest-minded composers. Their name is legion. How many of these will prove worthy of what permanent record a work such as this gives it is at present impossible to say, but it is no rash prophecy to predict that a future volume of the "Oxford History of Music" will have to deal with a great school of composers who honour Brahms as their founder, and whose history begins with that of his work.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE Cambridge Press has ready an addition to its series of facsimiles of rare books printed in England in the fifteenth century. The book reproduced is the only copy known to exist of Wynkyn de Worde's edition of Lydgate's "Assemble of Goddes" printed at Westminster about the year 1500, and the reproduction in photogravure is from photographs taken in the University Library at Cambridge. The Press is also issuing almost immediately the second volume of Dr. A. W. Ward's edition of "Crabbe's Poems" and the third volume of the Cambridge "Beaumont and Fletcher."

Publication of the great variorum edition of the Septuagint which the Cambridge Press has had in preparation since 1883, begins next week with the issue of vol. i., Part I., containing Genesis. As in the smaller Cambridge edition already published—Dr. Swete's Old Testament in Greek—the text is that of Codex Vaticanus, but the variations given, which in the smaller edition were confined to a few of the most important uncial codices, extend to all the uncial manuscripts, to select cursive manuscripts, to the more important versions, and to the quotations of the earlier ecclesiastical writers. The work has necessarily been the labour of many years, and its object is to present clearly and fully the evidence available for the reconstruction of the text or texts of the Septuagint.

Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. announce that Mrs. Humphry Ward's new novel, "Fenwick's Career," will be published on May 3, with four illustrations by Albert Sterner. Westmoreland, London, and Paris, the art-world of thirty years ago, and the rise and decline of a painter, form the subject of the book.—Early in May the same firm will publish "Wesley and His Century: A Study in Spiritual Forces," by the Rev. W. H. Fitchett, B.A., LL.D., with a photogravure frontispiece from the portrait of John Wesley by George Romney, and four facsimiles.—On May 3 will appear "From a College Window," by Arthur Christopher Benson, and "A Vision of India," by Sidney Low, will be published shortly, with twenty full-page illustrations. This book is in no sense a reprint of Mr. Sidney Low's letters to The Standard, describing the Indian tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales. It treats, inter alia, of such topics as Indian society, the present position of the Anglo-Indian, the Indian towns, the new sahib, industrial India, in camp with a district officer, and the Rajah.

The Oxford University Press announces for shortly after Whitsuntide a publication of some interest: "The English Hymnal," a new hymn-book for use in the Church of England as a companion to the Book of Common Prayer. Some of its special features are as follows: The inclusion of a large number of hymns not in other books, and the exclusion of feeble hymns or hymns that are never sung; the printing of hymns as their authors wrote them, the names of authors and translators being given at the head of each hymn, and the composer, name and measure at the head of each tune; hymns for special seasons, for Holy Communion and for the Commemoration of the Departed; Office Hymns for both morning and evening for all days in the Prayer Book Kalendar. New translations have been made where necessary. Processions and Litanies arranged as definite acts of worship. Introits, graduals, etc., for the year, with special devotions, such as the Reproaches and the Story of the Cross. Hymns for Men's Meetings, Mission Services, etc. A Table of Simple Hymns suitable for occasions when there is no choir. A Table of Hymns suggested for Sundays and Holy Days throughout the year to assist in the choice of hymns. The Editorial Committee consists of Messrs. W. J. Birkbeck, Percy Dearmer, A. Hanbury-Tracy, T. A. Lacy, D. C. Lathbury, and Athelstan Riley. There will be 744 hymns divided into twelve parts, and the book will be published in three editions; one music edition at 3s. net; two editions with words only, 24mo., 1s. net, and 32mo., 2d. net. Prospectus, specimen copies and full particulars may be obtained of the publisher, Mr. Henry Frowde.

Admirers of Mr. J. C. Snaith's recent novel, "Broke of Covenden," will welcome a new book from his pen, entitled "Henry Northcote," which will be published on Monday next, April 23. The book has for its hero a poor but rising young barrister, who after long waiting for briefs, at last dramatically seizes his opportunity. Messrs. Constable and Co. are the publishers.

The same publishers will also issue immediately "The Evasion," by Miss E. B. Frothingham. The scene is laid in America, and the book deals with two young men in love with the same girl. Bridge, motoring, and week-end house-parties are their principal entertainments.

On April 23 Mr. George Allen will publish "A Plea for Church Schools," by Hakluyt Egerton. This pamphlet is intended to explain why Churchmen claim, as a civic right, unpenalised opportunity to give Church teaching to Church children, as part of the national system of elementary education; and, also, why they cannot be content with the State-establishment of "Undenominationalism" or "Fundamental Christianity."

Maurus Jokai's famous Russian story, "The Green Book, or Freedom Under the Snow," forms a first volume in a cheap re-issue of famous works by European novelists, which Messrs. Jarrold and Sons are projecting. Each volume in the series will have a cameo portrait of the author on cover, and a photogravure frontispiece.—The same firm will publish shortly "Murray of the Scots Greys," an eighteenth-century romance by Mr. Laurence Clarke, dealing with the adventures of the notorious Lord Berkley, who once wrote a letter to George the First, offering to kidnap his son, the Prince of Wales, with whom the king had quarrelled, and ship him, a prisoner, to America. The hero of the novel is a young officer in the Scots Greys.

Messrs. Sisleys Ltd. announce that their new series of Classics de Luxe—the Panel-Books—will be ready on May 1. It is claimed that these dainty and richly embellished volumes recall the delightful editions of the eighteenth century and the aim of the publishers is to issue mainly those classics which have not been greatly reprinted in recent years. Goldsmith's "Life of Beau Nash," Le Sage's "Devil on Two Sticks," "The Memoirs of Count Grammont" and "Decisive Battles of the World" are included in the first set.

Messrs. Blackwood have a Browning volume nearly ready for publication, the subject of which is not likely to awaken such pleasant anticipations as did the announcements of the books relating to the poet which have already been published this year. When the comments of Carlyle, Tennyson and others concerning "Sordello" are recalled, it takes some courage to undertake "An Exposition of Browning's Sordello." The work of the audacious writer, David Duff, B.D., "consists of a full paraphrase of the poem, with synopses of the different sections, side-notes, and notes on historical and literary references."

The disturbed condition of Natal will cause numerous readers of fiction to return with interest to Mr. Rider Haggard's stories in which that country and its native races are depicted. In "Nada the Lily" and "Allan Quatermain" the author is on his favourite ground. Not only does he give vivid descriptions of the country, and the racial characteristics of its people, but embodies these in interesting and dramatic stories. Sixpenny reprints of both of them are published by Messrs. George Newnes, Ltd.

Dr. Jamieson Hurry, of Reading, the author of an exhaustive history of Reading Abbey, is about to publish through Mr. Elliot Stock a new and smaller work, entitled "The Rise and Fall of Reading Abbey." It will take a narrative form, but will give extracts from ancient documents, illustrations of seals, coins, charters, plans, as well as many illustrations of the building and its surroundings.

The late Mr. Thomas W. Shore, author of the "History of Hampshire," left behind him the manuscript of an exhaustive work on the "Origin of the Anglo-Saxon Race," to which he had devoted a great part of his life. It deals principally with the vexed question of the settlement of England and the Tribal origin of the Old English people. The work will be edited by his two sons, and will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock very shortly.

CORRESPONDENCE

AUTHORS' MISTAKES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—You ask instances of authors' errors. In "The Antiquary" where Sir Arthur and Miss Wardour are overtaken by the tide at the foot of cliffs on the East Coast of Scotland, Sir Walter Scott describes the sun setting in the ocean, i.e., the east.

W. P.

April 15.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I notice in this week's ACADEMY, that you ask for examples of mistakes made by authors. The following is a good, though perhaps not very obvious example of an anachronism.

In Grillparzer's Sappho, Act I., scene iii., occur the following lines, in which Phaon describes the impression that Sappho's verse made upon him:

Jetzt kam der Tag für des Gesanges Kämpfe
Alkaios sang, Anakreon—umsonst!
Sie konnten meiner Sinne Band nicht lösen.

Now Alcaeus lived from about 611 to 580 B.C., while Anakreon flourished about 530 B.C.

It is true that the exact dates of the birth and death of these early Greek lyric poets are uncertain, but it seems fairly obvious that Alcaeus and Anakreon could not have competed together as the dramatist depicts.

As I only possess the plain text of the play, I have been unable to ascertain what view the editors take of this passage.

P. P. SELVER.

April 17.

AUTHOR WANTED

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall be grateful if you or one of your readers will be so kind as to answer the following inquiry.

In October 1872, I was present at a Reading given by the late Mr. J. C. M. Bellew at the Pavilion at Brighton. One of the pieces read was a poem called, I think, "The Captive Knight." The story of it was that a crusader knight, who had been taken prisoner by the Saracens and confined in a castle, heard in the distance the notes of a trumpet of his comrades. His hopes of a rescue were aroused and became stronger as the trumpet sounded nearer and nearer, but they were dashed and ultimately destroyed by the receding and final disappearance of the sound. The poem expressed the feelings of the Knight, that he was supposed to be the speaker. The charm of the reading was greatly increased by a trumpet accompaniment.

For long I thought that the author of the poem was Mrs. Hemans, but I have lately searched her works once or twice and cannot find it. Will you kindly help me?

J. W. C.

Reading, April 14.

"PARADISE LOST" IN RUSSIA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your reference to Mr. Maurice Baring's statement of the fondness of the Russian peasant for "Paradise Lost," reminds me that some months ago a correspondent of one of the papers (was it Mr. Baring?) mentioned he had discovered this in a journey with the Russian troops to Manchuria. He also added that there were several translations in the Russian language. It certainly strikes an Englishman as remarkable. Could not one of your Russian readers oblige us with some information on this interesting subject?

H. D. BARCLAY.

April 16.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

The Highlands and Islands of Scotland. Painted by W. Smith, Jr.; described by A. R. Hope Moncreiff. 9 × 6½. Pp. 232. Black, 10s. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Elizabeth Montagu, the Queen of the Blue-Stockings. Her Correspondence from 1720 to 1761. By her Great-Great-Niece, Emily J. Climeson. With illustrations. 2 vols. 9 × 5½. Pp. 601. Murray, 36s. net.

Cestre, Charles. John Thelwall. A Pioneer of Democracy and Social Reform in England during the French Revolution. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 204. Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.

[Dr. Cestre sees Thelwall as "a representative of obscure mental tendencies in England . . . suddenly brought from potentiality into act . . . by the shock of the French Revolution."] Cartellieri, Dr. Alexander. Philipp II. August König von Frankreich. Band II. Der Kreuzzug (1187-1191) mit vier Stammtafeln. 9½ × 5½. Pp. xxxi, 360, and the four genealogical tables. Leipzig: Dyksche Buchhandlung. Paris: Le Soudier. n.p.

[The Second Volume of Dr. Cartellieri's great work. Bibliography and Index.] Little Flowers of a Childhood: the record of a child. 8 × 5½. Pp. xv, 167. Moring, 3s. 6d. net.

[The record of a boy who died at the age of four. With Portraits.]

EDUCATION.

Eggar, W. D. A Manual of Geometry. 7½ × 5½. Pp. xxiii, 325. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.

[The author has rearranged the subject-matter of his "Practical Exercises in Geometry" in accordance with the Cambridge Schedule for the Previous Examination, and introduced the theorems along with the practical work.]

Board of Education. Report for the year 1904 on the Victoria and Albert Museum, the Royal Colleges of Science and of Art, the Geographical Survey and Museum, and on the work of the Solar Physics Committee. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 128. H.M. Stationery Office, 1s. 4d.

The Royal University of Ireland. Examination Papers: a supplement to the University Calendar for the year 1906. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 788. Dublin: University Press. n.p.

Peaker, Fredk. British Citizenship: its rights and its duties. With a preface by Sir John Lawson Walton, Attorney-General. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 159. Ralph, Holland, 2s.

[Mr. Peaker's object is to raise the standard of popular knowledge of public affairs. His book is in four divisions: The Legislature; Executive Government; The Judiciary; Local Government: with a chronology of constitutional history and an Index. His handling of the subjects is brief, clear and complete.]

Fiedler, H. G., and Sandbach, F. E. A First German Reader for Science Students, comprising a Reader and Outline of Grammar with diagrams and vocabulary. 9 × 6. Pp. x, 99. Moring, 2s. 6d. net.

FICTION.

Anstey, F. Salted Almonds. 7½ × 5½. Pp. vi, 312. Smith, Elder, 6s. (See p. 381.)

Vachell, Horace Annesley. The Face of Clay. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 363. Murray, 6s. (See p. 381.)

McCarthy, Justin Huntly. The Flower of France. 8 × 5½. Pp. 323. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Hill, Headon. The Avenger. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 320. Ward, Lock, 6s.

Read, Opie. Old Lim Jucklin. The Opinions of an open-air Philosopher. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 262. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Wister, Owen. Lady Baltimore. With Illustrations by Vernon Howe Bailey and Lester Ralph. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 406. Macmillan, 6s.

Triana, S. Perez. Tales to Sonny. With four illustrations by Dorothy Furniss. 5½ × 4½. Pp. 72. Treherne, 1s. net.

- Holland, Rupert Sargent. The Count at Harvard. Being an Account of the Adventures of a Young Gentleman of Fashion at Harvard University. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Boston: Page, $1.50.
- Sigerson, Dora. The Story and Song of Black Roderick. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 82. Moring, 3s. 6d. net.
- [Contains some of Mrs. Clement Shorter's beautiful lyrics.]
- Rean, Amy. The Best Beloved and other Allegories. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 61. Fifield, 1s. net.

HISTORY.

- The Cambridge Modern History*. Planned by the late Lord Acton. Edited by A. W. Ward, G. W. Prothero, Stanley Leathes. Vol. ix. Napoleon. 9½ x 7. Pp. xxviii, 946. Cambridge University Press, 16s. net.
- [The Consulate, by George Pariset. The Armed Neutrality, 1780-1801, by I. A. Walker and H. W. Wilson. The Pacification of Europe and France and her Tributaries, 1801-3, by Anton Guillaud. France under the Empire, 1804-14, by Professor Pariset. The Codes, by H. A. L. Fisher. The Concordats, by L. G. Wickham-Legg. The Command of the Sea, 1803-15, by H. W. Wilson. The Third Coalition, by Colonel E. M. Lloyd. The Napoleonic Empire at its height, 1807-9, by J. Holland Rose. The War of 1809, by August Keim. The Continental System, 1809-14, by J. Holland Rose. The French Dependencies and Switzerland, 1800-14, by H. A. L. Fisher and Professor Guillaud. The Peninsular War, 1808-14, by C. W. C. Oman. Russia under Alexander I., and the Invasion of 1812, by Eugen Stschepkin. The War of Liberation, 1813-4, by Julius von Pfugk-Harttung. The First Restoration, 1814-15, by H. A. L. Fisher. The Congress of Vienna, I., 1814-15, and II., 1815, by A. W. Ward. The Hundred Days, 1815, by Professor Oman. Great Britain and Ireland, 1792-1815, by G. P. Gooch. The British Empire, 1783-1815, by W. H. Hutton and H. E. Egerton. St. Helena, by H. A. L. Fisher. Bibliographies and Index.]
- Ancient Records of Egypt. Historical Documents from the earliest times to the Persian Conquest, collected, edited and translated with commentary by James Henry Breasted, Ph.D. Vol. ii. The Eighteenth Dynasty. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xxviii, 428. Chicago: University Press. London: Luzac, $3.00.

[For vol. i. see the ACADEMY, March 3, 1906, p. 213.]

LITERATURE.

- Dalbiac, Lilian. Dictionary of Quotations (German). With authors' and subjects' indexes. 8½ x 6. Pp. vi, 485. Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.
- [Each quotation is translated, the translation being taken from "the best existing sources."]
- Lollée, Frédéric. A Short History of Comparative Literature from the earliest times to the present day. Translated by Mr. Douglas Power. 8½ x 6. Pp. xii, 381. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.
- [M. Lollée's book appears here in an English dress, which, so far as we have tested it, seems to be creditably carried out. Of the book itself we shall have more to say.]
- The Madonna of the Poets*. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 126, xix. Burns & Oates, 2s. 6d. net. (See p. 374.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Van Dyke, Henry. Fisherman's Luck, and some other uncertain things illustrated, 7½ x 5½. Pp. 285. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- [Twelve sketches, mainly concerning fishing. American. Index.]
- The Century Magazine*. Vol. lxxi.—November 1905-April 1906. 10 x 7. Pp. 978. Macmillan, 10s. 6d.
- St. Nicholas*: an illustrated magazine for Young Folks. Vol. xxxiii. November 1905-April 1906. 9½ x 7½. Pp. 576. Macmillan, 6s.
- Twenty Years' Railway Statistics, 1886-1906*. 6½ x 3½. Pp. 208. Mathieson, 1s.
- List of Works on the Tariffs of Foreign Countries*. Compiled under the direction of Appleton Prentiss Clark Griffin. 10 x 7½. Pp. 42. Library of Congress. Washington: Government Printing Office. n.p.
- [A briefly annotated catalogue of the books on this subject in the Library of Congress. General; Continental Tariff Union; France; Germany; Switzerland; Italy; Russia; Canada.]
- Magnússon, Eiríkr. Notes on Shipbuilding and nautical terms of old in the North. A paper read before the Viking Club Society for Northern Research. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 62. Moring, 1s. net.
- [Includes a glossarial Index.]
- Platt, William. London and Londoners, a book without statistics. 7½ x 5. Pp. 92. Simpkin, Marshall, paper 1s. net, cloth 2s. net.
- [Aims at giving "a really vivid and faithful picture of this London of ours, and the chief characteristics of the Londoners who inhabit it."]
- Gonner, E. C. K. Interest and Saving. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xv, 172. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.
- [The normal and necessary existence of interest in society as it is, is briefly treated, and the main aim of the two essays is an analysis of the connection between interest and the process of saving whereby wealth is accumulated and capital supplied.]
- The Case for further Strand Improvement, 1906*. Edited by Mark H. Judge. 10½ x 7½. Pp. 30. Williams & Norgate, n.p.
- [The memorials to the County Council, reports of meetings, etc., and a list of members, of the Further Strand Improvement Committee, which has been formed to "promote a revision of the planning of the Strand so that the roadway may have its natural course direct to and from the Courts of Justice." With illustrations and plans.]

PHILOSOPHY.

- Craig, Wm. Y., formerly M.P. for North Staffordshire. An Essay on Man and Christian Civilisation. 7½ x 5½. Pp. viii, 237. Constable, 5s. net.

POETRY.

- Cranmer-Blyng, L. An English Rose. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 48. Elkin Mathews, paper 1s. net, cloth 1s. 6d. net.
- [Forty Sonnets and a few "Dialogues with Sa'di" by a writer who is well known for his work on Mr. Murray's "Wisdom of the East" series, besides his own "Odes to Confucius" and other works.]
- Gurdon, John. Dramatic Lyrics. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 101. Elkin Mathews, 3s. 6d. net.
- [The influence of Swinburne and Rossetti is very clear; but Mr. Gurdon has strength enough of his own to be no mere imitator. His verses show a rich and full music.]

POLITICAL.

- Lord Curzon in India*, being a Selection from his speeches as Viceroy and Governor-General of India, 1898-1905. With a portrait, explanatory notes and an Index, and with an Introduction by Sir Thomas Raleigh, K.C.S., Legal Member of the Governor-General's Council, 1899-1904. 9 x 6. Pp. lii, 597. Macmillan, 12s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Robinson Crusoe*, by Daniel Defoe. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 597. Nelson, 6d. net.
- Bohn's Standard Library. A View of the English Stage, or a series of dramatic criticisms by William Hazlitt. Edited by W. Spencer Jackson. 7½ x 5. Pp. xxiv, 358. Bell, 3s. 6d.
- [Mr. Jackson gives a brief introduction and there is a good index. He has compared the edition of 1818, of which this is a reprint, with the original newspaper articles, and supplied with brackets what was omitted.]
- Pierce the Ploughmans Crede* (about 1394, A.D.), transcribed and edited from MS. Trin. Coll., Cam., R. 3. 15, collated with MS. Bibl. Reg. 18. B. xvii in the British Museum, and with the old printed text of 1553. Edited by the Rev. Walter W. Skeat. 6½ x 4½. Pp. xxii, 73. Clarendon Press, 2s.
- The Christ in Shakespeare*. Shakespeare and the Bible. Shakespeare. A Reading from the Merchant of Venice. Shakespeareana. Sonnets with the Scriptural Harmonies. Interpreted by Charles Ellis. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 288. London: Bethnal Green Free Library, 2s. 6d.
- [This book was issued by Houlston and Sons in 1897, and some of it at least was published by Bagster in 1896. It consists mainly of excerpts from Shakespeare with parallel or similar passages from the Bible printed on the opposite page; many pages of Shakespeareana, original verses by the author, and the critical opinions of others occur in different parts of the book.]
- Nelson's New Century Library. The Count of Monte Cristo, by A. Dumas. In two vols. Pp. 1461. The Breakfast Table Series. By O. W. Holmes. The Autocrat of the Breakfast-table; The Professor at the Breakfast-table; The Poet at the Breakfast-table. In one vol. Pp. 810. Each 6½ x 4½. Nelson, leather 2s. 6d. net, cloth 2s. net per vol.
- [India Paper; large type.]
- Seeley's Miniature Portfolio Monographs. Gainsborough, by Sir Walter Armstrong. Pp. xi, 222, with 32 plates. The New Forest, by C. J. Cornish. Pp. xii, 222, with 32 plates. Each 6½ x 4. Seeley, 2s. net each.
- The Simple Life Series. Salt, H. S. Richard Jefferies, his life and his ideals. Pp. vi, 119. Crosby, Ernest. Tolstoy and his message. Pp. 93. Each 7 x 4½. Fifield, each 6d. net.

SCIENCE.

- Klages, Edward A. On the syntomid moths of Southern Venezuela, collected in 1898-1900. Pp. 22. MacGillivray, Alexander Dyer. A Study of the wings of the Tenthredinoidea, a superfamily of Hymenoptera. Pp. 86 and 24 plates. Schaus, William. Description of new South American moths. Pp. 57. Each 9½ x 6½. Washington: Government Printing Office. n.p. [From the Proceedings of the United States National Museum.]

THEOLOGY.

- Sabatier, Paul. Disestablishment in France. 7½ x 5. Pp. 173. Unwin 3s. 6d. net.
- [With a preface by the translator, Robert Dell, and the French-English text of the Separation Law, with notes.]
- Lindsay, Thomas M. A History of the Reformation. In two volumes. Vol. i. The Reformation in Germany from its beginning to the religious peace of Augsburg. 8½ x 6½. Pp. xvi, 528. Edinburgh: Clark. International Theological Library. 12s.
- [Principal Lindsay's object is to describe "a great religious movement and its social environment." Book I. deals with the social, religious and intellectual life of the age which gave birth to the Reformation. Book II. starts off with Luther. Volume ii. will deal with the Reformation beyond Germany, with Anabaptism, etc., and with the Counter-Reformation. Chronological Summary and Index.]
- Curtis, Olin Alfred. The Christian Faith, personally given in a system of doctrine. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xi, 541. Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.
- [Mr. Curtis is Professor of Systematic Theology in the New Theological Seminary, Madison, U.S.A. He "believes he has caught an important vision of the Christian faith as an organic whole of doctrine." The main clue to his "peculiarities of view and method" is the idea that "every man is a responsible moral person; but no man is complete in himself—he is made to be a fragment of an entire race."]
- Forrest, David W. The Authority of Christ. 8½ x 6½. Pp. xvii, 431. Edinburgh: Clark, 6s.
- [Dr. Forrest's chief aim is a practical one: to set forth what he conceives to be the true nature of Christ's Authority over us in all that relates to our religious belief and personal conduct.]
- Jastrow, Morris, junior. Die Religion Babylonien und Assyriens. Vom Verfasser revidierte und wesentlich erweiterte Uebersetzung. 9 Lieferung. 9½ x 6½ (contains pp. 81-160). Giessen: Töpelmann; London: Williams & Norgate, M. 1. 50.
- Literary Illustrations of the Bible. Edited by James Moffat, D.D. The Books of Judges and Ruth. 5½ x 4½. Pp. 144. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. 6d. net.
- [Dr. Moffat's plan is to set down passages of verse or prose in which the words of the Bible have been used or applied in a forcible or notable manner; and passages which develop aptly and freshly not the words but the idea of a Biblical verse.]
- The Church and the Commonwealth*: the visitation charges of the Rt. Rev. George Ridding, D.D., first Bishop of Southwell. Collected and edited by his wife, Lady Laura Ridding. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xii, 331. Arnold, 10s. 6d. net.
- [It was Dr. Ridding's intention to publish these charges. Lady Laura Ridding has omitted matters of local and temporary interest; since her forthcoming life of the Bishop will contain the information here omitted on the organisation and ordering of the diocese. The book has been very carefully and thoroughly edited, the sources of many of the quotations having been traced, and there is a full Index.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Bliss, Frederick Jones. The Development of Palestine Exploration, being the Ely Lectures for 1903. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xix, 337. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.

- [Traces the history of the exploration of Palestine from the very earliest times to the work of the Palestine Exploration Fund, with a chapter on the Exploration of the Future. Index.]
- Gibson, Charles. Among French Inns; the story of a pilgrimage to characteristic spots of rural France. Illustrated. 8x5 $\frac{3}{4}$ . Pp. xx, 418. Hodder & Stoughton. Little Pilgrimages, 6s. net.
- [Travels, recounted partly in fictional form, in Normandy, Brittany, Touraine, Provence, etc. Illustrated from photographs. American. Index.]
- Hope Moncrieff, A. R. The World of To-day, a survey of the lands and peoples of the globe as seen in travel and commerce. Volume v. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ x7 $\frac{3}{4}$ . Pp. viii, 266. Gresham Publishing Co.
- [This volume of the sumptuous and comprehensive survey of the world deals with South and Central America and the Spanish Main. Maps and plans, a large number of illustrations, many in colour, and a full and clear Geographical and Commercial Survey with statistics of the countries included.]

THE BOOKSHELF

WE have before us Part 2 (6d. net) of Messrs. Newnes's Atlas of the World's Commerce (see THE ACADEMY, March 7, 1906, p. 269). Mr. Taylor's "Description and Geographical Distribution of the Principal Commodities of Commerce" is carried from Bluestone to Chicory; and the sheets, which agree in the main features with the two described in our number mentioned above, deal with Sugar and Cotton. We observe one thing with regard to this atlas—that, however little one may be interested in Commerce, one meets over and over again with admirable maps of various parts of the world, which will be as useful to the student of history or literature as to the economist. In the Sugar Map there are six inset smaller maps on a larger scale, in the Cotton Map, five. Among them are two different maps of India, each supplying something that the other lacks, and both wonderfully clear. We are beginning to think that the Atlas of the World's Commerce will end in being the safest and clearest guide to people who are studying subjects of all kinds. There can be no question that to the student of economics and commerce it is unique and indispensable.

The first edition of Mr. W. W. Vernon's Readings on the Inferno of Dante was reviewed at length by L. Villari in the ACADEMY of April 28, 1894. We have now received the second edition (2 vols. Methuen, 15s. net), which has been re-written to an extent that almost renders it a new work. The Readings are addressed almost exclusively to beginners, though they contain much which will be found valuable by the serious student. It would be difficult to imagine a better "scorta fida" than Mr. Vernon for one making his first acquaintance with the Divina Commedia. The text is printed in groups of a few terzine at a time, followed by a literal prose translation. These groups are joined together by a commentary or exegesis in large print; while questions of variant readings, obscure meanings, uncertain references—in short, all the Dante difficulties—are dealt with in notes in small type at the foot of the page. Thus the beginner, who is bewildered at the same time by the unfamiliarity of the language, the difficulty of the thought, and the never-ceasing allusiveness of Dante, is enabled to pick out at a glance from Mr. Vernon's book exactly what help or explanation he desires, and leave further subtleties till he is better prepared to grapple with them. The author aims chiefly at two things: one, to give the student an accurate verbal understanding of Dante's text; the other, to supply a reasonable and authoritative explanation of the allegorical, historical and theological implication which is to be found in every part of the poem. He is peculiarly well equipped for the accomplishment of both these aims. In the first place, Mr. Vernon's familiarity with the Tuscan, and especially the Florentine speech gives him an enviable advantage over students who only know Italian from books; for the language of Dante will never be understood unless it be recognised that he wrote in Tuscan and not in Italian as we know it. Many bookish students might be surprised—to take instances at random—at seeing "conca" translated as "cavity," and not "shell," "terra" as "city," and "bruno" as "black." But Mr. Vernon produces abundant evidence to prove that the primitive meaning in Tuscan of the word "conca" is an earthenware vessel in the form of a truncated cone, that "terra" is Tuscan for "città," and that "bruno" is Tuscan for "nero," the Tuscan for "bruno" being "marrone." Secondly, as to the further understanding of the poem. The Readings are based chiefly on the Latin commentary of Benvenuto da Imola, the intimate friend of Petrarch, who wrote about fifty years after the completion of the Divina Commedia. His utterances are valuable, because, although he was not a Tuscan but a Bolognese, he was near enough to Dante's time to speak in the full light of tradition and to understand many of the personal and historical allusions in the poem which have by the lapse of time become obscure or unintelligible, without some explanation such as he was in a position to supply. Such in brief are the qualifications of Mr. Vernon's Readings to be considered the best book for the English beginner in the study of Dante. The only criticisms we would venture to make apply to certain passages here and there where the author seems to fall below his usual standard of accuracy, adequacy and clarity. For instance, on p. 9 of vol. i., in commenting on the line, "la notte ch' i' passai con tanta pietà," he quotes Blanc to the effect that Dante here uses "this poetical form instead of pietà in the sense of anguish, torment, grief"; but on p. 42 of vol. ii. the obviously correct explanation is given, taken from the Vocabolario della Crusca, saying that "pietà" is a poetical word, not to be confounded with pietà = pity, compassion, and means "anguish, pain, torment." On p. 29 of vol. i. occurs the phrase, "to travel by a different way from what he is doing," which startling piece of English is most unfortunately kept in countenance by one on p. 59 of vol. ii.: "and this will suffice to know about the first valley, and of they whom it holds in its fangs." On p. 95 of vol. i., talking of the abdication of Pope Celestine V., it is said that "the saintliness of the man by no means reconciled the Catholic universe to a Pope, whose office invested him with infallibility, acknowledging before the world his utter incapacity, his undeniable fallibility." Considering that Papal infallibility has only been made a necessary article of faith in our own time, the phrase above in italics seems to us somewhat misleading, applied to a Pope who resigned in the year 1294. Finally, on p. 248 of vol. ii., the word "assai" is rendered "enough," and on p. 286 of the same volume, "orecchi" is translated "eyes." We have dwelt on these inaccuracies and oversights merely because they are small imperfections in a really first-rate work of scholarship: they are not sufficiently numerous and important seriously to impair its undoubted and well-known value.

The Happy Motorist, by Filson Young (E. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net). In his latest book on motoring Mr. Filson Young has avoided technicalities, and dealt with his subject from the point of view of the man who, though willing enough to follow the prevailing fashion and replace his horsed carriages by motors, hesitates to make the exchange through sheer ignorance of all that pertains to the new locomotion. Hitherto the literature of automobilism has for the most part been far above the heads of "the common herd," who have yet to be initiated into the mysteries of sparking-plugs and change-speed gears. There are, doubtless, many, therefore, who will be duly grateful for "The Happy Motorist" with its brightly written chapters on the choice of a car, the management of the motor house, the duties of the driver, the little car, the family car, driving, equipment, and many other matters of supreme importance to those about to join the ranks of automobilists. Mr. Young has the gift of imparting useful advice in a singularly attractive fashion, but he is perhaps at his best when he forsakes the practical for the ideal, and speaks of the fascination the pastime possesses for its votaries. His own enthusiasm for the joys of the open road is revealed in every line, and his chapter on "The Happiest Motorist" must touch a responsive chord in the heart of many a veteran in the ranks of automobilists. "The beginning of things, the youth of the world, the childhood of life, these are Eternal Emblems of a happy freshness that lives incorruptibly in the memory, and retains its perfume of pleasure through years of custom or disillusionment. In any new discovery—especially one like motoring, which is associated with the world out of doors and brings into exhilarating contact with natural things—this freshness is the more acutely felt, because it is allied with a certain instinct of deep and binding root; a strong natural gladness that moves in the blood when the man of a civilised and indoor existence is led out into the sun. Truly the happiest day for the motorist, if he be young in years or heart, is that day upon which, for the first time he takes command of his marvellous toy."

From Messrs. Kelly and Sons, the bookbinders of Water Street, Arundel Street, we have received a very useful two-foot wooden rule, which is marked in eighths of inches, and bears also the sizes of books from 48mo. to royal folio; the length on one side, the width on the other. The rule is intended to measure the folded pages of printed books with cut leaves, and we have already found it very useful and time-saving. One curious fact it reveals is that bookbinders are not always very careful in cutting to the correct size. Messrs. Kelly inform us that they will be happy to send one of these new rulers to any Librarian (other than a Librarian of a Public Library) who will write for one, mentioning the name of this journal.

A HOME FOR BOOKS.
Treat your books as your best friends. They will be true to you when all others fail. In other words treat yourself to a

"GUNN"
Sectional Bookcase

Your books will look well in it; they will always be handy, and its specially made doors will keep them free from damage. Built up in sections of any required size, the whole looking like a solid, handsome piece of furniture. Always complete, yet always growing. Full particulars, prices, and name of nearest Agent, post free. Write for "Booklet No. 23" to WM. ANGUS & CO., Ltd., 44 Paul Street, London, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.THE SPHERE.6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily]

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD. SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY. Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net. By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden." Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations. 21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450 Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each. By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,

and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the Br Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.
ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

LECTURE ARRANGEMENTS AFTER EASTER, 1906.

Tuesdays. Lecture Hour, 5 o'clock.

Professor G. BALDWIN BROWN, M.A. Two Lectures on GREEK CLASSICAL DRESS IN LIFE AND IN ART. On Tuesdays, April 24, May 1 (at 3 o'clock)

Professor WILLIAM STIRLING, M.D., LL.D., D.Sc., Fullerian Professor of Physiology, R.I. Three Lectures on GLANDS AND THEIR PRODUCTS. On Tuesdays, May 8, 15, 22.

Colonel V. BALCK. Two Lectures on NORTHERN WINTER SPORTS. On Tuesdays, May 29, June 5.

Thursdays. Lecture Hour, 5 o'clock

P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, Esq., M.A., D.Sc., Sec. Z.S. Two Lectures on THE DIGESTIVE TRACT IN BIRDS AND MAMMALS. On Thursdays, April 26, May 3.

The Rev. J. P. MAHAFFY, C.V.O., D.D., D.C.L. Two Lectures on (1) THE EXPANSION OF OLD GREEK LITERATURE BY RECENT DISCOVERIES; (2) THE INFLUENCE OF PTOLEMAIC EGYPT ON GRÆCO-ROMAN CIVILISATION. On Thursdays, May 10, 17.

Professor WILLIAM J. SOLLAS, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S. Three Lectures on MAN AND THE GLACIAL PERIOD. On Thursdays, May 24, 31, June 7.

Saturdays, Lecture Hour, 3 o'clock.

Professor CHARLES WALDSTEIN, Litt.D., Ph.D. Three Lectures on ENGLISH FURNITURE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. On Saturdays, April 28, May 5, 12.

Professor Sir JAMES DEWAR, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., Fullerian Professor of Chemistry, R.I. Two Lectures on THE OLD AND THE NEW CHEMISTRY. On Saturdays, June 19, 26.

Professor W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A., Litt.D. Two Lectures on (1) THE ORIGINS OF POETRY; (2) INSPIRATION IN POETRY. On Saturdays, June 2, 9.

Subscription (to Non-Members) to all Courses of Lectures (extending from Christmas to Midsummer), Two Guineas. Subscription to a single Course of Lectures, One Guinea, or Half a Guinea, according to the length of the Course. Tickets issued daily at the Institution, or sent by post on receipt of Cheque or Post-Office Order.

Members may purchase not less than Three Single Lecture Tickets, available for any Afternoon Lecture, for Half a Guinea.

The FRIDAY EVENING MEETINGS will be resumed on April 27, at 9 P.M., when Professor JOHN W. GREGORY will give a Discourse on ORE DEPOSITS AND THEIR DISTRIBUTION IN DEPTH. Succeeding Discourses will probably be given by the Hon. CHARLES A. PARSONS, Professor J. H. POYNTING, Professor ARTHUR SCHUSTER, Mr. LEONARD HILL, Professor H. MOISSAN, Professor Sir JAMES DEWAR, and other gentlemen. To these Meetings Members and their Friends only are admitted.

Persons desirous of becoming Members are requested to apply to the Secretary. When proposed they are immediately admitted to all the Lectures, to the Friday Evening Meetings, and to the Library and Reading Rooms; and their Families are admitted to the Lectures at a reduced charge. Payment: First Year, Ten Guineas; afterwards Five Guineas a Year; or a composition of Sixty Guineas.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.
ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

Tuesday next, April 24, at five o'clock, Professor G. BALDWIN BROWN, M.A. First of Two Lectures on "Greek Classical Dress in Life and in Art." Half a Guinea the Course (the second Lecture will be delivered on Tuesday, May 1, at three o'clock).

Thursday, April 26, at five o'clock, P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, Esq., M.A., D.Sc., Sec. Z.S. First of Two Lectures on "The Digestive Tract in Birds and Mammals." Half a Guinea.

Saturday, April 28, at three o'clock. Professor CHARLES WALDSTEIN, Litt.D., Ph.D. First of Three Lectures on "English Furniture in the Eighteenth Century." Half a Guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season Two Guineas.

Friday Evening, April 27, at nine o'clock. Professor JOHN W. GREGORY, D.Sc., F.R.S. "Ore Deposits and their Distribution in Depth."

To the Friday Evening Meetings Members and their Friends only are admitted.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

THE LIFE OF
SIR RICHARD BURTON

By THOMAS WRIGHT,

Author of "The Life of Edward FitzGerald," etc. etc.

Two vols., demy 8vo, 24s. net. With 64 Plates.

EVERETT &amp; CO., ESSEX STREET, W.C.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS

LORD CURZON IN INDIA.

Being a Selection from his Speeches as Viceroy and Governor-General of India, 1898-1905.

With a Portrait, Explanatory Notes and an Index and with an Introduction by SIR THOMAS RALEIGH, K.C.S.I. 8vo, 12s. net.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

By WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL, M.P.

With Portraits. In 2 vols, demy 8vo, 36s. net.

MEMOIRS OF AROHBISHOP TEMPLE.

By SEVEN FRIENDS.

Edited by E. G. SANDFORD, Archdeacon of Exeter.
With Photogravure and other Illustrations. In 2 vols. 8vo, 36s. net.

HENRY SIDGWICK: A Memoir.

By A. S. and E. M. S. With Portraits, 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE DOOR OF HUMILITY.

By ALFRED AUSTIN, Poet Laureate.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"There is throughout this nobly religious Poem a real wish on the part of the writer to help his time. . . . The Poem flows with music from first to last, and the lines are so inevitable, there is such absence of all's raining after effect, such tenseness in many of the verses, as obliges me to hold them in memory, as one holds in memory so many of the lines of Wordsworth."—CANON RAWNSLEY IN THE "TRIBUNE."

IDOLA THEATRI.

A Criticism of Oxford Thought and Thinkers from the standpoint of Personal Idealism.

By HENRY STURT. 8vo, 10s. net.

LOWEN WISTER'S NEW NOVEL.

LADY BALTIMORE.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post f. ee

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

ROYAL EXCHANGE [Incorporated] ASSURANCE [A.D. 1720.]

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W

TWO NEW NOVELS FOR THE HOLIDAYS

Love and Adventure in London.

ROUGE. 6s.

By HALDANE MACFALL and DION
CLAYTON CALTHROP.

*A Cowboy's
Life.*

The Sunset Trail. 6s.

By A. H. LEWIS, Author of "Wolfville Days."

OTHER NEW BOOKS

HERE AND THERE. H.C. Keene, C.I.E. 10s. 6d. net.

CHRISTOPHER DEANE. E.H. Lacon Watson, 3s. 6d.

THE BENEFACTOR. Ford Madox Hueffer. 6s.

THE LADY NAVIGATOR. Edward Noble. 6s.

A DAUGHTER OF THOR. Helen Maxwell. 6s.

REFLECTIONS OF A HOUSEHOLDER. E. H. Lacon
Watson. 3s. 6d.

BROWN, LANGHAM & CO., Ltd., 78 New Bond St., W.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.,
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

MAY 8 1906

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1773

APRIL 28, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL. See Staff (honourmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

ON THE FOUNDATION OF THE HIBBERT TRUST.

PROFESSOR FRANZ CUMONT, of the University of Gand, will give Three Public Lectures in Manchester College, Oxford, on "THE RELIGIONS OF THE EAST IN ROMAN PAGANISM," Monday, April 30; Wednesday, May 2; Friday, May 4, at 5 P.M.
The lectures will be delivered in French.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.—THE FUTURE CAREER ASSOCIATION, conducted by A. Campbell Miles and Henry C. Devine, 39 Victoria Street, Westminster, founded to aid in the choice of suitable Careers for Sons and Wards. Literature, references, and terms on request.

MSS. MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, invite writers to send them MSS. of ORIGINAL STORIES: (1) for BOYS of 10-14, addressed Mr. JOHN LANG, BOYS' EDITOR; (2) for GIRLS of 10-14, addressed Mrs. JOHN LANG, GIRLS' EDITOR; (3) for CHILDREN of 6-10, addressed Mrs. LOUEY CHISHOLM, CHILDREN'S EDITOR; extent, 40,000 to 50,000 words. All MSS. (which should be sent in any time before September 30—typewritten preferred) will be acknowledged, and returned if not suitable.

Art

R.W.S.—ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East (near the National Gallery). 138TH EXHIBITION NOW OPEN.
F. W. HAYWARD BUTT, Secretary.

PAINTINGS by REPRESENTATIVE SCOTTISH ARTISTS OF TO-DAY and Watercolours by O. Wynne Apperley and Mr. and Mrs. Walter St. John Mildmay, now open.—THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W. 10-6

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Book-sellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

AMELIA, 4 vols, 1752, or odd vols
America, books on, printed before 1800
American Musical Miscellany, 1798
Analyst (The), vols 1 to 3, or any Anatomy of Melancholy, 1621
Anecdotes of Painting in England, 5 vols, 1826
Angelo on Fencing
An Address to the Irish People, 1812
An Elegy Wrote in a Country Churchyard, 1751
An Essay on Mind, 1826
An Historical Account of Pensilvania, 1698
Angas (G. F.) New Zealanders, 1847
South Australia
Kaffirs, illustrated, 1849
Angling, any books on, before 1700
Annals of Gallantry, 3 vols, 1814-15, or odd Annals of Sporting, 13 vols, or odd
Annual of the Civil and Military Gazette, by four Anglo-Indian Writers, Lahore, 1885
Annual Register, 1850 to date
Any books on the Alpine District since 1840
Any books printed before 1500
Any books illustrated by Phiz (H. K. Browne)
Any books having Presentation Inscription of the Author or of any Donor of importance other than the Author; or with drawings, autograph marginalia, etc.
Any books illustrated by Dürer, Burgkmair, Ammon, or other old artists of merit
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

Books for Sale, etc.

JUST PUBLISHED—B. H. BLACKWELL'S MONTHLY LIST OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS for APRIL, containing a considerable number of items dealing with Music, Instrumental and Vocal; Musical Biography and History, Psalmody, etc. Poetry and Verse and Miscellanies.
Also Monthly List of New Books (English and Foreign) published during March.
50 AND 51 BROAD STREET, OXFORD.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

GLAISHER'S
Remainder Book Catalogue.
APRIL SUPPLEMENT NOW READY.
Comprising all most recent Purchases.

WILLIAM GLAISHER,
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
263 High Holborn, London.
Also Catalogue of Popular Current Literature, and New List of French Novels, Classics, etc.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net for 35s., 1902-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

PITMAN'S SHORTHAND. New Method of Postal Tuition under Britain's highest honourman. Theory and Reporting. Remarkable results. Send stamp for Booklet S. 13.—ALSTON'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

THE IDEAL, edited by Temple; magnificently coloured reproductions after Velasquez (5), Turner (2), Watts, Leighton, Fortuny, etc.; only 100 published, folio boards as issued at £10 10s. net, offered for £3 10s.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

SHAKESPEARE.—Our NEW CATALOGUE 118 (annotated extensively in English) is entitled SHAKESPEARE: HIS WORKS, HIS TIMES, HIS INFLUENCE (including Emblems of Books and Dances of Death), and contains 603 Nos., all of which are of interest to the Shakespearean Collector.—Sent gratis on application by LUDWIG ROSENTHAL'S ANTIQUARIAT, Hildegardstrasse 16, Munich (Bavaria).

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late
R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by
E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.
Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. rod. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING WANTED.—MSS. and all Literary work executed accurately and promptly. 10d. per 1000 words. Carbon copies.—Mrs. BRAMBLES, 26 Clarence Road, Windsor.

TYPEWRITING—8d. 1000 words (Remington). Novels, Plays, Duplicating Circulars, etc.—Miss WILLARD, Beaufort House, Osborne Road, Southville, Bristol.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS having MSS. typed at Miss LONGLEY'S, 467 Mansion House Chambers, 20 Bucklersbury, E.C., at 10d. per 1000 words, receive carbon copy free. Established 10 years.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY: Planned by the late Lord Aton. Edited by A. W. Ward, Litt.D., G. W. Prothero, Litt.D., and Stanley Leathes, M.A. In twelve volumes.

Volume IX

Napoleon

now ready

Royal 8vo
16s. net.

Earlier volume

Subscription price

Volume IX. of this History is now ready. The period with which it is concerned is indicated by its title NAPOLEON.

The writers are Georges Pariset, Professor of Modern History in the University of Nancy (who writes on the Consulate and on France under the Empire); T. A. Walker, Fellow and Tutor of Peterhouse, Cambridge; H. W. Wilson; Anton Guiland, Professor of History at Zurich (on the Pacification of Europe, 1799-1802, and on France and her Tributaries, 1801-3); H. A. L. Fisher, Fellow and Tutor of New College, Oxford; L. G. Wickham-Legg, Lecturer in History at the same College; Colonel E. M. Lloyd, late R.E.; J. Holland Rose; Major-General August Keim, of the German Army (on the War of 1809); C. W. Oman, Chichele Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford; Eugen Stschepkin, Professor of Universal History in the Imperial University of Odessa (on Russia under Alexander I. and the Invasion of 1812); Julius von Pfugk-Harttung, formerly Professor of History in the University of Basel (on the War of Liberation, 1813-4); A. W. Ward, Master of Peterhouse, Cambridge; G. P. Goeb, M.P.; W. H. Hutton, Fellow and Tutor of St. John's College, Oxford; and H. E. Egerton, Beit Professor of Colonial History in the University of Oxford.

It will be remembered that, for convenience, the twelve volumes of the History are issued in two series; the one beginning with Volume I. and the other with Volume II. Under this arrangement five volumes have already appeared: viz. I.—The Renaissance, II.—The Reformation, III.—The Wars of Religion, VII.—The United States, and VIII.—The French Revolution. Volume IX, Napoleon, now appearing, completes half the publication.

The price of each volume is 16s. net, but subscriptions of £7 10s. net are still received for the complete work in twelve volumes. Subscriptions may be paid either at once in full, or half now (for the six volumes ready) and the balance in instalments of 12s. 6d. on the publication of each of the six remaining volumes. Additional subscribers should send in their names at once, through any bookseller.

GEORGE CRABBE: POEMS. Edited by A. W. Ward, Litt.D., Master of Peterhouse. Volumes I. and II.

Crown 8vo,
4s. 6d. net
each vol.

This edition which includes a number of poems not hitherto identified or till now unpublished will be completed in three volumes.

"Here, at last, then, is the edition of Crabbe."—ACADEMY
"The most complete and reliable text of Crabbe."—SCOTSMAN

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER. Complete Plays and Poems. Edited by Arnold Clover, M.A., & A. R. Waller, M.A.

Crown 8vo,
4s. 6d. net
each vol.

The text of this edition of Beaumont and Fletcher, reprinted from the folio of 1679 with a record of all earlier variant readings, will be completed in ten volumes. It is intended to follow the ten volumes of text with an eleventh containing explanatory notes, a glossary, and other material of use both to the student and the general reader.

To subscribers,
4s. net

Subscribers for complete sets of the edition are entitled to purchase copies at the reduced rate of 4s. net per volume.

Vol. I. Containing the Maid Tragedy, Philaster, A King and no King, The Soorful Lady, and The Custom of the Country

Vol. II. Containing the Elder Brother, The Spanish Curate, Wit without Money, Beggars Bush, The Humorous Lieutenant, and The Faithful Shepherdess

Vol. III. Containing the Mad Lover, The Loyal Subject, Rule a Wife and have a Wife, The Laws of Candy, the False One, and The Little French Lawyer.

"Une œuvre solide et qui rendra les plus grands services."

REVUE GERMANIQUE
"Pre-eminently, then, this new edition . . . is an edition for scholars."—ATHENÆUM

"In the full sense, then, the edition is critical and adequate."

NOTES AND QUERIES.
"An ideal Beaumont and Fletcher."—SCOTSMAN

LONDON
FETTER LANE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE G. F. GLAY MANAGER

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S
NEW NOVEL

FENWICK'S CAREER

READY ON THE 3rd OF MAY
AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES.

Westmoreland, London, and Paris, the art-world of thirty years ago, and the rise and decline of a painter, form the subject of "Fenwick's Career." A local patron enables Fenwick to leave wife and child in Westmoreland, while he makes his genius known in the great world. A tempo- in order to con- London patron, situation which berate desertion wife by George and Westmore- But Fenwick, in success and nounced in a fit lousy by wife he has virtually with the loss of his inward rela- world, and his Egeria, grow false. At the end, however, he finds his wife again, her strength spent with jealous toil for her child; and the mists are dispelled in reconciliation and hope.

With Illustrations
BY ALBERT STERNER

Crown 8vo,

6s.

An Edition de Luxe in 2 vols, price 21s. net, limited to 250 copies, will be ready immediately. Particulars on application.

FROM A COLLEGE WINDOW

By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON, Fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [On May 3]

IF YOUTH BUT KNEW 6s.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

With 20 Illustrations by LANCLOT SPEED.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

ATHENÆUM.—"The atmosphere clothes this story as a garment from the very outset. It begins to be romantic, it continues in the true vein of romance, and ends sweetly on a proper romantic note to the accompaniment of Gelger Hans's fiddle."

SALTED ALMONDS. 6s.

By F. ANSTEY, Author of "Vice Versa."

TRUTH.—"Anybody with a taste for witty, ingenious, whimsical, and diverting stories will devour this dish of 'salted almonds' at a sitting without experiencing any other feeling than one of perfect enjoyment."

THE POISON OF TONGUES. 6s.

By M. E. CARR. SECOND IMPRESSION.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The charm of Miss Carr's novel lies very largely in the excellent manner of its presentation, in the admirable way in which the characters are at once individualised and consistently developed, and the interest in them maintained to the close."

A SUMMER RIDE THROUGH WESTERN TIBET.

By JANE E. DUNCAN.

With 93 Illustrations and a Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

SCOTSMAN.—"An animated and extremely interesting narrative of travel."

THE SMALL GARDEN BEAUTIFUL AND HOW TO MAKE IT SO. By A. C. CURTIS.

With a Coloured Frontispiece, 16 Half-tone Illustrations, and several Plans, small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Despite the many books on the subject already in existence, we have no hesitation in repeating in regard to this one the familiar formula that it supplies a felt want."

FIFTY YEARS OF FAILURE

With a Frontispiece. CONFESSIONS OF AN OPTIMIST. 10s. 6d. net. SECOND IMPRESSION.

SPECTATOR.—"The author has written an autobiography without any incident at all, yet whose interest never flags, and whose effect upon the reader is simply that of happy distraction."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	395	Fiction . . . . .	405
Literature:		Fine Art:
English Mysticism . . . . .	397	The Art of the Plain . . . . .	406
Baudelaire . . . . .	398	The Report of the National Art
Mr. Sturge Moore's Poems . . . . .	399	Collections Fund for 1905 . . . . .	407
A Bishop on the Congo . . . . .	400	Forgotten Painters . . . . .	407
The Saviour of the Dauphin? . . . . .	401	Exhibition of Photographs . . . . .	408
A Song of Remembrance . . . . .	402	Music:
"The Greater Love" . . . . .	402	Choral Music—I. . . . .	408
Days and Hours . . . . .	402	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	409
A Literary Causerie:		Correspondence . . . . .	409
Sick-Room Fiction . . . . .	403	Books Received . . . . .	412

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE honours of this week have been pretty evenly divided between Shakespeare and Miss Ellen Terry. To read the language used by some part of the Press, it would be difficult to know which was the greater—the poet, or the lady who has charmingly interpreted some of his creations. But we cannot grudge to an actress—least of all to Miss Terry—the slightest grain of the hail-storm of “consummates,” “superbs,” “exquisites,” “utterlys” and “perfects” that self-advertisement and sincere admiration in their respective proportions have set rattling about her ears during the past few weeks. We sincerely pity the people to come, who have nothing but the portraits, the legends, and the journalists’ superlatives to go to for a knowledge of Ellen Terry, just as we pity ourselves for knowing no more of Clive or Oldfield or Siddons, than can be learned by the same rather dreary means.

At His Majesty's Theatre Mr. Tree has been having a week—and a hard week—of Shakespeare; at Stratford Mr. F. R. Benson is holding his usual festival, and there have been the usual speeches, sermons and so forth (and, we may add, the usual bitter cold); the British Empire Shakespeare League and other educational bodies are busy, and we have all been turning our eyes back to the great figure who stands as the very voice of England at one of her greatest moments. Certain Shakespeare enthusiasms there are which strike us as odd. In the New Shakespeareana, for instance, conducted by the Shakespeare Society of New York, we find it announced that the society intends to publish in nine volumes the text of the 1623 folio on one page, and on the opposite page the text of each play as altered by the Restoration dramatists. Nine volumes full (or half-full) of the ineptitudes or vulgarities of D'Avenant, Otway, Tate and the rest! All for Love can be bought cheap, and what more can any one want?

One or two contributions to our collection of authors' mistakes were to be found in our columns last week, and The Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette gives us another, which “the watchful publisher” (rara avis in terris!) “strangled at birth.” It is as follows: “In Mr. Downey's collection of Lever's letters, just published, we find John Blackwood pointing out such a blunder in the manuscript of ‘Tony Butler.’ Lever had described a garden scene between Tony and Alice on a fine summer night, whereas when Tony started in the morning in the cold and snow for Burnside it was clearly winter. In reply, the novelist confessed that he was unable to suggest how the night was so fine for Alice, and the morning so severe for Tony.” “Unable” here probably means “unwilling to take the trouble.” The reason is clear enough. If a novelist has any imagination at all, he has enough to control the weather, and he needs to keep a very sharp look out, if he is not going to contradict himself about the season and the sky when his mood changes. For, after all, it is the mood that affects the weather quite as much as the weather affects the mood. A gleam of sunshine in December has set us all but dancing down the street; and on a perfect June day we have hunched our shoulders, and cursed the unseasonable cold.

A correspondent, H. D. B., writes to us, meanwhile, with reference to the letter of W. P., which appeared in our last issue, touching Sir Walter Scott's “mistake” in making the sun set in the ocean on the east coast of Scotland. H. D. B. is “not prepared to say that W. P. is wrong,” because he does not know the spot described; but he points out that at Cromer, on the east coast of England, the sun may be seen both to rise and to set over the sea. H. D. B. is perfectly right, as all visitors to Cromer will know: the sun, of course, does not rise all the year round exactly E. nor set exactly W. The point rather is: was Sir Walter, that “idle child,” properly aware of his facts when he wrote the passage, or was it merely that he happened to want a sunset for the purposes of the scene, and put it in without due thought? At any rate, he would not have been guilty of an error which we discovered some years ago in a manuscript novel submitted to us for an opinion. There, the very first sentence of the very first chapter led off with the setting sun shining through the east window of a church.

A very interesting letter from Burns to Mrs. Dunlop was sold at Christie's on Wednesday. It contains the whole of “Tam Glen” and another poem; and goes on to talk, among other things, of politics. Here is a splendid passage from it. “I, too, Madam, am just now Revolution-mad, but it is not the tarantula-frenzy of insulting Whiggism, like an ass's Colt capering over the generous hound breathing his last; mine is the enraged scorpion, shut up in a thumb-phial; the indignant groans and blood-shot glances of a ruined Right, gagged on the pillory of Derision to gratify the idiot insolence of . . .” The letter was bought by Mr. Quaritch.

The Report of the National Art Collections Fund is fully examined in another part of this issue; but we may be permitted to call attention to a very able and lucid article in Thursday's Times on the problem before the nation in general and the Fund in particular. That article pours proper scorn on those who “babble” about “artificially inflated” prices, and “seem to think that the value of a picture in the market can be fixed by their own arbitrary and personal estimate of its artistic quality.” It then proceeds to examine the various proposals for saving for the nation the treasures of art in private hands put forward by Professor Holmes, Mr. MacColl and others, and comes to the very sane conclusion that the best way of all is for individual lovers of art to become members of the National Art Collections Fund and subscribe.

The Princess Royal has consented to become patroness of a performance of Mr. Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon which is being organised, with the author's permission, by Miss Elsie Fogerty for the benefit of the fund being raised to procure a new site and building for Bedford College for Women, University of London, York Place, London, W. The following have also promised their patronage to the performance: The Duchesses of Marlborough, Sutherland, and Hamilton, Lady Leila Egerton, Ellen Countess of Desart, Susan Countess of Malmesbury, the Hon. Mrs. Alfred Lyttelton, the Head Master of Eton, and the Hon. Mrs. Edward Lyttelton, Lord Avebury, the Right Hon. Arthur and Mrs. Acland, Sir Edward H. Busk, Vice-Chancellor of the University of London, Sir Arthur Rücker, Principal of the University of London, and Lady Rücker, Dr. Churton Collins, Canon Barnett, the Rev. Russell Wakefield, and others. The performance will take place on Monday, June 11, at 3 P.M., at the Scala Theatre, Charlotte Street, Tottenham Court Road. This, we believe, will be the first time that Mr. Swinburne's tragedy has been publicly performed in England.

Millet's picture, The Man with the Hoe, lost in the San Francisco disaster, gave its idea and title to a poem by Mr. Edwin Markham, which appeared early in 1899 in the Examiner of San Francisco. Later in that year the poem gave its title to Mr. Markham's first volume of verse—dated from Oakland, California, and dedicated "to Edmund Clarence Stedman, first to hail and caution me," From "The Man with the Hoe," which, though it made a considerable impression seven years ago on both sides of the Atlantic, is now practically forgotten, we may quote a few lines:

Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans
Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
The emptiness of ages in his face,
And on his back the burden of the world,

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands,
How will the future reckon with this Man?
How answer his brute question in that hour
When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world?
How will it be, with kingdoms and with kings—
With those who shaped him to the thing he is—
When this dumb Terror shall reply to God,
After the silence of the centuries?

The frequent allusion to Santa Rosa in the telegraphic news of the week from California may have recalled to some readers that it was in the neighbourhood of that town, a quarter of a century ago, Mr. Thomas Luke Harris established the community known as the Brotherhood of the New Life. The place was known as Fountain Grove, and there, for a considerable period, Harris exercised his "primacy." Some of his books, notably "The New Republic," were printed at the press he set up. Now, at Fountain Grove, it will be remembered, Laurence Oliphant was for a time a resident. For some years past Mr. T. L. Harris, now in his eighty-fourth year—he visited England four years ago—has been resident in New York, and it is long since his community was dispersed.

Mr. T. Aldred (Southwark) opened the April meeting of the Library Association, which took place at the London School of Economics on the 23rd inst., with a paper on Stocktaking. Stocktaking from the earliest times was discussed and the catalogues of the Alexandrian library were quoted. The chief point, however, was the question of closing for the purpose. From the point of view of the borrower there is no doubt that closing for periods varying from three days to a month is to be deprecated, as it causes a great deal of inconvenience. An aspect of the subject which did not receive the attention it deserved is that of the continuity of the "reading habit." During these periodical stocktakings when the library is closed, many of the borrowers who are then deprived of their usual books lose some of the desire to read, and it sometimes happens that they do not trouble to resume that "habit." It is worth notice in this respect that "The Times Book Club" while removing to their new premises issued a double number of volumes to each subscriber.

The chief paper of the evening was on "Public Libraries and Public Opinion," written by Mr. J. Hutt, M.A.: (Lyceum Library, Liverpool), and read by Mr. Purnell. From the article in Household Words of 1851, possibly written by Charles Dickens, who was present at the opening of the Manchester Library in the following year, the attitude of the press was traced to the present time. Chambers's Journal has always taken an interest in the subject; in 1875 and again in 1900 articles appeared there. But the criticism is always adverse. Even "A Working Woman," the author of the articles which appeared in 1900, while admitting the value of the public library to herself, complained that the working classes have no love for reading, and that libraries do not supply stimulating reading. Among recent attacks which were also described as uninformed and misleading were mentioned those in the Nineteenth Century and the Westminster Review. In the latter the time-worn "fiction bogey" was again raised, to be "laid" in the Library World.

The ideal of the public library was laid down as "general culture." And it will not be until the generation now at school has grown up that the result of the present activity of public libraries will be evident. (A "fiction censorial committee" was suggested in the paper. This raises a subject of great interest and importance, and one which we hope to refer to in a future issue.) The broad democratic basis of the foundation of the public library was described as the chief cause of this jealous criticism (Mr. J. D. Brown, Islington). And although the public library was no doubt originally intended for the poorer classes, economic conditions have so changed that it is a false idea at the present time (Mr. E. A. Baker, M.A., Woolwich).

It is impossible to give in a small space any idea of the treasures that are to come under the hammer at Messrs. Sotheby's on Monday next and the three following days, when the libraries of the Rev. the Hon. Stephen Lawley, Mr. Arthur Ram, Mr. G. P. Wall, Captain Butts, and the Hon. Mrs. Skeffington Smyth are to be sold. Mr. Ram's books include first editions of "Jack Sheppard," Campbell's Poems, several of Dickens's novels, and several of Jesse's series of Memoirs, besides a number of other books of value, especially in the department of biography and memoirs. The Lawley library is strongest in modern literature. There are three or four first editions of Matthew Arnold, including "The Strayed Reveller," a first edition of the Bon Gaultier Ballads; and of Coleridge and Wordsworth's "Lyrical Ballads." Then there is the very rare first edition of Mr. George Meredith's "Poems" (1851), and of Stevenson's "Inland Voyage," while the Tennyson first editions include the 1842, two volume Collected Poems: "In Memoriam"; "The Princess," "Maud," and the "Idylls," and the Wordsworths, the "Lyrical Ballads" (1800) vol. ii., the "Prelude," and the "Excursion." White's "Selborne," and some Drydens and Waltons are among other interesting first editions.

In "The Salterns" Library we find the exceedingly rare first edition of Blake's "Poetical Sketches," besides Rossetti's Poems; a Kelmscott "Chaucer," uncut, as issued, and a good number of specimens of the work of the Ashendene, Doves and other presses. Among other first editions are a number of Ainsworths, "Pickwick," and several other Dickenses, Sheridan's Critic, Lamb's "Last Essays of Elia," and a number of works by William Combe, Lever, Pierce Egan, and R. S. Surtees. As "The property of a gentleman deceased" is entered the excessively rare first edition of Cervantes's "Novelas Exemplares" (Madrid, 1613). Among Mrs. Skeffington Smyth's books we find first editions of "Camilla," of Goldsmith's "Experimental Philosophy," Hazlitt's "View of the English Stage," and Byron's "Hebrew Melodies," "Prisoner of Chillon," "Marino Faliero," and "Sardanapalus." The four days' sale has also many very interesting early printed books, and illuminated manuscripts.

On Monday, April 30, Messrs. Puttick and Simpson will sell an important collection of early printed books and rare first editions. Amongst the first editions are Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield" and "She Stoops to Conquer," Ayleyn's "Historie of that Wise and Fortunate Prince, Henri of that Name the Seventh" (1638), Braithwait's "Times Curtaine Drawne" (1621), Cartwright's

"The Preacher's Travels" (1611), and John Donne's "Death's Duell or Consolation to the Soul against the Dying Life and Living Death of the Body."

The Portico Library, of Manchester, from the librarian of which we publish a letter in this issue, is a venerable institution—for a Manchester institution—having been founded as long ago as 1806. It is particularly strong in historical and antiquarian books, among its treasures being Gau's "Antiquités de la Nubie," and the great Napoleonic "Description de l'Egypt," with its two volumes of text and twelve of plates. It owns also a first edition of "Tim Bobbin," a very rare book which even the British Museum lacks. The library is now to be rebuilt.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Society of Arts.—Arrangements for week ending May 5, 1906. Monday, April 30, at 8 P.M. Cantor Lectures: "Ivory in Commerce and in the Arts," by Alfred Maskell, F.S.A. Three lectures. Lecture II.—Early Christian and early Byzantine ivory sculpture—Uncertainty of the origin and dating of certain type pieces—Examination of the methods of recent German commentators—Examples considered (amongst others): British Museum Passion Plaques; Munich and Liverpool "Ascensions"; B.M. Pyx or vase with cover; B.M. archangel; Ravenna chair; Carrand diptych; Lorsch book-covers; Brescia casket; Bodleian bookcover; South Kensington bone plague with "Magi"; Alcester tan; and others—An attempt to throw light on some obscurities and difficulties from a different point of view from that usually accepted. (Illustrated by lantern slides and casts.) Tuesday, May 1, at 4.30 P.M. Colonial Section: "Social Conditions in Australia," by the Hon. J. G. Jenkins, Agent-General for South Australia. Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart, G.C.M.G., late Governor of South Australia, will preside. Wednesday, May 2, at 8 P.M. Ordinary meeting: "Submarine Signalling," by J. B. Millet. Sir William White, K.C.B., F.R.S., will preside.

University College, London. (University of London).—Jevons Memorial Lectures, 1906. A course of lectures will be delivered by Mr. Philip H. Wicksteed on "The Application of the principle of Margins to the problems of wage-earning, unemployment, foreign trade and finance." On Mondays, at 6 P.M., beginning on Monday, May 7, 1906. A course of public lectures on Polish Literature: Slowacki's "King Spirit," a Messianic Poem, will be delivered by Dr. W. Lutoslawski, on Mondays, at 5.30 P.M., beginning on Monday, May 7. Comparative Law. Professor Sir John Macdonell (Quain Professor of Comparative Law) will deliver a course of lectures on Tuesdays, at 5 P.M., beginning on Tuesday, May 22, 1906, on Modern Labour Legislation. To be followed by a course of lectures on International Law. The Professor's prizes of £15 and £5 respectively will be given for the best Essays, showing sufficient merit, on: "The rights of belligerents and neutrals as to submarine cables, wireless telegraphy, and the intercepting of information in time of war." Candidates must have attended at least two-thirds of the lectures for the whole session, and have worked to the satisfaction of the Professor. Essays must reach the Secretary of the College on or before Monday, June 18. Two public lectures on "The Assyro-Babylonian Antiquities in the British Museum," will be delivered by Dr. T. G. Pinches on Tuesdays, May 24 and 31 at 4.30 P.M., in the Botanical Theatre. All these lectures will be open to the public without fee or ticket.

Royal Geographical Society.—Evening meeting, Monday, May 7, 1906, at 8.30 P.M. At the Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W. Paper to be read: "From the Victoria Nyanza to Kilimanjaro," by Colonel G. E. Smith, R.E. The Right Hon. Sir George T. Goldie, President, in the chair.

Linnean Society of London.—The next general meeting will be held on Thursday, May 3, 1906, at 8 P.M. The discussion on the "Origin of Gymnosperms," adjourned from March 15, will be resumed by Dr. D. H. Scott, F.R.S., Sec.L.S. A ballot will be taken in respect of Mr. Dharendra Lal Day, M.A., B.Sc., and Colonel John William Yerbury, late R.A.

Grafton Galleries.—Tuesday, May 2. Private view of the German Exhibition of painting, including the works of H. von Bartels, Benno Becker, Cairati, W. von Diez, Raoul Frank, O. von Fader du Faur, F. von Defregger, Freiherr von Habermann, Otto Hierl-Deoneo, Albert von Keller, Aug. von Kaulbach, Hermann Kaulbach, Angelo Jank, Julius Exter, Franz von Leubach, Carl Marr, Gabriel Max, Leo Samberger, Raffael Schuster-Woldan, Carl Seiler, Toni Stadler, Franz Stuck, Fritz von Uhde, Lud. Willroider, Ernst Zimmermann, Heinrich Zügel and others.

Æolian Hall.—Tuesday, May 1, at 9 P.M. Bach Concert in aid of the fund for the purchase of Bach's house at Eisenach and the endowment of a Bach Museum.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, Leicester Square.—Monday, April 30, at 1.10 P.M. Sale of early printed books and rare first editions including a selection from the Library of a Collector consigned from abroad.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—April 30-May 3 inclusive. Sale of the libraries of the Rev. the Hon. Stephen W. Lawley, Mr. Arthur Ram, Mr. G. P. Wall, the Hon. Mrs. Skeffington-Smyth and "The Salterns," Parkstone, Dorset.

LITERATURE

ENGLISH MYSTICISM

Studies of English Mystics. By W. R. INGE, D.D. (Murray, 6s. net.)

TEMPERATENESS is the note of the English mind. In matters of practice it aims at compromise: in matters of imagination it affects the material sublime. It keeps, in every field of thought, to the middle way. In the genius for pure speculation it is excelled by the Teutonic mind, and in the genius for logical systematisation it is surpassed by the French mind: but, possessing somewhat of the imaginative power of the northern races and somewhat of the practical power of the southern races, it combines these in an unrivalled genius for invention. In poetry and politics, in science and industry, and in some branches of art and philosophy, the English mind has been singularly creative. In the matter of religion, however, it does not seem to have exercised, as yet, any supreme and permanent influence on the rest of the world. This is partly due to its aversion from extremes. As it proceeds by the way of assimilation rather than by the way of rejection it works slowly towards a definite position. The Latin school of tradition has elaborated a compact body of doctrines; the Teutonic school of rationalism has developed a frame of mind; the English school of experience is still seeking for the middle way. Dr. Inge, for instance, holds that neither Roman Catholicism nor Protestantism possesses enough of the truth to satisfy the religious needs of the day, and that the special work assigned to the English Church is the development of a Johannine Christianity:

Thousands are craving for a basis of belief which shall rest, not on tradition or authority or historical evidence, but on the ascertainable facts of human experience. And the mystics, it has been truly said, are the only thorough-going empiricists. . . . It is to the study of religious experience that faith must look for the reinforcement which it needs against its many enemies. The religions of authority are tottering to their fall; but the religion of the Spirit is still near the beginning of [its] triumphant course.

It is sometimes said that the English are averse from mysticism. But there is no race in which there is a richer vein of idealism, a deeper sense of the mystery of life. The mystical literature of England is, indeed, as important as that of Germany or Spain. By keeping to the mean between speculative pantheism and devotional extravagance, English mysticism has acquired in the modern era a distinct and original character. In the spirit of reasonableness in which they write, the best English mystics of all ages resemble one another. The note of temperateness persists amid the vicissitudes of creed. This is seen very clearly in the works of the writers that form the subject of Dr. Inge's suggestive studies. Lady Julian, an anchoress of Norwich, and Walter Hylton, Canon of Thurgarton, represent the mystical side of that English renaissance of the fourteenth century which is illustrated by Langland, Wiclif and Chaucer; William Law is the greatest English mystical divine of the age of Pope and Addison; Wordsworth is the poet of the philosophical mysticism of the Romantic period. Dr. Inge also includes Robert Browning as a representative English mystic, but we scarcely believe that the author of "La Saisiaz" can be ranked among the seers of the divine vision. Valuable and illuminating as the "Studies of English Mystics" is, we think that there would have been an historical and a more interesting connection between the different lectures had the space occupied by the trite discussion of the didactic element in Browning's poetry been devoted to an exposition of the rational mysticism of the Cambridge Platonists of the seventeenth century. These men are writers of far more importance than the English mediæval mystics. Lady Julian is an author of fine charm, and Walter Hylton is an author of agreeable distinction; but their charm and their distinction are a matter of style that veils their want of profundity in the matter of thought. They reflect faintly a few of the ideas of the great Continental mystics of the fourteenth century. Their orthodoxy was, no doubt, a supreme merit in the age of Wiclif; but what one prizes most at the present day in a mystic is the insight into the fundamental problems of religion. This one finds in the Cambridge Platonists. The genius of the English race was not fully displayed until the latter part of the sixteenth century. In the space of a few years it built up a great literature, and then, wearying of the pageantry of an existence woven of "such stuff as dreams are made on," it turned with undiminished energy to the spiritual realities of life. Shakespeare was succeeded by Milton, and Bacon by the Cambridge Platonists.

Whichcote and his circle were the founders of the first authentic school of mysticism in England. To the sobriety of manner of the mediæval English writers they united a remarkable originality of conception. "That is not revealed which is not intelligible." This was the leading principle of the Cambridge Platonists, and they anticipated the method of Hegel in making mysticism a matter of rational exposition. A mystic cannot, by reason simply of his special gift of insight into the divine nature of things, claim any authority over the minds of other men. It is this arrogant assumption of superiority which has ever tended to reduce mysticism into an ineffectual element in the general life of the world. The mystic's vision of all things in God must remain for other men a mere dream unless he can "unfold its concentrated white light into new views of the many forms of nature and human life, with all the varied and definite hues and shapes."

Am farbigen Abglanz haben wir das Leben.

To affect men he must interpret the divine vision in terms of reason and experience. This is what the Cambridge Platonists essayed to do. Their system of philosophy has not endured entirely, but the frame of mind of which it was the expression has persisted and preserved from mere irrationalism and extravagance the best of the later English mystics.

Among these Wordsworth is supreme. Jelâleddin, a Persian writer of the thirteenth century, is sometimes said to be the greatest mystical poet of any age. We have read only a translation of his works, and cannot therefore appreciate his literary merit; but it seems to us that, as a mystical philosopher, he is surpassed by the author of "The Prelude" and "The Excursion." The English poet keeps to the facts of actual experience, and, without the adventitious pomp of luxuriant imagery and fanciful symbolism, he invests these facts with a glorious significance. To him the infinite is the finite seen sub specie æternitatis. The art with which he registers, not only those moods of ecstasy felt

When the light of sense
Goes out, but with a flash that has revealed
The invisible world, but the moods of common life, and the insight with which he traces the development of the higher states of soul and their connection with the lower, are an initiation into a practical mysticism of a high order. In manner he is the profoundest of poets, and in manner the simplest. From writers of the Oriental school, such as Emerson, from writers of the Teutonic school, such as Blake, and from writers of the Spanish school, such as Coventry Patmore, he is nobly distinguished by a spirit of awe and deep reverence that withholds him from vain and unseemly fantasticalness.

Growth is the sign of life. If English religion develops on the lines of English mysticism, it will be moulded by grave experience and temperate thought. Christianity, the Cambridge Platonists held, is not a divine science, but a divine life. It is a temper of mind, of which dogmas are merely symbolical expressions that change with the change of circumstances. It is as fluid a thing as life itself. Whenever it tends to harden into a set of rigid doctrines and unchanging rites, and ceases to adapt itself to the religious needs of the age, persons with minds of a mystical cast withdraw from it, and lose themselves in an extravagant and base sort of spiritualism, and persons with minds of a worldly cast revert to a mechanical kind of Deism, in which there is nothing to stimulate and nourish the spiritual side of a man's nature. Mysticism is the vital force of religion.

BAUDELAIRE

Poems in Prose from Baudelaire. Translated by ARTHUR SYMONS. (Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.)

The Poems of Charles Baudelaire. Selected and translated from the French with an introduction by F. P. STURM. (Walter Scott, 1s.)

... Unhappy master whom unmerciful disaster
Followed fast and followed faster. . . .

THUS Poe, with a sort of uncanny prevision of his disciple, whose fate was so much more terrible than his own, and through whom, perhaps, he was to come to his own at least with those, poets and writers for the most part, for whom his own rather obvious melodies are too loud, too insistent: who are listening, it may be, for a softer music.

It is this softer music which Mr. Sturm has tried, really for the first time, to translate into English verse with much patient labour; not very successfully, perhaps, for somehow almost all the emotion, the subtle, shadowy life of the original, betrayed into captivity only by ænuius, seems to have escaped, so that, correct though they be, these Flowers of Evil are but artificial flowers after all, copied from the real blossoms that opened, it may be, only for Baudelaire.

The principal work of Charles Baudelaire dates from 1857, and in whatever way we may have come to regard him, whether as a classic or as a mere expression of decadence, his work has never been much read in England, even by writers, and not at all by the English people. Yet it is small in amount, very perfect in accomplishment, almost always faultless, and often exquisite. It is his most exquisite work that one of our own poets has cared to translate; for, while certainly "Les Fleurs du Mal" are the most famous of Baudelaire's works—given to the world as they were by the Revue des Deux Mondes, and advertised by a police prosecution, which serves to remind us what strange folk our fathers were—it is to the "Petits Poèmes en Prose" that we return again and again, finding there something more of the nuance which Verlaine has told us is absolutely necessary to Poetry and something less of the couleur that he condemns, than in "Les Fleurs du Mal."

Mr. Henry James, writing of "French Poets and Novelists," has been curiously unfortunate in his estimate of Baudelaire; indeed, so eager is he to condemn him, that he might be mistaken for one of those policemen who, no doubt, were appalled at the wickedness of "Les Fleurs du Mal," as they declaimed the verse from either side of the prisoner to the horrified correctional magistrate. "Baudelaire," says he, "was a poet, and for a poet to be a realist is of course nonsense"; and again: "To deny the relevancy of the subject-matter and the importance of the moral quality of a work of art strikes us as, in two words, ineffably puerile." Well, what is the subject-matter of Tschaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique": and what is its moral quality? and, again, what is the subject-matter of "The Wings of the Dove"? It was not of such "examination-paper questions" that Baudelaire was dreaming, but of the miracle of a poetic prose, musical without rhythm and without rhyme, subtle, and staccato enough to follow the lyric motions of the soul, the wavering outlines of meditation, the sudden starts of conscience.

It is just this musical prose, so alert, so self-conscious, always aware of itself, that Mr. Symons, with an art beyond praise, has given us in his translations. He has caught the very emotion of the original work itself; a little faint, perhaps, a little far away; yet he has sacrificed nothing, no single hint or thought or half-word of Baudelaire's. He is absolutely accurate, but his accuracy has not killed the emotion; it is living there in that curiously pallid English, which in any other hands would almost certainly have been too robust a vehicle for the delicate, ambiguous French, where words are visions, creating for us worlds we have never seen, thoughts that overwhelm us and remain with us for days, moods that we are subject to, that have in them all the terror of experience, the agony of regret.

The "Petits Poèmes en Prose" are the work of a man who is in prison, whose intellect is dying of horror, whose soul is trembling with disgust. He is like a priest who celebrates an endless Mass before a Deity in whom he does not believe; and for him honey is a poison that has lost its savour and the salt of our tears is too sweet. For him the visible world has never existed: it is only in his own soul that he finds any reality—his own soul terrified and disgusted at the aspect of the world, at the dreams of men, that interpose themselves between him and the sun. Thus, when asked what he loves best, it is only after many repudiations that he decides it is the clouds that delight him:

The clouds which pass—over there—the marvellous clouds.

And he insists upon nothing but the mood, and thus as an artist he is always true to himself; he will never excuse himself from perfection, and, small though his work is in quantity, it is a monument. We see him at last robbed of everything, the tortured nerves that have driven him mad still impotently twitching, a dead man, though his eyes are still alive, long before he really died. And it is this man, a decadent, an æsthete, who, atheist though he be, in some not inconsiderable way is the founder of the modern symbolist school, which has already learned to look beyond him to those mystics who fled from the tyranny of the appearance into the profound reality which is God. All his life Baudelaire may be said to have sought in the dust and dirt for the lilies of the love of God, lilies that in his writings festered and smelt far worse than weeds that in our spring shall tower again spotless into the infinite pure sky. For, as we have been reminded: "We also are ancestors and stand in the sunshine of to-morrow."

MR. STURGE MOORE'S POEMS

Poems by T. Sturge Moore. Collected in one volume. (Duckworth, 6s. net.)

The author presents this book in a somewhat whimsical, or, at any rate, unusual form. Six little sheaves of poetry, each separately numbered for paging, are combined into one; each sheaf has a separate dedication; some sheaves—e.g., the first two and the fourth—consist of a single poem each; the others contain little groups of shorter poems; the bulk of the volume is classical, but lyrics of to-day or to-morrow are interspersed; the lament over Saul and Jonathan reappears in language mainly Biblical, but in broken and irregular rhymes: the least poetical poem in the whole book, a grim but dull dirge over Don Juan, stands side by side with one of the finest, that on Titian's "Bacchanal" in the Prado Gallery at Madrid. A corresponding caprice is apt to mar the rhyme—e.g., in "Pan" (p. 21), "live" and "with" stand for rhymes, as, in "A lament for Orpheus" (p. 18), do "ever" and "together," and, in "A Grecian Amphora" (p. 17), "many a story" and "live in story." The form "glid," for "glided," appears more than once; it is preferable to Mrs. Browning's terrible "glode," and logically may be defended by the analogy of "slid" and "chid;" but the sense of poetry suffers by the intrusion of oddities, and the ear protests against (p. 24, "The Centaur's Booty")

Hug thy wisdom, but hark: the child is here—in a passage of blank verse: in "To Leda" (p. 11), the burning of Troy is strangely described as Those shriek-pulsed towers that flamed.

In a word, the author has a leaning towards queerness in thought and expression, which jars upon the reader.

Beneath this rather irritating imperfection, there lies a vein of genuine poetic feeling, rising at times to real beauty and power. The pathetic half-human centaurs, Pholus and Medon, and their delight in the little human child whom Medon has carried away to their mountain solitude, are beautifully depicted: so is Pholus's memory of a still older centaur who loved a nymph:

She was not as a woman who grows old,
Loses her charm and frees those whom she snared:
Nay, till he died her beauty held him fast;
No joy he knew, no change, but, in a trance
He gazed upon her snowy languid form,
And sought he knew not what within her eyes.

MEDON

I thought of him; for thou, long years ago,
Hadst spoken sadly of his wasted life,
And how his death was like a blasted tree's
Ragged with dead moss, whitened with crumbling tinder,
Gnarled, writhen, old, patient and desolate.
For she, she left him as the white owl quits
The old stump ere it falls; she left him young,
Dreamy and calm as she had been before
He found her like a sleeping water there,
A mirror visited by all the stars
And which at noon-day seems a golden shield
Dropped by a Titan mid the rocks he hurled.

The very best of our poets might, we think, have been glad to have written these last four lines!

Not less fine is the passage in "The Rout of the Amazons" (pp. 27-9), where the Faun describes the dead Amazon, and the mystical music of the approach of Artemis and her train.

Mutely I prayed

That she to joy might even yet return,
Then looked and saw the stars shine through the boughs,
And far away I heard a silver sound.
At first methought it was the rising moon
Did make a music pure and clear as dew;
But, lo! 'twas answered from the west, and soon
Out of the south was gently born again. . . .

Then, over the plains and hills, the nymphs of Artemis sound their sorrowful music over each slain Amazon as they come upon her body, and finally, the vision of Artemis herself appears:

I, turning, saw one stand

With all the dignity and charm of night . . .
Beside that prostrate sister of like grace.
Then knelt she and laid both the arms to rest,
Next straightened both the knees, and closed the shift
Above the breast, ordered the dew-damp hair,
And kissed the eyelids, having lowered them;
Went then and gathered young ferns not far off;
With these she covered up that lovely corse,
Then drew a circle round it with an arrow,
Saying some words of heaven,—some rare spell . . .

and then:

Sounding again that glory on her horn,
She turned and passed away among the trees.

Less good than this, yet quite good, are "Pan's Prophecy," and "To Leda": the "Lament for Orpheus," immediately following the last-named poem, will attract, by its pathos, non-Virgilian readers. But scholars, we think, will find it an undue expansion, and to some extent a washing-out, of the nobly pathetic close of Virgil's Fourth Georgic: the topic will hardly bear rehandling. Of the lesser poems, with the lyric touch upon them, the best perhaps, is "Love's First Communion" (pp. 21-2 in the section named from "The Gazelles"); the last stanza has both strength and sweetness:

Ardent softly-breathing Even,
What thou whisperest, that is truth;
Through and through me throbs belief;
By thy star, the first in heaven

Hesperus the early bright,
Tell me, shall I love? "For brief,
Brief thy days!"
Song there is thus wails on youth,
"For the May time, no time stays,"
So it says;
Speak then, speak, ere thou be night
Dread with stars and extreme height.

The leading defect of the book is the inclination, probably unconscious, of the writer to express natural and often poetic fancies in an abrupt and eccentric form. But his touch on mythological subjects, and especially on half-human creatures, such as the Centaurs, the Faun, and Pan, would avail to redeem worse faults than eccentricity.

A BISHOP ON THE CONGO

Vingt-huit Années au Congo. Lettres de Monseigneur AUGOUARD. 2 tom. (Paris: Société Française d'Imprimerie et de Librairie.)

WE hear so much nowadays about the Congo from persons who either have never been there or who pose as authorities after a very brief trip through that vast territory, that it may not be uninteresting to our readers to call their attention to the experiences of a man who has resided in Central Africa for almost a whole generation, and who has devoted himself untiringly to the amelioration of the negro's lot. There is no one whose name is more honourably or prominently associated with missionary enterprise than Bishop Augouard. His acquaintance with the blacks began in 1877, and it has continued down to the present day. A Zouave under General Charette in the war of 1870-71, he has displayed a soldier's courage in his efforts to extend Christianity, civilisation, and, we may add, the good name of France in the Congo regions. As a founder of missions he probably holds the record. He founded those on Stanley Pool and the Kasai, as well as on the Ubanghi. He began his African career as the priest at Gabon in Dahomey, and he is now Bishop of the whole of the French Congo. The story of his work as a missionary is told in two hundred and eighty-three letters, written chiefly to members of his family and now collected for publication. They are full of interest and life, and, although they naturally appeal most forcibly to French readers, no one who wishes to understand the African problem can overlook the information provided by this zealous and sympathetic labourer among the heathen millions of the French and Belgian Congos.

When he went out to Africa in 1877, nothing had been done to alienate the blacks from their savage practices and barbarous cruelty. The whites were indifferent, or at the best helpless. The King of Dahomey slaughtered three or four thousand innocent victims on his birthday, and if he wished to do honour to an European he invited him to the spectacle, which the white man was impotent to prevent and compelled for his own safety to behold. Remonstrance would have meant death. The sacrifices of the medicine doctors in the name of Ju Ju or fetishism were among the daily occurrences that M. Augouard recites as the horrors of the period when he first arrived in the country. Even after he had been there some years and the scene of his labours had been changed from Dahomey to the Congo, he wrote that "the practice of cannibalism exists on the Congo in a truly horrible degree." In his closing letters he calls attention to the marked improvement that has been effected in twenty-five years. The slaughterings by decree of kings, the sacrifices by order of priests, are ended, and, if cannibalism is not, its practice has passed out of the category of universal custom into that of a secret and, so far as possible, concealed proclivity, of which the black himself is either ashamed or under the eye of the law apprehensive as to the personal consequences. The Bishop's early letters dilate on the heavy and seemingly hopeless nature of the task before him. The later letters embodying the experience of nearly thirty years denote confidence and hope in the ultimate regeneration of the blacks. Bishop Augouard has indeed only one misgiving. He does not conceal his fear that much mischief may be done by European visionaries who would treat the black man exactly as if he were a white man, and who protest through ignorance against much that has to be done in weaning the negro from his old savage ways, and above all things in accustoming him to regular, peaceful work.

Bishop Augouard, besides being a zealous missionary, is a practical man of affairs who has had to cope with great difficulties, and has overcome them by his own personal efforts as well as example. He has no belief in the ideas of arm-chair theorists who call for the creation of Utopias, which do not exist even in this ancient centre of civilisation called Europe. If the negro is to be raised permanently in the scale of humanity it must be done, he says, by hard work on the spot, and not by the drafting of model constitutions and regulations for his sudden conversion into an up-to-date European by his friends and admirers here. The motives as well as the knowledge of Bishop Augouard in expressing opinions that are associated with practical men of affairs, officials and statesmen, rather than with missionaries, cannot be suspected, although, as he seems himself to be aware, they are likely to evoke the clamorous protests of the emotional sympathisers with our black brethren.

Bishop Augouard's correspondence—which is especially valuable because it was certainly never intended for publication, and his editor gives the assurance that even now it has been published without the author's knowledge—contains very many references to the radical difficulty and problem in Africa. It is nothing more complicated to all seeming than to induce the black man to work as the white races have to. Some of the difficulties of the question are revealed in the following passage:

Work! Labour! There is the most important question, to which all others are of secondary importance. . . . From the moment of my arrival on the Congo, and more especially since my being placed at the head of the important Ubanghi vicariat, I have striven to put in practice two essentially colonising ideas. They are the spreading of the French language, and the creation of native labourers. . . . Our main object is to teach our pupils a trade so that they may contribute later on towards the economic and industrial development of the colony. But the task is not easy. . . . The blacks have no wants, and despite their primitive simplicity they fully realise that if the whites ask them to work it is only for the purpose of exploiting them.

This subject, especially with regard to the much discussed rubber collection, is dealt with in the following quotation, which states some of the difficulties well known to African administrators in English-speaking as well as French-speaking colonies of the dark Continent:

The want of labour is also a continual source of discussion and content. The natives sell ivory freely enough because they have a reserve stock, or because they can get it by an elephant hunt. But on the other hand they are disinclined to manual labour, and especially to the collection of rubber, because it often entails covering a good deal of ground in the forest. Still it is absolutely necessary to make the natives extract this precious gum on their own account, for if their work were paid by a daily wage the result would not cover the cost of collection. The black man works as little as possible, and it is difficult to superintend a considerable number when they are scattered in the forest looking for the precious liana. When the collection has been made they carefully refrain from bringing in the whole quantity collected. They skilfully conceal part, which they sell to the nearest rival, who is naturally ready to buy all that is brought him.

These extracts are interesting as referring to some of the minor details, but the whole question is treated in the following paragraph, which defines the problem with an exactitude approximating to the method of Euclid:

There is no use now discussing the legitimacy or not of the general division of Africa among the Great Powers. France has her good share of it, and whether she likes it or not she cannot stand aloof from this serious African question. The accomplished fact must be recognised. Let us have no delusions. Left to himself the black will remain steeped in idleness and ignorance as he has lived during centuries. A complete social condition of things has to be changed, and the way of living among an entire people is not altered in a day or without much effort. Over almost the whole of Africa work, and specially work on the land, is a dishonour, and is left to the women r slaves. How is such a state of things to be changed, more specially as it accords so well with the heat of the climate, and with the long-inherited laziness of the unhappy blacks? Two ways offer themselves. The first is moral training by religion, which will make the blacks understand that work is not dishonouring. Further instruction will show them the need of learning different trades in order to raise themselves out of the state of inferiority and degradation in which they are at this moment. This must be a matter of time, for the missions and the schools are still not sufficiently numerous to extend their influence over the whole of the colony.

The second way would be more rapid and more effective, but it must be employed with great firmness combined with extreme prudence. It is enforced labour.

I already hear the exclamations of the negrophils who protest that this is simply a return to "the old slavery." By this reckoning the Frenchman is the most hardly used of slaves with his taxes, his prestations, his military service and his rude labour! By asking of the blacks only a tenth part of what is required of the whites in Europe marvellous results will be secured in Africa.

The black man having no wants and living only from day to day without troubling about the morrow will only work if he is forced to do so. The black man will only be civilised despite himself, and since France has extended her protectorate over these regions she has assumed the obligation of introducing progress and civilisation there. This theory, I do not doubt, will give rise to clamour, and many will cry out "Slavery!" I may reply that having lived on the Congo more than twenty-four years [in 1902] and having devoted my life to the unhappy blacks I am in a position to know what best would suit France and the blacks themselves.

Bishop Augouard's letters furnish exceptionally interesting reading, simply because he has known how to make his own life interesting despite the difficulties and depressing conditions in which it has been passed. The majority of men, whether missionaries or ordinary mortals, would have been disheartened by the trying and often sad experiences which he has borne with unflinching equanimity and steadfastness of purpose. The climatic conditions alone would excuse some diminution of zeal in those who, unprepared for what awaits them, go out to convert the heathen in tropical Africa; but M. Augouard contents himself with remarking in one of his letters that it would not do for persons afraid of thunder to come here, because it thunders for eight hours without ceasing every night during the wet season. A sad passage refers to the death in eighteen months of thirteen of the priests of his mission, all French and young men. But despite these saddening episodes, Bishop Augouard remains cheerful and confident to the end of this correspondence, which leaves him still in the active discharge of his episcopal duties. The extent of his diocese may be inferred from the fact that his congregations, spread over the whole of the French Congo, speak eighteen different languages. With the record of his work as benefactor of the negro races in their material condition, as well as their guide and would-be converter in a spiritual sense, fresh in our mind, his boast that "French missionaries are the best of Frenchmen, and the best pioneers of civilisation" does not seem unfounded or much exaggerated. But that it would be impossible to preserve the charm of style that characterises this correspondence, "Twenty-eight Years on the Congo" should certainly be translated for the benefit of the English student of African problems.

DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER.

THE SAVIOUR OF THE DAUPHIN?

A Friend of Marie Antoinette (Lady Atkyns). Translated from the French of FREDERIC BARBEY. (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d.)

THIS is—alas! that it should be so—a most disappointing book. Indeed, one is tempted to ask oneself, when wading through the excellent translation of M. Barbey's work, whether that distinguished writer really made the best of his material. M. Sardou, who contributes a little preface, evidently considers that, thanks to M. Barbey's researches, the mystery of Louis XVII. is on the eve of solution.

Would that we could agree with him; for it may be doubted whether any historical problem is of deeper and more painful interest to the student.

The friend of Marie Antoinette, whose romantic personality has been evolved from out of the past by M. Barbey, was before her marriage to Sir Edward Atkyns a beautiful young London actress of good character, who, as "Charlotte Walpole," won for some two years the suffrages of the eighteenth-century playgoer at Drury Lane. Shortly after their marriage Sir Edward took his bride abroad to Versailles, the French Court being in those days the Mecca of the English social world. Lady Atkyns, pretty, charming, and evidently even at that time more than a little "fond and foolish," was made much of by the Court, and Marie Antoinette, then in the zenith of her beauty and of her power, soon became really intimate with the young Englishwoman. If M. Barbey, who seems to have had the good fortune to find intact the whole of Lady Atkyns's voluminous correspondence, had only published those of his heroine's letters which describe the Versailles of 1780, he would have earned our gratitude. He has preferred to concentrate himself on Lady Atkyns's later relations with the French royal family; but here, again, when we get, as it were, at the kernel of the book, the volume is full of tantalising lacunae.

If we read between the lines, it becomes clear that Lady Atkyns was not only on terms of close friendship with the queen, and was trusted by her with every kind of state secret, but that she was also intimately connected with the many plots for the rescue of first one and then another member of the royal family. Novelists notwithstanding, a love of intrigue and of taking part in political conspiracies is seldom synonymous with either sense or mental power; the wise man and the sensible woman keep instinctively clear of such dangerous imbroglios. The course of Lady Atkyns's whole life proves that she was neither wise nor sensible, but she had, as the French say, the qualities of her faults: she was generous and enthusiastic, and spent her time, her health, and her money in futile attempts to rescue, first the royal lady to whom she was romantically devoted, and later the poor little boy known to posterity by the title which he never bore during his short life.

By dint of determination and, it is hinted, by the expenditure of a very large sum by way of bribe, Lady Atkyns actually spent an hour alone with Marie Antoinette in the Conciergerie, and she hoped to persuade the queen to change clothes with her and thus escape. Will it be believed that of that important hour M. Barbey gives no definite account, nor any details of the letter or document which must surely be his authority for stating that the interview ever took place? To our thinking he even fails to establish what is now generally admitted to be probably the fact: namely, that the miserable dumb child who finally died in the Temple had been substituted weeks or months before his death for the son of Louis XVI. Lady Atkyns always believed that the royal boy was actually freed by her exertions, and that he was on his way to the coast to be given up into her hands, when he was kidnapped by some person or persons unknown. But while we are given some sort of evidence which goes a long way to prove that one and probably two boys successively were substituted for Louis XVII., there is no evidence to show that the royal child ever left the Temple alive.

It should be added that the book contains interesting sidelights on the period, and that vivid glimpses are shown of many well-known and of some new and important personalities of that day. The Princess de Tarente's letters, given in the appendix, make excellent reading, and reveal a curious and ardent feminine personality. M. Barbey also resuscitates the amazing and amusing Baron Auerweck, who played so odd and ambiguous a rôle in the continental politics of a hundred and ten years ago, and whose memoirs, if any exist, should form fascinating reading.

A SONG OF REMEMBRANCE

I AND my heart alone,
In a world so fair,
Found nothing to call our own
Of all that was there.

I and my heart forgot,
In the tears that we shed,
All but the things that are not; . . .
All but the dead.

"THE GREATER LOVE"

Two loves I ever hold apart :
Two loves, to make my life complete.
One holds me folded to his heart,
One draws me to his feet.

And he who loves as humans love,
I give him part, but not the whole ;
And he who loves as God above
Has all my heart and soul !

ETHEL EDWARDS
(Ethel Ashton).

DAYS AND HOURS

OF the many bores that afflict the editorial mind it would perhaps be not much of an exaggeration to say that the greatest is the minor poet when he or she begins to celebrate the advent of a season. Those who have not had experience would scarcely believe the immense number of little poems which are annually written and submitted for consideration, on spring especially, and on summer, autumn, and winter as these come round. Not only so, but the approach of a month brings with it a cloud of verses. May, perhaps, inspires more than any of the others, but no single month is so unobtrusive but that it has been made the subject of innumerable poems. Year after year the same thing continues. It would appear that no sooner does the budding poet feel able to rhyme two words than he looks at the calendar to see what month it is, and down goes April, May, June, or one of the other twelve, with a poem to follow. It is true that not all the poems are on the same level of mediocrity. Now and then there arrives some fine piece of versification, the discovery of which is ample reward for having to wade through such endless piles of rubbish. It seems so easy, and yet in reality it is most difficult to write well on these simple themes. Any one who casts a retrospective glance over English literature will easily recognise on how very few occasions our greatest poets have been at their best in chanting, for instance, of the gladness of spring. We look to Shakespeare for excellence in nearly every department of poetry, and yet we doubt whether here he is so absolutely pre-eminent. The prettiest song of spring in the plays is, to my mind, the well-known one in As You Like It.

It was a lover and his lass,
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
That o'er the green corn-field did pass
In the spring time, the only pretty ring time,
When birds do sing, hey ding a ding, ding :
Sweet lovers love the spring.

This is fine, and renders delicately and beautifully, like the song of some woodland bird, the spirit of spring ; yet it is not Shakespeare at his very highest, and is not quite equal to that splendid ecstasy of

Hark, hark ! the lark at heaven's gate sings,
And Phœbus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs
On chaliced flowers that lies;
And winking Mary-buds begin

To ope their golden eyes :
With every thing that pretty is,
My lady sweet, arise :
Arise, arise.

If Shakespeare did write the finest song of spring, this, we feel sure, was it, just as Ariel's song is the unequalled, unmatched and unrivalled song of the sea.

Come unto these yellow sands,
And then take hands :
Courtsied when you have and kiss'd
The wild waves whist,
Foot it feathly here and there ;
And, sweet sprites, the burthen bear.

But, if asked to name what, in my opinion, is the poem that conveys most of the very spirit of spring, I would not search in the pages of Shakespeare, but turn to a still older favourite. It is written in language that sounds uncouth to us now, and yet in spite of that has ever retained plenty of admirers from the thirteenth century, when it probably was written, till the twentieth.

Sumer is icumen in, loud sing cuckoo !
Groweth seed and bloweth mead and springeth the wood nu !
Ewe bleateth after lamb, loweth after calve cu,
Bullock sterteth, buck verteth, merry sing cuckoo !
Cuckoo ! cuckoo !
Wel singes thu cuckoo : ne swick thu naver nu.

It is very difficult to show by analysis the difference between one fine piece of poetry and another, but if beside that we place such a little masterpiece in its way as, for instance, Mr. William Watson's "April," we can at least see that one star differs from another star in glory. Even Wordsworth is scarcely at his best as an interpreter in his poem "In Early Spring," and the well-known piece of Browning's, called "Home Thoughts from Abroad," has more of the spring feeling, but less poetry. Perhaps next to the piece we have quoted there ought to be placed Herrick's "Corinna's going a Maying."

Get up, get up for shame, the Blooming Morn
Upon her wings presents the god unshorne.
See how Aurora throws her faire
Fresh-quilted colours through the aire :
Get up, sweet Slug-a-bed, and see
The Dew-bespangling Herbe and Tree.
Each Flower has wept, and bow'd toward the East,
Above an houre since ; yet you not drest,
Nay ! not so much as out of bed ?
When all the Birds have Mattens seyed,
And sung their thankfull Hymnes : 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation to keep in,
Whenas a thousand Virgins on this day,
Spring, sooner then the Lark, to fetch in May,

But there is just a suspicion of consciousness in those very appropriate adjectives that throws into contrast the spontaneous gladness of the unknown early singer, and we do not know of anything that renders the delicate, almost imperceptible melancholy of spring so splendidly as does a poet of the eighth century in lines which have been thus modernised :

Soon as ever thou shalt listen on the edges of the cliff
To the cuckoo in the copse-wood, chanting of his sorrow,
Then begin to seek the sea, where the sea-mew is at home ;
Sit thee in the sea-bark, so that to the southward
Thou mayest light upon thy lover, o'er the ocean pathways
Where thy Lord with longing looks and waits for thee.

In these lines the charm is at once so poignant and so illusive that they rest us, we scarcely know why. The very air seems full of tender and beautiful poetry. If we turn from spring and summer, the poets have not really been more successful. There is, however, one winter picture which stands out above all the others. Needless to say it is Shakespeare's :

When icicles hang by the wall
And Dick the shepherd blows his nail,
And Tom bears logs into the hall,
And milk comes frozen home in pail ;

When blood is nipt, and ways be foul,
Then nightly sings the staring owl
    Tu-whit!
Tu-who! A merry note!
While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.

When all about the wind doth blow,
And coughing drowns the parson's saw,
And birds sit brooding in the snow,
And Marian's nose looks red and raw;
When roasted crabs hiss in the bowl—
Then nightly sings the staring owl
    Tu-whit!
Tu-who! A merry note!
While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.

No doubt there are many people who would set up a different standard and select passages in their favourite poems that appeal to them more than the lines we have quoted. Sooth to say, it is always rash to declare that one's choice is the absolute best. To do that would be intolerant; yet the only honest and sound criticism must be the expression of one's own predilection, and though the best to one may not be the best to another it is always of great importance to know what sayings of men and women have served the purpose to fellow mortals which Matthew Arnold said was the function of poetry—that is to comfort and sustain. But that function can never be adequately fulfilled save by an art that is divinely perfect, because no one can possibly cherish a fine and poetical phrase or passage from poetry in which the eye is continually detecting a flaw. And, again, many of the pipings of poets, even of great poets, are thin, though sweet and musical. While considering the subject dealt with here, a thousand passages came into the writer's mind, yet of all that great number scarcely one but was wanting in something. It might contain a verbal infelicity, it might lack strength or emotion; but, whatever the cause, very little of the poetry dealing with the seasons was able to withstand the sifting process.

A.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

SICK-ROOM FICTION

FACTS are stubborn things, we are told, and the facts which obtrude themselves upon the helpless sufferer bound fast to a sick bed are of a particularly obstinate and unconquerable nature. Leaving out of the count such weighty matters as procrastination of business and the worries attendant thereon, the yoking of a weakened body to a mind abnormally active, there are certain minor facts which claim the attention of the patient with irritating persistence. That crack on the ceiling which would have so exactly portrayed the map of England if Devon and Cornwall had not been cut off by the cornice—how annoying to be unable to remove the obstacle, yet how difficult to construct the peninsula with such an impediment in the way! The wall-paper, at ordinary times bearing an innocent design of roses and foliage, now wreathes itself with grinning faces, the more repulsive because, though nose and mouth and eyes are there, the chin is wanting, and the green pigtail which completes the head is unevenly attached! Then the impatient wonder as to whether the greater comfort ensured by restoring the slippery pillow to its accustomed place would be worth the exertion of raising one's head; as to whether it would be expedient to ring the bell that the blind may be lowered, or whether on the whole it might not be more profitable to wait till somebody came in.

Such slight matters as these assume a quite unnatural importance, and the relief of having one's mind diverted and one's thoughts pleasantly occupied by the sayings and doings of imaginary persons is proportionately great.

From the very earliest age the aid of fiction is invaluable in the sick-room as promoting repose of mind and consequently hastening recovery. I knew a baby boy once who, while still teething, was helped through many a feverish night by the recital of a certain tale, which in his inarticulate fashion he entitled "Tom-'n-d'-apple-tree." At intervals of broken slumber the little flushed cheek would be raised from the pillow and the little hand outstretched.

"Tom-'n-d'-apple-tree!"

Straightway the tired watcher began again, being speedily pulled up if Towzer barked a moment too soon, or if the delinquent Tom began his perilous slide down from the tree before Farmer Brown appeared at the gate.

Looking back upon one's own past, one's first definite recollections of fiction are invariably associated with physic. In one's nursery days the former served as an antidote to the latter. One sees again the railed cot in the corner by the fire, one feels all the importance of lying abed while little sisters' toilets are progressing; one could almost shudder in recalling the slow tread down the long passage and the opening of the door, revealing the advancing figure of old Nurse armed with cup and spoon.

A breakfast-cup, if you please! No cachets or tabloids were thought of in those days. On came the kindly old executioner, her wrinkled, apple-blossom face wreathed with meretricious smiles, her persuasive Irish tongue multiplying inducements and endearments.

"Now then, alanna, it'll be down in a moment! Shut your eyes and hold your nose, and it will be gone before you know where you are!"

How could one shut one's eyes when one was so anxious to calculate the extent of one's misery, or hold a nose at that time exiguous in nature and rendered slippery with ineffectual tears?

But the nauseous potion is disposed of at last, and Nurse cuts short the injured protests which succeed it by the welcome announcement:

"Now, mavourneen, I'll make ye some toast for your breakfast, and I'll tell ye a story."

The combination was too delightful to be resisted. Smiles succeeded tears as one selected one's particular "wanity" in the matter of toast, and composed oneself to listen. One discarded, of course, ordinary toast in favour of "French" toast, which, as every one knows, necessitates the buttering of the bread before submitting it to the action of the flames; or steamed toast, which was simply prepared by holding a thick slice close to the spout of a boiling-kettle. When quite saturated and buttered hot it afforded a very good imitation of a tea-cake, and possessed the further advantage of being extremely unwholesome.

The selection of the story took rather more time. Nurse only possessed three in her repertoire. "Blue-Beard," which was comparatively commonplace; "The Little Man and the Little Woman who lived in the Vinegar Bottle," which was exciting but short, and, moreover, tantalising to the juvenile mind as being wanting in verisimilitude; and "The Spider and the Gout," a delicious folk-tale which I have endeavoured to relate elsewhere ("North, South, and Over the Sea"). The "Gout" was always spoken of as if it were a living thing, and was supposed by the small listener to be a kind of insect. It would be impossible to describe the raciness which the narrative received from the quaint phraseology and varying facial expression of the story-teller. The "weeshy-dawshy" Little Man was of so sociable a turn that directly the stopper was removed from the vinegar bottle he popped out his head and invited somebody to dinner. Indignation of the "weeshy-dawshy" Little Woman, who pulled him down by the legs and thrusting forth her head, requested the guests to stay away. Obstinate goodwill on the part of the Little Man, who, pushing her aside in her turn, once more looked out upon the world and cried, "Company, company, come!" Fury of the Little Woman, who, reverting to her former tactics, inhospitably shrieked, "Company, company, go!"

The story was disappointing, nevertheless, in having no definite end, whereas the other two, as we knew by experience, finished in the most satisfactory manner possible. One never doubted for a moment that Sister Anne would see somebody coming, any more than one troubled oneself over the misadventures of the Spider and the Gout in the rich man's and poor man's houses respectively, knowing, as one did, that by changing places all would be set right, and that the Gout would revel in velvet cushions and port wine, while the Spider spun his webs undisturbed in the cabin-window.

At a later period one fell under the spell of Dickens. Imagine the delight of the Christmas Books and the opening chapters of David Copperfield to an imaginative child! I have ever found Dickens a welcome visitor in the sick-room, though long familiarity has induced—not contempt, far from it indeed!—but a certain nicety of selection; one picks and chooses which scene shall be enacted for one's delectation before one rings up the curtain. The same applies to other giants of the craft: they are too big, too important to be permitted to dally long in converse with a sufferer. One is not in a condition to appreciate the subtleties of Meredith, the delicate art of Stevenson, and "the big bow-wow" of which Sir Walter Scott himself speaks is too noisy for the sick-room. Thackeray's occasionally uncomfortable views of human nature strike the prisoner there as painfully true; certain poignant passages in Hardy and George Eliot positively haunt one. Poor Fanny Robins dragging herself in her extremity to Casterbridge Union; the murder-scene in Tess; Hetty Sorrel's journey and its climax—such pages as these dwell in the memory, pervading feverish slumbers, weighing upon one in waking hours.

It may be noted, indeed, that the sick instinctively dread any strong call upon their emotions; this peculiarity is equally noticeable in the old. Anything that demands intense admiration, deep pity, violent abhorrence, whether in actual life or in the pages of a book, is felt to be a strain to which they are unable to make adequate response. In the feebleness induced either by illness or the weight of years one likes to be gently amused, not violently agitated—even by pleasurable emotions, to laugh in moderation, and not to cry at all. It is the young and healthy who in a manner revel in sorrow and take their joys seriously.

Sick-room fiction is best administered in selected portions; though other rich dainties are forbidden, the plums of literature may be indulged in without restraint. A few, a very few books may be read from cover to cover without undue excitement or subsequent pain. Such a book as "Cranford," for instance, or to cite more modern examples, "Elizabeth and her German Garden," or "A Lane Dog's Diary." And I know one author, only one, who is welcome to the invalid in her entirety.

A recent illness was lightened for the present writer by the sympathetic society of the incomparable Jane Austen, whose works were read aloud to her in succession and from beginning to end, just as she had reached the captious stage of convalescence. What a delightful company is that to which Jane introduces us! Sunny, high-spirited Emma, gentle Ann Elliot, Catherine so lovable in her naïveté; Elizabeth Bennet, queen of them all. And then Mrs. Jennings, Miss Bates, Mr. Collins—how life-like they are! Could anything be more graphic than that description of Admiral and Mrs. Croft's drive in the one-horse chaise, the Admiral holding the reins to which Mrs. Croft occasionally gives a better direction, judiciously "putting out her hand" whenever they were in danger of taking a post, falling into a rut, or running foul of a cart? Then the Admiral's joy over their lodgings at Bath, which he likes all the better because they remind him of those they had when they first kept house, a penniless couple, at North Yarmouth. "The wind blows through the cupboards in just the same way."

Not one of these personages but possesses its own individuality. After one has lived in their society for a day or two they assume such actuality that one is inclined to ask a chance visitor if Miss Woodhouse has been seen lately, or: "How does my sweet Ann Elliot do to-day?" One has, moreover, a distinct consciousness of Jane's own personality—one could almost fancy her coming in round the screen, dressed in her brown muslin and carrying her useful little bag. One would submit to the application of any remedy which Jane might produce from that little bag, from lavender drops to hartshorn; and with what satisfaction would one watch that expressive face of hers with its bright eyes and humorous lips!

A recent biographer of Jane Austen has found fault with her for some remarks in her delicious gossiping letters to Cassandra; for one in particular, which describes, if I remember aright, a certain Mrs. So-and-so who appeared at an assembly "the same as ever—pink husband, fat neck, plain daughters and all." In this the commentator detects signs of impending shrewishness, and opines that the removal of Jane and her family to Bath came only just in time to avert that calamity. Dear Jane, how she would have laughed at such an idea! The same chronicler compares her humour with that of Dickens, to the disadvantage of the latter. But why Jane Austen and Dickens? The theory would seem to be worked out on much the same principle as that apparent in certain phrases with which we are familiar in the pages of Ollendorff: "The tooth-pick of the uncle is more valuable than the pincushion of the aunt." Jane Austen was quick-witted indeed, ready of tongue no doubt, and marvelously felicitous in her power of drawing a character by a mere stroke of the pen; but ill-natured—unkindly—satirical! One has but to glance at the pages of "Emma" to realise what she herself thought of such a fault.

Among all her heroines there is but one perhaps who is unsympathetic—the terribly sensible Eleanor Dashwood. Miss Austen has shown her wisdom in mating her with Edward Ferrers, who admires a fine country "because it unites beauty with utility," and who, looking upon a picturesque valley, remarks that "it must be dirty in winter." One feels a certain satisfaction in realising that this couple finally settled down in a small parsonage and never had more than five or six hundred a year.

Those endings of Jane's, how appropriate they are! How well one knows that everything will ultimately come right, and that all the couples will pair off in the most satisfactory manner possible. But this does not in the least spoil one's interest—one is curious till the very last chapter to know exactly how Jane will manage it, in what manner that deft hand of hers will remove obstacles and create stepping-stones. But she never leaves one in doubt. On the very first introduction of Mr. Elliot, though he is represented as a very pleasant and charming man, and, moreover, a person "of consequence," we are made to feel that Jane does not approve of him, and that Ann will never be persuaded into accepting him. In the same way we are not deceived when Catherine is ignominiously expelled from Northanger Abbey; and though she is but a poor parson's daughter, and the subsequent mention of her portion of three thousand pounds takes us somewhat by surprise, we are quite prepared to read on the last page: "Henry and Catherine were married, the bells rang and everybody smiled."

It is the old story over again: the story familiar to nursery hearers, how Sister Ann did see somebody coming, and how the woodcutter came in time to prevent Red Riding Hood from being devoured by the Wolf. Perhaps that is why Jane Austen's company is so acceptable during an illness; for the sick, as I have said, have many traits of resemblance to the old, and the old have much in common with little children.

M. E. FRANCIS.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Glamour and Vision," by Edward Wright.]

FICTION

Simple Annals. By M. E. FRANCIS (MRS. FRANCIS BLUNDELL.) (Longmans, 6s.)

MRS. BLUNDELL says in her Foreword that a golden thread runs through the homespun of even the most commonplace life. In each of these stories she has followed the golden thread. The village girls are innocent and charming, the men are chivalrous—their purpose is invariably marriage, and courtships end, as they should, with wedding-bells. The seamy side of ignorance and poverty is kept in the background, even when the picture is of "Mrs. Angel," the uncertified midwife, who feeds babies with cinder tea and their mothers with muffins and whisky. The misery, disease and dirt for which the woman is responsible are not glossed over, yet Mrs. Blundell skilfully persuades us to feel some compassion for the poor old sinner when she is ousted by the new, up-to-date trained nurse. Mrs. Angel missed her occupation; she missed the babies in whom she had ever taken such keen interest and delight. So a baby is brought to her by a dying mother and left to her care: to "bits" and the tail of a smoked haddock and cinder tea. But the baby flourishes. The tune of the story demands that it should. We have no quarrel with Mrs. Blundell's optimism, for we believe that her sympathetic sketch of Mrs. Angel, for instance, is just as useful and far pleasanter than harrowing histories of the tragedies to be laid at her door. Indeed, our only quarrel is with her claim in the Foreword to call these charming fables "studies." For that, they are surely too slight and too determinedly optimistic. They are fine-weather impressions, and we all enjoy fine weather. But a persistent picture of it is just what reminds us that some never survive the storm.

A Mender of Nets. By WILLIAM MACKAY. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

JENNIE SEBBON, the real mender of nets, is a far less important personage in these pages than Daniel Wormald, the Nessborough Town Councillor, unless he may also claim the title in a metaphorical sense. In Wormald the author gives us an able, lifelike, and minute portrait of a rare type in municipal life. Born with a faculty for affairs, he is driven to his career by the impulse of his own aptitudes, moved neither by vanity nor self-interest, but by a desire to control the governing machinery of Nessborough for the progress and prosperity of the community. While still on the sunny side of middle age he finds himself rich beyond his youthful ambition, and the most considerable man in Nessborough. So far the author does not labour in vain to interest us in his paragon among civic magnates, who, endowed with every public virtue, has not a single foible that we can smile at, else we had liked him better. But no man is perfect to the modern biographer. Wormald, like many another great man, is dual natured; there is a world of difference between his public honour and his private conscience. Unluckily he falls in love, not with Miss Rutter-Johnstone, "the Parish Aunt," his fitting mate, did he but know it, but with the beautiful and ignorant Jennie Seaborn, or Sebbon, a mender of nets, whose parentage remains for ever a secret of the sea. This wonderful man of business and ruler of men, with all his tact and charm, and the irresistible way of him, is a shocking bad lover; he brings neither experience nor instinct to the wooing of Jennie, and makes a sad mess of it altogether. Love calls out the worst of him. He intrigues with the nuns against Jennie's religious convictions; he maroons her sailor sweetheart on some South Pacific isle; he is guilty of a baseness which is called "a little crime"; in fact, he is diabolically patient in evil doing until he brings the modest and loyal Jennie to his feet with the melodramatic cry: "Do with me as you will." It is all possible, of course, on the assumption that a lover, like a father of a family, is capable of everything, but the manner of it strikes the reader as antiquated from so progressive and "up-to-date" a person as Wormald. Still, it is a fine, bold portrait of one aspect of him, and worthy a place among other successes from the same hand, though it is not perhaps altogether the happiest choice of character in general interest. Miss Rutter-Johnstone is a fresh and welcome creation; we recall nobody quite like her in modern fiction: a clever, all-round, manly woman, blessed with a sense of humour, and an utter indifference to ridicule, yet under her masculine attitude towards life not without feminine dreams, and even schemes for their fulfilment. Some light relief and amusement are furnished by Wormald's colleagues and that wise fool the Town Crier, and there are picturesque scenes and illustrative incidents of the hard lives of the fisher-folk. Mr. Mackay is a conscientious writer with a sarcastic touch in dealing with public men and public affairs; but though his satire is often keen it is rarely ill-natured. To do justice to his careful and elaborately worked out story, the reader should bring both leisure and an undivided attention to the perusal of these pages.

Dearlove. By FRANCES CAMPBELL. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

DEARLOVE, we are told, was the only child in all her family; a child of unexpected moods, and chiefly happy ones, not precocious yet strangely wise, devoutly pious and sometimes exasperatingly naughty. She is all this and more, and one of the most natural, lovable, amusing children to be found in or out of a book. She plays the chief rôle, and is the life of Mrs. Campbell's story of a "Summer's make-believe"; but there is also Reggie with his "ill body and beautiful soul," whose devotion to the strangers who take him into Dearlove's holiday scheme is as pathetic as Mrs. Campbell meant it to be. She tells her tale with complete understanding of children and their ways; and heart as well as skill goes to make it the charming book it is. A thread of grown-up interest runs through Dearlove's holiday, a chapter of family history, a spice of romance, plenty of fun, sunshine and kindness. It is an April story of smiles and tears, a book for readers of any age. Few will resist Dearlove, whatever her mood, or the charm and frank kindness of the Amherst family, one and all. Perhaps "Chris," Lord Inverona, will be the first favourite among the grown-ups; his management of Dearlove, his "boon companion" in her wildest moments, and his ways with Reggie are very prettily described. If in a future edition Dearlove's dream at the end of the book could be omitted, so much the better; it is so glaringly a dream for a purpose that it spoils the effect of the closing pages. Dearlove herself is too delightful and whimsical a character to drift lightly away into the reader's "forgettory."

Mara. The Story of an Unconventional Woman. By CHRIS HEALY. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

ALL the ingredients that go to the making of what is known as a powerful novel are in striking evidence in Mr. Healy's book: cheating at cards, a livid lash across the culprit's face, the untimely death of the hard-riding, hard-drinking, hard-living squire, usher the indomitable heroine, Mara, the squire's daughter of sixteen, into life, and life at its bottom rung—the workhouse, with the determination not to come back to her native village except as mistress of the house. Her adventures are on the same thrilling level, cunningly touched in with true peeps at "real life" behind the scenes—in the workhouse, in a Salvation Army shelter and other exciting places. The hero, too, is just what is wanted. A bad lot (drink and cards), he is pulled up on the downward path by a vision of Mara, who was his neighbour in the country in better days: he steadies himself and begins to work; gradually, through vicissitudes and an occasional sight of Mara, he prospers, and, just as he has been raised to a good salaried position at his works, his father dies repentant, or, rather, forgiving, and he becomes a peer of the realm. The "curtain" is equally powerful; and wedding-bells sound brightly to the accompaniment of the chink-chink of good golden sovereigns, after a moment of dreadful suspense connected with paralysis and Mara's face. We think it is a pity that Mr. Healy should have put his cleverly observed pictures of a certain side of life into such a commonplace and sensational setting.

The House of Shadows. By REGINALD FARRER. (Arnold, 6s.)

MR. REGINALD FARRER is, let us hope, a very young man whose omniscience may be modified by experience of life. It is difficult to say whether he is more ignorant of the society in which he places his characters, or of the church to which they belong. Marchionesses of ancient blood do not drink cups of coffee in the stalls of a theatre, nor do they drag into every sentence the name of the person they are addressing. We doubt too whether any great gentleman, such as the Dean in this story, would have lived on the moneys of a Church in whose doctrines he had ceased to believe. Mr. Farrer's grandees are of the stage and the penny novelette, and his humour smacks of farce. The Church Catholic, with the eternal mysteries underlying her dogmas and ceremonies, is not the rickety structure built on hell fire of Mr. Farrer's belief. His own religion, like the world before creation, is "without form and void." It is only bad taste that can load a novel with such terrible pathological details as those of Mr. Ladon's illness. Happily, the disease is neither common nor hereditary; but the less the public knows about it the better for its sanity. The victim, Tempest Ladon, is a north-country squire of ancient lineage, who marries a young Italian lady. Elena dies in giving birth prematurely to a son, and leaves behind her a casket of love-letters written, she says, to her husband, which he promises never to read. The son, St. John, in his turn, marries a beautiful middle-class girl and brings her home to his father, who hates her as she hates him. Meanwhile Tempest discovers that he is dying of sarcoma, and is so afraid of hell-fire if he commits suicide that he tries to persuade his son to take the chances of damnation and kill him. Ultimately the daughter-in-law is tempted into handing him the over-dose which ends him, but not before he has discovered that Elena's letters were written to an Italian cousin, who is the real father of St. John. There is not a lovable character in this unpleasantly morbid book, if we except the nebulous Dean and Lisa the cat; but it is clever enough to make us hope that, when Mr. Farrer has read more widely and thought more sanely, he may yet do good work.

FINE ART

THE ART OF THE PLAIN

WITH the most amiable intentions it is difficult to say any good of the Summer Exhibition at the New Gallery. To the applied-art section we can give praise almost unqualified, for it is severely limited, and the jewelled hair ornaments and pendants of the principal exhibitor, M. Lucien Gaillard, are of a chastened elegance, while there is often real beauty as well as richness in the more matronly jewelry of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Gaskin. But it is to other establishments in Regent Street rather than to the New Gallery that we are accustomed to go to view jewelry. Here we expect to see pictures and sculpture. Pictures and sculpture of a kind there are; but of a kind that will give the educated stranger a very poor opinion of contemporary British art.

Sophisticated persons know better than to expect great things from our two mammoth summer exhibitions. Already the provinces are waking up to the fact that we must look outside the Royal Academy and the New Gallery for what is most alive and sincere in modern art—witness the success of the International at Bradford, the New English at Liverpool, and the Scottish painters at Brighton—and though the suburbs are not yet freed from the awe inspired by the numbers and titular distinctions of these summer exhibitors, the Londoner is no longer disposed unquestioningly to accept their work as great art. But being of a tolerant and merciful disposition he would not that either institution be destroyed for the sake of the ten righteous exhibitors who peradventure shall be found there. Searching for these ten at the New Gallery we begin to fear the moment for destruction has arrived. In the list at the end of the catalogue it is easy to find some dozen exhibitors whose work in the past has been counted unto them for righteousness, but if we take the novel course of judging these men not by their names but by their present exhibits we shall be saddened to find that communication with the New Gallery seems to have corrupted the manner of their art.

To Mr. Walter Crane we must ever be indebted for many decorative designs and story-book illustrations as beautiful as they are appropriate. But can our gratitude for those make us condone his Prometheus Unbound (170)? In colour it is crude, in drawing unsympathetic, and in conception it suggests far more the lawlessness of a Sansculotte throttling the imperial eagle of Order, than the heroism of a Titan who braved Jove's ire for humanity. Far preferable is the pendant allegorical picture Spiritus Adversus Carnem (163), by Mr. James Clark. A frank and obvious imitation of Watts's style of subject, it is at least a tolerable imitation of Watts's style of painting. To greatness, save in dimensions, it has no claim, but the figures typifying Flesh and Spirit are well-handled and the colour scheme is not unpleasant. Mr. Brangwyn's A Wine Shop (167), which hangs between these two, is something of a disappointment. Contrasted with the majority of the exhibits it is a masterpiece, for his paint has quality, his colour is rich and harmonious. But compared with what Mr. Brangwyn has done it is a minor work, a trifle heavy, a little dull.

Obtuse, indeed, must be the critic who regards inequality as a sin in a painter. It is through unsuccessful experiments that successful progress is made. Therefore let it suffice to express regret at the number of not altogether happy experiments made this year by capable artists. That a portrait-painter's standard of excellence should vary is natural and excusable. Some sitters must necessarily interest him vastly more than others, and few painters can afford to decline uncongenial commissions. Judging from results, one imagines that Mr. Lavery was more interested, and rightly so, in the winsome incarnation of English girlhood who posed for Mary Reading (154) than in his other sitters, while Mr. George Henry must surely have taken a keener pleasure in painting The Hour Glass (97) than in "knocking off" his child portrait of Rosalind (204). For the Academic banality of the latter we are inclined to censure Mr. Henry severely, till we remember that patrons have ideas about art, ideas which often prove the undoing of a too amiable portrait-painter. In Summer Morn (258) Mr. Henry is evidently experimenting with a light-effect, and possibly more interested in the view from the London window than in the young lady standing by. Undeniably it is clever, but its complete success is doubtful.

Mr. Sargent, declining to treat the New Gallery seriously, is represented only by oil sketches, of which a strongly characterised portrait of Mr. Seymour Lucas (134) is by far the best. The portrait of Mr. Napier Hemy (145) is unwontedly inexpressive, while his Syrian studies, welcome for their fearless rendering of unadulterated sunlight, are successful in parts rather than as wholes. Professor Herkomer's portrait of Mrs. S. L. Lazarus (216) unpleasantly reminds us that it took a Gainsborough to smother a canvas in blue and keep the scheme tender and harmonious, while Mr. Byam Shaw's portrait of Miss Constance Collier (155) is downright offensive in the exaggerated realism of the pink roses and purple robe in which his sitter is effaced. Sir P. Burne-Jones, Bart., also sends a portrait of the same actress (1) which is as passively uninteresting as Mr. Shaw's is actively meretricious.

Quality, that indefinable virtue, lacking in these and too many other paintings at the New Gallery, is found in the contributions of Mr. Alfred Withers, Mr. Spenlove-Spenlove, Mr. Alfred East, Mr. Moffat Lindner, Mr. Peppercorn, Mr. D. Y. Cameron, and, of course, Mr. E. A. Hornel. But though their landscapes and open-air scenes are a much-needed relief after those of Messrs. MacWhirter and H. W. B. Davis, they merely repeat what they have done, and in some cases done better, for some years past. They show no advance, as Mr. Austen Brown does, while retaining all the quality which has long distinguished his work. For soundness of painting, expressive drawing, and rich harmonious colour his By the River (110) is without an equal here; while in Meadow Flowers (194) he shows a sensitiveness to the mysterious veil drawn by twilight, which reveals him as an unsuspected admirer of Carrière. This development in Mr. Austen Brown's art is seen to still better advantage in his beautiful Mother and Son, 10 p.m., at the Doré Gallery, where Mr. and Mrs. Austen Brown are holding a joint exhibition. En parenthèse, be it noted, that some of Mrs. Brown's effectively decorative coloured woodcuts are also exhibited in the balcony at the New Gallery.

Returning, somewhat reluctantly, to the Regent Street emporium, we wonder whether Mr. Max Bohm's Golden Hours (91), of so rich a promise both in the colour and quality of the paint, is the happy result of Mr. Brown's influence.

That delight of Mr. Max Beerbohm and other eminent personages, the gold-fish tank in the Central Hall, sufficiently indicates the inability of the directors to obtain a single piece of sculpture worthy to form its centrepiece. Mr. Tweed's crouching nude, Latona (530), with an expressively modelled back, is the most important exhibit, while Mr. Derwent Wood shows a highly finished plaster head, La Pensée (522), and three attractive sketches for garden statues. Some models and statuettes by Messrs. Basil Cotto, Alfred Drury, F. W. Pomeroy, and Prof. V. C. Bonanni are moderately interesting, while Mr. Gustav Natorp's Three Groups for Hyde Park Corner (516) are about as delectable as the Achilles statue, no better, and perhaps no worse.

Evidently it is time for Mr. Austen Brown to remove to Zoar.

THE REPORT OF THE NATIONAL ART COLLECTIONS FUND FOR 1905

THE National Art Collections Fund has just issued its second annual Report, which contains the record of a successful year. The Fund already numbered, at the end of 1905, six hundred and five subscribers, but it will need a large increase in membership before its permanent income is sufficiently large to enable it to acquire pictures of importance directly from their owners without the publicity entailed by the need of appealing to the public. Since the beginning of this year, however, the Fund has met with great encouragement and has strengthened its position very much by two events, not wholly unconnected. Its persistent efforts to secure the Rokeby Velasquez for the National Gallery have been crowned with success in spite of many obstacles, and just lately the King has been pleased to become Patron of the Society. The great interest aroused by the exhibition of the Venus and Cupid at Messrs. Agnew's Gallery and sustained by the announcement that an effort was being made to secure it by subscription for the National Gallery brought the Fund much more prominently before the notice of the public than the more modest achievements of the first year of its existence were able to do; and if all who confessed their pleasure in its final triumph by attending the delightful soirée given by the Society on March 13 at the New Gallery were to become subscribers to the Fund, it would attain at once to that influence and wealth which his Majesty's patronage will certainly bring more within its reach.

The chief event of 1905 itself was the purchase of Whistler's Nocturne in Blue and Silver (Old Battersea Bridge), which looked a forlorn exile, environed by early British Masters, in its temporary place on a screen in the National Gallery, but has now been removed to a more appropriate home among the moderns at Millbank. The other picture of the year was a small Cotman, presented to the National Gallery of Scotland. The illustration of this in the Report gives no idea of the merits of the picture to those who have not seen its colouring; the blues and yellows on which its charm depends are just of the kind which baffle the skill of the photographer. The British Museum received several drawings by the gift of individual members of the Fund. Among these was another Cotman, a remarkable drawing of a riverside fire at Norwich in 1829, a companion to one already acquired from the Reeve Collection. Of the three Italian drawings, one is of special interest from the fact, not mentioned in the Report, that it contains an inscription which, wrongly read, was the source of a false statement about Francia's death which was current in the older critical literature on that painter. A more modern work is the view of Westminster Bridge during its construction, by Canaletto; more modern still, the two characteristic drawings by Rodin in a style not likely to appeal to the public, but less mysterious than his water-colours in the recent International Exhibition. A beautiful jug of Rhodian ware, reproduced in colours, was purchased for the Victoria and Albert Museum with the assistance of the Fund; a Florentine albarello, or pharmacy jar, and a porcelain bowl of special interest were given to the British Museum, which also received a small collection of Anglo-Saxon jewelry, glass and pottery. A fine brazier in cast bronze, of Italian Renaissance work, was given to the Victoria and Albert Museum, through the Fund, by Mr. H. J. Pfungst, F.S.A.

But all these small contributions, useful and valuable as they are in filling gaps in the National collections, will interest specialists more than the general public. The purchase of the Rokeby Velasquez is altogether on a different level. The Report contains a fine photogravure plate of the picture, a statement of the sum for which its late owner sold it, and of that paid by the Fund for its purchase, a full list of subscribers and subscriptions, and, in short, all the information demanded somewhat prematurely by certain correspondents of the daily papers, who might have had the courtesy to await the issue of the Fund's official statement. Mr. Claude Phillips has contributed, moreover, an eloquent appreciation of the picture with an account of its pedigree, based on the researches of Señor de Beruete, which must for ever do away with the legend that the picture was damaged by fire at the Alcazar in 1734. That legend was based on a confusion of the Venus and Cupid with the Psyche and Cupid which appears to have perished altogether in the conflagration.

We regret to learn that a deficit of nearly £1500 has still to be made up to complete the purchase of the picture. The Secretaries of the Fund, at 47 Victoria Street, S.W., will welcome contributions towards this object or for the general purposes of the Society.

FORGOTTEN PAINTERS

To Messrs. Shepherd's exhibitions one goes with the pleasantest anticipations, for this firm has an enviable reputation for resurrecting the work of painters unworthily forgotten—a reputation ably sustained by the collection now on view at 27 King Street. In the sale-room the achievements of the minor painters of the Early British School too often masquerade under more famous names; at Messrs. Shepherd's the true authors find acknowledgment in the catalogue. No painting pretends to be better than it is, each stands on its own merits, with the result that we are not less but more interested in the portrait of Mrs. Featherstonhaugh (69), for example, when we learn that it is not by Reynolds but by his "drapery man,"

Mr. Peter Toms. R.A. Again, the Portrait of an Architect (103), by Bartholomew Dandridge, throws light on the authorship of more than one dubious Hogarth, just as the Landscape (115) by Thomas Hand, reveals an apt pupil of George Morland, a pupil whose work is not infrequently taken to be his master's. Morland himself is represented in this collection by a delightfully British portrait of The Old Squire (75), while a portrait and a fascinating study in three colours by Reynolds, a millboard painted on both sides by John Constable, a characteristic Woodland Landscape (110) by Patrick Nasmyth, and a full-length portrait of Lord Belhaven (80), by his father Alexander, the painter of Burns and the inventor of the "bow and string" bridge—all these, not to mention a Hoppner, an Etty and an unfinished David Cox, indicate the justness of the exhibition's claims to represent the greater as well as the lesser lights of Early British art.

But somehow it is always the lesser lights who interest us most at Messrs. Shepherd's. Perhaps their work has a novelty lacking in that of the more famous. The portrait group by William Dobson (1610-46) shown at Burlington House this winter revived interest in this British contemporary of Van Dyck, and his strongly drawn, soberly coloured portrait of John, Lord Belasye (68), confirms our high opinion of this early and ill-fated champion of British painting. Dobson may not have the elegance of Van Dyck, but he has all his strength and is a master of his craft.

Notwithstanding the fine classical ring of his name, Mark Anthony the painter (1817-86) is practically forgotten. The rich quality of his little picture of Heifer (70) proves that he did not go to Barbizon and work with the French Romanticists for nothing, that England might remember his existence as well as that of Troyon. One foreigner is included in this collection, the French painter, C. Michel. But his Landscape (107), with the luminous sky, is so akin to Crome in quality that we might call Michel's art British in sympathy if not in origin. A trio of artists' portraits must not go unmentioned, those of Richard Wilson and W. Collins by themselves, and that of Turner by J. T. Smith, the author of "A Book for a Rainy Day"; while no admirer of Mr. Tree should fail to visit Messrs. Shepherd's if only to see Zoffany's portrait of that favourite actor's double, John Moody as Father Foigard (126).

EXHIBITION OF PHOTOGRAPHS

At the gallery of the British Journal of Photography 24 Wellington Street, W.C., an exhibition of photographic portraiture has been opened. It differs from the usual shows of camera work in being free from the brilliant waywardness and experimental tendency of the amateur. Herr Rudolph Dührkoop of Hamburg possesses the steadiness of purpose and certainty of method due to a long and full experience. A few of his works are so fine in style, in arrangement, and in chiaroscuro as to call to mind the principles of the early Flemish masters. Especially is this so in certain portraits of Hamburgers in civic robes and seventeenth-century ruffs. In domestic portraiture Herr Dührkoop carries photography farther perhaps than others have done hitherto. He is especially happy with children, in whose faces there shines the real spark of young life. Maternity shows a baby at the breast of its mother, and the colour-values of its little pink hand in relation to the fair bosom it presses are preserved with delightful truth. Breadth and strength of effect are characteristic of these pictures. In their making it has not been thought necessary to deny to the lens its legitimate powers of focus in a mistaken effort to gain results erroneously thought to be artistic. All the work of Herr Dührkoop is clear and rich in tone, and firm in definition. We think that much will be gained for the reputation of photography by his work, which shows firm faith in the well-established principles of design, composition, and arrangement of light. We detect no flukes or accidents paraded as new artistic points of view, and it is a real satisfaction to note that these remarkable successes have been achieved without the slightest subversion of the obvious purposes of apparatus and materials. His published portfolio of photogravures must constitute the most extensive collection of portraits of celebrities ever produced by one man.

F. C. T.

MUSIC

CHORAL MUSIC—I

To read that the morning stars sang together is to realise that our ideals of melodious concord are as old as the foundations of the world, and that of all forms of music, the first, namely choral music, remains the most popular as well as the most enduring. It is a far cry from starry consonances to the war-songs of a savage people, from the Bacchic revels to plain-chant, from the Song of Miriam to the recent performances of the Leeds Choir or the London Choral Society. But they are all links in a chain which has never been broken since the earliest union of emotional or religious expression to fixed sounds. Beginnings of choral music then, we see, are lost in antiquity, or can only be traced to a myth, like the religion of the Japanese. The importance of the Greek chorus has passed into a proverb. But, delicate and complicated as the Greek system of music appears to have been, it was cultivated more as an accessory of the all-important drama than as an art in itself. When the drama decayed, music died out likewise. In its palmy days there had been legal provision for choruses. Plays being things of the utmost national and political importance, the successful poet whose work was selected for representation applied to a magistrate for a chorus. The best voices in several districts were then chosen and trained by a competent teacher; the expenses of the singers' maintenances and education being defrayed by men of wealth, called in consequence choragi. Great emulation prevailed among these rival choirs which were considered representative of their districts; and to the best a prize of a tripod was awarded after the play. This tripod became the property of a choragus, who in his turn dedicated it to a god, and set it up in some public place. At one time there was a street in Athens bordered with such trophies.

The Hebrews for their religious ceremonies employed soloists, choruses of men and women, and an orchestra. All these musicians were carefully trained in the Prophet and Levitic schools, and Kings David and Solomon each had a Chapel Royal attached to their court. The Song of Solomon was written for these court singers. It is supposed to have been a sort of pastoral play, or more probably—the drama being forbidden by law—a cantata rendered antiphonally by choruses in time to a dance. For the dedication of Solomon's temple, according to Josephus, two hundred thousand trumpets and trombones were constructed, likewise forty thousand stringed instruments; two hundred thousand garments of fine linen being also prepared for the chorus. In view of his era and nationality, it is impossible to suspect a Hibernian strain in Josephus, which might account for the magnitude of this description, but with all due respect to the historian we fancy the numbers here given must be overstated. However, no doubt this festival in every detail reached the climax of eastern magnificence, and Holy Scripture witnesses to the astonishing effect produced when "the trumpeters and singers were as one to make one sound." We can easily believe this. If, as some people suppose, Eternity stretches backwards as well as forwards, and could the as yet unembodied shades of Wagner and Mr. Strauss have been present among the viewless spirits who attend such gatherings, they must have felt their astral noses considerably out of joint.

After the Christian era, music for nearly fifteen hundred years became the property of the Church, in whose schools it remained for a long time purely choral. As early as 314 we read of scholæ cantorum in Rome, under Pope Sylvester, where choirs were trained from boyhood in the intricacies of plain-chant. These schools led eventually to the foundation of the Sistine Chapel, the oldest institution of its kind still extant. Monasteries of northern and middle Europe, were not slow to follow Rome's example, and progress in choral music is largely due to these centres, as the discipline there being less severe than in Italy, national idiosyncrasies and innovations gradually crept in, and modified the rigorous simplicity enforced in the Papal dominions. About the eighth century the convent of St. Gall in Switzerland, with the Abbeys of Reichenau and Fulda, and later the schools of Würzburg, Mayence, and Ratisbon, and some of the English monasteries, instituted a more complicated system in their church services. That such developments were dubiously received even in the twelfth century is proved by the following excerpt from the Speculum Charitatis of Ailred, Abbot of Rivaux Abbey, Yorkshire (1109-1166). The translation is taken from Prynn's Histriomastix:

Let me speak now of those who, under the show of religion, do obpalliate the business of pleasure. . . . Whence hath the church so many Organs and Muscical Instruments? To what purpose I pray you is that terrible blowing of Belloes, expressing rather the crakes of Thunder, than the sweetnesse of a Voyce? To what purpose serves that contraction and inflection of a voyce? This man sings a base, that a small meane, another a treble, a fourth divides and cuts asunder, as it were, certain middle notes. One while the voyce is strained, anon it is remitted, now it is clashed, and then again it is enlarged with a louder sound. Sometimes, which is a shame to speak, it is enforced into a horse's neighings; sometimes the masculine vigour being laid aside, it is sharpened into the shrillnesse of a woman's voyce; now and then it is writhed and retorted with a certain artificial circumvolution. Sometimes thou may'st see a man with an open mouth, not to sing, but as it were to breathe out his last gaspe, by shutting in his breath, and by a certain ridiculous interception of his voyce, as it were to threaten silence, and now againe to imitate the agonies of a dying man, or the estasies of such as suffer. . . . In the meantime, the common people standing by, trembling and astonished, admire the sound of the Organs, the noyse of the Cymballs and Musical Instruments, the harmony of the Pipes and Cornets.

Besides monastic schools of music, succeeding centuries brought the institution of Chapels Royal, of which the earliest on record in England is that of Henry V. An old Latin poem mentions this monarch's plena cantoribus ampla Capella as though it were something of a novelty. When Rouen surrendered in 1419, John Page thus describes the King's triumphal entry into the fallen city:

So to the Minster did he fare,
L of hys hors he lyght there.
His Chapylle met him at the doore,
And went before him on the floore,
And songe a responce gloryus
That is namyd—Quis est Magnus?

E §.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

SIR Martin Conway has written a history of Spitsbergen which the Cambridge University Press will publish shortly under the title of "No Man's Land." Though never an inhabited country, for part of every year since early in the seventeenth century Spitsbergen has been the scene of industries which have drawn to its beautiful but inhospitable shores innumerable visitors, whose fortunes, purposes and adventures are now to be recorded.

The Eragny Press, The Brook, Hammersmith, announces the publication of "Songs by Ben Jonson. A Selection from the Plays, Masques, and Poems with the earliest known Settings of Certain Numbers." The frontispiece, printed in four colours, has been designed and engraved on the wood by Lucien Pissarro. The border and initial letters have been designed by L. Pissarro and engraved by E. Pissarro. One hundred and seventy-five copies have been printed in red and black throughout with the "Brook" type on "Arches" linen hand-made paper with the Eragny Press water-mark. Of these one hundred and fifty are for sale in England and America at forty shillings net. Ten copies on Roman vellum have been printed, and of the eight for sale two remain to be sold at seven guineas net.

Messrs. Pitman will publish in a few days Mr. Frederick Wedmore's new book, "Whistler and Others." Beside Whistler Mr. Wedmore deals with Watts, Constable, Etty, Rembrandt, Van Dyck, Boudin, and Goya.

Messrs. Maunsell and Co. Limited, of Dublin, announce that the third number of the Tower Press Booklets will be "Reminiscences of the Impressionist Painters," by Mr. George Moore. The essay consists, for the most part, of a lecture recently delivered in Dublin, and embodies many personal recollections of Manet, Monet, Degas and others of the Impressionist school who were amongst the friends of the writer.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin has in the press and will issue shortly a new volume in the Mermaid Series—"The Best Plays of George Farquhar," edited, with an introduction, by William Archer. The plays reprinted are: "The Constant Couple"; "The Recruiting Officer"; "The Beaux' Stratagem"; and "The Twin Rivals."

Messrs. Alston Rivers announce that the publication of Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer's "The Heart of the Country"—a companion volume to "The Soul of London"—will be postponed from May 2 till May 9.

Dr. Alexander van Millingen, Professor of History at Robert College, Constantinople, and a recognised authority and writer on all that pertains to the city, is the author of the volume on "Constantinople" which will form the next of Messrs. Black's Colour Books. Mr. Warwick Goble, who is responsible for the series of pictures which are the raison d'être of this volume, reveals the city under many aspects. We see it, for example, at early morning with its spires and minarets emerging through the haze as if it were an enchanted city of the "Thousand and One Nights." We get glimpses of the life in its streets, we are shown its flower-markets, its bazaars, its cafés, its walls, its churches, its mosques, its cemeteries; and various types of its inhabitants are the subject of special sketches.

CORRESPONDENCE

A LIFE OF ECLIPSE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May we ask the assistance of your valuable columns to let the fact be known that the first complete life of Eclipse is in course of preparation, and that any references to this celebrated horse in contemporary literature, to his breeder, the Duke of Cumberland; to his purchaser, Wildman; and to his subsequent owner, Dennis O'Kelly, will be very much appreciated. Many facts have already come to light from private and unexpected sources which have enabled us to settle various questions hitherto doubtful, such as the birthplace, the burial-place, the authentic skeleton, and so forth. Many more letters, documents, prints, or paintings must still exist—besides those already brought to our notice by the generosity of their possessors—which will be of the greatest value. The monograph will be as completely illustrated as possible from contemporary paintings and engravings and other sources, and will contain detailed photographs of the anatomy of Eclipse and the most famous of his descendants, which should prove interesting both to biologists and breeders. A sketch of racing in the days when Eclipse was on the turf will be included, with biographies of his breeder, owners, and others connected with the sport of that time. It is important that the information should reach us before June 1, if possible, and all letters, manuscripts, prints, or pictures addressed to "Eclipse," c/o Mr. W. Heinemann, 21 Bedford Street, London, W.C., will be acknowledged before that date, and will be received not only with the greatest care, but with profound gratitude. Any originals reproduced will be scrupulously guarded from injury, and safely returned, and may be insured, if necessary, while out of their owner's hands, if a separate message to that effect is addressed to Mr. Heinemann.

With every confidence that our efforts to collect everything known about the most famous horse ever bred will meet with the indulgent and sympathetic assistance of all Englishmen who have facts to contribute, we are,

THE AUTHORS.

April 9.

SMITH'S FOLLY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The ACADEMY is always informing. Last week it told me the origin of this hotel. It may interest other readers to know that "The round house on the shores of Torbay built by one Smith, a retired John Company man," is now a modern hotel. Probably many visitors are ignorant as myself, as to its origin. Comfort has been restored by English methods, but its Eastern character is still obvious.

The Hotel Redcliffe, Paignton.

L. C.

AN EMENDATION OF HERODAS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am extremely sorry I cannot accept the new emendation of Herodas, which Professor Johnson (ACADEMY, p. 362) is kind enough to present especially to me. I thank him very much; but I think, that  $\epsilon\pi' \omega\mu\omicron\nu\delta\alpha\iota\lambda\omicron\nu\tau\epsilon\varsigma = \delta\alpha\iota\lambda\omicron\nu\tau\epsilon\varsigma$  (pour lacérer au vif) is impossible: (1) The metre does not allow it in the beginning of this verse, and the contraction  $\delta\alpha\iota$  for  $\delta\alpha\iota$  is excluded; (2)  $\delta\alpha\iota\omega$  is a word taken from the poetical language, used by Homer, the tragic poets, etc.; there seems no place for it in the vulgar diction of Herodas; (3) The poor boy is no slave, but the son of a—of course poor—townsman and an old citizen. "A sound thrashing" Metrotime wishes for him, but a laceration is a little too much even for an impudent schoolboy of ancient times. But I am very glad, that "l'entente cordiale" is universal for such an important matter as the full moon of the Greek Island-schoolboy Kottalos, which now can shine upon three friendly nations.

DR. MAX MAAS.

"THE CAPTIVE KNIGHT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have before me as I write an old copy of the poem, "The Captive Knight," referred to by your correspondent "J. W. C." The description which he gives is entirely accurate. My copy is in the form of a song published by Chappell, the title-page setting forth that the words are by Mrs. Hemans, the music by her sister, and that the whole is "most respectfully dedicated to Sir Walter Scott."

After a preliminary symphony, "music at a distance," the ballad is given as follows:

'Twas a trumpet's pealing sound!
And the Knight look'd down from the Paynim's tow'r,
And a Christian host, in its pride and pow'r,
Through the pass beneath him wound.
Cease awhile clarion! clarion wild and shrill!
Cease! let them hear the captive's voice, be still, be still!

I knew 'twas a trumpet's note!
And I see my brethren's lances gleam,
And their pennons wave by the mountain stream,
And their plumes to the glad wind float.
Cease awhile, etc.

I am here with my heavy chain!
And I look on a torrent sweeping by,
And an eagle rushing to the sky,
And a host to its battle plain.
Cease awhile, etc.

Must I pine in my fetters here?
With the wild wave's foam, and the free bird's flight,
And the tall spears glancing on my sight,
And the trumpet in mine ear.
Cease awhile, etc.

"Music advancing" (symphony)
They are gone! they have all passed by!
They in whose wars I had borne my part;
They that I lov'd with a brother's heart,
They have left me here to die!
Sound again, clarion! clarion pour thy blast!
Sound! for the captive's dream of hope is past!

W. B. LEIGH.

April 22.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have pleasure in referring your correspondent "J. W. C." to her Tragedy, "De Chatillon: or the Crusaders," Act v. scene i., for Mrs. Hemans's poem, or song of "The Captive Knight," of which, it is said, Sir Walter Scott never was weary. It will be found in the Complete Copyright Ed. of her poems, published by Nimmo. The words were set to music by her sister and biographer, Mrs. Hughes.

W. STARKEY.

THE PORTICO LIBRARY, MANCHESTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am compiling a history of this Library, which has existed for exactly a century and shall be much obliged if you will request any of your readers who may have letters, documents, newspaper-cuttings etc., relating to the early history of this Institution to communicate with me.

The Portico Library,
57 Mosley Street, Manchester.

ERNEST MARRIOTT,
Librarian.

THE EARLY ENGLISH DRAMA SOCIETY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My consent to an official connection with an "Early English Drama Society" was given with no other thought in mind than that of thereby accepting a certain degree of responsibility and of promising something in the way of personal work. Indeed I had already spent some time in looking over Old Plays, with the interests of the Society in mind, when the ACADEMY of March 24 surprised me. Your issue of March 31 now answers the question I wished to ask of my good friend Dr. Furnivall; and it is clear that, however much I should always be inclined to comply with any request made by Mr. Farmer, I must in this instance show my friendship towards him in the manner found necessary by Dr. Furnivall and Mr. Bradley.

JAMES W. BRIGHT.

Johns Hopkins University, April 12.

THE KREMLIN AT MOSCOW

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—English is, as we all know, an allusive language, but even so can we excuse the following sentence, which appeared in the ACADEMY of April 21: "There are two plain candlesticks of brass of this type in the Museum, and in the Kremlin at Moscow there is a very large specimen in hammered silver-gilt bearing the English hall-mark for 1663-4."

I wonder if your correspondent has ever seen that candlestick in the Kremlin at Moscow. The said Kremlin contains, in addition to the arsenal and barracks, three cathedrals, three or four palaces, half a dozen churches or so, at least one convent and one monastery, and a variety of national monuments and other side-shows: the whole is enclosed by a high wall which is about two kilometres in circumference. Looking for a needle in a haystack would be easy work compared to looking for a candlestick in the Moscow Kremlin. Inquiries on the spot might prove useless, for it is not every English tourist who can pronounce the Russian word for candlestick, which is, I believe, podsveychnik!

S. T. S.

[The sentence our correspondent complains of was quoted direct, with the rest of the article, from the official communication.—ED.]

A CURIOSITY OF LITERATURE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I venture to think that your readers may be amused by the following curiosity of literature.

The story is in two parts.

Part I.—When Mr. Churchill published his book on "The River War," it was criticised in the National Review by Colonel Ivor Maxse, C.B., D.S.O., who expressed surprise that the book should have been written by any one who had once been an English officer and still presumably considered himself an English gentleman.

Part II.—A book entitled "Seymour Vandeleur" was recently published by the same Colonel Maxse. It deals in part with the same River War and represents, with slight alterations, a large number of sentences and even paragraphs from the unsoldierly and ungentelemanly work, which the Colonel had so forcibly condemned.

This must be regarded as an act of reparation all the more beautiful in that it has been done by stealth, and it would be interesting to learn whether Colonel Maxse will blush to find it false.

I enclose evidence and beg leave to subscribe myself,

HERBERT VIVIAN.

April 21.

From seventeen pages of closely typewritten "evidence" sent us by Mr. Herbert Vivian we select one or two of the most striking points of resemblance:

SEYMOUR VANDELEUR

p. 157.

At 2.30 it moved on by moonlight and trickled man by man through a gorge.

Suddenly in the stillness of the night drums were heard beating a mile to the front.

p. 158

The Dervishes must be on the alert! Would they charge the head of the column in the defile? But the sound died down. It had been the usual call to prayer.

THE RIVER WAR

p. 225.

The Sirdar moved on again with the infantry at 2.30. The moon had risen over the rocks.

p. 226

The column of nearly 6000 men had to trickle through one narrow place in single file. . . .

Suddenly, a mile to the southward, rose the sound of the beating of drums. . . . The Dervishes were prepared. Perhaps they would attack the column before it could deploy. Then the sound died away. . . . It was no alarm but only the call to the morning prayer.

p. 166.

One Dervish shell penetrated the Abu Klea at the water-line and entered the magazine, but did not explode. Several shells struck the Metemma. Commander Colville, R.N., on the Tamai, was severely wounded in the wrist, and casualties occurred on all the boats. . . . The bold riflemen in the tree-tops were frequently dropped like young rooks on a spring day.

p. 172.

Experts both at home and on the spot had no hesitation in denouncing the desert railway as the scheme of a lunatic.

p. 197.

Every day at dawn some of Broadwood's squadrons rode forth (p. 198) to reconnoitre . . . in the scrub. It is not an easy country for cavalry. The wide belt of mimosa-trees and dōm-palms by the river was fresh and green and beautiful to behold owing to the rich alluvial soil deposited by the annual flood. Brilliant parrots and other bright birds flitted amongst the trees.

No precaution which the Sirdar's experience could suggest was neglected. A staff officer, familiar with the country by daylight, guided the leading brigade. Careful patrolling guarded against surprise, and the four brigades marched in separate squares on a broad front ready to use their rifles if attacked.

p. 206.

A pale yellow flash in the midst of a ball of white smoke marked the exact spot and then the crack! of the explosion came faintly back, like an echo . . . the air above the trenches became dotted with white puffs dealing out shrapnel bullets.

Then gradually, the strange scene became almost monotonous, and many a weary infantry-man dozed into sleep.

p. 225.

But at this critical moment one of the gun-boats swung down-stream and at short ranges plastered the Kerreri hill-sides with shrapnel and maxim bullets. . . . The infuriated Dervishes baulked of their prey turned upon Broadwood with renewed vigour and pursued his elusive squadrons three miles down the river bank. . . . Broadwood's squadrons . . . merely played with the angry Dervishes.

p. 262.

One shell struck the Abu Klea on the water-line, and entered the magazine. Luckily it did not explode. . . . Three shells struck the Metemma. On board the Tamai, which was leading, Commander Colville was severely wounded in the wrist . . . and on each boat some casualties occurred. . . . (p. 263) By the Nile all the tops of the palm-trees were crowded with daring riflemen, whose positions were indicated . . . when some tiny black figure fell, like a shot rook, to the ground.

p. 286.

Many other persons who were not consulted volunteered the opinion that the whole idea was that of a lunatic.

p. 384.

Colonel Broadwood was further instructed to reconnoitre. . . . The country on either side of the Athara is covered with dense scrub, impassable for civilised troops. From these belts . . . the dōm-palms rise in great numbers. All the bush is leafy, and looks very pretty and green by contrast to the sombre vegetation of the Nile. Between the trees flew green parrots and many other bright birds.

The Sirdar had neglected no precaution which thought and experience could suggest. . . . (p. 418) Many of the officers were familiar with the intervening ground. An officer of special knowledge . . . maintained the true direction. Careful patrolling prevented surprise . . . the open desert enabled the troops to march on a comparatively broad front, and to make effective use of their rifles if attacked.

p. 423.

Over the centre of the zeriba a pale yellow flash and a round white puff showed the bursting shell. The wop! of the distant explosion came back, like the echo of the report.

p. 424.

Gradually even the strange sight became monotonous. . . . The men began to sit down again. Many of them actually went to sleep.

Vol. 2.

p. 125.

But at the critical moment the gun-boat arrived on the scene and began to blaze and flame from Maxim guns, quick-firing guns, and rifles. The range was short. . . . Exasperated by their disappointment, the soldiers of Osman Sheikh-ed-Din turned again upon the cavalry, and, forgetting in their anger the mobile nature of their foe, pursued the elusive squadrons three long miles (p. 126) to the north. The cavalry . . . played with their powerful antagonist.

A QUESTION OF TEXT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you allow me a few lines in which to defend myself from a quite unjust charge brought against me by the reviewer of certain editions of Beaumont and Fletcher which appeared in your issue of April 21? In discussing the lines in the Elder Brother:

Where the Violet and the Rose

The blew Veins in blush disclose,

he remarks that, in the second, "The" is the reading of the folios [sic, though the play only appears in one folio] and quartos, and that the substitution of "Their" is my "clever emendation." Were this so the fact of the deviation not being recorded in a "Variorum" edition would have merited a far severer censure than the gentle reprimand he bestows on me. But the facts of the case are not as he represents them. It is Cambridge "Red" not Bullen "Slate-blue" that is at fault. "Their" is the reading of the first edition (1637) as well as of all subsequent texts deserving any regard, namely the quarto of 1651 and the Egerton manuscript. "The" is a late corruption which I did not think worth while recording. I should state that the quarto text which appears in the Appendix to the Cambridge edition, so far from being the first, as there stated, is a late reprint of 1650-60 in which the original date, 1637, was fraudulently retained. The fact that the Cambridge editors imply that "The" is the reading of all old editions and of the manuscript, will show how far trustworthy is the edition which has so taken the fancy of your reviewer. I am sure that when the facts are placed fairly before him he will be the first to acknowledge the slight error into which he has been led and to withdraw his charge against me. The other points he mentions do not concern me. I leave it to the editors of the other plays in the volume to defend their texts as best they can.

May I at the same time thank you for your most kind review of my book on Pastoral Poetry? I wish I could claim the authorship of the phrase "love in vacuo" which your reviewer justly praises. As I stated on p. 154 it is the property of that acute critic Professor Raleigh.

WALTER W. GREG.

Park Lodge, Wimbledon, April 23.

[Our reviewer writes: My strong predilection for the "the" and "in" reading led me into error: and I hasten to apologise for attributing the "their" reading to an emendation of Mr. Greg. The folio of 1679, however, and the Q. 2, of which he sometimes collates the readings, have "the," and in a "variorum" edition a variant of such importance should be noted. Indeed, the phrase, "which I did not think worth while recording," throws a strong light on the very point of our complaint against this "variorum" edition—that it is a work of caprice, not scholarship. Of this Q. 2 which Mr. Greg is now in a position to condemn, he writes in his introduction: "It should be observed that Q. 2, though dated 1637, was probably not printed till many years later. It contains the same ornaments, etc., as Q. 4, which may have appeared at any date previous to 1661." The Egerton manuscript, to which he pins his faith, is considered by the Cambridge editor to be "doubtful," and accordingly its variants are printed separately.]

"PARADISE LOST"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall be glad if you will very kindly allow me to correct several errors into which your critic has fallen in criticising my adaptation for the stage of Milton's great epic poem; and I would ask you please in fairness and justice to me, to give this letter the same place of prominence in your journal as you have given to your strictures on my work, i.e., in your issue of the 14th inst. I desire to say at the outset, that your critic has not studied my preface carefully, nor is he correctly familiar with the life and history of Milton's works. I speak of "learned and unlearned criticism" in my preface, and I regret to say your critic's remarks come under the latter category. He is quite in error in stating, and it is pure conjecture on his part that Milton felt he could not make a good tragedy out of his epic, for it is a fact and common knowledge that blindness alone prevented his accomplishing his task. You seem to forget that if a man writes a tragedy it is his one supreme desire to see it rehearsed by himself and produced, and as he became blind he realised how hopeless such a task would be since he never got farther than the notes he penned, and which I refer to in my preface. Your critic further entirely forgets that Milton by the very words by which he described tragedy, i.e., as regards the drama and quoted by me, shows that he fully knew that the notes he had made were satisfactory to himself, and the further proof is, that as he received £23 (not £18 as you quite erroneously state) this alone was an incentive to complete the tragedy. I am quite aware of the fees paid in Milton's time, but there were sufficient theatres ready to produce his plays or any other author's, but as he realised what I have already stated, he with great sorrow abandoned his idea. Your critic's statement, therefore, that he was "afraid" to carry out his design is supremely ridiculous and pure idle conjecture.

I have not rushed in as you state to repair the effects of Milton's timidity, but I have tried in a spirit of reverence in a task that has taken me nearly two years to use his own words and methods throughout; whilst experts and others have pronounced my work to be excellent. The words you quote of mine are used for stage purposes, and if you or your critic had the slightest knowledge of stage technique, etc., you would realise that if you can get the same situation in a few words, it is a triumph to do so, and I have merely discarded Milton's lengthy lines, and used what has conveyed the same idea in a few for stage purposes. This is a licence allowed to all playwrights and as I claim to be one of considerable experience and also as a theatrical manager, your critic's facetious and uncalled remarks that I am "good enough" to say that the poem is "throughout great," are very petty and pointless.

The censor did not refuse me a licence because of the nature of the play itself, which as an adaptation he praised to me very highly, personally, but because it was "scriptural" and against the Lord Chamberlain's rules!

Finally, I have not "timidly" used any words, but strongly and eagerly the correct ones for "ethereal" does scan as I mean it, i.e., for stage purposes, and "heavenly" does not at another situation on the stage. The play will be performed, if possible, in London, whilst it is about to be translated into several foreign languages for representation abroad. It has already been very largely welcomed and read here, i.e., with intelligent and careful interest by educated people.

You need to take a great and broader view of it, if you will excuse my saying so, and rise superior to minor details, trying also to grasp the real merit and purport of a sincere effort as a whole.

WALTER STEPHENS.

April 23.

[If the justness of our critic's observations had stood in need of support, no better means could have been discovered than the above letter, which we print in full, and without further comment.—Ed.]

"THE ROMISH CHURCH"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your review of the "Madonna of the Poets" in last issue I find the following: "we do not quite get the same feeling as in the stately periods of the Romish Church." Considering the position of the Catholic Church, its antiquity, its history, etc., does it not show bad taste to write in this contemptuous fashion? We, Catholics resent it, as offensive. Have we not a claim to courteous treatment in your columns and protection from such coarseness?

EDWARD T. QUINN.

Ballybrack, Co. Dublin, April 24.

[We do not clearly see the reason for Mr. Quinn's violent letter. Can it be the substitution of three letters for two—of "ish" for "an"? We can scarcely believe it, for Mr. Quinn must be well aware that it is long since intelligent people, either Catholic or Protestant, have ceased to discover or to intend any insult in the use of the word "Romish." And, if Mr. Quinn were a regular reader of this paper, he would surely know that in the office of the ACADEMY the Church of which he is too hasty a champion is held in the highest veneration.—Ed.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

English Costume. Painted and Described by Dion Clayton Calthrop. 1—Early English. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 80. Plates xviii. Black, 7s. 6d. net.

[To consist of four volumes, which will eventually be issued in one book. Each volume will contain about twenty full-page illustrations in colour and numerous thumb-nail sketches in the text. The three remaining periods dealt with will be as follows: "Middle Ages" (ready in May); "Tudor and Stuart" (ready in September); "Georgian" (ready in October).]

Newbolt, Frank. The Etchings of Van Dyck. Plates xxxiii. The Master Etcher Series. 11½ x 8½. Newnes, 7s. 6d. net.

Birch, Mrs. Lionel. Stanhope A. Forbes, A.R.A., and Elisabeth Stanhope Forbes, A.R.W.S. With eight reproductions in colour and thirty-two other illustrations. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 123. Popular Modern Artists series. Cassell, 5s. net.

[Deals, in a popular manner, with the lives and work of Mr. and Mrs. Stanhope Forbes and with the Newlyn School.]

Index omitted from vol. i. of Simpson's History of Architecture. Longmans, Gratis.

The Langham Series of Art Monographs: Dante Gabriel Rossetti, by H. W. Singer; Goya, by Richard Muther. 6½ x 5. Pp. 70, 64. Siegle, 1s. 6d. net each.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Macmillan, D. George Buchanan: a biography. 8 x 5½. Pp. 292. Edinburgh: Morton, 3s. 6d. net.

[A biography on the same plan as Mr. Macmillan's "John Knox"; intended for readers who do not possess Dr. Irving's or Dr. Hume Brown's fuller biography.]

Morris, Henry. The Life of John Murdoch, L.L.D., the Literary Evangelist of India. 8 x 5½. Pp. 185. The Christian Literature Society for India, 3s. 6d. net.

FICTION.

Diehl, Alice M. Love—With Variations. 7½ x 5. Pp. 328. Long, 6s.

Forbes, Lady Helen. Lady Marion and the Plutocrat. 7½ x 5. Pp. 317. Long, 6s.

Middlemass, Jean. A Veneered Scamp. 7½ x 5. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.

Tracks in the Snow, being the history of a crime. Edited from the MS. of Rev. Robert Driver, B.D., by Godfrey Benson. 8 x 5½. Pp. 281. Longmans, 6s.

Le Queux, William. Whatever a Man Soweth. 8 x 5½. Pp. 306. White, 5s.

MacFall, Haldane, and Calthrop, Dion Clayton. Rouge. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 311. Brown, Langham, 6s.

HISTORY.

Kaempfer, Engelbert, M.D. The History of Japan, together with a Description of the Kingdom of Siam, 1690-92. Translated by J. G. Schencher. 3 vols. 9½ x 6. Pp. lxxxix, 1120. Glasgow: MacLehose, 37s. 6d. net.

[Since its original publication in 1727, Kaempfer's History of Japan has not until now been reprinted in full. In the original edition the maps and illustrations were engraved as folio sheets, and bound in at the end of each volume: in this edition they have, for greater convenience, been placed in their proper positions through the text; and while obvious printer's errors of spelling and punctuation have been corrected, Kaempfer's spelling of Japanese names has been retained.]

MUSIC.

Newman, Ernest. Elgar. The Music of the Masters series. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 188. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.

NATURAL HISTORY.

Dewar, Douglas. Bombay Ducks. An account of some of the every-day birds and beasts found in a naturalist's Eldorado. With numerous illustrations from photographs of living birds by Captain F. D. S. Fayer. 9 x 6. Pp. 304. Lane, 16s. net.

PHILOSOPHY.

Sturt, Henry. Idola Theatri. 9½ x 6. Pp. 344. Macmillan, 10s. net. [A criticism of Oxford thought and thinkers from the standpoint of personal idealism.]

POETRY.

Tilston, Rev. Thos. Dramatic, Lyrical, and Idyllic Poems. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 245. Simpkin, Marshall, 6s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Jókai, Maurus. The Green Book; or Freedom Under the Snow. Famous Works of European Novelists series. 7½ x 5. Pp. 470. Jarrold, 3s. 6d. net.

Stanley, Arthur Penhryn. The Bible in the Holy Land. Popular edition with illustrations. 7½ x 5. Pp. 204. Murray, 1s. net.

Moehler, John Adam. Symbolism, an Exposition of the Doctrinal Differences Between Catholics and Protestants, as evidenced by their Symbolical Writings. Translated from the German by James Burton Robertson. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xxii, 513. Gibbings, 6s. net.

Welsh, R. E. The Challenge to Christian Missions. Sixpenny Series. 8½ x 6. Pp. 77. Allenson.

Babelon, Ernest. Manual of Oriental Antiquities, including the Architecture, Sculpture, and Industrial Arts of Chaldaea, Assyria, Persia, Syria, Judaea, Phoenicia, and Carthage. New edition, with a chapter on The Recent Discoveries at Susa. 7½ x 5. Pp. 352. Grevel, 7s. 6d. net.

Low, Sidney. The Governance of England. Second impression. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Unwin, 3s. 6d. net.

"BLACKWOOD"

For MAY contains

THE CROWTH OF THE CAPITAL SHIP.

A JOURNEY TO SANAA.

THE EARLY ROYAL ACADEMY. The Story of its Foundation and the Romances of some Original Members.

THE PEREGRINATIONS OF A COCKNEY.

BRACE: AN ENGLISH EPIC.—BOOK III. By ALFRED NOYES.

GRAMMAR TO THE WOLVES. By P. A. WRIGHT HENDERSON.

COUNT BUNKER.—CHAPTERS XXIV.—XXVIII. By J. S. CLOUSTON.

MORE ABOUT THE STREETS OF LONDON. By Lieutenant-Colonel Sir HENRY

SMITH, K.C.B., Ex-Commissioner City of London Police.

MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD.

THE MORAL OF THE ARMY.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

Blackwoods' Best Books.

THE SECOND EDITION IS NOW READY.

PORT ARTHUR: The Siege and Capitulation.

By ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

Fully Illustrated, and with Maps and Plans, 21s. net.

"A great history of a great siege."—BELFAST NEWS LETTER.

CHARLES LEVER: His Life in his Letters.

By EDMUND DOWNEY.

Demy 8vo, 2 vols., 21s. net.

"A revelation of the man, a first-hand record of Charles Lever, and a first-hand picture of the man in his habits as he lived."—WORLD.

THE AUTHOR'S PROGRESS

By ADAM LORIMER. 5s. net.

"There is a laugh in almost every page."—SCOTSMAN.

WILLIAM PITT

By CHARLES WHIBLEY. Illustrated, 6s. net.

"To read it is to be braced as by a tonic."—DAILY MAIL.

6s. FICTION

"No. 101." By WYMOND CAREY. (5th Edition).

LADY SARAH'S DEED OF GIFT. By E. A. GRIFFIN.

A MAID OF NORMANDY. By DORA M. JONES.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Now Ready. Price Six Shillings.

The Edinburgh Review. April.

- I. THE POLITICAL SITUATION.
- II. IN MEMORIAM. AFTER FIFTY YEARS.
- III. THE JARDIN DES PLANTES BEFORE AND DURING THE REVOLUTION.
- IV. CANNING AND THE TREATY OF TILSIT.
- V. CRITICISMS OF LIFE IN IRELAND.
- VI. VENETIAN DIPLOMACY AT THE SUBLIME PORTE DURING THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.
- VII. HISTORY IN FURNITURE.
- VIII. ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE.
- IX. PRE-RAPHAELITISM.
- X. SOME ASPECTS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.
- XI. THE ROYAL POOR LAW COMMISSION, 1905, AND THE CONDITION OF THE POOR.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.
NEW YORK AND BOMBAY.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fuller Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD. SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____
months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

A Selection from the List of GEORGE NEWNES, Limited

Recent Volumes of Newnes' Thin Paper Classics.

BYRON'S POEMS. 3 vols. The Shorter Poems; The Longer Poems; The Dramas and Satires.

ESSAYS OF ADDISON.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.

PLAYS AND POEMS OF CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE.

LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.

Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; Cloth, 3s. net per volume.
Postage, 3d. extra.

Newnes' Pocket Classics.

Super royal 24mo. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net.
Postage, 2d. extra.

THE CAVALIER IN EXILE. Being the Lives of the first Duke and Duchess of Newcastle. By the Duchess.

GOETHE'S FAUST. A Dramatic Mystery. Translated by JOHN ANSTER, LL.D.

THE POEMS OF THOMAS GRAY AND WILLIAM COLLINS.

A JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR. By DANIEL DE FOE.

SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS AND SONGS.

POEMS OF GEORGE WITHER.

SONGS FROM THE DRAMATISTS OF THE XVI., XVII. and XVIII. CENTURIES.

POEMS OF MICHAEL DRAYTON.

Newnes' Devotional Series

Uniform with Newnes' Pocket Classics. Super royal 24mo; lambskin, 2s. 6d. each net; cloth, 2s. each net. Postage 2d. extra.

LYRA GERMANICA. Translated from the German by CATHERINE WINKWORTH.

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS À KEMPIS.

THE CHANGED CROSS. And other Poems.

THE CHRISTIAN YEAR

THE SACRED POEMS OF HENRY VAUGHAN } Just Ready.

LYRA INNOCENTUM

Library of Applied Arts.

FRENCH POTTERY. By HENRI FRANTZ. With 86 Full-page Plates, of which several are in colour, 7s. 6d. net. By post 7s. 10d. [Just Ready.]

This volume also contains a comprehensive list of marks and monograms on falence and porcelain, and a list of the prices realised at auction since 1882.

Other Volumes.

DUTCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By W. PITCAIRN KNOWLES.

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE. By FREDERICK FENN.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY. By A. F. KENDRICK.

ENGLISH TABLE GLASS. By PERCY BATE.

OLD PEWTER. By MALCOLM BELL.

SHEFFIELD PLATE. By B. WYLLIE.

THE SPOILERS. By EDWIN PUGH. Illustrated by C. E. BROCK. 6s. By post, 6s. 10d.

SCOTSMAN: "It is a story revealing a good deal of knowledge of the life of people who prey upon others. It is a picture of a not very pleasing phase of life, but it is painted by a man who has evidently studied closely the ways of burglars and resellers, and gives an account of their doings in a manner which suggests an atmosphere of reality."

HASTINGS AND ST. LEONARDS ADVERTISER: "The story is an admirable sketch of the low life of to-day, while there is also plenty of comedy."

THE CHINESE AT HOME. Adapted from the French of EMILE BARD. By H. TWITCHELL. With numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. By post, 7s. 10d.

STANDARD: "M. Bard's pictures of this singular people are bright, entertaining, and at the same time instructive; they help us to see the Chinese at home, and appreciate their better qualities."

SCOTSMAN: "The book as a whole is both an attractive and instructive one for any reader curious as to the present state of China."

Recent Volumes of Newnes' Art Library.

GIOVANNI BELLINI. With an Introduction by EVERARD MEYNELL. With 65 Full-page Plates, including Photogravure Frontispiece.

FRA ANGELICO. With an Introduction by EDGCUMBE STALEY. 64 Full-page Reproductions and a Frontispiece in Photogravure. 3s. 6d. net each. By post, 3s. 10d.

Other Volumes.

Each volume contains about 64 full pages in monochrome, and a Frontispiece in photogravure. These are in many cases made from works which have not previously been reproduced. Each volume also contains a list of the principal works of the artist. 3s. 6d. net, by post, 3s. 10d.

BOTTICELLI. By RICHARD DAVEY.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. By A. L. BALDRY.

CONSTABLE'S SKETCHES. By Sir JAMES D. LINTON, R.I.

VELASQUEZ. By A. L. BALDRY.

GOZZOLI. By HUGH STOKES.

RAPHAEL. By EDGCUMBE STALEY.

VAN DYCK. By HUGH STOKES.

G. F. WATTS. By Dr. R. PANTINI.

TINTORETTO. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.

PAOLO VERONESE. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.

BURNE-JONES. By MALCOLM BELL.

FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. KONODY.

EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. By MALCOLM BELL.

PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By ARSENE ALEXANDRE.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. By ERNEST RADFORD.

LATER WORK OF TITIAN. By HENRY MILES.

THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By J. E. PHYTHIAN.

Studio.—"Messrs. Newnes' now celebrated series devoted to the Great Masters . . . excellently reproduced, and apparently considerable trouble has been taken to secure reproductions of some of the least known and less accessible of the painters' chief works."

Art Galleries of Europe.

Uniform with "NEWNES' ART LIBRARY." 3s. 6d. net.
By post 3s. 10d.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF LONDON:

THE FLEMISH SCHOOL.

THE EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.

THE LATER BRITISH SCHOOL.

THE DUTCH SCHOOL.

Modern Master Draughtsmen.

THE DRAWINGS OF DAVID COX. With an Introduction by A. J. FINBERG. 7s. 6d. net. By post, 7s. 10d. [Just Ready.]

Other Volumes.

7s. 6d. each net. By post, 7s. 10d.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. BURNE-JONES. By T. MARTIN WOOD.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A. By MALCOLM BELL.

DRAWINGS OF ROSSETTI. By T. MARTIN WOOD.

DRAWINGS OF J. M. SWAN, R.A. By A. LVS BALDRY.

DRAWINGS OF MENZEL. By Dr. HANS SINGER.

Great Etchers.

Uniform with Drawings by Great Masters.

CHARLES MERYON. By HUGH STOKES.

VAN DYCK. By FRANK NEWBOLT.
7s. 6d. net, each. By post 7s. 10d.

GOLF FAULTS ILLUSTRATED. By G. W. BELDAM and J. H. TAYLOR. Large 8vo, illustrated, 5s. net. By post, 5s. 4d.

The cheapest and most authoritative work upon this popular game.

What to Drink and Why.

Drink cocoa. Drink it regularly, at breakfast, at lunch - time, and with the afternoon or evening meals.
The cocoa habit is a good one to acquire.

Cadbury's
is cocoa in its most beneficial form.
It possesses the combined advantages of being thirst-quenching, invigorating, and highly nourishing.

Drink Cadbury's
it's Best.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1774

MAY 5, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 27, 28, and 29 to fill Vacancies in Scholarships and Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the BURSAR, The Bursary, Little Dean's Yard, Westminster.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL. See Staff (honourmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The COUNCIL of the COLLEGE invites applications for the post of LECTURER in POLITICAL and COMMERCIAL SCIENCE, at a Salary of £200.

Applications, with testimonials, should be sent on or before THURSDAY, May 31, 1906, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A., Registrar.
University College, Cardiff.
April 21, 1906.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The COUNCIL of the COLLEGE invites applications for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER in WELSH.

Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications, with Testimonials (which need not be printed), must be sent on or before FRIDAY, May 25, 1906.

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A., Registrar.
University College, Cardiff.
April 21, 1906.

PARTNERSHIP WANTED, in advanced school for boys, by Cambridge University Honour Man.—Particulars to GRADUATE, 413 Edge Lane, Liverpool.

ARTISTS' GENERAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION

For the Relief of Distressed Artists, their Widows and Orphans.

President—SIR EDWARD J. POYNTER, Bart., P.R.A.

The ANNIVERSARY DINNER will take place at the Whitehall Rooms, Hôtel Métropole, on SATURDAY, May 12, at 7.15 o'clock.

The Lord CLAUD J. HAMILTON in the chair. Dinner Tickets, including wines, one guinea.

Donations will be received and thankfully acknowledged by

SIR ASTON WEBB, R.A., Treasurer.
ARTHUR S. COPE, A.R.A., Hon. Sec.

DOUGLAS G. H. GORDON, Secretary.
41 Jermyn Street, S.W.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

READERS and COLLECTORS will find it to their advantage to write for J. BALDWIN'S MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, sent post free on application. Books in all Branches of Literature. Genuine bargains in Scarce Items and First Editions. Books sent on approval if desired.—Address 14 Osborne Road, Leyton, Essex.

BOOKS! BOOKS! BOOKS!
GREAT VARIETY. LOW PRICES.
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDER STOCKS.

Comprising all kinds of Literature.
ALL BOOKS IN NEW CONDITION AS WHEN PUBLISHED.

Frequent Catalogues. Write or Call.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London.

SCOTT (Sir W.), Waverley Novels, Edinburgh Edition, large type, bound in buckram, leather labels; condition as new; 1901-3; J. & E. Jack; published at £14 8s. net for £9.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net for 35s., 1902-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,

All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING WANTED.—MSS. and all Literary work executed accurately and promptly. 10d. per 1000 words. Carbon copies.—Mrs. BRAMBLER, 26 Clarence Road, Windsor.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—8d. 1000 words (Remington). Novels, Plays, Duplicating Circulars, etc.—Miss WILLARD, Beaufort House, Osborne Road, Southville, Bristol.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS having MSS. typed at Miss A. LONGLEY'S, 467 Mansion House Chambers, 20 Bucklersbury, E.C., at 10d. per 1000 words, receive carbon copy free. Established 10 years.

TO AUTHORS.—ISABEL H. CAINE (Certificated Cambridge) undertakes all descriptions of TYPING at 9d. per 1000 words; with Carbon Duplicate, 1s. Excellent references.—The Hollies, Durrington, Worthing.

Art

R.W.S. — ROYAL SOCIETY OF COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East (near the National Gallery). 138TH EXHIBITION NOW OPEN.
F. W. HAYWARD BUTT, Secretary.

PAINTINGS by REPRESENTATIVE SCOTTISH ARTISTS OF TO-DAY and Watercolours by O. Wynne Apperley and Mr. and Mrs. Walter St. John Mildmay, now open.—THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W. 10-6

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL. — SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

SHORTHAND is invaluable to every young man and woman entering business. You can learn under Britain's highest honoursman. Send stamp to-day for Booklet S. 13—ALSTON'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

HOLLAND HOUSE (1).

This book contains unpublished letters to John Whishaw from Sidney Smith, Maria Edgeworth, Hallam, Sismondi, Dr. Holland, Sir James Mackintosh, Lady Holland and others. These with Whishaw's own letters are full of gossip about Napoleon, Wellington, Madame de Stael, Byron, Scott, and others, about the politics and all the prominent events of the time. A memoir of Whishaw and an account of the once famous "King of Clubs" are contributed by Mr. W. P. Courtney.

HAECKEL (2).

Professor Bölsche's admirable biography places before us a graphic picture of his countryman, Professor Haeckel, the charm of his personality, his marvellous powers of detailed work, his keen æsthetic sensibility, his imaginative grasp of broad principles, his constant endeavour to render systematic the whole field of scientific knowledge within which his own brilliant researches were only subsidiary factors, his Huxleyan combativeness, combined with the conviction that he fights on the right side in the cause of truth.—The Tribune.

SPORT AND TRAVEL (3).

Three separate journeys, undertaken chiefly for purposes of sport, are described in this interesting book of travel. . . . The work is at every step illustrated by interesting photographic pictures, which exhibit the characteristics of the scenery and the natives. It gives in an appendix a reprint from its author's book on British East Africa on game preservation in the protectorate. The work, in fine, forms an interesting addition to the literature of sport and travel, and will be eagerly read by all who hunt big game.—Scotsman.

- (1) THE "POPE" OF HOLLAND HOUSE. Edited by Lady SEYMOUR. Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)
- (2) HAECKEL: His Life and Work. By WILHELM BÖLSCHÉ. Illustrated. 15s. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)
- (3) SPORT AND TRAVEL: Abyssinia and British East Africa. By Lord HINDLIP. 21s. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

Aristotle's Theory of Conduct.

By THOMAS MARSHALL, M.A.
21s. net.

A lucid exposition of Aristotle's Ethics. With Introduction, Notes, and a paraphrase of the greater part of the original text.

The Anglo-Saxon: a Study in Evolution.

By GEORGE E. BOXALL. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

A work of peculiar fascination . . . of genuine merit and interest.—Sunday Special.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Tuesday next, May 8, at five o'clock, Professor WILLIAM STIRLING, M.D., LL.D., D.Sc., First of Three Lectures on "Glands and their Products." Half a Guinea the Course.

Thursday, May 10, at five o'clock, the Rev. J. P. MAHAFFY, C.V.O., D.D., D.C.L., First of Two Lectures on (1) "The Expansion of Old Greek Literature by Recent Discoveries"; (2) "The Influence of Ptolemaic Egypt on Græco-Roman Civilisation." Half a Guinea.

MSS. MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, invite writers to send them MSS. of ORIGINAL STORIES: (1) for BOYS of 10-14, addressed Mr. JOHN LANG, BOYS' EDITOR; (2) for GIRLS of 10-14, addressed Mrs. JOHN LANG, GIRLS' EDITOR; (3) for CHILDREN of 6-10, addressed Mrs. LOUEY CHISHOLM, CHILDREN'S EDITOR; extent, 40,000 to 50,000 words. All MSS. (which should be sent in any time before September 30—typewritten preferred) will be acknowledged, and returned if not suitable.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

NOW READY, THE MAY

BOOK MONTHLY, 6d.

CONTENTS

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR

What is being Said and Done in Bookland, with Portraits and Pictures

A "GREAT UNKNOWN"

Special Peeps at Mudie and His World of Readers.—By James Milne

TREASURE TROVE

Some Unpublished Verse by Our English Poet Crabbe.—By M. Jourdain.

WANTED—HUMORISTS!

Has the Triumphant Woman Novelist Killed them All?—By C. E. Lawrence

MAN AND SUPERMAN

Or the Human Side and Little Ways of Herbert Spencer

A LONDON LETTER

On Some of the Influences which Help to Sell Books

LIGHT AND LEADING

New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY

Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month

BOOKS OF THE MONTH

A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions and Reprints of April

OUR EXCHANGE AND MART of Books

Wanted and For Sale

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., STATIONERS' HALL COURT, LONDON.

Write for a free specimen copy.

CHATTO &amp; WINDUS, PUBLISHERS.

New Stories by the Author of "East of Suez."

RED RECORDS. By ALICE PERRIN, Author of "Waters of Destruction."

[At all Libraries.]

"RED RECORDS" is mainly concerned with the Weird and the Supernatural in India, and the stories open up some strange byways of native superstitious beliefs and customs. There are contained in them records of tragedy, of mystery, of love, and of punishment, many of which are founded on actual fact; and dealing as they do with Anglo-Indian life in camp and station, as well as with the people of the country in their villages and jungles, the tales will be found interesting by various classes of readers.

THE LOST EARL OF ELLAN. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED, Author of "Christina Chard." [May 10.]

THE FERRY OF FATE. A Tale of Russian Jewry. By SAMUEL GORDON, Author of "Sons of the Covenant." [May 17.]

HARLEY GREENOAK'S CHARGE. By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of "The Gun-Runner." [May 24.]

THE WOMAN IN THE ALCOVE. By ANNA KATHARINE GREEN, Author of "The Leavenworth Case." [At all Libraries.]

LOVE AND LORDSHIP. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "Joan the Curate."

"Shows all the excellent qualities which made 'The House on the Marsh' so popular. . . . Holds our interest the whole way through."—GLASGOW HERALD.

A MENDER OF NETS. By WILLIAM MACKAY, Author of "The Popular Idol."

"A strong and conscientious study . . . boldly conceived and skilfully developed."—SCOTSMAN.

"Could not have been better written."—COURT JOURNAL.

CHRIS HEALY'S New Novel,

MARA: an Unconventionable Woman,

Has been REPRINTED, and a full supply is now ready at all Libraries and Booksellers'.

"It commands attention and merits praise. 'C'est magnifique.'"—WORLD.

"Thrillingly interesting."—SHEFFIELD TELEGRAPH.

"A vigorous novel."—TRIBUNE.

THE POCKET CHARLES DICKENS: A Choice of Favourite Passages made by A. H. HYATT. 16mo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt top, 3s. net. [May 17.]

ALSO, UNIFORM IN SIZE AND PRICE,

The Pocket R. L. Stevenson.

The Pocket Richard Jefferies.

The Pocket George MacDonald.

TAINIE'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Translated by H. VAN LAUN. A New Edition in POCKET SIZE, with 32 Portraits, pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net per vol.; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net per vol.

Mr. SWINBURNE'S TRAGEDIES. Collected Library Edition in Six Crown 8vo Volumes, bound in buckram, 30s. net for the five volumes.

Mr. SWINBURNE'S POETICAL WORKS. Collected Library Edition in Six Crown 8vo Volumes, bound in buckram, 36s. net for the six volumes.

LITERARY RAMBLES IN THE WEST OF ENGLAND. By ARTHUR L. SALMON. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

LIFE IN MOROCCO. By BUDGETT MEAKIN, Author of "The Land of the Moors." With 24 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH SEAS. By CLEMENT L. WRAGGE, F.R.G.S. With 84 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

CHEAP EDITIONS. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

BEN-HUR: a Tale of the Christ. By LEW. WALLACE.

EAST OF SUEZ. By ALICE PERRIN, Author of "The Waters of Destruction."

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By HAROLD BINDLOSS.

LOVE—OR A NAME. By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

NEW SIXPENNY COPYRIGHT NOVELS.

The Grand Babylon Hotel. By ARNOLD BENNETT.

Madame Sans-Gene. By E. LEPELLETIER

Ariadne. By OUIDA.

Beyond the Pale. By B. M. CROKER.

Eve. By S. BARING-GOULD.

The Double Marriage. By CHARLES READE.

Fettered for Life. By FRANK BARRETT.

The Monks of Thelema. By BESANT and RICE.

London: Chatto & Windus, 111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	419	Fiction . . . . .	429
Literature:		Fine Art:
A Novel of the Studio . . . . .	422	Sham Antiques . . . . .	431
Comparative Literature . . . . .	423	Water-Colours in Pall Mall and
Alice's Looking-glass . . . . .	424	Elsewhere . . . . .	432
An Antique Song . . . . .	425	Historical Portraits at Oxford	432
The Monastic Ideal . . . . .	425	Music:
Letters from Samoa . . . . .	426	Choral Music—II . . . . .	432
In the Forest . . . . .	427	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	433
Ye Verdant Groves, Ye Sylvan		Correspondence . . . . .	434
Shades . . . . .	427	Books Received . . . . .	435
A Literary Causerie:		The Bookshelf . . . . .	436
Glamour and Vision . . . . .	428

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

IN the May number of the National Review there is an article by Miss Eveline Godley on "A Century of Children's Books," which was well worthy of greater elaboration. The writer looks back with amusement at the very instructive works for children published during the early reign of Queen Victoria—the Sandford and Merton type of book—but it is open to doubt whether the attitude of superiority is quite justified. It is laughable, no doubt, to think of the moral lessons and general instructiveness which we thought suitable to children in the early days of Queen Victoria, but are we not going to the other extreme to-day?

The child of to-day is indeed unfortunate if it happens to be born to literary parents, because the creature is studied and observed and watched and made notes of just as if it were some extraordinary animal in captivity. We can easily imagine a writer fifty years hence looking back on the words of wisdom which have proceeded ex oribus parvulorum in the early years of the twentieth century, and some attempt will be made to trace the future career of these small prodigies. The majority, to be sure, will be old men and women by the time they are thirteen years of age. Indeed, they often look like prematurely old people before they have done with infancy, and our coddling is just as foolish as was the discipline of the nineteenth century.

Something might have been said about the picture-books in common use. Few people seem to realise that the beginning of taste must be in the nursery, yet even in expensive and otherwise beautiful books that can only be meant for people able to afford luxuries, pictures which are, in spite of all their colour, really vulgar and debasing often find a place. Among such we would classify all those wretched attempts at humour where the supposed fun consists in fitting the head of one animal to the body of another: in giving a dog's head, for example, to a man's body. Absolute truth to nature should be insisted upon even in these early days, though it must be obvious to any one that it is easier to produce a laugh by some small mechanical device than by that closeness of observation which is able to discern what is naturally amusing.

Members of the Honourable House, known at Harrow as the Park, will be amused at a certain passage in a dialogue between Pater and Filius in next month's Cornhill. A certain Archbishop of Canterbury (as Mr. W. P. Frith, R.A., tells us through the pen of Mr. Walter Frith) was known as "The Beauty of Holiness" —which reminds us of a certain famous passage in "The Picture of Dorian Grey." At one time this Archbishop was Headmaster of Harrow, and this is the story Mr. Frith has to tell: "He was rather a little chap and the boys called him Jacob. One night he was coming home and saw a rope hanging down in the street from one of the windows of that very house. He suspected one of the young gentlemen was out larking about the town, and coming under the window, caught hold of the rope. The young gentlemen above thought it was the signal of their pal's return and hauled him up. When his face was level with the sill, and they saw who it was, they cried 'Jacob, by George!' and dropped him. He said he was a good deal shaken." The joy of the "young gentleman" must have depended largely upon the personality of the victim. There would be no joy at all in dropping Temple; very little in dropping Benson. It may be indecorous—but we can imagine an hilarious delight in dropping Randall Cantuar.

For the rest, Mr. Walter Frith's "Talk with my Father" is sprinkled with amusing and informing facts. "What was the first picture which ever had a rail round it at the Exhibition" [we need not add "of the Royal Academy"]? is a fair specimen of the important points of art which it settles; and "There's generally been what one may call a picture of the year, hasn't there?" is the easier sort of question it answers. There has, indeed, and: "First-rate, nearly all of them" is the comment of the staunch old ex-R.A. Todgers's, as we know, can not only do it when it likes, but can't help doing it, when it lodges in Burlington House, W. But the succeeding comment is interesting. "Why, look what a wonderful drawing a student has to do now to get into the Academy schools at all. I saw some the other day, and I'm sure I couldn't have done them, never, at any time." Nohow! Contrariwise! we do not believe it. Mr. Frith could always draw anything he wanted to, even Miss Herbert of the St. James's—and we hope that, now he has given up painting, his wonderfully green old age may at least draw on itself for several further instalments of such yarns as his son here records.

Our notes on the inaccuracies of illustrators and authors have brought forth an interesting article from a writer in a provincial paper, who cites several errors we had overlooked. The author of "Don Quixote" makes the party at the Crescent tavern eat two suppers in one evening. Scott in one chapter of "Ivanhoe" gives the Christian name of Malvoisin as Richard, subsequently altering it to Philip. Pope makes a weasel eat corn. Kingsley makes John Brumlecombe read the prayer for "All sorts and conditions of men," though in the time of Elizabeth the Prayer Book did not contain it. Sir Archibald Alison speaks of "Sir Peregrine Pickle" when he means Sir Peregrine Maitland; and the same author translated "droit de timbre" as timber duty, "a howler" which is only equalled by Victor Hugo's translation of "Firth of Forth": "premier de quatre."

Three other errors quoted by the writer occur in a book which—we confess it without shame—we have never read. That book is Ash's Dictionary. Gawaine here is "a sister to King Arthur"; esoteric is "an uncorrect spelling—exoteric." The word exoteric "belongs to those lectures of Aristotle which any one had the liberty to hear." But the most amusing blunder of all is in the definition of "curmudgeon." Johnson, in his Dictionary, adds after the meaning of the word, "unknown correspondent," thereby indicating his authority. Ash ingeniously gives: "Curmudgeon (from the French cœur, unknown, and merchant, a correspondent), a miser, a churl!"

The First Folio of Shakespeare after the "wore and tore" of a chequered history has reached its old home again. It now lies in Case 22 in the Bodleian Library, and is open at its most interesting page. For this rediscovery makes a definite original contribution to Shakespearean criticism. For forty years the volume was chained close to its present resting-place for the edification of the graduates of the University. The comparative use shown by the delicate state of certain pages teaches us something of the popularity of the separate plays. Romeo and Juliet especially attracted the academic mind, and the Folio now lies open at the Balcony scene.

It was the Larke, the Herauld of the Morne:
No Nightingale: looke Loue what envious streakes.

If we may denote the wear of this play by the number 10, we may realise the comparative attractiveness of Julius Cæsar (9), The Tempest would be represented by 8, and Henry IV. Part I., Cymbeline, and Macbeth each received the amount of wear shown by 7. We are surprised to see that King John was not more popular. This evidence of contemporary literary opinion is the more valuable, since the wear has been caused by successive readers in a public library. Sceptics may assert that during its years of travel, it must have been subjected to private use. The unbroken condition of the back disproves this conjecture. It has not been tortured on a reader's knees. It was treated with due respect, as became a book chained in an exceptionally accessible position in a public room.

There has been some misunderstanding as to the reasons of its departure from the Bodleian. The book is now a national treasure, and it is well that its history should be clearly known. Certain writers have conjectured that it was abstracted in the troublous times of 1663. It is not easy to steal a chained volume. Also, in the accounts of the Bodleian is an entry to the effect that £24 were received from Richard Davis, the Oxford bookseller, for "superfluous Library Books sold by order of the Curators." With the arrival of the edition containing seven new plays, the First Folio lost for a time its interest and value, and so was sold as superfluous. Many such "mid-night darlings" have been sold in blissful ignorance.

The Folio has another peculiar feature. It is the copy selected by the publisher for permanent preservation! It was sent in sheets by the London Stationers' Co. in 1623 or 1624, according to an arrangement similar to the privileges now enjoyed by the four great libraries under successive Copyright Acts. It is the identical copy that was bound by William Wildgoose, the Oxford binder. The original broken corners now hang limply, but Oxford is to be congratulated on regaining possession of the most interesting copy of the most important printed book in the English language.

The extra-territorial notice of copyright is, it appears, after all a mere bogey. Judge Wright has decided that no copyright notice is required on copies of an English edition to safeguard the American copyright. This reverses the decision of Judge Kohlsaat commented upon in the ACADEMY, February 10. Although the result of this litigation is eminently satisfactory and rational it cannot be doubted that it comes as a surprise to American lawyers. It is to be hoped that it will not give pause to the movement in favour of elucidating the meaning of the American Statute with unmistakable clearness in the forthcoming American Copyright Code. It is not impossible that the case may go to a yet higher court, and, as we all know, anything may happen there. For the moment, however, it may be safely assumed that the piracy of English editions of American copyright works will be "off" in the United States. The United Dictionary Company showed enterprise worthy of a better cause in importing copies of "Webster's Brief International Dictionary" from England—from which the American copyright notice had been deliberately omitted—photographing them and making plates with a view to issuing a reprint. Judge Wright, in effect, came to the conclusion that the American Statutes are only applicable on American soil and that the legislature never intended to render compulsory in England or elsewhere formalities not required by English or foreign law. The case seems to settle the question for the time being and in any event will serve to make piracy more unpopular than ever.

Messrs. Smith Elder are making an interesting experiment in issuing an édition de luxe (delightful phrase!), in two volumes, of Mrs. Humphry Ward's new novel "Fenwick's Career," which we notice in another column. But it is an experiment which, we think, is little likely to meet with success, and we do not anticipate a return of the "library" novel at half a guinea a volume. The innumerable editions of "pocket classics"—every month heralds the appearance of a new series—have destroyed a possible market; for the public which buys modern novels is, for the most part, unacquainted with the classics, and few readers will pay a guinea for ephemeral literature with a choice of the "immortals" before them at prices ranging from eighteenpence to three-and-six.

A correspondent complains that the Shakespeare celebrations in London on April 23 were very inadequate. "The ceremony in Leicester Square," he writes, "may have been well meant but it was extremely ridiculous. One of the speakers there talked chiefly of the Education Act and another was pathetically dull. The 'wreath,' which may have been the best which limited means could provide, was a bundle of hedge-clippings, to all outward appearance. The crowd which collected in curiosity was like the 'wreath,' for it contained hardly a decent coat or hat—not that appearances matter—and a good deal of the riff-raff of the population of London, male and female. I am convinced that there were not half a dozen in that crowd who knew anything at all about Shakespeare, and the pity of it is that they had not the chance of learning something then and there. In the afternoon there was a tea-fight among lady journalists and some good singing at Essex Hall, and in the evening more tea and more singing (not all good and not all Shakespearean songs) in Clifford's Inn Hall. The last function was redeemed by the presence of Dr. Furnivall and a few other ardent spirits, but it seemed hardly worthy of a festival which, after all, comes only once a year. The day for me, who attended these three ceremonies, was very mournful, and might have been more usefully and pleasantly employed."

Medwin, in his "Conversations of Lord Byron," records an interview with the poet at Pisa. "You tell me," said Byron, "that Baron Lutzerode has been asking you for some authentic particulars of my life to affix to his translation of 'Cain,' and thus contradict the German stories circulated about me, and which, I understand, even Goethe believes. Why don't you write something for him, Medwin? I believe you know more of me than any one else—things even that are not in the book." "My friend the Baron," replied Medwin, "is a great enthusiast about you, and I am sure you would like him. . . . Shall I bring the Baron?" "I have declined going to Court," answered Byron, "and as he belongs to it, must also decline his visit. I like neither Princes nor their satellites. . . . I will make my peace with your amiable friend by sending him a 'Cain,' and 'Don Juan' as a present, and adding to the first page of the letter an impression of my seal with the motto Elle vous suit partout. This will please the German sentimentalist."

The two presentation copies of "Don Juan" (first edition) and "Sardanapalus, a tragedy; The Two Foscari, a tragedy; and Cain, a mystery" (first edition) are included in what will probably be one of the most interesting book sales of the year—to be held at Messrs. Sotheby's on the 25th and 26th of this month. Perhaps the most important collection is that of Mr. E. W. Hussey, which includes, beside seven Shakespeare quartos, the very rare second edition in quarto of the spurious Shakespeare play, "A Yorkshire Tragedie, not so New as Lamentable and True," and the first edition of "The First Part of the True and Honorable History of the Life of Sir John Oldcastle, the good Lord Cobham. As it hath bene lately acted by the Right Honorable the Earle of Nottingham, Lord High Admirall of England, his Servants. Written by William Shakespeare," which have been ascribed to Munday, Drayton, Wilson and Hathway.

The Shakespeare quartos are: (1) "A Midsommer Night's Dreame"—the original edition with the Roberts imprint. (2) "The Excellent History of the Merchant of Venice. With the extreme cruelty of Shylocke the Jew towards the Saide Merchant, in Cutting a just Pound of his flesh. And the obtaining of Portia by the choyse of three Caskets"—the first edition. (3) "The Chronicle History of Henry the fift, with his battell fought at Agin Court in France, Together with an ancient Pistoll"—the third quarto. (4) "M. William Shakespeare, His True Chronicle History of the life and death of King Lear, and his three Daughters. With the unfortunate life of Edgar, sonne and heire to the Earle of Glocester, and his sullen and assumed humour of Tom of Bedlam. As it was plaied before the King's Majesty at White-Hall uppon S. Stephens night, in Christmas Hollidaies. By his Maiesties Servantes, playing usually at the Globe on the Banck-side"—the second quarto. (5) "A Most pleasant and excellent Conceited Comedy, of Sir John Falstaffe, and the Merry Wives of Windsor. With the Swaggering Vaine of an Ancient Pistoll and Corporall Nym"—the second quarto. (6) "The Whole Contention betweene the two famous Houses, Lancaster and Yorke. With the tragicall ende of the good Duke Humfrey, Richard Duke of Yorke, and King Henrie the Sixt. Divided into two Parts, and newly corrected and enlarged"—the rare first edition, to which the "Pericles" was originally joined in publishing. Some one has written the erroneous date 1622 after the imprint on title. (7) "The Late, and much admired play, called, Pericles, Prince of Tyre. With the true Relation of the whole History, adventures and fortunes of the saide Prince"—the third quarto edition, published with the "Whole Contention between the two famous Houses, Lancaster and Yorke" mentioned above.

There are also first editions of "Nicholas Nickleby," "Martin Chuzzlewit," "Dombey and Son," "David Copperfield," "Bleak House," and "Little Dorrit"; the extremely rare original edition, before the numbering of the plates, of Blake's "Songs of Innocence, 1789, the Author and Printer W. Blake," seventeen leaves printed in colours and touched with colour by the artist himself; and a first edition of Tennyson's "The Last Tournament," of which less than a dozen copies are recorded. A number of old illuminated manuscripts are included in the sale, and among them one of the most noteworthy is "Le Roman de la Rose," by Guillaume de Lorris—a beautifully written manuscript of the early fifteenth century, by a French scribe, red and black Gothic letter. Two other interesting manuscripts are the "Le Pelerinage de la Vie Humaine" of De Guilleville, which has been often compared with Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," and "Lancelot du Lac et Autres Romans de la Table Rond"—an important early manuscript in prose of the Arthurian Legends. The manuscript was sold by Messrs. Sotheby for £400 in 1871.

What may fairly be described as the most remarkable collection of the works of George Cruikshank ever brought to the hammer will occupy Messrs. Sotheby on May 7 and five following days when they will dispose of the Cruikshank portion of the library of the late Mr. Edwin Truman. The catalogue, which has an appropriately illustrated title-page, is divided into the following sections: Books, Chap Books and Pamphlets, Book illustrations (mostly in proof state), Etchings, Caricatures and Broad-sides, Theatrical Caricatures and Portraits, Unique Large Paper Copies of Caricatures, Etchings and Caricatures (in Reid's Catalogue but repudiated by Cruikshank), Songs Music Titles, Lithographs, Drawings, Books in Sheets, Engraved Copper Plates, Wood Blocks, and the inevitable last section called "Miscellaneous." The completeness of the "Cruikshankiana" will make the catalogue of great future value.

Mr. Haldane announced in the House of Commons on Monday that considerable progress has been made with the official History of the War in South Africa. The first volume will probably be out by midsummer, and it is expected that the second and third volumes will be out about the end of the year and the concluding volume in 1907. It seems likely, therefore, that the hope held out to the House in 1904, that the work would be completed in three years' time, will be realised. Even so, it must be acknowledged that the official historians are very leisurely, for they have access to every document on the subject and a good deal of money to back them, which are advantages to be set against the loss of Colonel Henderson which so crippled the undertaking in its early days. The Times history consists already of three volumes, and it is quite likely that the fourth will be published before the first volume of the official history appears. Yet many of the subscribers to the Times history complain, somewhat unreasonably, of the delay in publication.

The Fortune-Teller, by George Morland, bequeathed by Mrs. Behrend, and the Venus and Cupid, presented by the National Art Collections Fund, have been added to the national collection and are hung in the Gallery at Trafalgar Square. The Conversion of St. Hubert, by the Meister von Werden, The Adoration of the Kings, by the Meister von Liesborn, The Annunciation, by the Meister von Liesborn, which have been on loan in the National Gallery of Scotland since 1862, have been returned to Trafalgar Square and are now hung in Rome XV., together with a small picture of The Virgin and Child, ascribed to Martin Schoen, which was formerly hung in the Board Room.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Society of Arts.—Arrangements for week ending May 12, 1906. Monday, May 7, at 8 P.M. Cantor Lectures: "Ivory in Commerce and in the Arts," by Alfred Maskell, F.S.A. Three lectures. Lecture III.—Applications and uses of ivory in the industrial and decorative arts—Religious statuettes and figures of mediæval times—Pastoral staves and other liturgical accessories—Caskets, marriage coffers, mirror cases, combs, and other domestic articles—Arms and hunting horns—Tankards—Tobacco graters—Portrait medallions—Chessmen and draughtsmen and boards—Ivory sculpture in India, China, Japan—Musical instruments—Furniture and inlaid work—The working of ivory: the lathe and turnery—Forgeries of works of art—Ivory sculpture at the present day in France, Belgium, and England—The position of ivory sculpture, with a plea for its encouragement. Tuesday, May 8, at 8 P.M. Applied Art Section: "Damascening and the Inlaying and Ornamenting of Metallic Surfaces," by Sherard Cowper-Coles. Henry Hardinge Cunyngghame, C.B., will preside. Wednesday, May 9, at 8 P.M. Ordinary meeting: "Bridge Building by means of Caissons, including remarks upon Compressed Air Illness," by Professor Thomas Oliver, M.D., LL.D.

The Dante Society Lecture.—May 9, Rev. Sebastian Bowden: "Dante and St. Thomas Aquinas." Sir Hubert Jerningham, K.C.M.G., in the chair. June 13, Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D.: "The Companionship of Dante." Sir Theodore Martin, President, in the chair.

The next production of the Stage Society, which will take place at the Scala Theatre on May 13 and 14, will be Hermann Sudermann's Johannisfeuer, which has been translated by Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Grein. The play will be produced by Herr Hans Andresen.

LITERATURE

A NOVEL OF THE STUDIO

Fenwick's Career. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THE life of George Romney has not only been frequently written, but it has supplied crude materials out of which imaginative work both in prose and verse has been fashioned. During the course of the last two or three years it has been brought into considerable prominence chiefly owing to the painter's connection with Emma Hart, who afterwards became Lady Hamilton. Probably that had something to do with Mrs. Humphry Ward's choice of a plot. She has taken the facts of Romney's life and transplanted them in a most literal manner into her book. The only difference is that whereas Romney was a man of the eighteenth century and a contemporary and rival of Sir Joshua Reynolds, she places her hero in the nineteenth century and provides for him fictitious rivals who, no doubt, will be identified by the curious in such matters with some of the leading artists of the day.

The novel is emphatically an old tale with a new and very modern setting. Its comment—and we must say that there is a great deal of comment—is to a large extent the babble of the studios: art criticism is very freely mingled with the narrative in "Fenwick's Career." How little invention Mrs. Humphry Ward has bestowed on her plot will be apparent from a mere statement of the parallel between Fenwick and George Romney. Romney was the son of a cabinet maker of Dalton-in-Furness. Afterwards he was apprenticed to Edward Steele, a local portrait painter. He began his life as an artist by painting portraits, and married Mary Abbott, a peasant woman of the neighbourhood. After marriage, he left his wife and children and came to London, where he attained considerable success before going to Paris to complete his studies in 1764. In the novel before us, the curtain rises on the painter's studio, where he is at work on the picture of Bella Morrison, an ill-tempered and by no means good-looking young lady of the provinces, who complains that Fenwick makes her upper lip "miles too long," gives her a "nasty staring look," and a mouth she is ashamed of. Thus does the novelist insist at the beginning on the vexatious life of a local portrait painter—a life that no man with the artistic temperament could endure for very long. Fenwick himself has an uncle in the upholstery business, and his father has kept a bookseller's shop, so that he might have been first cousin to the cabinet maker who begot Romney. As a matter of course, he had quarrelled with his father, had picked up some knowledge of drawing at an art school, and in the midst of his early painting met his future wife, Phoebe. The father of his model advances sufficient money for him to go to London, and, though making very strong objections to it, his wife consents that he should go while she and the child are left behind.

He is a man of some talent and very great ambition, loud-voiced, rude, insistent. Like many young men, he undervalues those already in the field, and thinks he will carry the world before him:

Millais, Leighton, Watts,—spent talents, extinct volcanoes!—Tadema a marvellous mechanic, without ideas:—the landscape men, chaotic,—no standard anywhere, no style. On the other hand, Burne-Jones and the Grosvenor Gallery group—ideas without drawing, without knowledge, feet and hands absurd, muscles anyhow. While as for Whistler and the Impressionists—a lot of maniacs, running a fad to death,—but clever—by Jove!

He is also possessed of a fatal gift for writing, a gift that causes him the loss of many commissions. With this bad equipment, and leaving his wife in a passion of unconquerable tears, he goes off on his pilgrimage to the metropolis—not as we may suppose Romney to have done, on the top of a coach, but in a modern and hum-drum railway train. His next appearance is in the middle of a coterie of artists in London, where he has the good fortune to find Lord Findon, even as Romney had the good fortune to find a patron in the Duke of Richmond, and Georgiana Duchess of Devonshire.

Lord Findon has a married daughter, Madame de Pastourelles, who fills a part that might have been suggested half by the duchess and half by the versatile Emma, only she is built on more saintly lines than either of them. With her, after many years, Fenwick falls in love—even as Romney fell in love with Emma Hart. But this is long after Phoebe, in a passion of jealousy, had visited his studio in his absence, and, seeing the portrait of her whom she considered her rival, had destroyed it, and, to all seeming, had passed completely out of his life. Even in such circumstances Fenwick is not really untrue to his first love, the relations between him and Madame de Pastourelles being more or less platonic in nature until the very end, and even then the novelist makes it clear that he seeks for her friendship rather than her love. The writer is Mrs. Humphry Ward, and it will be quite understood that the atmosphere of the book is, generally speaking, one of high-toned morality. Fenwick's artistic ruin is not brought about by vice or his going astray in any one particular direction, but he is one of the men who seem born to kick against the bricks. He rages at the Royal Academy, by which he is well treated at the first, though ultimately he quarrels with it; he is jealous and envious of his fellow painters, and altogether seems a very undesirable person to live with. Whether consciously or not we cannot determine, but Mrs. Humphry Ward has not endowed him with the real artistic temperament: that temperament which would make painting the be-all and end-all of life—which would hurry a man to a great achievement even though he were accursed like him of whom it was said, "Heshall lay the foundation thereof in his firstborn, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it." He divides his attention between two mistresses, trying to be a writer as well as a painter. There is an old and well-known but very significant story told of Ruskin and Turner. The art critic was holding forth with his usual copious eloquence to the artist himself one day about a picture on which Turner was engaged, and in due time he stopped to hear the artist's comment. Turner took the clay pipe which he usually smoked out of his mouth and made this profound remark: "Yes, painting is a rum thing, it is"; and that, perhaps, is the best attitude of the artist. His province is not to write about his art, but to act. It is with painting as Wordsworth said it was with poetry, every great man must make his own following. So, therefore, in spite of much writing on the part of Mrs. Humphry Ward about Fenwick, we reluctantly come to the conclusion that he had not the root of the matter in him, and he certainly was no Romney.

If we turn from the painter's side of the novel to look at it as pure literature, the criticism that one is almost compelled to pass upon the work is that the characters are somewhat wanting in life and full-bloodedness. If Madame de Pastourelles had possessed a little more of Emma Hart's spirit she would have been a more interesting character, though perhaps not furnishing such innocuous reading for the benefit of the Young Person. Lord Findon, as the Mæcenas of the piece, is somewhat of a lay figure. The painters are drawn with a considerable amount of vivacity and individualism and furnish what is perhaps the best reading in the book, though we are made to see a good deal of the more sordid aspect of art and, what is still more fatal, it is exhibited in a rather sordid light. The peasant wife, again, seems to be drawn on rather hesitating lines, as though the novelist were not quite sure what to make of her. It is probable that Mrs. Humphry Ward does not quite understand the simple strength of peasant men and women. Most of the striking characters in her novels are the creatures of fashion and luxury, or belong at any rate to circles where refinement is the rule; but much that distinguishes them is pure tinsel and it would test the strength of this popular novelist if she would endeavour to give us a study of men and women that has no meretricious attraction, and no "topicality," to use a journalistic word. The idea of taking a well-known story of the eighteenth century and fitting it up with the gear and tackle of the nineteenth century savours of a direct appeal to popularity more than of attention to what is perhaps the noblest of all arts, that of creating a work of imagination.

COMPARATIVE LITERATURE

A Short History of Comparative Literature, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE. Translated by M. DOUGLAS POWER, M.A. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.)

EVER since the Natural Sciences attempted to dominate the realm of knowledge, it has been the habit of those who must be in the movement at all costs to demand for their pursuit the dignity of a science. So we saw the late Professor Max Müller claiming for the study of language the exactitude which is said to belong to botany or physics. So another enterprising scholar presumed to establish the mythology of the whole world upon a definite basis with the simple help of the sun and the moon. And more recently an eminent critic has claimed that his craft is a branch of Darwinism or Haeckelism. In other words he has said that a poet is "a complex instance of natural selection, obvious and almost geometrical, yet interfering not a whit with that counter-principle of individual variation which is needful to make the poet not a parasite upon his artistic ancestors, but an independent output from the main growing organism." M. Loliée would carry this nonsensical jargon a step further, and invites us in a short history of some four hundred pages to make a comparative study of universal literature.

If M. Loliée's book have any clear meaning, it is that the literatures of all countries are organic growths, each having its permanent distinguishing marks, and differing one from another in a constant ratio at each stage of their progress. As you distinguish this race from that by noting facial angles and measuring skulls, so at a glance you may part one literature from another. The French, for instance, "are especially appreciative of noble linguistic style." The Germans, on the other hand, "are endowed by nature with a strongly marked international sense." For England not much may be said. "Common sense is the characteristic mark of British talent." Is it? Is common sense the quality which most easily leaps to our mind when we consider Shakespeare or Ben Jonson, or Byron or Shelley? Italy fares not much better than England. "Save for certain notable exceptions, the profounder side of nature," says M. Loliée, "has often escaped the Italian, nor does he know mankind deeply or truly." Alas, poor Italy! At the outset it seemed that Spain was to fare better than her neighbours. "Spanish literature is profoundly original," we are told. But there is a fly even in this pot of ointment. "To conclude, we must make this observation"—thus M. Loliée—"namely, that the appreciation of the beauties of nature and the simple pleasures of family life are almost totally absent from Spanish literature until the advent of the last contemporary novelists." Fancy that!

Now, the worst of these hasty generalisations, made in the name of a false science, is that they leave the poet, the philosopher, the historian, out of the account. They imply that literature is a plant which will grow of its own accord if only you give it enough water. But literature does not grow. It is made, as chairs and tables are made. The one thing necessary to its production is not natural tendencies or racial qualities, but the artist, and he comes only after his own way and at his own time. If you put a certain seed in the earth, a turnip will surely be the result; but how shall you contrive the growth of a Chaucer, a Shakespeare, or a Tennyson? The poet, indeed, is not the product of his age. It would be nearer the truth to say that the age is the product of the poet. And without a pseudo-scientific dogmatism no more can be said than that the age and the poet reciprocally influence one another. Shakespeare was born not of his generation but of his father and mother. His genius belonged to himself and to his ancestry. By no method in the world shall you docket it as the outcome of the national temper and the wise government of the Tudors. Among the many thousands of Englishmen, born into the sixteenth century there was but one Shakespeare, and to attempt to bring this splendid exception under a general rule is bad criticism and foolish science. A man of genius will give expression to the poetry which sings in his brain, whether he be French or English, and we shall not understand his music the better if we throw him hastily into a heap with all the poets who speak his own tongue. And how does M. Loliée arrive at his generalisations? By guesswork or by counting heads? In either case he wastes his time. If he have a natural gift for guessing, let him exercise it not on literature but on conundrums. And if he arrive at his conclusions by counting heads, let him at least respect the rights of minorities. He says that the simple pleasures of family life are absent from Spanish literature. If he will read the "Exemplary Novels," perhaps he will be persuaded to change his opinion.

In order to make his comparison complete, M. Loliée takes us at a gallop over the whole course of literature. With breathless speed we are hurried from the abode of prehistoric man to Egypt, to India, to Greece, to where you will. It is not surprising that in this rapid rush M. Loliée often stumbles and falls. Rarely indeed does he keep a tight hand upon the rein, and his steed, whether he call it Literature or Science, gives him many a nasty fall. In other words, he either blunders or tumbles into commonplace. He is always tripping between falsehood and truism. Of Homer he has nothing more illuminating to say than that "we may not ignore the fact that for thirty centuries Homeric creations have presided over the destinies of all literatures." And the scientific method does not prevent him from sinking into the lowest pit of sentimentality. "The very name of Sappho enables us," says he, "to realise that inspiration can ennoble and regulate the most passionate love." There is the true accent of Pecksniff. And is it not consoling to be told that Euripides "took a happy medium tone between baseness and moral elevation"? As we come down the ages M. Loliée is still further at fault. Chaucer, he discovers, "brilliantly headed a series of national writers in England," and "the English imagination was ready to follow him." And who followed him, think you? Dryden and Leigh Hunt "in the modernisation of some of his tales"! From which it is clear that our professor of Comparative Literature looks no deeper into poetry than its plot.

In dealing with English literature M. Loliée is singularly unhappy. He sums up the talent of Goldsmith in these ingenuous words: "He was a kindly but severe moralist, and one of the most original writers of his country. His irregular life was not always in correspondence with his idealist literary work." Of Marryat he says no more than that he "followed Dickens," which is untrue. He has discovered that "the exotic Stevenson affected the heart of the nation with the Imperial sentiment." In the name of Comparative Literature he assures his readers that Howells and James are "the authors of the best novels in the English language at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century." Concerning this, indeed, there is no dispute. "England herself," we are told, "is the first to bear witness to it in her journals and reviews, and the avowal is all the more remarkable as she herself possesses at the present time novelists of great talent, such as George Meredith, the subtle portraitist of feminine character, and Thomas Hardy, the gifted analyst belonging both to the Romantic and the Modern School." We wish M. Loliée had told us where this avowal had been made, and had also explained how, in the cause of science, he can divide Mr. Hardy into two unequal portions.

We have read this work with dismay and disappointment. We had fondly hoped that the day had long since gone by when a list of the hundred or thousand best books might masquerade as literature. And even as a list M. Loliée's work is incomplete. For he seems to say nothing of Pope, and he mentions Rabelais by accident. Sciolism such as this is not merely useless. It encourages idle readers to the hypocrisy of pretending a knowledge that they do not possess. And as for M. Loliée's comparisons, they are fit only to be made at a penny-reading. It remains to add that the book is very ill-translated, and that it bristles with misprints.

ALICE'S LOOKING-GLASS

The Mirror of the Century. By WALTER FREWEN LORD.
(Lane, 5s. net.)

It is to be hoped that the Countess of Tankerville is not so unfortunate as to receive many letters like that addressed to her by the author of this book and printed as an introduction to it, for it is a long epistle and, sooth to say, we find it more than a little dull. The only thing that tends to enliven it is a very singular attack on the reputation of Thackeray. We are told that Mr. Ruskin's famous "Poison" sums him up not unfairly. "After Shakespeare one is glad to be alive; after Thackeray one is horribly ashamed of oneself." He even attributes to Thackeray the lapse of the great middle-class of England from political authority to contented insignificance. On the other hand it is amusing to find him taking Thackeray's disciple, Anthony Trollope, who has been described as Thackeray with all the poetry left out, and praising him up to the skies.

Mr. Frewen Lord, however, does not keep long to literature. He seems to think novels were written chiefly for the purpose of propagating political opinions. He tells us that for thirty years "shouts of pagan exultation went up as estate after estate went out of cultivation," which is absurd, as Euclid says. "Finally, as a result of attacking alike our land and our manufacturers, we find our sons and daughters starving in the streets." This will amuse those who heard Mr. Asquith's Budget speech, or who heard Mr. Chamberlain himself extolling the youth of this country only a few nights ago. However, political argument would be out of place here. One can only offer sympathetic condolence to the Countess of Tankerville, on whose unoffending head this long and dismal letter has been poured. The opinions in the book are precisely such as might have been expected from the introduction. Mr. Frewen Lord appears to have waded through a vast quantity of novels seeking not mere literary merit but the political or moral lesson they conveyed. The first sentence of his criticism is: "The art of George Eliot dominates the world of romance as the dome of St. Paul's dominates the city of London." Yet the next sentence seems to show that this declaration is not so confident as it looks, for he admits that during the last twenty years critical opinion has greatly changed in regard to her work. There are not many whose judgment is worth having who would endorse his opening sentence. But indeed the opinion is too absurd to call for comment. It seems quite natural that Mr. W. E. Norris should follow George Eliot in this curious assembly. He is described by Mr. Frewen Lord as the Gainsborough of English novelists. Of course we have all obtained great pleasure from the novels of Mr. W. E. Norris, who in truth is simply a very genial and pleasant disciple of Thackeray; but the very strong opinions here expressed can only tempt the reader into disparaging a favourite author. It is much to be regretted that living writers should be hauled before the public in this way. Naturally enough, Jane Austen, who comes next, is not highly valued by this serious critic. He is dumbfounded because Macaulay acclaimed her "Shakespearean" and Mr. Howells found her "divine."

The rush and riot of Shakespearean life, its tumultuous passions, its hell-black tragedies, and its glimpses of heavens undreamed of—I do protest that all these things would be vastly improper in Miss Austen's world.

It would be extremely pleasant to hear Macaulay dealing with this sort of stuff. The following passage, will, we think, satisfy most inquirers as to the value of the criticisms before us:

Miss Austen will have none of this. Her heroines are ordinary healthy young women who live the most ordinary lives imaginable, and they are perfectly drawn. Even so Gerard Dou's cats are perfectly painted, even to the very iridescence of their whiskers. They are very bad cats, destitute of all the points that mark the good cat; and one cannot help wondering, was it worth while?

We next have the Brontës, and then comes W. M. Thackeray. The passage in the preface prepared us for Mr. Lord's criticism, but it is interesting to discover on what his opinion is based. For one thing Thackeray is accused of not being the accurate mirror of the clergyman of the nineteenth century. The conclusion arrived at is that "his picture of the Church is one of those half-truths which are so much more damaging than downright falsehoods." As Thackeray did not set out to paint the Church but only certain individuals who happened to be connected with it, the criticism is not very relevant. He is also accused of misrepresenting the Civil Service in the person of Jos Sedley, and probably Thackeray would have been much amused by being told that he had caricatured those many amusing people of his who claim to be descended from the Irish Kings. The gem of the whole criticism is the fault that is found with the novelist who, when describing the death of Lord Steyne, did not follow the exact facts about Lord Monmouth. Our critic goes on to say:

The extra scenery and machinery employed by Mr. Thackeray tell us nothing more than Mr. Thackeray's private opinion of Lord Steyne's future life. Why all this brutal invective? Disorderly behaviour in a man of mediocre rank would have hardly attracted Mr. Thackeray's attention. It is not because Lord Steyne was wicked, but because he was a marquis, that Mr. Thackeray denounced him. Exalted rank, like high character and lofty aims and noble achievements, must all be attacked and denounced, and until life is reduced to a desert of colourless drudges Mr. Thackeray will continue to disapprove. Even so, as Mr. Trollope observed, Mr. Thackeray worked himself into such a state of mind that a man could not mount his horse or put on his gloves or order his dinner without being called a snob.

Now let us take Mr. Frewen Lord in a moment of unwonted gaiety and listen to him while he sings the praises of Charles Dickens:

Lovers of Dickens the world over find in their worship a veritable freemasonry of mirth. Care drops from our shoulders and anxiety from our brows when we remind each other that Mrs. Nickleby decided to call Smike "Mrs. Slammons." In moments of depression, and even of misery, life becomes less wearisome when we murmur: "The Baron Sampson Brasso and his fair sister are (you tell me) at the Play? Ha! 'tis well, Marchioness! but no matter. Some wine there, ho!" Delightedly we cap passages; and while listening with joy to some reminiscence of the Fat Boy, we await the moment when we can slip in, "If the law says that, the law is a ass."

It were a profitless business to follow this author further. Indeed we find it impossible to realise the standard of ideas which makes such a judgment as he sets down possible. On every possible occasion he says the thing that is exactly wrong with a perversity that never deviates into illuminating criticism. To call these essays on certain novelists a mirror of the century was not the happiest inspiration. The nineteenth century was an extraordinary one, and marked by special characteristics of its own, but the feature that distinguished it was undoubtedly the scientific discoveries it brought forth. Not in the pages of Anthony Trollope and Mr. W. E. Norris is its spirit mirrored, but in the changes that have come over religion, science and philosophy.

AN ANTIQUE SONG

The Dawn in Britain. By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY. Vols. i.-ii. (Duckworth, 4s. 6d. net each).

I chant new day-spring, in the MUSES' ISLES,
Of Christ's eternal Kingdom—Men of the East,
Of hew and raiment strange, and uncouth speech,
Behold, in storm-beat ship, cast nigh our Land!

But thou, dear Foster, Britain's Muse, record,
What antique wights dwelled ere in this sweet soil;
Who kings, of sacred seed, bare o'er them rule;
What gods adored then the blue-pictured Britons.
Sith tumults, great war-deeds of Britain's sons;
And erst of glorious BRENNUS in Mainland,
Who conquered Rome, and Italy did burn; . . .

THE first lines of the poem are enough to announce to the reader that he holds in his hand the most unexpected book of the year—an Epic on old-fashioned lines, and on a subject which is antique and obscure. The eight Books which have been published tell of the early history of the Gauls both in Britain and on the mainland, and—after a gap in the narrative—of the voyage of Joseph of Arimathea and his companions from Palestine to Britain, and their reception by the people of the island. The four which, we understand, are to follow will presumably deal with the Christianising of Britain. It is to be feared that the first pages, besides giving some idea of the strangeness of the work both in scheme and matter, will do a good deal towards making most readers feel disinclined to go further and discover its poetical qualities. For it soon becomes apparent that the poet writes a language of his own. From his use of the signs of punctuation to the structure of his sentences, the author's style is one which is not only entirely different from current speech, but which has never been an accepted manner in any period of English. Archæology is of the essence of the poem. Mr. Doughty has turned to the distant past for his form and his subject: he has drawn upon it for words, expression and illustration; but this is not all: his sentences are cast in a semi-classical mould, which imparts to the verse a full and peculiar rhythm by no means unpleasing when once the ear has grown accustomed to it. Yet he is consistent in his mannerisms; and, if we except his frequent use of ancient words and atavistic orthography, his language is, after its own fashion, unambiguous and perfectly intelligible. His verse with its inversions and ellipses has, together with all the involution, all the clarity of the Latin hexameter poetry.

We have spoken first of those features of "The Dawn in Britain" which are hindrances in the way of the reader, because they are precisely the aspects which are bound to make the first impression upon one to whom the book may be recommended quite casually (as it was to the writer of this article) and who has never heard Mr. Doughty's name before. Such a reader will in all probability not only feel discouraged by the numerous difficulties, but he will begin to doubt the possibility of a work so obviously built-up being also inspired—of so much learning and artificiality co-existing with poetry. But if he will read on for a little time until he is familiar with the style, he will soon find his attention riveted to some "episode" or passage of peculiar interest, such as the incident of Queen Corwenna reconciling her sons, who had taken up arms against each other, or the chivalrous combat between the Gaulish King Brennus and the German Heremod, or the journey of Odin to inquire of Balder in Hel. Other particularly salient passages are those relating the crossing of the Alps by the Gauls and the taking of Rome, and, later in the poem, the sacrilegious spoiling of the temple of Apollo. But perhaps the passage which will best bear extracting is the account of how the image of Samoth's god journeyed in the sacred waggon drawn by two white colts from Kent to Stonehenge. We regret that it is too long to quote in full:

Cropping the tender herb, those colts draw forth,
With tardy wavering pace. Wend barefoot choirs,
Of white-stoled druids, all chanting where they trace:
With whom much people, which have crowned their heads,
With guirlands, and that carol on green grass
Descends this sacred pomp, from shire to shire:

See, how the goddess, Mother of the Year,
Her virgin youth reneweth! late, having doffed
Her russet homely weed of winter teen,
She takes new raiment, on her, of high tide,
With silver knops and buds of living gold.
The earth her garden is, wherein she goeth
As Dawn's sweet breath; and all, with green, beds, decks,
And gentle flowers, like a bride-chamber floor.

Through moor, through moss, and many an oozy ford,
And bourn, they tread; that, in his hollow brinks,
His pebble-streams, in reverence of the god,
Withholds; that might they, dry foot, overpass.
Through launds, and by sweet-smelling underwoods,
Which guirlanded with honeysuckle locks;
Where windflower blows, and dew-dropt daffodillies,
With robin, meddled in the thicket grass;
And loved maylilies, most of heavenly grace,
And pure ambrosial breath: where vermeil-white,
Are blossomed boughs, of cherry and the thorn;
And strew wood-apple blossoms, their forest path.
Be these wild garden-grounds of Britain's woods.
Bow down their sprays, the latticed boughs of oaks;
And seem to crown the Britons' antique god,
With budded bronze. Bordering these breathing pines,
Beyond the forest, lies fair champaign, wide;
Sweet with wild thyme, and gift of the sun-god;
Which flower of broom gilds widewhere, and the arms
Of thorny honeyed whin, that heathbell shrouds;
In whose frail trembling crocks, the wild bee sleeps.

But it would be a poor compliment indeed to Mr. Doughty if we were to recommend his work to our readers on account of its brilliant passages; for, ornamental as they are, they are not essentials. That which has chiefly and finally impressed us in his poetry is the vivid and convincing imagery of the whole narrative—the wonderfully living idea he has given us of a past which to most men is but dimly imaginable. His archæology is not that of Bekker's "Gallus," nor that of a certain learned but unreadable volume on the Attic Theatre. It is more akin to that of Robert Browning in "Balaustion's Adventure"; that is to say, it is vivified and illumined by poetic imagination. It seems as if the author must himself have fought and hunted with bow and spear in the primeval forest, listened to the bard singing the legends of the heathen gods, and noticed the impression made on his companions by their first sight of the Romans, a people of strange lineage and speech. Though his material be entirely derivative, the poem which he has made out of it could have been written by no one else. His writing is intensely individual; his art is the expression of his own personality. His utter disregard of accepted conventions makes it clear that he has written to please himself and not to win the applause of indiscriminate readers. To predict wide or immediate popularity for his book would be optimism run wild; we sincerely hope, however, that these two volumes may receive sufficient attention to encourage the author to publish the rest of the poem.

THE MONASTIC IDEAL

Life of St. Alphonsus de' Liguori. Edited in English from the French of AUSTIN BERTHE by HAROLD CASTLE, M.A. 2 vols. (Duffy.)

ALL great enthusiasm demands admiration, as a form of that most precious of men's endowments—vitality: this it is that makes the book before us valuable to the general reader, that vitality is its keynote. Father Berthe, a member of St. Alphonsus's Order of the Holy Redeemer, wrote in French the life of a man who was a saint because he never wavered for an instant in his enthusiasm for his cause. Father Castle, who has edited the English edition, has not let this fire of enthusiasm abate: he, too, was so impressed by the life at which he has worked, that he left a brilliant career to follow in the track of St. Alphonsus, and his devotion is seen in the elaborate care with which his work is done. And so there is an atmosphere of peace in the book which is due partly, no doubt, to its aloofness from what is known as the world, but which is due also—chiefly, perhaps—to the extreme devotion both of the saint to his work and of the writers to the memory of the saint's life. Father Castle's work is a free translation from the French, with much of his own added—and it is a translation into scholarly English: but on reading the volumes we were conscious of another hand, writing in a style quite other than that of the notes which are Father Castle's own and of large portions of the translation: a hand that writes slovenly English and favours the outpouring of unctuous religion without simplicity and often almost naively out of context. We made inquiries, and discovered our conjecture to be well founded. Father Castle's manuscript was subjected to authorities at Rome and returned in a state that was unrecognisable: and though the book may in its present state offer safer guidance to the devout, its literary worth has been deplorably impaired.

The chief facts in the life of St. Alphonsus, Msgr. de' Liguori are these: He was born on September 27, 1696, took his degree of doctor in the year 1713 at a very early age, and scored success upon success as a barrister at the Neapolitan bar. He was always of an intensely religious temperament, but it was not until 1726 that he was actually ordained priest, having become in 1723 a novice at the Congregation of Missions. His father, Don Joseph, was much opposed to the step, having filled his heart with ambitious dreams for his son's worldly future, which were on the point of being realised when they were irrevocably ended by the act of renunciation. In 1732 he founded the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, the special object of which was the instruction of the rural poor. Their first house was in Scala, eight miles from Salerno; but a little later the headquarters were transferred to Ciorani, and in 1743 to Nocera dei Pagani, which is still the chief house of the Order. All the difficulties which Alphonsus encountered in founding his Order are fully described; but special care is given in the present edition to what is known as the Regolamento. When he was a very old man—eighty-three years—the Order, his love for which, we read, was second only to his love for God, was threatened with destruction by a regal decree of illegality: his Congregation was weakened but was not destroyed. The old man's strength sustained the condemnation, and, before his death on August 1, 1787, at Nocera dei Pagani, he had the joy of knowing that it was firmly re-established.

Alfonso [we quote from Jannoia] was of middle height, but his head was somewhat large and his complexion fair. He had a broad forehead, a beautiful eye a little blue, an aquiline nose, a small mouth, pleasant and rather smiling. His hair was black and his beard which he cut short with scissors but did not shave, well grown. . . . Being shortsighted he used spectacles which he took off when preaching or speaking with women. . . . He could be great with the great and little with the little, adapting himself to all to draw all to God. . . . He was always recollected. . . . He was an enemy of a pleasant and easy life, yet the more austere he was with himself the kinder and more compassionate was he with others.

In his love for animals he resembled St. Francis, and we read that "one brother who had thrown a cat which had annoyed him out of the window was deprived of his fruit for eight days in punishment of his cruel action." Again, his students once gave him two doves, and the doves became so friendly with him that they sat upon his shoulders and fed from his hand during meals: when the saint thought that they had taken enough he said kindly, "Now away with you," and then they immediately flew away to their cage. But, unlike St. Francis, St. Alphonsus became a bishop and wrote many theological works and tried by his writing to thwart the progress of the "infidel Voltaire." It is interesting to learn that a rumour came to Naples that Voltaire had been converted and that St. Alphonsus wrote to him, by a friend in Paris, a long letter of congratulation upon the event, begging him to publish a recantation of his past infidelity. The letter was never delivered: the rumour, it is needless to say, was not founded upon any fact.

The book ends with an epilogue, which is called with considerable beauty "St. Alphonsus in his Congregation," and which gives the history of his canonisation and the history of the Order from 1787 to 1905. The whole aim of Father Castle, which is seen in his delightful notes, has been to emphasise the human side of the saint's character, that he might not seem a peerless paragon so much as a very human man whose saintliness lay in the triumph of his spiritual nature over weakness. That third hand has helped to obscure his aim: but it is none the less apparent. Few men, indeed, have not experienced a weariness or disgust at the pressure of the world. "The time is out of joint," cried Hamlet. "The world is too much with us," wrote Wordsworth in one of his most inspired moments. The instinct that drove men to renounce the world will never die; but that instinct does not now drive the men it obsesses only into a monastery. Freedom is what they crave; and they are not anxious, as a rule, to exchange one set of fetters for another. Rather, like Thoreau, they live upon themselves: little by little eliminating the necessities of life, which are the present fetters. For civilisation has done away with the boisterous, unruly element, to escape which the quiet and the peaceful were forced to become monks or be slain. The world has grown more orderly and complaisant: it exacts other tributes from its adherents. There is no need for a recluse to join an order for protection: he can do without, as much as in him lies, and no one interferes. We are not less religious: but our religions are more varied with the greater experience of mankind—though all religion is at heart the same, leading a man a little further afield than the limits of his own personality, so as to bring him into communion with the great force of life, which is the spiritual force.

From link to link it circulates
The soul of all the world, which Keats celebrated when he wrote, "Beauty is truth, truth beauty"; which Browning realised when he wrote:

Then life is—to wake not sleep
Rise and not rest, but press
From Earth's level . . .
To the heaven's height, far and steep . . .
Where Power is Love.

And Shelley's words, "To fear himself and love all human-kind," might have been spoken by St. Alphonsus and might be hung in red letters on the walls of any monastery.

Who shall limit human ways of reaching humanity's ideal? Who wishes to do so lacks reverence for the soul of man, which, in all its strange lapses and twistings, contains what is divine and what is infinite.

LETTERS FROM SAMOA

Letters from Samoa, 1891-1895. By MRS. M. I. STEVENSON.
Edited by MARIE CLOTHILDE BALFOUR. (Methuen, 6s. net.)

STEVENSON'S reputation is passing through the usual vicissitudes. Mr. Kipling excepted, no writer of our time was more widely or loudly acclaimed in life. At his death the praise of him went up in still greater volume wherever he had been read; and then, in less than a year, signs of what is called "reaction" began to appear in the customary way. More particularly his style, which had been so much admired and enjoyed, was objected to as rather painfully artificial; a fault, we venture to think, which would have remained obscure to this day if he had not described with Rabelaisian exaggeration his labours to acquire a style. Since then, some critics more critical than others have even asked whether, after all, he should not be rated as a very superior writer of books for boys; the authority for that view being also supplied by Stevenson himself, when he sent the manuscript of one of his best stories to the editor of a boy's magazine. Yet a good many of us keep in being the belief that Stevenson was a man of fine inventive and discerning imagination as well as of keen descriptive power, and therewith (especially remembering certain essays of his) a writer of admirably choice and meaning English, however come by. Through these gifts he will regain his own again after awhile—new generations of young authors, not improbably, poring upon "Virginibus Puerisque" in hope of catching from it the art of good writing. Lucky for them if they succeed. Meanwhile we of unaltered faith go on reading him from time to time, with a ready welcome for all that can be told of the writer. Not that much remains to be told, if anything. Substantially, all has been said—there can be little more to learn in any way.

We have now before us "the second and last instalment" of his mother's letters, "written during her journeys to Samoa and her life there in the household of her son, up to her return home after his death." After the first fifty pages, they are full of the small significant particulars which men too often neglect, even with the great example of Boswell before them, and which few male creatures know how to describe as multitudes of women do without taking thought. Therefore this last batch of letters is always interesting, although Vailima was but a little world and the life there much of a muchness day after day. Nor is anything described in these letters that is new to us. We have seen it all before, either in glimpses or in full displays, and yet, for the reasons suggested, the book is an interesting one for all Stevenson's friends and lovers, though all it does is to revive and sometimes to vivify impressions already recorded. The Vailima house, the Vailima household, its employments, its dissipations, the atmosphere of it and the strangeness and beauty of its surroundings, are vividly described by a pen which is not literary and yet has all the point and effect which "come naturally" to the most unambitious women whenever they sit down to write. There is no conscious attempt, for example, in the letter that fills pages 54 to 57, but it is a full and finished description all the same, with the prime merit of making itself memorable without awaking the least effort of memory. And as we go on with our reading again we see how brave a fight Stevenson made against an unconquerable weakness which yet was not that which overcame him at last. It is highly probable that, by calling up his vital forces, his work (being what it was) combated the malady which he and his friends believed would be the ending of him. And so we may still believe it would have been, if the work had not wrought good and harm together. But he could not take it easily, this work. Sometimes it excited him to absolute exhaustion, and so prepared and brought on the fatally sudden blow that ended his life and all its great capacities. So we may reasonably think at any rate.

As to his fame, that is like a great many other things in the keeping of the ages. No writer of the last fifty years has died without a wave of depreciation following his death. It was so with George Eliot, with Robert Browning, with Anthony Froude—to take only a few examples—and no doubt the whirligig of time will bring in his revenges. It takes no very exhaustive knowledge of English literature to enable one to put a finger on authors whose reputation has lain under a cloud, and then come out shining and more resplendent than ever. We do not say that Stevenson will so emerge, but he may.

IN THE FOREST

THOUGH I have borne the brunt of 'battled spears
Unflinching, 'neath these boughs that writhe and twist,
My heart is as a wren's heart when she hears
The litch-owl calling through the evening mist,
And falters frail—a thing of fluttering fears—
Before some shadow-plumed antagonist.

Quaking, I ride; yet know not what I dread.
Naught stirs the boding silence save the sound
Of beechmast crackling 'neath my horse's tread,
Or some last leaf that rustles to the ground;
And long it seemeth since the sun, blood-red,
In sea on sea of night-black boughs was drowned;

Though dark hath not yet fallen; wavering gloom
Sweeps through the brake, and brims each hollow dank;
Empty of light, the stirless pine trees loom
Against the glistering sky; and grey and lank
The shadows rise, as ghosts from out the tomb,
And, closing, follow at my horse's flank.

But them I fear not; nor the beasts that lurk
Beneath the cavernous branches, crouching low,
Whose famished eyes burn on me through the mirk;
Spellbound, they spring not; 'neath the cleaver's blow,
Their desperate fangs would snatch the blinded stirk,
Yet quail before the doom to which I go—

The unknown, death-plumed horror that, at last,
From its old ambush in the heart of night,
Leagued with long-thwarted perils of the past,
Shall swoop upon me with unswerving flight.
Drink, while ye may, the light that fades so fast,
O eyes that shall not see the morning light!

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.

YE VERDANT GROVES, YE SYLVAN SHADES

THE eighteenth-century view of Nature has been exposed by criticism, time after time; and whenever its poets discover a little true observation or pastoral sentiment, they win an excessive applause in which they are most effectually hid. Dyer, for example, has suffered by the bright light in which his verses have lived for the past century. Not content with showing that "Grongar Hill" had a charm, Wordsworth said extravagant things about the terrible "Fleece"; no critic has since added discrimination to enthusiasm; and in the end a pretty loud laugh is likely to come. Aesthetically, of course, Gray's Virgilian sentiment is more important; and, historically, so are Thomson's observation and brave efforts to digest it in an unpropitious day; but is there not also a definite and inalienable charm in the average eighteenth-century poet's view?

It has seemed to me that the critic, travelling with his wonderful "nose of a rhinoceros" through time, is apt, however many volumes he may obtrude, to win something less than the whole truth by cleaving faithfully to his historical point of view. He finds little observation and magical sentiment in the eighteenth-century masses; and that is true enough: but he never clearly acknowledges that they may yet have for us a singular delight. It is much like the delight of a pretentious old building which all the architects condemn, except Time. The thing has a way of assaulting the heart which the canons do not explain.

Take Goldsmith, for example—a writer who usually set little store by his descriptions of Nature, his "Natural History" notwithstanding. My own fancy aiding, I gain a rich and pleasing impression from a few lines of his,

with nothing apparent in them but facile observation and (I think) a genuine sentiment; for example, this, from "The Deserted Village":

No more thy glassy brook reflects the day,
But, cloak'd with sedges, works its weedy way;
Along thy glades, a solitary guest,
The hollow-sounding bittern guards its nest;
Amidst thy desert walks the lapwing flies,
And tires their echoes with unvary'd cries . . .

In its place it is more effectual than things of our own day, far more truthful and melodious.

The few readable pages of Shenstone, again, especially when they are met unexpectedly after the "Ode to a young lady somewhat too solicitous about her manner of expression," are more moving than a critic could show to be probable. Perhaps the fact that Shenstone died long ago, after a foolish pathetic life, is not without its influence upon my impression; but what I would insist on is that, though there are a hundred men living now who can stuff their verse or prose with more natural history than he, yet he has a power distinct from theirs, a power that we should do ill to explain away or ignore. I would even admit to finding a true rapture in his

O sweet disposal of the rural hour . . .

So, too, in the stanzas on herbs in "The Schoolmistress," beginning

Herbs, too, she knew, and well of each could speak.

Even Smollett—I fancy the critic's ears twitching at his very name—Smollett has, imbedded in his songs and odes and satires and history and fiction, a few lines that taste of the country purely. If they stood alone, or in the work of a professed encomiast of Nature, they would be vain; but, where they are, such lines as these in his "Ode to Leven Water" are full of enjoyment and life:

Pure stream in whose transparent wave
My youthful limbs I wont to lave;
No torrents stain thy limpid source;
No rocks impede thy dimpling course,
That sweetly warbles o'er its bed,
With white, round, polish'd pebbles spread;
While, lightly pois'd, the scaly brood
In myriads cleave thy crystal flood;
The springing trout in speckled pride;
The salmon, monarch of the tide;
The ruthless pike, intent on war;
The silver eel and mottled par. . . .

And who, in reading the lesser eighteenth-century poets, has not been delighted, as by some indiscretion in a too severe existence, by even so conventional a touch as that of Ambrose Phillips in his "To Charlotte Pulteney"?

Like the linnet in the bush
To the mother-linnet's note
Moduling her slender throat.

Such things, in their setting, remind me of the old London merchant, faithful to London for half a century, who lay on his deathbed and replied to one who asked whether there was anything he needed: "Yes, Marlborough Downs and the rain."

But what, above all, is pleasant in these bewigged poems, is the truly rural sentiment. The poets are mostly townsmen, preferring the town. Of the modern sad passion for Nature they have nothing: they simply love the fields in their season. Now and then they go out into the country, and in their fêtes champêtres there is something gay and foreign from us which calls up a vision of fields more unspoiled than they are now. There were elves in those days; country people saw them, if poets failed: if you were returning after nightfall, from a day's shooting, you might see the torches that lit the King of the Cats to his grave. The country had always been there, and was to be there for ever. It had not yet assumed the "pale cast of thought." They greeted it and smiled, as men once greeted Helen, not thinking of her immortality. And so the words which they used in praise or description of Nature were less profuse, less precise than ours. When Dr. Thomas Parnell talks of early shepherds "printing long footsteps in the glittering grass," we have to fill in, each to his taste, what that blithe lover left out. When he says "a grove" he means as much as Mr. — when he writes a score of sonnets; and he and many others give us a feeling that they have been out in the country and have liked it, but thought it an unliterary experience of what Gay calls "amusing thoughts and peaceful hours." To glance for a moment at prose—there are pieces in Fielding which, for pastoral sentiment, cannot be challenged by anything in our more elaborate style. They are of a genuine rusticity, while in the finest things of a late day, the landscape is pensive with a by no means rustic sentiment. It was a day when literature seems to have been diffident of making use of anything which was not suitable for polite discourse. There was little poetry which might not have been written, on a full stomach, in a drawing-room. The great literature of Nature represents rather the unsocial thoughts of men—thoughts sometimes ejaculated in most intimate conversation, sometimes not at all in speech. Such thoughts were not suited to the common methods of the eighteenth century, though they are not absent from the work of the greater men. But it would be rash to assume that, because men did not express many unsocial thoughts, they had them not. Men did not often write love-lyrics in Chaucer's day, yet I suppose they loved. Thus, the frugal lives of these commonplace poets imply—it is uncritical to say so—much that is common to humanity but unexpressed; and they suggest as well. They had their conventions, their personifications, their nymphs and Ohs, for which in some moods we can spare some tender mockery. At least, it should be tender, since it is hard to foretell of what conventions we ourselves are to be accused by an enlightened posterity.

E. T.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

GLAMOUR AND VISION

IN one of his excursions into the field of criticism in "Traffics and Discoveries" Mr. Rudyard Kipling sums up in a striking manner the extreme view of the romantic school to which he belongs. He cites two famous passages in modern poetry. One is the verse in which Keats conveys in a few lovely words the mood of ecstasy excited in him by the nightingale's song, that

Charm'd magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn.

The other is that description of the unearthly chasm in the garden of Kubla Khan—

A savage place! as holy and enchanted
As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
By woman wailing for her demon-lover!—

in which Coleridge embodies in a phrase the spirit of malign beauty that informs the artificial paradise of the opium-eater. These two passages, Mr. Kipling says, are pure vision; the rest of English poetry is mere literature. Mr. Kipling has a violent manner of expression, but one can perceive his point of view. It is one from which the two sorts of ecstasy in poetry are confounded. There are four ways in this world. Some people only know of one; many recognise two; Mr. Kipling, like Thomas the Rhymer, has learned to distinguish three:

O see ye not yon narrow road
So thick beset with thorn and brier?
That is the Path of Righteousness,
Though after it but few enquire.

And see ye not that broad, broad road
That lies across yon lily leaven?
That is the Path of Wickedness
Though some call it the road to Heaven.

And see ye not that bonny road
That winds about yon fernie brae?
That is the road to fair Elf-land
Where you and I this night maun gae.

He relishes so keenly the way of glamour that he mistakes it for the way of vision. Certainly for the quality of magic the two phrases of Keats and Coleridge are incomparable. Even in the ancient ballads, from which the poets derived somewhat of their inspiration, there is nothing of equal power. The cry of Douglas as he rushes into the field in the "Battle of Otterburn"—

But I hae dreamed a weary dream
Beyond the Isle o' Sky,
I saw a dead man win a fight,
And I think that man was I—which is perhaps the finest thing of the sort in our popular poetry, does not throw over one's mind so deep a spell. Neither is there so potent a glamour in the refrain of the "Lyke-Wake Dirge":

This ae night, this ae night,
Every night and all:
Fire and fleet and candlelight,
And Christ receive thy saul!

But the dirge is very impressive. In the strange rhythm and the strange words there seems still to reside that eerie feeling that overcame the mediæval mourners as they chanted the burden over the body of the dead. It has a rude incantatory power, and it was this power which the later poets of the romantic school, such as Poe and Rossetti who lacked the imaginative energy of Keats and Coleridge, tried to recover by reverting to the primitive method of the refrain. Poetry is the most ancient form of magic. An hypnotic effect is produced by a rhythmical repetition of words of mysterious sound and dim similitude that bewilder the imagination, and then subdue it. All fine verse has something of this quality of charm. It is the entrancing element in poetry which distinguishes it from the reasonable art of prose. But such refrains as those which Poe and Rossetti employ are now rather ineffectual. The mind of the child and the savage may still be susceptible to the rudest form of incantation; the mind of a cultivated man of poetical temperament is only to be won by the fine and gradual sorcery of intricate rhythms, of syllables in musical array, and of subtle overtones of sentiment arising from the magic collocation of words. Yet when a cultivated man is overpowered by the glamour of poetry, he is carried away by a mood as irrational as that which the Red Indians excite in themselves by their necromantic chants. He becomes a creature of instinct, isolated in the midst of a universe in which everything is a mystery. Superstitions which interest him in his reasonable hours merely as matter of anthropological study, regain somewhat of their authority over his mind and arouse in him dim emotions of panic and wonder. Under the spell of the poet he lives over again the life of the savages out of whose spiritual experience the sombre substrata of his own soul have been slowly built. Like them he projects his personality into the world of inanimate objects and so enlarges the means of human expression. There is no "pathetic fallacy" in this. It is a pathetic reality. We are at times moved by actual and powerful feelings which can only be represented in this way. There are some moods, as Mr. W. B. Yeats observes, which men can only express by thrusting their souls into the heart of rocks and peopling again the earth with fairies and spirits of darkness. The poetry of the school founded by Coleridge and Keats derives its inspiration from that part of the subliminal region of the mind in which primitive ways of feeling are secreted, and in which, as Keats said in a letter to Reynolds, the Imagination brought Beyond its proper bound, yet still confined,

Lost in a sort of Purgatory blind,
Cannot refer to any standard law
Of either earth or heaven.

That is one kind of ecstasy; but Keats divined that there was a higher kind. A few weeks after composing the letter in question, he said to Reynolds:

I compare human life to a large Mansion of many apartments, two of which I can only describe. . . . We no sooner get into the second Chamber . . . than we become intoxicated with the light and the atmosphere, we see nothing but pleasant wonders, and think of delaying there for ever in delight. However, among the effects this breathing is father of, is that tremendous one of sharpening one's vision into the heart and nature of Man, . . . whereby this Chamber becomes gradually darkened, and at the same time, on all sides of it, many doors are set open—but all dark—all leading to dark passages. . . . To this point was Wordsworth come, as far as I can conceive, when he wrote "Tintern Abbey," and it seems to me that his Genius is explorative of those dark Passages . . . Here I must think Wordsworth is deeper than Milton.

Keats's letter is one of the most illuminating pieces of criticism in our language. His insight into the secret of Wordsworth's greatness is derived from a sense of similar power. "Now, if we live and go on thinking," he said, "we too shall explore them [the dark Passages]. . . . We read fine things, but never feel them to the full until we have gone over the same steps as the author." When he wrote, he too was losing his delight in the glamour of

The light that never was on sea or land, and was seeking in the way of the mystics for the vision that comes when

With an eye made quiet by the power
Of harmony, and the deep power of joy
We see into the life of things.

Keats explains very clearly in one of his later letters, in which he speaks of the world as a "vale of soul-making," the essential doctrine of mysticism, but he seems never to have had the direct illumination which Wordsworth describes:

I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man;
A motion and a spirit, that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.

This is pure vision. In all the literature of mysticism one cannot find the ineffable experience of enlightenment adumbrated in terms of equal simplicity and power. Other writers use all manner of symbols in the matter, some of which are perilously ambiguous: Wordsworth conveys his feelings in plain, unfigurative language, and yet with incomparable effect. It even seems to me that the most inspired passage in Shakespeare:

We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep;

sounds a little mundane besides the "Orphic song" of Wordsworth.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

FICTION

Tracks in the Snow. By GODFREY R. BENSON. (Longmans, 6s.)

IN this history of a crime, "edited from the manuscript of the Rev. Robert Driver, B.D.," Mr. Godfrey Benson has strongly reinforced criminological fiction with a story carried out, as the stock advertisement phrase has it, upon entirely new lines. And very excellent lines they are. We do not remember reading such a clever murder story since Grant Allen's "The Curate of Churnside." Intellectually it is to the ordinary detective story as a humane judge is to policeman X, and those who have grown a trifle weary of the rivalries between professional sleuth-hounds and cadaverous amateurs in detection may embark without fear upon this voyage of psychological discovery. Just at first, perhaps, there may be a momentary impression that the rector of Long Wilton is a little over-anxious to tell his story well, but if so it is rapidly succeeded by an interest in and sympathy with him which is sustained to the end of the book and constitutes one of its chief charms. Mr. Benson has done wisely in keeping the light steadily upon the little group of four (three travelled and experienced men of varied attainments and the rector) who dined with Eustace Peters at Grenville Combe on the eve of his murder. In this way, for the usual village gossip, parish annals and police-court records, are substituted glimpses of life amid widely different environments which lend breadth to the whole. Where the more ordinary detective story stock-in-trade is drawn upon it is always with admirable point and skill. That little thumb-nail sketch by defending counsel of a "most deleterious cleric," with a prejudice against the (unorthodox) prisoner and an animus to defend a certain suspect arising from a sickly sentiment towards his (suspect's) daughter, betrayed when he fled to her from an ailing family at Florence, is a delightfully humorous misrepresentation of the real facts of the case. From the tangled skein of preliminary possibilities the wary reader will of course refuse the first thread offered him, but all the loose ends are deftly manipulated, and when he has fast hold of the right clue there is no lack of excitement. Nor does the interest abate with the collapse of the plots against the "deleterious cleric" and the hunting down of the murderer, for by means of a subtle confession Mr. Benson has us absorbed in considerations of motive and character till the close of a very able book.

Richard Baldock. By ARCHIBALD MARSHALL. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

MR. MARSHALL follows the fortunes of Richard Baldock, from birth to prospective marriage with an heiress, with great pains and without a hasty step; his style moves like the coming of old age, with slow insistence. As a mute protest against the usual indecent rush of modern novels, the book is invaluable and wins our support; but even a mute protest may be wearisome, and wearisome Mr. Marshall is apt to be. He is inclined to overweight in his sentences, to use long words for their own bad sake; in fact, in his desire (and it is a proper desire) to lend importance to his theme, he has been led to walk on stilts at times. And by this mistake he does not gain his wish and loses grace. This is most apparent in his treatment of Richard when Richard is a very little boy: his character is crushed under sheer phraseological weight, as the little ant is crushed in the great epic when he is styled "parsimonious emmet." Neither the child nor the ant can survive it. But as Richard grows in years he seems also to grow into closer sympathy with his creator; the writing becomes less stilted and there is much finer observation and wise deduction. His novel-reading phase, when he comes in contact with John Meaking (an excellent character-study) in the second-hand bookshop, shows deep and original insight. And here Mr. Marshall is too interested in what he has to say, not to say it as directly and simply as he can. We read these chapters over two or three times, and each time with renewed pleasure. They are so good that we felt, and still feel, a certain disappointment that Mr. Marshall should have thought it necessary to make what seems an unworthy concession in the matter of the ending. Richard is too well done to sink into a conventional hero.

The Light. By Mrs. HAROLD GORST. (Cassell, 6s.)

THE story of "The Light" follows closely upon the lines of "This Our Sister." It is, however, in some respects a more finished book, more even in narration, more restrained, not so horrible in its scenes and their details; moreover, in "The Light" the idiom and the slang of the slums are less startling. Yet, even with these grateful concessions to hypersensitive readers, "The Light" is a tale of almost unbroken misery and temptation. That there should be many sordid scenes in it was but natural to the theme; others there are which are none the more pleasant for being resolutely lifelike; but both author and reader go through them with courage though not, perhaps, without mutual doubt of their acceptability. Margaret Durnley, a naturally honest, decent-minded servant, leaves her first situation in disgrace, and spends two years in a workhouse with her blind baby while she is still in her teens. By that time her friends have died or have disappeared: in such ways the author is obliged to dispose of every person who is kind and helpful to Margaret, either as a means of punishment or of ultimate redemption. Constantly exposed to the dangers of simple, unprotected comeliness, as constantly buffeted and beaten in a desperate struggle to keep herself and her child "respectable," the poor girl is not always ready to echo the cry: "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world." Even the most sensation-hardened reader must be moved at last to question why everything should go so persistently, cruelly wrong with Margaret, despite her own sterling qualities. No lot in life, even in the slums, is without some compensation, some moments of ease and even of content. That there should be such alleviations may be difficult of comprehension to most of us, and yet more difficult to describe convincingly by even the most observant of outsiders; but they exist, and should not be excluded from a study of this kind. What Mrs. Gorst gives us is a composite picture of the miseries of half a dozen poor "women of the people" under one name, painted with unflinching realism, in strong colours, and almost without shading or gradation. Not many years ago such a story as "The Light" would have found but a cold welcome from the general reader: now it belongs to a class of literature sanctioned by a passing fashion. Yet, strangely enough, but distinctly, Mrs. Gorst's novel has something in common with those old-fashioned religious story-books which demanded not so much repentance and atonement for sin as some definite turn to spiritual conversion. In this tale it is Timothy, the blind child, who shows his mother "the light." A mere gleam it is, but enough to enable her to find her way, through the most painful sacrifice a mother can make, towards some measure of future peace. Mrs. Gorst is not successful in her treatment of such menfolk as appear in her pages, but her landladies, laundry-girls, and cottagers deserve praise as individual and truly excellent portraits.

George's Whims. By PHILIP WHITHARD. (Allen, 6s.)

GEORGE'S other name is Harcourt, and he is very large, even fat, and forty, and eccentric to the verge of lunacy. His sister knows his eccentricity, and, fearing it, places him under the guardianship of her nephew, who is wise and twenty; and ward and guardian journey to Charmouth and live there together for a month. Mr. Whithard writes of their adventures, which are ingeniously contrived, with neatness and a sprightly dexterity. But he is a little apt to run a joke to death, and that strikes any one who has a feeling for jokes as unkind, especially when some of the jokes thus done to death are good jokes. For example, one old lady with a stentorian voice makes our eye twinkle, but the second old lady with a voice as stentorian dims the twinkle with a tear of regret, of annoyance even, and annoyance is a mood which it takes much pleasantry to tickle away. Twice, at least, Mr. Whithard annoys noticeably in this respect; and each time he has succeeded in smoothing away the annoyance. This redounds to his credit, as far as his invention is concerned, but points to weakness of workmanship, which will doubtless strengthen with practice. These Whims of George are, we think, his first attempt; let him learn restraint, and he will be able to give scope to his wealth of fun. Even as it is, his book is most amusing: George's whim of craniology, which makes him measure the heads of the Charmouth people, and his strenuous effort to be a Viking and raid the coast of Wight, are delightfully funny.

Mr. Baxter, Sportsman. By C. F. MARSH. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

MR. BAXTER is a shooting man whose single-hearted aim in life is to keep fit in order to kill his birds clean: though he likes cheese, we are told, "he never touches it, he feels it for days and is behind his birds at once"; and when, later, it comes out that his cellar is stocked with—not vintages—but three tons of shot specially "made" to ensure uniformity of pattern, the reader will not be unduly surprised to learn that, having failed to educate his niece to the high-standard of keenness and proficiency he deems requisite in his favourite sport, he feels that the only thing left for him to do is to find her a husband who will satisfy his exacting demands. His choice falls on a friend's son with whom he has a truly wonderful day's shoot, during which a ring of dead pheasants lies around the great gun "for a distance of sixty yards" and 140 cartridges account for 125 head killed. A yet more marvellous coot drive is described in which eighty-six fall to Mr. Baxter's guns. No wonder "Barry had heard of such shooting, had read of it . . . but had never before seen it, and the sight awed him." It was enough to awe any one. The rest of the book—describing this same Barry poaching and selling his father's game for pocket-money; his entanglement with a village girl; and his subsequent escape from his troubles—is uninteresting, and fails to convince the reader that such a sequence of events as here described ever did or was likely to take place.

FINE ART

SHAM ANTIQUES

AT Messrs. Dowdeswell's Mr. Byam Shaw is showing a small group of nine works. Paintings would be an inadequate term, because so many other things beside paint have gone to their making. In two or three of the nine Mr. Shaw is content with the usual resources of the painter, and these, despite a certain crudity of colour, are the most pleasing of his exhibits. But in the remaining works he lapses into Byzantine barbarisms, freely using gesso, inlays of mother-of-pearl, coral and other inexpensive precious stones. Nor does he make even a skilful use of his foreign ingredients. For example, in the picture called Hope, a string of real coral beads appears to be trickling out of the lady's chin, seen in profile. A fifteenth-century Italian would have known better than to use beads of exactly the same size to express a row circling a woman's rounded breasts. He would also have had the advantage over Mr. Shaw in that his models would have been of his own period and not of an aggressively modern type.

Mr. Byam Shaw's intentions are usually better than his achievements in colour, and his design of Flora if executed in black and white, might have expressed beautifully a beautiful idea. But in what poses as his principal work, The Neglected Invitation, there is no special beauty or originality of conception. This picture of the Saviour sitting at a long, empty banqueting-table, seems a rather commonplace subject treated in weak imitation of Gentile di Fabriano. The reactionary mediævalism of the Pre-Raphaelite movement seems to have touched bottom in such tired works as these. However much an artist may admire the work of such men as Vincenzo Foppa and the like, he should remember that they were trying to get as near to life as they could. If they had been alive to-day they would not have been so foolish as to shut their eyes to all that has been learnt in painting since their time. And when they learnt that beads could be rendered in paint as they have been rendered by Jan Van Eyck in his splendid portrait group at the National Gallery, they would have thrown away their bits of coral and mother-of-pearl as any self-respecting painter of to-day would do. For a modern painter to have recourse to the jeweller's stock amounts to little less than a confession of impotence. Colour, liquid or solid, should be gently but firmly taken away from Mr. Byam Shaw, who has done and still could do delightful things in black and white. And if he urgently desires a change of medium, he should turn his attention to iron-work, in which his real gift for decorative design might find a more congenial outlet, and his rather forceful handling a more suitable material.

WATER-COLOURS IN PALL MALL AND ELSEWHERE

Now that Arthur Melville is no more, the Old Water-colour Society is resuming in the realm of art a position analogous to that occupied by the House of Lords in the world of politics. If the exhibitors in Pall Mall do nothing in particular, they do that nothing reasonably well compared with the exhibitions of the Institute and younger societies. It is to be regretted, however, that so many of the more capable contributors have been won over to the use of body colour, for this breaking away from the purer and more truly national style tends to make their drawings, or paintings—call them which you will—a little dull. Pigment upon pigment will enrich the quality of an oil painting. Wash upon wash inevitably deadens the glow of a water-colour. The maidenly virtue of this medium is its purity; trouble that, and whatever else be gained its loveliest charm is lost.

Inasmuch as they respect their material, not attempting to make it do the work of another medium, Mr. R. W. Allan, Mr. Robert Little, Mr. Herbert Marshall, the veteran Mr. William Callow, and even Mr. Reginald Barrett, despite the hardness of his colour, present street scenes and landscapes with a freshness lacking in the work of many artists otherwise far more distinguished. Mr. E. J. Sullivan, for example, is a much stronger draughtsman, a more original and decorative designer, but in The Victorian (74) he strives after an effect more proper to pastel, and pleasure in a charming composition is lessened by the sight of a medium whose highest virtues are ignored.

Mr. R. Anning Bell's idyllic compositions, The Garden of Sweet Sound (38) and The Finding of the Head of Orpheus (132) are rich in colour, varied in types, poetic in conception, and thorough in craftsmanship. Nevertheless the Venetian spirit in his work would breathe more easily in oil or tempera and needs greater spaces than sheets of Whatman paper if it is to expand to its fullest development. In his water-colours, as in his oils, Mr. Sargent astonishes by the dexterity of his handling, but the colour of his Bedouins (179) is a little crude; while Mr. Walter Bayes seems to have left his decorative convention in search of greater truth in lighting. When he has pushed his researches a little further his second manner may be a greater improvement on his first than at present it appears. Mr. George Clausen's work is always interesting, and his Emptying the Sack (143) is full of movement, simple and expressive in drawing, and impressive in depth and unity of tone. Miss Clara Montalba, Mr. James Paterson, Mr. Arthur Rackham, and other regular supporters of the society send exhibits which are pleasant and eminently characteristic, but too close akin to previous efforts to need further comment.

Some idea of what the Old Water-colour Society's exhibitions might be, in happier circumstances, is given by the collection of water-colours and black-and-white drawings at 5 Old Bond Street. The contributors are Messrs. D. Y. Cameron, Joseph Crawhall, Wm. Nicholson, W. Orpen, J. Paterson, J. Pryde, A. Rackham, E. J. Sullivan, and J. M. Swan, and to say that each is well represented is sufficient to prove how attractive is Mr. Paterson's new exhibition.

Mr. Crawhall, who has a wall to himself, is especially well represented, his water-colours on brown holland, such as The White Horse and The Chinese Goose, being as exquisite in colour as they are masterly in draughtsmanship. Mr. Orpen's portraits and Mr. Paterson's nude Dryad in a landscape are other notable exhibits.

Of the water-colours in the London Sketch Club's sixteenth exhibition, at the Graves Galleries, Mr. A. J. Mavrogordato's London street scenes stand out as at once the most decorative and the most distinctive. Mr. Montague Smyth's Sea on East Coast, Mr. Burnside's Low Tide, and Mr. Starr Wood's frankly conventional humorous drawings count among the most pleasing and least pretentious of the remaining exhibits. At the same galleries are water-colours of Ireland by Mr. Baragwanath King. As topographical records of very beautiful scenery they may prove satisfactory, but they are so literal, so lacking in individual vision and personal treatment, that their artistic interest is insignificant.

Miss Amelia Bauerlé, whose dainty designs will be remembered by all readers of the "Yellow Book," is showing at Messrs. Clifford's (21 Haymarket) a collection of water-colours and etchings, some realistic, practically all decorative, and many illustrative of fairy tales and poems. With her, Mrs. F. M. Unwin is showing child portraits and scenes from child-life in town and country, the title of the joint exhibition being "Dream Children and Real Children." Reality can scarcely hope to compete with such delightful dreaming as Miss Bauerlé's, but both exhibitors handle their mediums with a delicacy and affectionate discretion which the robust male might well imitate.

HISTORICAL PORTRAITS AT OXFORD

THE Committee of the Third Exhibition of Historical Portraits has succeeded in bringing together an interesting and fairly representative collection of portraits of personages who died between 1714 and 1837, the period in which English art gradually freed itself from foreign influence and culminated in the masterpieces of Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Romney. The early years of the eighteenth century were, as Mr. Lionel Cust says in the introduction to the Catalogue, "a period of gestation in England," and we need not therefore be surprised, when we look round the walls of the Exhibition, to find a certain number of miscarriages. In an exhibition of historical portraits many pictures must necessarily be admitted irrespective of artistic merit: so in the case of the daub which attempts to portray the features of John Kyrie (24), the saintly Man of Ross, the painter is forgiven for his subject's sake. Among the earlier English painters Jonathan Richardson is represented by three portraits, Joseph Highmore by an excellent portrait of Edward Young (77), and Hogarth by the curious Assembly of Artists (83) from the University Galleries. There are also examples of the works of Thomas Hudson and William Hoare. Thomas Rowney (80) by the Swiss artist Adrian Carpentier (the Catalogue prefers Adrien Carpentier) is so delightfully pompous that his portrait is worth mention if only on that account. The exhibition will probably interest most because of the fine group of paintings by Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Romney. As regards Reynolds, attention may be called to the portraits of William Markham (159), Richard Robinson (133), Thomas Warton (119), and to the portrait of Edward Gibbon (131) lent by the Earl of Rosebery. An unusually good opportunity is afforded of comparing this last painting with the Gibbon (130) by Romney, from the collection of Earl Beauchamp. Both portraits are well known, but it is a great advantage to have them hanging side by side. Hayley has said of the Romney that "the countenance is delicately exact in resemblance and truth of character, but the subordinate parts are very far from being entitled to praise." The historian is sitting at a table before three volumes of his History, to which he points with outstretched forefinger.

The effect of that forefinger is lamentable, and whatever admirable qualities Gibbon's face may express one cannot help being reminded of Boswell's epithet, "affected fellow." The portrait by Reynolds is admirable in its delineation of character, and leaves one convinced, without having recourse to books and finger, that Gibbon was a great historian and almost a philosopher. A good specimen of Romney's skill with nothing untoward uppermost is his John Oglander (118). The best portrait in the Exhibition is Gainsborough's Welbore Ellis (144), where all the finest traits of that artist's work are found—the skilful harmonising of tones (here rust-red and dark green), and the aristocratic grace and bearing with which he always invested his subjects. Three portraits by Allan Ramsay (123, 177, 184) should not be missed, and of those by Sir Thomas Lawrence special attention may be called to his William Eden (165), painted in a very free and pleasing style. There are, moreover, several portraits by Hoppner, Opie, and Owen, and a group of pastels by Lewis Vaslet, who, although uninspired, knew how to picture a face and leave some character in it.

MUSIC

CHORAL MUSIC—II

IN the fifteenth century the English school of music was justly celebrated, and indeed for a period of a hundred and sixty-one years (1400-1561) shared with the Netherlands the glory of being the foremost in the world. That English singers ran the Flemish very close is proved by the verdict of the Venetian Ambassador to the Court of Henry VIII.—a man who was doubtless familiar with the famous services at St. Mark's in Venice, conducted by the great Flemish Master, Villaert. "The Music," he reports, "was sung by His Majesty's choristers, whose voices are more heavenly than human. They did not chant like men but gave praise like angels." However, Flemish singers were in great request all over Europe, and it was the ambition of every court to have a choir-master from the Netherlands attached to its chapel. The most famous of these was Orlando di Lasso, who for thirty-seven years trained the chapel of Duke Albert of Munich in the most perfect style of polyphonic singing ever known. Such establishments were too costly to be maintained outside courts, and were therefore called Scholæ Palatinae; while their peculiar system up to the seventeenth century retained its name of mos palatinus or Imperial style. The choristers were, for the most part, boarded and lodged under the choir-master's roof, and received a good deal of severe discipline as well as instruction at his hands. Indeed, from a very early age the theories of music in most singing-schools seem to have been vigorously enforced by the rod. The whip used by Pope Gregory to impress the plainest form of plaint-chant on his pupils in the sixth century was for a long time exhibited as a relic, together with the book of modes and hymns compiled for their use. And the following complaint written by one Thomas Tusser after the Reformation shows that the protestant choristers of Wallingford fared no better than little papists:

O shameful time, for every crime
What toosed ears like baited beares
What bobbed lippes, what yerkes, what nips,
What hellish toies,
What robes, how bare—what colledge fare,
What bread low stale, what penny ale
Then Wallingford, how went thou abhorr'd
Of silly boies!

In the previous century the children attached to the Chapel Royal of Edward IV., were domiciled in his palace and seem to have fared well. The board was plentiful daily: "two loaves, one messe of greate meate, ij galones of ale." But these poor little warblers seem to have entered such institutions unwillingly enough, for we read of the existence of a sort of musical press-gang—officers who explored country districts, and were empowered by warrant to seize all children and youths "with good breasts, for service in the Royal chapel."

The first amateur choral society known was established at Prague in the twelfth century, and was doubtless formed by the scholars who had finished their course in the church choirs. A little later we hear of the Currendani—choral schools which educated poor pupils free of cost. On festival days these little Currendani went in procession through their different towns, singing in the vernacular, and in return for their sweet canticles received slender alms. These institutions were continued after the Reformation. The higher Cathedral schools trained a certain number of boys and youths called Alumni, who were also boarded and lodged; in return for this they were obliged to give their services to the church choirs and orchestras. The education thus imparted was of so excellent a nature that we are not surprised to read that Luther and Bach were among the Currendani and Alumni of their day. In large towns, after their terms in the schools had expired, these bands often united and formed Collegia Musica of their own for the better pursuit of a beloved art, and from such an institution the famous Gewandhaus orchestra of Leipzig originally sprang. In places of less importance amateur music-lovers sometimes joined with the Currendani to form choirs called Cantoreyen (from Cantor—choir-master or director), which made the performances of elaborate compositions possible.

England, above all other countries, remains the home of choral music. With her it is, indeed, a national art, a thing of natural development, whose beginnings can be traced back to the sixth century. As early as the twelfth century Giraldus wrote of the marvellous quality of our North Country voices, and noted that folk-melodies were sung in two parts by the people and even by their children—an unusual achievement in those days. Four centuries later the country was saturated with songs of all sorts. Chappell says: "Tinkers sang catches, milkmaids sang ballads, costers whistled, each trade and even the beggars had their special songs." Izaak Walton writes delectably of the gypsies' chorus, and milkmaids' ballads, heard in idyllic surroundings "under the sycamore-tree," he says, "on the primrose-bank and looking down the meadows." Milkmaids, it would appear, from all time, have had an especial gift for song. Pepys in 1662 speaks of these wenches as "coming home in pomp with their milk; sometimes they have musique go before them." Here is a pastoral indeed! Buxom Moggy and black-eyed Sukey, and Mally and Kate coming lilting through the green lanes with their foaming pails balanced on head or hip, and preceded by pipes and tabors. The waiting-maids, the barbers, the charity-school children, the guilds of tradesmen were all trained in music. In 1741 a certain madrigal-society, composed chiefly of "mechanics and weavers from Spitalfields," used to meet regularly at a tavern called "Twelve Bells" in Bride Street. A century previously, one Thomas Britton, "a small-coal man," instituted musical meetings, during which coffee was served at a penny the dish. We do not go to concerts at coal-shops now, nor do we encourage warblings from our hair-dressers and parlour-maids—not as an accompaniment to their personal services to us, that is to say. But lyrics are still fostered in the dairy, as may be seen by one of Thomas Hardy's most charming pages. Said that dairyman whom we all love: "These gam'sters," alluding to certain refractory cows, "do certainly seem to keep back their milk to-day. Folks, we must lift up a stave or two—that's the only cure for 't." Upon which, we are told, "the band of milkers burst into melody."

The plant that is destined to live must keep its roots in the soil, and though it is a long climb from a milkmaid's ballad to the Oratorio, the seed which blossoms ultimately in our concert-halls is still nursed in rural England's heart. It is pleasant to think that choral music remains, in the best sense, a popular art with a race whose countenances in the Roman slave-market drew from the founder of Gregorian chant the exclamation, "Not Angles but Angels," and whose singing ten centuries later the Venetian deemed more heavenly than human.

"They did not chant like men, but gave praise like angels."

E#.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

A COMPLETE edition of the works of Robert Louis Stevenson will be published shortly by Messrs. Cassell on behalf of the various publishers of his books. The new "Pentland edition" is to consist of twenty volumes (at ten guineas the set), the first of which will be issued in the autumn.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. announce that they have arranged for the publication of an octavo volume on "Costume: Fanciful, Historical, and Theatrical," which has been compiled by Mrs. Aria, and is illustrated by Mr. Percy Anderson with sixteen full-page plates in colour and about eighty pictures in the text.—About the middle of the month the same firm promise "The Life and Experiences of Sir Henry Enfield Roscoe," written by himself. Sections of the book deal with the chief life-work of the author, the successful building up of a school of chemistry at Manchester, and the endeavour which resulted in Owens College obtaining full University powers. The history of technical education, in which Sir Henry played a considerable part, is dealt with, and a picture of Parliamentary life from 1885 to 1895 is given.—Early in June Messrs. Macmillan will publish Sir Frederick Treves's book on "Dorset" in the Highways and Byways series.

On May 11, the anniversary of Fontenoy, Messrs. Blackwood will publish a history of "Great Britain's Share in the War of the Austrian Succession 1741-48," from the pen of Mr. Francis Henry Skrine. The book is to have an introduction by Field-Marshal Earl Roberts.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin has in the press and will publish shortly a new volume in the Library of Literary History: "A Literary History of Persia from Firdawsi until Sa'di (A.D. 1000-1290)," by E. G. Browne, sometime Lecturer in Persian at Cambridge. This is a continuation of the volume published in 1902, which treated of the literary, religious and intellectual life of Persia from the earliest times until Firdawsi. The present volume deals with Persian literary history (in the usual and more restricted sense of post-Muhammadan literary history) down to the Mongol Invasion, the sack of Baghdad, and the Fall of the 'Abbásid Caliphate. It thus includes, besides Firdawsi and Sa'di, the majority of the famous classical and many minor poets of Persia, and notable prose writers of every class. Such matters as the Sufi Mysticism, the history and tenets of the Assassins, and other religious sects of this period, and the technique of Persian poetry and rhetoric are also discussed with some detail, and due attention is paid to contemporary Arabic literature.

Messrs. Putnams will publish shortly a volume of the collected poems of Mr. Edward S. Tylee. The book, which will appear under the title of "Trumpet and Flag and other Poems of War and Peace," contains a selection from the writer's numerous contributions to the Spectator, Speaker and other periodicals, together with some additional poems.

Messrs. Harper will issue immediately a new book by "Christopher Hare," the author of "The Most Illustrious Ladies of the Italian Renaissance." It is entitled "A Queen of Queens and the Making of Spain," and is an account of Spain in its grandeur under the great Queen Isabella. The book deals also with the period of the Moorish dominion and the events which led up to the union of the Provinces and the rise of Spain as a Christian Power.

The new and fourth edition of "Lady Nairne and Her Songs," by the Rev. George Henderson, of Monzie, will contain some interesting and hitherto unpublished particulars concerning John Stewart, friend and secretary of Prince Charles Edward in 1746. Mr. Gardner, of Paisley, hopes to publish the book at an early date.

Messrs. Constable have in the press and will publish shortly Mr. Alonzo Rothschild's "Lincoln, Master of Men." The book differs from the work of Lincoln's other biographers in aiming to concentrate the reader's attention on the one element of his personality which continually grows in significance: his mastery over different types of men as well as over himself. Chapters deal with his physical, intellectual, and early political life; and his relations with Douglas, Seward, Chase, Stanton, Fremont, and McClellan. A bibliography is included.

A new work entitled "The King's English" is about to be published by the Oxford University Press. The book deals with questions of vocabulary, syntax, "airs and graces," meaning, ambiguity and style, and there is a very full index.

"A History of Architecture on the Comparative Method," by Professor Banister Fletcher and Banister F. Fletcher (Batsford), is, we understand, to be translated into Russian by M. Robert Böker, of St. Petersburg, to whom the Russian rights of translation have been sold.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie is publishing a volume on "Literary London," by Mrs. Elsie M. Lang.

CORRESPONDENCE

A QUESTION OF TEXT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your reviewer holds my edition of the Elder Brother to be "a work of caprice, not scholarship" because I have failed to record the reading of certain late editions. He is welcome to the phrase if it pleases him. I should only like to point out (1) that the term "Variorum Edition" applies, and always has applied since first used in 1803, not to an edition in which all variants are recorded (such as the Cambridge Shakespeare) but to one in which the notes are drawn from a variety of sources (as in Furness's Variorum Shakespeare); (2) that I explicitly stated in my introduction that I made no pretence of recording all variants and gave the rules which had guided my selection; (3) that I convinced myself by a careful collation of all seventeenth-century editions that the pseudo-1637 text was of no authority, being a mere trade reprint of the first quarto, and that I consequently only quoted its readings in cases where a divergence among the better texts made it desirable to record the readings of all. Whether these methods were capricious and whether the work based on them must, as a consequence, lose all claim to scholarship, I willingly leave to your readers to determine. In any case, I am not responsible for the general scheme of the edition, which, like most things, is probably not ideal. It is the editor of the Cambridge, not of the Variorum, Beaumont and Fletcher who purports to give all variants, but, as I have already shown, fails even to record those of the first edition. I in no way pin my faith on the Egerton manuscript, but merely record its reading as that of an independent authority which it undoubtedly is.

WALTER W. GREG.

Park Lodge, Wimbledon, April 28.

[Our Reviewer writes: "I was interested to read Mr. Greg's letter. In it he seems to illustrate more clearly than ever my point of variance."]

THE POETRY OF ASIA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Sturge Moore in his "Literary Causerie" in the ACADEMY (March 24) on "New ideas for old" refers to the letter I wrote on "Shelley and Eastern poets." He grants that Hafiz, Jelaludin Rumi and the other Sufi poets of Persia may also be the greatest. But as he does not know their language, he is quite satisfied with hearing what England and Europe say about poets and poetry. He seems to think that Asia (the continent par excellence of poetic and religious thought) is a "dumb world"! Now, does senility mean "dumbness" in the sense in which he uses that word? Asia spoke her earliest words definitely, clearly, with pathos and poetry and passion to the listening world a few thousand years before Plato was born. She uttered her final words of wisdom with the brilliant Arabic civilisation in Spain and with the men of letters who flourished under Soliman the Magnificent in Turkey. From that time she has practically retired from the gaze of the European audience. She has not given, since then, any new light to the world perhaps. But, be it ever remembered that her old light is unquenchably bright, expressing an infinite number of great things. She does not need anything more than modern science to rejuvenate her, as one Asiatic country has already shown.

Mr. Sturge Moore feels the need "of general ideas and agreement on them in regard to the interpretation of the use and value of poetry." Now, poetry is the dream of a paradise which an individual forms for himself. An idea of a national temperament can be formed by mixing together the fragrant essences that may be found in the paradise, conceived by each individual poet of a particular country. By this selective process, we get an idea of the poetry of different nations. In spite of some small differences, the various countries of Asia have agreed as to the principal characteristics of all great poetry. Poetry of the highest kind must be spontaneous and not elaborately wrought and polished. It must be melodious, for all true poetry should possess the power of enchanting the human mind. It must burn with various-coloured lights, sparkling with images of faint and far things seen and unseen. Our eyes and ears should be capable of carrying the images and the sounds of poetry to the seat of our soul which then soars upwards into supersensuous regions. Thus, all poetry dealing merely with humanity as it is, is on a lower plane than that which reveals and describes the heights which all cultured men aspire to reach. It is with such tests of great poetry, that Aryan and Semitic Asia considers Valmiki and Firdansi, Hafiz and Jelaludin Rumi, as the greatest poets of the world. Your Hegels, your Edwin Arnolds, and several others have acknowledged the supreme merits of these incomparable masters. How the European poets strike Oriental readers is not the question just now. What we look forward to is the further interchange of ideals between East and West. The East is learning not only physical sciences from Europe, but many other subjects also, whilst the West is studying with greater diligence now the philosophy, arts and literatures of the Oriental world. From this mutual exchange of thought, a new and more cosmopolitan method of artistic and literary criticism ought to result, which would embrace in its purview the work done not only by "England or Europe but by Asia and the whole world."

V. B. MEHTA.

Bombay April 14.

"QUOUSQUE TANDEM—"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As "Horror plumed" has brought me to death's door, may I breathe my last breath in a feeble protest? No one can deny the literary distinction with which the best of our evening journals is edited. Imagine, then, my emotions when, on taking it up to-day, my eyes fell on the words, "The illogic will be, etc." "Illogic!" May I, on the same principle, charge that paper with "illiberalism," or acquit it of "illunacy"? Before I had recovered from this shock, I read in another column, "I for one reluctant at this apocalypse." Because the folly of some critics is "blatant," may I be allowed to "blate"? Talk of "dying of a rose in aromatic pain," as Pope does! Such a death is merciful compared with mine.

Alas! would that this were all! A friend urges me to "keep in touch with modern thought": may I urge him to "keep in step with modern music"? A bookseller presses on me "an up-to-date pamphlet": may I ask him for "a down-to-level speech"? We are told that the great curse of the country is "unemployment": may I congratulate Mr. Chamberlain on his "unambition," and bewail the "unfeeling" of children in our nation schools? Even the ACADEMY, if I mistake not, has talked of an "outstanding event": * may I claim for myself that I am a "back-sitting man"? After this, it is a trifle to be told that "we are completely disillusioned": we shall soon be "cheerfully disenennued." A few days ago I read in a leading newspaper some such sentence as this: "One looks carefully at the picture, and then one sees (what one failed to notice at first) that one is mistaken in supposing it to be melancholy." "Le moi est haïssable," said an eminent Frenchman: what would Swift and Addison, "one" asks, have said of "one"? It is bad enough that Shakespeare should have been guilty of the attempt to neutralise "sans," and Milton "debel": but at least their sins are lost sight of in a blaze of glory.

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

P.S. Pray forgive me for being "obsessed" (!!) with this subject.

[* We think not.—Ed.]

"ONE": THE LADIES' PRONOUN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—One took up one's ACADEMY this week and turned with interest to the article on "Sick-Room Fiction," by M. E. Francis. One had not read far before one was attacked in force by "the ladies' pronoun"; with increasing testiness one began underlining the thronging "ones" until the fair page of one's ACADEMY was quite spoilt for one. I counted eight sentences commencing with "One." A single sentence contained four: "How could one shut one's eyes when one was so anxious to calculate the extent of one's misery"; and there were forty-six in the whole article! This astonishing discovery caused me to investigate further, but in all the other twenty-two pages of the ACADEMY (advertisements included) I could not find more than thirty-eight "ones," and most of these were poor inoffensive numerals.

Can any one explain why it is that this little word has become monopolised by ladies as their own personal pronoun? I feel fairly confident that "M. E. Francis" is a lady: masculine writers seem instinctively to get along without using this pronoun, whilst lady writers simply cannot avoid it. I remember coming across, in Margaret Black's short life of R. L. Stevenson, a single sentence containing eight "ones"! The author of "Sick-Room Fiction" spoke of "certain minor facts which claim the attention of the patient with irritating persistence"; this ladies' pronoun has always seemed to me one of those minor facts.

Wallasey, Cheshire.

T. HERBERT KENDRICK.

[That our correspondent does not know so eminent a woman of letters as M. E. Francis (Mrs. Bluntell) excites some surprise. The use of "one" is the monopoly of neither sex.—Ed.]

PREPOSITIONS AT THE END OF SENTENCES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In elementary books on English Style a rule is often given that prepositions should not be left over to the end of sentences but should precede their object. The argument from Comparative Philology, which shows that prepositions are in origin adverbs, is no doubt too remote for militating against this rule. But the other day I had the curiosity to dip into Swift's "Tale of a Tub" for the special purpose of testing whether he observed such a rule. I had no difficulty in discovering "it reaches up to the very garret I am now writing in" (p. 98 in edition of 1766)—where modern purists (who also object generally to the omission of the relative) would have the unmusical "in which I am, etc." So again we have (p. 108) "a certain paltry scribbler, very voluminous, whose character the reader cannot wholly be a stranger to," and (p. 125) "whatever pains or improprieties I may be at to introduce them." Since the inferior class of modern grammarians are very positive on the point, I may quote a now forgotten authority. Campbell in his "Philosophy of Rhetoric," Bk. III., ch. iv. § 2, p. 342 (2nd ed. 1801), says of "the frequent suppression of the relatives who, whom, and which," "this, I imagine, is an ellipsis peculiar to the English, though it may be exemplified from authors of the first note" and of three cases in which he declares the construction to be used the third is "when it is governed by a preposition." He gives as an example, "To contain the spirit of anger is the worthiest discipline we can put ourselves to" from the Spectator, No. 438. Further on (p. 346) he deals with the very point at issue. "In every other language," he says, "the preposition is almost constantly prefixed to the noun which it governs";—here, of course, he is in error—"in English it is sometimes placed not only after the noun, but at a considerable distance from it, as in the following example, 'The infirmity was indeed never so full as on this day, which I was at some loss to account for'" (Spectator, No. 440). He adds: "the singularity of the idiom hath made some critics condemn it absolutely. That there is nothing analogous in any known tongue ancient or modern, hath appeared to them a sufficient reason. I own it never appeared so to me."

I suspect ignorance is in part the parent of this rule. To end a sentence with half of an infinitive, "the rudimentary to" is, naturally, horrible to a cultivated taste. The caveat entered against this construction has, perhaps, been misunderstood. Ignorance too of the true nature and origin of prepositions has, as Campbell shows, had much to do with the rule. What might have been a good reason for it, viz., that the construction created obscurity, in point of fact does not exist: " (obscurity) is seldom or never the consequence."

T. NICKLIN.

Rossall School, Lancs.

THE WOLF OF BADENOCH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Were there two such characters?

The late Sir T. D. Lauder issued a novel under the above title, founding it largely on the career of Prince Alexander Stewart, Earl of Buchan, a younger son of King Robert II., who reigned from 1371 to 1390. He was Lord of Badenoch, a wild forest district of Inverness, then infested by wolves; he died in 1394, s.p.l., and his Earldom of Buchan passed to a nephew; but he left five natural sons, the eldest of whom, another Alexander, was afterwards Earl of Marr.

This last Earldom has its own history, for Thomas, the thirteenth Earl having died, s.p., his sister Margaret, having married William, first Earl of Douglas, 1377-1384, their daughter Isabel Douglas became Countess of Marr. She married twice, her second husband being Alexander Stewart, the "Wolf of Badenoch"; this second marriage, however, was by a forcible abduction, yet she made a free grant of all her honours and possessions to her said husband who, at her decease in 1419, resigned all to the Crown, obtaining a fresh grant in 1426, with remainder to his own natural son Sir Thomas, who, however, predeceased him, without issue; having married a cousin named Elizabeth Douglas, Countess of Buchan, then a widow, who married again; he being styled Earl of Garioch.

This Alexander Earl of Marr was Ambassador to England in 1406, 1407, and 1416; he died in 1435, when his titles reverted to the Crown and were claimed by the Erskine family. Was the "Wolf," who married the elderly and widowed Countess of Marr, father or son, or Alexander Stewart? Our author, named above, says it was the Earl of Buchan; Burke's "Extinct Peerage" calls the "Wolf" son of this Earl of Buchan, and Earl of Marr.

A. HALL.

April 21.

AUTHORS' MISTAKES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As H. D. B. has raised the point may I again refer to Sir Walter's "mistake"; H. D. B. says he does not know the locality. I do,—otherwise I had not written. The position of Cromer relatively to the Wash does admit of the sun setting in the sea. Fairport is Arbwath, the good people of which to this day point out Monkbarrow, Knockmarnock, Glenallan, and other places referred to in the novel, and a glance at the map will show that the nearest points at which it might be possible for the sun to set in the sea are Fraserburgh on the north and Fife Ness on the south.

With regard to the "mistake" itself a learned and observant friend with whom I once discussed the passage suggested that Sir Walter described a storm he had seen on the West Coast. The sudden change from dead calm to storm, "the mass of waters," the size of the waves, and the whole atmosphere of the description are Atlantic rather than North Sea. Storms on the latter are not to be despised but their characteristics are different.

W. P.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Even Homer nods sometimes, so presumably neither the publishers nor his niece Miss Koscoe should be blamed, but the late Mr. Richard Holt Hutton himself, for the reproduced error in his Dickens critique. It was not Martin (as he has it) but Jonas Chuzzlewit to whom Mr. Pecksniff proposed the surprising of his daughters. Before this slip caught the eye of the present writer in "Brief Literary Criticisms," he was always impressed with the idea that the accuracy of the late editor of the Spectator was surpassed only by his brilliancy, and he still inclines to that view. Is he in error?

A. W.

West Hampstead.

THE PORTICO LIBRARY, MANCHESTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall be obliged if you will kindly correct the statement in last week's ACADEMY which says "the Portico Library is now to be rebuilt." This is not so. Various structural alterations have been made recently with a view to increased comfort and accommodation, but these improvements were made in keeping with the character of the Institution.

ERNEST MARRIOTT,
Librarian.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Wedmore, Frederick. Whistler and Others. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 222. Pitman, 6s. net.

[Deals with: The Place of Whistler; Venetian Painting; Fantin and Boudin; Richard Wilson; Goya; The Rise of English Water-Colour; Romney and Lawrence; Raeburn and Zoffany; Ruskin; Constable's "English Landscape"; Etty; Large Water-Colours; Hine; The Field of the Print Collector; The Norwich Masters; Thomas Collier; Pictures by Orchardson; Charles Keene; Paris and Fulleylove; D. V. Cameron; Still Life; The Art of Brabazon; and the Personality of Watts.]

The National Gallery: The Dutch School. By Gustave Geffroy. Art Galleries of Europe series. 9½ x 7. Pp. xxxiii. Plates lxiv. Newnes, 3s. 6d. net.

Prideaux, S. T. Modern Bookbindings: their design and decoration. 9 x 5½. Pp. 131. Constable, 10s. 6d.

[Deals almost exclusively with modern book-binding in England and France. Illustrations of binding by Zaehnsdorf, Rivière, Morrell, etc.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Clayton, Joseph. Bishop Westcott. Leaders of the Church 1800-1900 Series. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xii, 192. Mowbray, 3s. 6d. net.

[The author gives an account of the life and teaching of Bishop Westcott, and—in accordance with the aim of the series—dwells more on the social and religious teaching than on the details of episcopal biography.]

Morris, J. Makers of Japan. With Illustrations. 9 x 5½. Pp. 330. Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.

[Sketches of twenty-two makers of modern Japan, with portraits. The author's aim has been to convey a general impression of Japan and her people, and of the working of reform, as exemplified in the lives of some of her patriots.]

EDUCATION.

Madame de Staël's "L'Allemagne." Edited by H. W. Eve. Pp. xxi, 229, 2s. 6d. net; Victor Hugo's "Notre-Dame." Edited by L. Delbos. Pp. xxvii, 434, 3s. 6d. net; Gautier's "Trois Grotesques" (Villon, Cyrano de Bergerac, Scarron). Edited by H. J. Chaytor. Pp. xxii, 125, 2s. net; Flaubert's "Salammbô." Edited by E. Lauvrière. Pp. xlvii,

- 272, 3s. 6d. net; Lamartine's "Jocelyn." Edited by E. Legouis. Pp. xxxv, 245, 3s. net; "Madame Campan's Mémoires," 1785-1792. Edited by H. C. Bradby. Pp. vii, 170, 2s. 6d. net. Higher French Series. Each 7 x 4½. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- [“Intended for upper forms of Public Schools, for University and private students, and for all those who are interested in modern French literature and want guidance to choose therefrom the best and most characteristic works.” The general editing of the series has been undertaken by Mr. Leon Delbos.]
- Richmond, Ennis. In Youth. 7½ x 5. Pp. 147. Alston Rivers, 2s. 6d. net.
- [A series of addresses to parents on the up-bringing of children—the majority read before the Parents' National Education Union.]
- Egerton, Hakluyt. A Plea for Church Schools. 7½ x 5. Pp. 46. Allen, 6d. net.
- [“This pamphlet is intended to explain why Churchmen value Church teaching, why they claim for it State recognition, and why they claim that recognition as a civic right.”]
- The Story of Joan of Arc*, by Andrew Lang; The Story of Captain Cook, by John Lang. The Children's Heroes Series. 6 x 4½. Jack, 1s. net each.
- [Volumes similar in character to those in Messrs. Jack's "Told to the Children" Series.]

FICTION.

- Cornford, L. Cope. Parson Brand. 8 x 5½. Pp. 352. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- [Short stories.]
- Green, Anna Katharine. The Woman in the Alcove. 7½ x 5. Pp. 327. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
- Ward, Mrs. Humphry. Fenwick's Career. Illustrated from drawings by Albert Sterner. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 468. Smith, Elder, 6s. (See p. 422.)
- Hutton, Baroness von. What Became of Pam. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 340. Heinemann, 6s.
- Crespigny, Mrs. Philip Champion de. The Grey Domino. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 341. Nash, 6s.
- Sons of the Milesians*. By the Countess of Cromartie. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 306. Nash, 6s.
- Syrett, Netta. Women and Circumstance. 7½ x 5. Pp. 349. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
- [Short stories.]
- White, Stewart Edward. Blazed Trail Stories. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 277. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- [Short stories.]
- Le Queux, William. The Mystery of a Motor-Car. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 336. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- Drury, Major W. P. Men-at-Arms. Stories and Sketches. 7½ x 5. Pp. 236. Chapman & Hall, 3s. 6d.
- Prideaux, Mrs. H. Maxwell. "Returned With Thanks," and other stories. 8 x 5½. Pp. 119. Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Benson, Arthur Christopher. From a College Window. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 326. Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.
- [Twelve of the eighteen essays which comprise the volume have appeared in the Cornhill. Papers on The Point of View; Growing Older; Books; Sociabilities; Conversation; Beauty; Art; Egoism; Education; Authorship; Criticism of Others; Priests; Ambition; The Simple Life; Games; Spiritualism; Habits; Religion.]
- Bax, Ernest Belfort. Essays in Socialism New and Old. 7½ x 5. Pp. 336. E. Grant Richards, 5s. net.
- [Rather more than a third of the contents of the volume has been published before in a little book entitled "Outspoken Essays." Some of the rest of the essays have appeared in Socialist and other periodicals; the remainder are new.]
- Annual Report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution*, showing the operations, expenditures, and condition of the Institution for the year ending June 30, 1904. 9½ x 6. Pp. 780. Washington: Government Printing Office.
- Whisperings from the Great*. An autograph album and guest-book compiled by Constance A. Meredyth. 10½ x 7½. Frowde, 21s. net.
- [For each day are given at least five excerpts from poems by great writers, one quotation or more being from the works of a French author.]
- Jaures, Jean. Studies in Socialism. Translated, with an introduction, by Mildred Minturn. 7½ x 5. Pp. 174. Independent Labour Party, 1s. 6d. net.
- [The third volume of The Socialist Library, under the general editorship of Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald.]
- Nicholson, William T. Man, or Problems Ancient and Modern relating to Man, with Guesses at Solutions. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 238. Swan Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d.
- Hyslop, James H. Enigmas of Psychical Research. 7½ x 5½. Putnam's, 6s.
- [Supplementary to the same author's "Science and a Future Life." "While I have discussed Telepathy and Apparitions more exhaustively than before," says Dr. Hyslop, "I have added much material on Crystal Gazing, Coincidental Dreams, Clairvoyance, and Premonitions, with some illustrations of Mediumistic Phenomena"!] ]
- "The Queen" Newspaper Book of Travel. A Guide to Home and Foreign Resorts. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 504. Cox, 2s. 6d.
- [A resumé of the practical travel information which has appeared in the "Queen" from 1894 to 1906. Sixteen maps and forty-six illustrations.]
- Lord, Walter Frewen. The Mirror of the Century. 7½ x 4. Pp. 268. Lane, 5s. net. (See p. 424.)

NATURAL HISTORY.

- Halsham, John. Every Man's Book of Garden Flowers, with short directions for their culture. 128 Illustrations from photographs, by Henry Irving. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 375. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.
- [A sound and useful little book dealing with varieties of border and bedding flowers usually grown in British gardens. From considerations of space, roses, climbers, shrubs and rock plants have been omitted.]

POETRY.

- The Poetry of Badenoch*. Collected and edited with translations, and notes, by the Rev. Thomas Sinton. 10½ x 6½. Pp. xxxvii, 576. Inverness: Northern Counties Publishing Company, 21s.
- [Translations of the Gaelic poetry are placed in a separate section of the book.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Le Sage's The Devil on Two Sticks. (Introduction by Malcolm Hine); Anthony Hamilton's Memoirs of Count Grammont (Introduction); Byron's Don Juan (Introduction by Frank Banfield). The Panel Books. 6½ x 4. Sisley's: silk cloth, 2s. net; lambskin, 2s. 6d.; and rough Persian, 3s. 6d.
- Twelfth Night; or What You Will*. Edited by Morton Luce. The Arden Shakespeare. 9 x 6. Pp. 195. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.
- The Sacred Poets of the Nineteenth Century: James Montgomery to Anna Letitia Waring. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. 6½ x 4. Pp. 396. Routledge, 1s. 6d.
- The Works of Thomas Love Peacock*. Vol. ii. ("Crotchet Castle"; "The Misfortunes of Elphin"; "Gryll Grange"); Borrow's Bible in Spain and Romany Rye; Spectator Essays (in 6 vols.) vol. iii.; and Aristotle's Ethics, translated by D. P. Chase. New Universal Library. 6½ x 4. Routledge, 1s. net each.
- Smith, Alexander. Dreamthorp. A book of essays written in the country. With a biographical and critical introduction by John Hogben. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 281. Melrose, 2s. net.
- Lytton's Last Days of Pompeii. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 535. Sixpenny Classics. Nelson.
- Tales of the Spanish Main*. By Mowbray Morris. Illustrated. Pp. 357. God Save King Alfred. By the Rev. E. Gilliat. Illustrated. Pp. 422. Three Rascals. By Raymond Jackberrns. Pp. 208. Each 7½ x 5. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. each.
- [New editions of children's books.]
- Fabre, J. H. Insect Life: Souvenirs of a Naturalist. Translated from the French by the author of "Mademoiselle Mori." Preface by David Sharp; edited by F. Merrifield. Illustrations by M. Prendergast Parker. 7½ x 5. Pp. 320. Macmillan, 2s. 6d.
- Trollope's The Kellys and the O'Kellys. 6 x 3½. Pp. 680. New Pocket Library. Lane, 1s. 6d. net.
- Twelve Sermons Preached at Trinity Chapel Brighton*. By the late Rev. F. W. Robertson, M.A. 8½ x 6. Pp. 96. Sixpenny Series. Allenson.

SCIENCE.

- Parr, G. D. Aspinall. Electrical Engineering in Theory and Practice. With 282 Illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. 447. Macmillan, 12s. net.

THEOLOGY.

- A Day-Book of Short Readings for Use by Busy People*. Advent to Trinity. By the author of "Præparatio." Preface by the Rev. Geo. Congreve. 8 x 5½. Pp. 509. Masters, 6s. net.
- Benn, Alfred William. The History of English Rationalism in the Nineteenth Century. 2 vols. 9 x 6. Pp. 983. Longmans, 21s. net.
- The Communion of the Christian with God, Described on the Basis of Luther's Statements*. By Wilhelm Hermann. Being the translation of J. Sandys Stanyon, revised throughout, and enlarged and altered in accordance with the fourth German edition of 1903 by K. W. Stewart. 7½ x 5. Pp. 356. Crown Theological Library. Williams & Norgate, 5s.
- [Mr. Stewart has incorporated the numerous additions of the later German editions; and the arrangement in chapters and paragraphs has been discarded. Dr. Hermann's own new summary and division in the fourth German edition has been followed exactly.]
- Henslow, Rev. Prof. G. The Spiritual Teaching of Christ's Life. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 253. Williams & Norgate, 5s. net.
- [In a former volume—"Christian Beliefs reconsidered in the Light of Modern Thought"—Professor Henslow sketched the present conception of "the Church's doctrines"; in the book before us he "emphasises the teachings rather than the dogmatic beliefs which have arisen out of the Gospel Memories of Jesus Christ."]

THE BOOKSHELF

The Golden Book. Legends of Saints and Martyrs of the Church. Translated from mediæval sources by Mrs. Francis Alexander. (David Nutt, 6s. net). Legends, like fairy tales, must be written by those who believe in them, not by a laborious effort but naturally and as a matter of course. It is for that reason that the old legends and fairy tales are convincing, whereas modern ones are merely conventional. Many of the stories in the Golden Book are not less impossible than, say, the stories of St. Joseph of Cupertino told by Ernest Hello in his Physionomies des Saints; yet the latter impress one as merely ridiculous, whereas these are charming. There is all the difference between real childishness and sophisticated puerility. Moreover, although these old legends were recounted ostensibly for edification, the motive is not too obvious and there is no trace of polemic. No man of science had then arisen to throw doubt on the most extravagant wonders. The healthy child, no less than its elders, will find as much delight in the Golden Book as in the immortal collection of the Brothers Grimm. Very like a secular fairy tale is the delicious story, for instance, of St. Vereburga (daughter of a king and queen of Wales hitherto unknown to us) and the marauding but afterwards penitent geese. The saintly abbess was at no loss when she discovered the painful fact that one of her penitents had been cooked and eaten by the convent steward and his family. It was the work of a moment to send for the bones of the victim, and, the Saint having made the sign of the cross over them, they at once became the original bird. We leave it to the curious to deal with the peculiar difficulties of the miracle; it presented none to the excellent Padre Giovanni Bollandus, who preserved its history for our pleasure. That saintliness is not incompatible with shrewd worldly wisdom many of the stories attest.

There, is, for instance, the pious wife who recommends her husband to lend his last fifty pieces to God rather than put them out to usury, on the practical ground that Heaven gives the highest interest. (A popular modern hymn written by an eminent bishop now deceased preserves the same idea.) The good man takes his wife's advice and bestows his fifty pieces on the beggars in the church porch. The need for repayment becoming pressing, he returns on his wife's advice to the same porch, where he picks up a small piece of money. With this he buys wine, bread and fish, and, when the fish is cut open, it is found to contain a precious stone which fetches three hundred pieces from the first jeweller. Heaven, it will be seen, pays 500 per cent., a rate of interest for a short loan certainly not obtainable in any other quarter. Not all the legends are of this naive description. Some are dignified and beautiful and express a real, if undeveloped, spirituality; others are rigorously orthodox, such as that which tells of the Blessed Virgin's strong disapproval of the works of Nestorius. All are the natural and spontaneous outcome of childlike imaginations, to which the supernatural was more natural than the natural; of simple souls who felt themselves to be literally and almost tangibly compassed about by a great crowd of witnesses. Mrs. Alexander has done her work admirably. Her translation is in excellent English, and reads like an original; she has given us an altogether delightful book.

A descriptive catalogue of the manuscripts in the library of Pembroke (Clare—Queens') College, Cambridge. By Montague Rhodes James (Cambridge University Press).—Dr. James's work of cataloguing the manuscripts of the College Libraries at Cambridge goes on apace, the latest catalogues to appear being those of Clare, Pembroke, and Queens'. All scholars who have had occasion to work on Cambridge manuscripts know the excellence of the series, but it seems to us a pity that in catalogues which can hardly ever be superseded Dr. James does not pay rather more attention to his merely descriptive work. Ambiguous sentences like, "Skin over boards (once red)" are not infrequent, and inversions such as, "Binding dark green morocco of cent. xviii early, with gilt tooling" are somewhat aggravating. To the Pembroke catalogue is appended a list of fifteenth-century printed books by Mr. Ellis H. Minns. It was a piece of work worth doing, and Mr. Minns has done it well.

The Deeper Sources of the Beauty and Expression of Music. By Joseph Goddard (William Reeves).—This little work is an extended essay on musical æsthetics. It is evidently the outcome of much careful thought on a subject which has proved peculiarly baffling to a number of profound thinkers. Darwin and Herbert Spencer attempted to solve this problem, the cause of the expressive power of music, and failed from their initial inability to grasp what that expressive power really is. Darwin says: "Music arouses in us various emotions, but not the more terrible ones of horror, fear, rage, etc. It awakens the gentler feelings of tenderness and love which readily pass into devotion. . . . It likewise stirs up in us the sense of triumph and the glorious ardours of war. . . . The sensations and ideas thus excited in us by music . . . appear from their vagueness yet depth, like mental reversions to the emotions and thoughts of a long past age." This idea of "arousing emotions" is of course the vain imagining of an unmusical mind and has only to do with the grosser forms of music allied with other arts, the third-rate ballad and the opera. Although Mr. Goddard succeeds in analysing the expressive power of single phrases to some extent he is not ultimately more successful in grasping the root of his problem. His frequent appreciative allusions to the sentimental works of Gounod betray his attitude towards musical expression and prevent his really perceiving its larger issues. The expressive power of "form," the development and combination of musical ideas are left out of count and appear unappreciated by him. His conclusion appears to be akin to if not identical with that of Herbert Spencer since he explains the expressive power of music by the influence of speech. Unfortunately Mr. Goddard's arguments are obscured by an awkward and opaque style of writing which often makes it difficult to understand him when he is treating of a very simple matter. His book is worthy of notice as a personal contribution to a much debated question.

A HOME FOR BOOKS.
Treat your books as your best friends. They will be true to you when all others fail. In other words treat yourself to a

"GUNN"
Sectional Bookcase

Your books will look well in it; they will always be handy, and its specially made doors will keep them free from damage. Built up in sections of any required size, the whole looking like a solid, handsome piece of furniture. Always complete, yet always growing. Full particulars, prices, and name of nearest Agent, post free. Write for "Booklet No. 23" to WM. ANGUS & CO., Ltd., 44 Paul Street, London, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO'S LIST

MRS. WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

Published on May 3, the first large Impression is nearly sold out, and a Second Impression is in the press.

FENWICK'S CAREER

By

6s. Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. 6s.

With Illustrations by ALBERT STERNER.

FIRST PRESS OPINIONS.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Once again has Mrs. Ward proved her fitness to be numbered among the leaders of living novelists. The new book is a piece of notable work—a triumph of constructive skill, of subtle and consistent characterisation, of definite and happy expression, of vital force. Like its predecessors from her pen, IT STANDS OUT FROM THE MASS OF FICTION OF THE DAY—A WORK DISTINCTIVE, APART."

TRIBUNE.—"A story rich in detail and incident. Putting down the book one feels a great admiration of the art, the imagination, the warm sympathy, the beautiful tenderness of Mrs. Humphry Ward's style, and a great gratitude to a novelist who has such a high and admirable ideal of her calling. IT IS DIFFICULT TO PRAISE THE BOOK ENOUGH."

First Impression nearly exhausted.
Second Impression in the Press.

JUST PUBLISHED. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FROM A COLLEGE WINDOW

By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON.

Fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge.

MORNING POST.—"Hardly since 'In Memoriam' was published has any Englishman, in a book not avowedly religious, written so intimately of his own soul face to face with the mysteries which surround us all."

A NEW LIFE OF JOHN WESLEY.

READY ON MAY 8. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and Four Facsimiles of Letters. Small demy 8vo, 6s. net.

WESLEY AND HIS CENTURY:

A STUDY IN SPIRITUAL FORCES.

By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D.

President of the Methodist Church of Australasia, Author of "How England Saved Europe," etc.

A SUMMER RIDE THROUGH

By JANE E. DUNCAN. WESTERN TIBET.

With 93 Illustrations and a Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

DAILY NEWS.—"A pleasant picture of a pleasant people. . . . Miss Duncan has performed a feat of which she may well be proud."

IF YOUTH BUT KNEW 6s.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

Second

With 20 Illustrations by LANCELOT SPEED.

Impression.

ATHENÆUM.—"The atmosphere clothes this story as a garment from the very outset. It begins to be romantic, it continues in the true vein of romance, and ends sweetly on a proper romantic note to the accompaniment of Geiger Hans's fiddle."

SALTED ALMONDS. 6s.

By F. ANSTEY, Author of "Vice Versa."

TRUTH.—"Anybody with a taste for witty, ingenious, whimsical, and diverting stories will devour this dish of 'salted almonds' at a sitting without experiencing any other feeling than one of perfect enjoyment."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER

MAY 1906

For and against the Education Bill:

- (1) By Dr. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P.
- (2) By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.
- (3) By the Most Rev. the ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER.
- (4) By the Right Hon. VISCOUNT HALIFAX.
- (5) By the Rev. Dr. J. GUINNESS ROGERS.
- (6) By D. C. LATHBURY.

The Future of Shakespearean Research. By SIDNEY LEE.

Eugenics and St. Valentine. By HAVELOCK ELLIS.

The Vocation of the Journalist. By D. C. BANKS.

The Liberal Government and the Colonial Conference. By RUSSELL REA, M.P.

The Teaching of Cookery. By Colonel KENNEY HERBERT.

The Physique of Girls. By Miss K. BATHURST (late Inspector under the Board of Education).

The Cantines Scolaires of Paris. By Sir CHARLES A. ELLIOTT, K.C.S.I., LL.D. (Chairman of the Joint Committee for Underfed Children in London).

The Lighter Side of Hannah More. By NORMAN PEARSON.

The Individual versus The Crowd. By Sir MARTIN CONWAY.

Parliament and the Army. By Colonel the Earl of ERROLL.

Why Lift Trades Unions above the Law? By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD. 5 NEW STREET SQUARE.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD. SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRURY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge

THE OFFICIAL YEAR BOOK OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND
FOR 1906. Twenty-Fourth Issue. Furnishing a Trustworthy Account of the Condition of the Church of England, and of all bodies in Communion with her throughout the World. Demy 8vo, paper boards, 3s.; cloth boards, red edges, 4s.

REX REGUM. A Painter's Study of the Likeness of Christ from the Time of the Apostles to the Present Day. By the late Sir WYKE BAYLISS, K.B., F.S.A., President of the Royal Society of British Artists. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 7s. 6d.

NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS SYSTEMS: the Religion of the Crescent; or, Islam—its Strength, its Weakness, its Origin, its Influence. By the Rev. W. ST. CLAIR TISDALL, D.D. New Edition, Revised. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

EARLY CHURCH CLASSICS. The Apostolical Constitutions and Cognate Documents with Special Reference to their Liturgical Elements. By the Rev. DE LACY O'LEARY, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

THE GREAT COMMANDMENT, and the Second like unto it. Six Sermons preached before the University of Oxford as Select Preacher by the Right Rev. JOHN MITCHINSON, D.C.L., Master of Pembroke College, Oxford, and Canon of Gloucester. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN MODERN LIGHT. By the late WALTER ALLAN MOBERLY, Canon of Southwark. With a Preface by the LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

THE STORY OF THE APOCRYPHA: a Series of Lectures on the Books and Times of the Apocrypha. By the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

NOTES ON THE HIGHER CRITICISM. By the Most Rev. R. S. COPESTON, Bishop of Calcutta. Fcap. 8vo, 3d.

HOW WE GOT OUR BIBLE. By J. PATERSON SMYTH, B.D., LL.D. Crown 8vo, paper cover, 6d. net.

TIBET AND THE TIBETANS. By the Rev. GRAHAM SANDBERG. Royal 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

THE SACRED TENTH; or, Studies in Tithe-Giving, Ancient and Modern. By Dr. H. LANDELL. 2 vols. 800 pp. demy 8vo, with Portraits, Illustrations, and Maps, cloth boards, 16s.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE LIGHT OF THE HISTORICAL RECORDS AND LEGENDS OF ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA. By T. G. PINCHES, LL.D., M.R.A.S. Second Edition, Revised, with Appendices and Notes. With several Illustrations. Large post 8vo, cloth boards, 7s. 6d.

Applies to the criticisms of the Old Testament the most recent discoveries in the field of Archaeology. This New Edition contains the Laws of Hammurabi and other new matter, amounting in all to nearly one hundred pages.

CHRISTIAN WORSHIP: its Origin and Evolution. A Study of the Latin Liturgy up to the Time of Charlemagne. By Monsignore DUCHESNE. Translated by M. L. MCCLURE from the Third Edition of "Les Origines du Culte Chrétien." Second English Edition, Revised with considerable Additions by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 10s.

It is not too much to say that this is the most important work which has appeared on this subject.

WORKS BY THE LATE CANON TRISTRAM.

THE LAND OF ISRAEL; a Journal of Travels in Palestine, undertaken with special reference to its Physical Character. By the late Rev. Canon TRISTRAM. Fourth Edition, Revised. With 2 Maps, 4 Full-Page Coloured Plates, 8 Full-Page Illustrations, and numerous other Engravings. Large post 8vo, cloth boards, 1 s. 6d.; half-calf, 14s.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE BIBLE. By the late Rev. Canon TRISTRAM. With numerous Illustrations. Cloth boards, 5s.

BIBLE PLACES; or the Topography of the Holy Land. A succinct Account of all the Places, Rivers, and Mountains of the Land of Israel mentioned in the Bible, so far as they have been identified; together with their Modern Names and Historical References. By the late Rev. Canon TRISTRAM. With Map, cloth boards, 5s.

CHEAP RE-ISSUE OF

ILLUSTRATED HANDBOOKS OF ART HISTORY OF ALL AGES AND COUNTRIES.

Edited by Sir E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A., and Prof. T. ROGER SMITH, F.R.I.B.A. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, each 3s. 6d.

ARCHITECTURE: CLASSIC AND EARLY CHRISTIAN. By Prof. T. ROGER SMITH and JOHN SLATER, B.A.

ARCHITECTURE: GOTHIC and RENAISSANCE. By Prof. T. ROGER SMITH and Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A.

SCULPTURE: EGYPTIAN, ASSYRIAN, GREEK, AND ROMAN. By GEORGE REDFORD, F.R.C.S.

SCULPTURE: GOTHIC, RENAISSANCE AND MODERN. By LEADER SCOTT.

EARLY BRITAIN. — ROMAN ROADS IN BRITAIN. By THOMAS CODRINGTON, M.Inst.C.E., F.G.S. Second Edition Revised. With numerous Maps. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

The TIMES says:—"Mr. Codrington's book has much to recommend it to the antiquary and the topographer. To come suddenly upon a book literally packed with suggestions for the well-being of the walker is, in this year of grace and automobility, no small joy."

ROMAN BRITAIN. By EDWARD CONYBEARE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

CELTIC BRITAIN. By Principal RHYS. Third Edition. Revised. Fcap. 8vo, with 2 Maps, cloth boards, 3s.

MATTER, ÆTHER, AND MOTION: The Factors and Relations of Physical Science. By A. E. DOLBEAR, A.B., A.M.M.E., Ph.D., Professor of Physics, Tufts College, U.S.A. English Edition. Edited by Prof. ALFRED LODGE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

MARVELS IN THE WORLD OF LIGHT. A Popular Study of the Phenomena of Light, Colour, and Sight. By the Very Rev. C. T. OVENDEN, D.D., Dean of Clogher. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

WAVES AND RIPPLES IN WATER, AIR, AND ETHER. Being a Course of Christmas Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain by J. A. FLEMING, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

WAYSIDE SKETCHES. By F. EDWARD HULME, F.L.S. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

THE FERN PORTFOLIO. By FRANCIS G. HEATH, Author of "Where to Find Ferns," etc. With 15 Plates, elaborately drawn life-size, exquisitely Coloured from Nature, and with Descriptive Text. Cloth boards, 6s.

FLOWERS OF THE FIELD. By the late Rev. C. A. JOHNS, B.A., F.L.S. Thirtieth Edition. Entirely Rewritten and Revised by G. S. BOULGER, F.L.S., F.G.S., Professor of Botany in the City of London College. With numerous Woodcuts. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 7s. 6d.; half-calf, gilt edges, 14s.

FREAKS AND MARVELS OF PLANT LIFE; or Curiosities of Vegetation. By M. C. COOKE, M.A., LL.D. With numerous Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

ROMANCE OF LOW LIFE AMONGST PLANTS: Facts and Phenomena of Cryptogamic Vegetation. By M. C. COOKE, M.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s. 6d.

JUBILEE OF THE COAL TAR COLOUR INDUSTRY.

ROMANCE OF SCIENCE SERIES.

COAL, AND WHAT WE GET FROM IT. By Prof. R. MELDOLA, F.R.S., F.I.C., etc. Third Edition. With numerous Diagrams. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

"An intelligible account of the successive stages in the development of the coal tar industry, without assuming any knowledge of chemical science on the part of the reader is undeniably bold."—CHEMICAL NEWS.

This is a work of general importance, and on the occasion of the Jubilee of the Coal Tar Colour Industry of special interest. The work forms one of the Romance of Science Series, of which the latest additions are

THE NEW STATE OF MATTER. An Address by Prof. H. PELLAT, of the Sorbonne, delivered April 3, 1905. Translated by EDMUND MCCLURE, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

SOUNDING THE OCEAN OF AIR. Being Six Lectures delivered before the Lowell Institute of Boston in December 1898, by A. LAWRENCE ROICH, S.B., A.M. With numerous Illustrations. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE MACHINERY OF THE UNIVERSE. Mechanical Conceptions of Physical Phenomena. By A. E. DOLBEAR, Ph.D., Professor of Physics, Tufts College, U.S.A. Small post 8vo, with several Diagrams, cloth boards, 2s.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.; 43 QUEEN VICTORIA ST., E.C. BRIGHTON: 129 NORTH ST.

RECEIVED
MAY 21 1906
LIBRARY

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1775

MAY 12, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL, WEST KENSINGTON.—An examination will be held at the above School on Tuesday, June 26, 1906, and on the following days for filling up several vacancies on the foundation.—Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Bursar.

REPTON SCHOOL.—Six or more ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS varying from £80 to £30 a year, and open to Boys under 15. Examination on Tuesday, May 29, and two following days, in London and at Repton. Entries by May 20.—For particulars, apply to HEAD-MASTER, Repton, near Burton-on-Trent.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.—See Staff (honourmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The COUNCIL of the COLLEGE invites applications for the post of LECTURER in POLITICAL and COMMERCIAL SCIENCE, at a Salary of £200.

Applications, with testimonials, should be sent on or before THURSDAY, May 31, 1906, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A., Registrar.
University College, Cardiff.
April 21, 1906.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The COUNCIL of the COLLEGE invites applications for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER in WELSH.

Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications, with testimonials (which need not be printed), must be sent on or before FRIDAY, May 25, 1906.

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A., Registrar.
University College, Cardiff.
April 21, 1906.

PARTNERSHIP WANTED, in advanced school for boys, by Cambridge University Honour Man.—Particulars to GRADUATE, 413 Edge Lane, Liverpool.

Lectures

LECTURES in FRENCH on Modern French Art and Literature will be given by Mlle. PÉCONAL at the Elysée Galleries, 17 Queen's Road, Bayswater, at 3 P.M. on seven successive Thursdays, beginning May 17. The course, 10s. 6d.; single, 2s.

MISS DREWRY'S LECTURES ON BROWNING'S POEMS will begin on May 16, at 7.45 P.M.—Miss Drewry gives Lectures, Readings, and Lessons in English Language and Literature and kindred subjects; examines, reads with private pupils, and helps students by letter and in her Reading Society.—143 King Henry's Road, London, N.W.

Books Wanted

ITINERANT BOOK HUNTER (many years' experience) desires ADDITIONAL COMMISSIONS. Specialities include Autographs, Relics of famous Libraries, Bibliographical Works, etc.—ANDREW DE TERNANT, 20 Gateley Road, Stockwell.

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

ANY Books issued by the Abbotsford, Bannatyne, Maitland Roxburgh, or similar clubs.

Any books on vellum with illuminations (Missals, Breviaries, Horæ, Processionals, Service Books, etc.)

Any Books, Tracts, Maps or Views, relating to Georgia, Virginia, Maryland, New England, Nova Scotia, or other North American Colonies; or to Canada before 1830.

Any books with extra illustrations

Any Early Romances of Chivalry

Any Fine Art Books of Superior Class: antique or modern

Any Fine Early Bindings, or with embroidered covers

Any Galleries of Good Engravings: especially coloured, or Mezzotint.

Any Prints of Military Uniforms published by Ackermann, Graves, McLean, Colnaghi, Fores, etc.

Any Old Almanacks: bound in Volumes, Astrological, or General, if old. (These are often in nice bindings, and also often many different ones for one year bound together)

Any Old Atlases, or Books containing Early Maps of the World, or of America

Any Old Chap-Books with Coloured Frontispieces, or the same (or Sheet Ballads and Broad-sides) with antique woodcuts.

Any Old Editions of the Bible, New Testament, Psalter, etc., if of rarity only.

Any Old Jest Books and Drolleries

Any Old Newspapers, 17th century, sm. 4to, often bound in thin vols

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

_____

Books for Sale, etc.

BERTRAM DOBELL, SECOND-HAND BOOKSELLER, AND PUBLISHER,

77 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

A large Stock of Old and Rare Books in English Literature, including Poetry and the Drama—Shakespeareana—First Editions of Famous Authors—Manuscripts—Illustrated Books, etc. CATALOGUES free on application.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net for 35s., 1902-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,

100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

READERS and COLLECTORS will find it to their advantage to write for J. BALDWIN'S MONTHLY CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS, sent post free on application. Books in all Branches of Literature. Genuine bargains in Scarce Items and First Editions. Books sent on approval if desired.—Address 14 Osborne Road, Leyton, Essex.

THE YELLOW BOOK, an Illustrated Quarterly, vols. 2 to 13, 1894-97, illustrated by Aubrey Beardsley, etc., original cloth, uncut, clean; published at £3 net, for 45s.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Sales by Auction

The valuable Library of R. C. FISHER, Esq., of Hill Top, Midhurst.

MESSRS. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE will SELL by AUCTION at their House, No. 13 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C., on MONDAY, MAY 21, and three following Days, at 1 o'clock precisely, the Valuable and Interesting LIBRARY of R. C. FISHER, Esq. (of Hill Top, Midhurst, Sussex), consisting chiefly of early and extremely rare Italian, German, and French Woodcut Books, including a fine series of Books of Hours and some fine bindings.

May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had; if with facsimiles of bindings, price half a crown each.

The Collection of Books in Fine Bindings of the late ARTHUR RAM, Esq. and the Library of late J. R. LORENT, Esq.

MESSRS. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON, and HODGE will SELL by AUCTION at their House, No. 13, Wellington Street, Strand, W.C., on FRIDAY, May 25, at 1 o'clock precisely, the COLLECTION of BOOKS in fine bindings, the property of the late ARTHUR RAM, Esq.; a portion of the Library of a Nobleman; and the Library of J. R. LORENT, Esq., deceased, in fine modern bindings, by Bedford, Rivière, etc.

May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

STAMMERING.—The severest and most obstinate cases can now be perfectly and permanently cured by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years; call or write.—Mr. A. C. Schnelle, 112 Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

FOR THE LIBRARY LIST

MOORISH REMAINS IN SPAIN

Being a Brief Record of the Arabian Conquest and Occupation of the Peninsula, with a Particular Account of the Mohammedan Architecture and Decoration in the cities of Cordova, Seville, and Toledo.
By A. F. CALVERT, Author of "The Alhambra," "Life of Cervantes," etc. With 84 Coloured Plates, 200 Black-and-White Illustrations, and 200 Diagrams. Crown 4to, 42s. net.

IMPRESSIONS OF JAPANESE ARCHITECTURE AND THE ALLIED ARTS

By RALPH ADAMS CRAM, Fellow of the American Institute of Architects, Member of the Society of Arts, London, and Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. With 60 Illustrations reproduced from Photographs. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

HISTORIC DRESS

1607-1800, with an introductory Chapter on Dress in the Spanish and French Settlements in Florida and Louisiana. By ELISABETH MCLELLAN. Illustrated in Colour, Pen-and-Ink and Wash Drawings by SOPHIE B. STEEL. Together with and Reproductions from Photographs. Demy 4to, 42s. net.

"By Tre, Pol, and Pen, Ye may know Cornishmen."

CORNISH SAINTS AND SINNERS

By J. HENRY HARRIS, Author of "The Fishers." With upwards of 70 Drawings by L. RAVEN-HILL. Crown 8vo, 6s.

* * * This is the narrative of the adventures of three friends while on a walking tour in Cornwall. There they become acquainted with the Saints and Sinners of the West, both legendary and real. Both author and illustrator have fallen under the spell of the Western shore. A special feature is the illustrations. Mr. Raven-Hill has thrown himself into his work, and is equally happy when portraying His Titanic Majesty building the hedge from Lerrin to Looe as in drawing some contemporary bit of local colour. For those who love Cornwall, and there are many, this is a volume of rare interest and charm.

THE YOUNG O'BRIENS

A Novel by the Author of "Elizabeth's Children" and "Helen Allston." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Just published.]
* * * Left to the care of Aunt Kezia, by parents who are ordered abroad for the benefit of the mother's health, Dennis, Eileen, Molly, and Sheila, Pat the atom, demonstrate to an elderly and somewhat acid Scotch spinster and her German lodger, Herr Schmidt, the latent possibilities for mischief which smoulder in the personalities of these young O'Briens.

THE UNDYING PAST: A Novel

By HERMANN SUDERMANN. Translated by BEATRICE MARSHALL. Cr. 8vo, 6s. [Ready May 15.]
* * * An English translation of Sudermann's great novel, "Es War." Some years ago "Regina" had a great success in an English form, and it is anticipated that this volume will increase the Sudermann public in this country.

THE CHAMPAGNE STANDARD

By Mrs. JOHN LANE. Author of "Kitwyk," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fourth Edition.]

THE HOUSE by the BRIDGE

A Novel by M. G. EASTON. Crown 8vo.

THE NEWELL FORTUNE

A Novel by MANSFIELD BROOKS. Crown 8vo.

The GREATER INCLINATION

A Novel by EDITH WHARTON. Crown 8vo.

BOMBAY DUCKS

An Account of some of the Everyday Birds and Beasts found in a Naturalist's EL DORADO. By DOUGLAS DEWAR, R.A., F.Z.S. With numerous Illustrations reproduced from Photographs by Captain FAYLER. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

"Bombay Ducks" is a time-honoured expression in India, and Mr. Dewar thinks that as the animals dealt with in his volume are all to be found on the "Bombay side," they have an equal right with pieces of dried fish to be called "Bombay Ducks." These sketches, dealing with common birds and beasts of Indian daily life, are written with considerable humour and insight, for Mr. Dewar knows his subject well. A special feature is the illustrations, some forty pages in all, reproduced from a series of remarkable photographs taken from life. Those who have tried to photograph living birds will be able fully to appreciate Capt. Fayer's work.

THE WILD FLOWERS OF SELBORNE

AND OTHER PAPERS. By the Rev. Canon VAUGHAN. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE MIRROR OF THE CENTURY

By WALTER FREWEN LORD. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

POINTS OF VIEW

By L. F. AUSTIN. with an Introductory Memoir, by CLARENCE BROOK. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net. [Ready May 18]

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, London and New York

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foor, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. of every description typewritten with promptness and accuracy at 7d. per 1000 words. Envelope addressing and duplicating circulars at lowest terms. Specimens and testimonials on application.—Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

TYPEWRITING.—8d. 1000 words (Remington). Novels, Plays, Duplicating Circulars, etc.—Miss WILLARD, Beaufort House, Osborne Road, Southville, Bristol.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS having MSS. typed at Miss LONGLEY'S, 467 Mansion House Chambers, 20 Bucklersbury, E.C., at 10d. per 1000 words, receive carbon copy free. Established 10 years.

MSS. MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, invite writers to send them MSS. of ORIGINAL STORIES: (1) for BOYS of 10-14, addressed Mr. JOHN LANG, BOYS' EDITOR; (2) for GIRLS of 10-14, addressed Mrs. JOHN LANG, GIRLS' EDITOR; (3) for CHILDREN of 6-10, addressed Mrs. LOUEY CHISHOLM, CHILDREN'S EDITOR; extent, 40,000 to 50,000 words. All MSS. (which should be sent in any time before September 30—typewritten preferred) will be acknowledged, and returned if not suitable.

The TWO ARCADIAS

PLAYS AND POEMS.

By ROSALIND TRAVERS

With an Introduction by RICHARD GARNETT, C.B., LL.D.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

Some Early Press Notices.

Professor DOWDEN who devotes a lengthy article to the book in the TWENTIETH CENTURY QUARTERLY, says:

"The writer possesses a gift of song which captures the imagination and both satisfies and makes desirous the sense of hearing."

The MORNING POST says:

"No outline can convey the grace and tenderness which Miss Travers has brought to the execution of a very difficult task."

The TIMES says:

"There is thought here and brainwork, fancy and judgment, lofty eloquence and humour, now farcical, now satiric. . . . A writer from whom we expect much. . . . She is new, vivid, surprising, strong."

The DAILY GRAPHIC says:

"Dr. Richard Garnett contributes a laudatory introduction. It decidedly deserves his praise and ours also."

The BOOKMAN says:

"Miss Travers appears to have the right stuff in her. She has power, courage, originality and that quality of illumination, without which so many would-be poets fail to attract. She has too, a pretty touch of satire, which she uses deftly."

BRIMLEY JOHNSON & INCE, LTD.,
35 Leicester Square, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S
NEW BOOKS

SECOND EDITION

MEMORIALS OF
EDWARD BURNE-JONES

By G. B.-J.

With 41 Photogravures and other Illustrations.
In 2 vols. 8vo, gilt tops, 30s. net.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH
PROSODY FROM THE
12th CENTURY TO THE
PRESENT DAY

By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., LL.D.,
Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh.
In 3 vols. 8vo. Vol. I. FROM THE ORIGINS
TO SPENSER. 10s. net.

LIFE & EXPERIENCES OF SIR HENRY ENFIELD ROSCOE,

D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S.

Written by Himself. With Photogravure and other Illustrations. 8vo, 12s. net.

POCKET TENNYSON

TENNYSON'S
COMPLETE WORKS

In 5 vols. Fcap 8vo, limp cloth, 2s. net; limp leather, 3s. net each.

Vol. I. JUVENILIA AND ENGLISH IDYLS.

Vol. II. IN MEMORIAM, MAUD, and other Poems.

[Tuesday.]

WITH COLOURED ILLUSTRATIONS

ELIZABETH AND HER
GERMAN GARDEN

With Coloured Illustrations by S. HARMON
VEDDER. Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
[Tuesday.]

VOLUME VII. NOW READY

A HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH

Vol. VII. From the Accession of George I. to the End of the 18th Century (1714-1800)

By the late Rev. Canon JOHN H. OVERTON,
D.D., and the Rev. FREDERICK RELTON, K.C.

7s. 6d.

* * * Previously published, Vols. I.-VI., 7s. 6d.
each.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE VIRGINIAN"

LADY BALTIMORE

By OWEN WISTER. Illustrated

Crown 8vo, 6s.

SPECTATOR.—"It would be difficult to speak too highly of this delightful novel."
SPEAKER.—"A clever and brilliant piece of work."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	443	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		An Australian Verse-Writer—
The Modern Spirit . . . . .	445	Victor Daley . . . . .	452
Napoleon . . . . .	447	Fiction . . . . .	454
The Greek of the New Testa-		Fine Art:
ment . . . . .	448	The Royal Academy—I . . . . .	455
Unfortunate Miss Beauchamp	449	The French Salons . . . . .	456
Retrospective Ramblers . . . . .	449	Music:
A People at School . . . . .	450	Bach's Humour . . . . .	457
A Lost Picture . . . . .	451	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	458
The Late Father General of the		Correspondence . . . . .	458
Jesuits—A Reminiscence . . . . .	451	Books Received . . . . .	459
The Bookshelf . . . . .	461

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

SELDOM we suspect, has the Royal Academy listened at its annual banquet to so brilliant a speech on Literature as that delivered last week by Mr. Rudyard Kipling. There are still memories of the speeches made by Charles Dickens on these occasions, and inquirers will be told how fine they were. We do not doubt it. From the comfortable, after-dinner point of view, they must have been much finer than this thought-packed, philosophic stuff of Mr. Kipling's, which, however smoothly it may have flowed and however often it may have raised laughter, has proved too much for most of the reporters, and yields more every time we study it.

The dangerous magic of words—a fire with which men play—the last importance of truth, the dependence of literature on the national life—these were three of many topics on which Mr. Kipling touched. And his last story, of the rain-doctors who could not get good and general rain because the head-men were running about hunting jackals and the little people running about chasing grass-hoppers, exactly illustrates the causes of our present dearth. Our head-men are hunting jackals and our little people chasing grass-hoppers all day; and in the evening we collect to hear the men with the words tell stories, and, so long as we are amused, we do not care that most of the stories are neither good nor true. How could they be when we give the men with the words nothing out of which good and true stories can be made?

Our great fault is that we come more and more to look upon literature as an entertainment, a refuge from the trouble of living, instead of the greatest aid to living which an age, which is not an age of faith, has left to it. We make far too much of the stories, while our lives grow pettier, less strenuous and less true every year. By a coincidence, within a very few days of the report of the Royal Academy banquet, one of the papers contained an account of a speech on Literature, delivered by Mr. Edmund Gosse. "Literature as an Entertainment" was its title: and, so far as may be judged from an abbreviated report, it was—as it surely would be—a very graceful, interesting and polished speech. It dwelt on the the pleasures of literature, on books as a solace and a joy, a "recreation and amusement as a remedy for dullness and weariness"—not as a guide "through the active stress of life." That is just it. Tired of chasing grass-hoppers, we come round the fire to hear the stories, and never observe that the stories ought to nerve us to do something better than chase grass-hoppers.

It is that attitude to literature which is responsible, more than anything else, for the barrenness and pettiness of the literature we make. Mr. Kipling referred to "the bare half-hundred words breathed upon by some man in his agony, or in his exaltation, or in his idleness, ten generations ago" that "can open to us the doors of three worlds, or stir us so intolerably that we can scarcely abide to look at our own souls." That is good, but there is more to be said about it. Literature is more than a record; it is the creator of character, purpose and feeling, the inspirer, the maker of the future as well as the preserver of the past.

The man with the words whose words live is the man with something more than the words. He is the man with sight and understanding. He sees and feels before he speaks. And the feelings, the characters, the lives of most of us are built to an almost incredible extent on what he has seen and told us. But for our acquaintance with literature, we should find in the beauty of a sunset, or a noble deed, or human love, not a quarter of what we find in them now. Literature, in fact, makes life, enlarges the capacity of every man, doubles or trebles his power to feel and to do, and so fits him, not to hear more stories and find a new and more subtle pleasure every time he hears them, to become an æolian harp giving out a new note under every soft air of style, but to be more of a man and more of a doer than he was before.

Much ingenuity has been expended upon the production of Birthday books, but we imagine that the Death book which Katharine Tynan has published under the title of "The Birthday Book of the Blessed Dead" is something of a novelty. The idea seems to be that when you lose a friend or an acquaintance you should inscribe his or her name under the proper date, where you will find space left for the purpose, while on the opposite page is a text of Scripture with some pieces of poetry that may serve as comfort in time of affliction. We open the book at random, and find that on May 3 the text of Scripture is: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends," and the verses of poetry are:

For He hears the lambs' innocent call,
And He hears the ewes' tender reply;
He is watchful while they are in peace,
For they know when their Shepherd is nigh.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

Grief fills the room up of my absent child,
Lies in his bed, walks up and down with me,
Puts on his pretty looks, repeats his words,
Remembers me of all his gracious parts.

King John.

The scheme of the book strikes us as being very interesting but the result rather lugubrious.

The book suggests a question as to the wisdom of conscious bewailing and mourning of the dead. In no other creature but man is this desire very highly developed, though one of our contemporaries from time to time entertains its readers with pathetic stories of birds and beasts that have died heart-broken at the loss of a mate. On the other hand, the hard-hearted sportsman and naturalist has proved by cruel experiment that, if you shoot a bird near its nest, the chances are that its survivor will have another mate in the course of an hour or two. Humanity is always rather proud of its emotions, and nurses its grief for the dead; but a wiser, though perhaps a more stoical emotion would urge a man simply to turn over the page and forget. Mrs. Hinkson appears to be of quite a different opinion; but what a mournful book hers will be after it has been kept for twenty years or so! It is easy to imagine a time when the owner would turn over the pages, evoking from every leaf ghosts of those whose laughter had once rung in his ears, and whose lips, perhaps, he had pressed. And the prospect, in the words of a famous writer, "do not over-stimulate."

A conference of library and educational authorities, promoted by the Library Association, took place at Birmingham on Thursday, May 3, too late for inclusion in our last issue. As we explained recently in these columns, this was the first of a series of three conferences to be held at local centres. It is suggested that the next should be held in London, and should be as influential as possible (Mr. Councillor Abbott, Manchester). Public libraries are doing a work which was not thought of some years ago; and the idea of these conferences is to bring the people to the books (Lord Mayor of Birmingham). The work the public library is now doing can only be increased with the expansion of the educational life of the country by radical alterations. These alterations, forming the subjects of two resolutions which were unanimously passed by the conference, are being embodied in a Parliamentary Bill (by Mr. Fovargue) which, it is expected, will be presented at the London conference.

The principle embodied in the first resolution, that children should be accustomed from an early age to collections of books is a good one. But there is some doubt about the wisdom of placing public libraries under the control of the local educational authorities (Mr. A. Capel Shaw, Birmingham). [We have elsewhere defined the public library as "a huge co-operative book club to meet the needs of both sexes, of all ages, of all classes of the people. And although its primary aim has now become, indubitably, educational, it is not concerned either with education alone, or in its educational objects with children only."] The question of school libraries versus a public library section for children is one of importance. The public library, even when the children's library forms a separate department, is too advanced (Mr. R. Cary Gibson, King Edward's Grammar School), and children should study the best books under the instruction of their teachers (Mr. Ballinger, Cardiff). But the cost of the formation of school libraries is considerable, and the children's department of the public library makes the child more familiar with a collection of books than would otherwise be the case (Mr. Dent, Aston); and it is only by means of the public library that the "reading habit" can be continued to any appreciable extent through life. The art of bibliography might profitably be taught at an early age (Mr. H. R. Tedder, The Athenæum, S.W.).

We have dealt recently with the extension of the Public Library Acts to county areas; and in an earlier number, at some length, with the exemption of public libraries from the payment of local rates. These subjects, together with the removal of the rate limitation, formed the clauses of the second resolution, and will be included in the omnibus Bill.

We have before us "Miscellanea," Part I., published by the Rymour Club, Edinburgh, a new body, which has for its objects "the collection, with a view to the preservation and study, and eventually the editing and printing, of ballads, lyrics, and other rhymed material, and of ballad and other tunes, unprinted, or of rarity and in danger of being lost, more particularly such as illustrate Scottish dialect, manners, and music in former days." The President of the Club is Mr. John Geddie: its Secretary, Mr. Alan Reid, F.S.A., of The Loaning, Merchiston Bank Gardens, Edinburgh; and it has forty-nine members, besides many corresponding members, and a few honorary members. Something of the same sort of work is being done in England by the Folk-lore Society, and has been done for a small corner of it—in a spirited but not very scientific fashion—by Mr. Baring-Gould; and it is work that deserves all encouragement. But this first number of "Miscellanea" is a little disappointing in that it does not rescue from oblivion much or anything that is genuinely Scottish.

Mr. J. Liddell Kelly, writing from New Zealand, contributes a paper on "Children's Rhymes and Rhyme Games" which is full of quaint things; but both the other two articles concern what is really English. The "Ballad of Jack Munro," though taken down in Scotland, is old English (probably, suggests Mr. B. J. Home, of Revolution or even later date); and d'Urfey's original of "Within a mile o' Edinboro' Town" is, of course, purely English, though it is, we learn, current, in some of its more respectable versions, in Scotland, and is never heard in England. The interest of both these papers and the ballads they preserve cannot be denied; but it is a great thing to limit the field of work, and we should like to see the work of the Club strictly confined to Scottish tunes and rhymes. Still, it is unfair to pass judgment on a single number, and that the first; and the Rymour Club has our good wishes for the success of an enterprise that has long needed scientific and thorough promotion.

Those of our readers who are interested in Russia or Russian literature will be glad to receive the announcement of a new Journal, La Revue Slave (50, rue Molitor, Paris), which will be devoted to the affairs of the Slavonic peoples and their relations with France and England. The object of the organ is to bind together the many peoples that compose what we call Russia, and to spread intelligence among the French and English peoples of the political and intellectual life in that country, the result anticipated being the firmer friendship of the three nations concerned. The Revue Slave has our cordial good wishes.

The new editions of Alexander Smith's "Dreamthorp" have revived a momentary interest in that writer, whose literary career began with the publication of "A Life Drama" in 1852, and closed with his death in 1867. Smith's only novel, "Andrew Haggart's Household," was published in 1866, both serially—in Good Words—and in book form, by Mr. Alexander Strahan, and has never been reissued. An appreciation of Smith's genius and work, seven pages in length, written by Alexander Nicolson, appeared in Good Words for March 1868. In "Last Leaves," with memoir by Patrick Proctor Alexander, published in 1868, there occur some sentences in Smith's essay on "Literary Work" which might have been written yesterday. "All the defects of our present literature," he wrote, "may be summed up in a word—want of style. And the reason is not far to seek. Literature has become a profession. Books are written too hastily, and to serve a purpose too immediate. . . . The world does not need new thoughts so much as it needs old thoughts recast."

Some idea of the joys and woes of an author may be deduced from the following statement by Professor Ernst Haeckel, contained in a recent letter to the Rationalist Press Association: "As many members of the R.P.A. are interested in my work, 'The Riddle of the Universe,' they will be pleased to hear that two hundred thousand copies have been printed of the German original; that it has appeared in fifteen different translations, including recent translations into Japanese, Chinese and Hebrew; and that more than six thousand letters have reached me in regard to it in the last six years." It certainly requires a philosophic mind to appreciate the receipt of a thousand letters a year continuously and on the same subject: even the large circulation of the book hardly comes as a compensation for this affliction.

The fine collection of lithographs by Whistler presented last year by Mr. Thomas Way to the Print Room of the British Museum has now been completely mounted and arranged for the inspection of students. One hundred and fourteen subjects are represented out of the one hundred and sixty described in the second edition of Mr. T. R. Way's catalogue. The subjects missing are chiefly those printed in Paris, with the addition of a few experimental sketches of which only two or three impressions were ever taken. The portraits of Mallarmé and Henley are among the desiderata. The total number of proofs included in the gift is larger, however, by fourteen than the number of subjects represented, since in several cases trial proofs and rare early states were given in addition to an impression of the finished lithograph. The source from which the proofs come is a guarantee of their quality, and the Museum is much to be congratulated on the receipt of so valuable and munificent a gift.

At the same time, the entire collection of Whistler's etchings at the Museum was rearranged and placed on sunk mounts. The series is notoriously incomplete, but the representation of the earlier works of the master is extremely fine, so far as it goes. His later style is represented only by the Twenty-six Etchings, chiefly of Venice, and a few other isolated examples.

Messrs. Carfax and Co., of Bury Street, St. James's, have recently bought the entire Butts collection of William Blake's drawings. This is the finest and most complete private collection. They will be exhibited during the months of June and July, and Sir William Stirling Maxwell has consented to lend his picture of The Canterbury Pilgrims, Blake's largest and most important work. Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Graham Robertson are also contributing from their collections. This exhibition, therefore, may be anticipated as possessing unique interest and value.

The sale of engravings at Messrs. Sotheby's on Monday includes several interesting things. Perhaps the most important is J. McArdell's mezzotint of Mary, Duchess of Ancaster, whole-length, after Hudson, a proof before any letters, cut close excepting the inscription space. Then there are Fisher's mezzotints of Laurence Sterne (first state) and Lady Elizabeth Lee (second state), after Sir Joshua Reynolds, besides others after the same painter, by J. R. Smith, Bartolozzi and others; line engravings after Romney, Turner, Faithorne, Greuze, Van Dyck, etc.; a good set of Wheatley's Cries of London, and among engravings in colours, Ward's Louisa Mildmay, Morland's Delia in Town, by J. R. Smith; Reynolds's Countess of Harrington and Children and Theophila Gwatkin as Simplicity, by Bartolozzi. There are also one or two modern etchings, including Mr. C. J. Watson's London Thoroughfares, in the original wrappers.

On Empire Day, May 24, will appear the first number of the new series of a very popular illustrated paper, The Navy and Army. It is at the suggestion of a large number of Naval and Military Officers that the paper has been revived, and expressions of approval and good-will have been received from the most prominent members of both Services. The Navy and Army will, as before, be a sixpenny fortnightly; but the changes which the last ten years have seen in the men, the methods and the material of the Services make the new series of the paper particularly needful and welcome. It will keep pace with all the developments of the citizen-soldier movement and hold continually before the public the workings of the General Staff; and by means of illustrations and articles it will record the aims and doings of the two Services all over the world.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—On Saturday next (May 19), at three o'clock, Sir James Dewar will deliver the first of a course of two lectures on

"The Old and the New Chemistry." The Friday evening discourse on May 18 will be delivered by Professor Arthur Schuster on "International Science."

Society of Arts.—Monday, May 14, 8 P.M. Canton Lecture. Mr. George W. Eve, R.E., on "Heraldry in relation to the Applied Arts" (Lecture I.) Wednesday, May 16, 8 P.M. Ordinary Meeting. Mr. Clayton Beadle on "The Development of Watermarking in Hand-made and Machine-made Paper."

Royal Microscopical Society.—The next meeting of the society will be held on Wednesday, the 16th instant, at 8 P.M., when there will be an Exhibition of Pond Life.

The Musical Association.—Thirty-second Session, 1905-6. The seventh meeting will be held on Tuesday, May 15, at the King's Room, Messrs. Broadwood and Sons, Conduit Street, W., when a paper will be read at 5.15 P.M. by Dr. F. G. Shinn on "The Study of the History of Music: a consideration of some of the prevailing methods of study and a plea for the adoption of more rational ones."

Royal Photographic Society of Great Britain.—Exhibition of Works of Members of the Birmingham Photographic Society at 66 Russell Square, W.C., from May 1 to June 16. Admission on presentation of visiting-card.

Home Arts and Industries Association.—The twenty-second Annual Exhibition of wood-carving, inlay, metal repoussé, embossed leather-baskets, pottery, bookbinding, handspun linen, woollen and silk fabrics, pattern-weaving, tapestry-weaving, carpets and rugs, plain needlework, smocking-embroidery, lace, knitting, stencils, toys, etc., will be held in the Royal Albert Hall, from Thursday, May 17, 1906, to Monday, May 21, inclusive. Demonstrations will be given in hand printing, velvet-weaving, wood-carving, inlay, pot-throwing, metal work, leather embossing, basket-making, bookbinding, spinning and weaving in flax and wool, lace-making, and toy-making. On Saturday, May 19, at 4 P.M., Mr. T. R. Ablett will lecture on "Observation Drawing," illustrated by lantern slides.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Sale of Engravings, comprising a portion of the collections of the Earl of Lovelace and others. Monday, May 14, at 1 P.M.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson.—Sale of the libraries of the late Mr. Collingwood Chown and others. May 14 and 15.

University College, London (University of London).—May 12 at 11 A.M. Professor Priebisch will give a lecture (for Honours and Post Graduate Students) at the British Museum. Subject: Development of German Literature; illustrated by original Manuscripts.

Royal Meteorological Society.—An ordinary meeting will be held in the Rooms of the Society, 70 Victoria Street, Westminster, on Wednesday, May 16, at 4.30 P.M. Papers to be read: (1) "An Instrument for testing and adjusting the Campbell-Stokes Sunshine Recorder," by Dr. W. N. Shaw, F.R.S., and G. C. Simpson, M.Sc.; (2) "The Development and Progress of the Thunder Squall of February 8, 1906," by R. G. K. Lempfert, M.A.

St. James's (Hampstead Road) Dramatic Society.—Performance of One Summer's Day, by H. V. Esmond, at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock Place, on Wednesday, May 16, at 8.45 P.M.

LITERATURE

THE MODERN SPIRIT

From a College Window. By A. C. BENSON. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.)

It may be necessary to explain what we mean by the words used as the title of this article. Such phrases as "up-to-date modernity" and so forth have come to indicate a type of mind very different from that of Mr. Benson, who is refined, cultivated, and almost cloistral in his expression. What we mean to imply is that his mind appears to be suffused with modern thought and modern ideas. It is, in a high and good sense, an echoing chamber out of which issue in limpid and musical language thoughts that are "in the air" at the time of writing. The themes dealt with in the book are many of them such as essayists of all times have treated. The author laments with pleasing elegance that he is growing older, and gathers to himself comfort such as scarcely could have dawned on the mind of him who wrote the "De Senectute." Though it is impossible for him to take part, as he once did, in the elastic and joyous games of youth, he finds his pleasure in the song that the kettle sings on the hearth, the new book into which he will look as he has his solitary cup of tea, the conversation with fresh and youthful students; and he ends with a pleasing glimpse of the best side of college life:

I pass out into the court, the lighted windows of the Hall gleam with the ancient armorial glass, from staircase after staircase come troops of alert, gowned figures, while overhead, above all the pleasant stir and murmur of life, hang in the dark sky the unchanging stars.

In the literary essays which find a place in this volume there is the same elegance, accompanied perhaps by a perceptible lack of the strenuousness with which Carlyle, for instance, would have treated the same themes. Mr. Benson tells us of the bore who has written a novel and insists in reading it aloud, of the fine dame who adds authorship to her other fascinations, and of the people generally who play at being literary. In regard to reading he speaks rather of the minor comforts :

The object is to get clear conceptions, to arrive at a critical sense of what is good in literature, to have a knowledge of events and tendencies of thought, to take a just view of history and of great personalities ; not to be at the mercy of theorists, but to be able to correct a faulty bias by having a large and wide view of the progress of events and the development of thought.

To this it is quite permissible to answer that the genuine and whole-hearted lover of books can give no reason. As an essayist of a very different kind has written : "there is no why." As soon as a book is taken up with a set purpose, it means that the schoolmaster is abroad. The reading for its own sake, the reading that is unconscious of any ultimate end, is at once the most genuine and that which has most effect. In that lies the true objection to all those lists of books that ought to be read. The mind working naturally and without constraint will seek out what is necessary for its own nourishment and, acting quite unconsciously, is for ever gathering to itself that which is needed to build up the pillar of experience which is the property of every individual mind. According to our conception, the only essential to be kept in view is that reading is always second-hand knowledge and that it possesses a true value only when it comes to amplify or to purify that which we already possess. From the moment of birth experience is coming to us, and no experience of others can be useful unless it can be dovetailed into our own. Or, to put the matter in an old schoolmaster's formula, the known is the foundation on which that which was previously unknown must always be built. Mr. Benson's attitude is well shown in the passage wherein he declares : "Direct bookish talk is my abomination." He prefers a "delicate allusiveness, an aptitude for pointed quotation." Of course, tastes differ, and we can imagine few conversations more interesting than that with a man who has mastered a book and out of his full mind points out its beauties and its defects. How much delightful reading do we owe to enthusiasts of this kind ! Naturally enough, Mr. Benson bewails the change in popular taste. He sees something pathetic in the shelves of old books at the University, written, many of them, so carefully and so lovingly hundreds of years ago and now scarcely ever opened, while the great book factory pours out from groaning presses an endless stream of literature as ephemeral as the snows of autumn. Again, in his essay on conversation we find the same kind of epicureanism peeping out. The professional conversationalist is at bottom a dull dog. We can well sympathise with Carlyle in the following story :

He was asked to dinner to meet a great talker, who poured forth a continuous flow of jest and anecdote until the meal was far advanced. Then came a lull ; Carlyle laid down his knife and fork, and looking round with the famous "crucified" expression on his face, said in a voice of agonised entreaty, "For God's sake take me away, and put me in a room by myself, and give me a pipe of tobacco !"

Dinner-party talk is, as a matter of fact, a very futile thing, unless the company has been very carefully selected. You may go to hundreds of dinners and hear again and again the same graceful but superficial comments on the topics of the day, talk of theatres to which no thoughtful man would willingly listen, talk of music and fashion, talk of clubs and wines and tobacco, of motor-cars and the other resources of civilisation. How different it is when two or three men who think earnestly on the same subject and yet disagree profoundly on particulars in regard to it meet in some friend's room and over their pipes and a glass of whiskey and water enter with zest into the subject which they have at heart ! Talk, as a rule, suffers more from being too copious than from being restricted. Much of it reminds us of the game of chess. Two inferior players will sit down to discuss a position and will argue and contradict and suggest and theorise, until we are weary of hearing them. On the other hand, two experts looking at the same position will waste little of their energy in words. "Yes, white does so-and-so, and black's reply is —," and a shrug of the shoulders ends the discussion. They see the merits of the position and are ready to advance to something else. No doubt, in ordinary society it would be a drawback if everything were taken seriously, and he, indeed, would be an austere man who did not recognise how beautiful is the ripple and flow of conversation at an average dinner-table. There is nothing whatever in it ; nobody seems ever to have thought of anything, and, if they have, their deepest ideas are kept carefully in the background. It is all on the surface, like sunlight playing on rippling water, and for digestive purposes it may be counted good, but in no real sense of the term can we admit this to be conversation. Indeed, it is curious, though many have observed it, that the most agreeable talks frequently occur at an inn with complete strangers. You meet a man—chance may even cause you to form the acquaintance of a lady whom you have never seen in your life before and are never likely to see again—and some accident, it may be an error of the cook or a false step on the part of the waiter, forces you into speech. A spark is, as it were, struck from the flint and a most interesting conversation follows. Probably you may think that, if the same person were to be met daily, he or she would become the greatest bore imaginable. All the freshness, all the novelty, all the originality have been poured forth in one conversation, and it really is a blessing that those who take part in it have to direct their steps in different ways in the morning. No doubt, the pleasure is largely due to the doing away with reserve. You can be frank to a stranger where you would not be frank to your intimates ; and it is possible that the stranger may touch sympathies and even bring out the avowal of weaknesses that your nearest and dearest have never suspected.

Among the more general subjects discussed by our author is that of egoism, and here, perhaps, more than anywhere do we feel the lack of depth to which allusion has been made before. There is no gainsaying that the strong man is usually an egoist. His very strength lies in the knowledge and belief that he is somebody, that he has a mission to perform in the world, and that this mission is the most important thing in it. Even great writers must be more or less consumed with this passion. They could not have achieved greatness unless it were by continually brooding over their own dreams and thoughts, and probably the combination of a strong egoism with wide and universal sympathies is that which leads to the highest pre-eminence. In the article on Art, Mr. Benson has said something like this. He writes :

There are very few people who are highly developed in one faculty who do not pay for it in some other part of their natures. Below the emotion itself their sits enthroned a hard intellectual force, a power of appraising quality, a Rhadamanthine judgment. It is this hardness which has so often made artists such excellent men of business, so alert to strike favourable bargains.

It is impossible for us even to glance at the many subjects dealt with by Mr. Benson in this book, and all that he says invites us to argue and dissent : but at the same time it is no more than justice to say that he is always suggestive, and writes in a style that must commend itself to every lover of letters. Occasionally there is just a slight tendency to become precious, as when he writes of : "the bewildering beauty and aromatic scents of those delicate toys of God which we call flowers," but at a time when a boisterous roughness tends to debase our language we can readily forgive a fault of over-refinement and cultivation. Mr. Benson has earned our gratitude by the publication of this book.

NAPOLEON

The Cambridge Modern History. Planned by the late Lord ACTON. Edited by A. W. WARD, G. W. PROTHERO, and STANLEY LEATHES. Vol. ix. "Napoleon." (Cambridge University Press, 16s.)

OVER a dozen writers have contributed to the new volume of the "Cambridge Modern History," which consists of seven hundred and seventy-one pages, and a very valuable general bibliography of works dealing with the subject-matter, which in itself extends to over one hundred pages. The reviewer, however, is restricted in his operations by lineal, or rather lineage, measure more than by avoidupois, so that no attempt can be made to criticise as a whole a book of this size and these varied contents, as would be more easily done if it were all from one pen. A treatise on Napoleon which contains contributions from Dr. Holland Rose, Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, Dr. von Pflugk-Hartung, and Dr. A. W. Ward is bound to be good in parts, and this book is no disappointment in that respect. But there are, unhappily, gaps filled with second-rate productions, which detract considerably from the value of the whole. No period, as the editors point out, was so completely dominated by a single personality, and yet it is a period which cannot be regarded from any one standpoint to the exclusion of the others. It is the incidental aspects of the period which are treated with the greatest skill in this volume.

The Napoleonic régime was not one which fostered the free expression of ideas, but French literature was enriched by Chateaubriand and Madame de Staël, who continued in France the opposition to Bonaparte which had been started with far-reaching effect in other countries by Wordsworth, Schiller and Fichte. Dr. Holland Rose and Professor Pariset are able exponents of this "Idealist Revolt," just as Mr. H. E. Egerton is of so different a subject as the history of the English Colonies, or Mr. L. G. Wickham-Legg of the Concordats, and it is a sign of the more scientific study of history that so catholic a view of the period has been taken in this volume.

It has been noted that the chief writers of the Napoleonic régime were in the opposition, and this in spite of Napoleon's profession that his "canaille would have become the best educated in the world." It may not be the fancy of a hero-worshipper which attributes this fact not so much to repression as to the personality of the Emperor. He would always do everything himself, and he invariably did it better than any one else would have done it. So Sainte-Beuve recognised the literary quality of the St. Helena writings, the prompt imperious brevity, the exquisite clearness, the occasional beauties of sentiment and eloquence; and Mr. Fisher, in making the inevitable comparison, says that "Cæsar has more formal eloquence; Napoleon has more romance, more passion, more vibration." We can only speculate what the result would have been if that great intellect had been devoted entirely to literature. Archibald Forbes enunciated this idea paradoxically some years ago, when he wrote that the "first Napoleon, if only he could have been a little truthful occasionally, would have eclipsed Julius Cæsar [as a war correspondent], and knocked William Howard Russell into a cocked hat." Napoleon as a writer and his attitude towards literature, art, and science are subjects most attractively discussed in this book: the legislator, the financier, the administrator, are all set before us with skill and judgment; but it must be confessed that "the little corporal" is, after all, the man we love and like to study.

There has always been the danger that the Napoleonic period should be regarded exclusively as a long series of battles, but that view is apparently now to be discarded for the opposite, since there is not a single map or plan in this book to help the reader who tries to devote his attention to the military history. It is often stated that the study of military history is not understood in this country, in spite of the large number of books annually published on the subject; and there appears to be some truth in the assertion, since foreign writers—very good writers, too—have had to be called in to chronicle the campaigns of 1809, 1812, and 1813-14. Whether equally good military historians could not have been found in the United Kingdom is a matter of opinion, but there can be no doubt that those English writers on military affairs who were selected are not, on the whole, in the first class, and even the excellence of a few contributors will hardly atone for this. Nor is the resultant hotchpotch of a kind which would have appealed to Lord Acton.

To this military side of the question Colonel E. M. Lloyd contributes two important chapters on the third coalition, which are more readable than scholarly. Than his style and arrangement of his materials nothing could be more pleasant, but he has not been at the pains to write a definitive account of his period, and he dishes up the story in much the same way as every former writer has done. The legend, for example, of the loss of some thousands of Russians in the lakes of Satschan and Mönitz is one which was kept alive for a great many years, and which, owing to the picturesque inventions of Marbot and Ségur, is familiar to everybody. Colonel Lloyd repeats the oft-told tale with an air of assurance which is quite delightful.

Many were drowned [he writes] in trying to cross the thin ice of the lakes. It is uncertain how large a deduction should be made from the 20,000 of the Thirtieth Bulletin, or even from the 2000 of Thiers; but, at all events, 30 guns were afterwards recovered from Lake Satschan.

As a fact, when the lake was drained, a few days after the battle of Austerlitz, there were found twenty-eight or thirty guns, one hundred and fifty corpses of horses, but only two (some say three) human bodies. Dr. Holland Rose contributed an article on this fable to The English Historical Review about four years ago, and it was re-published in his "Napoleonic Studies"; but Colonel Lloyd is content to go his own way and to allow the lakes of Telnitz to go on playing the same part as did the "snows of an exceptionally early winter and the flames of Moscow" in the Napoleonic version of the campaign of 1812. Colonel Lloyd, however, is a far better historian than Professor Oman: the former writes at any rate with a soldier's insight into military affairs and with a sense of proportion; the latter reminds us more of a certain old Irish guide on the field of Waterloo than of a Chichele Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. Mr. Oman writes on the Peninsular War and on the Hundred Days, subjects which might have been treated with skill and knowledge by Mr. Fortescue and Monsieur Henry Houssaye if the editors had sought nothing but the best. Whether those writers were approached or not does not matter now. M. Houssaye and other writers have told us all about the Waterloo campaign, and we can look forward with confidence to Mr. Fortescue's treatment of the Peninsular War in his new volume of the History of the Army. Mr. Oman has a trick of irritating his readers by stating a fact and not the cause, assuming that his statement is all that will be required by the student, and it is in this respect that his work is unprofessional. His remarks on the late arrival of Ziethen's corps at Waterloo are a good example of this, while his account of Wellington's advance on La Belle Alliance shows so little mastery of the importance of the movement that it reads more like the end of a hurriedly written answer in an examination than anything else. These are, unfortunately, not the only respects in which the history falls short of being perfect. Instead of Captain Mahan or Mr. J. R. Thursfield we have Mr. H. W. Wilson writing on the naval history of the period, and not even after his amusing contributions to the story now appearing in a half-penny paper can it be affirmed that Mr. Wilson is to be considered very seriously as a historian. So complicated a subject as that of Napoleon demands treatment by the very best of writers, if only because it has already so enormous a literature; and now that military history forms a special branch of study at the Universities, the military operations should be treated with the greatest care. One of the best chapters in the book is that by Monsieur Pariset on "France under the Empire, 1804-1814," but even that is typical of the whole volume. The chapter contains much that is very interesting but rather superfluous, and very little about Napoleon's armies and their organisation. Yet the subject, we should imagine, must be grasped if there is to be any proper understanding of that wonderful series of wars. Nor is there any excuse for its partial neglect, since M. Jean Morvan's masterly study of Le soldat impérial was published quite recently and is obviously known to Monsieur Pariset.

Mr. H. A. L. Fisher is one of the chief contributors to the volume, and his work is uniformly good: his chapter on the Codes in particular is a clear exposition of an intricate subject. Even if we should prefer that Lord Rosebery had written the last chapter, entitled "St. Helena," we can offer no criticism against Mr. Fisher's account of the last phase. Mr. Fisher is especially good in his short final essay on Napoleon's significance in history and his legacy to France. His account, too, of the last scene comes as a recompense to the reader who has found much to which to object in this long volume.

The last faint sounds [he writes] caught from his lips as he expired on May 5, 1821, are said to have been, France, armée, tête d'armée, Joséphine; and so in the midst of the great hurricane he passed out of life, charging at the head of his ghostly legions. De Tocqueville has written his epitaph—"He was as great as a man can be without virtue."

THE GREEK OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

A Grammar of New Testament Greek. By JAMES HOPE MOULTON, M.A., D.Litt. Vol. i. Prolegomena. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 8s. net.)

Johannine Grammar. By EDWIN A. ABBOTT. (A. & C. Black, 10s. 6d. net.)

FROM many points of view Greek stands alone in the languages of the world alike in its character and in its history without a parallel. It gives, as none other, "a soul to objects of sense and a body to the abstractions of philosophy." It is, as none other, to use the words of H. Nelson Coleridge, "as universal as our race, and as individual as ourselves." Again, the language of ancient Greek changed with changing times, but never perished; it was originally broken up into dialects, and attained its full perfection in the Attic, the dialects perishing but not the language, which became Hellenistic or Common. "As great poetry by virtue of its own vitality remains a living and a quickening force to successive generations," to apply the recent words of the present Oxford Professor of Poetry, Mr. Mackail, so the greatest and most beautiful of all languages has survived all the forces of destruction wielded for its annihilation by the conquerors of Greece. The modern Greek requires no translation of either Homer or the Greek Testament, for he can read and enjoy both. The fact is that there is a greater difference between the English language of the present day and the language of Chaucer than between the modern and the ancient Greek. The recent discoveries of the papyrus documents and inscriptions, writes Dr. Moulton:

show with startling clearness that we have at last before us the language in which the apostles and evangelists wrote. The papyri exhibit in their writers a variety of literary education even wider than that observable in the N.T., and we can match each sacred author with documents that in respect of Greek stand on about the same plane. The conclusion is that "Biblical" Greek, except where it is translation Greek, was simply the vernacular of daily life. Men who aspired to literary fame wrote in an artificial dialect, a would-be revival of the language of Athens in her prime, much as educated Greeks of the present day profess to do. The N.T. writers had little idea that they were writing literature. The Holy Ghost spoke absolutely in the language of the people, as we might surely have expected He would.

We may add that in more than one sense the Vox populi est Vox Dei. In the history of Common Greek as told by Dr. Moulton the author has more than utilised the learned labours of Bloss and others. The Greek text adopted is that of Hort and Westcott. The work is a most valuable contribution, and in some cases an illuminating commentary on the mind and purpose of the sacred writer, and we still look forward with eager interest to the grammar of which the Prolegomena is the herald.

The term "Johannine Grammar" scarcely does justice to the prominent merits and distinctive aim of Dr. Abbott's valuable and scholarly work, which brings out more adequately than any existing commentary on St. John's Gospel the meaning of St. John as derived from a correct interpretation of the peculiar language and grammatical form used by the evangelist, so remarkable for creating ambiguities very difficult of explanation. To a very great extent Dr. Abbott here does for the language of St. John's Gospel, what he did for the language of Shakespeare: to quote his own words, he assumed that Shakespeare wrote, with a style of his own, in English that he read and spoke. Hence North's Plutarch, Florio's Montaigne, the Elizabethan dramatists—and especially his own works compared with one another—were treated as safer guides to his meaning than Milton, Dryden, and Pope. A similar assumption is made in the Johannine Grammar. The Johannine language in general has been carefully classified with a view to the elucidation of particular passages; and the LXX, the Synoptists, the New Testament as a whole, Epictetus, and the Papyri of 50-150 A.D. have been recognised as safer guides than writers of the third century and far safer than those of the fourth. This assumption is even truer about John than about Shakespeare, to whom was given, in some measure, the very rare privilege of anticipating, or shaping, the language of posterity.

In this connection it may be noted that, as in Dr. Abbott's work on the "Grammar of Shakespeare," he "assumed" the dramatist's pre-eminence as "a great poet," so he here states his conviction, founded on "grammatical inferences," that St. John was also "a master of style and phrase, as well as an inspired prophet." In support of such an inference the work from beginning to end bears continuous and conclusive testimony. This, too, is its main drift and its special characteristic. The plan here adopted is that of discussing critically the evangelist's use of the various parts of speech, beginning with the Greek article. It is in his treatment chiefly of the Greek article, adjective, and verb, that the critic's power of illuminating the obscurity and bringing out the full force and beauty of many passages of the highest interest is most apparent. Take for instance the reduplication of the article with the adjective, especially in the utterances of Our Lord or in weighty sayings about Him, as in "I am the Vine, the true Vine" (John xv. 1)—"ἡ ἀμπελος ἡ ἀληθινή." Here, as in many cases, the Greek adjective is made emphatic by the reduplication of the article (one before the noun, and one after the noun), which reminds us of the formula for the emphatic adjective common in Shakespeare and in other poets, as in his "farewell, a long farewell," "a frost, a killing frost," where the adjective is made emphatic by being placed between the repeated words it qualifies. In his treatment of the verbs, one of the most remarkable is that of the verb ἐκρύβη (St. John viii. 57 and elsewhere), which is twice rendered as a middle voice in the Revised and Authorised Versions, "hid himself." Against this Dr. Abbott urges the usage of New Testament Greek, which requires the passive "was hidden," and also Origen's answer to Celsus, who charged Jesus with cowardice for hiding himself.

If [writes Dr. Abbott] Chrysostom is right in calling Christ's "conveying himself away" (from the pool of Bethesda) an act of "hiding," then there are three such acts in John, each followed by an expression of unbelief or hostility on the part of the Jews, or by some evangelistic statement about unbelief: (1) "He conveyed himself away," (2) "He was hidden and went out of the Temple," (3) "He went away and was hidden from them." The last seems intended as a climax, implying the final departure of the Light so that it was "hidden from" the Jews.

Again, the verb κλίνω wrongly rendered (St. John xx.): "bowed" (the head) said of Jesus is here rightly rendered "laid his head to rest." This is in accordance with the force of κλίνω (a couch, or bed), a place of repose, and in harmony with Hellenistic usage, and is supported by Origen: "inclinasse caput super gremium patris," and with St. John's expression of Christ as "being in the bosom of the Father." The chapter Dr. Abbott devotes to the Repetitions so characteristic of St. John, goes far to confirm Bishop Westcott's theory of "the witness to Christ in the Fourth Gospel as of a sevenfold character." This is analogous to the more frequent recurrence of the number seven in the Book of the Revelation than in any other part of the Greek Testament. In conclusion, we gather that three most instructive lessons may be learned from a close perusal of this most learned treatise. (1) That a careful study of a writer's style, so characteristic of this work, as in the repeated use of certain words and phrases, is a most useful key to the mind of the author and to the meaning of his words, and often reveals delicate shades of meaning which would be lost without such a key. Further, it shows that inspiration does not obliterate personal character, and each inspired writer delivers his divine message in a manner natural to himself. (2) These pages point out in many cases the fact that the textual readings adopted by the Revisers admit of considerable doubt and discussion, and hence appears the necessity of a new and careful recension of the Greek text. (3) Last, that, even where the textual readings are generally accepted, our increased knowledge of Hellenistic Greek within the last thirty years makes it imperative to revise the renderings of the Authorised Version and the Revised Version in accordance with our more adequate present knowledge.

T. H. L. LEARY.

UNFORTUNATE MISS BEAUCHAMP

The Dissociation of a Personality. By MORTON PRINCE, M.D. (Longmans, 10s. 6d. net.)

Dr. Prince's "biographical study in abnormal psychology" reminds us, in the topic treated, of M. Flournoy's book on "Hélène Smith," named "From India to the planet Mars." Both savants have studied extremely eccentric women, who seemed each to contain two or more personalities in one body of flesh. But Hélène Smith was amusing in her secondary state—she unfolded romances about life in Mars and about her previous existences as an Arab princess in India and as somebody else at the Court of Louis XVI. She wrote in the Martian language, and had a few scraps of more or less Sanskritish nature. Her subliminal self knew things in an odd way, and if she never did any feat quite supernormal, still, she came pretty near doing so. The amateur in abnormal psychology found Hélène interesting.

Dr. Prince's Miss Beauchamp the amateur of abnormal psychology finds distressingly dull. She may be interesting to members of the medical profession, just as a gumboil may have meritorious points. But Miss Beauchamp's oddities (she has several distinct personalities) are far from gay. None of them soars through space and time on the pinion that the Theban eagle bears, and that wafts Hélène Smith. Miss Beauchamp's various personalities are all irredeemably suburban, even the freshest of them is a bourgeoise mint. The supernormal is quite out of their line. Miss Beauchamp, a sensitive but blameless person normally, suddenly finds herself, and other people find her, somebody else, B 1, B 2, or B 3, but all the three of them differ chiefly because they are tiresome in different ways. Miss B. herself was a somnambulistic child, and subject to hallucinations, but we do not gather that these hallucinations were "veridical." She was not even second-sighted. She was only hysterical, and not one of les hystériques qui mènent le monde. She was hypnotised, for the good of her health, and we are sorry, for she seems to have been her normal self before she was hypnotised; later her name, if not exactly Legion, is B, B 1, B 2, B 3. The various B's, as far as they recognise each other's existence, are not on very friendly terms. They have different tastes, different health, and dress their hair differently. Would it not have been better for the genuine B. if she had never been hypnotised?

Dr. Prince applies his observations of the B. hallucinations to "the visions and voices of historical" (not hysterical) personages, and infers that these "hallucinations were sensory automatisms generated by their own thoughts, conscious or unconscious." That is a good old orthodox view of the case; but take the instance of Jeanne d'Arc, or of Socrates, both were persons of extraordinary health, mental and moral, and of surpassing strength and vigour. They were not "neurasthenic" females, nor had they ever been hypnotised by a medical man, or by any other person, like Miss B. Miss B.'s personality called Sally could cause hallucinations in the other personalities, just in proportion to the morbidity of the subject. When Miss B. was quite her normal self, Sally could not hallucinate her at all (p. 512).

But Socrates and the Maid were usually in the prime of health, and when wounds or bad treatment in prison made Jeanne ill, we hear nothing of her visions and voices then. Moreover, the historical evidence for the veridical character of Jeanne's visions and voices, in several cases, is as good as the historical evidence for her victories and her martyrdom. It is Monsieur Quicherat who says so, a deeply learned palæographer and historian, and not un croyant, in the Catholic sense. He had the courage to speak out on this matter. How the silly visions of the morbid hypnotised Miss B. can give us a line to the veridical visions of Jeanne, a girl who did the military work of two strong knights, as the Duc d'Alençon bore witness, one is unable to understand.

Miss B. was herself again, such as herself is, at the period when the book was finished. Let us hope that she may never be divided against herself any more. It is not easy for the amateur to estimate the value of this work to the members of the healing profession, but every one must recognise that it is most conscientiously done. Dr. Prince promises another volume on the philosophy of the subject; on hysteria, hallucinations and other freaks of human faculty.

RETROSPECTIVE RAMBLERS

More Famous Houses of Bath and District. By J. F. MEEHAN. (Bath: B. & J. F. Meehan, 12s. 6d. net.)

Literary Rambles in the West of England. By ARTHUR L. SALMON. (Chatto & Windus, 6s. net.)

ODYSSEUS was an ideal traveller. "Many were the men," says Homer, "whose towns he saw and whose mind he learnt." Odysseus could no more have spent all his days in Ithaca than could Mr. Pickwick have been satisfied "to gaze on Goswell Street for ever." These great men journeyed as observers of character and manners; and perhaps the traveller of to-day can have no sounder motive for his wanderings. Exploration and adventure are to some minds a more tempting lure, of course, and most people pack their trunks in quest of mere diversion. Other travellers there are whom for lack of a fitter appellation we may term retrospective rambles. The dog-roses and honeysuckle of a June landscape, children playing about cottage doors, a long white road edged with the vivid blue of succory—these things move them less than the thought of the famous persons who trod of old the paths they are treading now. They "hear a voice" we "cannot hear," and it is more to them than the notes of lark or nightingale. In cities their converse is with shadowy wayfarers, whom the workaday world forgets: and in some cases notable books have emanated from this communion with the silent voices.

The retrospective Rambler cannot and doubtless does not expect a public so large as that which hungers for records of sports and peril at the Equator or highly coloured descriptions of Japan as she will be to-morrow; yet he has his public, a patient, childlike public (to say truth), if not a very extensive one. Only five hundred copies of Mr. Meehan's book were printed, and all have been subscribed. This is a tribute to his earlier work on the same subject. Of Mr. Salmon's papers the first half-dozen have already appeared in the Western Morning News. The two books have more in common than would at first appear. Mr. Meehan's title would lead us to expect a large amount of architectural and historical detail, such as is found in "Jones' Views" (published at the Temple of the Muses, Finsbury Square, 1829) and similar volumes descriptive of "the seats, mansions, castles, etc., of noblemen and gentlemen" in the United Kingdom. The chief interest of works of this class lies in their illustrations—those of Jones are excellent—the text having an esoteric claim on the noblemen and gentlemen in question and their families. In the main, as when discoursing of King's Weston, Farleigh Castle, Lacock Abbey, and so on, Mr. Meehan shows himself to be of the school of Jones, yet with a difference: his text is more voluminous, his illustrations less frequent and less satisfying. But, whether because the supply of famous houses ran short, or from whatever cause, he goes far, elsewhere, to suggest that his title is a misnomer. Thus, in three sections devoted to the career of John Arthur Roebuck, "a Bath politician," it is difficult to regard 10 Gay Street, 29 Circus and 1 Queen Square, as famous houses because Mr. Roebuck's inevitable aunt resided in the first, his future wife in the second, and he himself was a lodger in the third. That there is no evidence to prove that Major André lived at 22 Circus, in spite of the statement of a misleading mural tablet, Mr. Meehan himself admits, yet goes on to narrate at considerable length André's familiar and melancholy history. The tragic death of an Earl and Countess of Sutherland in Bath "lodgings" (address not given) is made an excuse for a lengthy account of the Sutherland family, together with some superfluous remarks on the qualities of its present representatives. General Wolfe certainly used to visit Bath, but the fact hardly seems to call for a full description of his career, not omitting the famous death-scene which all of us have known since we were short-coated. However, if Mr. Meehan's subscribers do not object, no one is the worse; but we question whether all of them will suffer gladly such a phrase as "the giddy throng of fashionables then at Bath"; and "Attendance was given to the Rooms" (to Mrs. Sherwood) is a cryptic saying. The pleasantest and least hackneyed thing in the book is the paper on Southey's schooldays at Corston Manor Farm, a sort of Dotheboys Hall.

When writing about Southey, Mr. Meehan shows his kinship with Mr. Salmon, who does not give us any Bath stories (Mr. Meehan tells us all about Mr. Pickwick's card-party at the rooms), but has a good deal to say about literary Bristol. With no other illustration than a rather ordinary photograph of Tintagel for frontispiece, Mr. Salmon's book must stand or fall by its text. Mr. Salmon cannot, any more than Mr. Meehan, be acquitted of dragging in extraneous topics by the head and shoulders. The poet Gay was born in or near Barnstaple. Well: but he left it in boyhood, and his one or two bare allusions to the West Country scarcely justify the inclusion of a sketch of his career in a book of western rambles. "George Borrow in Cornwall" sounds promising, but there is scant performance. Borrow, at the age of fifty, made a walking tour in the Duchy, and left some notes of his journey which "enable us to realise," says Mr. Salmon, "how delightful the issue might have been if he had produced the book on Cornwall, which he certainly contemplated." The notes, however, appear to furnish little more than a bare itinerary. To write of Herrick at Dean Prior is to attempt to succeed where the Israelitish brickmakers failed. Herrick tells us something in his verses, the rest is conjecture. He abused Devon and its people, yet he lived in the county thirty years. What is the explanation? Alas! Mr. Salmon can only offer us the stones of surmises, and we arise from his article tantalised, with empty bellies. One of Mr. Salmon's studies is to be highly praised, and that is his paper on R. S. Hawker. Hawker's miseries and consolations are portrayed with sympathy and tenderness. But in "With Coleridge and Tennyson at Clevedon," and still more in the chapter on Quantocks, Mr. Salmon does not rise to the height of the occasion. Commonplace writing on such subjects is unendurable. We turn with relief to Cottle's record of the day he spent with Coleridge and Wordsworth at Allfoxden. In Mr. Salmon's book are certain repetitions which point to haste, and he might easily have avoided such very ugly expressions as "to come out on top" and "destined to become a Laker." He who writes about the poets should pitch his style higher than this. We bear no ill-will to the retrospective Rambler: on the contrary, we stand indebted to earlier masters in this vein for much pure pleasure. But we have regretfully to assert that its latest exponents have in these excursions disappointed our hopes. Their books should have been much better than they are.

A PEOPLE AT SCHOOL

A People at School. By H. FIELDING HALL. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

WHEN Mr. Fielding Hall first penetrated to the teak forests of Upper Burma and settled at Ningyan, King Thibaw was on the throne. That was only some twenty years ago. There were no roads, only tracks. Each village was self-contained and self-governed: there was no aristocracy of any sort, no ruling class, no endowed church. "They had the omniscience and arrogance of a boy who hardly believes any world can exist outside his garden wall; who thinks he is the receptacle of all knowledge and has no fear, because he does not know what numerous things there are to be afraid of outside. . . . They were as children who had not yet been to school." Now there are railways, and steamboats and the telegraph. But no Burmese King rules at Mandalay: good or bad, his kingdom has passed away: and Burma has become a province of the British Empire. Civilisation has quietly advanced upon them, and the people who have lived for hundreds of years secluded in their great valleys, happy, careless, free as children in the nursery, have been put to school under our Civil servants, who have themselves just left a University. The changes that have taken place since the annexation in 1885 have been, as may be imagined, enormous: and at first sight appear more extensive and deeper than is actually the case. Perhaps there is nothing more interesting than this test of modern civilisation which is given when civilisation at its best comes into sudden contact with a nation that has existed for centuries in oblivion of its methods—to see the effect of new ideas, to note exactly how fundamental the changes are: whether the people become more prosperous and happier and better; and to watch the civilised, too, under the new light that is cast upon them. For in no other way is the essential in man brought out so clearly, and thrown into such prominent relief. The strong wind blows away the chaff of mere convention and habit, however thickly it may lie; and there remain the few grains which are important and valuable. Then we discover, with something of surprise may be, how small in reality is the difference between the civilised and the uncivilised, and how that difference is not wholly to our advantage.

It is with such questions as these that Mr. Fielding Hall deals. And no one could be better qualified to deal with them than he. How intimate is his knowledge of Burmese customs and how actual is his sympathy with Burmese thought, every one knows well who has read that very fascinating book "The Soul of a People." The present volume has the same wisdom and charm; but the matter is treated from another point of view: in some ways perhaps a less attractive point of view, as it is a more material one. But there is the same splendid lack of narrowness and officialdom, although he shows the organisation of the present government in all its minute workings. His knowledge of that great machine is as intimate as his knowledge of the material upon which it is at work. He writes, moreover, without prejudice; and he is master of a style which is as clear as it is graceful. He gives a vivid picture of Burma before the annexation: of the desultory guerilla war that followed: of the slow settling down of the people, and of the gradual spread of civilisation. And though he himself is a pawn in the movement, he is able to rise and survey the whole position and see what the new power has touched and what it has improved; what it can never touch and what its touch has bruised.

A LOST PICTURE

[I dreamed one night that the lost paintings of Wu Taotze, the greatest of Chinese masters, were unrolled before me. On waking, I could remember none distinctly except one, of which these lines are a transcript.]

I saw a Goddess in the evening step
Between two mountain-pillars, tall as they;
There she stood pausing on one foot advanced,
With head inclined: and a slow weight of hair,
In hue like distant pine-forests, unrolled
Over her shoulder, down one side: her hands,
Still stretched out to the tops of either hill,
Seemed touching yet relinquishing their touch,
As she gazed downward; at her feet a smoke
Rose, amid blue woods, from the roofs of men.
The heights of evening trembled with new stars:
And in her eyes were stars, but not like those
In heaven, that see not: these were thoughts that shone
Kindled by what they looked on: in deep hearts
The hiding terrors, the unwhispered hopes,
The suffering of infinities confined,
Breathed in the pale mist up from homes, all peace
In growing dimness, while that Tenderness
Inclined above them, whose immortal eyes
Held what had been, were she a mortal, tears.

LAURENCE BINYON.

THE LATE FATHER GENERAL OF THE JESUITS

A REMINISCENCE

FATHER LUIS MARTIN during life was constrained to keep as much in the background as any of his predecessors. This was the inevitable result of the fault-finding, intolerant tone of too many continental journalists on the subject of the Jesuits. Now that he is gone, it will not be an annoyance or an unkindly act for a friend to describe in a few words the character of one whose fate it has been during life to excite much curiosity and to remain almost unknown.

It was my good fortune to see a good deal of him ten years ago. One noticed, of course, at once, the characteristics of a Spaniard, the swarthy complexion, the black hair and large, dark, quick-glancing eyes, the facile dignity of bearing, the ready, suave and well-turned speech, and the warm heart which soon declared itself for the side it took, even in conversation. These qualities were common to many of his race, and, before we come to what was distinctive, a few words about his life-story will be in place.

He was born in the little town of Malagar de Fermental in 1846 of parents belonging to the middle class, who sent him when he was nine to the petit séminaire at Burgos. On the completion of his college course he felt a strong attraction to the Society of Jesus. His father, who had other plans, at first refused his consent, but granted it when the seriousness of the call became unmistakable, and at the age of eighteen he began his Jesuit training at Loyola, the family castle of St. Ignatius, in which the founder first heard and followed a Jesuit's vocation.

Of the long training prescribed by the Order nothing more need be said here, except that he distinguished himself in the theological schools, and that the first office entrusted to him was the chair of Lecturer in Theology. He was then put at the head of the house, though only thirty-three years of age, and he afterwards presided over the Jesuit college at Salamanca. After a year or two at Bilbao employed in preaching and other works of the active ministry, he became Provincial in 1886. In 1892 the General, Father Anderledy, fell ill, and on his death-bed named Martin as Vicar until a General should be elected. This took place in the October of the same year, when Martin was chosen for the post. Last year cancer attacked his right arm, and after much suffering, borne with heroic courage, he passed away during Easter week.

These leading events in his life correspond with the developments of his character. Bred to piety, it became the chief concern of his life. I have seen religious-minded men of many countries and creeds, but never one who brought to the cause more thoroughness of mind, heart and will, nor one who strove more consistently to see and to resolve in the light of prayer and according to the principles of Christian revelation. Bound though he was by his office to work double tides at correspondence and interviews, it was a marvel to see what hours he gave daily to meditation and the liturgical prayers and services of the church. And all this with the naturalness and facility of a man who has practised an art from childhood and is unconscious that there was anything beyond the ordinary in what had become to him so easy.

The next obvious characteristic was the ruling mind. It will have been noticed that he was put into command at the first opportunity and was left at the head of affairs until the end. And no wonder, for he was a born leader, strong, fearless, quickly decided, swift and resolute in execution. His force of character, refined by long intellectual training and enthusiasm for holiness, marked him as an ideal religious leader. Yet he was not a martinet, and I have heard his government contrasted favourably in this respect with that of his predecessor, whose Swiss descent and German training predisposed him to greater rigidity of discipline.

At times, of course, one heard him spoken of unfavourably. A man of his strength and utter unworldliness is sure to be occasionally styled brusque, or magisterial, or behind the age. But whatever truth there may sometimes have been in such criticisms, they did not endure. The frequency of his acts of kindness, the sense of his earnestness, the evidence of his lofty motives, inevitably caused minor complaints to lose their force, fade away and disappear.

Here I may mention some smaller matters, which, however, to English people at least, may not seem insignificant. Father Martin was the first General of the Society who spoke English fluently, and he taught himself the language amid the labours of his generalate. He was also the first General who visited England voluntarily. Father Rothaan, indeed, also did this, but during an enforced exile. Father Martin read and appreciated English newspapers.

The last point of character which I desire to note corresponds with his early training amid scenes historically important for his Order. He was fond of history, scientific history, to a degree which is rare everywhere, and especially in those countries where speculative science and literature attract so much attention as to withdraw interest from research. As my personal acquaintance with him was formed whilst I was studying under his auspices in the Vatican Archives, it was natural that his conversations with me should often turn on history, and I was surprised to find how firmly he held to true principles.

Not only did he see that history which shall endure must be written with a first-hand knowledge of original records, but he also perceived that history must be as uncontroversial as photography, and must portray good and bad indifferently, without encomium or excuse, save that which arises from a fair representation of the circumstances of the case. This he had learnt, not so much from his own historical studies, for which he had never had much opportunity, but in the course of giving aid to historians.

It was his ambition to see the history of his Order written fully and scientifically, but he knew that much preparation would be necessary. So he promoted archive-work, the publication of essays and studies on debated points and special periods, even though the theme was not integrally connected with Jesuit history. He encouraged me, for instance, to face the still but half-solved Mary Stuart problem. Many such investigations, he knew, would be necessary before the ground would be clear for the Jesuit historian to tell his own story without endless digressions. But these inquiries would take years, and he used to tell me that he feared he should never see the first volume of the history he desired. Father Astrain's volume on the Society in Spain, however, he did see, and Father Hughes's History of the American Jesuits is going through the press, while as for historical materials I need but mention the names of Fathers Duhr and Braunsberger, Mercier and Tacchi Venturi, and the title of the great series "Monumenta Societatis Jesu Historica," to remind those interested in the subject how much has been achieved, and how much is in progress.

Father Martin's patronage of history and literature should prove a valid title to esteem and recollection with the world at large. The Jesuits, houseless and scattered in France, not even yet able to return freely to Germany, and threatened in many other countries, may well mourn a leader so constant and so high-minded. But for himself, I feel sure that no man, fully conscious of all he was doing, ever steered his bark across the bar with a more steadfast hand.

J. H. POLLEN, S.J.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

AN AUSTRALIAN VERSE-WRITER—
VICTOR DALEY

THERE died in Australia, at the end of last year, Victor James Daley, a writer of verse who had become prominent in the young literature of his adopted country. Daley furnishes an interesting illustration of the literary characteristics of the Celt, as described by Mr. Havelock Ellis in February's Contemporary Review. Born near Armagh, Ireland, in 1858, of an Irish father and a Scottish mother, he could trace descent from an ancient sept of bards, the O'Dalys, whose motto was "Laudes cano heroïum." He journeyed to Australia when he was twenty, and for the remainder of his days was occupied chiefly in writing verses contributed to the Australian Press, and in particular to The Bulletin of Sydney. The precarious livelihood thus earned was sufficient for a volatile, improvident Irishman without capacity for persistent labour; and during twenty years scarcely a week passed without the appearance of some new example of his facile talent. Daley wrote rhyme as easily as most people write prose—wrote fancifully or tenderly, humorously or satirically; and his name and work are familiar to every reader in Australasia. His death at a comparatively early age was an occasion of general regret.

A single book, "At Dawn and Dusk," published in 1898, does not adequately represent Daley's liberal gift; but in that book, as elsewhere, he shows reason for varying slightly Mr. Ellis's definition of Celtic characteristics in literature. "In the first place," said the critic, "always there is presented to us the remote as remote. . . . In the second place the Celtic poet's method is always decorative." It is suggested that instead of declaring that the Celtic style is both "remote" and decorative, it would be better to say that there are two orders of Celtic style, the "remote" and the decorative—the former rare, and merging (sometimes in the same person: e.g., Keats) into the latter, which is common. Victor Daley, despite his Lowland Scottish tincture, was a writer typically Celtic in the decorative style: literally speaking, "whatever he touched he adorned." But his style was not in the least "remote": he had no "glamour": never wrote as if he were walking in the kingdom of a half-forgotten dream. His mind was a camera obscura in a world sunlit, and his art was to picture his reflected vision in splendid verbiage.

Her eyes are black as midnight,
Yet in their depths doth dwell
A light like starlight shining
Within a holy well.

Her lips are like pomegranates,
That in the summer glow,
Outside the latticed windows
Of the seraglio.

Her breasts are golden goblets,
So pure, and chaste, and fine;
Two cups like moons of splendour,
And full of royal wine.

Her brow is like a banner,
That leads a royal line;
Her hair is like the darkness
In branches of the pine.

Her slender limbs are lilies,
Slow swaying in the stream,
Her feet in scarlet slippers
Like pearls in rose-leaves gleam.

It is verbal embroidery rather than poetry: as Mr. Ellis also has pointed out, the effect produced by such work is that of sumptuous tapestry.

In literary character and capacity, Daley was very like Tom Moore—to whom, by the way, Mr. Ellis surely is wrong in ascribing "remoteness" in the Celtic sense. Moore "looked into his mind and wrote," instead of looking at reality; but this is a practice not uncommon among writers of all races. Many a student of literature can visualise from words a stronger image than he gains from actual seeing. Indeed, literary students often walk blindly among facts, and their eyes are opened only when an artist, such as the late Stephen Crane, tells his vivid vision in printed words. Doubtless Moore relied greatly upon impressions thus received at secondhand; but the "remote" impressions of the Celt are different. We comprehend that Moore is describing the procession of images in a mental mirror, rather than writing of things directly seen; but his art never leads us into those twilight and other-worldly regions that are the Celt's peculiar domain. He has no mystery. His world is romantic, or passionate, or sorrowful; but it is always the world we know, however exalted by the power of fancy. Wherever we journey we recognise our familiar space of three dimensions. But the really "remote" Celt dwells in the Fourth Dimension, in a land set awry to common notions, a land of neither night nor day, where always a green light glimmers through dark and endless woods, and shadows flit to and fro without a sound. Whoever has breathed that enchanted air with "La Belle Dame sans Merci," will look for it in vain with Thomas Moore.

Victor Daley had so many of the qualities of Moore that one could cite his verses in support of nearly all that Mr. Stephen Gwynn has written of the latter poet. Possibly there is a greater weight of thought in Daley's work, with occasionally a tinge of bitterness. He wrote these lines on "London":

Sad, sad is she, and yearns for mirth :
With voice of golden guile
She lures men from the ends of earth
To make her smile.

The student of wild human ways
In wild new lands ; the sage
With new great thoughts ; the bard whose lays Bring youth to age ;

The painter young whose pictures shine
With colours magical,
The singer with the voice divine—
She lures them all.

But all their new is old to her
Who bore the Anakim ;
She gives them gold or Charon's fare
As suits her whim . . .

She sits beside the ship-choked Thames,
With Sphinx-like lips apart—
Mistress of many diadems—
Death in her heart !

He pictures a musing God surveying the world, and declaring at length his weariness with Man whom he has made. Then,

With all its glories ripe
The Earth passed, like a spark
Blown from a sailor's pipe
Into the hollow dark.

His mind was not absorbed by the Irish land he had left, but he regarded it fondly and sadly :

. . . O, the Hawthorn is a Queen,
And the daughter of a King,
And amidst her branches green
The sweet brown thrushes sing . . .

O, the Hawthorn is a Queen,
And the daughter of a King,
And amidst her branches green
The thrushes sadly sing . . .

O, the Hawthorn is a Queen,
And a Lady fair and grand,
And the thrushes sing the keen
Of the Dead—in Ireland.

The theme of Daley's verse is often thus sorrowful : "he painted his dream of joy upon a canvas of regret." Never precisely lyric, when he wrote tersely and spontaneously, he could reach something that is almost a lyric effect :

We bought a volume of Anacreon
Defaced, mishandled, little to admire,
And yet its rusty clasps kept guard upon
The sweetest songs, the songs of young desire,
Like that high song once sung by Solomon.

My sweetheart's cheeks were peonies on fire ;
We saw by the bright message of his eyes
That Eros served us in bookseller's guise . . .
I turn the faded leaves, but She is gone :
Ah, for the poetry in Paradise !

There's Honey still and Roses on the earth,
And lips to cling, and jugs to drain with mirth ;
And lovers walk in bliss ; but She is gone . . .
Anacreon ! Anacreon !

He was master of dexterous epithets :

This homely, gracious, green, familiar Earth . . .

Often he revised old images beautifully :

Your heart is trembling, like a dove
New-caught, within your breast—as though,
With struggling pinions, rosy Love
Were prisoned in a drift of snow.

Occasionally Daley's work is touched with grave emotion, as in these lines for a dead child :

There is some pleasant shore—
Far from His Heaven of Pride,
Where those strong souls who bore
His Cross in bliss abide—

Some place where feeble things,
For Life's long war too weak,
Young birds with unfledged wings,
Buds nipped by storm-winds bleak,

Young lambs left all forlorn
Beneath a bitter sky,
Meek souls to sorrow born,
Find refuge when they die . . .

Child Jesus walketh there
Amidst child-angel bands,
With smiling lips, and fair
White roses in His hands.

I kiss thee on the brow,
I kiss thee on the eyes—
Farewell ! Thy home is now
The Children's Paradise.

Daley wrote ironic verse too, after the manner of Heine, and many verses with a gaiety like Thackeray's. He wants the "personal weight," the deep passion, that belong to great poets ; but he wrote so much that is brightly or tenderly fanciful, so much that is richly phrased, that in Australia he is cherished high among the minor singers.
His talent was displayed typically in those longer pieces where he narrates or meditates, and in stanza after stanza showers pictorial epithets and allusions profusely. The following are from "A Sunset Fantasy" :

So, hand in hand, we watch the sun
Burn down the Western deeps,
Dreaming a charmed dream, as one
Who in enchantment sleeps ;

A dream of how we twain some day,
Careless of map or chart,
Will both take ship and sail away
Into the sunset's heart.

Our ship shall be of sandal built,
Like ships in old-world tales,
Carven with cunning art, and gilt,
And winged with scented sails

Of silver silk, whereon the red
Great gladioli burn,
A rainbow-flag at her masthead,
A rose-flag at her stern ;

And, perching on the point above
Wherefrom the pennon blows,
The figure of a flying dove,
And in her beak a rose.

And from the fading land the breeze
Shall bring us, blowing low,
Old odours and old memories,
And airs of long ago—

A melody that has no words
Of mortal speech a part,
Yet touching all the deepest chords
That tremble in the heart :

A scented song blown oversea,
As though from bowers of bloom
A wind-harp in a lilac-tree
Breathed music and perfume.

And we, no more with longings pale
Will smile to hear it blow ;
I in the shadow of the sail,
You in the sunset-glow.

For, with the fading land, our fond
Old fears shall all fade out,
Paled by the light from shores beyond
The dread of Death or Doubt.

And from a gloomy cloud above
When Death his shadow flings,
The Spirit of Immortal Love
Will shield us with his wings.

He is the lord of dreams divine,
And lures us with his smiles
Along the splendour opaline
Unto the Blessed Isles.

That is Daley in the characteristic manner which, adapted to a hundred similar dreams with scarcely less effect, Australians have learned to appreciate and in its measure to admire.

A. G. STEPHENS.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Bertrand de Born," by
M. H. H. Macartney.]

FICTION

The Flower of France. By JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY.
(Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

IN "The Flower of France" Mr. McCarthy writes a well-considered, stirring historical romance, and adds one more to the group of portraiture that bears the name of Joan of Arc. It is a convincing and dignified picture, and may be dwelt upon with sympathy and admiration. The story opens in Domrémy, and from that point conducts the "Maid" through triumph and failures to the stake in the market-square at Rouen. The author wisely keeps to the lines accepted by authority, conscious, probably, that no invention can heighten the wonder of the known facts of Joan's life, nor give to them an added touch of poetry, mystery, tragedy. He has, however, taken some little liberties, as was only to be expected. In addition to the voices, Joan is endowed with the gift of second sight, which brings in some striking scenes; and La Hire displays qualities and graces not accorded to him by tradition. A further touch of romance connects Joan with Catherine, the mistress of the "gentle Dauphin." The Maid's bargain with heaven—it comes to that—for the salvation of Catherine's soul raises a nice question of spiritual duty and sacrifice. Of course, the motive might appeal strongly to an exalted religious mind, but it is out of harmony with Joan's purpose and her singleness of aim. To her the cause of France was the cause of God. She could not be ignorant that she was the living standard, the rallying-point for a disheartened and distracted country, and that failure personified in herself would at least retard the success of her mission, divinely inspired as she believed it to be. We are grateful to the author for sparing us the attempt to tell the story in the language of the period; but in avoiding that mistake he need not have adopted common phrases and catch-words which came into use last year, and next year will be out of date.

The Count at Harvard. By RUPERT SARGENT HALL. (Boston: Page, $1.50.)

THE Count is a kind of American "Babe, B.A." That is to say, he is one of the "best men" at Harvard University and gaily leads what is known in parlance of the modern Babe (masquerading in the cap and gown of the undergraduate) as "the push." It is interesting to note the difference of custom and convention and to note, too, the golden thread of resemblance which is to be observed in das ewig bábliche, even as it is to be observed (we are told) in that far more variable quantity—das ewig weibliche. Mr. Hall relates the Count's doings with sufficient gusto and vividness to make the Count a living person; we see him playing tennis, playing golf, playing baseball (this game we found a little hard to follow); we are with him in the editorial den of the Lampoon; with him as he conducts the rehearsal of his opera; in the examination-room, where he behaves shamefully; at his late breakfasts and his early morning suppers—and his company is always or nearly always pleasant, for he is amusing and irresponsible. So, also, we remember, was the Babe, B.A. But the Count does not so wholeheartedly adopt the charming pose of tiredness. He is more vigorous. He is not obliged to take a bath well-filled with eau-de-Cologne after meeting an undesirable: he skirt-dances with a sail and not with a sheet. There lies the essential difference. He is what a spinster aunt would call more manly. . . . We recommend the book to the punters on the Cher, this summer term.

The Shadow of Life. By A. D. SEDGWICK. (Constable, 6s.)

ANY one who in reading Pater's wonderful portrait of Sebastian van Stork has felt within him something vibrate in answer not only to the perfect beauty of the writing, but to the strange aloofness of Sebastian from life, will read with pleasure and appreciation Miss Sedgwick's latest book. We do not mean to suggest any comparison in the matter of expression, though Miss Sedgwick writes with grace and distinction; but the character of Gavan in the "Shadow of Life" is akin, and extraordinarily akin, to that of Sebastian. "Surely! these transient affections marred the freedom, the truth, the beatific calm of the absolute selfishness which could not if it would pass beyond the circumference of itself; to which at times with a fantastic sense of well-being he was capable of a sort of fanatical devotion." That expresses the attitude of Gavan, or more truly, perhaps, the attitude which the book shows him struggling to attain, as he feels instinctively that on those lines only can his personality develop to its full height. The drama of the book lies in the fact that, though life is to Gavan an illusion, yet life calls to him unceasingly in the form of a woman, endowed with all the beauty of vitality; and chiefly for her sake he is forced to stifle the call of life. The book is deeply sad, but the thought in it is so strong and the treatment so sensitive that never for an instant does it sink into the slough of morbidness. The least faltering in grip, the least weakness in writing, and the book would have been a failure: a splendid failure, no doubt, but still a failure. There is no faltering, there is no weakness: the book is an achievement, and an achievement on a high and unusual plane. Such work fills one with deep respect. Caviare to the general, by the few it will be kept and read and re-read.

Women and Circumstance. By NETTA SYRETT. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

THIS volume of short stories we read with considerable interest and a tinge of disappointment, because nearly every story is well conceived and nearly every story should have been better executed. All are marred by a fatal fluency, which enabled the writer to express herself before her subject was deeply enough imagined to be expressed with point: in consequence there is a lack of grip and a lack of depth about the stories, and they do not hold the attention as they should. They meander and spread, like a stream in a waste of sand, and disappear. No channel is cut. The stories, like the men and women they present, are without stamina, and so they appear morbid and dismal, where they are meant to appear poignant and sad; and in the one story that bears the stamp of gladness the stamp is blurred to a smudge of unreality. The scheme of the story, "The Idealist," is excellent—to make a girl who is a dreamer realise how a part of life has passed her by; but the way in which it is worked out is so commonplace that we feel no thrill of sympathy for her envy of the servant-girl whom she sees kissed by a lover. Rather are we irritated by the weak and false sentiment into which the story is allowed to peter out. "Borderland," the first and longest story in the book, is in our opinion the best, though more ought certainly to have been made out of the man who had the power of reading the thoughts of others. When Miss Syrett escapes from the snare of her fluency and sees the true nature of bitterness (that cheapest of life's commodities) her work will gain incomparably in value: at present it is spoiled by that fluency of execution and that streak of bitterness in her point of view—faults which in their own sphere are more akin than would at first sight appear to be the case.

The Story and Song of Black Roderick. By DORA SIGERSON. (Moring, 3s. 6d. net.)

A VERY charming and quaint little book is this of Mrs. Clement Shorter's; a romance told in prose and verse. In the first part we are on earth, watching the Little Bride pine away and die because her grim lord loves her not; in the second we are in heaven or hell or the space between, waiting on the devotion of the Little Bride, whose soul by self-sacrifice saves that of the Black Earl. The whole story is mediæval in tone, very daintily told, and full of tender grace.

FINE ART

THE ROYAL ACADEMY—I

THAT the two paintings likely to provoke most discussion at this year's Academy should each be the work of an American artist can give but moderate satisfaction to well-wishers of native talent. The place of honour on the west wall of Gallery III. is allotted to Mr. Abbey's Columbus in the New World, but doubtless many will consider that its position should have been given to Mr. Sargent's portrait group of four Baltimore professors, unquestionably the most successful painting of large size. The black gowns of these professors and the severe collegiate interior in which three are seated, present the painter with a sombre colour-scheme, which indirectly gives dignity to his composition and sobriety to his handling. The lighting is effective, and the whole work is well knit together in tone, but the grouping is too artificial to give complete satisfaction. Three professors are patently sitting for their portraits, while the fourth comes towards them, a little late for his appointment. Rembrandt and Hals, who have transparently inspired Mr. Sargent in this work, would have secured a homelier arrangement, and neither would have allowed the four sitters to concentrate their attention on the painter.

Far more natural, and thereby the more effective, is the grouping in Mr. James Sant's rendering of The first Lady Fellow (Mrs. Frank Crisp) being admitted to the Linnean Society, a painting which ably commemorates an interesting occasion with harmonious colour and graceful handling. The simple realism which is the merit of this group is not to be expected in Mr. Abbey's large decorative design, but the American painter might well have emulated the coherence of the Englishman. As a whole, Mr. Abbey's design suffers from the painter's hesitation between a decorative and a more realistic treatment. The figures, notwithstanding their stained glass attitudes, are treated with moderate realism; but the decorative accessories—including the shadows—are arbitrarily conventional, while a bewildering and confused effect is given to the whole by the flight overhead of a large number of flamingoes, whose colour is less suggestive of plumage than of pillar-boxes the worse for wear.

That England possesses many native artists capable of equalling or even excelling Mr. Abbey's essays in decorative painting cannot easily be ascertained at the Royal Academy. Mr. Frank Brangwyn, whose sumptuous panels for the International Exhibition at Venice now form part of the permanent decoration of the Leeds Art Gallery, is by no means adequately represented. His Venetian Funeral, which occupies the East wall of Gallery VIII., is decorative in arrangement, strongly drawn and richly painted, and its leaden hues may be suitable to the subject. But the cold heaviness of the colour-scheme chills and oppresses the spectator even while he recognises the quality and merits of the painting. In the same gallery, with due pomp of drapery, are exhibited by Royal Command two State portraits destined to be hung in the Canadian Houses of Parliament. We have rarely seen such tawdry presentments of Their Majesties except on the booths at a country fair.

More coherent than Mr. Abbey's and far more pleasing in colour is Mr. Frank Craig's smaller decorative painting, The Heretic, which has been bought by the Chantrey Trustees. The crowd of soldiery is well handled, and the bright reds which dominate the colour-scheme, if vivid, are less metallic than Mr. Abbey's. Essentially dramatic in conception, it just escapes coming within the province of melodrama, though the expression on the fair heretic's face is decidedly intense. As proving that the claims of younger decorative painters are not wholly ignored, it is worthy of note that the Chantrey Trustees have also acquired from the Old Water-colour Society Mr. R. Anning Bell's Garden of Sweet Sounds. Mr. Craig and Mr. Bell—whose The Archers shines among the Academy watercolours—are better endowed than many a painter represented in the Chantrey Collection. Nevertheless, it will be questioned whether the achievements of either strictly comply with the conditions laid down in Chantrey's testament. Of the two remaining painters favoured by the Trustees, Mr. David Farquharson, A.R.A., is already sufficiently represented at the Tate by his In a Fog; and his Birmam Wood, the merits of which are marred by its oil-cloth surface, shows no such advance on previous efforts as to warrant a second purchase. Mr. C. D. Leslie's The Deserted Mill is neither better nor worse than the similar landscapes he has exhibited at Burlington House for many years past, and, since he has been a full Academician for thirty years, this first recognition of his art by the Trustees is either too early or too late.

Few, indeed, are the insiders whose exhibits this year show any improvement on previous efforts. Almost the only exception is Mr. Clausen, who each year progresses to a truer realisation of sunlight illumining the earth. In The Green Fields and two other small pastorals Mr. Clausen treats Millet's subjects with Monet's truth to natural colour, and the expressive simplicity of his drawing, the unfailing balance of his composition, the beauty and truth of his colour and the creamy texture of his paint, unite to make these exhibits the most admirable contributions to the exhibition. The strongly painted, sunny, rustic scenes of Mr. La Thangue, and the harmonious low-toned pastorals of the new Associate, Mr. Edward Stott, stand out as thorough expressions of sincere feeling amid much that is conventional, commonplace and meretricious. But like Mr. East, Mr. Spenlove-Spenlove, and other artists to whom we referred in noticing the collection at the New Gallery, Mr. La Thangue and Mr. Stott merely repeat what they have said before.

Mr. Solomon's soundly painted portrait of Sir Aston Webb is an advance on his previous efforts in portraiture, but it would be folly to be too sanguine as to the permanence of this improvement, in view of his operatic rendering of St. George rescuing the prima-donna (295). Mr. George Henry more than atones for any disappointment given at the New Gallery by his delightful The Blue Gown, not only the best of numerous portraits of women at the Academy, but the most complete thing this gifted painter has accomplished of recent years. Of many portraits also hung in the third Gallery, few call for special commendation save the dignified and well-characterised head of Sir Francis Younghusband, which occupies the corner now habitually allotted to Mr. Orchardson. The Duchess of Northumberland is painted by the President in his usual careful but arid manner. The foreshortening of the right arm is unduly exaggerated, and the extreme minuteness with which accessories of costume and surroundings are depicted emphasises details till the sitter herself sinks into secondary importance. Mr. Sargent's Portrait of Maud, daughter of George Coats, Esq., painted with a simple directness which recalls Manet, is artistically far more pleasing than his presentation portrait of Lord Roberts, in which the truculent splendour of the uniform overshadows the individuality of the wearer. Mr. Harrington Mann's The Fairy Tale is delightful, not only for its rich harmonious colour but also for the natural and decorative grouping of the children, while Mr. W. W. Russell's The Jewel must be reckoned among the most distinctive works in the unusually attractive Gallery II. Here, in addition to Mr. Sant's Linnean picture and Mr. Clausen's landscape already mentioned, are a well-painted fantasy of night-gowned children wandering in The Land of Nod, by Mr. Charles Sim, Fritz Thaulow's Entrée du Chateau Royal à Copenhague painted with his usual power but with unusual discretion, and Mr. J. M. Swan's diploma picture, Tigers Drinking. Many will regret that Mr. Swan has chosen to be represented in the Diploma Gallery as a painter rather than as a sculptor, but this moderate-sized painting amply testifies to his ability as a draughtsman, while in colour and surface quality it represents the painter at his best.

To the sculpture, which contains no work of outstanding merit, and to the water-colours, of which the same may be said, reference must be made in a further article, but the Black and White Room deserves more immediate attention if only for the work of the two new Associate Engravers. Mr. Strang contents himself with sending two cleanly etched portraits, and the expressive simplicity of his line may be profitably compared with the tentative drawings of Mr. Seymour Lucas, while Mr. Frank Short's beautiful translation of Turner's A Yorkshire Dell is a welcome contrast to Mr. Pratt's rendering of H.M. Queen Alexandra; After Luke Fildes, R.A. Other works of merit in this room are Mr. Brangwyn's large etching, Santa Maria della Salute, Mr. Hyde's The Storm Cloud, Mr. Shepperson's delightfully suggestive drawings (1316, 1334), Mr. Hanslip Fletcher's austere wash-drawing of Wren's house in Billingsgate, and Mr. T. R. Way's poetical lithograph of London Bridge.

Among the less famous Academy exhibitors from whom, as usual, comes a very large proportion of the most pleasing work, a leading position must be assigned to Mr. J. Buxton Knight for his admirable landscape The Hamlet: Winter Sunshine (156); to Miss Marion Powers for the Chardin-esque still-life in her two virile interiors, The Bouquet (270) and Preparations (824); to Mr. Harold Knight for the silhouette in his arrangement in grey and black, The Girl and the Letter; and to Mr. Ambrose M. Patterson for his well-painted and unjustly "skied" portrait of a guards officer (496). Mrs. H. Creamer's decorative portrait of a girl at a mirror, The Purple Scarf (353), would deserve higher praise were it less reminiscent of Mr. C. H. Shannon. It is amusing to note how often the disciples of a distinguished outsider forestall their master in securing academic approval. Moreover, in fairness to Mrs. Creamer it must be said that Mr. Bernard Partridge's portrait of his wife (54) is equally reminiscent of Mr. William Nicholson, while Mr. J. J. Shannon—who seems to have abandoned his more personal eighteenth-century convention—and Academicians innumerable struggle with more or less success to imitate Mr. Sargent. When we look at the flaring light blues in Mr. Shannon's Mrs. Herbert M. Sears and her Daughters, or the insistent pink in Mr. Dicksee's The Duchess of Westminster, we sadly recall the prophetic words of John Hoppner, in that the masters, as well as the students, losing sight of the great authorities in art, are content to follow the popular painter of the day. This, as defects are easily imitated, unfortunately flatters the indolent, and entraps the unwary; and is naturally productive of a uniform mode of practise, that not only tends to paralyse genius, but obstructs the course of effective improvement.

THE FRENCH SALONS

FOR the benefit of "the general" it is almost necessary to explain precisely what are the Salons or picture-exhibitions in Paris, because during the last four or five years they have all changed in one way or another, either their local habitations or their names, or both; or else they have changed from non-existence to existence. The oldest institution—the oldest by far—that of the Société des Artistes Français—corresponds in almost every point to our Royal Academy. The "old salon" it used to be called when the first dissident salon—corresponding to our New Gallery—which is now sixteen years old, was still young. Comparatively, the name still holds, seeing that the Artistes Français are giving their hundred and twenty-fourth exhibition. But "Salon des Champs Elysées" and "Salon du Champ de Mars" used also to be distinctive epithets of the old and the new respectively. Then the old exhibition building was pulled down to make way for the Universal Exhibition of 1900: for the same reason the "new salon" had to quit the Champ de Mars. Since 1901 both these societies have been housed back-to-back in the new Grand Palais des Beaux-Arts in the Champs Elysées. Now as the "new salon" is by its official title that of the Société Nationale des Beaux-Arts, while it has to take, in fact, a back seat in the Palais des Beaux-Arts; as, finally, there is an École des Beaux-Arts which has its home in the Rue Bonaparte, and has no connection whatever with either of these societies, though it corresponds pretty closely to our Academy school, and though it, too, has its official building and at certain times its own exhibitions: it is evident that for the uninitiated there are plenty of elements of confusion. But I must add the fact that the newest of new salons is that of the Indépendants, which has its show on the same bank at Cour la Reine. For brevity however I shall simply distinguish the three shows as the old salon, the new salon, and the Indépendants.

For any one in search of a new sensation I am not sure but that the last is the one to be recommended. As Whistler used to say: "There's madness about." And the general effect of walking through this "independent" show is to make us doubt whether we have not been transported in the night to some planet where the laws of form, of colour, of all else that goes to make art, are strange and new; if not to a new planet, say to the Laputa island where, it will be remembered, "there was a man born blind who had several apprentices in his own condition. Their employment was to mix colours for painters, which their master taught them to distinguish by feeling and smelling." I guess that here, too, 'tis a question of reconstructing art on some new principle, which may work excellently when perfected, only that I was in the same case with Gulliver. "It was my misfortune to find them at that time not very perfect in their lesson." I guess this, because I am told that there is a similar "independent" school of music which considers harmony the element in that art which should be avoided at all risks. It is only fair to say that there are some good pictures, rari nantes, even at the Indépendants.

The other two galleries have adopted a custom which may be recommended to our Royal Academy. They set apart one room for "a one-man show." In the case of the old salon the one man is M. Henri Martin. As I can claim to have followed this painter's career at any rate for the last fourteen years, and almost always with admiration, at a time when he was practically unknown in England and only slightly recognised in France, it is with something of personal gratification that I witness this apotheosis. The room is given up to two vast decorative subjects, in effect rus and urbs. On one side are reapers at their toil, girls dancing, simple rustic love-making. The other side is more open to criticism. What are these city-folk doing? The profani will ask: "Are they watching ballons volants, such as are often sent over Paris in the summer time, that they seem such Johnny Head-in-airs? The answer is, I suspect, that their attitude is symbolique of the more spiritual life which should distinguish citizens: perhaps, according to M. Martin, it does. Symbolism apart, the fine attitudes of the rustic figures, the brilliancy of light and colour in both series, are things most notable.

Such large decorative pictures are distinctive of the French picture-shows and, therefore, the most worth considering. When they deal naturally with "actualities"—as MM. Sieffert's Dockers, or Henri Delacroix's Vie des Champs, they command our respect, while monstrosities, such as Rochegrosse's La joie rouge, command a sentiment exactly the opposite. From the date of his first decided success with the Chevalier aux fleurs, this painter has steadily declined. Jean-Paul Laurens is one of the few older painters who can still do fine work; and one, at least, of his two artist sons, J.-Pierre Laurens, has two pictures of high merit: The Cliffs, the best of the two. It is one of the few good landscapes in the exhibition. Others are a Moonrise, by M. Didier-Pouget, oily but good, and Mr. Pratt's Chanson d'été. M. Chahas's Nageuses is very nearly the most attractive thing in the gallery. Two clever heads are Nos. 413 (by Mr. Congdon, an American), and 472 (by A. Dechenaud). But more worth noting, because among so many vast lartines they are like to escape notice, are M. D'Estienne's Jeune fille bretonne, a marvel of delicate workmanship, and M. Suau's Vielle femme du Cantal. A Hungarian Styria has some strong work, evidently of the school of Muncaczky.

Scarcely any space, alas! remains to me to speak of the new salon, which of late years has fallen behind the old, which at first it much surpassed. Putting aside the attraction of the show of Carrières, for which one room is set apart, and excepting for two English painters, Mr. Lavery and Mr. Rupert Bunny (Nos. 195-8), I scarcely know what would remain to keep up its ancient glories. Mr. Lavery is so well known in England that I need not speak of him. He exhibits three good portraits (Nos. 735-7), and the Bridge of Grez. Mr. Bunny is, like Henri Martin, essentially a decorative artist. His (briefer) career, too, I have followed, and expect not less of him than of his senior. But he has never yet had mural decoration put in his way. Charles Cottet is one of the best of the great men (gros bonnets) of the new Salon: his triptych of portraits, and his Sunset on Pont-en-Royans are both fine pieces of work. Undoubtedly there are other clever things—MM. Guirand de Scovola's portraits, Gaston Latouche's Fête de nuit, Besnard's portrait of M. Barrère, a snow scene by Thaulow (No. 1148), etc. But, as we have seen as good and better work by these artists before, it is impossible to be enthusiastic over their achievement.

C. F. KEARY.

MUSIC

BACH'S HUMOUR

EVERY one who has listened with any attention to the music of J. S. Bach will have discovered that among its manifold attractions, perhaps the most obvious is an abundant sense of humour, which suffuses his work and especially comes to his rescue to prevent his learning from becoming pedantry. In spite of what looks like a persistent determination amongst, at any rate, his English admirers to ignore this, and to dwell only upon the deep expression of great things, which is the life and soul of his music, again and again his humour asserts itself. It is the salient feature of many of the fugue subjects of "The Forty-eight"; it plays daintily over the suites and concertos; it even finds a place in the organ loft, and has its word to say in the course of many of his great organ works which are seldom heard out of church. Nor is it in the least incompatible with such surroundings or of a kind to interfere with a perfectly serious expression of high thoughts. Humour is not frivolity: the preacher may be the better for it; without it, indeed, he has often come to grief. It may save his dignity, instead of imperilling it, by enabling him to distinguish the great from the little, the real from the unreal. Humour of this kind enters Bach's church compositions, and over and over again saves a cantata from heaviness. In the Christmas Oratorio, typical of his festal works, it plays over the graceful weaving of voice and accompaniment, and sometimes almost places them in a competition of rapid and joyous little figures, as in the tenor aria, "Haste, ye shepherds." In the Passion Music we least expect to find this quality, yet even here instances might be quoted without casting a moment's doubt upon the deep seriousness of Bach's purpose.

But sometimes he indulged in a purely humorous type of composition, in fact in a musical joke, of which the Cantata, "Der Streit zwischen Phöbus und Pan"—Dramma per Musica, Bach calls it—is an excellent example. We are rarely given an opportunity in London of hearing these offshoots of Bach's genius, and the performance of this work lately at the Bach Memorial Concert at Æolian Hall was quite an event of importance amongst recent music-makings. The concert itself was a noteworthy one, the principal artists headed by Mr. Henry J. Wood, who conducted a contingent of the Queen's Hall orchestra, all generously giving their services with the object of contributing towards the purchase of Bach's house at Eisenach, and the endowment of a Bach museum therein. The "Phöbus und Pan" cantata was far from being the sole example on the programme of Bach's humour. The second Brandenburg concerto overflows with it. A violin, trumpet, flute and oboe are the quaintest quartet, and they carry on a delightfully brisk and amusing dialogue. One minute the trumpet and flute are in animated discussion, when the violin bustles in and asserts itself, while the oboe always makes its strident voice heard above the rest when it chooses. This is the spirit of the first and last movements, while the middle movement is one of the most purely beautiful and contemplative that Bach ever penned. The trumpet is left out, the oboe is hushed to an expressive melancholy, and the three solo instruments ponder in loving fashion over the beautiful subject above an accompaniment of muted strings. Again, the dainty suite in B minor for flute and strings, the solo part played to perfection by Mr. Fransella, is full of the most delightful fun. Of course, another side of Bach's character was well represented. The beautiful cantata, "Schlage doch," which was recently discussed in connection with the Bach Choir concert, was well sung by Miss Maria Philippi; Mrs. Edgar Speyer's playing of the Chaconne was broad and dignified, and Mrs. Henry Wood sang the aria, "Ich ende behende mein irdisches Leben" in careful style. Last of all came the "Phöbus und Pan" cantata. Six characters make up the dramatis personæ and they were allotted thus: Miss Lillie Wormald (Momus), Miss Maria Philippi (Mercurius), Mr. Henry Turnpenny (Tmolus), Mr. Harold Wilde (Midas), Mr. Frederick Ranalow (Phœbus), and Mr. Frederic Austin (Pan). This "Dramma per Musica" is as free from the drama as possible. It is a succession of dialogues in recitative between the various characters with strongly individual arias for each, and at the beginning and end a "Coro," in which the six voices combine. When we first open the score, the general outline and plan, as well as the texture of the writing, look so much like that of his church cantatas that we are inclined to fear lest the likeness should have the appearance of parody. But in performance this is not so, unless it be in the recitative, where Bach's use of certain progressions of harmony and outlines of melody is so conventional that in the rather characterless dialogue of this work he often approaches very nearly to the less deeply felt parts of the narrative recitative in his church music. But apart from this there is no confusion. All the music stands as definitely upon the one side of the barrier that divides the sacred from the secular as the most light-hearted of his church cantatas stands upon the other side. The bustling triplets of the orchestral parts of the first "Coro," tossed from the fiddles to the oboe parts and from them to the flutes, or rumbling about among the basses, suggest a tone painting of the "wirbelnden winde" upon whom the voices call. When Phœbus and Pan have met, and in pompous recitative boasted each of his own musical prowess, the soprano (Momus) aria "Patron, Patron," follows. This, written with figured bass accompaniment only, required some editing for modern performance, but Herr Felix Mottl's edition, clever though it is, takes some liberties with the harmonies as indicated by the figures. It was, however, very effective as sung by Miss Wormald, its sprightly, mocking character being well grasped by her. Then comes Mercurius, who ordains the contest between the two, Phœbus choosing Tmolus as his judge, Pan choosing Midas. The efforts of the combatants are represented by two arias. That of Phœbus is richly scored for flute, oboe d'amour and muted strings. As representative of serious art, it is long and complicated, employing every device of sustained and florid singing dear to the heart of the operatic singer of that day. It is so very much better music than the languishing love-song it parodies that it is not very surprising that Mr. Ranalow took it too seriously and made it sound solemn. But Pan's solo could not be mistaken. He puts so much energy into it and jumps about so excitedly, that the words become:

so wack-ack-ack-ack-ack-ack-a-ckelt das Herz.

Short of physical jumping, Mr. Austin sang it with excellent realism. When the judges give their verdict, each must needs sing a long aria to describe his reasons for so doing. Of course each supports his own candidate, and then they all bully poor Midas for giving a candid opinion, one, moreover, in which I believe that most of the audience at this performance concurred. He supports Pan in a very spirited aria, beginning with the name of his hero upon the high tenor A. Mr. Harold Wilde sang this in excellent style, taking the high notes with perfect ease. However, Midas only gets the ass's ears for his pains, and when Mercurius has moralised further upon the subject, Bach points the moral in a recitative sung by Momus, impressively accompanied by strings, whereas the others had only the "continuo." This point was, however, not apparent in this performance, in which the orchestra accompanied throughout.

Du guter Midas, geh' nun hin
Und lege dich in deinem Walde nieder,
Doch tröste dich in deinem Sinn;
Du hast noch mehr dergleichen Brüder,
Der Unverstand und Unvernunft
Will jetzt der Weisheit Nachbar sein,
Man urtheilt in den Tag hinein
Und die so thun, gehören all in deine Zunft.

It does not, perhaps, make the joke the sweeter to learn that this was Bach's answer to an unfavourable newspaper criticism, but if the words, which are not his own, are bombastic, the music is throughout too good-natured to let the repartee sound malicious, and, as the attack made upon him in "Der Kritische Musikers" was really ignorant and "unverständlich," the retort was well merited. This jocular sermon to musical critics ends with a short ode in praise of music, in which all the voices and full orchestra bear a part; and thus ended a very delightful concert.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE most important addition which is proposed for "The World's Classics" is a complete Shakespeare in about seven volumes. The text is being edited by Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton, and he will write a preface to each play, adding a bibliography. The first volume is to contain a newly-written, long introductory essay on Shakespeare and his art by Mr. Swinburne. Mr. Frowde hopes to have a portion of the edition ready in the autumn. It will be printed in the clear type always used for this series, on ordinary paper and on thin paper for the pocket. Among the editors of other volumes in preparation are Mr. R. Warwick Bond, Mr. Austin Dobson, Dr. Robertson Nicoll, Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch, Mr. T. Seccombe, Mr. Clement Shorter, Mr. A. Waugh and Judge Willis.

In the "Twenty-three Tales by Tolstoy" newly translated by Mr. and Mrs. Maude, are some stories not contained in any of the "complete" or "collected" editions of Tolstoy's works.

It is hoped that at least one hundred volumes of "The World's Classics" will be ready by the end of the year, and they will be procurable in the new pocket edition as well as in the more familiar form.

On May 17, Messrs. Methuen will publish Mr. F. M. Gostling's translation of M. Anatole le Braz's "The Land of Pardons." The book contains fifty illustrations, of which ten are in colour.—The same publishers promise, on the 21st, Mr. Richard Davey's "The Pageant of London," in two volumes illustrated in colour. The first chapters deal with Roman, Saxon, and Danish London; accounts of the aspect of the city in Norman and mediæval times are given; and the Tudor, Elizabethan, Caroline, and Georgian eras receive due attention. At the end of each chapter will be found a list of the principal and most accessible works, ancient and modern, on the subject treated, and in addition to this the writer adds a list of the principal remains and relics of old London, illustrative of each period, to be found in old churches, houses, etc., and in various museums.

The Essex House Press announce that they have now ready "Mendicant Rhymes," a new volume of verse by Laurence Housman.

Messrs. Everett and Co. will publish shortly an interesting book—"From Valmy to Waterloo": extracts from the diary of Captain Charles François, translated and adapted from the French by R. B. Douglas, with a preface by Jules Claretie. François was with Napoleon throughout his extraordinary series of campaigns, and in his diary he records, with grim bluntness and simplicity, his own adventures, his own views of events, and the talk of his comrades round the bivouac fire.—The same publishers have in the press a humorous novel by Fox Russell: "The Escapades of Mr. Alfred Dimmock."

Under the title "The Undying Past," Mr. John Lane will publish on May 15, a translation by Beatrice Marshall of Sudermann's great novel "Es War."—Mr. Lane has also in the press a book from the pen of the late Mr. F. L. Austin—"Points of View."

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish shortly a book on "Court Beauties of Old Whitehall," by W. R. H. Trowbridge.—A small volume on the "History of Jewish Literature, from the Fall of the Temple (70 C.E.) to the Era of Emancipation (1706 C.E.)" by Mr. Israel Abrahams, Reader in Rabbinic Literature at Cambridge, is promised about the same date. The book, which is introductory to a larger work on the same subject, deals in a general way with the Talmud, the mediæval poetry, the mystic Kabbala, and other subjects.

E. Grant Richards will publish in the course of a week or two an open-air anthology entitled "Traveller's Joy." In this collection Mr. Waters has attempted to provide, as he says in his preface, a guide to those flowery wildernesses which lie a little off the beaten track. The book is to have end-papers in colour.—"Venus and Cupid: An Impression in Prose after Velasquez in Colour," is the title of a little book which will be issued during the next two or three weeks by the same publisher. The number of copies printed will be limited to three hundred and fifty on hand-made paper, and twelve, to which will be added a reproduction in photogravure of the Rokeby Venus, on Japanese vellum.

Mr. Philip Welby will publish about the end of May a new volume of poetry by Mr. A. E. Waite. The book, "Strange Houses of Sleep," is divided into four parts: (i) Shadows of Sacraments; (ii) The Hidden Sacrament of The Holy Graal; (iii) The Poor Brother's Mass Book: containing a method of assisting at the Holy Sacrifice for children who are not of this world; and (iv) The Book of the King's Dole, and Chantry for Plain Song: A Greater Initiation.

The next volume of "The Makers of British Art" will be Lord Leighton of Stretton, by Edgcumbe Staley. In addition to a full biography and an appreciation of his merits, the book gives a list of Leighton's works and matter for student-critics and general readers.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE BIRD CROCODILE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Singular as it may seem, this anomaly, which is rejected by the editor in "Sir Gawayne and the Grene Knight," may be accepted as a confused verbal complex, in mediæval natural history.

To put it shortly, it arises from a misspelling of the Biblical cochatrix: thus, arranged chronologically; in the year 1210 we find coquatrix, by 1250 it varies to chocatrix and cocodrille or corcodillus; in 1263 cocatrix, in 1266 it is calcatrice, in 1300 cokadrille and Wycliffe has cokedrill. These last forms resemble the Italian cocodrillo, Spanish crocodilo; so the cockatrice develops into the better known crocodile.

Now it is explained that all this is put for the ichneumon, a sort of parasite which attends the genuine crocodile, and is the Egyptian weasel; the crocodile is not described as such in the Old Testament, but is there symbolised by the word Leviathan to identify Egypt.

The result is that the prefix "cock" does produce a "bird-crocodile"; but I have not access to the context known to "Mr. Collins"; still the prefix is different, in composition, to the suffix in "woolfes and wolfebirds."

A. HALL.

Highbury, N., May 3.

"QUOUSQUE TANDEM—"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I wonder if your much-afflicted correspondent, "A Student of Literature," ever studies the works of Charles Lamb. If so he has evidently forgotten the following passage from "New Year's Eve":

"I am not content to pass away like a weaver's shuttle. Those metaphors solace me not, nor sweeten the unpalatable draught of mortality. I care not to be carried with the tide, that smoothly bears human life to eternity; and reluctant at the inevitable cause of destiny."

I have not time to consult Sir Thomas Browne, from whom it is possible that Lamb may have borrowed what seems to me a brave enough word, but I trust your correspondent will not accuse me of "blating," if I say I am quite content to borrow from Lamb.

B. N.

SHAKESPEARE AND WORDSWORTH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Though I would not display the impertinence of crossing swords with Mr. Edward Wright, I could not help wondering how many would subscribe to his opinion that "the most inspired passage in Shakespeare sounds a little mundane beside the 'Orphic song' of Wordsworth."

Is it the knowledge of Wordsworth's egotistical character that prejudices one against lines beginning "I have felt"? It seems to me that though it is "pure vision" the lines convey a single experience, personal and positive, and for this reason my thoughts revert not more to the subject in hand than to the writer himself.

Shakespeare's lines are impersonal and suggestive. Looked at from a more general point of view are they not therefore greater art?

MAX PLOWMAN.

PREPOSITIONS AT THE END OF SENTENCES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—How can it be accounted for that in conversation sentences frequently end with a preposition while in writing this is avoided? Swift had the courage to use the conversational arrangement and we seem to hear him speaking. A person who in talking places the preposition as he would in writing exposes himself to the remark, "Why you talk like a book," which is not considered complimentary.

J. BUCKLER.

ONIONS AND VINEGAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Readers of the ACADEMY must certainly be among those who loathe blatant adulation arrayed in the guise of literary criticism; yet having read my copy this week I was tempted to ask: Upon what meat do these our critics feed that they are grown so—lean? Lent being ended, why continue the diet of onions and vinegar? Rapiers and battle-axes! What weapons, Mr. Editor, you must have served round last week! Surely there is a happy mean between indiscriminate applause (reminding one of ubiquitous introductions) and wholesale slaughter. Did it so happen that in all "the making of books" none came forth whereon your reviewers could bestow one grain of unstinted praise? Should such a dearth occur again, may I beg of you to depute one critic to extol the merits of some time-honoured classic just to remove this battlefield impression?

M. P.

[If M. P. will look over last week's ACADEMY again, he will not, we think, find it so full of onions and vinegar as he gathered from his first reading.—ED.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Rembrandt, a Memorial, 1606–1906. Parts IV. and V. Each 14½ × 10½. Pp. 12. With 7 plates. Heinemann, each 2s. 6d. net.

McKay, William D., R.S.A. The Scottish School of Painting. Illustrated, 8 × 5½. Pp. 369. Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net.

Jouin, Henry. Jean Goujon. 10½ × 8. Pp. 105. Paris. Librairie de l'Art. 3f. 50.

[Another volume in the excellent semi-official series of "Artistes Célèbres," published under the direction of M. Paul Leroy. M. Jouin's work has been crowned by the Académie des Beaux-Arts. It is illustrated with 57 engravings.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

The "Pope" of Holland House: selections from the correspondence of John Whishaw and his friends, 1813–1840. Edited and annotated by Lady Seymour, with a memoir of Whishaw and an account of "The King of Clubs" by W. P. Courtney. Illustrated. 9 × 6. Pp. 345. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.

Fitchett, Rev. W. H. Wesley and his Century. A Study in Spiritual Forces. Portrait and facsimiles. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 537. Smith, Elder, 6s. net.

Williams, H. Noel. Later Queens of the French Stage. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 360. Harpers, 10s. 6d. net.

[This is a similar volume to "Queens of the French Stage," which was reviewed in the ACADEMY of Feb. 3, 1906. Lives of Sophie Arnould, Mdle. Guimard, Mdle. Raucourt, Mme. Dugazon, Mdle. Contat and Mme. Saint-Huberty. Portraits and Index.]

CLASSICS.

Longinus on the Sublime. Translated by A. O. Prickard, M.A. With introduction, appendix and index. Oxford Library of Translations. 7¼ × 4½. Pp. 128. Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d. net.

DRAMA

D'Humiac, L. Michaud. Le Roi Grallon. Tragédie en cinq actes et sept tableaux, en vers. 9½ × 6½. Pp. xv, 212. Paris: Librairie Molière, 4f.

[The tragedy of the submerged Breton city of Ys, of which opera-goers know something from the work of Blau and Lalo. M. d'Humiac objects to that opera that the librettist has made Ys a Christian city, whereas it was still Pagan, and has toned down the story for polite ears. His own tragedy gives a vivid picture of the luxury of the doomed city, and shows its conversion to Christianity by Gwenolé. Date—the middle of the fifth century.]

EDUCATION.

A First German Reader. Edited, with questions for conversation, grammatical exercises, vocabulary, etc. By D. L. Savory. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 108. Arnold, 1s. 6d.

Langlois, Ch.-V. Questions d'Histoire et d'Enseignement. Nouvelles série. 7¼ × 4½. Pp. 323. Paris: Hachette.

[Contains two historical lectures on "La Tradition de la France" and "Michelet," both delivered in America. The remainder of the book is concerned with education in the United States and in general.]

Nathaniel Hawthorne's Tanglewood Tales. Told to the Children by C. E. Smith, with Pictures by Olive Allen. Fairy Tales from Hans Andersen. Told to the Children by Mary Macgregor, with Pictures by Olive Allen. Each 6 × 4½. Told to the Children series. Jack, 1s. net.

Henson, Canon H. Hensley. Religion in the Schools. Addresses on Fundamental Christianity delivered in St. Margaret's, Westminster, during Lent, 1906. 7¼ × 5½. Pp. xix, 137. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.

[Canon Henson's views on what he calls "Fundamental Christianity" are well known, and his lectures will be fresh in the public mind. His book contains a bold statement of his point of view, and a plea for unity of action lest secularism be the result.]

Clarke, G. H. and Murray, C. J. A Grammar of the German Language. 7¼ × 5½. Pp. viii, 404. Cambridge University Press, 6s. net.

[The authors have some faith in "teaching grammar for its own sake." They give modern usages to be found in works of the best writers rather than the stereotyped rules of grammarians. Colloquial usages have not been neglected.]

Craven, R. M., and Lander, G. D. Systematic Inorganic Chemistry, from the Standpoint of the Periodic Law. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 374. Blackie, 6s. net.

[Intended for students reading for final degree and other advanced examinations.]

Hassall, Arthur. A Brief Survey of European History from Charles the Great to the Present Day. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 367. Blackie, 4s. 6d.

Virgil—Aeneid, v, vii, viii, ix. Edited by S. E. Winbolt. Latin Texts. Each 7 × 4½. Blackie, 6d. net each.

Izaak Walton's Complete Angler. Pp. 120. Captain Cook's Second Voyage. Pp. 128. Raphael Holinshed's England in the Sixteenth Century. Pp. 127. English School Texts. Each 6½ × 4½. Blackie, 6d. each.

[Abridged.]

Jonson, Ben. London Historical and Descriptive. A Reading-book for Schools. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 255. Blackie, 1s. 6d.

Garvie, Alfred E. Religious Education, mainly from a Psychological Standpoint. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 95. Sunday School Union, 1s. 1net.

FICTION.

Harris, J. Henry. Cornish Saints and Sinners. With numerous drawings by L. Raven-Hill. 7¼ × 5½. Pp. 312. Lane, 6s.

Swan, Annie S. A Mask of Gold. The Mystery of the Meadows. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 320. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.

Spender, Harold. The Arena. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 380. Constable, 6s.

Brooks, Mansfield. The Newell Fortune. 7¼ × 5½. Pp. 304. Lane, 6s.

Sutcliffe, Halliwell. A Benedick in Arcady. 7¼ × 5½. Pp. 343. Murray, 6s.

Macilwaine, Herbert. Anthony Britten. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 365. Constable, 6s.

Albanesi, Madame. A Young Man from the Country. 8 × 5½. Pp. 343. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Tracy, Louis. Heart's Delight. Illustrated. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 336. Ward, Lock, 6s.

Pitman, William Dent. The Quincunx Case. 8 × 5½. Pp. 316. Ward, Lock, 6s.

Marchmont, Arthur W. By Wit of Woman. Illustrations by S. H. Vedder. 8 × 5½. Pp. 317. Ward, Lock, 6s.

Glyn, Elinor. Beyond the Rocks. A love story. 7¼ × 5½. Pp. 319. Duckworth, 6s.

Perrin, Alice. Red Records. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 306. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

Clarke, Laurence. Murray of the Scots Greys. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 363. Jarrold, 6s.

GEOGRAPHY.

Bartholomew, J. G. Atlas of the World's Commerce. Part iv. 16x10½. Newnes, 6d. net.

HISTORY.

Hill, G. F. (described by). Historical Greek Coins. With thirteen plates 9½x5½. Pp. xix, 181. Constable, 10s. 6d.

[We enter this book under History because it is from the historical point of view that Mr. Hill regards his subject, and the coins he describes are chosen for the light they throw on history. He has attempted to do in Greek coins what Canon Hicks did in Greek inscriptions. He starts with the beginnings of coinage in Asia Minor in the seventh century B.C., and goes down to Amyntas, King of Galatia, B.C. 36-25. The thirteen plates illustrate 100 coins.]

Conway, Sir Martin. No Man's Land: a history of Spitsbergen from its discovery in 1596 to the beginning of the scientific exploration of the country. 9½x6½. Pp. xii, 377. Cambridge University Press, 10s. 6d. net.

[With 13 maps and 11 full-page plates; list of modern voyages; bibliography; cartography; chronological list of maps; history of nomenclature and index.]

Hare, Christopher. A Queen of Queens and The Making of Spain. Illustrated 9x6. Pp. xiii, 372. Harpers, 10s. 6d.

[The Queen of Queens is Isabel of Castile, wife of Fernando of Aragon. "Christopher Hare's" book is handsomely illustrated, and includes a map, a chronological table, a genealogical tree and an Index.]

Overton, the late Rev. Canon John H., and Relton, Rev. Frederic. The English Church from the accession of George I. to the end of the eighteenth century. 7½x5½. Pp. xvii, 374. Macmillan, 7s. 6d.

[This is vol. vii. of Stephens and Hunt's "History of the English Church." Canon Overton left at his death a work in MS. which Mr. Relton has curtailed, amplified and adapted to the plan of the series. Index.]

Lavisse, Ernest. Histoire de France depuis les origines jusqu'à la Révolution. Tome Septième, I. Louis XIV. La Fronde, Le Roi, Colbert (1643-1685). 9½x7½. Pp. 407. Paris: Hachette.

LITERATURE.

Saintsbury, George. A History of English Prosody from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day. Vol. 1—From the Origins to Spencer. 9x5½. Pp. xvii, 428. Macmillan, 10s. net.

de Rothschild, J. A. Shakespeare and His Day: a study of the topical element in Shakespeare and in the Elizabethan Drama. Being the Harness Prize Essay, 1901. 7½x5½. Pp. xi, 251. Arnold, 5s. net.

[“An attempt to extract from the Elizabethan Drama something of Elizabethan life.” The scheme of Mr. de Rothschild's work is “to shadow forth some of the Elizabethan personalities and events,” and “to evolve something of the general colours and forms of Shakespeare's times.”]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Northcote, Hugh. Christianity and Sex Problems. 9x6. Pp. 257. Philadelphia: F. A. Davis Company. $2.00 net.

Wythes, George; and Roberts, Harry. The Book of Rarer Vegetables. 7½x5½. Pp. 109. Handbooks of Practical Gardening. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.

Johnson, Rev. Frank. Faith and Vision. Chapters of Suggestion on Religion and Life. 7x4½. Pp. 124. Melrose, 2s. net.

[The substance of these papers has appeared elsewhere, but all have been revised, many recast and rewritten.]

The University of Liverpool Students' Song Book. 6½x4½. Pp. 161. Published for the University Press of Liverpool by Williams & Norgate. 2s. 6d. net.

A Book of Memory: The Birthday Book of the Blessed Dead. Compiled by Katharine Tynan (Katharine Tynan Hinkson). 8½x7½. Pp. xii, 216. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net. (See p. 443.)

How to Shave Yourself: a reliable guide to an "easy" shave. By an Expert. 7½x4½. Pp. 24. Illustrated. Van, Alexander, and Simpkin, Marshall, 6d. net.

Hueffer, Ford Madox. The Heart of the Country. 7½x5½. Pp. 218. Alston Rivers, 5s. net.

[The present volume forms the second of "three small projections of a View of Modern Life." The first was, of course, "The Soul of London."]

NATURAL HISTORY.

Collett, Anthony. A Handbook of British Inland Birds. With coloured and outline plates of eggs by Eric Parker. 8½x5½. Pp. 289. Macmillan, 6s.

Elms, E. F. M. A Pocket-book of British Birds. 6½x4½. Pp. 150. West, Newman, 2s. 6d.

[A useful little book of notes on birds, their colour, habits, nesting-places, etc., by a bird-lover.]

POETRY.

Bancroft, Hester. Poems. 7½x4½. Pp. iv, 44. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.

Grindrod, Charles, F. Songs from the Classics. 7½x5½. Pp. 141. Elkin Mathews, 3s. 6d. net.

Dunn, Stanley Gerald. The Treasure of the Sea: and other verses. 7½x5½. Pp. xii, 100. Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d. net.

Rawlings, B. Burford. A Story of Unrest: a Drama of Dreams. 7½x5. Pp. 134. Elliot Stock, 4s. 6d.

POLITICAL.

Aubert, Louis. Paix Japonaise. 7½x4½. Pp. xxi, 351. Paris: Colin, 3f. 50.

[M. Aubert's interesting book deals with the Paix Japonaise—the new "Pax Romana" which Japan is now to establish all over the Far East, and with its effects on Japan herself. In his opinion it means the passing of the old order. "The bells that rang the surrender of Port Arthur sounded the knell of Old Japan."]

Lucy, Henry W. The Balfourian Parliament, 1900-1905. Illustrated by E. T. Reed and Phil May. 9½x6. Pp. xii, 439. Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.

[The sixth volume of Mr. Lucy's Parliamentary Diary, which started with the Disraeli Parliament, 1874-80, Mr. Lucy having been present at every sitting for thirty-one years except during two Sessions. We are sorry to hear that he intends this volume to be the last. The illustrations are reproduced from Punch. Index.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Lydgate, John. The assemble of Goddes. 10½x7½. Cambridge University Press, 17s. 6d. net.

[One of the beautiful series of facsimiles issued by this Press. The original is Wynkyn de Worde's edition printed at Westminster about the year 1500, of which the only known copy was presented to the Cambridge University Library in 1715 by George I. with the rest of the library of John Moore, Bishop of Ely.]

Poems by George Crabbe. In three vols. Vol. ii. Edited by Adolphus William Ward. 7½x5½. Pp. 508. Cambridge English Classics. Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net.

[This volume contains the whole of the "Tales" and the first eleven of the "Tales of the Hall," reprinted from the editions of 1823, with variants noted from the first editions of the "Tales" (1812) and the "original MS." readings given in the "Life and Poems" (1834), and from the first edition of the "Tales of the Hall" (1819), the "Life and Poems" and certain MSS. which will be described in vol. iii. This volume also contains addenda to the variants in vol. i. Vol. iii., containing a considerable amount of previously unpublished verse, is promised by Dr. Ward for this summer.]

The Works of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher. In ten volumes. Vol. iii. Edited by A. R. Waller. 7½x5½. Pp. 464. Cambridge English Classics. Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net.

[Contains The Mad Lover, The Loyal Subject, Rule a Wife, and have a Wife, The Laws of Candy, The False One, and The Little French Lawyer.]

Müller, F. Max. The German Classics from the fourth to the nineteenth century. With biographical notices, translations into modern German and notes. Revised, enlarged and adapted to Wilhelm Scherer's History of German Literature by F. Lichtenstein. Second edition. In two vols.; vol. ii. revised by F. L. Armitage. Vol. i. Pp. xv, 711. 8s. 6d. net. Vol. ii. Pp. vii, 468. 5s. 6d. Each 7½x5½. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

[The original of this book was published in 1858; in 1886 the revised form adapted to Scherer's book was prepared by Lichtenstein and after his death finished by Dr. Joseph.]

Emerson, Ralph Waldo. English Traits. 8½x5½. Pp. 103. Allenson's Sixpenny Series. 6d.

Mitchell, S. Weir. The Adventures of François. Jackberns, Raymond. The New Pupil. Howe, Herbert. A Study of the Sky. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. each.

[Reprints of children's books.]

Wülker, Richard. Geschichte der Englischen Literatur von den ältesten Zeiter bis zur Gegenwart. Zweite, neu bearbeitete Auflage. Heft I. 10½x7½. Pp. 64. Leipzig und Wien: Verlag des Bibliographischen Instituts. M. 1.

[This new edition of Geh. Hofrat Prof. Dr. Richard Wülker's great work (originally published in 1896) is to be issued in 15 parts, lavishly illustrated. This first part contains a reproduction in colour of the Coronation of Henry IV. from the fifteenth-century MS. in the Stadtbibliothek at Breslau, and a facsimile of a page of Caxton's "Dictes or sayings of the Philosophers," besides many other full-page and inset plates.]

Dumas, Alexandre. La Tulipe Noire. Préface d'Emile Faguet. 6½x4½. Pp. 298. Les Classiques Français. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.

M'Kerlie, P. H. History of the Lands and Their Owners in Galloway, with Historical Sketches of the District. 2 vols. Illustrated. Second edition, enlarged. Paisley: Gardner, 25s. net.

Rose, J. Holland. A Century of Continental History, 1780-1880. With a supplement descriptive of events up to the year 1900. Fifth Edition. Revised and corrected throughout. 7½x5½. Pp. xii, 481. Stanford, 6s.

[Intended for the upper forms of schools. The first edition was published in 1899. To this fifth edition of a well-known and admirable book Dr. Holland Rose has added three chapters on the chief events in France, Germany and Russia between 1880 and 1900, and the whole book has been worked over. Maps and Index.]

Tisdall, Rev. W. St. Clair. The Religion of the Crescent, being the James Long Lectures on Muhammadanism. Second Edition, revised. Non-Christian Religious Systems Series. 6½x4½. Pp. xvi, 251. S.P.C.K., 4s.

SPORT.

Knight, Albert, E. The Complete Cricketer. With 50 illustrations. 9x6. Pp. 368. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.

[Outline of the early history and development of the game, with chapters on batting; bowling; fielding; captaincy; umpiring; cricket on farther shores—Australian wickets; players of the past and present; modern cricket and some of its problems; and laws of the game. A glossary of colloquial cricket terms—a very necessary feature—is given.]

Standing, Percy Cross. The Hon. F. S. Jackson. Introduction by K. S. Ranjitsinhji. 16 illustrations. 7½x5½. Pp. 164. Cassell, 2s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

Mater, André. L'Eglise Catholique: Sa Constitution, son administration. 7½x4½. Pp. iv, 461. Paris: Colin, 5 fr.

[A "purely objective" history of the organisation and administration of the Catholic Church by a Professor of the New University of Brussels. It aims at being impartial and at supplying the facts in the light of which Article 4 of the Law of Separation may be studied. Index.]

The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria. By Theophilus G. Pinches, LL.D. Pp. 125. Celtic Religion in Pre-Christian Times. By Edward Anwyl. Pp. 68. Hinduism. By L. D. Barnett. Pp. 65. Each 7x4½. Religions Ancient and Modern Series. Constable, 1s. net each.

The Old Testament in Greek according to the text of Codex Vaticanus, supplemented from other uncial manuscripts, with a critical apparatus containing the variants of the chief ancient authorities from the text of the Septuagint. Edited by Alan England Brooke and Norman McLean. Volume I. The Octateuch. Part I. Genesis. 114 x 84. Pp. viii, 155. Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d. net.

[It was in 1883 that the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press undertook the "Larger Cambridge Septuagint"—an edition of the Septuagint and Apocrypha with an ample apparatus criticus, of which this is the first instalment. The object of this work is "to present as clearly and fully as possible within reasonable limits of space the evidence available for the reconstruction of the text or texts of the LXX." We shall have more to say about it later.]

Daubney, William Heaford. The Three Additions to Daniel. A Study. 8 x 5½. Pp. 258. Cambridge: Deighton Bell, 5s. net.

[The author considers that the three apocryphal portions of Daniel dealt with in this book have been very hardly judged. He has attempted to show that they are worthy of more serious attention than they have generally received.]

THE BOOKSHELF

WE have before us Parts IV. and V. of Mr. Heinemann's Rembrandt, A Memorial, 1606-1906, which is now half-completed. M. Michel's account of the artist, of which each part contains six pages, is not only very handsome to look at, thanks to the printing of the Ballantyne Press, but tells exactly what the admirer of Rembrandt, who is not himself an authority, wishes to know, and will enable all to appreciate more highly the beautiful plates of which each part contains seven, three in colour, and four in "Rembrandt" photogravure. The coloured prints are by F. Schmidt, of Paris, and exquisite they are. The pen-and-wash study of a landscape, the original of which is in the British Museum, facing p. 42 (Part IV.) is delightful in its silvery tone; the reproduction of the pen-and-wash drawing, "The Geographer," in the Albertina, Vienna, is astonishingly rich. Among the photogravures are the well-known "Rembrandt and Saskia" (Dresden), in which the artist's wife is sitting on his knee while he holds up a long glass of wine; a superb reproduction of the "Presentation in the Temple" (The Hague), full of light and splendour; the portrait of Sobieski in the Hermitage, St. Petersburg, and our National Gallery "Portrait of an Old Woman"; while the charming Saskia appears again in the Dresden portrait of her holding a flower, with her left hand on her breast. Altogether this "Rembrandt" will be a book that all lovers of art will want to have on their shelves and in their hands; and when it is complete, with the special plate that is to be presented to subscribers, it will be one of the most artistic productions of the time.

Mr. Oliver G. Pike is one of the most adventurous and successful of photographers of wild birds in their haunts, and in Birdland Pictures (Crofton Publishing Company, Brockley, S.E., 3s. 6d. net) he has given us a handsome folio containing twenty-four very characteristic bird-groups and portraits. The development of nature-photography has done a great deal of good in stimulating a healthy popular interest in outdoor life, and in dissipating many impressions which were purely erroneous; but, from the standpoint of artistic illustration, it has merely produced an erroneous multiplication of the second-best. These pictures of Mr. Pike's are as good as photography and its subsequent processes of reproduction can make them; and they supply a final demonstration that the artist who is also a naturalist can always give us a picture more true to life than is possible for the most skilfully handled camera. The difference will be clearly seen on comparing Mr. Pike's photographs with many of Mr. Lodge's drawings, or with those in Mr. Millais's "British Mammals." The best of Mr. Pike's pictures, on the whole, are those which were also the most difficult to secure. Nests and sitting birds, which are naturally concealed in garden and woodland foliage, must be stripped and posed, to a certain extent, to make it possible to photograph them, and this gives a slightly unnatural appearance to such pictures as those of the Meadow Pipit's nest and the Wild Duck's. The Razor-bills and Gannets, on their naked and precipitous sea-cliffs, are in this respect much better. The pictures are in each case accompanied by a short descriptive notice, embodying the results of Mr. Pike's experience. They are well informed, but not invariably grammatical. It is a pity that, by an ill-framed comparison with the Blackcap, the writer encourages the erroneous notion that the Nightingale is exclusively a singer by night.

Jewish Encyclopædia. Vol. xi. Samson-Talmid. Funk and Wagnall.—If owing to the fortune of the alphabet the eleventh and penultimate volume of the Jewish Encyclopædia does not possess quite the importance of its immediate predecessors it is none the less full of interesting articles. We would mention in particular those on Spain and Spinoza from the pen of Mr. Joseph Jacobs, by far the ablest of the contributors to the volume. In the former article it is instructive to see how the alternating and in some cases simultaneous efforts of the Spanish monarchs to be at peace at once with Mammon and with God occasioned that policy of the protection chequered with persecution that continued till the expulsion in 1492. It is significant that even now the Jews are not allowed to have any public building in Spain in which to hold their religious services. There are also two admirable articles on Synagogues and Synagogue architecture by Mr. Lewis Dembitz and Mr. A. W. Brunner respectively, both copiously illustrated and containing photographs of synagogues in all parts of the world from Jerusalem to New York. Shehita, the Mosaic method of killing, is treated by Mr. J. H. Greenstone, while Mr. Mannheimer gives a comprehensive history of the Sanhedrin from its earliest constitution down to the French Sanhedrin convoked by Napoleon to give legal sanction to the principles expressed by the Assembly of Notables in answer to the twelve questions with regard to the relation between Jewish and French law submitted to it by the Government. Gentiles, moreover, will read with a peculiar interest the article by Mr. Wiernik on the Shadchan or marriage-broker, who still drives his profitable trade among the ultra-orthodox Jews in both the Old and the New World. As in the other volume the number of celebrated people thought of sufficient prominence to be mentioned is legion, so that it would seem that the Encyclopædia is intended to serve inter alia the function of a Jewish "Who's Who." Speaking generally the volume is capably compiled, though the article on Satire by Mr. Israel Davidson partakes too much of the nature of a mere catalogue omitting to give any description of the peculiarly Jewish vein of satire or to mention such characteristic writers as Disraeli or Heine and, in more modern times, Mr. Zangwill.

Very beautiful are the reproductions in colour of Mr. Walter Tyndale's paintings of Wessex scenery in Wessex, one of a series of elaborate Guide Books published by Messrs. A. and C. Black. The letter-press by Clive Holland is interesting, if sketchy; but it leaves a good deal to be desired in the order, both geographical and historical, in which it is given. And the fact that Mr. Hardy's books first awoke the author to the knowledge that such a country as Wessex existed, is hardly sufficient justification for assuming that the readers will be content or even grateful for the constant suggestion that they should look at everything through "Hardy" spectacles which are insistently placed on their nose. The delightful sketch of the Frome (opposite p. 170) gains nothing by the word "Casterbridge" inserted in brackets after "Dorchester"; and it is with a quite a feeling of relief that we find the name Burton Bradstock, left no peg on which to hang an allusion to one author out of several who have written ably and well of this country side.

The Art and Practice of Laundry Work, by Margaret Cuthbert Rankin, is a true Mother's Help. It raises this necessary work to the dignity of an art, and removes any lingering notion that any novice can wash and iron. It will be a revelation to many, for instance, to know that sunshades and other delicate things can be washed (Blackie, 2s. 6d.)

Mark Matsevitch Antokolsky, his life, work, letters and articles, edited by V. V. Stassov (Moscow). The most captivating part of this work, edited by the great critic Stassov, are the letters, for the life is related disconnectedly, and the autotypes are poor. The sculptor Antokolsky is chiefly known abroad by his great works, Ivan the Terrible, Spinoza, Mephistopheles, etc.; but his letters introduce us to a clever writer on artistic topics of the day, and at the same time disclose the tragedy of his life. For financial reasons he had to submit to the dictation of his patrons as to choice of subject. Yet, as years roll by, we find him inured to dictation, and competing for statues to Alexander II. and Alexander III., and furnishing a statue of Catherine the Great to the town of Vilna. No wonder, therefore, that, though illuminated by the spark of genius, his work often showed signs of effort, inequality and artificiality. After a quarter of a century of silence he broke out: "I know not what further awaits me, but I will do all that in me lies to vindicate the freedom of creative genius. True, I have come to my senses late in the day; yet better late than never. What sins have I committed during my lifetime! What silly statues have I made to order! I have wasted years over them." And Antokolsky returned to an unrealised conception of his youth, to "The attack of the Inquisition upon the Jews"; but death intervened and the idea remained unrealised.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Ready May 16. Price 6s.

THE BAR SINISTER

BY

J. MORGAN DE GROOT

Wm. BLACKWOOD AND SONS
Edinburgh and London

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER
FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM
YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR
SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fuller Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO
Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.,
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

A Selection from the List of GEORGE NEWNES, Limited

Recent Volumes of Newnes' Thin Paper Classics.

BYRON'S POEMS. 3 vols. The Shorter Poems; The Longer Poems; The Dramas and Satires.

ESSAYS OF ADDISON.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.

PLAYS AND POEMS OF CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE.

LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.

Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; Cloth, 3s. net per volume. Postage, 3d. extra.

Newnes' Pocket Classics.

Super royal 24mo. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net. Postage, 2d. extra.

THE CAVALIER IN EXILE. Being the Lives of the first Duke and Duchess of Newcastle. By the DUCHESS.

GOETHE'S FAUST A Dramatic Mystery. Translated by JOHN ANSTER, LL.D.

THE POEMS OF THOMAS GRAY AND WILLIAM COLLINS.

A JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR. By DANIEL DE FOE.

SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS AND SONGS.

POEMS OF GEORGE WITHER.

SONGS FROM THE DRAMATISTS OF THE XVI., XVII. and XVIII. CENTURIES.

POEMS OF MICHAEL DRAYTON.

Newnes' Devotional Series.

Uniform with Newnes' Pocket Classics. Super royal 24mo; lambskin, 2s. 6d. each net; cloth, 2s. each net. Postage 2d. extra.

LYRA GERMANICA. Translated from the German by CATHERINE WINKWORTH.

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS A KEMPIS.

THE CHANGED CROSS. And other Poems.

THE CHRISTIAN YEAR

THE SACRED POEMS OF HENRY VAUGHAN } Just Ready.

LYRA INNOCENTIUM

Library of Applied Arts.

FRENCH POTTERY. By HENRI FRANTZ. With 86 Full-page Plates, of which several are in colour, 7s. 6d. net. By post 7s. 10d. [Just Ready.]

This volume also contains a comprehensive list of marks and monograms on faience and porcelain, and a list of the prices realised at auction since 1882.

Other Volumes.

DUTCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By W. PITCAIRN KNOWLES.

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE. By FREDERICK FENN.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY. By A. F. KENDRICK.

ENGLISH TABLE GLASS. By PERCY BATH.

OLD PEWTER. By MALCOLM BELL.

SHEFFIELD PLATE. By B. WYLLIE.

THE SPOILERS. By EDWIN PUGH. Illustrated by C. E. BROCK. 6s. By post, 6s. 10d.

SCOTSMAN: "It is a story revealing a good deal of knowledge of the life of people who prey upon others. It is a picture of a not very pleasing phase of life, but it is painted by a man who has evidently studied closely the ways of burglars and resellers, and gives an account of their doings in a manner which suggests an atmosphere of reality."

HASTINGS AND ST. LEONARDS ADVERTISER: "The story is an admirable sketch of the low life of to-day, while there is also plenty of comedy."

THE CHINESE AT HOME. Adapted from the French of EMILE BARD. By H. TWITCHELL. With numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. By post, 7s. 10d.

STANDARD: "M. Bard's pictures of this singular people are bright, entertaining, and at the same time instructive; they help us to see the Chinese at home, and appreciate their better qualities."

SCOTSMAN: "The book as a whole is both an attractive and instructive one for any reader curious as to the present state of China."

Recent Volumes of Newnes' Art Library.

GIOVANNI BELLINI. With an Introduction by EVERARD MEYNELL. With 65 Full-page Plates, including Photogravure Frontispiece.

FRA ANGELICO. With an Introduction by EDGCUMBE STALEY. 64 Full-page Reproductions and a Frontispiece in Photogravure. 3s. 6d. net each. By post, 3s. 10d.

Other Volumes.

Each volume contains about 64 full pages in monochrome, and a Frontispiece in photogravure. These are in many cases made from works which have not previously been reproduced. Each volume also contains a list of the principal works of the artist. 3s. 6d. net, by post, 3s. 10d.

BOTTICELLI. By RICHARD DAVEY.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. By A. L. BALDRY.

CONSTABLE'S SKETCHES. By Sir JAMES D. LINTON, R.I.

VELASQUEZ. By A. L. BALDRY.

GOZZOLI. By HUGH STOKES.

RAPHAEL. By EDGCUMBE STALEY.

VAN DYCK. By HUGH STOKES.

G. F. WATTS. By Dr. R. PANTINI.

TINTORETTO. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.

PAOLO VERONESE. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.

BURNE-JONES. By MALCOLM BELL.

FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. KONODY.

EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. By MALCOLM BELL.

PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By ARSENE ALEXANDRE.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. By ERNEST RADFORD.

LATER WORK OF TITIAN. By HENRY MILES.

THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By J. E. PHYTHIAN.

Studio.—"Messrs. Newnes' now celebrated series devoted to the Great Masters . . . excellently reproduced, and apparently considerable trouble has been taken to secure reproductions of some of the least known and less accessible of the painters' chief works."

Art Galleries of Europe.

Uniform with "NEWNES' ART LIBRARY." 3s. 6d. net. By post 3s. 10d.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF LONDON:

THE FLEMISH SCHOOL.

THE EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.

THE LATER BRITISH SCHOOL.

THE DUTCH SCHOOL.

Modern Master Draughtsmen.

THE DRAWINGS OF DAVID COX. With an Introduction by A. J. FINBERG. 7s. 6d. net. By post, 7s. 10d. [Just Ready.]

Other Volumes.

7s. 6d. each net. By post, 7s. 10d.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. BURNE-JONES. By T. MARTIN WOOD.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A. By MALCOLM BELL.

DRAWINGS OF ROSSETTI. By T. MARTIN WOOD.

DRAWINGS OF J. M. SWAN, R.A. By A. LYS BALDRY.

DRAWINGS OF MENZEL. By Dr. HANS SINGER.

Great Etchers.

Uniform with Drawings by Great Masters.

CHARLES MERYON. By HUGH STOKES.

VAN DYCK. By FRANK NEWBOLT. 7s. 6d. net, each. By post 7s. 10d.

GOLF FAULTS ILLUSTRATED. By G. W. BRIDAM and J. H. TAYLOR. Large 8vo, illustrated, 5s. net. By post, 5s. 4d.

The cheapest and most authoritative work upon this popular game.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE [A.D. 1720.]

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.
West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY have the pleasure to announce that they have now made arrangements under which they are enabled to publish Autotypes of a number of the more important of the Works of the late Mr. G. F. WATTS, R.A.

The Reproductions are made in Permanent Carbon, and include the following:

"Hope."	"For He Had Great Possessions."
"Love and Life."	"Dawn."
"Love and Death."	"Fata Morgana."
"Good Luck to Your Fishing."	"Time, Death and Judgment."
"Orpheus and Eurydice."	"Thetis."
"Paolo and Francesca."	"Britomart and Her Nurse."
etc. etc. etc.

Published in two sizes—

About 18 ins. by 14 ins., 12s.; and 10 ins. by 6 ins., 5s. each.

Or, framed complete—

From 21s. for the large size, and
10s. 6d. for the small size.

The first three on the list are also published in a larger size, about 27 ins. in height. Price £1 10s.; or framed complete, £2 15s.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
FINE ART GALLERY, 74 NEW OXFORD STREET,
LONDON, W.C.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies, and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1776

MAY 19, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 27, 28, and 29 to fill Vacancies in Scholarships and Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the BURSAR, The Bursary, Little Dean's Yard, Westminster.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.—See Staff (honoursmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS FOR THE NONCONFORMIST MINISTRY.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUSTEES offer for open competition, Undergraduate Scholarships, tenable in the University of Glasgow only; and Divinity Scholarships for Graduates, tenable in any approved School of Theology or University. The Scholarships are open to Students of all Denominations preparing for the Nonconformist Ministry. For particulars apply to the SECRETARY, DR. WILLIAMS'S LIBRARY, Gordon Square, London, W.C., before June 1.

GREEK LITERARY GENTLEMAN would give GREEK LESSONS at PUPIL'S RESIDENCE. Terms: Three Lessons a Week, Three Hours, 10s.; Four Hours, 12s.—Write R. L. G., care of Gould's, 54 New Oxford Street, W.C.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—11 Victoria Gardens, Notting-hill Gate, W.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

SECOND-CLASS ASSISTANT ACCOUNTANTS in the Army Accounts Department, and Examiners in the Exchequer and Audit Department (18-20) May 24.

The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, London, W.

PARTNERSHIP WANTED, in advanced school for boys, by Cambridge University Honour Man.—Particulars to GRADUATE, 313 Edge Lane, Liverpool.

Lectures

LECTURES in FRENCH on Modern French Art and Literature will be given by Mlle. PÉCONTAL at the Elysée Galleries, 17 Queen's Road, Bayswater, at 3 P.M. on seven successive Thursdays, beginning May 17. The course, 10s. 6d.; single, 2s.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

READERS and COLLECTORS will find it to their advantage to write for J. BALDWIN'S MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, sent post free on application. Books in all Branches of Literature. Genuine bargains in Scarce Items and First Editions. Books sent on approval if desired.—Address 14 Osborne Road, Leyton, Essex.

THE YELLOW BOOK, an Illustrated Quarterly, vols. 2 to 13, 1894-97, illustrated by Aubrey Beardsley, etc., original cloth, uncut, clean; published at £3 net, for 45s.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,

All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

JUST PUBLISHED—B. H. BLACKWELL'S MONTHLY LIST OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS for APRIL, containing English Literature, Part 1 (Addison to Leigh Hunt), Biography, Natural History, Sport, etc.

Also Monthly List of New Books (English and Foreign) published during April.

50 AND 51 BROAD STREET, OXFORD.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

MISCELLANEA GENEALOGICA ET HERALDICA, Vol. II, First Series (about 1870), wanted; good price given.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury, (Vol. I., 1869 for sale.)

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. rod. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. rod. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSEK, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. rod. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. of every description typewritten with promptness and accuracy at 7d. per 1000 words. Envelope addressing and duplicating circulars at lowest terms. Specimens and testimonials on application.—Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

TYPEWRITING.—8d. 1000 words (Remington). Novels, Plays, Duplicating Circulars, etc.—Miss WILLARD, Beaufort House, Osborne Road, Southville, Bristol.

Art

EXHIBITION of PAINTINGS by J. D. FERGUSSON and ARTHUR STUDD, and Metal Work by G. DIKKERS & Co., of Holland, open May 21.—THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W., 10 to 6.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

STAMMERING.—The severest and most obstinate cases can now be perfectly and permanently cured by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years; call or write.—Mr. A. C. Schnelle, 112 Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

NEW WORK BY OSWALD CRAWFURD

Just Published

THE REVELATIONS OF INSPECTOR MORGAN

By OSWALD CRAWFURD, C.M.G.,
Author of "Sylvia Arden," "The Ways of the Millionaire," etc.

PRICE 6 SHILLINGS.

Contents:—DETECTIVE INSPECTOR MORGAN.
GENTLEMAN COGGINS: ALIAS TOWERS.
THE FLYING MAN.
THE MURDER AT JEX FARM.
THE KIDNAPPED CHILDREN.

LONDON: CHAPMAN &amp; HALL, LIMITED.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER
FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM
YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS
THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND
MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR
SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,

and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	467	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		Bertrand de Born . . . . .	478
Alfred Ainger . . . . .	469	Fiction . . . . .	479
The Origins of Arab Art . . . . .	471	Fine Art:
More Tinsel Queens . . . . .	472	Flemish Art at the Guildhall . . . . .	481
Town and Country . . . . .	473	Mr. Strang's Etchings . . . . .	482
Why do the Nations . . . . .	474	Music:
British Birds . . . . .	475	The New Grove's Dictionary . . . . .	483
The Art of Bazzi . . . . .	475	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	484
To a Seer . . . . .	476	Correspondence . . . . .	484
Holland Walk . . . . .	477	Books Received . . . . .	486
Gazettes in Rhyme . . . . .	477	The Bookshelf . . . . .	487

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

WE have been reading with great amusement and (we blush to confess it) some profit to ourselves, a book recently published by the Clarendon Press and called "The King's English." The authors, or compilers, give us no better means of naming them than their initials, H. W. F. and F. G. F.; but those initials should be stencilled on the walls of all newspaper offices and all the rooms in which people write for publication. Indeed, since their owners have caused us to blush, we feel inclined to hang their initials over our looking-glass, and read them as the text for the day, as Mr. Horace Hutchinson's golfer read the words "Slow Back!" "all the time he shaved." "The King's English" points out, with a delicate finger and a delicate but very "nasty" wit, the mistakes that most people make in writing what they suppose to be English.

Naturally, we turned first to the Index, to see there how the authors dealt with the mistakes or tricks against which the ACADEMY—in the privacy of the editorial room—has wielded its blue pencil since March 1905. (Readers of an article on this subject by Mr. Andrew Lang in the Morning Post some weeks ago should note carefully the dates appended to his quotations from this paper). Before we mention one or two of them, we would acquaint our readers, for the first time, with the fact that they have escaped from more offences than they are likely to have suspected. If, in the past fourteen months, we have cut out two "somewhats" from the manuscripts accepted, we have cut out twenty thousand. The number of times the words "so," and "such" lacking any "that" to follow, have either had the necessary "that" supplied or been deleted, is beyond calculation (the habit of saying that something was "so sweet" or "so clever" without adding how sweet or how clever is not confined to women writers); the impersonal "one," imitated from the French on, which we have always regarded as, if not incorrect, at least very ugly, has consumed, roughly, about one blue pencil a month. If Mr. T. Herbert Kendrick, who wrote the letter that appeared in our number of May 5, had been able to compare the number of impersonal "ones" printed with the number written in the manuscripts, he would have seen that the author of the Causerie of that week was not alone in finding the usage convenient.

We have, too, consistently discouraged the use of "individual" in place of "man," "woman," or "person." "Unique" to us means "the only one in the world": we have never (we wager) allowed it to be used in these columns for "good," "exceptional," or "unusual"; while as to "rather unique" or "almost unique," not even those pampered persons, the writers of signed Causeries, have been spared correction when they committed those offences. In the same way, "perfect" to us has always meant perfect. A thing can no more be "almost perfect" than it can be "almost infinite." We admit, however, that we have sometimes passed the use of "singular" for "unusual," and of "singularly" for "very."

"Excellent," again, is a word that our blue pencil has crossed out fifty times and more in a week. That which is excellent excels everything else of its kind; but even ACADEMY reviewers have an idea that the word means nothing more than "good." While as to "very," a writer of our acquaintance (he is sitting in the room with us now) makes a point, while reading over any article he may have written, of cutting out all the "verys"—and performs in some degree the same office for those whose work he is privileged to publish.

Of other bad habits—the use of "phenomenal" for "extraordinary," "phenomenon" for "fact"; the use of "tags" like "true inwardness," "galore," "a certain," "perchance," "nothing if not," "the worthy" (author or subject), "up to date," "you shall find" ("for you will find"); together with the use of foreign phrases when English phrases will do, and many others pointed out or passed over by H. W. F. and F. G. F.—we can claim to be guiltless. Their book is disquieting. It "gibbets" (as they would not say) many usages which we imagined permissible; it spares many to which we have vowed enmity. It allows, for instance, the impersonal "one," and says nothing against "firstly," "lastly" and "later on," the last of which Walter Pater used to correct in the present writer's college essays. But perhaps we may give some idea of how good and valuable a book it is, by stating that it has made us so nervous that we doubt the correctness of every sentence we have written. If any reader take the trouble to check these notes by "The King's English" and send us a list of the mistakes, it will prove, not that we are guilty of an excessive quantity of "solecisms," as the hack journalist calls mistakes, but that the correctness of all modern writing is "very far to seek."

We must not close our account of the book without remarking that the authors "fly at high game." Ruskin, John Morley, George Eliot, Thackeray, Stevenson, Frederick Greenwood, Henry James, and George Meredith: these are some of the writers they convict of slovenliness. That Dickens, Crockett, and E. F. Benson should occur frequently on their "black list" "was only to be expected": of one of Mr. Benson's mistakes the authors remark that it "is generally whipped out of schoolboys." But to a woman falls the distinction of having written the very worst sentence of all that they quote. It is as follows: "Why even Tennyson became an amateur milkman to somewhat conceal and excuse the shame and degradation of writing verse." The mistakes in that are not confined to its grammar.

To the Times of Monday last Dr. B. P. Grenfell and Dr. A. S. Hunt contributed an article of more than common importance and interest on their last season's discoveries of manuscripts at Oxyrhynchus, the Egyptian city where the excavations of the Egypt Exploration Fund have already yielded many valuable finds. Those of the fifth season reported in the article referred to prove to be the most valuable of all. A couple of cases of rolls were found to contain a number of second- and third-century papyri. Among these was a papyrus of Pindar, containing principally paeans, with elaborate scholia. Some twelve lines are, at present, all that we have extant of Pindar's paeans, so that this manuscript "practically introduces us for the first time to this class of Pindar's compositions." Another most important discovery is a tragedy on the subject of Hypsipyle, which Drs. Grenfell and Hunt believe to be no other than the lost Hypsipyle of Euripides.

Of this at present only a hundred lines, mainly lyrical, have been discovered, but it is expected that more will be found later.

Among the prose manuscripts containing works hitherto unknown to modern days is a papyrus of the orations of Lysias, containing the conclusion of a speech against Hippothereses; and a fragment of a history of Greece, possibly by Ephorus or Theopompus. The part already deciphered deals with "the relation of parties at Corinth to Argos and Sparta" after the Battle of Nemea; B.C. 394, and "refers to two otherwise unrecorded incidents in the Peloponnesian War." The discovery of a papyrus containing seventy lines of the meliambi of Cercidas, the fourth-century poet-philosopher of Megalopolis, will mean, practically, that for the first time we shall be able to judge the work of a writer of whom only fourteen lines have hitherto been known:

These are things to make the mouths of scholars water. But it is not only classical scholars and students who will be interested in the discovery of forty-five lines of a lost Gospel, written in a cultivated literary style and phraseology, and displaying a "curious familiarity—whether genuine or assumed—with the topography of the Temple and Jewish ceremonies of purification." The incident recorded, according to the article from which we draw our information, is a visit of Jesus and His disciples to the Temple, in which a Pharisee reproaches them with their neglect of the ceremonial of purification, and, having described that ceremonial, receives a crushing reply which contrasts outward with inward purity.

A Society that makes such discoveries as these deserves hearty and practical support. Funds, we learn, are urgently needed by the Græco-Roman branch of the Egypt Exploration Fund to carry on the excavations at Oxyrhynchus; and the publication of the news of the latest discoveries should have the effect of bringing in subscriptions in large numbers. They should be sent to Mr. H. A. Grueber, at the offices of the Egypt Exploration Fund, 37 Great Russell Street, W.C.

From the British School at Athens, too, there has recently come good news and an appeal through a letter to the Times from Mr. George A. Macmillan, the Chairman of the Managing Committee. The walls of the city have been traced for four-fifths of their extent, and are found to be Roman, not Byzantine, in period; the theatre has been investigated and a life-sized statue of Aesculapius discovered; and, most important of all, the Temple of Artemis Orthia, the scene of the chastisement of the youths of Sparta, has been identified on the right bank of the Eurotas. Here votive offerings—small models in lead, ivory, bronze, gold, silver and terra-cotta, of gods, men, fishes, animals and inanimate objects—have been found in thousands. The Managing Committee appeals for another £500 to continue the work. The treasurer is Mr. Vincent Yorke, The Farringdon Works, Shoe Lane, E.C.

Sunday, May 20, is the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Stuart Mill; and all the surviving supporters (if any) of the "Liberalism of the Sixties" will keep their saint's day. To tell the truth, the anniversary means little to the public of letters; and among philosophers Mill's day has passed. Any undergraduate who has just begun to read "Lit. Hum." can point out the central fallacy which invalidates his whole argument for utilitarianism. It will be sufficient, therefore, to give our readers a bare reminder of the anniversary.

It may appropriately be recalled this week, in connection with the birthday of Miss Florence Nightingale, that exactly fifty years ago Mr. Gerald Massey, in his little volume "Craigcrook Castle," now long out of print, made Florence Nightingale the subject of an ode in the section of the book called "Glimpses of the War." Though not one of the happiest of Mr. Massey's lyrical efforts, it is essentially characteristic. The closing verse is as follows:

The Rose did lift her veil, and blush
At her bower-door like a Bride;
The shy brown birds came back with Spring
In our merry green woods to hide.
But there she sang, our Nightingale!
Till War's stern heart grew mild;
And, nestling in the arms of Peace,
He slumbered like a Child.

The dulness of official reports is proverbial, and the annual reports of public library authorities are not exceptions to the general rule. Occasionally, however, a report reaches us which is interesting, because it expresses opinions, and gives reasons. The annual report of the Bromley Public Library records the fact that the library committee have bought books upon two principles. The first is to avoid the sharp division between "light" reading and standard literature, and to buy more books which form, as it were, a bridge between the two extremes, and so tend to encourage the reading of better and still better books. . . . The second principle is to limit the number of subjects represented. It is impossible to include an adequate number of up-to-date books on all subjects. The alternatives are to make the Library as fully representative of knowledge as possible by purchasing one or two books on each subject, or to limit the number of subjects, and to provide a fuller course of reading in each. The Committee have acted upon the latter course.

We would point out that the "bridge" will be of no avail unless the Committee does its best to give the utmost publicity to the good books lying beyond the bridge.

The report ends by pointing out one result of the public library movement which its detractors have overlooked. "It should be borne in mind" that the statistics in this Report—or in the report of any municipal library—do not show the whole benefit of the library to the community. To a large extent a library is a school for readers; it attracts people, encourages and trains the reading habit, and finally produces a certain proportion of finished readers. If these trained readers read pure literature, the library continues to satisfy them. But some of the trained readers adopt special lines of study, the books for which the library can never hope to supply. Such readers leave the library, and form collections of their own; they continue the reading which the library has induced them to begin, but for which it no longer gets the credit. It is well to note that at the present time, notwithstanding the increased use of all municipal libraries, the number of books in the home, and the number of small special collections for private study have increased to an extent which was certainly not expected fifteen or twenty years ago.

So far as the average municipal library is concerned, this argument is perfectly sound. It is obvious that only the very large general libraries can satisfy students and specialists; and even the British Museum and the Bodleian at times fail to provide the thorough-going student with all he wants. Time is proving to the bookseller that the municipal libraries are among his best friends.

A Greenock gentleman, who is an enthusiastic "Meredithian," has printed a lecture he recently delivered on "The Shaving of Shagpat" and Mr. Meredith, in accepting the dedication of the brochure, remarks that the essay recalled some of the thoughts he had when writing the novel—if it can be so called. "The Shaving of Shagpat," according to the Greenockian disciple of the "Master of all of us," as Stevenson termed Meredith, is "all allegory." It is almost if not quite fifty years since this work of Mr. Meredith was written, and in one of the early editions of the book he wrote that: "Though I certainly should be flattered to have it supposed that anything very distinct was intended by me, the Allegory must be rejected altogether. The subtle Arab who conceived Shagpat meant either very much more or very much less, and my belief is that designing in his wisdom simply to amuse, he attempted to give a larger embrace to time than is possible to the profound Dispenser of Allegories, which are mortal, which, to be of any value, must be perfectly clear, and when perfectly clear, are as little attractive as Mrs. Malaprop's reptile."

Another question has been asked in the House of Commons about the Official History of the Boer War, which has elicited from the Prime Minister the valuable information that the cost of the work from first to last is estimated at £27,000 at least, of which sum about £22,000 had been expended up to the end of March in this year. Against this sum, he adds with official wisdom, there will be profits from its sale, which have not been and cannot be estimated. It looks, at any rate, as if the vocation of an official historian were lucrative.

An interesting mansion now in the market is Hunsdon House, which Mr. Spencer Charrington purchased in 1882. Hunsdon House, which was founded in 1447, became the palace of Henry VIII. and a favourite residence of his children. The place, however, is chiefly celebrated in literary history as being the spot where Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, first met the fair Geraldine.

Hunsdon did first present her to mine eyen.
Bright is her hue and Geraldine she hight;
Hampton me taught to wish her first for mine.

Surrey's passion may, perhaps, be classed with the love of Dante for Beatrice, and of Petrarch for Laura. According to one account he roamed over Europe challenging all men who questioned the beauty of his mistress, and like Ivanhoe he came out victorious from all combats that ensued. At Vienna he debased his character for chivalrous devotion by falling in love for a time with another lady, but at Florence he visited a magician who was able to show him his mistress seated on a couch and reading one of his sonnets, her eyes the while being filled with tears. Geraldine at this period seems to have been aged seven. Her prosaic destiny was to marry a man old enough to be her grandfather, and when he died to become the third wife of the Earl of Lincoln.

Another house that is in the market is "Bird Grove," a villa near Coventry, where George Eliot took up her abode in 1842. The time that she spent there is full of interest. Owing to her brother's marriage, her father had made up his mind to migrate to Coventry, and there he took a semi-detached house with "a good bit of garden round it." Next door lived Mrs. Pears, who, struck by the evangelical fervour of Miss Evans, introduced her to her brother, Mr. Bray, a somewhat sceptical person, in the hope that the clever young woman might influence him in the right direction. The reverse, however, happened, for within six months she announced to her astonished father that she had abandoned the beliefs learned in childhood, and could no longer occupy her accustomed place in the family pew. Mr. Evans, much enraged, threatened to leave her to make her living by teaching, whereupon his daughter, seeing the value of compromise, consented to resume her attendance at church. It was while she was at "Bird Grove" that she translated Strauss's "Life of Jesus," a task that occupied three years and produced for her the sum of twenty pounds. This period of Miss Evans's life was brought to an end by her father's death, which took place in 1849.

The sale of the Library of Mr. R. C. Fisher of Midhurst, Surrey, which was announced by Messrs. Sotheby for the 21st and three following days, has now been arranged by private treaty. The purchaser is not an American. The collection consists chiefly of early and rare Italian, German and French woodcut books formed by the late Mr. Richard Fisher and his son, the present owner, for the purpose of illustrating the development of the art of Engraving in its connection with Literature, chiefly in France, Italy and Germany.

Among the Italian books are Æsops of 1485, 1493, 1501 and 1510; the Dante of 1491 and 1512; the Bonaventure of 1489 and 1495; the Capranica of 1490; the "Com-mandamenti" of 1494; "Epistole et Evangelii" of 1495 (of which one other copy only is known); the Ovid of 1497, the Petrarca of 1500, and Voragine, 1505. The French School of Engraving is represented by a fine series of Books of Hours, of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, and other works. There is also a series of editions of the Dance of Death by Holbein and others, and first editions of Tracts by Martin Luther and Erasmus, with fine borders. There are also a few remarkable bindings.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—On Thursday next (May 24), at five o'clock, Professor W. J. Sollas begins a course of three lectures at the Royal Institution on "Man and the Glacial Period." The Friday evening discourse on May 25 will be delivered by Mr. Leonard Hill on "Compressed Air and its Physiological Effects."

Royal Geographical Society.—The Anniversary Meeting of the Society will be held in the Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W., on Monday, May 21, at three o'clock P.M., the Right Hon. Sir George T. Goldie, K.C.M.G., D.C.L., F.R.S., President, in the chair. (1) Presentation of medals and awards; (2) Address by the President; (3) Annual report and election of President and Council. The annual dinner will take place at seven P.M. in the Whitehall Rooms.

Society of Arts.—Monday, May 21, at 8 P.M. Cantor Lectures "Heraldry in Relation to the Applied Arts," by George W. Eve, R.E. Three lectures. Wednesday, May 23, at 8 P.M. Ordinary Meeting. "The General Supply of Electricity for Power and other Purposes," by James N. Shoolbred, B.A., M.Inst.C.E. Thursday, May 24, at 4.30 P.M. Indian Section. "The Persis of Persia," by Major Percy Molesworth Sykes, C.M.G., H.B.M.'s Consul-General and Agent to the Government of India in Khorasan.

Linnean Society.—The Anniversary Meeting will be held at Burlington House, Piccadilly, on Thursday, the 24th inst., at three o'clock precisely, for the election of a council and officers for the ensuing year, for the award of the Society's gold medal, for the reception of the Presidential Address, and for other business.

Church of England Society for Waifs and Strays: Performances of Mr. Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon at the Crystal Palace School of Art on Thursday, June 7, and Saturday, June 9, at 3.30 P.M., in aid of the Quarter Century Fund of the Society. The play will be repeated at the Scala Theatre on Monday, June 11 at 3 P.M. in aid of the Bedford College for Women Site and Building Scheme. The performers are past and present students of the Crystal Palace School of Art, assisted by Mr. Gerald Ames, Mr. Lewis Casson, Miss Hazel Thompson, Miss Mary Webb and Miss Elsie Fogerty. Performances under the direction of Miss Elsie Fogerty, 11 Wetherby Mansions, Earl's Court Square, S.W., of whom all further information may be obtained.

Messrs. Christie, Mason and Woods.—Saturday, May 26: Sale of the pictures (mainly of the English school) of the late Mr. T. H. Woods, late senior partner in the firm.

LITERATURE

ALFRED AINGER

The Life and Letters of Alfred Ainger. By EDITH SICHEL. (Constable, 12s. 6d. net.)

MISS SICHEL has written a charming biography of one of the few wits of our time. Every page of this volume yields something to show how excellently fitted the late Canon Ainger was to be the biographer and annotator of Charles Lamb. His was a kindred mind. As we read the story of his life, a most attractive personality is revealed. Canon Ainger in his later days, when Master of the Temple, felt the seriousness of his position, and to some extent restrained the wit and humour which were among his earliest characteristics. He was, indeed, a consummate flower of modern culture, but in him were united to solid attainment the gaiety, the humanity, the wit of Charles Lamb. It is true that a critic fond of fun might suggest as a motto the parody he made for another purpose:

Under the chestnut tree
Who loves to lie with me.

It is no blame to Canon Ainger that most of his witticisms were handed round during his life, and we are glad to have the best of them in an authorised version. His father was the architect who built University College Hospital. He was a clever, witty man of many parts, loved the microscope, played a fine game of chess, and was interested in the development of modern science. There is not much to review of Alfred's early years. He was taken to Germany about the age of seven, but learned no more of the language than "Du bist ein Schwein," a phrase freely applied to those who irritated him. At school he had the inestimable advantage of coming into contact with the family of Charles Dickens. It was an interesting time at which he went up to Cambridge; Latham and Leslie Stephen were tutors at Trinity Hall, and Henry Fawcett was a Fellow. The prophets of the time were Tennyson, Carlyle and Ruskin. Ainger made friends in all directions, one of his most constant companions being Henry Fawcett. His letters from Cambridge, without being extraordinary, are full of the high spirits appropriate to the youth of the Ainger of 1856, and are not without scintillations of the wit which was afterwards to characterise his correspondence. As an example of his repartee at that time we might refer to the occasion when one of the men told him that he had discovered that the classical lecturer used a translation in class. "Ah," replied Ainger, "the ass knoweth its master's crib."

On leaving the University he hesitated for some time about a career. His early predilection had been for the stage, but it was afterwards decided that law should be his profession. His father, however, died in 1859, and it was realised that he could not afford to wait for briefs, and a thought of taking Orders, which had frequently haunted him, now assumed practical shape. He took up residence in St. John's Wood, and a note-book kept by him at this period helps to show us the direction his thoughts were taking. We cannot make any long quotation, but one or two brief extracts will be found very characteristic. Here is one: "Shakespeare said, 'Brevity is the soul of wit.' Our age reads, 'levity.'" And another: "Blackstone says that idiots cannot marry. How frequently is this law evaded!"

In 1860 he was ordained Deacon, and became curate to the Rev. Richard Haslehurst, Vicar of Alrewas, in Staffordshire. Subsequently he went to Sheffield, but in 1866 he left Sheffield and came to live in London altogether. We cannot here say much about his readership at the Temple or his canonry at Bristol. More interesting is it to follow his literary development. He had early gained an introduction to the Macmillan family, and was a constant visitor to their house during a period of fifty years. Other literary acquaintances had been steadily formed since the beginning of his career, and he seemed to glide almost naturally into the world of journalism and criticism. Of the intellectual character that he had developed we can scarcely do better than give Miss Sichel's own account:

Ainger's wit was no mere embroidery: it filled a definite rôle in his life. Spontaneous and mercurial though it was, he had a clear conception of what he meant to do with it. He hardly ever discussed general subjects, even when they were literary ones, and he usually avoided the topics of the day, or any threshing out of ideas. His talk consisted mainly of allusion, of anecdote, of quotation, elements that cannot exist, except in an atmosphere of humour; and his genius lay in their application more than in original flights. "His talk was rich and full" (to quote a Bristol friend), "his silences full of inspiration. He knew exactly how to fill a pause with some dry comment, irresistibly piquant and droll." "By no means a gossip, yet he was very personal—and circumspect in his inquiries about people. These he made with a good deal of human interest, in which his natural precision played no small part."

His wit, as a matter of fact, was used as clothing for thought that was often both keen and deep. After reading Mr. Le Gallienne's "Religion of a Literary Man," published at the Bodley Head, he made the following rhyme:

I read in a Fin-de-Siècle Bard
And then I up and said—
"O give us more of the godly heart
And less of the Bodley Head."

Two other instances of the same kind of cleverness can be quoted. One was made immediately after the appearance of Haweis's book "Music and Morals," which was simultaneous with the birth of his first child:

Little Baby Haweis,
Playing with your corals,
Pa will mind your music—
Who will mind your morals?

Of his readiness the following is a good example:

There was once a discussion as to rhymes at the Macmillans', and some one challenged the company to find a rhyme for "porringer." Immediately there came back Ainger's rejoinder:

The Princess Mary fain would wed,
They gave the Prince of Orange her,
And now it never can be said,
I've not a rhyme for "porringer."

There is enough in what we have said to show his kinship to Charles Lamb, but Ainger's was a more delicate, slighter, more elusive personality. It may be said that he skimmed lightly over the surface of things with only a pregnant glance now and then at the depths below. Of the visible, tangible, concrete, he was a wise and witty judge, but general principles he never seems to have cared to investigate. In his personal character, however, he had that same loveliness by which Elia is distinguished. It went out readily to the poor and needy, whether the poor and needy happened to be biped or four-footed. When living at Hampstead, he always employed a most disreputable looking fly and paid the still more disreputable looking cabman more than was due to him. He hated giving unnecessary pain to man, beast or bird. Yet he had a feeling which amounted almost to abhorrence of whatever was maudlin or sentimental, and not unfrequently cloaked his inner feelings under an outward garb of laughter and even cynicism. He took his profession very seriously, and the responsibility of it seemed to increase with the passing of the years. Yet his preaching was more remarkable for the soundness and sanity of its common sense than for the discussion of difficult theological problems, and looking back over his literary predilections we seem to see a kindred characteristic displayed. He did not at all like Emerson, but he had been brought up on Crabbe, whom to the end he regarded as "Nature's sternest painter." He had his doubts about George Eliot and thought it revolting that she who professed herself one of the most advanced of the materialists of her day should have worked Christianity into her novels in the spirit of a mere artist. But, truth to tell, he had no very just conception of what art meant, but ever in his more serious moods was searching literature for its moral lessons. And occasionally he writes without much discernment, as in his comment to Mrs. Andrew Lang on the well-known article in which W. E. Henley attacked Stevenson:

I suppose Henley's attack on R.L.S. has reached your ears even in your Ultima Thule. Strange that H. should not have foreseen the storm of abuse it must inevitably bring about his ears, and quickly. On hearing of it I took out my pocket-book and instantly produced the following:

"De mortuis nil nisi malum."
"They can't hit back, so let's assail 'em;"

which, however, is but a poor pendant to what suggested it, the words of a modern Irish wit, with a truly Swiftian power of rhyming:

"De mortuis nil nisi bonum."
"When scoundrels die we'll all bemoan 'em."

Of course Henley foresaw (and none more clearly) the tempest he was provoking.

We are sorry to have to add that the index is one of the worst we have ever met in a book of this kind. Why the maker of it should, for instance, have inserted Tennyson's name and not Browning's, is a mystery. There are many other equally startling omissions, and very little skill has been shown in construction. How convenient it would have been, for example, to have had an entry under the heading of parodies!

THE ORIGINS OF ARAB ART

Moorish Remains in Spain. By ALBERT F. CALVERT. (Lane, 42s. net.)

IN the whole history of artistic development few things are more remarkable than the swiftness with which the Arabs evolved an original style of construction and decoration. There is, perhaps, something of a paradox in the very terms of this statement: yet the originality of the art is no more questionable than its evolution from definite antecedents. What, then, are the sources from which the Arabs derived their first inspirations? What were the forces which moulded their characteristic style? And how came it that a semi-barbarian people of Arabia in the seventh century—a people “in the days of ignorance” almost artless and unlettered—were able, as early as the eighth century and in the distant cities of Spain, to produce works which must still be judged as of the highest artistic excellence?

The problem which these questions suggest is curious and interesting: the materials for its study are by no means scanty: yet it remains, so far as we are aware, without any clear or complete answer. No doubt the fact is partly due to geographical conditions. The two main groups of Arab architecture are sundered by the whole length of the Mediterranean. There are no Mohammedan buildings of importance in Arabia: few in Syria, with the exception of Damascus: on the northern coast of Africa there is little of value except the mosque at Kairwān: while in Egypt to the east and in Spain to the west we find a series of splendid monuments from the earliest times to the fifteenth century. But a writer on Arab art is seldom familiar with both groups of buildings, and, unless he know both, he is not fully equipped for a scientific study of the subject, since such a study must be based on a survey, comparison, and correlation of all the chief forms in which the Muslim spirit found expression.

Mr. Calvert has produced a beautiful book in outward show, but it is not one founded on any serious study of the subject. It is illustrated with so lavish a richness of colour that to turn its pages gives one at first almost the same impression of splendour as one receives in wandering from hall to hall of the Alcazar of Seville: and this is probably the highest compliment we could pay to the book or its author—a compliment which we shall regret having to qualify. He aims mainly at placing on record some such impression and at giving some notes on Spanish history: for his final chapter on “Moorish Ornament” is poor, and the elaborate series of diagrams which follows it, and which contains a careful analysis of geometrical design, is borrowed without acknowledgment from Bourgoin. And the great skill with which page after page is illumined in colours—no other term is so apt—does not atone for the weakness of the subject-matter or the want of relation between these illuminated pages and the text.

Facts, of course, are given here and there by which a student may profit. For example, there is precise evidence that the great Mosque at Cordova—on the whole the most interesting Arab building in the world—was designed by a Christian architect from Syria, and was enriched by Christian workers in mosaic sent from Byzantium. Mr. Calvert's theory that the mosque was built in imitation of a palm forest will not stand for a moment. The Syrian architect more probably had before him the plan of the church of the Nativity at Bethlehem. With this in mind he reproduced the atrium or forecourt in what is now the Patio de los Naranjos: the pillared aisles were multiplied by a stroke of genius and extended in every direction; and the mosaics adorning the east end of the Syrian church have their counterpart in the mosaics upon the mihrāb of the mosque. Here then, we find the conquering Arabs, as soon as they were settled in Spain, displaying at once a remarkable love of splendour, a native refinement of taste, and the good sense to employ Christian artists when as yet they had none of their own. Precisely the same thing happened in Egypt, where, for example, the Mosque of Ibn Tulūn was built by a Christian architect. And it must be remembered that even in Arabia itself churches such as the Cathedral at Sanā, built in the time of Justinian, had furnished examples of magnificence in structure and adornment, which may have helped to form in these rude conquerors that love of the arts which they certainly developed with amazing rapidity. Muslim art, then, sprang from Christian beginnings, and among the most potent influences which determined its style was the exclusion of the human form and in fact a distrust of the pictorial as well as of the statuesque. It followed that colour and line had to be almost independent of nature: form became more and more conventional as the imitation of nature was abandoned, and finally for the variety of nature was substituted the complexity of balanced lines—in other words geometrical symmetries. But the geometrical style was novel only in the perfection to which it was carried in design and scheme of colour by the Arabs. The Pompeian, and still more the Byzantine, mosaic pavements figured by Owen Jones, show clearly the development of this style: and the origin of the so-called arabesque from Byzantine forms is equally clear. That nevertheless the Mosque of Cordova and the Alcazar of Seville are of a type original and unique, it would be folly to deny: and one could wish that Mr. Calvert had shown signs of some independent research in dealing with the evolution of this type.

Apparently, however, the book is meant to be more popular than scientific, and it professes to stand more on the illustrations than on the text. Now as regards the text, the historical matter is put together in a readable narrative, but it is both superficial and florid, and is disfigured by many mistakes. It may be unreasonable to expect that an author writing on Moorish things should know a little Arabic: but Mr. Calvert's slips are often quite inexcusable. Forms like Es Deffah (p. 17), Abd-dhobi (p. 44), Dair as asdaca (p. 133), Abdullah Ibn (p. 240), Amron (p. 408), are frankly impossible. So is Zak-hrafah, where, indeed, the letters divided by the hyphen represent but a single letter in the Arabic. It was not necessary to give the Arabic for gilding: if given, it should be given correctly. Nimbar, for mimbar, iman for imam, and mezzin for muezzin are perversions of forms well known in English, though for the absurd Almnedian (p. 199) Mr. Calvert is not responsible. But there is distinct carelessness in such matters: thus Idrisi on p. 42 becomes Edrisi on p. 103: Juma on p. 42 (which by the way denotes union, not rest) is apparently the same as Alchuma on p. 44, and neither is quite right. If fuseyfasa is a form used in the Spanish to mean mosaics, it is merely a transposition for Ar. sufaiṣaṣa; but there is nothing mysterious in the Arabic, which is taken from the Byzantine ψήφωσις. Then on p. 53 it is said that the Mosque of Cordova was finished in 793 A.D., and on p. 63 in 794–5 A.D.: and Mr. Calvert does not seem to know that the original bridge at Cordova was Roman, and that the Roman substructure remains.

But there is a far more serious criticism to be made about the illustrations. We gladly admit the fulness and the excellence of the views and detail drawings of the Mosque at Cordova: the views of Seville are good, as far as they go; and the coloured plates are at least superbly executed. But with one solitary exception—the vase—not a single drawing is given to scale. Moreover, so vague is the attribution that one is puzzled to know to what building a plate refers. Nor does the text help one: it does not seem to contain a single reference to the coloured plates. If this fact was surprising, the explanation proved astonishing. On comparing this book (which on its title professes to give a particular account of Moorish remains at Cordova, Seville, and Toledo) with the same author's work on the Alhambra, we discovered that of the eighty-five coloured plates no less than fifty-five relate neither to Cordova nor to Seville nor to Toledo, but are the identical plates—copied largely from Owen Jones—used to illustrate the author's book on the Alhambra, to which they rightly belong. But in the Alhambra book these plates have their distinctive titles, specifying the part of the Alhambra to which they refer—"Court of the Lions," "Hall of Justice," and so forth. Here in almost every case the distinctive titles have been suppressed, the order has been changed, and nothing but vague descriptions are left, such as "ornament on panels," "spandrels of arches," etc. And these plates so disguised are thrust at random into the text describing Cordova and Seville without a word of warning that they have nothing to do with buildings there, but belong to buildings at Granada. How the author can defend this proceeding we do not know: it is certain that any one buying the book would do so under the false impression that these fifty-five plates illustrate the text: they do not, and both their presence and their arrangement in the book are grossly misleading.

Beside this, it is a small matter to note that on plate xix. the Cufic inscription is upside down: that on plate viii. portados is a mistake for portadas (why Spanish at all?): and that in the chapter on Toledo the author gives photographs of the very interesting church of Santa Maria la Blanca which is not mentioned in the text: while in the text he speaks of Cristo de la Luz as "a gem of Moorish-Byzantine architecture, which is regarded as the oldest and most perfect specimen of its kind," and yet he gives no illustration of it whatever. Again, in treating of the Alcazar at Seville he does not seem to know how much it is suffering from mere imitation work of to-day; and to the unrestored and therefore more interesting Casa de Pilatos he gives less than a page of text, and makes no mention of the exceedingly rare and beautiful lustre of the wall-tiles there, a lustre of blue and purple, green and crimson, quite different from the familiar gilt lustre of Hispano-Moresque ware. Nor does he note the contrast between these Spanish tiles with their purely conventional designs and the rich and varied flower patterns of Rhodian and Damascus tiles as found in Syria and Egypt.

Taken altogether, Mr. Calvert's book is most disappointing, and we think that the Alhambra plates should be withdrawn.

A. J. BUTLER.

MORE TINSEL QUEENS

Later Queens of the French Stage. By H. NOEL WILLIAMS. (Harpers, 10s. 6d. net.)

IN reviewing Mr. Noel Williams's former volume, "Queens of the French Stage," some months ago, we spoke of our disappointment at finding it rather a gossip than a scientific work. The second volume of what we hope may prove to be a series of these handsome books (though Mr. Williams will be more puzzled for titles the further he progresses) is now before us, and we find it still less scientific than its predecessor. For one thing, the ladies he writes of as "Later Queens" had less influence on their art than those of the former volume—Armande Béjart, Champmeslé, Favart, Clairon, Adrienne Lecouvreur, and the others, who all had an interest through their artistic aims and achievements as well as through their highly-coloured private lives. Of the later Queens, only Sophie Arnould, the friend and champion and first exponent in Paris of Gluck, and Madame Saint-Huberty effected a reform in the costume of opera. The rest of them, Guimard, Raucourt, Madame Dugazon and Mademoiselle Contat, are remarkable only for their personal triumphs and popularity on the stage and their varied love-affairs and fortunes off it. Perhaps the most remarkable case is that of Mademoiselle Raucourt, the tragic actress. Early in her career, her virtue was impregnable. A girl of great beauty, she resisted all the handsome proposals made to her; not even a Prince of the Blood, the Duc de Bourbon, could move her resolution, and the Parisian public, struck, perhaps, with the novelty of the idea, admired her as much for her honest life as for her superb acting. And then Voltaire, possibly tired of hearing Aristides called the just, possibly in order to champion, as Mr. Williams suggests, his favourites, Adrienne Lecouvreur and Clairon, against the fame of a dangerous rival, sent a letter to his friend the Maréchal de Richelieu, casting doubts on the reality of the lady's notorious virtue. The letter was read aloud (by accident) at a dinner-party at which Raucourt was present, and she fainted away on hearing the passage that accused her. But the mischief was done. The fickle public came to believe that they had been duped, and Mlle. Raucourt, finding that she had lost the rewards of virtue, plunged straightway into a life which won her, justly or unjustly, the reputation of being more vicious than ever she had been virtuous. Then the mob turned on her. She was not only a bad woman, they declared, but a bad actress. There may have been some truth in that. "A dissipated life," writes Mr. Williams, "does not conduce to success in any profession." She was hooted from the stage. Theatrical intrigue cast her over and over again for parts that were unsuited to her genius. At last she ran away, to hide in Paris in the uniform of a grenadier, which her great stature and mannish air enabled her to wear to advantage. Her subsequent adventures are no less exciting; and, being a lady of strong monarchical sympathies (Marie Antoinette and the Court had championed her stoutly through all her troubles), she was arrested and imprisoned with the two Contats, Fleury and other players of the Française. Their dossiers were all marked by Collot d'Herbois with the G that meant "Guillotinez!" and it was only by the connivance of a clerk in the Bureau des Pièces Accusatives that Mlle. Raucourt and the rest escaped.

The most charming of all these six subjects chosen by Mr. Williams for this volume is, undoubtedly, Sophie Arnould, the opera-singer. Sophie's life was no better than those of the rest of them. At eighteen years of age she ran away with "M. Dorval," who appeared to be the well-behaved young artist-lodger in her father's house, and was in reality no other than the eccentric Comte de Lauragais; and she clung to him—with intervals—for many years; but the intervals were too frequent to allow her to claim constancy. She was not only a very clever operatic singer, but a woman of a sharp tongue. Mr. Williams gives us many instances of her keen wit; and the best joke she ever made we will tell in his own words. The occasion was one of her many quarrels with M. de Lauragais.

No sooner had her tyrannical lover left Paris, than she ordered her coach—a present from the absent Lauragais—threw into it pell-mell everything portable that she had ever received from him: jewellery, plate, lace, porcelain, and so forth. placed the two children she had borne him on the top, and despatched the whole cargo to the Hôtel de Lauragais, Rue de Lille, with a note for Madame de Lauragais, in which she stated that "having resolved to recover her freedom, she did not wish to retain anything which might serve to remind her of her unhappy love-affair." Madame de Lauragais, who was a good and long-suffering woman, accepted the children, "regretting very much that they were not her own," but sent back the coach and the rest of its contents.

The most interesting part of the story of Sophie Arnould's professional career relates to the arrival of Gluck in Paris in 1773, and the production of Iphigénie en Aulide in 1774. The difficulties with which the heroic little Bavarian had to battle are almost inconceivable. The operatic stage was disgraced not only by the scandalous indecency of the behaviour behind the scenes, but by what was even worse from the composer's point of view—bad acting, bad singing, perpetual squabbles between singer and singer and between singer and orchestra. He attacked and defeated all these abuses.

Throwing off his coat and replacing his wig by an old cotton nightcap, he would dart about the stage, imploring Mlle. Arnould to follow his music, M. Larrivée not to sing through his nose, M. Legros to endeavour to express something at least of the dignity and nobility which one was accustomed to associate with the great champion of the Greeks, and the chorus to endeavour to look and move a little less like automata.

And the artists, with the fear of the Court to reckon with, had to obey "this terrible man, whom they devoutly wished at the bottom of the Seine."

Madame de Saint-Huberty, the great opera singer, has a special interest for us in that she ended her life, very tragically, at Barnes. She had (ultimately) married the Comte d'Antraigues, who, once an ardent Republican, turned his coat and became an agent of the Bourbons in London and elsewhere. He had taken a house on Barnes Terrace, where, on the morning of July 22, 1812, just as he was about to drive into town to see Canning, he and his wife were murdered by their Piedmontese servant. The man was suspected of being in the pay of Fouché, but his immediate suicide prevented the truth of the case from being known.

To any one who likes gossip, amusing stories, vivid descriptions of a very brilliant and heartless state of society, just before it toppled to its fall, we recommend Mr. Williams's handsomely published book. He has spared no little trouble in research, and is thoroughly well up in his subject; and his book makes most agreeable reading.

TOWN AND COUNTRY

The Heart of the Country. A survey of a modern land. By FORD MADOX HUEFFER. (Alston Rivers, 5s. net.)

MR. HUEFFER has written here a very remarkable book. Its title is somewhat misleading, as it might induce one who took a cursory glance at it to believe that the author had penetrated into the inmost recesses of Nature, whereas the phrase seems to mean only that spot in the country which is known and particularly dear to each of us. Mr. Hueffer, needless to say, is a poet; and for that very reason we regret that he should have plunged into the politics of the country. As long as he gives us only the results of his vision his work is delightful, but what is meant to be the practical side will, we think, strike most people who know the subject as being extremely impracticable. The book, too, would have been better without the very long and rather dreary opening chapter called "The Country of the Townsman." It contains one or two striking thoughts, it is true, such as the speculation that: "The necessity for the Nature of green fields is at an end, according to the New Millennialists." Striking we have called this, but Mr. Hueffer himself does not believe it to be true: Wheat is still the staff of life and meat forms the second most important item in ordinary diet. The fleeces of sheep and the pelts of cattle supply us with the greater part of our clothing. That "Foods exquisite and nourishing are to be made from mineral oils and acids" counts for very little, so does the "raiment of glorious dye and skin-caressing texture . . . to be had from all sorts of coal-tar products." It will be some time before the latter supersedes wool and cotton. The townsman's country is in reality a somewhat poor affair: a house (with a garden or a field or two) mostly used for sleeping in, and without any of the long associations that constitute the real charm of the country to the countryman. However, there is no need to labour that point, because Mr. Hueffer is most generous in his estimate of the importance of the true countryman in our economy. He describes a print that used to be found in cottages in the following terms:

It shows a man bearing upon his back many others: a king on the top, then, in a bunch, a soldier, a priest, a lawyer, a doctor, a merchant. Those who form the burden bear scrolls: "I govern all," "I fight for all," "I pray for all," "I cure all," "I sell for all," and the figure with its bowed head, like Atlas groaning beneath the weight of a world, exhibits the legend: "I work for all."

After much cogitation he seems to come to the conclusion that the peasant is right when he says: "I govern all," "I fight for all," "I pray for all," "I cure all," "I sell for all." He puts the same sentiment in a manner that is equally pregnant when he says:

And there, for me, the agricultural labourer stands. He is, after all, Every-man, this final pillar of the state, this back-bowed creature who supports king, soldier, priest, merchant and the rest. And if I desire to have a good idea of my kind, une fière idée de l'homme, I think of him. He is the raw material from which we draw, the mud from which our finer clays are baked.

It is a new way of stating what was said long ago by Oliver Goldsmith in "The Deserted Village," and, working with such thoughts in his mind, it was only to be expected that Mr. Hueffer would produce a book that, whatever its other merits or demerits may be, is at all times manly and sympathetic. He recognises that the peasant is a pillar of the State. All the greater is his grief, therefore, to find him disappearing from the land whereon he was nourished. The state of things that he discovered is set forth in the following passage:

It is, I think, a truism to any one who knows the country, though I have found townsmen to deny it, that there are whole stretches of territory in England where a really full-witted or alert youth of between sixteen and thirty will absolutely not be found. I visited lately eighteen farms of my own neighbourhood, covering a space of about four miles by two miles, and on this amount of ground only five boys found employment. Four of these were below the average intelligence, and had at school not passed the fourth standard; the fifth was so "stupid" that he could not be trusted to do more than drive the milk-cart to and from the station. And of all the farm-labourers' families that I know well—some forty-six in number—only two have youths at home, and one of these has "something the matter with his legs."

Without in the slightest degree questioning our author's accuracy, it ought to be said that the district wherein he found only five boys employed on eighteen farms must be a very exceptional one. The rural exodus has been extremely severe, but through the whole extent of the country it has led to nothing like this. If a similar area had been taken, for example, in the small-holdings district of Lincolnshire, a full proportion of young men would have been found. Even in Wiltshire, where, we presume, Mr. Hueffer gained a great deal of his information, he had but to go to Winterslow, where Major Poore has founded a colony of small holdings, and he would have found the population there steadily on the increase. He says that, making a rough calculation of the figures as they have presented themselves to him, he finds that "just over five per cent. of the country-born boys I have known have stayed of their own free choice on the land." He goes on to say that the living-in system still prevails in the North of England and that it does keep the youths on the soil. We do not know precisely what district he refers to when he uses so vague an expression as the North of England. In Northumberland and Durham the living-in system has been practically abandoned, and in Cumberland, the land of statesmen, it never prevailed to any great extent. Even if we come so far south as Cheshire, there is very little of the living-in system to be found, although a number of the farmers follow the old practice of feeding the servants in the house. But though these men have cottages that they go to at night, yet in other respects they do not materially differ from the same class in other parts of England. Again, it is one of the most remarkable facts about the rural exodus that it has proceeded to the same extent among the well-paid Northumbrian hinds as among the poorer farm labourers of the south. The result has been that on many farms the greater part of the work is done by women because boys are not available. This is the region of large farms; where small farms exist, a considerable proportion of the young people will be found to remain on the old homestead, and this reminds us of another mistake that Mr. Hueffer would have avoided if he had possessed a wider knowledge of the country. He says:

For it must be remembered that the field labourer has not any reason for courting the society of his betters. He cannot by any possible means rise in the social scale. A successful draper will become a knight and build a manor-house, but there is no kind of "success" open to the usual farm labourer. Hence he has no reason for snobishness and "knows his place."

Now it is a very remarkable fact, to which attention has frequently been drawn, that farm labourers have very often succeeded in obtaining land for themselves. They are by no means so hopeless as our author makes them out to be. Moreover, what gives driving power to the movement in favour of small holdings is that it supplies this object of ambition. Every writer on this subject tries to construct for himself a Utopia, and that of Mr. Hueffer, which a millionaire might help him to carry out, can best be shown by quotation. He would take 50,000 acres of mixed down, hill-side, woodland and marsh, and would arrange them thus:

400 holdings of between 1 and 10 acres apiece,	averaging 5	...	...	...	...	= 2,000 acres.
50 holdings of	20 acres apiece	...	...	...	...	= 1,000 "
10 "	150 "	...	...	...	...	= 1,500 "
5 "	300 "	...	...	...	...	= 1,500 "
4 "	500 "	...	...	...	...	= 2,000 "
4 "	1,000 "	...	...	...	...	= 4,000 "
2 "	5,000 "	...	...	...	...	= 10,000 "
2 "	10,000 "	...	...	...	...	= 20,000 "

This would account for 42,000 acres, and the remaining 8,000 I would leave available for the pleasure-grounds of large houses, for villa residences, for week-end cottages, and for what not.

Here we should have, as it were, the manœuvring-ground for an army of 10,000 souls. So many thousand—the privates—would be the men and the families of the field labourers, men too young, too indolent, too dissipated, or too merely slow-brained ever to rise or to have risen. But such a man might save enough money to acquire a holding of from one to ten acres; or he might show enough intelligence to satisfy an agricultural bank that he could be trusted with money enough to be aided in the acquirement of such a holding. Then he would be, as it were, promoted to the rank of corporal or lance-corporal. He would have a holding not large enough to render himself quite self-supporting, and he would be there ready to be employed by the larger farmers at times when there was need for extra labour. And from that stage, either by proofs of saving or of being aided by the banks, he might be promoted to the rank, as it were, of a sergeant in this army—he might acquire a holding of twenty acres; and so given luck or genius, he might go upwards until he or his sons might take one of the large mixed farms of five thousand, or one of the downland ranche farms of ten thousand acres.

Comment on these suggestions is unnecessary. We leave them to the consideration of the millionaires who, according to the author, are required for the purpose of carrying it out.

WHY DO THE NATIONS . . .

The Development of the European Nations, 1870-1900. By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D. (Constable, 18s. net.)

THE historian who sets out to survey areas of contemporary human activity so vast as those which come under Dr. Rose's observation in the volume before us has a high claim, as a pioneer, upon the gratitude of his generation. The true significance of many a modern event has too often been obscured rather than revealed by the tanglewoods of comment springing up around it, and he who ventures back into the maze of memoirs and newspaper correspondence, biographies and blue-books, in order to notch the track, is doing service not only to the writers who may come after him but to all who care to give a thought to the trend of great movements about them. We congratulate Dr. Rose upon the completion of a book which presents the European nations massed, as it were, and moving, in conflict or amity amid a broad historic panorama, during thirty years of surpassing interest.

To open upon the year 1870 is like putting the eye to a kaleidoscope of tumbling, changing, and coalescing state-patterns. Regarded as either an end or a beginning, it possesses unique advantages as a starting-point. In the first aspect it calls for some such introductory retrospect as that in which Dr. Rose lays stress upon the working together of those two great kindred impulses towards individual liberty and racial union, which swept over Europe during the nineteenth century, while, regarded as a beginning, it retains a strong hold upon the imagination of both the present generation and that which is passing away. When those of us who have now reached mid-stream were in our cradles, the bubble of French military invincibility was pierced by the bayonets of a confederacy, under the leadership of a once despised and bullied state. To-day those bayonets seem sometimes the most significant and sinister thing in Europe; and our fathers, who saw that re-adjustment of temporal power, who have seen a consolidated Germany, a new Italy, a rehabilitated France, all dwelling perforce upon the motto of the strong man armed, are wondering whether thirty years of Europe have anything to show comparable with one decade of an island that lies east of Cathay.

Dr. Rose's book falls naturally into two main divisions, the European and the extra-European, corresponding roughly with the two halves of his period. For the first fifteen years or so, the human interest centres exclusively in Europe. We pass in review the Franco-German quarrel, the difficult re-construction of France and the consolidation of the German Empire. After the rectification of what had become in 1870 a false equilibrium in Western and Central Europe, Russia occupies the field, and five chapters treat of the Eastern question, the Russo-Turkish War (a war in which genuine racial and religious enthusiasms played their part on the Russian side, however much the subsequent treatment of Roumania and Bulgaria by Russia's rulers obscured it), the Balkan settlement, the making of Bulgaria, and the conflict between Absolutism and Nihilism in Russia. Dr. Rose gives a fine picture of brooding war in the midst of the peace preliminaries in 1878.

The Russians and Bulgars, swarming over Roumelia, glutted their revenge for past defeats and massacres by outrages well nigh as horrible as that of Batak. At once the fierce Moslems of the Rhodope Mountains rose in self-defence or for vengeance. And while the Russian Eagles perforce checked their flight within sight of Stamboul, the Greeks and Armenians of that capital—nay the very occupants of their foreign embassies—trembled at sight of the lust of blood that seized on the vengeful Ottomans.

Nor was this all. Far away beyond the northern horizon the war cloud hung heavily over the Carpathians. The statesmen of Vienna, fearing that the terms of their bargain were now forgotten in the intoxication of her triumph, determined to compel the victors to lay their spoils before the Great Powers. In haste the Austrian and Hungarian troops took station on the great bastion of the Carpathians, and began to exert on the military situation the pressure which had been so fatal to Russia in 1854.

This last paragraph recalls an instance of external pressure upon an international situation, in which the parts played by Austria and Russia were reversed. In 1870 when Austria seemed likely to embrace the French cause, hints went from St. Petersburg to Vienna that this would mean the presence of Russian troops upon the exposed Galician border. The menace was a main factor in the appearance of that system of alliances which, re-inaugurated by Bismarck, has resulted in the ponderous, uneasy stability of the present day. It is curious to reflect how completely the two main ideas upon which his policy at the outset rested—friendship with Russia and isolation of France—have failed, and, it might be added, how little the Franco-Russian alliance has affected the potentialities of Germany. But Bismarck's chief diplomatic triumph remains in the Austro-German compact (the fruit of his moderation after the war of 1866) which has till now secured the solidity of Central Europe, and was more firmly based upon mutual regard and racial affinity than was the accession of Italy to the alliance, or the gravitation of France towards Russia.

With the chapter upon the Triple and Dual Alliances we pass from Europe into Central Asia. For in Europe:

the age of great achievement, that of the years 1859-85, makes way for a period characterised by satiety, torpor, and an indefinable malaise. Europe rests from the generous struggles of the past, and settles down uneasily into a time of veiled hostility and armed peace.

Having framed their State systems and covering alliances, the nations no longer give heed to constitutions, rights of man, or duties of man; they plunge into commercialism and search for new markets. Their attitude now is that of Ancient Pistol when he exclaims:

"The world's mine oyster
Which I with sword will open."

It is through the consideration of the rival expansions of Russia and Great Britain in Central Asia that Dr. Rose attempts to vindicate a criticism of Lord Beaconsfield's attitude towards Russia at the close of the Russo-Turkish War, to which he gives frequent expression. Apart from the fact that his policy "dissociated the new feeling of imperialism from those humanitarian sentiments which lay at the root of the Balkan problem" and so paradoxically nourished in the end false ideas as to the relationship between timidity and righteousness, the consequent "unending hostility of Russia . . . has clogged British policy at every turn and probably helped to bring about the discreditable surrenders of the year 1884-86 and 1895-97." Those periods of "graceful concessions" weigh heavily upon Dr. Rose's memory. Moreover, as it seems to him, the fault has lain with the nation at large.

The lesson that lies clear on the surface of our present historical inquiry for all who have eyes to see is that the responsibility for the public weal rests more with the masses of the people than with its officials. Only by whole-hearted exertions and self-denying sacrifices have the great national movements of the present age reached their goal; and these qualities are not apparent in the younger generation of Britons.

Not the least of England's dangers lies in the fact that, collectively and individually, we are the happiest and freest people in the world, with little to pay for our good fortune. Those potentialities for self-sacrifice, discipline, organisation of which Germany and Italy furnished proof were made manifest at great gain, indeed, but at enormous cost. As Dr. Rose truly says: "after struggling for a generation through a wilderness of plots and punishments, those two peoples reached the Promised Land only to find it a parade-ground," nor has any great European nation escaped that experience. In that parade-ground the individual:

has entered into a state of military serfdom. There he is but a bond-man tolling to add his few blocks to the colossal pyramid of war which imposes respect upon some enemy away in the desert. From that life there can come no song. From those weltering masses, engaged in piling up work upon work against some remote contingency, there rises, and will still more arise, a dull confused questioning murmur, whether the whips of fear which drive them on are not wielded by some malignant Fury masquerading in the garb of Peace—whether the whole gigantic effort is not a hideous nightmare, a game with men's lives doomed to end in stalemate.

Well would it be if the nations could lay down their arms; but till that millennium comes there is a menace to us in that terrible picture with which the book concludes.

BRITISH BIRDS

Handbook of British Birds. By ANTHONY COLLETT. Illustrated by ERIC PARKER. (Macmillan, 6s.)
A Pocket-book of British Birds. By E. F. M. ELMS. (West, Newman, 2s. 6d.)

ALMOST every young naturalist begins ab ovo—from a desire for the oval, coloured thing in the hidden nest. For him this bird's-nesting book is written, and we hope he will appreciate the delightful art shown in its get-up. It opens with nine plates of eggs which are a real pleasure to look on. The colouring seems to us more truthful, and indeed, more beautiful than any we have seen, even in the more luxurious classics. It is a novel and excellent idea to give mere outlines in the case of the white eggs. The emphasis is thus laid on the shape which is curiously distinctive in most species when the attention is drawn to it. In the coloured plates the only failure in precision seemed to us in the excessive breadth of the swallow's, the too deep colouring of the missel-thrush's, and the exaggerated smallness of the cuckoo's egg. In many cases two specimens are given, and the benefit might well have been extended to the cuckoo. It would have been worth while to devote a whole plate to cuckoo's eggs, that the young generation of naturalists might have had the old fallacy of adaptation visually dissipated.

The only fault to be found with the book is a want of ambition in the scope. The title suggests none of the charm which the book possesses. It compares, for example, most unfavourably with that standard delight of boys in the country, Mr. Johns's old-fashioned "Birds in their haunts"—a title in a thousand. This, too, is a book of birds in their haunts, on a rather less ambitious but more useful model. It deals only with inland birds and each little monologue covers no more than a page or two. But it is vastly more than a handbook. The accounts, of course, owe their debt to the standard works, but in every instance the description proclaims the personal observation of a naturalist with peculiar insight of his own and a wide experience. Of course, in any book that is not exhaustive other observers will find anomalous intrusions or omissions. Half a dozen birds in the list are less common than the ubiquitous jack-snipe, which is omitted. Too much is sometimes sacrificed to space. The best part of Mr. Selous's discoveries on the feeding habits of the night-jar and green woodpecker are omitted; and it is surely no new theory of his that the bird engulfs small flies and midges in the lump as it flies. Fuller reference to the call-cries as well as the songs would have been welcome. It cannot be too soon impressed on the boy-naturalist that song is only a part of the language of birds. This distinction is quite as important, for example, as the correction of the fallacy about migration, which is one of the few general things for which Mr. Collett finds room. He is, of course, entirely right that the line between home-keeping birds and birds of passage cannot be sharply drawn. We notice in Mr. Elms's useful little book, which is what its title proclaims, that "intermigratory" is adopted as a technical term, applicable to the stonechat and all birds of similar habits of movement.

It is when Mr. Collett allows himself a little wider range that we regret the too rigid adhesion to the Handbook ideal. With the help of the publishers the volume seems to us quite the best handbook that has been published. No boy could desire a more faithful or more pleasing companion. But we should like to see the authors go further afield. Mr. Johns gave black and white illustrations of the birds themselves over his chapters. Mr. Collett might do worse than produce a companion handbook with picked illustrations of some birds and some nests to illustrate protective colouring and the wider observations on which this second volume would have room to enlarge. We have a great many ornithologists in these days who relish the old books and absurdly exaggerated theories—Darwinian and other—which were cut and dried before the sum of observation was sufficient. A writer with so fresh and original an outlook would be welcomed by naturalists who have got beyond the handbook-stage, if any one can claim to have done that.

THE ART OF BAZZI

Giovanni Antonio Bazzi (hitherto usually styled "Sodoma"): The Man and the Painter, 1477-1549. By ROBERT H. HOBART CURT. (Murray, 21s. net.)

To many a lover of the hill-towns of Italy Siena stands supreme. There is fascination in every turn of her narrow streets and every page of her turbulent history, and her pictures have a charm as potent as the lives of her saints or the façade of her splendid Duomo. The possessor of some of Duccio's most famous work, the home of Matteo di Giovanni, of "the Sienese Fra Angelico," Sano di Pietro, and later of the Lorenzetti and many others, Siena maintained for a long while the severity of Trecento ideals, and was still almost Byzantine in feeling when Florence was permeated by Renaissance tendencies. But even Siena was conquered at last, and the arrival of one whom Siena made her own, Giovanni Antonio Bazzi, has much to do with the development which was thereafter apparent. He enriched Siena with works of wonderful beauty, and amid much that is unworthy of him, the city possesses his finest frescoes. A visit to Siena is necessary to an understanding of the enthusiasm which he has aroused.

Mr. Cust's book is a welcome and valuable addition to the existing literature relating to this fascinating painter. Welcome also is the title, for it is full time that the name of "Sodoma" should either be entirely dropped or made to take a secondary place; it being very probably, as Mr. Cust suggests, a nom de guerre given him without special evil meaning by some club or society of which he was a member. In his opening chapter Mr. Cust endeavours, with a very fair measure of success, to clear the painter's good name from the unpleasant aspersion which that untrustworthy chronicler, Giorgio Vasari, casts upon it. It is most unlikely, Mr. Cust points out, that even a Medici Pope would have appended to such a name the title "Cavalier of Christ," or that the Emperor would have conferred the rank of "Count of the Holy Roman Empire" upon him, had the sinister interpretation which Vasari puts upon the name been recognised at the time. And, even in Renaissance days, it is difficult to imagine that Carmelites, Dominicans and Franciscans would have chosen so notorious an evil liver to adorn their cloisters, their refectories, even their altars, with scenes from the lives of their great saints, Bernardino and Catherine, in that city of Siena that lay under the special protection of the Blessed Virgin. That Bazzi had risen altogether superior to the faults and vices of his period no one will maintain; but the refined beauty of his Madonnas and saints and the restraint with which he treats such a subject as the Marriage of Alexander and Roxana (painted for Agostino Chigi's bedchamber at his villa in Trastevere) should suffice to prove that in a licentious age Bazzi's ideal was high. The master who gave us that majestic and beautiful presentment of the Risen Lord, who could so realise the ecstasy of a St. Catherine or the tender grace of Eve, and paint the wonderful Sleeping Disciple, stands in no need of a defender. He enriched Italian Art with some of its most ideal figures, and has taken his place amongst the great painters of his time.

It is uncertain whether Bazzi was ever actually a pupil of Lionardo da Vinci, whose influence is sometimes strongly felt in his work. Like Bernardino Luini, he may never have been in da Vinci's studio. Neither of these painters, though reflecting something of Lionardo's types, was the mere imitator which his actual pupils, such as Solario, Cesare de Sesto and others, became. Bazzi owes something to Giacomo della Quercia, whose statues he studied. The graceful draped figures which we find in such frescoes as the Marriage of Alexander, with their feeling for classic types and their serene Greek beauty, may be traced to the influence of della Quercia. The figure of the young King in the Adoration of the Magi in St. Agostino, Siena, and a drawing of the head of Leda are Lionardesque: the ideal presentments of Christ, the noble S. Sebastian in the Church of S. Spirito, Siena, together with all the pictures of St. Catherine, seem characteristic of the painter himself. In Mr. Cust's book we find the subject most exhaustively treated; with Italian documents at the end of the volume, and a useful list of all the pictures attributed to the painter.

Bazzi spent the greater portion of his life in Siena. Mr. Cust gives us, in careful sequence, his apprenticeship, his early years in Siena, his two visits to Rome, his return to Siena and so forth, and we gain a clear idea of the personality of the painter—his great love for animals, and especially for horses, his great popularity with all classes, his impulsive and careless ways. Bazzi's early frescoes at St. Anna in Campresa exhibit already some of his characteristics, such as his fine arabesque work and the careful drawing and modelling of the limbs of the principal figures beneath their robes, showing his mastery of anatomy. He was not strong in composition, and we get amongst the confused and over-crowded figures some very careless drawing. Amongst these, however, there stand out figures of the greatest beauty and dignity. We feel the truth of the remark made in the preface to this book: that Bazzi was an "immoral" painter, "because, with such gifts and such talents, he . . . let himself drift into work that would disgrace any artist." Tuscan influences may be traced in these early frescoes. Bramante's decorative architectural designs appear, together with the well-known ruins of ancient Rome, in many of his backgrounds, and Lionardo's rocks and running water are sometimes suggested. Bazzi may, therefore, be described as a true child of the many-sided Renaissance, complex in character and in aim, assimilating from many sources the ideals and culture of the period, reminding us now of Perugino, now of Pintoricchio or of Raphael, then again of the great Lombard master; yet giving us at the same time the expression of his own art in many tender and lovely forms, which, though borrowing something from others, were yet in their consummation characteristically his own. The frescoes in the Farnesina, for example, give an excellent idea of the painter's most classical style.

In 1508 Bazzi was working in the stanze of the Vatican. Of his work there the ceiling in one room yet remains to us, having been spared by the Pope at Raphael's request. The friendship between the two painters was very genuine; and, as Mr. Cust tells us, there is a marked resemblance in their work. Their children, for instance, classic patti or Holy Infants, or youthful portraits, are much alike. Many drawings still extant are ascribed alternately to Raphael and Bazzi; and, at his best, the latter need not fear the rivalry of the great Umbrian himself. About 1525-6 Bazzi painted the Swoon of St. Catherine, and to this period we owe the Eve and the Sleeping Disciple. Of the Eve Mr. Cust says: "Her modesty, instinct with the knowledge of power, is absolutely unsurpassed and unsurpassable." These words might, mutatis mutandis, be applied also to the gracious figure of Christ stepping from the open tomb in the fresco in the Palazzo Pubblico. The passage descriptive of Eve is one of the most beautiful amongst Mr. Cust's many eloquent tributes to the painter. We feel with him that "the creator of two such perfect works as the Marriage of Alexander and the Descent into Limbo must, in spite of all his many weaknesses, take a foremost rank amid artists of all ages." In the summary at the end of this scholarly work we find a just appreciation of the art of Bazzi as a whole. It is most true that, setting aside "all weakly sentiment prompted by the effect upon us of two or three of his most celebrated paintings," we can see "the light of genius shining through his errors," and can do "justice at last in restoring him to the place among the painters of the Renaissance, which he so fully deserves."

TO A SEER

GAZING upon our life thou seest it,
Wherefore to thee we look, if we may know
Our own dark secret,—we who have but wit
Dimly to see thy face that is aglow
Beholding our bewilderment, as though
Thou findest there some glory infinite.—
Thou smilest, seeing: us it doth befit
Patient along our shadowy way to go.

HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

HOLLAND WALK

IN Holland Walk the spring's young grace
Shows furtively in sheltered ways
With tender bud and blossoming;
O'er greener grass the great trees fling
Their shadows, on these soft March days.

The elm-trees lift their fragile lace,
Whereon high up a small nest sways;
And gaily now the thrushes sing
In Holland Walk.

Ungratefully my spirit strays
Far off to some wild woodland place
Where the wet wolds and meadows bring Largess of gold to greet the spring—
Too sombrely she shows her face
In Holland Walk!

ISABEL CLARKE.

GAZETTES IN RHYME

JOHN CHURCHILL, Duke of Marlborough, suffered many things at the hands of his Queen, his country and his country's poets, and in the month which will see the two hundredth anniversary of Ramillies, one of the most successful campaigns ever fought by British arms, it is interesting to recall some of the praise lavished upon the greatest of English soldiers. He lived to see many of the poets turn against him, but he was, at any rate, spared in his life-time poems so bad as those which were published after his death.

It was Warton who first called "The Campaign" a gazette in rhyme, and in a sense the description is true, not only of that poem but also of many later verses, which are less known. Addison, it should be remembered, set out to write his account of Blenheim with truth as his ideal:

Marlbro's exploits appear divinely bright,
And proudly shine in their own native light;
Raised in themselves their genuine charms they boast,
And those that paint them truest praise them most.

There is much to be said for that point of view, and Addison's tact in adopting it is to be praised, for he gave Godolphin exactly what he wanted—a set of complimentary verses on Marlborough. Prior's flattery in prose and verse was far less successful: it was, as may be imagined from his behaviour all through his life, fulsome to a high degree, and that without the grace of diction which characterises some of his work. The ode on Blenheim, though it was, as Prior himself owned, indifferent verse, has the merit of being occasionally humorous: for instance, the struggles with names of places:

To say how Louis did not pass the Rhine
What work had we with Wageningen, Arnheim,
Places that could not be reduced to rhyme?
And though the poet made his last efforts,
Wurts—who could mention in heroic—Wurts?

Nor can Prior's Ramillies ode be counted an improvement on his earlier effort. "I set Horace before me as a pattern," he wrote, and goes on to say: "the choice I made of following the ode in Latin (Qualem ministrum, etc.) determined me in English to the stanza, and herein it was impossible not to have a mind to follow our great countryman, Spenser." In this ode, which is long and dull, there is a good deal of truth. It was not mere flattery to write the following lines of Marlborough, whose virtues were such that it could never have been said of his army, at any rate, that it swore terribly in Flanders:

Yet, mindless still of ease, thy virtue flies
A pitch to old and modern times unknown:
Those goodly deeds which we so highly prize
Imperfect seem, great chief, to thee alone.

The "we" in the third line refers, we presume, to Prior, his Emmas, and his Chloes—a good criterion of virtue.

It should be noticed that Prior evaded the difficulty of accenting Ramillies correctly by writing "Ramilia," so there is something to be said for adopting a classical model. The word is pronounced locally "Ramillee"—which is as near as we can get to it phonetically—with the accent on the last syllable, but it was evidently a great stumbling-block in England. A rhymed letter to Mr. Prior, published anonymously in 1706, throws the accent on the penultimate syllable:

The very ladies too, with Conquest pleased,
Renounce their scandal, and of War discourse,
And search the Maps to find Ramilly out.

I am not aware who was the author of this, but one more quotation from it, if only for the phrase, "sad variety," may be pardoned:

With Eyes intent the Warrior God surveys
The horrid Chaos of the purple Field,
Pleas'd with the sad variety of Death,
He snuffs with greedy nostrils human Gore
And on the boundless Ruin gluts his Rage.

The ordinary pronunciation of the word is to be found in the famous Irish ballad celebrating the deeds of an Irish regiment which fought on the side of the French:

When on Ramillies' bloody field
The baffled French were forced to yield,
The victor Saxon backward reeled
Before the charge of Clare's dragoons.

Yet another rendering of the word is to be found in "Tristram Shandy," where it is related that my Uncle Toby marched to the attack of the widow in his white ramallie-wig, which the corporal put fresh into pipes for the occasion. Ramillies set a fashion in wigs as Steinkirk did in cravats.

The amusing part of all these poems is the profound contempt which the poets had for one another, and which they did not hesitate to express. Sir Richard Blackmore in his "Advice to the Poets," after bidding the "unguided Muse"

with Rev'rence yield
Thy Strength unequal to Ramillia's field, goes on to suggest a composite effort by Prior, Congreve, Granville, Stepney, Walsh, and Hughes, with Summers and Montague presiding to "correct their labours and their progress guide." It will be noted that he omits Addison, at whom must be intended the thrust:

Ye mercenary Wits, who rime for Bread,
Ye unfledg'd Muses, this high Subject dread.

Oldmixon, too, in the preface to his pastoral poem on the victories at Schellenbergh and Blenheim says that, "had our soldiers fought no better than our poets write upon them we should have had little to rejoyce over but our Victory at Sea." He justified the use of the pastoral model by citing several instances "wherein the Antients have suffered the Rural Muse to tower upwards with a dazzling wing, and Thalia soars as high as Clio or Calliope." But the most scornful of all was Mr. T. Cooke, who wrote a poem in three cantos on the death of the Duke in 1722, and who calls his fellow poets daring scribblers, fawners, and a vile herd. Mr. Cooke is peculiar chiefly for his grammar, of which this is a specimen:

Next Ramellies (that raised the mighty He
To his Meridian in the brightest Sky)
Call'd him to add new glories to his Name.
There Villeroi in vain your valour show,
For know, weak Man, 'tis Marlborough is your foe,
He Fortune's Darling, Fav'rite of the Sky,
Round whom ten thousand Guardian Angels fly:
Him they protect, him from the Sword defend,
Balls fly in vain round whom those Angels tend.

I have kept to the end some extracts from that glorious poem "The Funeral," by Arthur d'Anvers, chaplain to Lord Carteret, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. It opens with the beautiful thought :

My weeping Muse attempts in humble Verse
To sing a Hero laid up in his hearse.

From this work we learn that Addison, after being transported to "join the Choir," was complimented with a seat between Maro and Homer, and that :

Homer too puts on a solemn Smile
To greet the Genius of the British Isle.

We are naturally anxious to know where Marlborough sat, but our curiosity is not gratified except in so far as to learn that he :

tho' only now a shade
Does from above the cause of Freedom plead.

This, however, was only after a prolonged conversation with "the great Nassau," when :

Nassau with transport is by Marlborough told
That Glorious George does now the Scepter hold.

It will be seen from these quotations what Marlborough and his memory suffered at the hands of the poets, but he really escaped lightly in comparison with some of his contemporaries. A poem entitled "The double welcome to the Duke of Marlborough" which was published in 1705, leaves the explanation of the "vast particulars" to those who "sing in numbers suited to the man" and deals more with home affairs. The Duke, it says, will be doubly welcomed on his return, as he is badly wanted to "engage with devils nearer home" and to Calm the Churches' sea and keep it still,

And fix the Nation's peace against her will;

the cause of all this being apparently Dr. Sacheverel, who is described as :

High Church Buffoon, the Oxford's stated Jest,
A Noisy, Sawcy, Swearing, Drunken Priest.

S. T. S.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

BERTRAND DE BORN

It is difficult to imagine any more ideal character for the hero of a mediæval historical novel than Bertrand de Born. A contemporary of Eleanor of Aquitaine and of Richard Cœur de Lion, this most celebrated of the Languedoc troubadours lived at a time when chivalry was most brilliant, and the feudal system was at its best. Lofty ideas of character and conduct prevailed. Admiration was freely bestowed upon those who nobly earned it; and, however much the standard of those times may have differed from our own, there is no doubt that the test of renown was not that of worldly success or wealth, but of personal qualities and achievements. This estimate of individual men was greatly helped forward by the troubadours and trouvères. They had brought their art to perfection. Even kings were proud to be numbered in their ranks, and songs and poems composed by Thibaut, King of Navarre, Alfonso, King of Arragon, and Richard Cœur de Lion are still extant.

Of Bertrand's early years little is known. He went, before he was grown up, to live in the Castle of Hautefort, which, according to the custom of the times, he shared with his two brothers. He seems to have been a most quarrelsome person. There were continual feuds between the brothers, though Bertrand had by no means the right to sole possession of the castle. In fact, had the castle been the property of one lord only, Bertrand would not have been that one. His character comes out clearly in his poems, of which the majority were written with the express purpose of stirring up war. He had a passion for fighting, and seeing others fight. A state of peace was to him a state of dishonour, in which no good quality could ever be cultivated.

Almost the first thing we hear definitely of Bertrand de Born is that in 1181 Count Raymond V., besieged in Toulouse by Alfonso of Arragon, besought him to compose a servente that should arouse the neighbouring seigneurs. The request in itself shows the power of the troubadours, and in this case Bertrand's poem brought so many willing combatants to Toulouse that Alfonso was forced to retire. The diffusion of poems, it may be remarked, was chiefly due to the jongleurs. A troubadour, as a rule, merely composed the words, and his favourite jongleur would learn the poem, fit it to music (though some troubadours were good musicians) and obtain leave to sing or recite it. An amusing reply of Bertrand's has come to us in answer to a jongleur who begged him for a poem.

You ask me for a poem, as you desire to achieve notoriety, regardless of the fact that your voice is that of a crow, that you sing out of tune, that you are as swarthy as a Moor, as ragged and dirty as a Savoyard; yet you prefer money and notoriety to poverty and modest retirement; so here is a poem for you :

and then follow several fine verses about the duty of fighting, chivalrous behaviour, generosity and so forth.

Like all his contemporaries, Bertrand was devoted to the old régime of the Dukes of Aquitaine. He bitterly resented the occupation of his country by the English. He was devoted to Queen Eleanor, as being the last representative of the old rulers, and his one hope was that her sons would shake off the authority of their father, establish themselves in Aquitaine and once more make it a free country. In particular, he had a deep love for Henry Plantagenet, the eldest son of Henry II.—"le jeune roi" as he is called in all the chronicles—and regarded him as the model of a noble knight. Bertrand's unceasing efforts to induce him to throw off his father's authority were, unfortunately, only too successful. Rebellion followed rebellion, and in the course of the last, which proved fatal to him, Prince Henry committed an act which may so have preyed upon his mind as to hasten his death. Searching everywhere for plunder wherewith to pay his troops, he came to the sanctuary of Rocamadour, and finally, after forcing the church dignitaries to hand over all their portable wealth, he seized Durandol, the sword of Roland. This sword had been hurled through the air after the battle of Roncevaux in order that it might not fall into the hands of the Saracens (a throw of a few hundred miles), and had imbedded itself in the rock. Henry sold the weapon to a Jew and replaced it by a common imitation. As he was hastening away, he heard the chapel bell ring. This is a miraculous bell, which has only been heard to ring a few times, always without human agency and only when Our Lady of Rocamadour intervenes to save a soul otherwise doomed. Henry felt himself doomed, and, after reaching a little town hard by, fell sick and died. He made, the chronicler said, "a beautiful death," and was attended to the last by Bertrand, who undertook to convey his body to its last resting-place. No sooner, however, had he started upon his journey than he heard that the English king, grieving for the loss of his favourite son and furious with Bertrand, whom he considered as the cause of Prince Henry's bad behaviour, was advancing to besiege his castle of Hautefort. Bertrand threw himself into the castle and hastily made such preparations as he could before Richard, temporarily acting with his father, and Alfonso of Arragon (who formed the advance guard of King Henry's army) arrived. The siege was notable for a remarkable incident. Finding the countryside ransacked of provisions, Alfonso asked Bertrand if he would supply him with food for his starving troops. The generous troubadour immediately supplied his wants abundantly, and, supposing that his foe would be animated by a similar spirit, begged in return that the attack of the heavy siege engines should be directed upon particular parts, since one wall was too weak to stand an assault. The treacherous Alfonso, however, betrayed the secret to Richard. The castle was soon carried and Bertrand brought a prisoner to King Henry's camp. Here all his wonted audacity left him, and, upon the king's taunting him with his lack of spirit, he burst into tears and confessed it had all forsaken him upon the death of his dearly loved "jeune roi." Henry was so moved at the sight of his real grief that he not only spared Bertrand's life but accorded him the treatment given to those who voluntarily surrendered their fortresses at their feudal lord's command, i.e., restored to him the possession of the castle. More; the king made out the title-deeds in due form, observing at the same time that Bertrand had obtained the castle like a rogue and hoping he would retain it like an honest man. Bertrand promptly went back to Haute-fort, which he compelled his brother Constantins to quit. Remonstrances were vain, and, when Constantins brought his complaint before the king, Henry acknowledged the injustice of his action but confessed his powerlessness to do anything. Constantins called the formidable routier, Mercadier, to his aid; but Richard came to support Bertrand, and finally Constantins abandoned his attempts and even abjured the name of Born. For a few years more Bertrand's activity continued. Some years previously he had insulted his patroness, Mahent de Montignac, by saying that her charms as compared with those of Matilda of England were but as sand beside gold; and Bertrand had found himself in the extraordinary position of having no patron lady. A reconciliation had, however, been effected; and inspired a few half-hearted love poems. But these were all, and his songs continued to be devoted to the promotion of his ideal, the spirit of chivalry and readiness to fight in its behalf. Amongst these later songs, not unnaturally, was more than one attack upon Alfonso, whose treachery was amply requited by the unforgetting Bertrand.

In the year 1196 Bertrand de Born retired to Dalon, an abbey of the Cistercian order, founded by Géraud de Sales and situated midway between Born and Hauteville. Many a stormy spirit in those days sought repose in like manner in the quiet of the cloister, and numerous stories are told of the difficulties the unhappy abbots experienced in curbing their turbulent novices. Curiously enough, Bertrand took kindly to his new life. And, if the abbots were agreeably surprised by his docility, there is no doubt that many who had suffered from his unsparing tongue were no less delighted at his voluntary self-effacement.

MAXWELL H. H. MACARTNEY.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Defoe as a Sociological Novelist," by Ernest A. Baker.]

FICTION

The House of Cobwebs, and other Stories. By GEORGE GISSING. With an introductory survey by THOMAS SECCOMBE. (Constable, 6s.)

WE are not of those whose pleasure in a man's work is necessarily increased by an intimate acquaintance with the circumstances of his life, yet it were idle to deny the power of that faculty (none the less irresistible for being frequently unconscious) which some writers have of exciting their readers' curiosity, and we well remember wondering, on taking up a book of George Gissing's for the first time, what manner of man this might be who could write with such bitter suavity, with such delicate irony, of a milieu which he appeared to know well and thoroughly to detest. The few hard, essential facts which invested Gissing's career with a not quite ordinary pathos are now well known to all who care enough to estimate an achievement standing in some sense apart; but the appearance of these fifteen short stories, aptly epitomising his personal attitude towards life as he found it, in conjunction with a strenuously condensed "chronological survey" of his work, justify a brief recapitulation. Educated at Lindow Grove School at Alderley and at

Owens College, Manchester, Gissing found himself at twenty, utterly poor and without a shred of influence, in London. Talented, delicate, and sensitive, of a shy geniality apt to freeze at an uncertain temperature into proud reserve, with a strong taste for the high romantic places of history, and a loathing for the sordid accompaniments of latter-day poverty, he seems to have had no assets but a fine comprehension of the significance of Dickens in English literature, a dogged industry, and the power begotten of dire necessity to pierce, with a pen naturally pointed for delicate introspection and æsthetic analysis, the tortured lives of the educated poor. In stress and poverty he produced his first book, "Workers in the Dawn," in 1880. For three years he suffered under various yokes imposed by the necessity of earning a living wage. Then, most miserably lodged, he sat down to write, book after careful book, year after weary year. After six years one of these, "Demos"—not the best—brought him fifty pounds. He spent them in Italy, the land of his dreams from which "only death would have held me back." It proved more than a decade before he could sufficiently re-emancipate himself to wend South again. The interval was filled with those stories, one or more every year—"Born in Exile," "The Odd Women," "In the Year of Jubilee" are three of them—of which the governing idea, as Mr. Seccombe well summarises it, was to analyse as an artist the misery inherent in the sharp contrasts of modern life and to express it to the world. Equally suggestive is Mr. Seccombe's reflection that in forgetting that the "educated poor" are not all artists, Gissing underestimated those compensating "consolations of temperament, of habit, and of humdrum ideals which are common to the coarsest of mankind." He does not (he says) represent men as worse than they are; but he represents them as less brave. Gissing himself, at any rate, for all his dolorous note, was no coward, and he won through to an independence only too well deserved. Though he died young, he lived long enough worthily to glorify Dickens, to leave behind him that "gentle masterpiece of softened autobiography," "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," to throw his whole romantic soul into "Veranilda." With all that Mr. Seccombe has to say of "Henry Ryecroft" we are in complete accord; but is not his praise of the "Dickens" and "Veranilda" excessive? That sentence, in the one case, about "a context in which every syllable is precious, reasonable, thrice distilled and sweet to the palate as Hybla honey"? That statement in the other that "Sir Walter himself could never in reason have dared to aspire to such a fortunate conjuncture of talent, grace, and historic accuracy"? It is, however, as a brief survey of the Gissing country designed to enable the reader to judge the author by eight or nine of his best books that this essay may most fairly be appreciated; and if, as we take it to be, it is intended for those who do not know Gissing well, it is either too long or too short. Those who have not read "New Grub Street" will scarcely care to learn that Reardon is "a greatly strengthened and improved rifacimento of Kingcote" (in "Isabel Clarendon,") or that Amy Reardon is "a better observed Isabel," or that "Reardon was unlucky in marrying Amy." They will probably fight shy, too, of the foot-notes in their impatience to reach "The House of Cobwebs" and the rest. On the other hand, the reading of these often exquisite grey and mauve studies in semi-autobiography may leave a good many people eager to know more about their author than Mr. Seccombe has been able to compress within his fifty serried pages. He seems to write with a full knowledge of his country. Should he ever supplement his survey with a history, we would hope to find it a little less flamboyant.

What became of Pam. By BARONESS VON HUTTON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

PAM's many lovers and friends will be delighted to know what became of her. The curtain rises on her at twenty-seven years of age in a dingy Bloomsbury boarding-house: two crucial years pass in which she shows her pluck and gaiety in adversity and her insight and kindness in good fortune, and at last she settles happily after some stormy interludes. Years have not taken toll from her vitality and lightheartedness; she is the same sprightly, brave Pam whom we loved, and whom we love to leave with the prospect of great happiness shining from her future. Her fascination controls the book. Who would tamper with this charm by asking impertinently: Is this life? It is enough that she is Pam, and of course Pam is exactly the person to whom the surprising and the unexpected and the inconsequent must happen. What could be more proper than that she should inherit at the right moment a house and a small fortune from a faithful lover; what more natural than that she should meet her heart's paragon in a pawn-shop and be kept dramatically from his arms by a wayward passion for another, of whom she goes in fear and trembling for ten years though her eyes have not seen him during that time? Finally, what could be more suitable than that, when she does see him at his wife's funeral, his appearance is such that she is freed for ever from his control; that, being free, she should pass the paragon on her way home, and hale him into her hansom, and that the hansom should be kept waiting at her door while their lips meet in the long first kiss on which the curtain is rung down to the accompanying chime of friendly old Big Ben? He must be a sad wise-acre who can find a headshake of impatience at such doings: especially when they are recounted in a Pam-fine and lighthearted style which carries you trippingly along from the first delightful page to the last.

Old Mr. Lovelace. By CHRISTIAN TEARLE. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

A READER who lays aside "Old Mr. Lovelace" at the end of fifty pages or so would probably pass an unfair judgment upon it. The simplicity of it appears at first too simple; the mothers' meetings and domestic and parish concerns promise the mildest form of entertainment. But gradually the story wins its way: we pass from indifference to friendly interest in many of the characters. More particularly are we attracted to old Mr. Lovelace, the shrewd lawyer and man of the world, who keeps the heart of a boy; kind and courteous with the fine manner of a by-gone day. In all the four stories into which the book is divided, Mr. Lovelace plays a benevolent part. The first two find him the adviser and active helper of his poorer neighbours, whose peculiarities are hit off with a genial humour in which there is no sting and much kindness. In the last two tales this delightful old gentleman, moved by lonely ladies in distress, gives up his hard-earned leisure to fight and win two legal battles for them. That the author, who, as we gather from many indications, is of the sex not yet permitted to practise at the Bar, should possess so intimate a knowledge of legal procedure is something of a mystery and a surprise. The knowledge, whether personal or borrowed, and the way it is used, add a keener interest to the last half of a very pleasant and well-written book.

The Lady of the Decoration. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

THE "Lady of the Decoration" was "a young widow who wasn't sorry," so a judicious friend shipped her off to seek salvation and a fortune "somewheres East of Suez." To Japan, therefore, sailed this charming "Lady" to teach in the mission school, to take notes, and to write those curious and interesting letters mainly about things Japanese. The form of narration is not altogether satisfactory; the letters are one-sided, and all are addressed to a friend of her own sex whom she invariably calls "Mate." Her own name is never disclosed; from the title-page onward she is known to us and her little Japanese pupils as "The Lady of the Decoration." The heroine's experiences cover the period of the war between Russia and Japan, and include descriptions of the departure of the troops for the front, the return of the wounded, scenes by the wayside and in the hospitals, and two visits to Vladivostock, all coloured by her strong sympathies with Japan. A slight, one-sided story runs through the book, with frequent sentimental allusions to the heroine's past, her mistakes, and her desperate homesickness. In the last letter we hear that "Jack," who has been biding his time in the background, suddenly appears—in the good old fashion—and insists upon a wedding almost at sight. "The Lady of the Decoration" contains an odd mixture of fact, fun, opinions, vivid impressions, and sentiment. Unfortunately, the sentiment is very much overdone, but the book is fresh and unconventional and well worth reading.

Henry Northcote. By J. C. SNAITH. (Constable, 6s.)

MR. SNAITH'S "Henry Northcote" is suggestive of more criticism, pro and con, than any reasonable allowance of space in the ACADEMY would suffice for. Much may be said in commendation of it, partly as displaying, but more as indicating, the operation of some of the highest qualities of the novel writer. Observation, insight, courageous description are all here, but all employed without art, and quite without harmony. They make pictures in broad patches, often more vivid than enough, for the reason that they are nearly destitute of gradation and shadow. The result is that, while every chapter testifies to Mr. Snaith's capabilities for the work he has taken up, none of them suggests that he has turned his gifts to the best account. What the story does suggest throughout is that it was written by a young man of remarkable ability while possessed by all the fantasies and impulses of youth, incapable of discipline as yet, and either without the artistic instinct or contemptuous at present of artistic effort. Considering the author's gift of perception and discrimination, something is certainly needed to explain the long conversation between the hero of the story (then a starving young barrister) and the solicitor who has unexpectedly briefed him in a sensational murder case. Here Mr. Snaith's intention evidently is to bring out two absolutely different minds and temperaments; and, determined to succeed, he puts the old lawyer and the philosopher in such violent opposition that its continuance for many pages becomes untrue to the characters so carefully depicted. In real life such a solicitor as Mr. Snaith describes would have broken off the wrangle after ten minutes: we feel it quite out of reason that he does not do so. This is only one of many unlikely things of a similar kind. No doubt there are inconsistencies in every character; but when they are so extreme as in the case of Henry Northcote and Emma Harrison, some shadings, some passages of transition are necessary; in work of this sort the novelist cannot afford to do without them. It is here, and in an overflow of philosophic language to ears incapable of understanding it, that the faults of the book lie. It has no art—no architecture, we may say. But it has some striking scenes, is studded with admirable points of observation, and gives great hope of what might come from the author's mind if he cared to exert it.

A Maid of Normandy. A Romance of Versailles. By DORA M. JONES. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THERE is a saying that old friends are best. If it be true, this story should be very welcome, for in it we meet with many well-known figures. There is the young hero, who has already done great deeds, before he comes to Versailles to seek his fate at the court of Louis XIV.; there is the beautiful, wicked lady, whose machinations continue throughout the book till she falls a victim to a disease that spoils her beauty; there is the stately girl who loves the hero vainly and enters a convent; the little unattractive heroine who blooms out into a pretty girl. And these old friends move in a familiar setting. The splendour of the court, the atmosphere of intrigue, the separation of the hero and heroine, the trouble they both suffer, a shadowy

King and a shadowy Fénelon, with a spice of Stuart plot thrown in—these ingredients, well stirred together, make up a tale which we can read without annoyance. If that seems faint praise, it must be remembered of how few books the same can be said. The style is inoffensive, but without distinction; altogether, "A Maid of Normandy" is mildly pleasing. If Miss Jones had chosen a less hackneyed period she would have done better; the exiled Stuart and the Grand Monarque have been the subject not only of so many histories and great romances, but of such a quantity of minor stories that it needs a serious and fine piece of work to please us now; and there is no evidence that Miss Jones had any other object in view than the weaving of a nice little story to entertain us. Briefly, her style is domestic, her theme historical, and the two spoil each other. The heroine's name is "Bathilde"; that comes perilously near the annoyance which the story otherwise avoids; it is too much like the familiar "Mathilde" spoken under the influence of catarrh.

Things that are Cæsar's. By H. N. DICKINSON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

WITH what relief does the jaded reviewer chance upon a novel in which there are no love-affairs, in which women are only allowed to be sisters or parochial scandalmongers! But, as is the way of this world, he has to pay for it in another direction, and he finds himself plunged into a morass of politics, wherein "Young Oxford" flounders, debonair and flamboyant, to the tune of a by-election in the cathedral town of Cayle. To be sure, Mr. Dickinson has been very successful; he writes about a subject in which he has evidently had some considerable experience, with a power of construction and of what is best described as "grip" which promise uncommonly well for the future. It is conceivable, indeed, that the main points of the book may fail to interest those who have forgotten the restlessness and uncertainty of those years just after the University, or who have perhaps never been unsettled in their beliefs and prejudices; it will seem, after all, as if the Brandonites were a set of very young men who lived comfortably under the impression that they were making political history, while in fact they were only playing the deuce with respectable Cayle. Some readers will, moreover, be disappointed in Brandon and the change of front and the Chamberlainite idealism and the rifle club. But that, as Venning would say, is "intellectual dishonesty." The writing and character-drawing are admirable; the coherence of the narrative, the clever way in which the conversations are handled, the wit abounding, are proofs of Mr. Dickinson's ability. What he says and what he knows and what he has seen, he expresses well. The hero, Lord Charles Brandon, is an extremely interesting character; a good deal is sacrificed to the elucidation of his temperament, and we confess to a hazy conception of most of the secondary personages; they are almost too subsidiary, too much Brandonites; the only person whom we see from every point of view is Brandon himself. No one can read this book without looking forward eagerly to Mr. Dickinson's next, and hoping that his interests are not entirely political.

The Sign of the Golden Fleece. By DAVID LYALL. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

"THE SIGN OF THE GOLDEN FLEECE" is one of thirteen short stories of a North London square connected by the silken thread of Miss Bethia Hardcastle's neighbourly kindness. The mysteries and romances nearly all owe part of their interest to Miss Bethia. She finds her way into most of the houses in Arundel Square, always upon some helpful mission; arriving just in time to avert a calamity, to make a friendly suggestion, or merely to listen and sympathise. Generally, and mainly through her benevolent intervention, those well-written, pleasant little tales end happily: even the end of Miss Bethia's own story is less sad than it appears. It is an unexpected, but not a regrettable solution of her difficulties. "The Sign of the Golden Fleece" describes how Susannah Goldsworthy inherited the business faculty of her grandfather, and thereby restored the fallen fortunes of her family. "The Revolt of Polly" is a pretty, Cinderella-like love-story, in which good luck comes to one who deserved it. In "Mr. Tredgold's Christmas," Miss Bethia converts a curmudgeon of a landlord to more charitable views of tenants and a more cheerful outlook on life. All are simple tales with everyday incidents, but the spirit that touches them with grace and humanity is as rarely met with as are characters like Miss Bethia Hardcastle.

FINE ART

FLEMISH ART AT THE GUILDHALL

WITH the exception of the modern section—which leaves out much to be desired and includes a good deal that never would be missed—the collection of paintings by artists who have been born or have lived on what is now Belgian soil worthily maintains the European reputation of the Guildhall exhibitions. Gallery I., where we whimsically arrive after traversing the three subsequent galleries, is devoted to the primitives, from the inventors of oil painting, the Van Eycks, to the portrait-painter of "Bloody Mary," Lucas de Heere; and here the two first centuries of Flemish art are more than adequately represented. Of the three existing paintings which modern criticism allows to be ascribed with certainty to Hubert, the elder Van Eyck, two figure in this exhibition: the Portrait of a Young Man, lent by the Gymnasium of Mannstadt, Hungary, and Sir Frederick Cook's beautiful panel of The Three Maries at the Tomb of our Lord, so precisely yet tenderly drawn, so sweet and glowing in colour, that the perfection of oil painting seems here attained. Hubert's younger brother, Jan Van Eyck, has left the world a greater number of works of undisputed authenticity, and Mr. Temple in his descriptive catalogue pathetically remarks:

Burghley House, in recent years, possessed one, The Virgin and Child with St. Barbara, but it is now in the Berlin Museum; Lord Heytesbury owned one, St. Francis and the Stigmata, but parted with it to an American collector.

The Duke of Devonshire is the possessor of a third, and fortunately he has not yet succumbed to the wiles of Germany or the United States, so that he has been able to lend the Guildhall The Enthronement of Thomas à Beckett as Archbishop of Canterbury. This painting is of special interest, bearing not only the artist's signature but also the date 1421, the earliest known on any work of his. The surface, however, has been so touched up by generations of restorers that its present condition can tell us little of Jan's powers in his thirties. A better example of his art is the smaller panel, lent by Mr. Weld-Blundell, of The Virgin and Infant Christ. The Madonna, clad in robes of limpid blue and ruby red, is represented sitting in a chamber dimly lit. Around her is a wealth of still-life such as Jan Van Eyck loved to paint; a table with a crystal vase, a plate of oranges, a candlestick, a brazen pot, a brightly-patterned carpet—all rendered with a reticent realism that has never been surpassed. Our veneration of the painter is not lessened when we perceive beneath his signature his motto, Als ikh kan—"As I can, not as I would"—a lesson in humility which should not be lost on modern painters of lesser powers.

To do justice to the works in this gallery necessitates the compilation of a catalogue raisonné, and since this has been done by Mr. Temple a brief reference to its more notable contents must here suffice. Of eleven exhibits attributed to Memling, the Duke of Devonshire's triptych,

The Virgin Mother with Donors and Saints, is the most important, as well as the earliest known work of the painter; but the Duke of Westminster's panel The Virgin Enthroned also deserves remark for the anticipation of Hobbema in the landscape background. Among many fine Gérard Davids the Duke of Devonshire's The Departure of a Saint is conspicuous for the exceeding beauty of the colour; the examples of Quentin Matsys include Lord Cobham's well-known The Misers, the Duke of Fife's A Philosopher, and a magnificent male portrait in profile lent by Madame Edouard André. Roger van der Weyden, Hugo van der Goes, Petrus Christus, and many lesser known masters are well represented, while M. Cardon's Portrait of an Elderly Man is in many respects the most consummate example of Mabuse, who, according to our cataloguer: "was remarkable for conscientious finish, for daylight freshness, and warm and brilliant colouring." In the opinion of many Mabuse was not less remarkable for the beauty of his line, especially as seen in clear-cut profiles, and this fine portrait alone suffices to prove his kinship in this respect with Holbein.

Notwithstanding the gracious majesty of Van Dyck's sumptuous Earl of Peterborough, in a gorgeous yet quiet red embroidered dress, Rubens dominates Gallery II. with his great decorative picture, Queen Tomyris with the Head of Cyrus, and his still more remarkable, if less complicated, Young Lioness at Play, the ne plus ultra of animal painting. A landscape and a masterly portrait-sketch of one of the painter's daughters further serve to emphasise the sovereignty of this painter-diplomat and most diplomatic painter. The fair fame of Jordaens is well served by the Duke of Devonshire's portrait-group of Van Zurpelen and His Wife, which attracted much attention when exhibited last year at Antwerp, but in view of the Jordaens exhibition held there it is a thousand pities that no attempt was made to represent this neglected master more fully at the Guildhall. One room might advantageously have been allotted solely to his work.

Although Frans Hals was born at Antwerp, he is so associated with the Dutch School that his Young Man Playing a Guitar and other portraits appear a little out of place among the Flemings, and, having enticed him into this exhibition, Mr. Temple might at least have treated him civilly. Instead of this we find the catalogue reviving old slanders, long discredited by all serious students of Hals, and gravely asserting that

He was a man of drunken and violent character, and was brought once before the magistrate for ill-treating his wife. . . . He was idle and fond of pleasure, but his abilities as a painter were held in high esteem by his fellow citizens, who seem to have condoned on this account the faults of his intemperate and imprudent life.

Now, the idleness of Hals consists in having lived for eighty-six years and having regularly produced noble paintings till within two years of his death. The charge of drunkenness and cruelty to his wife is based on no further information than the single unfortunate entry in the police records for February 20, 1616, when he was summoned for maltreating his wife—and, as Mr. MacColl once observed, we do not know what provocation she gave him. How seriously the magistrates regarded the affair is revealed by the recorded fact that Hals was let off with a reprimand. No one will deny that Hals was a jovial, and probably an impulsive person. That on festive occasions he now and then fell from sobriety is not unlikely, nor unwontedly reprehensible. But to the legend that he was an habitual drunkard the lie direct is given by a life-work of clear vision and unerring brushwork which could not conceivably have been the outcome of a blurred eye and a palsied hand; and, therefore, the reiteration of so ill-founded a calumny does as little credit to Mr. Temple's scholarship as to his charity.

Of Galleries III. and IV., which contain the modern Belgian paintings, little need be said. The academic side of modern Belgian painting unduly preponderates, and distinguished outsiders like Buysse and Van Rysselbergh are wholly ignored, while Constantin Meunier is most inadequately represented by a single portrait, The Blacksmith. The historical pictures of Baron Henri Leys are interesting as showing the origin of Sir L. Alma-Tadema, and having a quality rarely found in our Academic work; but the most delectable feature of this section is the group of works by Ferdinand Khnopff and Alfred Stevens. Khnopff, a mystical painter, has a technical equipment not unlike to that of Simeon Solomon, and an imagination which by its intensity and unearthliness often recalls Blake. His sensitively drawn and delicately coloured St. Anthony and the Queen of Sheba is a haunting example of his genius, and mercilessly sends Willem Linnig's conventional rendering of the same subject to its proper level. Alfred Stevens, a most gifted and most unusual artist, is seen almost at his worst in the meretricious Fedora, and at his best in The Visit, A young Girl Reading, and India in Paris, three delightful genre-pieces, which for effective arrangement, sweet untroubled colour, and minute realisation of subordinated detail, are no unworthy crop for the soil that gave birth to the Van Eycks.

MR. STRANG'S ETCHINGS

William Strang. Catalogue of his etched work, illustrated with 471 Reproductions. With an Introductory Essay by LAURENCE BINYON. (Glasgow: MacLehose, 42s. net.)

It was a happy thought of Mr. Strang's to make his catalogue not only an enumeration of the etchings, but, as it were, a photograph album in which its fortunate possessors, as they turn the leaves, can meet old friends and be introduced to new ones, and trace family likenesses or the evolution of types. Almost every etching that Mr. Strang has done since 1882 is pictured here in a half-tone block, rarely as much as three inches square and sometimes hardly bigger than a postage stamp.

The reproductions are excellently clear, and, though the epicure must needs miss the pleasure which original proofs afford to sight and touch, the substitute is good enough to give abundant pleasure to the less exacting. The variety of tone and surface and the alternation of the clean etched line with the soft "burr" of dry-point or the granular ground of aquatint tend to disappear under reduction and the uniformity of the one photographic process which renders all impartially. But the pattern and design remain, and these suffice to conjure up before the mind's eye a far more vivid picture of the print itself than the clearest or most minute description could do without an illustration. Mr. Strang, with the severest economy of words, restricts the verbal account of each plate, facing the reproduction, to a statement of title, date, process and size; the number of proofs is generally given, and occasionally the place or mode of publication, though by no means with the consistency or fulness that might be desired; the note, "published in Germany," for instance, falls short of the Gründlichkeit exacted in that country from historians of art. There are many, however, at least in this country, who will welcome such extreme brevity in place of the description, more or less diffuse, which is needed when illustrations are absent. A picture-book compiled by such a master hand is a thing to cherish more than the type of catalogue to which English print-collectors are most accustomed, in which elegance of phraseology is apt to be the first consideration, and accuracy of information a secondary matter. In this case Mr. Binyon's excellent introduction gives the literary flavour which we should not like entirely to forego.

There has never been a complete exhibition of Mr. Strang's etchings and engravings, but the issue of this complete collection of their midget photographs serves as a substitute and affords a pretext for some retrospect of his career. It is a commonplace of criticism to say that Mr. Strang derives much from M. Alphonse Legros. The relationship of pupil to master is obvious and avowed. From beginning to end of the younger artist's work, long after he had ceased to be a pupil, the influence persists. But the good seed has fallen on a soil naturally fruitful and fertilised by many other influences, and the crop consists of far more than copies or imitations. Mr. Strang possesses a fancy and inventiveness without parallel in a generation of English etchers most of whom are content to excel in landscape or architectural subjects while very few attempt figure-subjects successfully either by way of illustration or of original composition. With amazing rapidity Mr. Strang could finish in a few months a set of thirty plates to Kipling or Cervantes, and fill them with a multitude of men and women of his own creation, wonderfully alive and interesting, as you must admit, whether they repel or attract you. His Bunyan illustrations, much earlier in date, have been often praised, and there must surely be admiration in store, now that they are published in little, for his etchings to the ballad of "Aiken Drum." His etchings of biblical subjects, again, are beyond anything of their time. How impressive is The Resurrection, how touching in their homely realism are The Last Supper and The Descent from the Cross! But as instances of the beauty of design to which Mr. Binyon rightly attaches so much importance, we would choose the early Tobit and his Brethren, with the perfect pattern of the flat stone wall and its one prominent string-course, and the Adoration of the Kings, in its original state, before by an unlucky afterthought the restful white space on which the charm so largely depended was covered by a flight of rococo angels.

Then the portraits, though very unequal, sustain comparison, at their best, with some of the masterpieces of etching. Few modern etchings, at any rate, will stand by the side of Cosmo Monkhouse, Mr. Justice Lindley and the large Rudyard Kipling (No. 345). The Dr. Garnett is a very good approximation to a rendering of those difficult features, though it misses the characteristic smile which Mr. Strang emphasised almost too much in a drawing exhibited last year. In imaginative subjects, moralising and allegorical, Mr. Strang does not always succeed so well as in domestic scenes from peasant life, and especially those in which children are to the fore. The humours of a crowd appeal to him in a curiously personal way. Nobody but he could ever have seen or invented such a collection of oddities as he has put into The Procession or Street Merchants, or have made so delightful a design out of a ranting orator and his audience in Regent's Park (Socialists, No. 188).

There are subjects, of course, in which the characteristic is carried too far; the scorn of prettiness sometimes results in a wilful and regrettable disregard of beauty. But, if much of Mr. Strang's art can never be destined for popularity, it will always find many admirers to whom sincerity and vigour combined with exceptional technical accomplishment make a stronger appeal than the "softness" which seems to be the quality nowadays most in demand.

C. D.

MUSIC

THE NEW GROVE'S DICTIONARY

THE second volume of Mr. Fuller-Maitland's edition of "Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians" (Macmillan, 21s. net) is now published, and proves, like the first, to be a valuable extension of its predecessors. It covers the alphabetical ground from F to L, so that it corresponds to the latter half of the old first volume and the first part of the second. The complete new edition will thus occupy five volumes, the old being in four. Such a revision aims at achieving work of two kinds. It has to complete the work with the additions which time has made possible, and it has to improve upon the quality of the old. To do this the three methods of replacement, addition and rearrangement have all been used. Replacement is the method where the matter of the old was so slight or so lacking in individuality that it could be all incorporated in a new article without loss. This has made room for an interesting modern article on "Fugue" by R. Vaughan-Williams, one embodying much profound thought on "Invertible Counterpoint" by H. Walford Davies, and a striking and suggestive article upon "Instrumentation" by Frederic Corder, which makes discriminating reference to Strauss and the modern attitude towards the whole question of orchestral colour. The second plan—of adding sections in square brackets to old articles—is much less satisfactory from a literary standpoint, and is often reminiscent of the proverbial new cloth on an old garment. Yet it is not always easy to suggest an alternative method. It has, perhaps, been most successfully employed with the late W. H. Stone's article on the horn, which has been cleverly and amply emended by D. J. Blakley; it has also given the Editor the opportunity of adding a useful critical note on Liszt's work to the article by the late Francis Hueffer. The last named suggests what would have been a far happier method of dealing with the late Ferdinand Pohl's article on Haydn than that which Mr. Hadow has adopted. Perhaps the extreme length of the original article precluded any great addition, but, as this is mostly biographical and includes all the little personal stories which are much too often repeated, there is a real need for a critical summary of Haydn's position in musical history, which Mr. Hadow could have given as few others can. As it is, however, his short sections in square brackets always supply an omission or suggest a necessary criticism but are disappointingly restrained. This is an instance, and it is not the only one, where the point of view has already changed and has made an article which was acceptable as late as 1890 inadequate to 1906. Formerly, music was regarded more through the personal medium of the composer, whereas now the composer is seen through the medium of his music, and it is for discriminating treatment of Haydn's works rather than for details of his career that the present-day reader is likely to turn to the new "Grove."

The third method—that of rearrangement—is largely a matter of incorporating the work of the old appendix into its place in the main body of the Dictionary. But, besides this, the grouping has been much improved. Under the heading of "Fingering" appear four articles by Franklin Taylor, Alfred Gibson, Emil Krall, and D. J. Blakley on the fingering of the piano, violin, violoncello, and wind instruments. Again, the articles, or portions of them, by the late W. S. Rockstro, which appeared originally under the separate headings of "Real Fugue" and "Tonal Fugue," are now included as addenda to the article of R. Vaughan-Williams referred to above. Besides these classes of alterations, there is one other important class, namely, the treatment of new subjects, or subjects not included in the old edition. These largely consist of biographical notes on modern composers and performers, many of which have been ably written by the editor; but of those from other pens, Mrs. Rosa Newmarch's articles on Glazounow and Glinka are noteworthy, while that to which we naturally look with the greatest expectation is the article on Sir George Grove by C. L. Graves. The insight into and sympathy with the character of his subject, which made his life of Sir George Grove such delightful reading, has again come to Mr. Graves's assistance, and in epitomising the details of Grove's busy life he has not forgotten to include a picture of the man whose personality, more than his work of writing or organising, had so potent an influence upon the students of his day, who are the musicians of ours. Last, mention must be made of a learned article by H. S. Macran on Greek music, which enters in detail into the elaborate theories of scales upon which that music was founded, and explains, as far as is possible, its scientific system. The old edition only professed to deal with music from the fifteenth century to the present day, though practically it referred to many matters which had their root earlier. The removal of this limit makes possible the inclusion of this article and places the Dictionary upon the widest basis.

It is manifestly impossible to deal critically here with the substance of even the most important of the new contributions, but, to return for one moment to the group of principal articles first mentioned, "Fugue," "Invertible Counterpoint" and "Instrumentation," it seems that one particular problem besets all modern writers on such general subjects, namely, that of treating subjects surrounded with all the restrictions, true and false, of classical procedure in such a way as to be useful to the modern student. With "Instrumentation" the problem is simplest, since it is a matter which so largely exercises composers and listeners at the present day that every discriminating word must be useful. The chief danger is lest the writer should unquestioningly accept all that is modern, but the quotation of a sentence from Mr. Corder's article will show how he avoids this temptation.

It is quite a common thing for a composer to experiment, in the full assurance that though he cannot in the least tell how his music will sound, he is sure it will not sound bad. The Prelude to "Rheingold" might be cited as a case in point. None of the effects come off as intended. . . . Perhaps the same may be said of some of Strauss's more extravagant tone pictures.

Immediately after this he quotes the first bars of the Prelude to Lohengrin as an instance of perfect calculation. But with "Fugue" and "Invertible Counterpoint" the difficulty lies deeper. From Bach to Richard Strauss composers have been writing fugues which violate the rules of theorists, and the problem of discovering what are the real restrictions, the boundary lines of the form, and what are merely artificial conventions, is still unsolved. Dr. Vaughan-Williams has, therefore, been wise in laying down few rules, and explaining simply the main points characteristic of fugal form and illustrating these by ample examples. But to quote a cacophonous passage from "Also Sprach Zarathustra" next to the "Wohl-temperirtes Clavier" is rather bewildering than enlightening. If thereby a continuity of treatment from Bach to Strauss could be proved, the result would be invaluable, but this illustrates nothing but the fact that Strauss has chosen here to combine subjects which do not fit, whereas the art in fugue consists in combining subjects so that they do fit. Here Dr. Vaughan-Williams has simply fallen into the error which Mr. Corder has avoided, that of quoting modern works indiscriminately. Truly Richard Strauss is a snare to the unwary! Dr. Walford Davies has avoided him in "Invertible Counterpoint," probably because to Strauss all counterpoint is invertible, since his axiom is practically: "Let it be granted that any two or more tunes may be combined in any relation or without relation to one another." Dr. Davies has been content merely to hint at the application of invertible counterpoint to modern composition. We miss the definite suggestions as to the teaching of modern counterpoint with which he closed his article on "Counterpoint" in vol. i. But, if music has suffered in the past from the lagging behind of theoretical writers, it is equally conceivable that it may suffer as much at the present day from an almost feverish haste to incorporate the results of ill-considered experiment as part of the permanent resources of the art. This article on "Invertible Counterpoint" shows that, while music has been widening its resources on the one hand, it has narrowed them on the other by practically ignoring in modern times methods of combining and contrasting melodies which were once the common property of composers. It seems possible that we may lose as much as we gain by our persistent search after some new thing.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE Praelections delivered in January by the five candidates for the Regius Professorship of Greek at Cambridge—Drs. Jackson, Adam, Verrall and Headlam and Professor Ridgeway—will be issued very shortly in book form by the Cambridge University Press.—The Cambridge Press has also ready for immediate publication a work by Miss Frances Davenport, of the Department of Historical Research in the Carnegie Institution of Washington, tracing from extant records the economic development of the Manor of Fornsett, in Norfolk, from 1086 to 1565.

Another book on the Balkans is promised at an early date by Messrs. Smith, Elder: "The Balkan Trail," by Frederick Moore. Mr. Moore describes his experiences during the recent troubles in the Balkans, and incidentally tells, on the authority of the actors in the drama, the history of the abduction and ransom of Madame Tsilka.

On May 24 Messrs. Methuen will publish Mr. Edward Hutton's "Spain and the Spaniards." Mr. Hutton has endeavoured, by living among the people, and by immersing himself in the history and traditions of Spain, to gather vivid and sympathetic impressions. From the Pyrenees to Gibraltar the cities and the country districts are fully described, and separate chapters are devoted to the great towns, while the splendid remains of Moorish civilisation, the great cathedrals and the treasures in the galleries, receive a detailed attention.

Books on India may be divided, roughly, into three classes. There is, first, the "Guide Book," where every detail of journey and of scene is noted with meticulous accuracy; second, there is the "Colour Book"; and third, there is the "Educational Treatise," where the reader is carefully instructed on Indian problems of all kinds, social, political and economic. "From Charing Cross to Delhi," which Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish shortly, does not profess to be any of these. It is merely a light and irresponsible chronicle of impressions received during a recent visit to India, with certain graver matter in appendices for those who desire it. Mr. S. Parnell Kerr is the author.

Mr. George Allen will publish shortly Mr. Prevost Battersby's book on "India under Royal Eyes." The book deals with problems social, political, and military, such as the preservation of village industries, the advance of farming, the native agitation for more control in administration, and the great question of the defence of India.

A book of interest to students of history and modern warfare is "The Battle of the Sea of Japan," by Captain Klado, which Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton announce for early publication.—The same publishers promise "The Enemy at Trafalgar," by Edward Fraser, at an early date.

Mr. John Lane will publish on May 22 a new volume of poetry entitled "Songs to a Singer, and Other Verses," by Rosa Newmarch.

The Jewish Chronicle announces that Dr. Felix Falk (of Geneva) will publish in October a curious translation of the Books of Samuel into German in the Nibelungen metre. The translation is edited from two fifteenth-century manuscripts, one of which is in the Bibliothéque Nationale at Paris, and the other at the Stadtbibliothek in Hamburg. The manuscripts will be collated with the principal variants, one of which is the editio princeps of Augsburg, dated 1544, in the British Museum. There are others in the Bodleian. The work will consist of two volumes, the first containing reprints of the manuscripts with facsimile plates, and an introduction in ten chapters. The second will contain philological studies.

CORRESPONDENCE

DAYS AND HOURS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A week or two ago the ACADEMY contained a delightful article on "Days and Hours" in the poets. As the writer said, a thousand passages come to memory; few, if any, are quite perfect, yet there are many which one would be sorry to lose from one's mind where they remain as a constant source of refreshment. On a scorching day amid the turmoil of the city, to repeat to oneself Yeats's "Innisfree," where "midnight's all a-glimmer, and noon a purple glow, and evening full of the linnet's wings," is as cooling as it is comforting amid a fog to remember Arnold's:

"Far, far from here,
The Adriatic breaks in a warm bay
Among the green Illyrian hills."

Another summer picture is from Jean Ingelow:

"Come out and hear the waters shoot, the owlets hoot, the owlets hoot, Yon crescent moon, a golden boat, hangs dim behind the tree, O!
The dropping thorn makes white the grass, O sweetest lass, and sweetest lass,
Come out and smell the ricks of hay adown the croft with me, O!"

One can feel the cool dew.

The same sweet singer gave us the song of the blackbirds:

"Piping, fluting, bees are humming,
April's here and summer's coming;
Don't forget us when you walk, a man with men, in pride and joy;
Think on us in alleys shady,
When you step a graceful lady;
For no fairer day have we to hope for, little girl and boy."

Then there is Browning's joyous "The year's at the spring." Another seasonal picture is Tennyson's rendering of winter in "St. Agnes' Eve," while autumn finds its best expression in Keats's wonderful "Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness."

But one comes back to spring as the favourite theme of the poets when they write of the seasons. Five hundred years ago the spring rioted through the veins of Charles D'Orléans, and he burst into a rondel:

"Le temps a laissé son manteau
De vent, de froidure et de pluie,
Et s'est vêtu de broderie
De soleil rayant, clair et beau.
Il n'y a bête ni oiseau
Qu'en son jargon ne chante ou crie:
Le temps a laissé son manteau
De vent, de froidure, et de pluie.

Rivière, fontaine et ruisseau
Portent en livrée jolie
Gouttes d'argent d'orfévrerie;
Chacun s'habille de nouveau.
Le temps a laissé son manteau
De vent, de froidure, et de pluie."

Finally, one may cite Lady Gregory's translation of Finn's Song, as a real rendering of spring:

"It is the month of May is the pleasant time; its face is beautiful; the blackbird sings his full song, the living wood is his holding, the cuckoos are singing and ever singing; there is a welcome before the brightness of the summer.

"Summer is lessening the rivers, the swift horses are looking for the pool; the heath spreads out its long hair, the weak white bog-down grows. A mildness comes upon the heart of the day; the sad restless sea is asleep.

"Bees with their little strength carry a load reaped from the flowers: the cattle go up muddy to the mountains; the ant has a good full feast.

"The harp of the woods is playing music; there is colour on the hills, and a haze on the full lakes, and entire peace upon every sail.

"The corn-crake is speaking, a loud-voiced poet; the high lonely waterfall is singing a welcome to the warm pool; the talking of the rushes has begun . . .

"A weak lasting little bird is singing at the top of his voice; the lark is singing clear tidings; May without fault, of beautiful colours."

H. PEARL HUMPHRY.

May 14.

"QUOUSQUE TANDEM—"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent need not fear. I shall not "debel" him "sans" justification: I can, like Pascal, "détester" any such intention. But I cannot allow that even the authority of three of the greatest names in the world's literature will justify the use of the three words I have emphasised; still less will Lamb's example justify the use of "reluct." Will "B. N." contend that I may imitate Byron's famous "There let him lay!" or Cowper's "church-going bell," or Carlyle's neologisms, or Horace Walpole's "You was"? Would Xenophon have been justified in adopting the Æschylean  $\tau\omicron\phi\lambda\alpha\tau\tau\acute{\iota}\theta\theta\rho\alpha\tau$  which Aristophanes has covered with such inimitable ridicule? I conceive that it is true flattery to imitate great men in their strength, and false flattery to imitate them in their weaknesses, and that if (according to Pascal's famous image) their heads are in the clouds immeasurably above ours, yet their feet are fixed in the common clay like our own.

But these are old-fashioned views. Like Molière's doctor, "Nous avons changé tout cela." Hardly a week passes in which I am not reminded of Sainte-Beuve's pathetic exclamation, "Soyons simples!"

soyons naturels!" Vain exhortation! True counsel of despair! To be simple and natural is the very last thing of which we dream. "Modernity" (!) bids us be startling, original, novel, "up-to-date," at all costs, even at the cost of maiming and marring our mother tongue by our crude inventions and fantastic innovations.

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

A BOOK OF MEMORY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have been a reader of the ACADEMY for years, and reckon it as one of my most trusted friends.

This morning a paragraph relating to Miss Tynan's new book, "The Birthday Book of the Blessed Dead," which I have read, induces me to write a few words of courteous protest.

The writer suggests, on the subject of remembering those who have left us, that "a wiser, though perhaps a more stoical emotion, would urge a man simply to turn over the page and forget." Now it seems to me that this is a rather poor and selfish attitude to take. Apart from any religious hopes, surely it is nobler and more loyal to remember those who are dead, even although they may not have any bearing on our present life. To nurse a grief is certainly morbid; but to transmute one into a noble and stimulating remembrance is, I should consider, a finer way than to forget.

I quite agree with the writer that animals forget their dead very rapidly: but is that a logical reason why human creatures (who are certainly supposed to have reached a higher plane of evolution) should imitate them? Would any one recommend us to adopt the morals of the cuckoo for instance? I have never understood why Death should be considered a more morbid subject than Birth or Life. They are natural factors in the scheme of the Universe, and I think a right attitude towards Death, and loyalty to those who have left us, will help us in our relations with the living.

I am no spiritualist, or any other "ist," and my finite brain cannot realise the possibility of an immortality that will give us back the individuality of those we have lost. But what I can realise is, that such a possibility may seem a logical sequence for an infinite brain, which may compass the realisation as well as the comprehension of a supreme immortality, both individual and universal: and surely we fit ourselves better for a possible future evolution by love and remembrance than by "turning the pages and forgetting."

We live in such an age of spiritual motorcrazy that we need no one to tell us to forget; rather do we want the voice that bids us cherish even our lost illusions.

Eternity may perhaps be begun here, and we may dimly perceive the possibility of our future evolution; but I should think that evolution will be slower if we turn the pages too quickly, and too soon forget.

Surely a perfect memory must be one of the qualities of a more infinite intelligence than ours.

FIAMMETTA WALDAHOFF.

32 Lorne Gardens,
Regent's Park, N.W.
May 12.

THE WORD "ADOBE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It seems that an old building constructed of "adobe," or unbaked brick, has survived the "burning fiery furnace" of San Francisco; this building is very old and ascribed to the Spanish clericals before the Yankees took possession.

"Adobe" is a Spanish word and the Rev. Professor Skeat calls its "origin unknown," but he cites a late Latin adobare; now, if we substitute "p" for "b," we get "ad-operio," and the Latin opera becomes obra in Spanish, while obrar is "to work"; so adobe is the earth, called clay, worked up but not burned; further, in Spanish, ad-oberia is a brick-kiln!

This word adobare becomes adouer in French, and is connected with the process of "dubbing" or arming a knight; it therefore follows that the processes connected therewith have suffered degradation. It is certain that the mere accolade called "dubbing" originally meant fitting on the collar, Latin collum; and harnessing the chevalier, or putting on the armour "adouer à chevalier," is from an obsolete word, "adoub." If we spell dub, or doob, we may more readily accept the facts.

A. HALL.

May 10.

AN AWKWARD PHILOLOGICAL BLUNDER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—An unparalleled instance of an error of fact and judgment on the part of an English writer is to be found in Letter 2 of Ruskin's "Fors Clavigera," where, after a few preliminary remarks on the value of Latin, that author says:

"Fors" is the best part of three good English words, Force, Fortitude, and Fortune. I wish you to know the meaning of these words accurately. . . . Clavigera may mean therefore either club-bearer, key-bearer, or nail-bearer. Fors the Club-bearer means the strength of Hercules or of Deed; Fors the Key-bearer means the strength of Ulysses or of Patience; Fors the Nail-bearer means the strength of Lycurgus or of Law." The italics are mine.

A better illustration of the proof of the Preacher's words: "Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour," it would be hard to cite; for though Ruskin's classical equipment was not, I believe, of the strongest, yet at this time—1871—he held the professor's chair of Art at Oxford, and had already produced all his famous works. How, indeed, so great a man could have been guilty of such a lapsus memoria is difficult to realise—one that would consign any third-form boy swiftly to the bottom of his class—unless this inchoate misconception of the title and aim of his work be considered as an evidence of his over-excitability of temperament and as a premonitory symptom of a certain defect in his mind that was to develop later into serious cerebral derangement and bodily wreck.

I have not been able to discover what contemporary comment had to say of the incident, which is passed over in silence by Mr. Frederic Harrison in his short "Life of Ruskin." It first caught my eye a few years ago while turning over the pages of "Fors" in a free library in New York in order to ascertain the purport of a work bearing so strange a title.

After the deadly matter was once committed to print, one would have thought the better way out of the difficulty would have been for Ruskin to frankly avow his mistake than have recourse to the subterfuge adopted in Letter 85, which apparently does not much improve matters: "The series of letters which closed last year were always written, as from the first they were intended to be, on any matter which chanced to interest me, and in any humour which chance threw me into. By the adoption of the title Fors, I meant (among other meanings) to indicate the desultory and accidental character of the work." The italics here are Ruskin's own.

But perhaps he quailed at the thought of appearing before his principal auditors—in this case the workmen and labourers of Great Britain to whom the letters were directly addressed—in the light of a discredited and abashed leader? Small wonder, however, that the agricultural scheme of the Guild of St. George thus inauspiciously ushered in should have led to disastrous consequences; nor would the advanced members of the Labour Party of the present day be far wrong if they viewed this author's writings with a sceptical eye; for it is errors like the above that, if not corrected, may become hopelessly and mischievously misleading.

LABRADOR.

Philadelphia, May 4.

"THE LIFE OF GREGORY THE GREAT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I see in a review of Mr. Dudden's book published in to-day's Spectator that my surmise contained in the ACADEMY of February 17 was correct—viz., that the author acknowledges the labours of my old friend the Rev. William Halcourt, Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford: undertaken at Rome about 1876.

The Reviewer writes: "Something Mr. Dudden owes to the late Rev. T. H. (I think William) Halcourt, who had projected a similar work, and whose manuscript notes were placed at his disposal." So my memory was not at fault, and is amply justified thirty years after by the critic and author.

WILLIAM MERCER.

9 Westgate Terrace, Redcliffe Square, S.W.
May 12.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Constantinople. Painted by Warwick Goble; described by A. van Millingen. Pp. 282. Greece. Painted by John Fulleylove; described by J. A. M'Clymont. Pp. 235. Each, 9×6½. Black, 20s. net each.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Sichel, Edith. The Life and Letters of Alfred Ainger. 9½×5½. Pp. 354. Constable, 12s. 6d. net. (See p. 469.)

Leo Tolstoy: his Life and Work. Autobiographical memoirs, letters, and biographical material, compiled by Paul Birukoff, and revised by Leo Tolstoy. From the Russian. Vol. i.—Childhood and Early Manhood. 9×6. Pp. 364. Heinemann, 6s. net.

[Count Tolstoy has provided Mr. Birukoff with much autobiographical material and has revised his work. There are to be three volumes. This, the first, ends with Tolstoy's marriage; the second will embrace the years 1863–1884, the period of Tolstoy's "greatest literary success, family happiness and material welfare, followed by an important crisis which led to his birth into a new spiritual life"; the third will show the life he lives now. To this volume Tolstoy contributes an Introduction, in the form of uncorrected draft notes sent to Mr. Birukoff, who also furnishes an introduction and a bibliography of materials used in this volume. Portraits.]

Buck Whaley's Memoirs, including his journey to Jerusalem. Written by himself in 1797 and now first published from the recently recovered manuscript. Edited, with introduction and notes, by Sir Edward Sullivan, Bart. 10½×6½. Pp. 359. De La More Press, 21s. net.

Benson, A. C. Walter Pater. 7½×5. Pp. vi, 226. Macmillan. English Men of Letters. 2s. net.

Hollams, Sir John. Jottings of an Old Solicitor. 8½×6. Pp. 254. Murray, 8s. net.

Lilley, A. L. Sir Joshua Fitch: an account of his life and work. 8½×5½. Pp. 263. Arnold, 7s. 6d. net.

[Sir Joshua Fitch, who died in 1903, was the great champion of University and secondary education, especially for women. This life is by the Vicar of St. Mary's, Paddington Green. Index.]

The Life and Experiences of Sir Henry Enfield Roscoe, D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S. Written by himself. 9½×6½. Pp. xii, 420. Macmillan, 12s. net.

[This autobiography of the great Chemist is illustrated with portraits and views. Appendices: The Lecture on John Dalton delivered at Eton, and "My Jubilee." Index.]

Martin, Sir Theodore. Monographs: Garrick, Macready, Rachel and Baron Stockmar. 9×6. Pp. 341. Murray, 12s. net.

[Reprinted from the Quarterly Review and Blackwood's Magazine. Portraits and Index.]

DRAMA.

Summers, John. Oliver Cromwell. An Historical Drama in Five Acts. The Famous History of the Commonwealth of England. 7½×4½. Pp. 88. The International Copyright Bureau, Ltd., 2s.

Moutrie, Sidney. Judas: a tragedy. 8½×7. Pp. viii, 41. Shanghai: Kelly & Walsh. n.p.

EDUCATION.

Perry, Walter Copland. The Boy's Odyssey. Edited for Schools, with Introduction, etc., by T. S. Peppin. 6½×4½. Pp. xx, 211. English Literature for Secondary Schools. Macmillan, 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

Praed, Mrs. Campbell. The Lost Earl of Ellan. A story of Australian life. 7½×5. Pp. 398. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

The Young O'Briens. Being an account of their sojourn in London. By the author of "Elizabeth's Children." 7½×5. Pp. 347. Lane, 6s.

Randal, John. The Sweetest Solace. 8×5½. Pp. 341. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Gissing, George. The House of Cobwebs, and other stories. To which is prefixed "The Work of George Gissing," an introductory survey by Thomas Seecombe. 7½×5. Pp. lv, 300. Constable, 6s. (See p. 479.)

Dickinson, H. N. Things that are Caesar's. 7½×5. Pp. 304. Heinemann, 6s.

Giberne, Agnes. Rowena. 7½×5. Pp. 307. Werner Laurie, 6s.

Adams, Andy. Cattle Brands. A collection of Western camp-fire stories. 7½×5. Pp. 316. Constable, 6s.

Hains, T. Jenkins. The Voyage of the Arrow to the China seas. Its adventures and periods, including its capture by Sea Vultures from the Countess of Warwick, as set down by William Gore, chief mate. 6 illustrations by H. C. Edwards. 7½×5½. Pp. 300. Boston: Page, $1.50.

Cleeve, Lucas. A Double Marriage. 7½×5. Pp. 301. Unwin, 6s.

Gordon, Samuel. The Ferry of Fate. A tale of Russian Jewry. 7½×5. Pp. 314. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

Sims, Geo. R. Two London Fairies. 7½×5. Pp. 222. Greening, 3s. 6d.

Chan Toon, Mrs. M. The Triumph of Love, and other stories. 7½×5. Pp. 320. Greening, 6s.

O'Donnell, Elliott. Jennie Barlowe, Adventuress. 7½×5. Pp. 319. Greening, 6s.

Foulis, Hugh. The Vital Spark, and her Queer Crew. 8½×5. Pp. 184. Blackwood, 1s. net.

[Most of these sketches have appeared in the Glasgow News, others are new.]

HISTORY.

The Florentine History written by Niccolò Machiavelli. Translated from the Italian by Ninian Hill Thomson. In two volumes, each 7½×5½. Pp. 606. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.

[A new translation. Mr. Thomson has adopted the division of each Book into numbered sections, as in recent editions of the Italian text. Index to each volume.]

Skrine, Francis Henry. Fontenoy, and Great Britain's share in the War of the Austrian Succession 1741–48. Introduction by Field-Marshal Earl Roberts. 9×5½. Pp. 393. Blackwood, 21s. net.

LITERATURE.

Trevelyan, George Macaulay. The Poetry and Philosophy of George Meredith. 7½×5½. Pp. xiv, 234. Constable, 3s. 6d. net.

Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature of the United Kingdom. Second Series. Vol. xvi. 8½×5½. Pp. 248. Asher, n.p.

The Anglo-Russian Literary Society. Proceedings: February, March and April 1906. No. 45. 8½×5½. Pp. 100. Printed for the Society.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Tomita, Kumasaku; and Lee, G. Ambrose. Japanese Treasure Tales. 37 illustrations. 9½×6. Pp. 96+Plates. Yamanaka & Co., 68 New Bond St., 10s. net.

Boissier, Gaston. Tacitus, and other Roman Studies. Translated by W. G. Hutchison. 9½×5½. Pp. 277. Constable, 6s. net.

[Contents: Tacitus; The Schools of Declamation at Rome; The Roman Journal; The Poet Martial.]

The Channel Tunnel: its commercial advantages. The Joint Parliamentary Committee. Opinions of Experts. 8½×5½. Pp. 60.

Walker, Ernest, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. Modern Medicine for the Home. 7½×5. Pp. 256. Werner Laurie, 2s. 6d.

[Symptoms and treatment of common afflictions: from baldness, chilblains, and housemaid's knee to appendicitis.]

PHILOSOPHY.

Bonucci, Prof. Alessandro. La Derogabilità del Diritto Naturale nella Scolastica. 9½×6½. Pp. 292. Perugia: Bartelli, L. 5.

POLITICS.

Anderson, Sir Robert. Side-lights on the Home Rule Movement. 9×5½. Pp. 233. Murray, 9s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Documents Illustrating Elizabethan Poetry.* By Sir Philip Sidney, George Puttenham and William Webbe. Edited by Laurie Magnus. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 221. Routledge. The English Library. 2s. 6d.
[Contains Sidney's "Apology for English Poetry;" Puttenham's "Of Language;" and "Of Poets and Poesy;" and Webbe's "Discourse of English Poetry," with an Introduction and Notes by the Editor.]
- Thoreau, Henry David. Walden, or Life in the Woods. With an Introduction by Theodore Watts-Dunton. Pp. xvi, 299. Borrow, George. The Bible in Spain. Pp. xxvi, 600. The Poetical Works of Geoffrey Chaucer. Vol. iii—The Canterbury Tales (from the text of Professor Skeat). Pp. 595. Twenty-Three Tales by Tolstoy. Translated by L. and A. Maude. Pp. 211. Brontë, Anne. The Tenant of Wildfell Hall. Pp. 480. The World's Classics. Each 6½ x 4. Frowde, 1s. net each.
- Gulliver's Travels and other works by Jonathan Swift.* Exactly reprinted from the first edition and edited, with some account of Cyrano de Bergerac and of his voyages to the sun and moon, by the late Henry Morley, LL.D. With a note on the name "Gulliver" by J. P. Gilson. Early Novelists series. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 445. Routledge, 6s. net.
- Bunyan, John. The Holy War: made by Shaddar upon Diabolus. With three coloured illustrations by Victor Prout. 7½ x 5½. Pp. iv, 318. Religious Tract Society, 1s.
[With a preface by A. R. Buckland.]
- The Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson.* Edited by George Sampson. In five volumes, each 7½ x 4½. Vol. i. Pp. viii, 513. Vol. ii. Pp. viii, 416. Vol. iii. Pp. viii, 541. Vol. iv. Pp. x, 462. Vol. v. Pp. xiii, 281. Bohn's Standard Library. Bell, 3s. 6d. each.
- [This is not a reprint of the old "Bohn" Emerson in 3 vols., but a new edition, with revised, re-arranged and enlarged text. Vol. i. contains the "Essays" and "Representative Men"; Vol. ii.: "English Traits," "The Conduct of Life" and "Nature"; Vol. iii.: "Society and Solitude," "Letters and Social Aims" and "Addresses"; Vol. iv.: Miscellaneous Pieces, reprinted from the original texts, of which some (e.g., "The Senses and the Soul," the editorial preface to The Dial, and "Saadi and Persian Literature") have not been reprinted before; Vol. v.: Poems. Mr. Sampson contributes brief introductions and notes. A very scholarly edition, and the first complete edition ever published.]
- Waddell, L. Austine. Lhasa and its mysteries, with a record of the Expedition of 1903-1904. With 155 illustrations and maps. Third and cheaper edition. 9½ x 6. Pp. xx, 530. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net. (See col. ii.)
- Goethe's Faust. Part II. Translated by Albert G. Latham. Burke's Speeches on America. Temple Classics. Each 6½ x 4. Dent, 1s. 6d. net each.
- Anthony Trollope's Rachel Ray. Pocket Classics. 6 x 3½. Pp. 536. Lane, 1s. 6d. net.
- Swift's Polite Conversation and Tale of a Tub. Each 7 x 4½. Pp. 139 and 161. Greening, 2s. net each.

SCIENCE.

- Loeb, Jacques. The Dynamics of Living Matter. 9 x 6½. Pp. xi, 233. New York: Columbia University Press; London: Macmillan, 12s. 6d. net.
[No. viii. of the Columbia University Biological Series. Professor Loeb in this book considers living organisms "as chemical machines, . . . which possess the peculiarities of automatically developing, preserving, and reproducing themselves." His purpose is "to state to what extent we are able to control the phenomena of development, self-preservation, and reproduction." Illustrations and Index.]
- Lectures on the Methods of Modern Science.* Edited by T. B. Strong. 9 x 5½. Pp. viii, 249. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d. net.
[Nine lectures: (1) Scientific Method as a Mental Operation, by Thomas Case; (2) Some Aspects of the Scientific Method, by Francis Gotch; (3) Physiology: its scope and method, by C. S. Sherrington; (4) Inheritance in Animals and Plants, by the late W. F. R. Weldon; (5) Psycho-Physical Method, by W. McDougall; (6) The Evolution of Double Stars; (7) Anthropology: the Evolution of Currency and Coinage, by Sir Richard C. Temple; (8) Archaeological Evidence, by W. M. Flinders Petrie; (9) Scientific Method as Applied to History, by the very Rev. T. B. Strong. The lectures form part of a course on Scientific Method delivered at the request of the Delegates for the Extension of University Teaching during the summer meeting at Oxford in August 1905.]

SPORT.

- "Felix." Recollections of a Bison and Tiger-Hunter. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xi, 242. Dent, 3s. 6d. net.
[The interesting reminiscences of a sportsman who spent twenty-six years in India, and in that time killed well over 500 head of big game including 31 tigers, 25 bears and 33 bison bull. The author gives his portrait, but no name other than a nom de guerre.]

THEOLOGY.

- Abraham, W. H. The Position of the Eucharist in Sunday Worship. 8 x 5½. Pp. 371. Masters, 5s. net.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Rawnsley, Rev. H. D. Months at the Lakes. 9 Illustrations. 8 x 5½. Pp. 244. Glasgow: MacLehose, 5s. net.
- Low, Sidney. A Vision of India, as seen during the tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales. With illustrations from photographs by the author and others. 8½ x 6. Pp. xiv, 365. Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.
[Mr. Low acted as special correspondent of the Standard during the Royal tour in India; but his book is not confined to a record of that tour. He frequently left what he calls the "route of the illustrious voyagers" in order to gain a general idea of the conditions of life and society in India.]
- Le Braz, Anatole. The Land of Pardons. Translated by Frances M. Gostling. With 12 illustrations T. C. Gotch and 40 other illustrations. 9 x 5½. Pp. xxx, 290. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.
[The French title of the book is "Au Pays des Pardons." The Land of Pardons is Brittany; and Pardons are local festivals—remnants, according to Le Goffic, of the ancient Feasts of the Dead. A handsome book, well illustrated and provided with an index.]

Brabant, F. G. Oxfordshire. Illustrated by Edmund H. New and from Photographs. 6½ x 4. Pp. xiv, 282. The Little Guides. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.

[The plan and merit of these Little Guides are well-known. The city of Oxford is omitted, as being the subject of a special volume in the series. The places are arranged alphabetically, and there are plenty of maps and plans besides Mr. New's charming illustrations.]

THE BOOKSHELF

English Furniture, by Frederick S. Robinson. ("The Connoisseur Library," Methuen, 25s. net.)—Until we had read this book we had concluded and hoped that the subject of cabinet work in these islands might be allowed to rest for a time. But Mr. Frederick S. Robinson's clever and agreeable work demonstrates again the fallacy of human wishes. Had his survey of the subject not been published, all collectors would have been the poorer, and all those already experienced in the study of English furniture denied a most valuable and authoritative book of reference. The author reviews his subject from Saxon times to the end of our great period, the eighteenth century, and gives us by the way many pleasant semi-historical chapters on such themes as the Renaissance house, sixteenth-century cabinets, seventeenth-century chests, chairs and silver furniture of the Restoration, the work of Inigo Jones, Wren and Grinling Gibbons, the smooth-faced furniture of the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, an introduction to the fine mahogany period, and a number of lucid and interesting chapters on

Many things, divinely done

By Chippendale and Sheraton;

while he by no means neglects the equally important, if less often named Manwaring, Shearer, Keppelwhite, Ince, Mayhew, the brothers Adam, and the work of the vast army of unknown craftsmen who made, without apparent effort, furniture which puts our modern and laborious Society of "Arts and Crafts" to shame. Mr. Robinson has read all that has been written on his subject and arrived at many sound conclusions from original observation; to an enthusiast of antique furniture his volume is like a long and full conversation with a gifted friend whose views and sympathies are the same as one's own, but whose information is, perhaps, fuller and certainly more clearly arranged. A work of this class, possessing grace of style as well as charm of subject, only needs informatory illustrations to make it as nearly perfect as may be looked for in a not too exigent age. Some hundred and sixty carefully printed reproductions of photographs of actual pieces represent Mr. Robinson's traffics and discoveries among museums and private collections. The examples stretch from the rude simplicity of an early chair in Bere Regis church to the Renaissance elaborations of a state bedstead, or the richness of the satinwood cabinet designed by Sir William Chambers, painted by Hamilton, and made by Shackleton and Seddon. The list of these illustrations is given with occasional notes of no small value, and it may be said that as a whole the photographs are from unrestored pieces. There are, perhaps, one or two exceptions to this rule. Even in the printed reproduction we detect an addition to a piece called a "whatnot" on plate civ., evidently an eighteenth-century washing-stand newly "decorated" to suit with the taste of a later and less enlightened generation. On a subject crowded with sociological interest and æsthetic pleasure, Mr. Robinson has given us a book that should form the type and pattern for future volumes in the "Connoisseur's Library," and, at the same time, be the last word on English furniture for at least a generation.

We gladly call attention to a remarkable new and cheaper edition of an already famous book. Colonel L. Austine Waddell's Lhasa and its Mysteries was originally published at 25s. net: two editions of it at this price having been exhausted, Messrs. Methuen are now selling the third at 7s. 6d. net. And the buyer will get for that money a volume which is almost, if not quite as handsome and complete as the expensive first and second editions. The cheaper issue lacks, it is true, some few of the original illustrations; but it contains nearly all that appeared before; and these illustrations, most of which are reproduced from photographs taken by Colonel Waddell himself at critical moments during the progress of the mission, are to be found nowhere outside the covers of the book and form a very important part of the work. All the original maps and all the original letter-press remain: indeed, the latter has been enlarged, for this edition contains what the former editions did not, a list of the wild flowers collected by Colonel Waddell round Lhasa. Of the work itself we expressed an opinion on its first appearance. It is the work on the subject, and must remain for a very long time the classical authority on Tibet, its religion, its folklore, its languages, its natural history—all, in fact, that an exceptionally learned, acute and active observer was able to discover about that hitherto sealed book.

Verdi, by Albert Visetti. (Bell, 1s.) This little book contains an outline of Verdi's life, and a rather perfunctory sketch of his works, with fuller descriptions of Falstaff and the "Requiem." One of the reasons which the author gives for selecting Falstaff as Verdi's masterpiece is the alleged fact that in it he "completely altered his style." This is not very complimentary to Verdi's other works. Mr. Visetti says practically nothing about the transitional period—Don Carlos and the revised version of La Forza del Destino—the most interesting period of his hero's career.

ROYAL EXCHANGE Incorporated] ASSURANCE [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO
Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 350 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.,
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1777

MAY 26, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education*UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.*GOLDSMITH'S COLLEGE, New Cross.*DEPARTMENT FOR THE TRAINING OF TEACHERS.

About 10 ADDITIONAL TEACHERS (Men and Women) will shortly be APPOINTED in the above Department.

These will include an Assistant Master of Method, an Assistant Mistress of Method (for infant school teaching), and teachers of English Literature, French, History, Mathematics, Elementary Science.

The majority of the salaries will be, for men, between £175 and £250 a year; and for women, between £150 and £200 a year; but more or less may be paid in exceptional cases.

An Assistant Manual Instructor (salary £100 or £120 a year) is also required.

Applications must be received not later than Saturday, June 2, 1906.

Particulars may be obtained from the Warden, Goldsmiths' College, New Cross, S.E.

OWEN'S SCHOOL, ISLINGTON.—Form Master required in September; graduate, English, Elementary Mathematics, and two of the three following: Latin, French, German. The modern languages to be taught on the oral method; good experience necessary. Also a fully qualified Physics Master. The salaries generally commence at £150. Apply at once to the Headmaster, giving full particulars of qualifications and experience, and copies of the three recent testimonials.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 27, 28, and 29 to fill Vacancies in Scholarships and Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the BURSAR, The Bursary, Little Dean's Yard, Westminster.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.

See Staff (honourmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.*NEW ZEALAND.

Applications are invited for the appointment of ART MASTER at the Wellington Technical School. Salary £300. £40 allowed towards passage. Age should not exceed 35 years. Candidates should have an Art Master's Certificate.

For further particulars and for the forms on which application must be made, apply to the High Commissioner for New Zealand, 13 Victoria Street, London, S.W.

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY, Kingston, Canada.—The Chair of Latin is vacant. Salary $2000 (£400 sterling). Applications, with 35 copies of testimonials should be sent to Principal GORDON, c/o Messrs. James MacLehose and Sons, 61 Vincent Street, Glasgow, not later than July 14.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL, WEST KENSINGTON.—An examination will be held at the above School on Tuesday, June 26, 1906, and on the following days for filling up several vacancies on the foundation.—Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Bursar.

Books for Sale, etc.

JUST PUBLISHED—B. H. BLACKWELL'S MONTHLY LIST OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS for APRIL, containing English Literature, Part 1 (Addison to Leigh Hunt), Biography, Natural History, Sport, etc.

Also Monthly List of New Books (English and Foreign) published during April.

50 AND 51 BROAD STREET, OXFORD.

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

READERS and COLLECTORS will find it to their advantage to write for J. BALDWIN'S MONTHLY CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS, sent post free on application. Books in all Branches of Literature. Genuine bargains in Scarce Items and First Editions. Books sent on approval if desired.—Address 14 Osborne Road, Leyton, Essex.

LEIGH HUNT, An Autobiography, edited by Roger Inghen. With Thornton Hunt's Introduction and 12 Photogravure Portraits, 2 vols., demy 8vo. Charming edition, published at 21s. net, for 10s.; new.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

ANY old Sporting Books
Any old Humorous Scrap Books
Any old Coloured Engravings by Cruikshank, George Morland, Bartolozzi, Wheatley, Ward, Singleton, Bigge, etc.
Any Manuscripts, Presentation Copies, Letters, etc. of Dickens, Thackeray, C. Lamb, P. B. Shelley, J. Keats, R. Burns, or any of the favourite authors and authoresses; very high prices for these Any Portraits of General Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Major André, Edmund Kean
Any really rare Black Letter Books
Any Triumphs: or Wedding, Funeral or other Pageants with Plates
Any very fine Calligraphy, in MS., or Engraved or old Books on the Art
Any volumes of 16th-17th Century Black Letter Proclamations, Acts of Parliament; especially of a Local, Trade, American, Jacobite, etc., interest
Apianus (P.) Insc iptiones Sacrosanctæ, sm. folio, Ingolstadt, 1534
A Poetical Essay on the Existing State of Things, by a Gentleman of the University of Oxford, 1811
A Proposal for putting Reform to the Vote, by the Hermit of Marlow, 1817 Arabian Nights. Book of the Thousand Nights and a Night, with notes by Sir R. Burton, 10 or 16 vols, 1885-8
Archæologia Cantiana (Set or Run)
A Refutation of Deism, 1814
A Rent in a Cloud, green cloth, Chapman & Hall, n.d. (1869), or any edition

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

MISCELLANEA GENEALOGICA ET HERALDICA, Vol. ii, First Series (about 1870), wanted; good price given.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury. (Vol. i., 1869 for sale.)

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING.—8d. 1000 words (Remington). Novels, Plays, Duplicating Circulars, etc.—Miss WILLARD, Beaufort House, Osborne Road, Southville, Bristol.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Art

EXHIBITION of PAINTINGS by J. D. FERGUSSON and ARTHUR STUDD, and Metal Work by G. DIKKERS & Co., of Holland, now open.—THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W., 10 to 6.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL. — SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS.

MISS A. W. GREGORY, L.I.A., prepares pupils either orally or by correspondence, for University Examinations in History, Literature, Anglo-Saxon, French and German.—3 Ickburgh Road, Upper Clapton, N.E.

STAMMERING.—The severest and most obstinate cases can now be perfectly and permanently cured by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years; call or write.—Mr. A. C. Schnelle, 112 Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

1906 ISSUE NOW READY.

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR-BOOK

Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World, for the Year 1906. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D. With Maps. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LIFE & EXPERIENCES OF SIR HENRY ENFIELD ROSCOE,

D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S.

Written by Himself. With Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations. 8vo, 12s. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Vol.

WALTER PATER

By A. C. BENSON. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

HENRY SIDGWICK: A MEMOIR.

By A. S. and E. M. S. With Portraits. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH PROSODY FROM THE 12th CENTURY TO THE PRESENT DAY

By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., Hon. LL.D., Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh.

In 3 vols. 8vo. Vol. I. FROM THE ORIGINS TO SPENSER. 10s. net.

WITH COLOURED ILLUSTRATIONS

ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN

With Coloured Illustrations by S. HARMON VEDDER. Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE VIRGINIAN"

LADY BALTIMORE

By OWEN WISTER. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s. BLACK AND WHITE.—"Full of charming portraits of people and places and of elegant sentences, rippling over with a gentle and distinguished humour, it must take its place as the freshest and most winsome book that the spring has yet given us."

THE WRONG ENVELOPE AND OTHER STORIES.

By MRS. MOLESWORTH.

Crown 8vo, 6s. [Tuesday.]

EVERSLEY SERIES.—New Vol.

EIGHT DRAMAS OF CALDERON

Freely Translated by EDWARD FITZGERALD. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.

JUNE NOS. Ready on Tuesday.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s. The JUNE NUMBER contains:

BROWNING. By JEANIE PEET.

A FRENCH RIVER. The Lovely Marne from its Source to Paris. By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. Pictures by JOSEPH PENNELL.

FENWICK'S CAREER. VIII. A Novel. (Conclusion.) By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN ST. NICHOLAS

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, 12s.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

The Literary Sensation of 1906

PRINTERS' PIE

EDITED BY W. HUGH SPOTTISWOODE

The Great Literary and Artistic Annual, the Proceeds of which go to Printing Trades Charities, will appear on FRIDAY NEXT.

PRINTERS' PIE contains Articles, Stories, and Drawings by—

W. L. ALDEN.
F. ANSTEY.
THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, K.T.
ALFRED AUSTIN (Poet Laureate).
M. E. BRADDON.
J. M. BULLOCH.
G. B. BURGIN.
GERALD CAMPBELL.
MARIE CORELLI.
Lieut.-Col. NEWNHAM DAVIS.
AUSTIN DOBSON.
ATHOL FORBES.
TOM GALLON.
SARAH GRAND.
C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE.
E. V. LUCAS.
H. W. LUCY.
BARRY PAIN.
MAX PEMBERTON.
MOSTYN T. PIGOTT.
WILLIAM LE QUEUX.
FRANK RICHARDSON.
W. PETT RIDGE.
ADRIAN ROSS.
DORA SIGERSON.
G. R. SIMS.
KATHARINE TYNAN.
ISRAEL ZANGWILL.

CECIL ALDIN.
G. D. ARMOUR.
H. M. BATEMAN.
LEWIS BAUMER.
GEORGE BELCHER.
H. M. BROCK.
TOM BROWNE.
DUDLEY BUXTON.
FRANK CHESWORTH.
CHARLES FOLKARD.
HARRY FURNISS.
C. DANA GIBSON.
JAMES GREIG.
JOHN HASSALL.
L. RAVEN HILL.
GUNNING KING.
WILL OWEN.
CHARLES PEARS.
F. PEGRAM.
E. T. REED.
REGINALD SAVAGE.
PENRHYN STANLAWS.
LANCE THACKERAY.
F. H. TOWNSEND.
LESLIE WILLSON.
DAVID WILSON.
LAWSON WOOD.
STARR WOOD.

What PRINTERS' PIE has done:

In 1903, when Mr. SPOTTISWOODE first produced the Annual on behalf of the Funds of the Printers' Pension Corporation, 10,000 copies were sold.

In 1904, the entire edition of 25,000 copies was sold out.

In 1905, the entire edition of 40,000 was sold out.

THIS YEAR 50,000 COPIES ARE BEING PRODUCED.

Each copy sold benefits a Charity whose work has peculiar claims for public support.

Each copy has attached to it an Accident Insurance Coupon for £2000 for three months.

1/-

ON SALE ON FRIDAY NEXT, AT ALL BOOKSTALLS AND NEWSAGENTS.

1/-

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	491	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		Defoe as Sociological Novelist . . . . .	502
A Modern Statesman . . . . .	493	Fiction . . . . .	503
Two Elizabeths . . . . .	495	Fine Art:
Taste or Imagination? . . . . .	497	The Royal Academy—II . . . . .	504
Unions or Gilds? . . . . .	498	Photography in Colours . . . . .	506
The Young Lion . . . . .	498	Music:
What is Life? . . . . .	500	The Concert Season . . . . .	506
The Closed Door . . . . .	501	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	507
Henrik Ibsen . . . . .	501	Correspondence . . . . .	507
The Bookshelf . . . . .	510	Books Received . . . . .	508

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THIS week the rehearsals of the Warwick Pageant begin in earnest, and from now till July 2, when the Pageant opens, Mr. Louis N. Parker, the inventor, writer, producer, and Master of the Pageant, will be busily engaged in getting his two thousand performers into shape. Warwick has been working hard for months on dresses, properties, designs, and so forth, and the whole town, indeed, the whole neighbourhood, is giving loyal energy to what promises to be a splendid production. Nearly all the work is done on the spot. Mr. Parker's right hand, Mr. Edward Hicks, is a Warwick man, and has himself written the first episode of the Pageant. The Mayor of Warwick, Mr. Kemp, is a well-known antiquarian; the designing of nearly all the dresses and scenes is by Mr. Bolton, a Warwick artist, who has a charming miniature in this year's Royal Academy, and the music is the composition of a Warwick organist.

Warwick has some two thousand years of history to draw upon, and good use has been made of it. Standing, as she does, very near the tree at Leamington which is said to mark the exact centre of England, the city has seen wave after wave of history pass over her. Here Cymbeline died and Caractacus succeeded him, to be taken prisoner by the Romans and return after many years converted to Christianity; here Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred, brought her conquered Danes; here Guy of Warwick wedded Phyllis, when he had slain the great Dun Cow of Dunsmore (and the head of the Dun Cow as imagined by Mr. Bolton is indeed fearful); here and at King's Lynn only was Lady Jane Grey proclaimed Queen (and here was discovered by Mr. Kemp one of the few documents which mention "Queen Jane"); and here came Queen Elizabeth with Leicester on the occasion of the famous visit to Kenilworth—to be kissed, according to Mr. Parker's not impossible flight of imagination, by a curly-headed little boy, one William Shakespeare.

The site chosen for the Pageant is one of the most beautiful spots in the grounds of Warwick Castle, with the Avon on the left, ready to take Queen Elizabeth's state-barge, some noble trees on the right, and in the centre a long avenue, down which the gorgeous processions will advance, to group themselves on the wide lawn that lies before the colossal grand stand. Here, in the first week of July, a good deal of England and nearly all America will see unfolded before them the history of an ancient and famous city. The National Home-Reading Union is arranging to hold its summer meeting at Leamington the week before the Pageant, during which lectures will be delivered by the Master of Trinity, Cambridge, Professor Oman, Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. F. R. Benson, Principal Childs, Mr. Louis N. Parker, and others.

We learn from Mr. Clarence Rook's sympathetic introduction to Louis Frederic Austin's just published posthumous work, "Points of View," what is news to us, though it may be generally known, that Austin was the author of the Life of Henry Irving by "Frederic Daly." Austin was "associated with" (whatever that may mean) Irving, says Mr. Rook, and used to give him hints or frame-works for his speeches. He was generally regarded, we imagine, as one of those lucky writers who subsist in comfort and elegance on one, or perhaps two, columns of causerie contributed every week to certain papers. He was, as a fact, a very hard worker, and wrote regularly two leading articles every night. The causeries were only parerga—"whimsical fantasy by way of recreation." But how good they were—or seemed—a few years ago! The present writer well remembers giving up The Sketch so soon as Austin ceased to write in it "At Random."

His wit and grace, if they were no match for James Payn's, were quite good enough to make a pleasant moment's reading. And this book of collected papers contains, at least, some capital stories. Here is one which gives a very characteristic view of Tennyson. Walking one day with Mr. George Meredith, he was very silent and gloomy. Suddenly he growled: "Apollodorus [Austin's name for some unimportant Scotch divine] says I am not a great poet." Mr. Meredith objected that Apollodorus's opinion did not matter; Tennyson retorted: "But he ought not to say I am not a great poet." That was the entire conversation. It reminds us a little of a story of Matthew Arnold, to whom a friend once dared to hint that "Merope" was not Greek. Arnold threw up his eyes. "It may not be Greek," said he, "but it is very, very beautiful!"

Austin is amusing, too, in the side issues he raises when discussing a proposal advanced by Mr. H. G. Wells to make every one pronounce alike. The confusion is certainly great. We are all Latinists enough nowadays to say, with no matter what difficulty, inexplicable and indisputable, while, in spite of some sort of a rule in English of throwing the accent back, we cling to inconsolable. Yet we set Latin at defiance and strain our tongues over laboratory and peremptory.

The changes in pronunciation of words is another interesting topic on which Austin touches. John Philip Kemble clung to the practice of pronouncing "aches" as if it was "aitches." Why? Because in Shakespeare it has to be so pronounced—to scan; just as you must say revenue, and sometimes, like Poet Rogers, contemplate. Every one knows, too, that in King John Constance must call Rome "Room," or she will spoil a pun; though elsewhere in Shakespeare (we have not the reference to hand) it must be called "Rome" to make it rhyme. Whether "gouts" should be called "goots" or "gowts" is still a vexed question; though having in view "wounded," which, as Austin says, was properly pronounced "wownded," we believe "gowts" to be correct. And it is probable, by the way, that the curate in Mr. Bernard Shaw's play who called it "knowledge" in church and "knollege" out of church, was strictly correct, as he should be, in his reading-desk.

Here is an interesting contrast. In a paper on "Clouds of Glory" Austin writes: "For most of us our own childhood is another existence, bygone and forgotten. Here and there a sensitive temperament has preserved impressions of that embryonic stage, calls up scenes at will, analyses, a little morbidly perhaps, characteristics which had their germs in the well-remembered sensations of the child. . . But considering that the child is always father to the man, there is a widespread unconsciousness of the paternity." Now hear Thackeray: "Only to two or three persons in all the world are the reminiscences of a man's youth interesting : to the parent who nursed him ; to the fond wife or child mayhap afterwards who loves him ; to himself always and supremely—whatever may be his actual prosperity or ill-fortune, his present age, illness, difficulties, renown, or disappointments, the dawn of his life still shines brightly for him, the early griefs and delights and attachments remain with him ever faithful and dear." Many are the strange things ; there is nothing stranger than man.

As our last issue was going through the press we learnt with regret of the death of Mr. Hercules Brabazon Brabazon, the most gifted of our painters in water-colours and a man of extraordinary personal charm. He was in his eighty-fifth year, but his art was so far ahead of his time and his sympathy so entirely with his younger contemporaries, that we instinctively associate him with the young reformers of the New English Art Club instead of with the men of his own generation, the generation of Holman Hunt, of Millais and of Ruskin. The companionship of the last Mr. Brabazon enjoyed during more than one sketching tour in North-Western France—half a century before he thought his works worthy of exhibition—and their mutual veneration for Turner drew together two artists of very different outlook. A country squire of ample means, Mr. Brabazon was under no necessity to find a market for his drawings, and he strictly preserved his status as an amateur till he had reached seventy years of age.

In a letter now before us Mr. Brabazon briefly describes his début: "I had my first exhibition at Goupil's in December 1892 . . . Sargent had seen my drawings and often wished me to exhibit them—one of them he came and hung himself on the wall after everything was ready. He then wrote for me that admirable preface which the press so much admired." This preface led many ignorant of Mr. Brabazon's age and experience to regard him as a young protégé of the American portrait-painter, and only a few weeks ago a writer in an evening journal pithily but inaccurately gave his artistic pedigree as "sired by Turner and dammed by Sargent." With the facts before us it is needless to point out that the art of "H.B.B." was fully developed before Mr. Sargent had served his apprenticeship. That Mr. Brabazon owed much to Turner is obvious ; that he was influenced by Monet and Whistler is possible ; but his impressions in water-colour and pastel were, above all, the logical outcome of an original genius who regarded form and colour from the standpoint not of a writer, but of a musician.

No account of Mr. Brabazon can be complete which leaves out of consideration his musical gifts and sympathies. It will be remembered that he was the discoverer of Emil Sauer, whose studies and subsequent career were facilitated by the encouragement and generosity of the artist. Himself a pianist of great feeling and considerable technical ability, Mr. Brabazon brought to painting the musician's sensitiveness to tone and harmony. He was neither an illustrator, nor a descriptive reporter, for he dealt, as a musician should, with the abstract rather than the concrete. The play of sunlight on the canals of Venice, on the lakes of Switzerland, the sunset's glow in Alpine skies, on British seas, the peaceful atmosphere of old-world cities, the blither air of busy beaches—these were his subjects, treated not so much for their actual topography as for their spirit, caught by a poet's eye and registered by a master's hand with a magical economy of means, a learned suppression of the irrelevant, and a penetrating enforcement of the essential beauty.

The pressing need for an exact system of classification in Public Libraries was the subject of a paper by Mr. McKnight (Chorley) which was read in his absence by Mr. Baker (Woolwich) at the last monthly meeting of the Library Association. Although classification is one of the highest functions of the librarian, and the principle of the scientific classification of books has been universally adopted, there are not more than twenty per cent. of the libraries of the country classified on any exact system. The other eighty per cent. are arranged numerically in from eight to twelve main classes. Is it too late for these libraries, many of which have been in existence for years, to be classified on one or other of the exact systems? If it were not too late, the writer of the paper plaintively asked why there was not an exact system in use in all the libraries in the country.

The general opinion amongst librarians, that the public is an ass, is an erroneous one (Mr. Brown, Islington). The public not only appreciates an exact system of classification but understands it. The difficulties in the way of classifying a library at present only divided into a few rough main classes, or of re-classifying a collection of books on a different system, are very much over-rated (Mr. Philip, Gravesend). The greater number of the scientific libraries of the country are not classified, and there is no intention of introducing any exact system. Many of these libraries date back two or three centuries and there are physical disadvantages attending the introduction of any system of scientific classification (Mr. Prideaux, Royal College of Physicians). But no plan of shelving nor, in fact, any physical consideration of a similar kind should have any effect on a system which deals only with the books themselves (Mr. Hutt, Liverpool). The indicator, although a system of close classification may very easily be used in conjunction with it, is responsible for the large number of libraries without any scientific system. The difficulties are small, but they exist ; and there is not the same need for an extended classification as is found in an open-access library (Mr. Bond, St. Pancras).

The value of the British Museum would be very greatly enhanced if the present classification there, which is an excellent example of how not to do it, were replaced by an exact system. And the difficulties in the way of this would not be insurmountable, as it could be done in less time and at less cost than that expended on the printed museum catalogue (Mr. Jast, Croydon). The function of the catalogue must not be confused with that of classification. But it is nevertheless true that the printed catalogue is one of the greatest obstacles to the introduction of a systematic classification (Mr. Baker).

Yesterday (May 25) saw the publication of the fourth annual issue of "Printer's Pie," an issue just five times as large as the first, which jumped into instant success in 1903. The profits go to the funds of the Printers' Pension, Almshouse and Orphan Asylum Corporation ; and two other Societies, the Booksellers' Provident Institution and the Newsvendors' Benevolent and Provident Institution, also benefit by the sale of this annual. So that the buyer is like the buyer of seats at a charity matinée : he "has a good time" and does other people good by enjoying himself. The list of contributors to this year's number is stronger than ever. It includes all sorts of writers—the Duke of Argyll and the Poet Laureate, Madame Sarah Grand and Mr. Adrian Ross, Mr. Frank Richardson and Mrs. Clement Shorter ; and among the artists are Mr. Charles Dana Gibson, Mr. Harry Furniss, Mr. Tom Browne and many others. Among the adventitious attractions of "Printer's Pie" is the fact that it includes an accident insurance for £2000 for three months.

Musicians, and especially students of stringed instruments, will be interested in an announcement which appears below—a meeting of the Cremona Society at which will be exhibited the only known violoncello made by Joseph Guarnerius, known as del Gesù. It has long been asserted that this master never made any instruments but violins. From time to time a viola of his make has been reported, only to prove lacking in the most essential evidence of his handiwork. The find of a violoncello was all the more unexpected—indeed, such a discovery had long been regarded as impossible—owing to the difference in size and likelihood of variation in design and manipulation from his violins. Such a discovery, however, has been made, and the Cremona Society and its guests will be the first to enjoy it. The President, Mr. Horace W. Petherick, who has a book on Guarnerius in the press, will lecture on the instrument, and Professor Herbert Walenn will play on it.

It may be recalled, in connection with the celebration this week of the two hundred and thirtieth anniversary of the constitution of the Royal Company of Archers, the King's Bodyguard for Scotland, that two great names in literature have been associated with the company—Allan Ramsay and Sir Walter Scott. On being admitted an honorary member and appointed bard of the company in 1724, "worthy Allan" composed a short poem of thanks, and under his signature, in the original roll of members, he wrote the following lines:

Apollo! patron of the lyre,
And of the valiant Archers' bow,
Me with such sentiments inspire
As may appear from thee to flow,
When by thy special will and dread command
I sing the merits of the Royal Band.

Admitted a member in 1821, Sir Walter Scott was in the ranks of the corps when George IV. visited the Scottish capital in 1822. The company has never been without its minor bards, and among these are included Robertson of Struan, an ardent Jacobite, Dr. Pitcairne, Thomas Kincaid, and Scott of Thirlstone.

In the new number of the Periodical which Mr. Frowde, of the Oxford University Press, issues quarterly, some interesting particulars are given concerning "The English Hymnal," three editions of which are to be issued early in June. The late Rev. W. H. H. Jervois was a member of the editorial committee, and to him "is dedicated the work in which he bore a large share, but did not live to see completed." The book is divided into twelve parts, and contains seven hundred and forty-four hymns. "The liveliest interest," the Periodical states, "is being shown in 'The English Hymnal,' and already it has been decided to adopt the book in a large number of churches."

In the letter from Mr. William Mercer published in our last issue the name of Halcourt should be Halcombe.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—On Tuesday next (May 29) at five o'clock Colonel V. Balck begins a course of Two Lectures at the Royal Institution on "Northern Winter Sports; Sweden and its People" and on Saturday June 2 at three o'clock Professor W. Macneile Dixon delivers a lecture on "The Origins of Poetry." The Friday evening Discourse on June 1, will be delivered by Professor H. Moissan on "L'Ebullition des Métaux" and on June 8 by Professor Sir James Dewar on "Studies on Charcoal and Liquid Air."

Society of Arts.—Monday, May 28, 8 P.M. (Cantor Lecture.) George W. Eve, "Heraldry in Relation to the Applied Arts." (Lecture III.) Tuesday, May 29, 8 P.M. (Applied Art Section.) Harry Powell: "Cut Glass."

Royal Historical Society.—Alexander Prize. The following subjects have been proposed by the Council: (1) Latin Commerce and Commercial colonies in the Black Sea, especially in the years 1260-1470. (2) The Union of England and Scotland 1702-7. (3) The Political Relations between Great Britain and the United States of America from the Ashburton Treaty of 1842 until the Alabama Award of 1872. Essays must be sent in before March 31, 1907, to the Offices of the Society, 3 Old Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, London.

Physical Society of London.—A Meeting of the Society will be held at 5 P.M. on Friday May 25, at the Royal College of Science, Exhibition Road, South Kensington. (1) Mr. J. S. Dow: Colour phenomena in photometry. (2) Mr. H. Tomlinson and Rev. G. T. Johnston: Exhibition of an automatic arc lamp. (3) Professor H. A. Wilson: The theory of moving coil and other kinds of ballistic galvanometers. (4) Mr. A. Campbell: Exhibition of a bifilar galvanometer free from zero creep.

Cremona Society.—A Special Meeting will be held on Wednesday, May 30, at 7.30 P.M., at the Argyll Gallery, Argyll Street, W., when papers will be read on "Strings" by Mr. E. C. Rimington, and "An unexpected discovery, the only known Violoncello by Joseph Guarnerius (del Gesù)" by the President, Mr. Horace W. Petherick. To be followed by Violin and Violoncello Soli by Herr Ferencz Hegedüs and Professor Hubert Walenn (who will use the Guarneri Violoncello). Tickets may be had of the Hon. Secretary, Mr. Albert H. Elliott, Elswick, 4 Woodhouse Road, N. Finchley.

Selborne Society.—Friday, May 25. Annual Conversazione, to be held in the theatre and halls at the offices of the Civil Service Commission (formerly the University of London), Burlington Gardens, New Bond Street, W., from 7.30 to 11 P.M. Presidential Address by Lord Avebury at 8. Lecture on "Extinct Monsters" by the Rev. H. N. Hutchinson at 9.30. Exhibits: Natural History Specimens, etc.

Country in Town Exhibition. Whitechapel Art Gallery, July 5 to 19.—The prospectus and regulations for exhibitors are now ready, and may be had from the Honorary Secretary: Mr. Wilfred Mark Webb, at Toynbee Hall, 28 Commercial Street, Whitechapel, E. Exhibits are invited that show in any way what has been done, or what can be done, to introduce some aspect of the country into the street, gardens or schools of our great urban centres.

LITERATURE

A MODERN STATESMAN

Joseph Chamberlain. An honest Biography. By ALEXANDER MACKINTOSH. (Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d.)

THERE are obvious objections to writing the life of a statesman while he is still in harness. Frequently it happens, to take a great example, that the end of a career casts a shade of colour over what went before it, and this consideration holds especially good in regard to Mr. Chamberlain. He has promulgated a policy to the country which has had the immediate effect of dividing public opinion and wrecking a party; but it is given to no mortal to forecast the end. It may be that Mr. Chamberlain's propaganda will fall on deaf ears, and that it will die away like many previous efforts to revive the cry of Protection. On the other hand, it is at least conceivable that he may succeed in winning over the majority of the country to his views and that the re-introduction of Protection into the fiscal policy of the country will mark a new departure in our history. He would indeed be a very prejudiced and bitter partisan or rash prophet who ventured to say, while Mr. Chamberlain is still alive, what is going to be the effect of his missionary zeal. To write even a character-sketch of a public man while he is still in the full enjoyment of his powers cannot, at best, be more than a piece of superficial journalism. Political biography is the most difficult of all biographies to understand. The plain citizen, who is no quidnunc and who cares little for the gossip of lobby or coterie, is in the habit of taking a platform speech on its merits. He is intent, if he be a sincere citizen, on ascertaining the merits and disadvantages of the broad line of policy dealt with. However, he accepts the arguments in good faith and weighs one consideration against another until he arrives at some conclusion of his own; but the political biography often has the effect of confusing such simple issues. One of the writer's aims is to show that there is scarcely an orator who, when making a speech, is not actuated by some undercurrent of feeling. We confess ourselves to have read many hundreds of speeches, and even studied them carefully, without noticing the hidden gibes and sneers and flouts which have been subsequently pointed out in biography. Here it is not our wish to enter into the vexed sphere of politics or to discuss the rival merits of Free Trade and Protection. Our purpose is rather to judge of this life as a human document, and as such it is well worthy of attention.

Mr. Chamberlain does not belong to the class from which our statesmen have usually been drawn. He is really of the tribe of Cobden, not of that of Salisbury. In the past, we have drawn our politicians almost exclusively from the leisured and landed classes. If we take the list of Prime Ministers even from so late an epoch as that of

Sir Robert Peel, we find that they nearly all belong to the same class. Palmerston, Lord John Russell, Gladstone himself, Beaconsfield (who at least by his ambitions deserves to be included), Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, all belong to the same class. Many men who are exclusively business men have performed all but the highest service to their country. Parliament and the nation owe them much; yet it is curious to note that none has ever attained the highest position, and what is true of the business man is equally true of the lawyer. One of the most eminent was Sir William Harcourt, and yet Sir William just failed to reach the top rung of the ladder. Whether this be due to accident or to a strong Parliamentary prejudice founded upon instinct it would be hard to determine. It is easy to see why a lawyer should encounter a certain amount of suspicion in the House of Commons. He has been trained to advocate a cause, and has got into the way of framing his argument to suit his brief. It is perfectly certain that this does not in all cases injure his sense of fair play, justice and impartiality, because many of our most celebrated judges are men whose good faith even the severest critic would never think of calling into question, and who have in their time been keen advocates. Yet the House of Commons has invariably preferred a man of strong convictions, even if he did not quite come up to the lawyer in ability. On the other hand, business has never been thoroughly on its trial, any more than labour. As a rule, a man who has been successful in commerce has directed the whole of his attention at the most energetic period of his life to this calling and, although later, when his position has been secured, he may enter politics and do comparatively well, it is unlikely that he will ever become the equal of those who have had no other object or aim in life. These considerations derive additional point from the life before us, which the biographer, with no great modesty, calls "honest." It seems to us that Mr. Mackintosh gives most of his sympathy to the Chamberlain of early middle age: the impulsive, nimble and audacious Radical who propounded the doctrine of ransom; who said that Lord Salisbury and those like him were like the lilies of the field which "toil not, neither do they spin"; who on a memorable occasion declared of the peers that "the Lord hath delivered them into our hands"; who propounded the scheme of Home Rule, and generally speaking proved himself the opponent of what is. Evidently Mr. Mackintosh is of opinion that in the early part of his career Mr. Chamberlain aspired to the leadership of the Liberal party. That is the key-note which he gives to all those changes of policy and issues of new problems that took place between the return of the Liberals to power in 1880 and their split on the Home Rule Bill. It is not for us to discuss the question. We simply state the fact and leave it. It is on record that Mr. Chamberlain prepared a Home Rule Scheme of his own and, reading between the lines of Mr. Morley's Life of Gladstone, it is fairly obvious that he considered himself at the time "dished" by his leader.

The story of the manner in which he gradually came over to the Conservative point of view is interesting in itself and admirably told by Mr. Mackintosh. Indeed, we may say here that, whatever view may be taken of the opinions expressed in this book, it is from beginning to end as enthralling as any novel we have read. Mr. Chamberlain himself makes a first-rate central character. He is a strong man and a man of will, but to fill in the picture we want a biographer who can go into more detail in regard to his life as a business man. When that is more clearly understood than it is at the present moment, it will be more easily possible to establish a harmony between the beginning and the end of his career. A question that we cannot help asking as we read is whether the incubation of the idea of Protection was a natural outcome of Mr. Chamberlain's previous thought and character or merely a bid for popularity. The active, progressive type of mind to which he belongs is ever seeking some new thing, and it well may be that the scheme of fiscal change propounded so suddenly at Birmingham was the application of the speaker's commercial principles to the conduct of national affairs. It has been said that no one can love another more or less than he loves himself. Mr. Chamberlain's sincerity is beyond question, and we can very well imagine that if he were called upon to "run" the Empire, he would do it exactly in the same way as in early days he ran his business in Birmingham. Whether that would be good for the Empire or not is for politicians and statesmen to determine.

As companion figures to his in this volume there are many striking contrasts, notably the personality of the Duke of Devonshire. Perhaps, when all is said and done, his will be accounted the stateliest figure of the period. He seems never to have nourished a small thought or given expression to animosity. Disinterested, noble and sincere, his is the finest figure that appears in these pages. Mr. Gladstone does not come out so well, since it was necessary to give much attention to those years of his old age when his intellect was obviously failing. Lord Salisbury is most entertaining as the antagonist of Mr. Chamberlain, who was no match for him in word-play and writhed beneath many of the barbed arrows of that master of verbal fence. Very interesting are the two final chapters of the work, one on Mr. Chamberlain's personal life and the other on his characteristics. Even a chronicle of small beer has merits, and the small beer of the following passage may be commended to the reader's attention:

For fifty years he has eaten ices whenever he could get them—penny sorts debarred. His health has excited the envy of his contemporaries. He has, as he told the doctors, been addicted to ices; he has smoked whenever he had nothing else to do, and generally when he had something to do; and he has "consumed in moderation such alcoholic fluids as he saw before him." Yet he declared at the end of 1904 that his digestion was as good as ever it was. In this respect, as in many others, he has been specially fortunate, for a good digestion is as necessary to a politician as a thick skin.

A man who delighted in ices, who took no exercise yet retained a splendid digestion, "surprises by himself," in the words of a well-known character. As a Parliamentarian we have the following thumb-nail sketch of him:

It is at Westminster that Mr. Chamberlain has struggled hardest and gained his highest reputation; there he has aroused the fiercest animosities, and won the most notable victories. He understands the House of Commons. He knows its habits, its moods, its prejudices, its virtues; he knows how to humour it, he has often dared to defy it. He never despises it. At the end of twenty-eight years' service, he declared: "During all that time my respect for its authority, my confidence in its judgment, my desire for its good opinion, has never wavered." Nor has any section, however much it might dislike him, ever despised so skilful and zealous a member. From the month that he took his seat till the present time he has been an individual force, not always calculable, never negligible.

And in regard to his oratory this is worth quoting:

A new style of debate has been introduced by the member for Birmingham. The old school of oratory, with its learning and its pomp, was decaying when he entered the House, and with a new type of Parliamentarian the time was propitious for a new sort of speech. It is characterised by directness, and in Mr. Chamberlain's case by audacity; and it is without ornament.

It would seem that he has not had the literary turn which has enabled some statesmen to mint unforgettable phrases:

Among the most picturesque metaphors employed by politicians in recent years were Mr. Asquith's "ploughing the sand," and Lord Rosebery's "clean slate," and "lonely furrow." Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's "Ulsteria," served at anyrate for a season to indicate a phase of the Home Rule agitation. Mr. Chamberlain claims no credit for "ransom"; "pin-pricks" he took from the Matin; "they toil not, neither do they spin," was an audacious adaptation from the sublimest sermon; "what I have said, I have said"—the motto of a baronet—has been traced to Thomas Paine, and has recalled Pilate's "What I have written, I have written." "Little Englander" did not spring from the brain of the new Imperialist; it is said to have been suggested by the Pall Mall Gazette which asked in 1884: "The advocates of a Little England, where are they now?"

TWO ELIZABETHS

Elizabeth Montagu, the Queen of the Blue-Stockings: Her Correspondence from 1720 [sic] to 1761. By her great-great-niece, EMILY CLIMENSON. 2 vols. (Murray, 36s. net.)

A Woman of Wit and Wisdom: A Memoir of Elizabeth Carter, one of the "Bas-Bleu" Society (1717-1806). By ALICE C. C. GAUSSEN. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.)

MRS. CLIMENSON'S overgrown book illustrates the fallacy of the personal estimate. Elizabeth Montagu was a woman of wealth and social consequence, acclaimed by her friends as a prodigy of sense and learning, and, in fact, posset of a quick understanding, a cultivated literary taste, and a more than common acquaintance with books; but as a writer she does not count, nor can she be reckoned an appreciable factor in the intellectual movement of her day. She printed an essay in defence of Shakespeare against Voltaire, and was reported once to have flattered an obscure contemporary playwright named Jephson by exclaiming: "I tremble for Shakespeare!" Whereupon Johnson observed that, when Shakespeare had got Jephson for his rival and Mrs. Montagu for his defender, he must be in a poor case indeed. Johnson, says Leslie Stephen, respected her for her liberality, and "paid her some tremendous compliments, but he had his usual professional contempt for her amateur performances in literature." Such was the lady whose correspondence, as presented by Mrs. Climençon, runs to close on six hundred pages demy octavo—not, observe, the unabridged letters of a life-time, but a selection merely, from the correspondence belonging to thirty (1731-1761), and those, in this respect, the least productive of her eighty years! Her more significant epistolary intercourse, with Johnson, Burke, Sterne, Hannah More, Fanny Burney, and many other prominent people, belongs to a later period (1762-1800). Two letters from Burke, two, already in print, from Johnson, a letter and a curious testamentary memorandum by Laurence Sterne, with here and there a passage in the letters of Mrs. Carter, Mrs. Donnellan, Dr. Young, Lord Lyttelton, Lord Bath, Mrs. Montagu herself, and her cousin, Gilbert West the poet—known to his friends as "Tubby"—fairly exhaust the literary contents of these big volumes; the rest is a mere tale of trivial domesticities—a record of endless flittings to and fro between town and country—"a history of Forms, Fashions, Frolics, Drums, Routs, Hurricanes, Balls, Masquerades, Operas, Plays, and Puppet-shows"—in a word, an infinite deal of nothing.

"I have often groaned in spirit," writes Mrs. Climençon in the Preface, "at having to leave out much that was noble in sentiment, or long comments on contemporary books or events." Well, of sentiment, perhaps, there is enough, and to spare; but why, if hard pressed for space, as she implies—why devote five whole pages to the inoculation of her heroine for the small-pox? As the infection did not take, surely a bare note of the incident might have sufficed—though doubtless in many eyes such petty ills acquire a derivative dignity from the rank of the sufferer, and thus what in the servants' hall would be reckoned a pinprick becomes a tragedy in the boudoir. Be this as it may, we would cheerfully forego the report of the inoculation—an ordeal which, it is gratifying to learn, the illustrious patient supported "with the spirit of a Christian, a Philosopher, and a Woman of true fortitude"—for a few of those "comments on contemporary books" of which Mrs. Climençon gives us a tantalising glimpse. We suspect, if the truth must be told, that she is but faintly interested in the literary side of her subject. In its social and genealogical sides her interest is keen, and her notes, in these directions, are many and good. Indeed, in this respect her book is one that "my aunt Pedigree" might have pored and gloated over.

On the whole, we confess, fair entertainment may be won from this small-beer chronicle, wherein, if the literary vein is weak, the human element is strong and abundant. In youth, Elizabeth Robinson possessed many charms of person, and her temper was gay, mirthful and papilionaceous; but from childhood upwards her heart was impenetrable, self-centred, calculating, and void of the least tincture of romance. She was one of those passionless creatures

Who, moving others, are themselves as stone,
Unmoved, cold, and to temptation slow.

When barely twenty, she wrote to her mother:

Love has a good right over the marriage of men, but not of women; for men raise their wives to their rank, women stoop to their husbands, when they choose beneath themselves.

And, again:

A man of merit and a younger brother is a purchase only for a large fortune; as for those who have more merit than wealth, they must turn the penny by disposing of their useless virtues for riches. . . . Gold is the chief ingredient in the composition of worldly happiness. Living in a cottage on love is certainly the worst diet and the worst habitation one can find out.

Precocious Innocence! was ever miss just out of her 'teens so admirably fitted (as Becky Sharp puts it) to "be her own Mamma"? "Riches and alliance," she tells her cousin, Dean Freind, are what she desiderates in marriage; her husband must be "of established fortune and character—so established that one piece of generosity shall not hurt his fortune, nor one act of indiscretion prejudice his character." Is this adorable humility, or is it simply the mammon-worship of "pretty Kitty Lorrimer?" She views the act of marrying Elizabeth Montagu—wise, virtuous, beautiful, but undowered—in the light of an indiscretion! So, too, when her friend Torriano has "done the irrevocable deed" on £500 a year, she deplores his marriage not only "as the world will lose him, but as he will lose the world, which with all its faults is not to be entirely quitted"—as though a penniless wife entailed social ostracism on her husband! And when she hears that her cousin, Betty Lumley, has wedded a poor parson named Laurence Sterne, "a ci-devant rake, now japanned and varnished," her contempt and disgust find vent as follows in a letter to her sister Sally:

I never saw a more comical letter than my poor cousin's, with her heart and head full of matrimony. Pray, do matrimonial thoughts come upon your recovery? for she seems to think it a symptom. [Betty had been at death's door before her troth-plight to Yorick.] . . . Mr. Sterne has £100 a year living, with a good prospect of better preferment. . . . I do not comprehend what my cousin means by their "little desires;" if she had said "little stomachs", it had been some help to their economy, but when people have not enough for the necessities of life, what avails it that they can do without the superfluities and pomps of it? Does she mean that she won't keep a coach and six, and four footmen? What a wonderful occupation she made of courtship, that it left her no leisure nor inclination to think of anything else! I wish they may live well together.

Later, at the news of expected progeny in the same quarter, she exclaims:

Does the world want odd people, or do we want strange cousins that the Sternes must increase and multiply? No folly ever becomes extinct, fools do so establish posterity.

Needless to add that, as far as decency permitted, she turned her back on the cousin who had committed the scandalous indiscretion of obeying, in her marriage, the dictates of her heart.

Before Elizabeth had completed her twenty-second year, Prince Charming arrived in the person of Edward Montagu, Esq., M.P., a gentleman some thirty years her senior, grandson of the first Earl of Sandwich, and owner of a good estate in Yorkshire, and heir in remainder through his mother, Sarah Rogers, to an extensive property in the collieries of Durham and Northumberland. After marriage, Elizabeth addicted herself to lion-hunting; and, as she had a large income, a lavishly decorated house in Hill Street and a cunning chef, her parties were thronged by the celebrated people of the day. She had always detested cards; and now, though she did not dare openly discountenance them, and, in fact, gave card-parties of as many as a hundred and fifty guests at a time, she ventured to initiate a more intellectual form of diversion in the shape of literary conversation and discussion, in which distinguished writers and savants frequently took part. Some of those "fearful wild-fowl" evitated the ceremony of full dress; amongst others Dr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, who invariably appeared on such occasions with his cruscula clad in homely blue worsted, instead of the conventional black silk. Admiral Boscawen is said to have been the first to dub this sober-suited covey "the Blue-socking Society." In a letter dated November 13, 1756, Sam Torriano rallies Mrs. Montagu on her intimacy with Stillingfleet (recently her guest at Sandleford), and adds: "Monsey swears he will make out some story of you and him before you are much older; you shall not keep blew stockings at Sandleford for nothing." This is the first allusion to the sobriquet in the letters, and it anticipates Dr. Murray's earliest illustrative quotation ("N.E.D.") by a year.

Mrs. Montagu was, as we have said, a woman of alert intelligence, well read in English literature—she had Milton at her fingers' ends—and mistress of Latin, French, and Italian. But with all her accomplishments she lacked simplicity, and her lofty, self-conscious airs marred the ease and comfort of her guests. "She could never," writes Miss Gausson:

accomplish Mrs. Vesey's feat of squaring the circle; even the very chairs and tables seemed to conspire against her, and form themselves into a ring. She possessed no power of harmonising the conflicting elements of which her assemblies were composed. Her guests arrived in a mass, and each individual departed, "feeling himself single, isolated, and embarrassed with his own person."

How could it be otherwise, where the hostess was too deeply preoccupied in posing to give a thought to the feelings of those around her? As a child she was trained by Dr. Conyers Middleton to repeat by rote the abstruse discussions at which, under his roof, she was often present. How far the parrot-faculty thus exercised may have assisted her in the conversational displays of her maturity, it is impossible to say. But if at such times she ever ventured beyond her depth and "talked like poor Poll," the bystanders were none the wiser; for, like the parish functionary of whom her cousin Sterne discourses in his novel of "Tristram Shandy," she had acquired by long practice the habit of playing her official part with an imperturbable gravity of demeanour.

Mrs. Climensson has succeeded in identifying, with one or two exceptions, the numerous folk whose names occur in her text; in other respects her notes are defective and capricious. "Prunello" and "grogam" are explained, but nothing is said about Dr. Courayer's "gold orrace," or "the very handsome Du Cape" worn by Elizabeth when assisting the Duchess of Portland to receive in state, on the occasion of her grace's third lying-in. Again, the editor tells us twice over—once in the text, and, again, in a note—that "wheatears are delicious eating," thus wantonly and gratuitously provoking our gulosity; yet not a word does she vouchsafe touching "the noble game of E. O.," wherewith in 1748 Mrs. Montagu beguiled her evenings at Bath. Some notice should have been taken of that lady's remarkable acquaintance with Milton's verse—scarce one of her letters but testifies to this—of her references to Beaumont and Fletcher, Wycherley, Farquhar, and Otway, and her quotations from Waller, Cowley, Prior, Suckling, and Pope. Neither literature, however, appeals to the editor, nor even music—if one may judge from her suggestion that a certain "new Opera" by Handel, of which we read that it was produced in the third week of November 1741 and contained a number called the "Lion Song," may possibly have been the "Messiah"! Of the author of so quaint a conjecture what can be said but that:

Of common tunes she knows not anything,
Nor Rule Britannia from God Save the King.

Of various freaks of quackery related in these letters take the following anecdote of old Lady Northampton. Desiring to try the effect of "Ward's Pill"—a dangerous compound of antimony prepared by that egregious impostor, Joshua, alias "Spot" Ward—she conceived the expedient of administering it to a cock, which was then killed and converted into broth for her ladyship, whose death presently ensued. The ancients sacrificed a cock to Æsculapius: perhaps the miscarriage in this case was due to the preliminary medication, or (so to speak) pillification, of the victim. Of the Duke of Norfolk we read that he spent his time in drawing plans for beehives; of the Duke of Montagu, that he bequeathed legacies by codicil to each of his servants, his dogs, and his cats. According to Horace Walpole, "as he was making the codicil one of the cats jumped on his knee. 'What,' says he, 'have you a mind to be a witness too? You can't, for you are a party concerned.'" Those eccentric people, the aristocracy!

A propos of a rumoured Jacobite rising in February 1744, Edward Montagu, writing to his wife, quotes a saying of one Hungerford, a former member of the House, that "the Pretender was the best wooden leg a ministry ever had to beg with." Amongst phrases no longer current is that of "eating a cold loaf," in the sense of "picnicking." This is not recorded in the "N.E.D." With "hurricane," meaning "a crowded assembly," we were already familiar in the pages of Mrs. Delany and Mrs. Barbauld: it furnishes an exact parallel to procella, the word Encolpius employs to describe Trimalchio's dinner-party. "From the Shell-Room you have no advantage [= view] of the Thames," is an unusual locution, though "vantage-ground" in this connection is common enough. On the whole, the transcriber has done his work well, but here and there he nods, as on p. 241, vol. i., where "in a manner rather smiling Eastern courtesy" should manifestly run, "rather suited," etc. Three lines lower down we read that "Standen asked Mary classical questions. The context shows that "Mary" is impossible; "many" is an obvious and plausible conjecture.

Miss Gausson's book is disappointing: her narrative is so desultory and broken that we have found it difficult to derive a clear impression of the central figure. She has, too, an awkward trick of parenthesising Mrs. Carter's views at every turn of her story, which renders continuous perusal an exercise of patience. It is good to know that her translation of Epictetus rendered Mrs. Carter independent for life, enabled her to spend several months every winter in London, and furnished her with the means to buy a house in the town of Deal, where, after her step-mother's death, her father came to live with her. The pleasantest pages in the book are those which tell of her friendship with the kindly old humorist, Archbishop Secker, whose advice and assistance in her work she besought and received. After closeting himself with Epictetus for a month, however, the old man grew tired and remonstrated as follows:

Are you not ashamed to persecute a poor English Archbishop with heathen Greeks, which it may be hoped he hath the grace to forget entirely? But you cannot be quiet in your bed, you say, without doing it. Very probable truly; for I read of some persons; They sleep not except they cause some to fall.

Mrs. Carter replied:

'Tis not to be told how miserably I looked upon Epictetus and how miserably Epictetus looked upon me, at the news that my Lord had so inhumanly given us up to our own devices; however, in consequence of our philosophy, we are determined to go peaceably blundering on; he in being translated till I cannot understand him, and I in translating till nobody can understand me.

Miss Gausson devotes a chapter to the "Queen of the Blues," Mrs. Montagu, whose moral and intellectual measure her demure little friend, Mrs. Carter, appears to have taken accurately enough. When Minerva complained of the hardship of accompanying her husband on a visit to his northern property, her monitress sturdily replied:

After all, the true proof of wisdom is doing the thing which ought to be done. If you had stayed behind, you might have appeared a much finer lady, and a much finer genius, and might have sat in your Chinese and Athenian rooms and have written more Dialogues of the Dead, but you certainly are a more reasonable being in accompanying Mr. Montagu, and assisting him in his business and the entertainment of his northern neighbours.

And she practised what she preached, as Johnson recognised when he observed: "My old friend, Mrs. Carter, can make a pudding as well as translate Epictetus, and work a handkerchief as well as compose a poem." Johnson composed a Greek epigram in her honour, and thought she "ought to be celebrated in as many different languages as Louis le Grand." It is curious to find her father writing to Mrs. Carter on June 25, 1738: "You mention Johnson; that is a name with which I am utterly unacquainted. Neither his scholastic, critical, or poetical character ever reached my ears. I a little suspect his judgment if he is very fond of Martial." Sed haec prius fuere—in the dark days before the Dixonary.

It is right to add that Mr. Robert Brudenell Carter contributes a genealogical note on his family to Miss Gausson's volume.

TASTE OR IMAGINATION?

The English Water-Colour Painters. By A. J. FINBERG.
(Duckworth's Popular Library of Art, 2s. net.)

THIS is a bright and instructive little book, written in a clear and easy manner, with a piquancy and alertness that occasionally rise to humour or sarcasm. It is thoroughly representative of the present revival among art-lovers, which gives respect and study to the traditions of a hundred years ago, and regards with amused contempt the mania that the nineteenth century caught from the successes of mechanics and science.

Pictures were once painted for those who were considered "good judges"; under the influence of this millennial mania, whose watchwords were "education," "progress," and "the overwhelming majority," pictures came to be painted for the public at large. Mr. Finberg considers that up to 1815 Turner painted for "judges"; after that date for the indiscriminate public. In fact, 1815 seems to him the central date in the development of English water-colour painting, much as the birth of Christ appears in history to the orthodox, only it was that devil "vulgarity" who was born in the year of Waterloo.

This idea is calculated to give unity and comprehensibility to the story which Mr. Finberg tells, and he takes full advantage of it: while as a reaction from vulgar errors, which have on the whole prevailed till now, it may well be valued as an effective antidote to a stupefying poison. Admitting this, it may still be asked, does this theory express the facts in their true proportion? is it just, delicate, or capable of development? I wish to offer Mr. Finberg, and those who agree with him, a few considerations which, as it appears to me, invalidate their synthesis; and to suggest that such theories have too much the character of a counter swing of the pendulum.

Every point Mr. Finberg urges against Turner might be made against Shakespeare by any one who regarded the sweet, even flow of his early verse with the same reverence that our author has for Turner's earlier manner. In "Venus and Adonis" Shakespeare appealed to the good judges that were then, and no doubt every offence against their judgment, every freedom and liberty he took with his material, had the effect of securing a wider and wider public for him. Great artists almost always break down those traditions which, nevertheless, have often given some peculiar charm or refinement to their earliest masterpieces, such as may be lacking to their greatest. A tradition is the work of two or more generations of minds possessed by an instinctive or conscious faith in their solidarity with regard to some ideal. It cannot fail, therefore, to enshrine and consecrate some nobleness. No man could grow noble alone. The solitary inhabitant of a planet could never achieve moral dignity. Art is always addressed to some one and owes its effectiveness to the solidarity that obtains between the artist and the person or persons whom he addresses. What they have in common is the source of his strength. It is impossible either for him or them to value rightly what he alone has. That is divine, demonic, miraculous, incalculable. Every genius possesses a large share of this rebellious and eccentric character. The difference between a man like Turner and a Titian or Michelangelo is a difference of education: Turner had not been able to assimilate the best culture of his day; they had. When he frees himself and trusts to his own eccentricity he appears to fall from one social level to a lower. He then showed that he belonged to the lower middle class still, like the butler who is perfect in the drawing-room, but when at his ease in the kitchen is as frail as his fellows. Turner was forced by the development of his genius to break through the tradition which he had mastered; and to imply, as Mr. Finberg does, that the desire of gain was his only or chief motive is to be sovereignly unjust. The money which rewarded him may at times have seemed even to himself a justification—a compensation at least for what he had been forced to throw away, the approval, the security, the clear view ahead. We are told that he adopted this mercenary course on account of the success of his Dido, but the theory does not suggest any explanation of how he ever came to conceive or paint such a picture. Mr. Finberg forgets how much Ruskin and Tennyson, Whistler and Monet have owed to the later half of Turner's work. What beauties he brought within range by his daring, what new realms for research and observation his experiments opened up! The harvest is by no means yet all reaped; we may well allow that much is not yet even ripe.

Now, my contention is that, though Turner's later works share the defect in taste of those to whom they were addressed, they also share the elemental strength of their common humanity, a strength with which Rembrandt, Shakespeare and Michelangelo have all sought alliance. His earlier works were confined to some extent by the pedantic prejudice of the "good taste" of those "judges." "Thaumaturgist" if you like, a worker in wonder, but with the giant Florentine, with Pheidias himself, who, no doubt, made a similar appeal with his gigantic chryselephantine statues! The creative imagination has never, and will never, submit to the management of the "judges." Genius overrules taste. Mr. Finberg's theory colours his treatment of all the artists that precede or follow Turner; he goes more than half-way to meet the former, as a rule rather less than half-way to meet the latter. There is lack of proportion in the tone with which he speaks of John R. Cozens when we turn to what he has to say of Rossetti immediately after reading it.

The whole revival of interest in, and respect for, the traditions abandoned seventy or eighty years ago is necessarily beset with pedantry. Docility to a narrow past may so easily take the place of docility to all those rich and complex conditions that wait ready to inform the modern soul!

This is the only serious criticism I find to make on an admirable and instructive essay, which it is a pleasure to read, even where one is bound to disagree with it. If I can persuade Mr. Finberg to modify his expression of the truth he has so vividly apprehended in the longer work on Turner to which we are looking forward, it is the most for which I dare hope; since those who will heartily concur in the author's conclusions even as at present put forward are doubtless, at present, on the increase, and feel their expectations of influence flattered by every possible presage of success.

T. STURGE MOORE.

UNIONS OR GILDS?

The Restoration of the Gild System. By ARTHUR J. PENTY.
(Swan Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d.)

THE author of this book aims at carrying the philosophy of Socialism out of the arena of Politics into that of the Industrial system. Moreover, he turns the tables on the orthodox Socialist and proves the fallacy of his assumption that "Government should be conducted solely in the interests of man as a consumer." The book is remarkable, not so much for the finality of its reasoning as for the stimulus it gives to thought and the ability with which the existing theories of advanced Sociologists are shown to be founded on a false hypothesis. The author frankly admits, as a basis of reasoning, the ideals propounded by such philosophical thinkers as Ruskin, Morris, Carpenter, Carlyle and others, whose writings have shared in forming his opinions. But Mr. Arthur Penty goes a step further than these writers and endeavours to weave his ideals into the fabric of a new Socialism, where the producer shall take the place of the consumer and the master-craftsman the place of the financier. Collectivism (as the author designates modern Socialism), Fabianism and other Sociological doctrines have all been prospected and rejected as inadequate. Mr. Penty successfully proves that Collectivism is at fault in assuming that Competition is necessarily an evil and that Co-operation—that is Co-operation of Capital or the nationalisation of industry—can improve matters for the worker. It would in reality only be turning existing Commercialism into State Commercialism, which is an even worse evil.

It is rightly maintained that our industries, to become healthy, should be under the control of craftsmen rather than financiers, though it is perhaps scarcely reasonable to label our present captains of industry as mere financiers. Nor can we accept without question, that "the capricious taste of the public" is an inherent vice of the consumer; rather is it aggravated, if not created, by the inconsistencies and lack of any standard of the commercial producer. In this relation it is no doubt true that "the sense of a consecutive tradition has so completely disappeared from modern life that it is difficult for many of us to realise what it means;" consequently, to quote further: "the modern craftsman, deprived of the guidance of a healthy tradition, is surrounded on all sides by forms which have persisted, though debased and vulgarised, while the thought which created them has been lost." Similarly, this absence of tradition affected every department of our existence and has finally separated art from life.

In advocating a return to the Gild System of mediæval times, the modus operandi is by no means clear. We are told for instance that:

the Gilds cannot be re-established by further evolution upon the lines along which society is now travelling, but by the development of those forces which run counter to what may be considered the normal line of social evolution. Of these, the first which will be instrumental in restoring the Gilds is the Trade Union movement.

But our author then says:

in three respects only, as industrial organisations, are they [the Trade Unions] differentiated from the Gilds. In the first place, they accept no responsibility for the quality of the wares they produce. Secondly, masters are not permitted to become members of these organisations; and thirdly, they do not possess monopolies in their separate trades.

Admitting the importance of these differences, Mr. Penty still does not consider them fundamental.

We must confess that it would appear more logical to argue that Trade Unionism is symptomatic of disease and not of any striving after an ideal, inasmuch it is a movement that recognises only the financial and commercial aspect of labour and in no way the philosophic or artistic. In fact, Trade Unionism is as corrupt and as much in need of reform as any other department of our social system. And it is not satisfactorily explained how the vastly increased commercial relationship between countries which exists to-day is to be adequately coped with by a system which ignores financial profit. The internationalisation of all thought and progress is surely the inevitable trend of our modern development. It cannot be said that there are forces which will successfully run counter to this normal line of evolution. "The second force which is preparing for the restoration of the Gilds" is the Arts and Crafts movement, and this should, in our opinion, have been placed first. We could have wished that this section of the book had been worked out more thoroughly. It might conceivably have been shown how this latter movement could be developed into a vast united and organised body of workers for the furtherance of a sounder educational system and the administration of our industrial art-trades on a plan analogous to that of the Gilds. It would seem easier to graft the socialistic principles propounded by the author on to the Arts and Crafts movement, which already contains the germ of a similar ideal at its root, than to graft an appreciation of philosophy and art on to Trade Unionism, which only materialises the idea of co-operation in its crudest form.

The fact that this book challenges criticism in no way detracts from, but rather increases, its value as a most able addition to the literature of a subject that is one of the pressing needs of the day. The reader's interest in the author's point of view is held from first to last by the clearness of the arguments and the simple directness of his literary style. One thing is incidentally made very apparent in perusing this book—the necessity for a wider, more sympathetic view of education on its ethical and æsthetic sides, so that we may recover "more scrupulous honesty in respect to our trade relationships, the restoration of living traditions of handicraft and the emergence of nobler conceptions of life in general."

THE YOUNG LION

Leo Tolstoy, his Life and Work. Autobiographical memoirs, letters, and biographical material, compiled by PAUL BIRUKOFF, and revised by LEO TOLSTOV. Vol. i. (Heinemann, 6s. net.)

IF there be a muse, as Robert Burns feigned to believe there was, whose name is fun, her inspiration is sadly lacking in this serious, not to say lugubrious, life of the great Russian novelist. It is indeed a most serious work and suggests that the author was much more anxious to exhibit Leo Tolstoy as a prophet and a teacher than as a literary artist whose province it is to hold the mirror up to Nature. Perhaps that may to some extent be traced to the nationality of the novelist. The young Russian noble was educated and brought up in a way that would seem strange indeed to the budding heirs of our own landed gentry. It is set forth with the greatest care that the progenitors of the writer on both sides were illustrious and high officials. He was, in a manner of speaking, born to the purple. His father, after a period of service with the army, retired to his estate and engaged in the ordinary pursuits of a Russian nobleman. He was not a cruel man, and yet we get here and there a hint of occurrences that shock our English ideas:

We children with our tutor were returning home from a walk, when by the barn we met the fat steward, Andrey Flyin, followed by the coachman's assistant—"Squinting Koozma," as he was called—with a sad face. He was a married man, no longer young. One of us asked Andrey Flyin where he was going, and he quietly answered that he was going to the barn, where Koozma had to be punished. I cannot describe the dreadful feeling which these words and the sight of the good-natured, crestfallen Koozma produced on me.

We can scarcely fancy a country boy, such as the Sir Bevis that Richard Jefferies attractively pictured, watching the bailiff, for instance, going to receive corporal punishment in the barn. The childhood of Tolstoy was spent in the village of Yasnaya Polyana, the family estate of the Princes Volkonsky and is situated in the Krapivensk district of the province of Tula. How early his reminiscences begin may be gathered from the fact that he relates "his vague sensations of being swathed," sensations that he felt during the first year of his life, while he has a host of memories of the days before he reached the mature age of three. This fact alone would explain our lament that the muse of fun was not looking over the shoulder of the biographer when he penned these passages. As a matter of fact, the early reminiscences of Leo Tolstoy are not very illuminating. The biographer has made extensive use of notes supplied by his subject, and probably his seriousness is to some extent a reflection of that of his author. A great deal of attention is devoted to the moral development of the young prodigy and very little to those amusements and external interests that probably were of far more importance in shaping his character. Up to fourteen years of age he is said to have been most influenced by the story of Joseph from the Bible, the Arabian Nights' Entertainment, and two or three Russian authors. Previous to this he tells us that he was greatly concerned with conceptions of beauty, philosophic argument and the solution of such a question as: "Why is symmetry pleasant to the eye?" University life does not hold anything very interesting, but the following paragraph will give an idea of his thoughts at the time:

At that date, which I regard as the extreme limit of boyhood and beginning of youth, the basis of my dreams consisted of four sentiments. The first was the love for her, an imaginary woman, of whom I dreamt ever in the same way, and whom I expected to meet somewhere at any minute. . . . My second sentiment was the love of love. I wanted everybody to know and love me. I wanted to tell my name, and have every one struck by the information, and surround me and thank me for something. The third sentiment was a hope for some unusual vain happiness—such a strong and firm hope that it passed into insanity. . . . My fourth and chief sentiment was my self-disgust and repentance, but a repentance which was so closely welded with the hope of happiness, that there was nothing sad in it. . . . I even found pleasure in my disgust with the past, and tried to see it blacker than it was. The blacker the circle of my memories of the past, the brighter and clearer stood out from it the bright and clear point of the present, and streamed the rainbow colours of the future. This voice of repentance and passionate desire for perfection was the main new sensation of my soul at that epoch of my development, and it was this which laid a new foundation for my views of myself, of people, and of the whole world.

Yet it is at about this time that the natural frankness and candour of the man began to tell. He does not seem to have been a particularly pleasant or amiable child, and, as soon as he approached to maturity, he succumbed to the temptations by the way, though under this yielding to temptation it is obvious that there was always a striving after the good and true, which in the end gained a great victory over the purely animal in his temperament.

I honestly desired to make myself a good and virtuous man; but I was young, I had passions, and I stood alone, altogether alone, in my search after virtue. Every time I tried to express the longings of my heart for a truly virtuous life, I was met with contempt and derisive laughter, but directly I gave way to the lowest of my passions, I was praised and encouraged. I found ambition, love of power, love of gain, lechery, pride, anger, vengeance, held in high esteem.

We feel about this time, however, that he begins to resemble the ordinary youth who knows nothing of what he did in swathing clothes. There is something intensely human in the following extract, dated May 1, 1848. It might have been written by an undergraduate of Oxford or Cambridge.

Seryozha! I think you are already saying I am a most frivolous fellow. And saying the truth. God knows what I have been up to! I went to St. Petersburg without any reason, there I have done nothing necessary, only spent a heap of money and run up debts. Stupid! Insufferably stupid! You can't believe how it torments me. Above all, the debts, which I must pay, and as quickly as possible, because if I do not soon pay them, I shall besides the money lose my reputation too. Before I get my next year's income, I absolutely require 3500 roubles: 1200 for the Guardians' Council, 1600 to pay my debts, 700 for my current expenses. I know you will exclaim—but what is to be done? Such stupidity is accomplished once in a lifetime. I had to do penance for my freedom (there was no one to thrash me, and this was my chief misfortune), and for philosophy, and so I have paid premium. Be so kind as to arrange to get me out of the false and odious position in which I now am without a penny at my disposal and in debt all round.

His military life is chiefly memorable from the human point of view for his love-affair with a Cossack maiden, Maryanka. It came to nothing, because, in the first place, the girl does not appear to have cared for him, and in the second he could not make up his mind to:

turn Cossack, become a Lukashka, steal herds of horses, fill myself with red wine, troll songs, kill people, and, when drunk, climb through the window to pass the night with her, without asking myself who I am and why I am.

It was during his military experience that the first idea of writing came to him, and all that relates to this part of his development will be found well worthy of reading. Perhaps the most enlightening incident in regard to his character is to be found in his relations with Turgenev. They seem to have been born to criticise one another.

When Turgenev made Tolstoy's acquaintance, he said of him—

"There is not a word, not a movement, which is natural in him. He is constantly posing, and I am at a loss to understand in so intelligent a man this foolish pride in his wretched title of Count!"

"I did not notice it in Tolstoy," said Payanef.

"But there are many things you don't notice," said Turgenev.

After a time Turgenev came to the conclusion that Tolstoy had the ambition to be considered a Don Juan. Count Tolstoy one day related to us certain episodes which had happened to him during the war. When he went away Turgenev said:

"You may boil a Russian officer for three days in strong suds and you won't succeed in getting rid of the braggadocio of a Junker; you may cover him with a thick veneer of education, still his brutality will shine through."

And Turgenev began to criticise every sentence of Tolstoy's, the tone of his voice, the expression of his face, and finally said—

"And only to think that at the bottom of all this brutality lies merely the desire to get promoted."

The serious quarrel between them is thus described:

In the morning at the usual time [says Fet], i.e. about eight o'clock, our visitors came down to the dining-room, in which my wife was sitting at the samovar at one end of the table and I at the other, waiting for my coffee, Turgenev at the right and Tolstoy at the left of the hostess.

Being aware of the importance which Turgenev attached to his daughter's education, my wife inquired whether he was pleased with his English governess.

Turgenev showered praises on the governess, and among other things related that the governess, with truly English practicality, asked Turgenev to fix a sum of money which his daughter could use for charitable purposes. "Now," said Turgenev, "the governess requests my daughter to take the old clothes of the poor and, after mending them herself, to return them to the owners."

"And do you consider this right?" asked Tolstoy.

"Of course I do; it brings the charitable person nearer to real want."

"And I think that a richly dressed girl who manipulates dirty, ill-smelling rags is acting a false and theatrical farce."

"I beg you not to say this," exclaimed Turgenev, his nostrils dilating.

"Why should not I say what I am convinced of?" answered Tolstoy.

Turgenev said: "Then you think that I do not bring up my daughter properly?"

Tolstoy's answer to this was that he thought what he said, and without venturing upon personalities, expressed his thoughts.

Fet had no time to cry out to Turgenev to desist when, pale with wrath the latter said: "If you persist in speaking in this way, I will box your ears." With these words he left the table, and, catching hold of his head in great excitement, stepped into the next room. He came back a second after and said, turning to Fet's wife: "For God's sake forgive my hasty action, which I deeply repent."

He then left the room again. After this the visitors took their leave.

At the first halting-place from Novosyolky, the property of P. N. Borisof, Tolstoy sent a letter to Turgenev with a demand for satisfaction. Then he went on further to Boguslav, the halting-place half-way between Fet's estate and his own estate, Nicolskoye. He sent for pistols and bullets to Nicolskoye, and, without waiting for an answer to his first letter, sent a second one with a challenge.

The quarrel developed into something that very nearly approached farce. With all these eccentricities, we see amid all these events of childhood the Tolstoy of later days in the making. He was not one of those who seem to be born without original sin, but, as a matter of fact, had rather more than an average proportion of the old Adam in his composition. It would be premature to pass any final judgment on the biography, as only the first volume is before us. When the work is completed, we hope to make a more thorough survey of the life of one of the most eminent and illustrious men of our time.

WHAT IS LIFE?

The Origin of Life. By JOHN BUTLER BURKE. (Chapman & Hall, 16s. net.)

THERE be some who would have us believe that the mystery of Life is solved: and we have been assured of this more than once of late years. Naturally, such proclamations have excited the profoundest interest. But when those most concerned have forgathered to hear the rendering of the riddle, naught but empty words have rewarded them for the journey. They have been told either that our system of dividing the world into living and not-living was a mistake—that everything is alive; or that the gulf between the organic and the inorganic has been bridged, now by the chemist, and now by the physicist. But the wizard has not yet risen who has succeeded in demonstrating this feat.

Some assure us that "Life" is a something apart from matter, but which manifests itself through matter, and that the biologist's conception of Life is consequently too narrow. Whatever exhibits change, disintegration or accretion, is alive. But this is undoubtedly an unwarrantable use of the term "Life," which must be reserved for that manifestation of matter which, made up of a subtle compound of the elements carbon, hydrogen, oxygen and nitrogen, is enabled to maintain its equilibrium either by abstracting these elements from its immediate environment or by the disintegration of other bodies which have already synthesised these mysterious life-compounds. Living matter defies analysis while it is alive, and, so far, after it has ceased to live it has defied synthesis. Nor is there much hope that we shall ever alter this state of things. We can take life, but we cannot make it.

The latest of these attempts to explain away the mystery of life is that of Mr. Butler Burke, an event which was announced with a tremendous flourish of trumpets in the Daily Press of some twelve months ago. Ill-informed enthusiasts ecstatically assured us that the greatest of all mysteries had now indeed been laid bare, and this by the aid of radium and a little beef-tea! Brought into proper conjunction there resulted small bodies to which the name "radiobes" was given. These radiobes, we have since been assured, are distinguishable from any form of recognised life hitherto known—as might be expected—but (and this was a pity) they were found incapable of survival. This fact, however, was considered to be the crowning glory of the discovery, for in their disintegration these bodies showed signs, it was contended, so closely suggestive of death, that on this score alone it was held it could scarcely be questioned that they had lived. But what Mr. Burke really has done we have now an opportunity of studying in the book which he has just published.

Those, however, who will follow him through his pages will find the way very wearisome, the more so because travelled with a guide who halts by the way, now to contradict himself, and now to demonstrate that biology is decidedly not his forte. As if to clear the ground, he tells us that he uses the word Life . . . in a sense which, if not necessarily a new one, is at least an extension, and perhaps a considerable extension, of that in which it is already employed. It is used in such a manner as to include within its scope many phenomena hitherto regarded as belonging to the lifeless world. . . .

And he then continues:

Life might be described as a specialised mode of motion, the specialised mode of motion being that of a complex system of molecules in a dynamically unstable state.

Turning now to his "radiobes," he asks:

Are we, or are we not entitled to regard the . . . radium salt on the one hand and the sterilised bouillon on the other, as living or containing the elements of vitality? We should reply the radium yes, but the bouillon no . . . Radium, therefore, may be regarded as the seed, if we may put it so, which grows in the soil. The constituents of protoplasm are in the bouillon, but the vital flux is in the radium.

A most extraordinary conclusion surely, but quite in accord with his notion that Life-stuff or bioplasm, as distinct from protoplasm, is inorganic and contains the germ and mode of motion of vitality. It is not a seed that grows in every soil, but only flourishes in the chosen environment of beef-jelly.

Naturally, the reader supposes that this is, at any rate, to lead up to the solution of the problem which forms the title of this book. Such hopes are, however, rudely shattered, for we are told, a few lines further on, that "the origin of life itself remains unsolved." "Radiobes," then, cannot be counted on to help in this matter. As was to be expected, they throw no more light on the question of spontaneous generation. But this, too, Mr. Burke realises. Thus he says: "We do not claim to have produced spontaneous generation"; "We cannot claim that in all our observations there is the slightest evidence of anything which is the same as natural life." And Mr. Burke leads us on through just one fourth of his book before he suddenly stops and imparts this information; he leads us a day's journey into the wilderness under the pretence of solving the gravest of riddles, and then tells us that really all he has to talk of is "artificial life"! To tickle us with conundrums such as:

If an investigator . . . set out to manufacture a man, but only managed to produce a donkey; what inference would it be possible to draw from such an achievement?

It is claimed for these "radiobes" that they have "artificial life."

They are not bacteria, not more bacteria than donkeys are men; but, as we have endeavoured to emphasise, they possess most of the qualities which are observed in bacteria; and then, as if disconcerted at having made such an astonishing statement, he proceeds to qualify it:

at least enough of them to enable us to identify, or rather to classify, them with the living things we see.

But it is a strange classification which would include things living and things not living in the same system, and Mr. Burke has just assured us that these "radiobes" have only "artificial life"—whatever that may be.

These "radiobes" are produced by placing radium in contact with bouillon. After a few days, microscopic bodies appear containing a central differentiated area described by Mr. Burke as a nucleus; later still they "begin to segregate and multiply." That these phenomena are interesting there can be no doubt, but they are not more so than the soap films of Bütschli, for example,—which "crawled"! Nor are they more instructive than the experiments of other workers in this field of biological mechanics, which have been made during the last few years. But it is a mere waste of time to discuss these "radiobes" further with regard to their relation to living matter. The author himself admits they have nothing to do with living bodies. Even if they had, we should be no nearer the question of the origin of life, for the bodies he describes arose out of a matrix of organic matter, i.e., matter elaborated by living bodies. Yet another objection, as has been pointed out by an earlier critic, is that radium salts are very poisonous, and therefore inimical to living bodies. Further, Mr. Burke's experiments, if they prove anything, prove too much, inasmuch as he himself contends that the simplest forms of life are non-nucleated, while the conspicuous feature of his radiobes is that they are nucleated! We are, indeed, no nearer the solution of the problem of the origin of life than before this book was written.

W. P. PYCRAFT.

THE CLOSED DOOR

AMID the crowd, I pace apart
 The way that I was wont to go
 Ere yet the years had taught my heart
 The things youth cannot know:
 I, ghost-like, here my footprints see
 On stones that have forgotten me.

Here, where I came each day at morn,
 And whence at night I homeward went,
 The best of all my hopes were born,
 And here their gold was spent:
 The street is filled with dreams of mine
 As some old flask with mellowing wine.

I found the world in this grey street,
 Nor yearned to roam with wearying feet
 In search of all that life can give
 And die still seeking how to live;
 For all that life can give I found
 Within the City's narrower round.

I have not won the goal I sought;
 Poor I shall live, and poor shall die;
 But I am rich in joys unbought:
 In love that none can buy,
 In larger sight, that sees no loss
 In losing childish gauds and dross.

And passing the familiar door,
 Could I go in, and thus once more Return into my past, and be Still as when last it closed on me—
 My losses so the years requite
 I would not enter if I might.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

HENRIK IBSEN

THE death of Ibsen, which took place at his home in Christiania on Wednesday last, came as a surprise to no one, for he may be said to have been dying for five years. It can hardly be called a loss, except, of course, to his personal friends. His work was done. He had attained an eminence all over Europe which no dramatist of his own or any age, except Shakespeare, had ever reached; and not even Shakespeare ever roused so much talk, thought, high feeling, actual animosity as Henrik Ibsen. And the eminence he won for himself is as nothing compared with the influence he exerted. He not only brought back the theatre into the number of intellectual forces; he set people thinking, questioning, searching for the truth in all countries.

Henrik Ibsen was born at Skien in Norway in 1828. His father, it appears, had means when the boy was born, but lost them when his son was about eight years old. Henrik became shop-boy to a druggist, a more galling position to him, we may imagine, than that of errand-boy was to Charles Dickens, who had never known anything better. His struggle with poverty, cold and hunger was long and fierce; but with characteristic doggedness the boy was educating himself all the time, reading, writing, and discussing constantly. He decided to be a doctor, and by dint of unremitting work succeeded in entering the University of Christiania in 1848 at the age of twenty. It was during this time then that he read Sallust, an unimportant event, one would imagine; in reality an event of the utmost importance to himself and no slight importance to Europe. The reading of Sallust awoke in him the dramatic instinct, and he gave the remainder of his life, almost exclusively, to the cultivation and expression of that instinct. There are very few external facts to chronicle about his life. In 1851 he became manager of the theatre at Bergen, leaving it for the theatre at Christiania in 1857. After 1864 he lived for many years abroad, in Rome and other parts of Italy, settling at last in 1874 in Munich. Finally, however, he returned to his own country in spite of all the fault which he had found with her sluggishness, her narrowness, her want of true patriotism and of intellectual vigour, and in his own country he died.

His first play was Catilina, a tragedy of Roman history. He wrote it when very young, in a little provincial town where he was studying the apothecary's business. There is little of the Ibsen we know in Catilina. There is even less, to our thinking, in that extraordinary play, Lady Inger of Oestraat, which the Stage Society gave us an opportunity of seeing some weeks ago—a strange medley of all the "properties" and stock-components of tragedy, with no small amount of plain speaking about the patriotism of the Norwegians even in the distant days with which the play deals. He was trying his 'prentice hand, learning his business. And how well he learned it was proved later by his consummate mastery of stage-craft. Completely daring and unconventional in his choice of subject and idea, Ibsen knew through and through the laws and needs of the playwright's art; and many of the concoctors of unidea'd and stagey plays would give much to be able to manipulate their characters and scenes as did the innovator of whom at one time it was not uncommonly said that he was not a playwright at all. This process of mastering the technique of his art partly preceded and partly went hand in hand with the development of the ideas of life and man which startled, shocked and even infuriated the world when the present generation was in its infancy. It is difficult nowadays to realise that these plays, the real Ibsen plays, were dubbed immoral, subversive, all sorts of hard names; while the old phrase "Ibscene" was intended partly to hint a charge which was too unfair to be expressed in plain language. Ibsen was a Radical at heart; a man of the keenest observation, the imagination of a poet, which showed him the truth in its fulness, and a fixed resolve to see and tell the truth and nothing else. He was a man of a keen, if bitter, wit and unflinching honesty: the combination of the two was quite enough to implant in him that desire to épater le bourgeois, to shock the comfortable middle-class man, which he carried out so courageously and thoroughly. This is not the occasion to examine whether or no there is any constructive philosophy in the plays. The writings and translations of Mr. William Archer and his brother are the safest guides for all who would study the subject. Ibsen is not a prophet who says smooth things. No convention, however firmly settled, no pretence, however wide-spread and comfortable, is safe from him. He thinks for himself, and he says what he thinks—not as a preacher or a lecturer but as a playwright, a master of character, a poet, a man of imagination.

His value, when all is said, lies not altogether in the actual criticisms he passed on the life of our own times, which may or may not be superseded as society changes and develops: his greatest achievement was this; that by means of the theatre, a neglected and despised instrument of education, he made people think. He knew the force of the theatre, knew that a scene or an idea conveyed by actual representation has ten times the force of one conveyed by black ink on white paper, and will reach, moreover, scores of people on whom books have little or no influence. To him we owe very largely the partial supersession on the stage of meaningless, thoughtless drama, in which old types and sentimentalities and incidents were repeated ad nauseam, by plays that present an idea, that set you thinking, that raise before your eyes in quite a new light your own circumstances and difficulties. It is too early yet to judge of Ibsen's influence; he has few imitators, he has left no school. Only in the general broadening of the outlook, the inculcation of ideas, the fearless pursuit and representation of truth, is it possible for us to-day to trace the effect of the works of one of the most remarkable men in all the history of literature.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

DEFOE AS SOCIOLOGICAL NOVELIST

WHEN a man nearly sixty years of age, who has been engaged for a quarter of a century in journalism and pamphleteering, eulogising or abusing the views of different parties on political, religious, and social questions, takes to writing novels, it is only to be expected that he will have something to say about these questions in his stories. What was Defoe's particular aim in the kind of fiction he invented? In the case of such a man as he was, always ready to turn his hand to anything lucrative, the business element counted for much. Having struck out a profitable line, he was sure to follow it up, without being influenced by purely literary motives. Now, Defoe was an extraordinary collector of facts. The versatility, minuteness, and accuracy of his information on the most out-of-the-way subjects have been the marvel even of the modern geographer, whose special department of knowledge, it might be thought, was hopelessly barred to a man of Defoe's period. As an observer, Zola himself, with his arsenal of note-books, did not surpass this omniscient registrar of facts. And, on the other hand, for a romance writer Defoe was strangely lacking in invention. As soon as he began to produce fiction, he found that he had hit a huge section of the public which wanted facts, wanted to be told about the world it lived in, both its own part of it and the bigger world outside, which was still a region of romantic possibilities. Finding there was money in the store of facts he had collected, he began to pour them out in the copious stream of his novels.

In this way Defoe, without troubling to think out a theory or issue any manifesto, became the first naturalist in modern literature. That this is his position is made clear by comparing his stories with the different kinds of fiction that had amused the popular reader in the age just gone by. There were the writers of sheer romance, who descended from the metrical romancers of the Middle Ages, but had passed through the Renaissance influences that produced the "Arcadia"; and there were the biographers of popular heroes, who got their material from a similar source—the old English ballads. Other popular novels were the sentimental idylls of Lodge and Greene, and the Spanish picaresque novels. In all these the story, as a series of romantic or dramatic incidents more or less artistically arranged, was the dominating factor: with Defoe it was nothing of the kind. In Defoe there is never any plot. His men and women are carefully limned: the story takes care of itself. Though he is one of the finest raconteurs in the language, his stories lack constructive art; in truth, that was a thing they did not require.

If he had any end in view, it was to give, not merely a faithful portrayal of certain phases of contemporary life, but a minute study of the conditions that act upon human character and make it what it is. As a business man, he gave to his public interesting portraits of existing types, and descriptions of things seen: as a born artist, he gave the inner meaning of the picture. His novels are, in effect if not in intention, chapters in the natural history of the race. Caring nothing for romantic or comic, dramatic or melodramatic effects, he chose the simplest method of telling his story. He took a perfectly ordinary and representative character, a Moll Flanders, a Roxana or a Colonel Jack—people who had no charms of personality—and related their stories with the utmost directness, in the natural form of biography. There was a resemblance here to the plan of the picaresque novel, inasmuch as events there, too, followed each other with the fortuitous consecutiveness of life; but there the incidents were always carefully selected, to convey a desired impression; in Defoe we get the typical life of a typical person. That is all the difference!

Obviously, with such a ground plan, and with a mind profoundly interested in social problems, he was bound to give a criticism of things as they were. Such a criticism is latent in all his stories, and finds from time to time overt expression in his own comments or the words of his characters. He observes in "Colonel Jack":

It is evident . . . that the history of men's lives may be many ways useful and instructing to those who read them, if moral and religious improvement and reflections are made by those who write them.

He might well have said that the history of men's lives might be useful and instructive to those who govern and legislate, for nearly every story he wrote was a powerful indictment of our penal laws, our treatment of the poor and the criminal classes, of the social system in general.

In the four novels that stand by themselves as, in this sense, criticisms of the existing dispensation—"Captain Singleton," "Moll Flanders," "Roxana," and "Colonel Jack"—the subject of the biography is in every case a victim of social injustice. Singleton was stolen as a child, and sold to the gypsies; his foster-mother was hanged, and he was thrown helpless upon the world. He goes to sea, becomes in the natural course of events a thief; and being mixed up, through no fault of his, in a mutiny, turns pirate. "Colonel" Jack is a London waif, without father or mother, or even a surname. He runs wild about the City, herds with thieves and is himself an expert thief long before he learns that thieving is not an honest trade. In the struggle for life, these characters simply follow the path of least resistance. The picture of submerged London in those days, and the further account of the criminal classes in "Moll Flanders," make even our modern tales of mean streets sound almost Arcadian. Moll Flanders was the child of a woman who was sent to the plantations for a felony. Ignorance and helplessness are the cause of her moral downfall. After many vicissitudes, she is attracted mysteriously, and married, to a man from Virginia, who takes her across the Atlantic. To her horror, she discovers that he is the son of her transported mother, whom she had never seen or heard of since she was a babe. Fleeing home to England, she falls lower and lower, is victimised by a fortune-hunter, and at length, in utter destitution, takes to stealing as the only means of livelihood remaining, is caught and sentenced to be hanged, but in the event transported.

In his account of Newgate, the social reformer speaks out plainly:

My mother-in-law ran out in a long account of the wicked practices in that dreadful place; and "child," says my mother, "perhaps you may know little of it, or it may be have heard nothing about it; but depend upon it," says she, "we all know here that there are more thieves and rogues made by that one prison of Newgate, than by all the clubs and societies of villains in the nation; 'tis that cursed place," says my mother, "that half peoples this colony" [i.e., Virginia].

It is proclaimed on the title-page of "Moll Flanders," that she was married five times; and both in that novel and the others, the facility with which marriages were made and broken is a fertile source of immorality and subsequent disaster. Here, again, Defoe was probing a social sore, an evil that was not remedied until 1753, when the Hardwicke Act, in the face of unpardonable opposition, at last put a stop to "Newgate marriages" and the similar unions, lightly made and lightly unmade, of which they were the type.

Roxana was born in comfortable circumstances and came to grief through the folly of an extravagant husband, who was, as a matter of course, absolute master of her fortune. He absconds, and leaves her penniless, with five children, for whom she finds provision by a trick that, in the circumstances, may be winked at. Not so her ensuing conduct. Inexorable circumstance may be held responsible for her first lapse from virtue, but it was her insatiable covetousness and the vicious twist in her nature that made her fall a constant prey to the temptations offered by the general corruption of morals. In this novel, Defoe canvasses the question of the subjection of women. The motive that caused many of Roxana's lapses, and those the turning-points in her life, is her passionate rebellion against the doctrine that a wife is her husband's chattel. This independence of spirit was fostered and inflamed by the issue of her first marriage, in which, at any rate, she was the person sinned against.]

[I told him [says Roxana] I had perhaps different notions of matrimony from what the received custom had given us of it; that I thought a woman was a free agent, as well as a man, and was born free; and could she manage herself suitably, might enjoy that liberty to as much purpose as the men do; that the laws of matrimony were indeed otherwise, and mankind at this time acted quite upon other principles, and those such that a woman gave herself entirely away from herself in marriage, and capitulated only to be, at best, but an upper servant; and from the time she took the man, she was no better or worse than the servant among the Israelites, who had his ears bored, that is nailed to the door-post, who by that act gave himself up to be a servant during life. That the very nature of the marriage contract was, in short, nothing but giving up liberty, estate, authority, and everything to the man, and the woman was indeed a mere woman ever after, that is to say, a slave.]

Ay, said I, that is the thing I complain of. The pretence of affection takes from a woman everything that can be called herself; she is to have no interest, no aim, no view; but all is the interest, aim and view of the husband; she is to be the passive creature you spoke of, said I. She is to lead a life of perfect indolence, and living by faith (not in God, but) in her husband, she sinks or swims, as he is either fool or wise man, unhappy or prosperous; and in the middle of what she thinks is her happiness and prosperity, she is engulfed in misery and beggary, which she had not the least notice, knowledge or suspicion of. How often have I seen a woman living in all the splendour that a plentiful fortune ought to allow her! with all her coaches and equipages, her family and rich furniture, her attendants and friends, her visitors and good company, all about her to-day; to-morrow surprised with a disaster, turned out of all by a commission of bankrupt, stripped, to the clothes on her back; her jointure, suppose she had it, is sacrificed to the creditors, so long as her husband lived, and she turned into the street, and left to live on the charity of her friends, if she has any, or follow the monarch, her husband, into the Mint, and live there on the wreck of his fortunes, till he is forced to run away from her even there; and then she sees her children starve, herself miserable, breaks her heart, and cries herself to death! This, says I, is the state of a lady that has had ten thousand pounds to her portion.]

[There is the mark of the sociologist, whilst a more didactic purpose is set forth in the preface to "Moll Flanders":

Her application to a sober life and industrious management at last, in Virginia, with her transported spouse, is a story fruitful of instruction, to all the unfortunate creatures who are obliged to seek their re-establishment abroad, whether by the misery of transportation, or other disaster, letting them know that diligence and application have their due encouragement, even in the remotest part of the world, and that no case can be so low, so despicable, or so empty of prospect, but that an unwearied industry will go a great way to deliver us from it, will in time raise the meanest creature to appear again in the world, and give him a new cast for his life. These are a few of the serious inferences which we are led by the hand to in this book, and these are fully sufficient to justify any man in recommending it to the world, and much more to justify the publication of it.

This particular social lesson of self-help, with many others that he who runs may read, is inculcated in each of Defoe's stories, from "Robinson Crusoe" downwards; and there is no reason to doubt that Defoe, whatever his principal motives in writing, thought that he was doing a useful work for his fellow men in giving them forcible illustrations of such a moral.]

ERNEST A. BAKER.

[Next week's Causerie will be "A New Point in Shakespeare Bibliography," by Alfred W. Pollard.]

FICTION

The Arena. By HAROLD SPENDER. (Constable, 6s.)

THOUGH the main issues of Mr. Harold Spender's novel are concerned rather with the effect of his hero's unremitting parliamentary labours upon his domestic affairs than with his political views themselves, the fact remains that the political arena has incidentally supplied him with an opportunity, which he missed, to redeem a rather crude and sketchy plot by triumphing over a difficult situation. Lord Alfred Markham, a son of the Marquis of Glaisdale, who owns broad lands in the West of England, is one who has heard "the deep sighing of the poor" and devoted himself to the alleviation of their condition. After spending some time in their midst in Kennington, he has been induced to stand for Parliament in the Radical interest. He wins his seat, but, as his influence increases, finds himself on the horns of a dilemma. By voting against the Compulsory Purchase clause of the Land Nationalisation Bill he will seem false to his political creed; by voting for it he will be putting a hand to the financial ruin of a father to whom he is devoted. But in this interesting and critical juncture the author bethinks him of a famous device. Even as of old Greek Goddesses were wont to pluck their heroes, sorely bested, from the perilous fight, so now doth Mr. Spender pluck his Lord Alfred from the deadly arena, summoning him by aid of the swift-winged telegram to the bedside of his aged sire so that no man knew whither that great speech tended. This seems a pity, for, though this earnest young gentleman is not very "convincing," his actions are better worth following than those of his youthful bride who, in spite of the alleged combination in her of "youthful merriment and saintlike seriousness" is surely too trivial and self-centred a character for her important share in the action. We can forgive her for not wanting to live in Kennington, but her jealousy of Miss Motherwell, her weakness for Captain Dunster's "gleaming smile," and her sometimes rather fatuous conversation incline us to dislike her. The political scenes in the House and out of it are the best things in the book, but, if Bill Loder is representative of Leading Labour, the part might afford a possible opening to any one who ever studied the demeanour of those beautiful heroes of the old Adelphi melodrama in their milder moments. By the way, the "timbers" of a modern liner could hardly be heard to "creak" in a storm; "larboard" is, we believe, an obsolete term; and the man who could fail to recognise his wife's figure across the deck in broad daylight must be badly in need of glasses.

The Lady of the Well. By ELEANOR ALEXANDER. (Arnold, 6s.)

THIS is the story of Bernart the troubadour, and his horse Baiart, who lived in Italy at the beginning of the thirteenth century, in the days of Guelf and Ghibelline. It is a pretty story, gracefully written, as such a story should be; but a little nebulous, as is the troubadour himself. The very name of Sordello would seem to shed a cloud of obscurity. But the book conjures up a faint aroma of the past, fragrant as the scent of a verbena leaf crumbling in some secret drawer, and we found that aroma very delicate and pleasant. There is no vivid picture of the past; none, we feel, is attempted. The magic of great names is used to foster the illusion of fancies that are charming, and of conceits of love and ladies that are very pleasant to dwell upon for a little: history makes a fine background for the charm of unreality. Such charm we felt when the troubadour, longing to love, sees a lovely lady's face reflected in the waters of the well into which he is gazing, and obeys the lady's behest not to turn and see her actually. That incident is typical of the book's fancies, which are prettily conceived and prettily told.

Beyond the Rocks. By ELINOR GLYN. (Duckworth, 6s.)

"THE VISITS OF ELIZABETH," apart from its impropriety which was not fully realised by the innocent British public, was full of wit, a book to remember. Since then, Mrs. Glyn has done nothing that counts, and her latest story convinces us that she belongs to the large class of "one-book" writers. Theodora Fitzgerald, a lovely child of good birth, is married up by her needy Irish father to wealthy Mr. Josiah Brown, middle-aged and of the middle class. The tertium quid is Lord Bracondale, a most killing person. Mrs. Glyn has been reading Ouida:

She looked at him. His long, lithe limbs stretched out, every line indicative of breeding and strength. She noted the shape of his head, the perfect grooming, his lazy, insolent grace, his whimsical smile. Englishmen of this class were certainly the most provokingly beautiful creatures in the world.

A girl who regards this beauty as her own property plays a trick with a couple of letters which has the ultimate effect, highly convenient to the lovers, of sending Mr. Brown to the tomb, and so all ends well. This story is set in the midst of scenes from life in "smart" society which should delight the admirers of "Rita" and Miss Marie Corelli, but at which the less unsophisticated will shrug their shoulders. It is true that most people could put real names to some of the characters—to Lady Harrowfield, for instance, the painted, insolent old woman whose "path was strewn with lovers," and who, "report said, still had her lapses"; or to Lady Mildred Verner, whose "puny husband was helped to something in South Africa, when the man in possession was a Jew—or as agent for tea and jam in the Colonies—when he happened to be only a colossally successful Englishman." Nevertheless, Mrs. Glyn's picture of the unscrupulous, sensual, bridge-playing set would give a ludicrously false impression, both of that set and of English society in general, to any reader who was unable to correct it by his own observation. Nor is Mrs. Glyn much happier with more reputable people. The best character in a poor book is quite a minor one, a Colonel Lowerby, commonly called The Crow, the very type of gruff, sententious, honest old mentor who is a source of comfort to charming ladies.

The Grey Domino. By Mrs. PHILIP CHAMPION DE CRESPIGNY. (Nash, 6s.)

Mrs. DE CRESPIGNY has followed pretty closely Mr. Stanley Weyman's invaluable French recipe for the cooking of a historical novel. Take one invincible swordsman of distinguished parentage, great height and broad shoulders (Roland de Pontrevaix, alias the Grey Domino) for the hero, and one noble, beautiful and scornful young lady (Verrine de Chaumont) for the heroine, and throw them both into the pot of Fate at a masked ball. Here let him mistake her for another lady and send her to a ruined barn on an errand of mercy to a fugitive, one St. Ollier, the mildest of villains. Let St. Ollier fly, leaving the heroine to make her escape unaided, only to find the hero waiting outside. Place the heroine, as the result of her escape, against her will, in a convent; let the hero discover her there, and when she fears the veil let him secretly marry her. Separate them at once, and put the hero in Paris. Then gradually bring the heroine to him under the escort of the other suitor for her hand, M. de Sillonais. Let her see her husband acting as jester to the king, a part he has only assumed for political purposes. Bring the hero and heroine together, and add to the ingredients of the pot the indispensable misunderstanding. Again separate the couple, before there has been time to clear, and plunge the hero into a series of mild adventures, much against his will, with another lady. Add jealousy on the part of Verrine; more threats of the convent on the part of her uncle and guardian, who has designs upon her fortune; another flight with de Sillonais: a halt at an inn on de Pontrevaix's territory; a revulsion of feeling on Madame's part towards her husband and the chivalrous departure of de Sillonais. At this point throw in the hero, clear and serve as a historical novel of the time of Henry of Navarre. The result is pleasant reading for an idle hour, but Mrs. de Crespigny can do better things. She has an eye for nature, a pretty invention and a sense of humour, and she avoids melodrama, at times with flat results. But we are not sure of some of her facts. Did any convent of the period breakfast so late as 8.30, or any young lady then living think 7 o'clock an unconscionable hour for rising? We are open to correction, but we have our doubts.

A Young Man from the Country. By Madame ALBANESI. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

WHEN a young man settles down in a country village, devotes himself to three small children and offers no explanation as to whether he is a bachelor, or married and under some domestic cloud, or a widower, he supplies abundant food for uncharitable gossip. This is the chief mystery of Madame Albanesi's new story, which otherwise pursues a more uneventful course than readers are accustomed to look for in this popular author's books. A second mystery that is never solved is, why a thoroughly good fellow, of average sensibility and a high sense of honour, like Sir Francis Heatherington, should obstinately continue to adore Sheila Prentice in the face of many proofs of her unworthiness, those, moreover, of a kind particularly repugnant to the masculine mind. The author's enthusiastic comment upon Sheila's physical perfection does not compensate us for her monotonous unamiability, her sneers and flouts at all who form her little world. That she should satisfy her ambitions by marrying Mr. Icariot is a climax with which readers are not inclined to quarrel, for their boredom through his ill temper will at last be avenged. Patricia, Sheila's merry, winning sister, rebels against their mother's despotic rule in a youthful, harmless fashion that is but surface deep; her heart is never in it. Her impatience is free from the bitterness and hatred that characterise Sheila's attitude towards the dear, old-fashioned Mrs. Prentice, who failed to secure the proper environment for the development of her daughters' social gifts. The situation is possible; in life it might excite some measure of sympathy, but in fiction not even Madame Albanesi's art can make the subject interesting. Once the line between suggestion and discussion is crossed, the ugly side of such antagonisms becomes disagreeably prominent. Though "The Young Man from the Country" is less attractive than some other stories from the same pen, it possesses many of the qualities that made previous books successful. The characters are distinct and firmly drawn, and act consistently according to their kind. Lady Amelia Heatherington, in particular, with no charm of person, or of mind, yet stands out boldly as an example of the author's skill in portraiture. As literature the book is the best that Madame Albanesi has produced; the story is well planned and carefully carried out, and the style is smooth and graceful.

FINE ART

THE ROYAL ACADEMY—II

"A MAN'S hand or head does not last more than twenty-five years," said Landseer, "and therefore the time arrives in one's career when the fewer pictures he sends the better." Without necessarily endorsing the first half of this dogmatic utterance, it may be conceded that the advice given in the second is eminently sound. "Truth never fails, nor Beauty waxes old," runs the motto on this year's Academy catalogue; but not even the immortals of Burlington House have the gift of eternal youth, and increase of years is not always accompanied by increase of artistic power. David Cox, it is true, was an incomparably greater artist at sixty-five than at forty; but the late development of his genius was exceptional, and, as a rule, the middle period of a painter is his best.

Inquiry into the birth-dates of our Academicians may not be deemed impertinent in view of Landseer's opinions. Out of thirty painters who have attained full membership we find at least one is over eighty, eight have passed their seventieth, six their sixtieth birthday; that is to say, fifteen in all—exactly fifty per cent.—have exceeded that age at which they would have had to retire from most civil services. To lay too much stress on these figures might be unwise, for two of the seniors among the fifteen,

Mr. Sant and Mr. Orchardson, are assuredly not the least successful of this year's exhibitors. But apart from its influence on his own work, the longevity of an Academician is no unmixed blessing to the institution to which he belongs. Since its numbers are severely limited, the strength of the Academy can only be recruited, short of death, by the retirement of the older members. Why these should be so unwilling to retire it is difficult to guess. A retired Academician or Associate is not debarred from showing his work at Burlington House, and nobody would think less of the exhibits, say, of Messrs. Davis, Hook, Leader, Leslie, Sant and Marcus Stone did they follow the commendable precedent set by the late G. F. Watts and Mr. Frith. Sir George Reid—whose Bishop of Salisbury, by the way, is one of the best portraits of men to be seen in the Academy—was a much younger man than Sir E. J. Poynter is now when he gracefully resigned the presidency of the Scottish Academy in favour of Sir James Guthrie. And it is no unkindly comment on Sir George's own presidency to say that his self-effacing action and example have resulted in augmenting the artistic strength and prestige of the northern institution.

Retirement, it is well to remember, does not deprive an Academician of any titular distinction or of the right to exhibit. But it does restrain him from having a voice in the decision as to who shall be elected Academician or Associate, what works shall be admitted to the summer exhibition, and possibly what works shall be purchased under the terms of the Chantrey Bequest. These are matters which might better be left to the decision of men under than over sixty. There are painters—Camille Pissarro was one, the late Mr. Brabazon another—who remain students to the end of their days, who are always to be found in the dernier bateau. But these are rareties, and the average elderly Academician is neither in touch nor in sympathy with the younger generation of artists. He is as distrustful of new ideas as of new methods, and with difficulty becomes reconciled to either in a third of a century. And by that time his vitality has ebbed, so that in Academy exhibitions and in the Chantrey collection we see the work not of the leaders but of the rag, tag and bobtail of modern movements. As his age advances, the Academician has less reverence for the young, holds with greater conviction that "blood is thicker than water." He has a pathetic faith in the heredity of genius, and will visit on the sons the rewards withheld from the fathers. Mr. C. R. Leslie was an Academician for nearly as many years as his son, Mr. G. D. Leslie, has been, but the fathers of Sir William Richmond and Mr. Marcus Stone remained Associates to the end. At present Mr. Cope is only an Associate also, but, since his father was a full Academician, he need not despair of eventual promotion.

The weakness of the Royal Academy is nowhere more clearly revealed than in the Water-colour Room, the contents whereof are uniformly undistinguished, showing neither acceptance of the new tradition nor maintenance of the old. Profoundly speaking, there is no line of demarcation between the two, for the new has been gradually evolved from the old, and the descent of Brabazon and Melville could be traced through Bonington and Turner to Girtin and De Wint. Between the delicately stained drawings of the last two and the suggestively massed colour-blobs of the first there is, none the less, a divergence of technique sufficiently marked to justify separate classification. Of the living artists in water-colour who lean more towards the older method than the new, the most brilliant exponent is Mr. P. Wilson Steer, and after him Mr. A. W. Rich, the veteran Mr. Callow, and that surprising newcomer, Mr. Neville Lytton. None of these is represented at the Royal Academy. The recent deaths of Mr. Brabazon and Mr. Arthur Melville leave the new tradition momentarily without a chief, but certain of their disciples, Mr. R. Gwelo Goodman, Mr. Arthur Buntington, and others, are admitted to Burlington House, not as aquarellists, but as oil-painters. Messrs. Aumonier, James Paterson, and R. W. Allan, who have achieved success, if not greatness, in water-colour, must also be sought at the Academy among the oils. That brilliant flower-painter, Mr. Francis E. James, and Mr. Henry Tonks are, of course, wholly unrepresented, and we feel their absence from the Water-colour Room as acutely as we feel that of Mr. John from the Black-and-White, of Mr. Orpen from the portraits. Even the talent within the Academic circle is latent this year, for Mr. Lionel P. Smythe does not exhibit, Mr. Brangwyn and Mr. Sargent send only oils.

This section, then, being much more remarkable for what it omits than for what it includes, calls for little further comment. Mr. Charles J. Watson's freshly handled Marché au Blé, Neufchâtel-en-Bray (899), and Mr. Hans Hansen's Interior: Norwegian Café (931)—in which an adroit use is made of the brown paper ground—show a proper sense of the possibilities and limitations of the material. Mr. Walter Bayes and Mr. John D. Walker, neither lacking in ability, are not seen at their best in The Enchanted Wood (945) and Street in Assisi (1041), while Mr. A. H. Hallam Murray, though on the right road as regards his laying on of colour-washes, was sadly in need of a plumb-line when he erected The Rathhaus Doorway, Rothenburg (1018). Here and there may be found a few more drawings which give pleasure: Mr. Arthur Rackham's whimsical The Magic Carpet (995), Mr. A. E. Howarth's Ruins of Christianborg Castle, Denmark, for example; but, generally speaking, the room has a depressing effect, the exhibitors showing neither understanding of nor respect for their medium. The common ambition to make water-colour do the work of oil is glaringly displayed in Mr. Byam Shaw's Maud, Daughter of His Honour Judge Tindal Atkinson (960), a gross performance, which, like Browning's sunflower, loses its true graces for the sake of being "a foolish mimic sun." Even the President is not guiltless in this respect, for his Belinda (882) is treated in so oily a manner that it suggests nothing so much as a diluted Alfred Stevens.

The empty quadrangle of Burlington House hints alike at our sculptors' lack of enterprise and our public neglect of their art. It must be close on five centuries now since the nation perceived any relation between the arts of sculpture and architecture. In sacrilegious France the antiquated fashion of decorating edifices with graven images still prevails, but in this more righteous land the third commandment is less wantonly broken, and the British sculptor finds his scanty employment in making busts of the living or erecting monuments to the dead. Perhaps it is this pre-occupation with the graveyard which exhausts the vitality of his attempted renderings of life, and but for his residence in a foreign clime even Mr. Alfred Gilbert might be unable to endow his bust of Francis Petrus Paulus, Pictor (1737), with the divine spark. Certainly beside this tempestuous head and heaving breast all other busts seem tame and dead. Mr. Frampton's "posthumous bust" of G. F. Watts, R.A. (1671), is able enough superficially, but shows us no living personality, only an expressionless death-mask, uninspired and uninspiring. Mr. Colton's carefully chiselled Maharajahs (1659, 1765) are able, too, in workmanship, but they are scarcely more satisfying, if less commonplace, than Mr. Thornycroft's Dr. Mandell Creighton (1654) or Mr. Brock's Thomas Gainsborough (1795). A certain dignity of line cannot be denied to Sir W. B. Richmond's recumbent Memorial to Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone (1793). But it shows little originality of invention save in the figure of an angel at the head, whose curving, outspread wings are incongruously suggestive of a baby's cradle. Mr. Swan's group of Polar Bears (1798), in silver and crystal on a lapis-lazuli base, is a pretty toy for a drawing-room, scarcely more.

Fortunately for its own exhibitions, the Academy is less neglectful of talented outsiders in sculpture than in painting. Mr. Derwent Wood, Mr. Gilbert Bayes, Professor Lanteri, Mr. Basil Gotto, Mr. John Tweed—with a medallion of Rodin—and Mr. Bertram Mackennal are all efficiently represented, and their contributions raise the standard of this section. The bronze group Madonna and the Child Christ (1792) of the last deserves high praise, for it is beautiful in its expressive modelling and simple, natural pose. Entirely modern in conception and treatment, Mr. Mackennal's group is an expression of the spirit of his age, and not a dateless echo of the antique, like Sir C. B. Lawes-Wittewronge's Death of Dirce (1639), to which no Greek quotation in the catalogue can give Hellenic grace and symmetry.

PHOTOGRAPHY IN COLOURS

So often has the cry of "Wolf" been raised at the supposed advent of photography in colours, that we are disposed to regard lightly the announcement that it has really come at last. Yet, although to those who had dreamt of a simple operation producing the enchanting result seen upon the focusing-screen under the photographer's pall, the combination of three carbon films may seem a backstairs way of arrival, we cannot but regard the present method as truly scientific and theoretically sound. A studio, and reception rooms handsomely appointed, have been opened at the corner of Old Bond Street and Piccadilly, where it is claimed that sitters may obtain photographs of themselves in natural colours. Thus the thing receives publicity as a fact accomplished; and wealthy lovers of novelty will, no doubt, offer a wide patronage. The specimens that adorn the walls are of great interest, particularly those that are reproductions of paintings. In the portraits and other records from "life," we admit the fascination of the colour; but demur a little to the term "natural" in its strictest sense.

The modus operandi is as follows: A camera is employed which admits of three rapid exposures made in turn through blue, green and red "filters." These filters, cutting off certain colour rays from the subject photographed, give respectively a record of the yellow, pink and blue rays of the subject. From negatives of these records, prints are made upon thin films of pigment in gelatine. The pigment is, of course, as near to the tint of the original colour rays as can be obtained, and the result is three transparent pictures of all that is yellow or pink or blue in the original. Superimposed, they give the complete result. The precise hue of these films is the crux of the matter. The theory seems sound enough. But the whole thing is in babyhood. Its growth and development will be watched with interest by both artistic and scientific circles.

MUSIC

THE CONCERT SEASON

THE concert season rages, which means that, besides the few notable concerts which everybody knows about and everybody who is anybody (in the world of music) goes to, at all the smaller London concert-halls, afternoon and evening, there is a seemingly endless succession of private concerts given. Fiddlers are busy with their Max Bruch and Wieniawski Concertos; pianists thunder forth their Liszt or melt to tears over Chopin; singers charm their hearers with, at best, Schubert, at worst—perhaps it is better not to say what is a singer's worst. Any one whose lot it is to rush hither and thither to these concerts must be struck by two things, the quantity of talent of a high level, which is, so to speak, current at the present time, and, secondly, a feeling that in it all there is a certain misdirection of energy. Take for instance the fiddlers, who at present seem to be more plentiful than the pianists; a fine technical equipment must of course be taken for granted—nowadays no less is tolerated upon the concert platform—but of individuality, of free and unconventional artistic thought, there seems to be a dearth. I have mentioned Max Bruch as typical of the violinist's programme; I might go further and say that he is typical of the violinist's aim. His Concerto in G Minor may be fairly analysed into brilliant passages, of which the best that can be said is that they exactly suit the genius of the instrument, and certain others of a wandering and vague emotion, which appear to mean something very serious to both composer and performer, though what, the hearer has some difficulty in finding out. This is true of the Vorspiel and the Adagio. The fine rhythm of the last movement, akin to the last movement of the great concerto by Brahms, awakens the work into life and definiteness, but it comes too late to save the concerto as a whole. Yet probably there are few works which have been so often heard in London during the past few weeks. Its popularity with performers must surely argue some lack of musical insight, a certain carelessness as to what they talk about so long as they do talk. It is not to be classed with the gimcrack parlour-tricks of the Wieniawski school; the reason why they are played is not difficult to guess, but this purports to be serious music and is both serious and dull. So, when it appears constantly side by side with the really great things of violin literature, the suspicious critic begins to doubt whether it is wholly a perception of the greatness of the Bach Chaconne and the Beethoven Romance in G which accounts for their frequent appearance, or whether all are not dictated by the same fashion which decrees that we shall be over-fed with music for two months in the year while we are left to perish with hunger during the remainder. Certain it is that mere thoughtless convention dictates at least two-thirds of the concert programmes and accounts for the fact that, in spite of the narrow range of works performed, a large proportion of current concert music might never be heard again without any appreciable loss to the art.

We constantly need a corrective to taste, to be made to listen to the simple grace of primitive melodies, the pure beauty of fundamental harmonies stripped of the complex adornment which the best of modern music uses, if we are to keep our faculties unimpaired in this respect. Something of this kind is the particular usefulness of concerts such as that given by the Folksong Quartet at Æolian Hall not long since. They are a quartet of excellent singers, whose special business it is to sing four-part arrangements of old folk-tunes, and very delightful and refreshing they are to hear. When a concert begins with such old tunes as "Early one Morning" and "The Meeting of the Waters," sung unaccompanied, with freedom of rhythm and complete unanimity of expression, we are at once taken out of the stuffy concert-room atmosphere and transported into fresh air with the scent of spring in it. Tune followed upon tune; in fact, it was a whole concert of tunes. Most interesting, in the sense of being furthest from our ken, was a set of Russian tunes cleverly arranged by Mr. Percy Godfrey, but the two German, "Vergebens," and "Trutze nicht," arranged by Max Reger, and the well-known Scotch, Welsh and English tunes which ended the programme, were not less fresh and spontaneous. Perhaps the best thing that can be said about Dr. Walford Davies's "Eight Nursery Rhymes," the only vocal music included in the programme that had not its origin in folk-song, is that each little number, full of fun and grace as it is, has something of the childlike character which all the old tunes possess. "Willie Winkie," "Thomas and Annis" and "The White Paternoster" might be the original tunes to the old words, so closely do they fit, while "The Hunting of the Snail" and "If all the Seas were one Sea" only betray their modern origin by being too graphic for old-time music. In Mr. Percy Godfrey's "Humoresken" for wind instruments and piano there are a good many passages of the dull made-music, at which I began by grumbling. But in the last number, called "Burletta," there is a dainty rhythm, broken by little bravura passages for the flute, which has genuine charm. Still, it must be confessed that his work did not so well stand the severe test of close proximity to the folk-tunes.

Listening to such a concert as this, we feel that folk-song might do for modern audiences some such work as it has done for composers in the past. When the limbs of the sonata were fully formed, folk-song in the works of Haydn stepped in to infuse it with living beauty and to differentiate once for all between the purely formal constructions of the theorists and the real art of music. Brought into the modern concert room, it can do something as a healthy corrective to the taste of the listener, clamorously assailed on all sides by unworthy claimants. Only good music can really last, so only the best of the old tunes have come down to us. Judged by their standard, that which is merely ostentatious in modern music will soon betray itself, while what has been added by the real progress of the art remains. But apart from this point of view the Folk-song Quartet is to be valued as a set of singers who have left the beaten track to find their own métier and to follow it consistently. In this they are by no means alone, but so many who give concerts of the conventional type have evidently not yet begun to seek for what they individually can do best, that it is worth while to point out those who have.

Amongst instances of concerts stamped by the individuality of the concert-giver must be named the series of violoncello recitals now being given by Mr. Boris Hambourg. These "historical" recitals are designed to cover the whole range of literature for the violoncello, and are therefore instructive as well as musically fine performances. Historical concerts, however, have too often been the refuge for the incompetent, and it is rather in spite of the history than because of it that I cite these as notable performances. To make a list would be only to do injustice to some by omission; it is easier to say that those who strike out a line of their own are comparatively few in number. Let singers give up singing songs because others have made a success with them, and let fiddlers look a little deeper into the rich stores of literature which belong to them, before they make up their programmes, and their concerts would attain the added interest of personal expression.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MR. HEINEMANN announces a new edition of the Works of Henrik Ibsen, edited and chiefly translated by Mr. William Archer. As Mr. Heinemann holds the copyright of all Ibsen's plays, this will be the only complete edition that has so far been issued. The first volume will be ready early in June, and the series will be completed in monthly issues—eleven volumes in all.

Messrs. Methuen will publish shortly, in their series of Antiquary's Books a volume on "Seals," by J. Harvey Bloom. This manual traces the evolution of the seal in England in a series of sections. The principal of these deal with seals of the sovereign and those of royal courts; the seals of archbishops; courts ecclesiastical; those of the peers of the realm, and ladies of rank; seals of the bishops and clergy; those of county families, knights, and squires. The second main division covers seals of corporations, monastic houses, Universities, trading guilds, etc.—Messrs. Methuen have also in the press a new edition of Viscount St. Cyres's "Fénelon" in the Oxford Biographies and the first volume of Ben Jonson's works in the Standard Library.

Mr. John Lane announces the early publication of an English translation of Sienkiewicz's new novel, "The Field of Glory."

We understand that Messrs. Thomas Nelson and Sons will issue during the present month the complete works of Shakespeare in their New Century Library, India Paper Series.

On May 26, Mr. J. W. Arrowsmith will publish a new book by "Q" entitled "From a Cornish Window." It contains a series of essays, criticisms and poems, a large portion of which have never before been published.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash will publish next week a book by Mr. Lionel Decle, called "The New Russia." Mr. Decle is a distinguished traveller; he undertook one of the most remarkable journeys in South Africa ever successfully carried through, an account of which he published in his well-known volume "Three Years in Savage Africa." He was the first traveller to cross Africa from the Cape to the Nile, and also from the Cape to Cairo. The present volume is the result of a journey to Russia in the early part of this year, and presents a different point of view from that to which most Englishmen are accustomed.

On May 28 Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish Luigi Villari's new book, "Fire and Sword in the Caucasus." Mr. Villari spent many months in visiting every important political centre in the Caucasus and inquiring into the general conditions of the country; and the book gives a striking picture of the great Russian Colony during what is perhaps the most critical period of its history.—Mr. Unwin is also publishing a new edition of Major Martin Hume's "Modern Spain."

Mr. Elkin Mathews has a third edition of the late Dr. Richard Garnett's "De Flagello Myrteo" in the press, the second edition being already exhausted.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE WORD "ADOBE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not think this is derived from Latin, as Mr. Hall suggests. Dozy with far greater probability takes it from the Arabic name for a brick, tob, with the prefixed article at-tob, hence adobe, which like so many other Spanish words is a relic of the Moorish rule in Spain. The Arabic article is properly al, but is regularly assimilated to a following dental consonant, hence we find in English and other European languages such loan-words as adobe, assegat, atabal, athanor, azimuth, where the initial syllables ad, as, at, ath, az, all represent the definite article.

JAMES PLATT, JUN.

May 19.

THE WORD "BADGER"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Our great authorities are at issue hereon; Dr. Murray traces "badger" an ensign, to its extension the Badger—which seems like "the cart before the horse"; Professor Skeat boldly proclaims the origin of both words "unknown." The whole subject may be dealt with under three heads, viz., (1) The dealer; (2) the animal; (3) the badge or sign.

(1) is due directly to the Latin aufero, to deprive, plunder, rob; so the late Latin "bladum" put for ablutum minus the initial "a"; and bladarius a corn-merchant; this is held to have produced "bladger" the primitive form of badger. The corn-badger was a regrater or buckster, one who bought in bulk and retailed at famine prices; thus Fr. blereau, blaireau or corn-thief; and we have the dialectical "bladier" (old law term) "an ingrosser of corn and grain;" and bladarius, law-latin, a corn chandler or mealman. This seems to authenticate the lost "l" in bladger.

(2) The animal is properly the "brock," and called Celtic; taking from Jamieson, as used by Burns, we have, Irish breach speckled, Gaelic broc, a badger, brocach, greyish like a Badger; Welsh brych, a freckle; Scottish broched, mixture of black and white; a brookit cow has black streaks, mingled with white in the face. Here is the blaze or white mark, that counts as a supposed "badge," found in the badger's head.

(3) The badge itself, is traced to a late Latin bagia, bagea, a sign; this form is found in Dutch, bag, bagge, jewel, seal-ring [generally with an engraved signet]; French bague a ring; Latin bacca, A. S. beag, "a coronet (?).

A. HALL.

May 18.

THE TOWNSMAN'S COUNTRY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The "townee" view of the country can never be dreary, as last week's reviewer on Mr. Hueffer's book stated, at least to the countryman who loves a quiet laugh. It is often every whit as crude, unreal, and ridiculous as the rustic's vision of the town. For streets paved with gold read roads laid with white kamptulicon, bordered by meadows covered with three pile Axminster. Add skies in which the sun can be switched on like the electric light and clouds as uch under control as the bathroom cistern. This set-fair theory is occasionally contradicted by deluges on Bank-holidays and at times the country side looks over-watered, but speaking generally the fine weather picnic idea lies at the bottom of the Cockney's impression of Arcady. Of course, when he come to settle in the country, his beanfeast ideas sustain a rude shock. Like the old lady from the slums who refused to sit out of doors, he finds there are too many draughts. He discovers to his disgust that the farm yard midden is not infrequently an ingredient of the atmosphere, if not an integral part of the landscape. And his kamptulicon roads, especially if there are motors about, stand sadly in need of sweeping and watering. Nature after the rain may be beautiful enough, but the five months of winter that she takes to dress in make the time of waiting for her appear unconscionably long, even to her most devoted gallants. The cockney takes nature or he takes the thousand products of the earth that are piled up in his markets, without thinking of the toil and labour that have been expended to bring them to his door. She is a toy, a passing fancy, a fleeting conquest. He has not lived with her, suffered with her, wooed her and won her as the despised rustic.

C. B.

"CHURCH-GOING BELL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have always thought that Cowper's line in his poem on Alexander Selkirk—

"The sound of the church-going bell" was a very beautiful one. It gave me therefore rather a shock to find the phrase "the church-going bell" held up to reprobation by one of your correspondents. I think his objection to the phrase arises from a pardonable misconception. He thinks of the phrases "a house-going clergy" and "a church-going people," and imagines that "the church-going bell" can only mean the bell that goes to church. The fact is that in the former case "church-going" is an adjective, whereas in Cowper's line the word is a verbal substantive, so that "the church-going bell" means the bell connected with "church-going," precisely as a "church-bell" means a bell connected with a church. The phrase as used by Cowper is perfectly good idiomatic English.

A. L. MAYHEW.

"UNIQUE" AND "PERFECT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your issue of Saturday May 19 has the following :

"'Unique' to us means 'the only one in the world'; we have never . . . allowed it to be used in these columns for 'good,' 'exceptional,' or 'unusual'; while as to 'rather unique,' or 'almost unique,' not even those pampered persons, the writers of signed Causeries, have been spared correction when they have committed those offences. . . .

"'Perfect' to us has always meant perfect. A thing can no more be 'almost perfect' than it can be 'almost infinite.'"

With deference to the high authority of the ACADEMY, I submit that "almost unique" and "almost perfect" are permissible phrases. It is, of course, granted that there cannot be degrees of uniqueness and perfection, and for this reason "rather unique" is indefensible, but is it clear that things which fall short of those states by a little cannot be called "almost unique" and "almost perfect"? "Almost infinite" is absurd, because, as no limit can be set to infinity, we cannot say how nearly anything approaches it; but this argument does not apply to uniqueness and perfection, which denote definite qualities or states, and, although things cannot possess these in greater or smaller degree, they may fall short of possessing them by much or by little, and if by little may we not call them "almost unique" and "almost perfect"?

T. M. VERNON.

May 19.

INDEXES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I ask you to permit me to support your protest against slovenly compiled indexes. In your review of Canon Ainger's life you state that "the index is one of the worst we have ever met in a book of this kind." How far your statement is correct I have not the means of verifying at the present moment, but the index you refer to must be very bad if it is worse than the index to the recently issued biography of Lord Randolph Churchill. For instance, in this latter index there is no entry under Churchill. The references to the subject of the book must be looked for under "Randolph," and to the author under "Winston." If any man referred to in the work did not possess a title at the date the reference deals with, his Christian name, in almost all cases, has been ignored. The absurdity of this proceeding is shown in the case of Sir John Gorst, where the majority of references are to "Mr." Gorst, and a separate entry is made for a single reference to Sir John Gorst. I may also add that the bad workmanship of this piece of indexing includes omissions. The indexer has "selected" what he thought should be indexed, and thereby diminished the usefulness of both the book and the index, even if what he had selected had been treated properly. My experience as a Librarian assures me that this biography will be frequently referred to and that the need for a good index is imperative. Permit me to suggest to Mr. Winston Churchill that he should have a new index compiled for the next edition of the work, and that copies of the new index should be obtainable by all Libraries having copies of the earlier issues of the biography.

GEO. T. SHAW.

The Athenæum, Liverpool.

May 21.

PREPOSITIONS AT THE END OF SENTENCES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—E.g. vide Tennyson's "Simeon Stylites," 196.

"Which few can reach to. Yet I do not say."

Had the line run—

"To which but few can reach—I do not say" offence were given by the repetition of the word "to" in the previous line.

Can this be the explanation, or is it a Swiftianism?

F. G. F.

May 16.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The subject is not to be dismissed as summarily as your correspondent, Mr. Buckler, supposes. Experience of composition leaves no doubt in a writer's mind that the only way to prevent confusion in the sense of the text arising from the parenthesis of subordinate sentences in a principal sentence containing a preposition governing a relative pronoun is to make it an invariable rule not to separate the preposition from its object. I do not know who it was that first said "Easy writing makes hard reading" but of course he meant that careless writing makes hard reading; and it is undoubtedly true. What trouble it would occasion the reader if writers, especially those not averse from long periods (which by the way, are necessary to the conduct of all complex arguments), were to place the preposition last in a sentence! His eye would have to re-traverse perhaps scores of intermediary words before lighting upon the relative pronoun that serves to complete the sense; and this would not be smooth reading. A convenient test of the purity of a piece of English is effected by parsing it, and no fragment could satisfactorily survive this test if the existence of a preposition could not be accounted for without reverting to a relative pronoun situate several lines further back from which, by some strange convulsion of the text, it had become detached. Foresight places the preposition before the relative pronoun, for by so doing one is not deterred from introducing as long a parenthesis into one's sentence as is requisite by any consideration affecting the relation of a preposition with its object. If in the early pages of a work one comes across so great a solecism as that of separating the preposition from its object one may take it for granted that the book is freely strewn with grammatical blunders: in that case it should be laid aside at once as one is not justified in placing any confidence in the clearness of a mind that has no sense of arrangement in the expression of ideas. And this is not a question of construction alone. Of good prose as of good poetry, rhythm is a characteristic. One has but to hear read aloud a sentence concluded by a preposition, and the ear is offended at once.

The advice not to "talk like a book" is a result of the fallacy that to do so involves some loss of naturalness. As a matter of fact for a reader deliberately to deprive his diction of the influence of his reading (assuming that to be possible) would be to act in an artificial manner. Reading more than any other act of the outer life except that of public worship witnesses to the existence of the inner life. It follows that when one "talks like a book" one is expressing something of the hidden inner life, and that is the more real and natural life of the two.

Besides, the conditions of viva voce composition being what they are there is no danger of talking too like a book. The grave and judicial tone of the latter is always modified and relieved in the language of conversation. To circulate the essence of one's thought and reading in the most irresistibly fresh and undidactic forms one can devise; to catch the latent worth of some undeveloped thought which has been diffidently offered by one of the company and to pass it on to the rest in a reply that interprets, develops, idealises it; to fill the social atmosphere with the figments of a "most exquisite fancy," with the playful eccentricities of a "light fantastic" tongue; to do all this in observance of a tacit compact which the company has formed to maintain the "sparkle" of conversation by a real wit untainted by any shadow of ill-will—these are at once the true aims and privileges of the conversationalist. And he knows that it is to his love of reading that he owes the capacity of carrying out these aims.

LINDSAY S. GARRETT.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY.

Pope, Alfred. The Old Stone Crosses of Dorset. With an introduction and descriptive articles. Illustrated with numerous plates and a key-map of the county. 8½ x 7½. Pp. xiv, 142. London: Chiswick Press; Dorchester, Ling, 15s. net. [35 good plates.]

ART.

- Vinycumb, John. Fictitious and Symbolic Creatures in Art, with special reference to those used in British Heraldry. Illustrated. 9×6½. Pp. xvi, 276. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.
- [Mr. Vinycumb regards these creatures not only from the standpoint of art but of interpretation. Each, he believes, is a symbol, and he has tried to interpret each and give the reason for its appearance.]
- Rembrandt: A Memorial, 1606-1906. Part VI. 14½×10½. Pp. 6, with 7 plates. Heinemann, 2s. 6d. net.
- [The three Schmidt plates in this Part are "The Three Trees" etching; the black chalk "Study of an Elephant" (British Museum), and "The Raising of Lazarus" etching. The photogravures are "The Man in a Golden Helmet" (Berlin); "Samson's Marriage Feast" (Dresden); "Portrait of Titus van Rijn" (Wallace Museum); and "Portrait of Hendrickje Stoffels" (Berlin).]
- Lang, Andrew. Portraits and Jewels of Mary Stuart. 10½×6½. Pp. xiii, 107. Glasgow: MacLehose, 8s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Clifford, Hugh. Heroes of Exile. Being certain rescued fragments of submerged romance. 7½×5½. Pp. xiii, 320. Smith, Elder, 6s.
- [Nine short romantic biographical studies of what Mr. Clifford calls the ligan of history—forgotten men who in their day had some connection with, or influence on history, e.g., Lopez, the first exile in St. Helena, Sonnet Pasha, King of Siam, George Ross, who settled on Cocos Keeling Islands, etc.]
- Carpenter, Edward. Days with Walt Whitman. With some Notes on his Life and Work. 7½×5½. Pp. viii, 187. Allen, 5s. net.
- [Mr. Carpenter visited Whitman at Camden in 1877 and again in 1884, and records his conversations and impressions. The volume includes also papers on Whitman as Prophet (with an Appendix comparing some of Whitman's sayings with those in the eastern and other scriptures); the Poetic Form of "Leaves of Grass"; Whitman's Children; and Whitman and Emerson. Two portraits of Whitman and one of Emerson.]
- Burrage, Champlin. The True Story of Robert Browne (1550?-1633), Father of Congregationalism. Including various points hitherto unknown or misunderstood, with some account of the development of his religious views, and an extended and improved list of his writings. 9×5½. Pp. 75. Oxford: Printed by Horace Hart at the University Press, 2s. 6d. net.
- Mackintosh, Alexander. Joseph Chamberlain: an honest biography. 9½×6½. Pp. xvi, 462. Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. (See p. 493.)
- Thorpe, T. E. Joseph Priestley. 7½×5. Pp. viii, 228. English Men of Science. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
- [Founded so far as possible on Priestley's autobiography. Illustrations. Index.]
- Carroll, John S. Dante Alighieri. Lewin, Walter. Nathaniel Hawthorne. Little Books for Bookmen series. Illustrated. 5½×4½. Hodder & Stoughton, 6d. net. each.

CLASSICS.

- Plato. The Euthyphro, Apology, and Crito. With introduction, translations and notes, by F. M. Stawell. The Temple Greek and Latin Classics. 7×4½. Pp. 165. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
- Propertius. Translated by J. S. Phillimore. 7½×5. Pp. xii, 183. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d. net.
- [Intended both for those who have no Latin and those who wish to study Propertius in the original. Preface.]

EDUCATION.

- La Révolution Française*. Edited by D. L. Savory. Short French Readers. 6½×4½. Pp. 63. Dent, 6d. net.
- Fables de La Fontaine*. Avec notes, exercices et leçons de vérification par Thomas Keen. Modern Language series. 6½×4½. Pp. 177. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.
- The Simpler Poems of William Wordsworth*. Edited with introduction and notes, by Edward Hutton. 6½×4. Pp. 47. Dent, 3d. net.
- Hooton, W. M. Junior Experimental Science. The School Junior series. 7×5. Pp. 260. University Tutorial Press, 2s. 6d.
- Rippman's Picture Vocabulary*. German: First series. Modern Language series. 5½×7½. Pp. 32. Dent, 6d. net.
- Board of Education. Special Reports on Educational Subjects. Vol. 16. School Training for the Home Duties of Women. Part II., Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Switzerland, and France. 9½×6. Pp. vii, 352. H. M. Stationery Office, 1s. 6d.
- Wilson, Richard. Selected Poems of Matthew Arnold. 7½×4½. Pp. xv, 111. Arnold, 1s. 6d.
- Blackie's Model Readers*. Book iv. 7½×5. Pp. 240. Blackie, 1s. 4d.
- Hall, H. R. Wilton. Our English Towns and Villages. 7½×4½. Pp. 198. Blackie, 1s. 6d.
- Stobart, J. C. The Age of Chaucer—1215-1500. Epochs of English Literature series—vol. i. 7½×4½. Pp. 136. Arnold, 1s. 6d.
- Zobeltitz, Fedor von. Der Backfischkasten. Edited, with notes and vocabulary, by Gustav Hein. Authorised edition. 7½×5. Pp. 139. Arnold, 2s.
- Russell, John Edward. An Elementary Logic. 7½×5. Pp. 250. Macmillan, 3s. net.
- [Mr. Russell is Professor of Intellectual and Moral Science in Williams College, U.S.A. His book is intended for students and teachers. It follows the main tradition of logical doctrine; but contains new methods of arrangement and new features; the most important being that in Part II., "The Logic of Science," in which the author gives a fuller and more exact study of the problems and methods of science than most textbooks of logic contain.]
- Euripides' Alceste*. Translated by H. Kynaston. With introduction and notes by J. Churton Collins. 6½×4½. Pp. 44. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1s. net.
- Marchant, E. C. Græc Reader, vol. ii. Selected and adapted, with English notes, from Professor von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf's "Griechisches Lesebuch." 7½×5. Pp. 96. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2s.
- Milton: Paradise Lost*, Books i, ii. Edited by A. F. Watt. 7×5. Pp. xxiv, 88. University Tutorial Press, 1s. 6d.
- Tillyard, A. C. W. Le Livre des Jeux. Twelve French Games for English Children. Introduction by Miss E. P. Hughes. Modern Language series. 6½×4½. Pp. 63. Blackie 1s.

- Shakespeare: Select Scenes and Passages from the English Historical Plays*. Edited by C. H. Spence. English Literature for Secondary School series. 7×4½. Pp. 69. Macmillan, 10d.
- Histoire d'Aladdin ou la Lampe Merveilleuse*. Edited by Louis A. Barbé. Illustrated by John Hassall. Modern Language series. 6½×4½. Pp. 157. Blackie, 1s. 6d.
- Winbolt, S. E. The Latin Hexameter. Hints for sixth forms. 7½×4½. Pp. 48. Blackie, 2s.

FICTION.

- Hutchinson, Horace G. Amelia and the Doctor. 7½×5½. Pp. viii, 319. Smith, Elder, 6s.
- A Discrepant World*. Being an Essay in Fiction. By the author of "Through Spectacles of Feeling," "The Haggard Side," etc. 7½×5½. Pp. 223. Longmans, 6s.
- Sudermann, Hermann. The Undying Past. Translated by Beatrice Marshall. 7½×5. Pp. 382. Lane, 6s.
- Frothingham, Eugenia Brooks. The Evasion. 7½×5. Pp. 415. Constable, 6s.
- Wood, Walter. The Enemy in our Midst. The story of a raid on England. 7½×5. Pp. 320. Long, 6s.
- Morgan-de-Groot, J. The Bar Sinister. 7½×5. Pp. 308. Blackwood, 6s.
- Sergeant, Adeline. An Independent Maiden. 7½×5. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.
- Blake, Bernard Cecil. Cain's Wife. A legendary novel of love and hate and beautiful women. 7½×5½. Pp. 347. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 6s.
- Ruthven, E. C. The Uphill Road. 7½×5. Pp. 319. Chapman & Hall, 5s.
- Compton, Herbert. The Undertaker's Field, or Murder Will Out. 7½×5. Pp. 315. Bachelors & Benedict, 6s.
- Face to Face, and Dolorosa*. Two novels of modern Spain, by Francisco Acebal. Presented in English, with a preface, by Martin Hume. 7½×5. Pp. 336. Constable, 6s.
- Horton, George. A Fair Insurgent. Frontispiece by S. H. Vedder. 7½×5. Pp. 313. Ward, Lock, 6s.
- Lady Betty Across the Water*. Edited by C. N. and A. M. Williamson. 7½×5. Pp. 340. Methuen, 6s.
- Lonsdale, H. M. The Dread Ardrana. Frontispiece. 7½×5. Pp. 269. Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.
- Heath, the late Thomas Edward, of Northlands, Cardiff. Tales in Prose and Verse, and Dramas, with illustrations by the Author and his grandson. 9½×6. Pp. vii, 259. King, Sell & Olding, 6s.
- Hobson, Florence Edgar. Shifting Scenes. 7½×5½. Pp. 158. Fifield, 2s. 6d. net.
- [Seven short stories.]
- Marsh, Frances. A Romance of Old Folkestone. 7½×5½. Pp. 315. Fifield, 6s.

HISTORY.

- Bigg, Charles. Wayside Sketches in Ecclesiastical History. Nine lectures with notes and preface. 8½×6. Pp. xii, 230. Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.
- [The essays, says Canon Bigg, might have been called Essays on the Development of the Church. They refer to three great moments . . . the making of the mediæval system, its decay, and the beginnings of modern Christianity. The subjects are: Prudentius, Paulinus of Nola, Sidonius Apollinaris, Grosseteste, Wycliffe, A Kempis, the English Reformation (three lectures). Are the laws of the Church divine laws, or ecclesiastical by-laws? is the question he attempts to answer.]
- Hurry, Jamieson, B. The Rise and Fall of Reading Abbey. Illustrated. 8×5½. Pp. 119. Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d. net.
- [An abridgment of a larger work on the subject by the same author.]
- Mahaffy, John Pentland. The Silver Age of the Greek World. 7½×5½. Pp. vii, 482. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. London: Unwin. $3 net.
- [Intended to replace Professor Mahaffy's "Greek World under Roman Sway," which is out of print. Appendices and Index.]
- Barron, Evan M. Inverness in the Fifteenth Century. 7½×5½. Pp. 129. Inverness: Carruthers, 2s. net.
- [Reprinted, with revisions from the Inverness Courier.]

LAW.

- Williams, James. Dante as a Jurist. 7½×5½. Pp. 72. Oxford: Blackwell: London: Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. net.
- [Dr. Williams's book is founded on his article in the Law Magazine, February 1897. He examines Dante's knowledge and use of law, first in the Divina Commedia, and next in the prose works and letters. Appendix on the due Soli di Purg. xvi, 107: Lists of Laws and Cases cited; and Index of Names.]
- Burton, Percy M.; and Scott, Guy H. Guillum. The Law relating to the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and some kindred subjects, including the Wild Birds Protection Acts. 8½×5½. Pp. xix, 170. Murray, 3s. 6d. net.
- Pollock, Sir Frederick. Introduction and Notes to Sir Henry Maine's "Ancient Law". 9×5½. Pp. xvi, 62. Murray, 2s. 6d. net.

LITERATURE.

- Fyvie, John. Some Literary Eccentrics. 9×5½. Pp. 296. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.
- [The "eccentrics" are: Thomas Amory; Thomas Day; William Beckford; Walter Savage Landor; William Hazlitt; Henry Crabb Robinson; Charles Babbage; Douglas Jerrold; George Wither; James I.; and Sir John Mandeville.]
- Ince, Morton. A Handbook to the Works of William Shakespeare. 6½×4½. Pp. x, 463. Bell, 6s.
- [Mr. Ince's aim is to combine "scientific" and "artistic" criticism; to give, that is, full information on fact, and full consideration of æsthetics.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Hoggarth, Graham, and others. Cap and Gown. 11½×8½. Pp. 42. Oxford: The Holywell Press, 1s.
- [The "Varsity Humours." The pictures by Mr. Hoggarth have, most of them, appeared in the 'Varsity. They are clever and funny. Stories, sketches and verses, mainly by Mr. Hoggarth, H. F. B. B.-S. and C. de M. R. A very good shillingsworth of wit.]
- Things more excellent*: being the manual of the Tolstoy sisters. Compiled by Honnor Morten. 6½×4½. Pp. 58. Simple Life series, No. 26. Fifield, 6d. net.

Murray, Grace Peckham, M.D. The Fountain of Youth, or Personal Appearance and Personal Hygiene. With 134 illustrations from photographs taken under the personal supervision of the author. 8½ × 5½. Pp. xvii, 205. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.

[Instructions how to make and keep yourself healthy, beautiful and young, with full illustrations. Dr. Peckham's remedies and prescriptions are all simple and can all be carried out at home without recourse to outside aid.]

Sonnenschein, William Swan. Five Thousand Words frequently misspelt. The correct spellings with the more common erroneous forms indicated. 4½ × 2½. Pp. xiv, 301. Routledge: Miniature Reference Library, 1s. net. (See p. 510.)

Hyatt, Alfred H. The Pocket Dickens. Being favourite passages chosen from the works of Charles Dickens. 5½ × 3½. Pp. 246. Chapman & Hall, 2s. net.

Peace and War. By Ch. Richet. Translated from the French by Marian Edwardes. 7 × 4½. Pp. 87. Dent, 1s. net.

Rowles, William F. Every Man's Book of Garden Difficulties. 200 illustrations. 6½ × 4½. Pp. xi, 215. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d. net.

PHILOSOPHY.

Hooper, Charles E. The Anatomy of Knowledge. An Essay in Objective Logic. 8 × 5½. Pp. 226. Issued for the Rationalist Press Association, Limited. Watts, 3s. 6d. net.

POETRY.

A Marriage Symphony. 7 × 5. Pp. 40. London and Florence: The Olive Press, 5s. net.

[A dainty little book of graceful, melodious and often rich poems, by an anonymous writer. The volume is bound in white vellum with leather ties, the binding being copied from a thirteenth-century Venetian book, and executed entirely by hand without glue.]

Anthology of French Poetry from the time of Froissart up to the beginning of the present century. Compiled by Frederick Lawton. The Bijou series. 6 × 3½. Pp. 285. Swan Sonnenschein, 1s. 6d. net.

Housman, Laurence. Mendicant Rhymes. 9 × 7½. Pp. 56. Essex House Press.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Robertson, J. M. A Short History of Freethought Ancient and Modern. Second edition, rewritten and greatly enlarged. In 2 vols. 9 × 5½. Pp. 480, 455. Watts, 21s. net.

Ford, Harold. The Art of Extempore Speaking, or How to obtain fluency of speech. Sixth edition, revised and enlarged. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 155. Elliot Stock, n.p.

Dumas's The Companions of Jehu (2 vols.) and The Whites and the Blues (2 vols.) Each 7½ × 5. Illustrated. Dent, 2s. 6d. net per vol.

Jeffries, Richard. The Gamekeeper at Home. Sketches of Natural History and Rural Life. Illustrated by Charles Whympers. 7½ × 5. Pp. 221. The Waterloo Library. Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d.

Lever, Charles. Lord Kilgobbin. 7½ × 5. Pp. 475. Macmillan's Three and Sixpenny Library.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. Transformation, or the Romance of Monte Beni. 6½ × 4½. Pp. xx, 374. Bell. The York Library. 2s. net.

[Reprints from the first English edition, 1860, with such slight alterations from the American edition, published as "The Marble Faun" shortly after the English edition, "as appear to have resulted from the author's own revision." Biographical Introduction, by G. R. D. Thin paper.]

Ruskin, John. Fors Clavigera. Letters to the Workmen and Labourers of Great Britain. In 4 vols., each 6½ × 4½. Ruskin Pocket Edition. Bell, 3s. net cloth and 4s. net leather each.

Purchas, Samuel. Hakluytus Posthumus, or Purchas His Pilgrimes. In twenty vols. Vols. xi. and xii. Each 9 × 6½. Pp. xxviii, 1282. Glasgow: MacLehose, 12s. 6d. net each.

Fisher, George Park. The Reformation. New and Revised Edition. 8½ × 6½. Pp. xxx, 525. Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.

[The first edition was published in 1873. Professor Park's well-known book deals with the political and secular as well as the religious and theological side of the Reformation, and elucidates points of theological doctrine.]

THEOLOGY.

The Great Commandment, and the Second Like Unto It. Six sermons preached before the University of Oxford as Select Preacher by the Right Rev. John Mitchinson. 6½ × 4. Pp. 115. Stock, 1s. 6d.

Moberly, the late Walter Allan. The Old Testament in Modern Light. Preface by the Bishop of Southwark. 6½ × 4. Pp. 162. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.

Hoare, H. W. The Disestablishment Question at the Present Time. An address delivered in 1906 at the invitation of a London Debating Society. 7 × 4½. Pp. 61. S.P.C.K. 6d.

Sedgwick, Rev. S. N. The Story of the Apocrypha. A series of lectures on the books and times of the Apocrypha. 7 × 4½. Pp. 155. S.P.C.K. 2s.

O'Leary, Rev. De Lacy. The Apostolical Constitutions and Cognate Documents, with special reference to their Liturgical Elements. Early Church Classics. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 77. S.P.C.K. 1s.

Edghill, E. A. An Inquiry into the Evidential Value of Prophecy. Being the Hulsean Prize Essay for 1904. With a Preface by the Rt. Rev. H. E. Kyle, Lord Bishop of Winchester. 7½ × 5½. Pp. xxviii, 627. Macmillan, 7s. 6d.

[Mr. Edghill first inquires into the nature and scope of the prophetic work and office, drawing a careful distinction between the truths underlying Old Testament Revelations and the relative forms in which they find expression and embodiment; and goes on to examine the interpretation put upon the prophecies by the New Testament writers, concluding with a section on the evidential value of prophecy generally. He throughout discriminates between the temporary and permanent elements of prophecy. Indexes.]

Horne, C. Silvester. The Relationships of Life. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 155. Methuen, 1s. 6d.

[A discussion, "from the Christian standpoint," of the practical problems of conduct in the various relationships between members of the same family, lovers, masters and servants, and others—in which life places all.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Gregory, J. W. The Dead Heart of Australia. A journey around Lake Eyre in the summer of 1901-1902 with some account of the Lake Eyre Basin and the flowing wells of Central Australia. With Maps and Illustrations. 9 × 6. Pp. xvi, 371. Murray, 16s. net.

[The narrative, largely reprinted from the Melbourne Age, of Professor Gregory's expedition to South-Eastern Australia, in connection with the geological school of Melbourne University. It contains also, as its last chapter, a paper written for the Melbourne Argus on the proposal to flood the basin of Lake Eyre from the sea, by means of a canal from Port Augusta, a proposal which Professor Gregory regards as difficult but not impracticable. Appendixes on Fossil Birds and Mammals and a list of original literature on the Lake Eyre Basin. Indexes.]

Rouse Ball, W. W. Trinity College, Cambridge. Illustrated by Edmund H. New. 7 × 4½. Pp. xiii, 107. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

Kakemono, by Herbage Edwards. (Heinemann, 7s. 6d. net.)—With Japanese sketches the name of Lafcadio Hearn, that most graceful of writers, will be always associated. His books interpret Japan and Japanese to English readers with a beauty and clearness that are unrivalled. We do not say this to depreciate Mr. Edwards's work by comparison; Lafcadio Hearn is a master whom none need blush to follow; but master he remains by virtue of his knowledge and sympathy and gift of expression. Mr. Herbage Edwards has observed well and his observations are interesting and daintily put, though his simplicity becomes at times somewhat mannered, and his effects seem a little vague and far-fetched. That is not always the case, however; and he draws an admirable picture of the cloisonné factory in Nagoya, where the skilled work is done by the old men, and their age and skill in workmanship advance on parallel lines: "But the oldest of all sat by himself in a little room just opposite the arching bridge which crossed the mountain stream. He wore a pair of quaint horn spectacles and his face was the face of an Eastern sage. He sat with his tools before him fixing silver wires on to a silver vase with a certainty and rapidity beyond his fellows: and all that is most beautiful and most difficult in the cloisonné works of Nagoya comes from his hands." We are irresistibly reminded of Thoreau's old fisherman. "A straight old man he was who took his way in silence through the meadows, having passed the period of communication with his fellows: . . . whose fishing was not a sport nor solely a means of subsistence, but a sort of solemn sacrament and withdrawal from the world, just as the aged read their Bibles." Thoreau would have written finely about Japan: even in Concord he could understand the beauty of Eastern thought, and that beauty is apparent is materially expressed in no other country as it is in Japan. It penetrates the most trivial things of Japanese life's daily routine. Witness Mr. Edwards's account of the little stately old lady who taught the art of flower-arrangement. Seven years must be given to the art's study by one who will be its teacher, three years by a pupil. And the essence of the art lies in the perfection, not of colour, but of line-effect, which would pass unnoticed by the untrained. It is this spirit which endows small detail with almost ceremonial importance, which makes the fascination of Japan, and lends a strange interest to such books as this, which is written with reverence and without adulation. For the Japanese know splendidly how to live; their savoir vivre is so perfect that we cannot know too much about it.

We have on our shelves several little volumes of Messrs. Routledge's "Miniature Reference Library," and find them both trustworthy and useful. The latest addition to the library is Mr. Swan Sonnenschein's Five Thousand Words Frequently Misspelt (Routledge, 1s. net.) This little book is an attempt, on a very small scale, to standardise English spelling. Standardisation is a process which must rouse objections from somebody; and we find ourselves regretting that Mr. Sonnenschein should pronounce for "medieval" as against "mediæval"; "biased" as against "biassed," and—as our readers have guessed—the "z" as against the "s" in the inflected forms of words like "standardize," "authorize" and "criticize." He is obliged, too, to be occasionally dictatorial. He will not allow "enquire" nor "despatch"; and more than once he gives as English words—unaccented—words like "depot" which are certainly not English, and should never be written but in italics with accents. On the other hand, he has a good reason for nearly everything that he does. "The best usage of the best contemporary writers," backed, in cases where the choice is arbitrary, by The New English Dictionary, ought to be authority enough for any one who is not a philologist. The book is built on the difficulties of two hundred and fifty friends of the author, together with those experienced by children in the Fifth and Sixth Standard; so that it is pretty certain that no practical difficulty has been omitted, and the book should prove of the greatest service to hundreds of thousands of people.

The Journal of the Folksong Society (No. 7); Folksongs from Somerset, second series. (Barnicott and Pearce, Taunton.)—The subject really appears to be receiving something like adequate attention nowadays, and if Mr. Cecil Sharp, the eminent folksong collector, is to be trusted (and we know that he is) it is none too soon. With the plague of music-hall songs and musical comedy selections spreading over the whole country side, with the publication of cheap editions and the itinerant piano-organ, the tradition of folk melodies and words is rapidly becoming lost. The Folksong Society is working hard both to collect and preserve the tunes and words, which are published in their journal without accompaniment, and as nearly as possible as sung by the country folk, and to spread information which may arouse interest and help any one who may attempt collecting. This number of the Journal contains a paper by Mr. Frank Kisdon giving much useful information on the subject of the "Ballad-sheets" and "Garlands," which were the only ways in which the words of songs were printed and distributed in the past. The remainder is devoted to a number of tunes and words collected by various members of the society, including Mr. Percy Grainger, Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, Mr. Cecil Sharp, and Miss Lucy Broadwood. Particularly interesting in the Journal is the opportunity it affords of comparison by printing different versions of the same song side by side, versions which have been found in different parts of the country by different collectors. Thus there are four tunes to "Lord Thomas and Fair Eleanor," found at Taunton and Bournemouth and in Herefordshire and Devon. Many of the tunes are of great beauty, and all have a striking individuality. The same may be said of Mr. Sharp's Folksongs from Somerset, which are as faithfully noted as those of the Folksong Journal, while for practical purposes they have the advantage of neatly written and careful accompaniments for the piano. As this is a collection primarily for use rather than antiquarian interest, the words have been more freely edited and in some cases re-written by the Rev. Charles Marson. The editors in an introduction insist upon their title "Folksongs from Somerset," since it is impossible to claim that all belong to that or any other part of the country. Many are versions of ballads which Scotland has already claimed and will not readily part with, as, for instance, "The Low Low Lands of Holland." All that the editors claim is that "they happen to have been caught" in Somerset. This collection of twenty-seven is a very worthy second to the first of the same number. What is needed is that singers should complement the splendid efforts of collectors by singing these beautiful tunes until they regain their hold on the affections of the music-loving public. Something is being done in that way too. We discuss elsewhere in this number a concert recently given in London by the "Folk Song Quartet," an excellent set of singers with a splendid field for work before them.

We notice the publication of a new review which may be of interest to some of our readers. Inri (published at Market Chambers, South Parade, Market Place, Nottingham, rs.) is described as a monthly review of occult science, transcendental philosophy and experimental research. Its Hon. Director is Papus, M.D., Doctor in Kabbalah; its Editor is Teder, Doctor of Herm. Science; and its aim is to nurture the "spiritualistic renaissance," which has "already stultified the hardy denial of the materialists," to "control its tendencies and prune its excrescences"; "to synthetise Science and Faith, Physics and Metaphysics, the Visible and the Occult." It pledges itself also to "investigate impartially all the phenomena of Spiritualism, Magnetism, Hypnotism and Magic, as they are known to-day, and as they were better known in ancient times in Orient." Those who know the Paris review, L'Initiation, will find in Inri its fellow.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

Tuesday next, May 29, at five o'clock, Colonel V. BALCK, First of Two Lectures on "Northern Winter Sports." Half a Guinea the Course.

Saturday, June 2, at three o'clock, Professor W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A., Litt.D., First of Two Lectures on (1) "The Origins of Poetry"; (2) Inspiration in Poetry." Half a Guinea.

WHISTLER AND OTHERS

By FREDERICK WEDMORE

"Mr. Wedmore . . . the accepted authority on Whistler."—TIMES.

"Mature thought."—MORNING POST.

"Often instructive and always delightful, revealing insight and knowledge."—SCOTSMAN.

"Informed with wealth of learning, and expressed with a delightful ease."—MORNING LEADER.

"Chapters in which Mr. Wedmore's vast knowledge of Art, his gifts of intuition, and his catholic taste stand evident on every page . . . Mr. Wedmore is a Master of English."—SUNDAY TIMES.

"The appeal of the book is wide, and from the first page to the last it offers an invitation to think."—STANDARD.

With Photogravure Portrait, 6s. net.

LONDON: SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD., 1 Amen Corner, E.C.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD. SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER," TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties,

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHIAN, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

ncorporated] [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

LONDON LIBRARY ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING. President—The Right. Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.
Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; GEORGE MEREDITH, Esq.; ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Esq., F.R.S.
Trustees—EARL of ROSEBERY, K.G.; Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; HENRY YATES THOMPSON, Esq.

Committee—Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., LL.D., Dr. J. H. Bridges, Horace T.
Brown, Esq., F.R.S., Prof. Ingram Bywater, Prof. Lewis Campbell, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Esq., LL.D., Sydney Gedge, Esq., Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S., Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B., F.R.S.,
Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D., Mrs. J. R. Green, Rev. W. Hunt, M.A., Litt.D., Sir C. P.
Ilbert, K.C.S.I., Sir C. M. Kennedy, K.C.M.G., C.B., Sidney Lee, Esq., Litt.D., W. S.
Lilly, Esq., Sidney J. Low, Esq., Sir Frank T. Marzials, C.B., Sir F. Pollock, Bart., Rev.
J. H. Rigg, D.D., H. R. Tedder, Esq., Rev. H. Wace, D.D., Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B.,
A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D., LL.D.

The Library contains about 220,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 3s. a year, with an entrance fee of £1 1s.; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. The NEW CATALOGUE (1626 pp. 4to, 1903) is now ready, price £2 2s.; to members, 25s.

"One of the most sagacious and judiciously liberal men I have ever known, the late Lord Derby, said there was a kind of man to whom the best service that could be rendered was to make him a life member of the London Library."—W. E. H. LECKY.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED DRINK THE
WHITE
DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER. & BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,

and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net
By post, 3s. 10d.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1778

JUNE 2, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, open to Boys under 15, will be held in June.—Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 27, 28, and 29 to fill Vacancies in Scholarships and Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the BURSAR, The Bursary, Little Dean's Yard, Westminster.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.
See Staff (honoursmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.
SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

NEW ZEALAND.

Applications are invited for the appointment of ART MASTER at the Wellington Technical School. Salary £300. £40 allowed towards passage. Age should not exceed 35 years. Candidates should have an Art Master's Certificate.

For further particulars and for the forms on which application must be made, apply to the High Commissioner for New Zealand, 13 Victoria Street, London, S.W.

LONDON. HOME FOR ELDER GIRLS.

—A Lady (University Honours), experienced in Higher Educational Work, Foreign Travel, Household Management, receives, in Comfortable Home in South Kensington, Eight Elder Girls desiring to study Special Subjects or see London. Coaching in Art-History, Literature, Languages. Terms by the month or term. Miss ELLEN FARNELL, 13 Alexander Square, South Kensington.

ST. PAUL'S GIRLS' SCHOOL, BROOK GREEN, W.

—An Examination for foundation scholarships open to girls under 16 years of age will be held at the School on July 10, 11, and 12, which will exempt the scholars from payment of tuition fees. Further particulars may be obtained from the Head Mistress of the School.

CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS.

Miss A. W. GREGORY, LL.A., prepares pupils either orally or by correspondence, for University Examinations in History, Literature, Anglo-Saxon, French and German.—3 Ickburgh Road, Upper Clapton, N.E.

STAMMERING.—The severest and most obstinate cases can now be perfectly and permanently cured by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years; call or write—Mr. A. C. Schnelle, 112 Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Art

EXHIBITION of PAINTINGS by J. D. FERGUSSON and ARTHUR STUDD, and Metal Work by G. DIKKERS & Co., of Holland, now open.—THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W., 10 to 6.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL. — SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

EXHIBITION OF CONTEMPORARY GERMAN ART, PRINCES' GALLERY, KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

NOW OPEN, 10 to 6.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, that the President and Council will proceed to ELECT, on June 13, TWO TURNER ANNUITANTS. Applicants for the Turner Annuity, which is of the value of £50, must be artists of repute in need of aid through the unavoidable failure of professional employment or other causes. Forms of application can be obtained by letter addressed to the Secretary, Royal Academy of Arts, Piccadilly, W. They must be filled in and returned on or before Saturday, June 9.

By Order,
FRED A. EATON, Secretary.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,

100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

ENGLISH DIALECT DICTIONARY by Joseph Wright, 6 vols. imp. 4to complete, published in cloth at £15 15s. net, offered newly bound in half morocco for £10 net.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

J. POOLE & CO.

Established
1854.

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific

BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,

All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

A PAIR OF HANDSOME MODERN SOLID MAHOGANY BOOKCASES, measuring 9 feet high by 3 feet 6 inches wide. Deep cupboards below, glass doors above. Cost £18. Condition as new. Offers invited. Box 64 Advert. Dept., ACADEMY Office, 20 Tavistock Street, Strand, W.C.

Books Wanted

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

MISCELLANEA GENEALOGICA ET HERALDICA, Vol. ii, First Series (about 1870), wanted; good price given.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury. (Vol. I., 1869 for sale.)

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING.—8d. 1000 words (Remington). Novels, Plays, Duplicating Circulars, etc.—Miss WILLARD, Beaufort House, Osborne Road, Southville, Bristol.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING.—Novels 9d. 1000. Translations, plays, poetry, etc. Miss HANDLY, Bankside, Berkhamsted.

TYPEWRITING BY A GRADUATE, 8d. 1000 words. MSS. of all descriptions accurately typed and promptly returned. Translations 3s. 1000.—CONWAY, 14 Primrose Terrace, Gravesend.

PLAY TYPIST EXPERT. Work to Dictation or from MSS. Novels, etc., 10d. 1000 words. Duplicating and Tabulating.—Mr. J. MORTON, 40 Queen's Road, Lavender Hill, S.W.

LITERARY AGENCY.—INDEXING, Translations (French, German, Latin). Authors' MSS. carefully Revised and Placed. Terms moderate. Typewriting 8d. per 1000 words. References.—Miss A. HORSFELD, 48 Church Street, Barnsley, Yorks.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD. SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Messrs. BELL'S NEW BOOKS

Catalogue post free on application.

Demy 8vo, with 82 Illustrations, 8s. 6d. net.

TURBINES. By W. H. STUART GARNETT, Barrister-at-Law.

A popular book on the subject of Steam and Water Turbines, in which the theory of the subject is developed concurrently with its history, in such a way as to make it readily intelligible to the general reader. The problems which are at present associated with it are stated, with a forecast of the possible future of the engine. At the same time the book contains the most complete theory that has so far been published of the well-known machines, and will be of value to experts and to all users of power.

Fcap. 8vo, 6s.

A HANDBOOK TO SHAKESPEARE. By MORTON LUCE, Author of "A Handbook to Tennyson," etc.

This "Handbook to Shakespeare" offers in one volume the critical and explanatory helps that must otherwise be sought in many books. As far as possible it embodies all recent research and, like the author's "Handbook to Tennyson," to which it forms a companion, it aims at illustrating principles, while it supplies information.

SIXTH AND CHEAPER EDITION, with a New Preface.

Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

HENRY VIII. AND THE ENGLISH MONASTERIES. By the RIGHT REV. ABBOT GASQUET, D.D., O.S.B.

"We may say in brief, if what we have already said is not sufficient to show it, that a very important chapter of English history is here treated with a fullness, minuteness, and lucidity which will not be found in previous accounts, and we sincerely congratulate Dr. Gasquet on having made such an important contribution to English historical literature."—ATHENÆUM.

NEW VOLUMES OF BOHN'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

Post 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

HAZLITT'S VIEW OF THE ENGLISH STAGE; or, a Series of Dramatic Criticisms. Edited by W. SPENCER JACKSON

EMERSON'S WORKS. A new Edition in 5 volumes, with the Text Edited and Collated by GEORGE SAMPSON.

CONTENTS.—Vol. I. Essays—Representative Men. Vol. II. English Traits—Conduct of Life—Nature. Vol. III. Society and Solitude—Letters and Social Aims—Addresses. Vol. IV. Miscellaneous Pieces. Vol. V.—Poetical Works.

"A very scholarly edition, and the first complete edition ever published."—ACADEMY.

Post 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

THE UNIVERSAL KINSHIP. By J. HOWARD MOORE, Author of "Better World Philosophy."

"He has brought together a mass of scientific information, anecdotes, and descriptions of the ways of different animals, and seeks to establish in his readers a sense of their kinship with all things that live—kinship of a triple character—physical, psychological, and ethical . . . Written in a clear and interesting fashion."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED, post 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

THE LOGIC OF VEGETARIANISM. Essays and Dialogues. By HENRY S. SALT.

NEW VOLUMES OF THE YORK LIBRARY

On thin paper. Cloth, 2s. net, leather, 3s. net.

HAWTHORNE'S TRANSFORMATION (The Marble Faun).

PLUTARCH'S LIVES. Translated with Notes and a Life. By AUBREY STEWART, M.A., and GEORGE LONG, M.A. 4 vols.

"The best life of Napoleon."—TIMES.

LIFE OF NAPOLEON I. By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D., late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge, Largely Compiled from New Materials taken from the British Official Records. With numerous Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. In 2 vols. large post 8vo, THIRD EDITION, 18s. net.

Also a CHEAPER EDITION, without Illustrations, 2 vols, 10s. net.

"There is no single book on Napoleon, either in English or French, to be compared to this for accuracy, for information, for judgment, nor is there any that is better reading."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"The book is likely to become the authority for English readers on the greatest name in modern history."—ATHENÆUM.

"This book deserves to stand besides the classical works of Thiers and Lanfrey."—SPECTATOR.

NAPOLEONIC STUDIES. By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D. Post 8vo, with Maps, 7s. 6d. net.

"Whatever may be the side of Napoleon's career in which the reader may be interested, we make bold to say that he will find something new to him within the four hundred pages of this modest little volume. Dr. Rose is to be congratulated on his mastery of a difficult and complicated subject."—ATHENÆUM.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS,
Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.

IMPORTANT NOTICE

MESSRS. METHUEN have just published a New Novel by the Authors of "The Lightning Conductor," and the demand is so great that the First and Second Editions were exhausted before publication and a Third Edition is in the press. The book is LADY BETTY ACROSS THE WATER, by C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON, Authors of "The Lightning Conductor," "The Princess Passes," and "My Friend the Chauffeur."

Readers are particularly recommended to ask for Mr. EDWARD HUTTON's new Book, THE CITIES OF SPAIN—a book of unusual charm and, at the present moment, of unusual interest.

THE PAGEANT OF LONDON. By RICHARD DAVEY. With 40 Illustrations in Colour by JOHN FULLEYLOVE, R.I. In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 15s. net
Vol. I.—To A.D. 1500. Vol. II.—A.D. 1500 to 1900.

This is a book in which the author has condensed, in a light and readable style, a great deal of curious information concerning the various places of historical interest in the Metropolis which are little known to the average visitor or reader.

THE MAKERS OF JAPAN. By J. MORRIS. With many Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

This book, by a series of biographies of the great statesmen and warriors of the last forty years, describes the rise of Japan to its present commanding position. The book is full of value, and the biographical method gives it an interest which a set history could not possess. The author was for many years in Japan, and is on terms of intimacy with many prominent leaders of the country.

"The author is better fitted than most people to speak of things Japanese. The volume is full of interest."—DAILY NEWS.

"Mr. Morris's work on Japan will rank among the best, as it is certainly one of the most attractive and interesting."—SCOTSMAN.

ON THE SPANISH MAIN. By JOHN MASEFIELD. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"This is a fine book, perfectly written, and admirably illustrated. The little pieces of learning worked in everywhere show an amazing conversance with the subject, and with all that concerned that extraordinary period of our nival history."—MORNING LEADER.

"Mr. Masefield writes with knowledge and enthusiasm, with humour and distinction of style."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"Told with a fine sense of romance."—TRIBUNE.

"The whole book breathes an air of great adventure."—MORNING POST.

"Mr. Masefield has evidently the right enthusiasm; he has a style of admirable simplicity and balance; and he has the gift of feeling and revealing the 'still sad music of humanity.'"—DAILY CHRONICLE.

THE LAND OF PARDONS. By ANATOLE LE BRAZ. Translated by FRANCES M. GOSTLING. With 50 Illustrations, of which 10 are in Colour, by T. C. GOTCH, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

In this book the great Breton writer has described the five obligatory festivals of his country, and in so doing has shown us Brittany, not the Brittany hitherto known to the foreigner, but the true Breton Brittany, with its colour, its life, its quaint customs, legends, beliefs, all mingled with the superstitions that linger so persistently in the Breton mind. In fact "The Land of Pardons" is not a mere book about Brittany, for it is Brittany, painted as only a Breton could paint it.

LHASA AND ITS MYSTERIES: with a Record of the Expedition of 1903-4. By L. AUSTINE WADDELL, LL.D., C.B., C.I.E., F.L.S., F.A.I., Lieut.-Colonel Indian Medical Service, Author of "The Buddhism of Tibet," "Among the Himalayas," etc. With 200 Illustrations and Maps, New and Revised Edition, medium 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This charming book is acknowledged to be the most complete and authoritative account of the recent British Mission to the Forbidden Land. It is a mine of first-hand knowledge and research, giving an intimate insight into the quaint customs, folk-lore, philology, scenery, and natural history of the Hermit Land. Its unusual richness in excellent illustrations, most of which are unique and not to be found elsewhere, makes the book a work of art. The new edition is issued at a very low price.

THE COMPLETE CRICKETER. By ALBERT E. KNIGHT. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A book of exceptional merit which covers every side of the game. It is exceptional in two ways: because it studies character, the mind which lies behind the best play, as it does the best work, and because it presents aspirations towards an ideal and a philosophy of cricket which are sufficiently rare. Withal, Mr. Knight is thoroughly practical, as his pages show, and does not turn aside for the sake of mere anecdote."—ATHENÆUM.

"In many respects the most thorough and illuminating book ever devoted to its inexhaustible subject. A fine, vigorous, clean-witted, and freshly-written volume."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"An ideal work. The author has breathed into the dry bones of the game the breath of life; he has given shape and form and spirit to the greatest of national pastimes."—MORNING LEADER.

"He has made literature and sport meet as they assuredly have never met between book-covers before."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"A masterly, technical study of the subject; the most notable addition to the cricketers' library made for many a long day. . . . This delightful book."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"Mr. Knight's accomplished book, illustrated by excellent photographs, is one that no cricketer's library should be without."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"The book appeals to every one who knows how to appreciate good writing, interesting information, and sound advice."—LEEDS MERCURY.

THE MOTOR YEAR-BOOK FOR 1906. Edited by H. MASSAC BUIST. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"It is a valuable addition to the literature on motoring subjects."—AUTOMOBILE CLUB JOURNAL.

"Covers ably, lightly, and well the subjects which are of interest to car-owners, while, above all, everything is concise and compact."—AUTOMOTOR JOURNAL.

"A work which should prove of great value to all interested in the subject, whether for pleasure or commercial uses."—MORNING POST.

"It is likely to outlive many more pretentious volumes, both by reason of its literary as well as historical merit."—STANDARD.

"The whole ground of the automobile movement of to day is pretty well covered."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

THE MANOR AND MANORIAL RECORDS. By NATHANIEL J. HONE. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Hone is a model of lucidity and interest."—MORNING LEADER.

"One of the best popular accounts of a very interesting but little understood institution."—STANDARD.

"Altogether an extremely interesting volume on the position and significance of the manor in history."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

THE CITIES OF SPAIN. By EDWARD HUTTON. With many Illustrations, 24 of which are in Colour by A. W. RIMINGTON. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Here is an attempt to present to the modern reader a vivid picture of Spain as it is and as it was. Mr. Hutton has made a pilgrimage of the country, and he has endeavoured by living among the people, and by immersing himself in the history and traditions of this most fascinating land, to gather vivid and sympathetic impressions. From the Pyrenees to Gibraltar the cities and the country districts are fully described, and separate chapters are devoted to the great towns, while the splendid remains of Moorish civilisation, the great cathedrals and the treasures in the galleries, receive a detailed attention. But above all it has been Mr. Hutton's endeavour to paint the life of the people with a true and sympathetic brush.

THE MAKING OF AN ORATOR. By J. O'CONNOR POWER. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

The object of this book is to indicate in popular language a course of practice in oratory based on the writer's observation and experience in the House of Commons, at the Bar, and on the Platform. It is intended for the use of students, young or old, who have had no practice in public speaking, and for speakers who are not unwilling to consider suggestions made by another.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY; ; or, Science in the State and in the School; being Selection from the Presidential Addresses (1900-1905) of Sir WILLIAM HUGGINS, K.C.B., O.M., D.C.L., F.R.S. With numerous Illustrations, royal 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The four Presidential Addresses treat of subjects of great and general interest,—namely, what science, as represented by the Royal Society, has done in the past, and is doing now, for the nation; and the place and importance of science in education.

PICTORIAL GARDENING. By G. F. MILLIN. With many Illustrations, crown 8vo 3s. 6d. net.

This is an attempt to apply the principles of the landscape painter's art to the formation of small gardens.

LINCOLN. By E. MANSELL SYMPSON, M.A., M.D. Illustrated by E. H. NEW. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"Lincoln has now found an historian worthy in all respects of zeal and competency. . . . A great additional attraction to this scholarly work will be found in the numerous and beautiful illustrations of Mr. E. H. New."—NOTES AND QUERIES.

"A delightfully fresh account of all its ancient glories and present charm."—STANDARD.

BRISTOL. By ALFRED HARVEY. Illustrated by E. H. NEW. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

WORDS OF THE ANCIENT WISE: Thoughts from Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. Arranged by W. H. D. ROUSE, M.A., D.Litt. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A HANDBOOK OF CLIMBERS, TWINERS, AND WALL SHRUBS. By H. PUREFOY FITZGERALD. With 35 Illustrations, fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

This book is a companion to the Handbook of Garden Plants, by Mrs. Batson. It is intended to be a guide to all plants that can be used for climbing up walls, arches, pergolas, tree-stumps, and such like places, and gives concisely directions as to propagation, treatment, times of flowering, and other details. The plants dealt with are those that can be grown out of doors in the British Islands, and include some that require slight protection in winter.

OXFORDSHIRE. By F. G. BRABANT. Illustrated by E. H. NEW and from Photographs. Small post 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

PETROL PETER; or, Mirth for Motorists. By A. WILLIAMS. Illustrated in Colour by A. W. MILLS. Demy 4to, 3s. 6d. net.

Under the above title appears a skit on the ever-popular Strawwelpeter. The author, Mr. Archibald Williams, taking automobilism for his theme, portrays its legal restrictions, its dangers both physical and financial; the perils of invention and absent-mindedness.

COUNSELS OF LIFE. Edited by E. F. MATHESON. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

A Volume of Selections in Prose.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL. By GEORGE CLINCH. Illustrated by BEATRICE ALCOCK and from Photographs. Small post 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

THE EAST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE. By J. E. MORRIS. Illustrated, small post 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE. By WAKELING DRY. With 40 Illustrations, small post 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

TWELFTH NIGHT. By W. SHAKESPEARE. Edited by MORTON LUCK. Demy 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

THE FAITH OF THE BIBLE. By J. A. CROSS. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

A SCHOOL HISTORY OF WARWICKSHIRE. By B. C. A. WINDLE, D.Sc., F.R.S. With many Illustrations, crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS OF THOMAS CHATTERTON. Paper, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF ST. FRANCIS. Translated by W. HEYWOOD. Paper, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net.

Messrs. METHUEN'S New Illustrated Announcement List and Quarterly Bulletin are sent free to any address.

METHUEN & CO., 36 ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	517	Greek at the Universities . . . . .	527
Literature:		A Literary Cause: . . . . .
A Buck of the Eighteenth		Shakespeare in the Remainder
Century . . . . .	519	Market . . . . .	528
An Anthropologist on the		Fiction . . . . .	529
Moral Judgment . . . . .	521	Fine Art: . . . . .
English Prosody . . . . .	522	The German Exhibitions . . . . .	531
Two Points of View . . . . .	523	Gainsborough Studies and
A Conservative View of St.		Drawings . . . . .	532
Paul . . . . .	524	Music: . . . . .
Portraiture . . . . .	525	Grieg's Piano Music . . . . .	532
Gleanings or Winnings . . . . .	525	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	533
An Extension Guide to Athens	526	Correspondence . . . . .	533
Euthanasia . . . . .	527	Books Received . . . . .	534

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

ONE of many interesting questions opened by Mr. Quiller-Couch in his book of months, "From a Cornish Window," is that of the relation of the poet and man of letters to the State. It is especially interesting because Mr. Quiller-Couch holds his opinions not only strongly but clearly. Read "February," and see how he speaks of the spurious patriotism that says: "Be lustful, be vengeful, and play the game to win"; the spirit of bounce and grab that has too much defaced our literature since a greater poet than the braggers took to singing of the Empire. With that spirit Mr. Quiller-Couch contrasts the Celtic spirit, which is occupied with the universal truth, not the "local success," and he quotes some beautiful verses by Mr. Herbert Trench.

But if you stop short at "February," you will not have got to the bottom of the matter. Turn on to "July," and you will find a brave protest against the notion that literature should feed upon itself, that the poet should hold aloof from the politics and the national life of his country. "Art for art's sake" is a cant phrase with which Mr. Quiller-Couch has no patience. It is "one of the joys of life to have outlived it." "An artist," runs his concluding sentence, "exists to serve his art, and his art to serve men and women." So that, whether you write wrongly of your country or hold aloof from her altogether, you equally incur Mr. Quiller-Couch's censure.

Few will doubt that his second contention is right (his first is obviously so). The divorce of literature from life is, as we have had occasion to point out before, the gravest danger that literature or life can incur. It is not, of course, that all poets should be Laureates, writing of anniversaries, royal accouchements and the events of the day; but that, unless a poet has a knowledge and a feeling of something that exists outside himself, and of himself as part of a great whole, he cannot write good poetry. To regard the world as a show placed in front of him to tickle his emotions and wits, is to become barren of power and effect. To realise the ever wider circles that surround him—the family, the state, humanity, the Infinite—is to be alive and active in every part, to be a whole man, and therefore a whole poet; to be enabled to create or to increase a spirit, a temper, an atmosphere in which other men and women can breathe deep and live fully.

Mr. Quiller-Couch's words on the universal in Celtic poetry are among many wise things to be found in a brave, amusing, varied and stimulating book. But the spirit is, happily, not confined to the Celts. In a little book or periodical, "For the Fellowship," Part ii., published privately by Mr. Henry Bryan Binns, we find the spirit expressed over and over again in verses that are full of the consciousness of "the circles," and reveal an attitude to life at once high-hearted and humble. Mr. Binns has chosen to adopt the Whitmanic form for his thoughts, as a devout student and biographer of Whitman may be allowed to do. His matter has just the qualities which Whitman, to his great disadvantage, lacked.

The letters from our correspondents, Mr. Edmund F. Ludlow and Mr. Paterson, which will be found in another column, are interesting. When Canon Ainger produced impromptu in company a rhyme to "porringer," did he imagine he had invented it? Did he think that he had invented it? There is a third supposition that he did not pretend to have invented it, but merely produced it as quotation from a ballad which he knew, and the company did not. The narration of the story, so far as we remember, in Miss Sichel's Life of Canon Ainger does not state whether this was so or not. Supposing that he had never heard of the ballad, the episode shows in rather charming fashion two men, centuries apart, both struck by the same happy idea. Supposing he did once know the ballad and had forgotten it, it opens up all sorts of questions of psychology—memory conscious and unconscious—association of ideas and so forth. But instances of apparent plagiarism are so numerous (the Law Courts have seen one lately, in the matter of a play) that they cease to arouse wonders.

Lovers of mediæval England will be glad to hear that the necessary repairs have been taken in hand at Croyland Abbey, and will hope that all the money that is required will be speedily forthcoming. Croyland Abbey is no longer as Kingsley described it in "Hereward the Wake": "a vast range of high-peaked buildings, founded on piles of oak and alder driven into the fen, itself built almost of timber from the Bruneswold, barns, granaries, stables, workshops, strangers' hall fit for the boundless hospitality of Croyland . . . with the great minster towering up, a steep pile, half wood half stone, with narrow-headed windows and leaden roofs, and above all the great wooden tower from which on high days chimed out the melody of the seven famous bells, which had not their like in English land." To-day there is a ruined nave, a part of the central tower and of the magnificent west front, as well as the north aisle, which has been turned into a church. Tennyson has immortalised the beauties of the Wolds, but "Holland" lacks a sacred bard. And yet Tennyson, as a Cambridge man, was in debt to the Abbey. At the beginning of the twelfth century poverty made the Abbot send out begging monks, who began to lecture with such success to the people of Cambridge that in a short time there was not a barn or even a church in the town large enough to hold the hearers. This is supposed, not without reason, to have been the origin of Cambridge University.

The recent death of Mrs. Sarah Hines revives the memory of "Jack Sheppard," since she was the owner of the cottage on Dollis Hill, mentioned in that famous book. How few the relics of that time! Gone is the low wooden railing within which there stood the triple tree of Tyburn, and it is probable that a convent covers the place of execution. Gone, too, it is needless to say, is "the beautiful green lane" which the handsome young stranger followed as he went on horseback from Oxford Road to Willesden, and probably Ainsworth himself would have some difficulty in recognising Wych Street, where the woollen draper, Mr. Kneebone, lived.

A striking and original sight was witnessed in Venice on Thursday last, when the children—boys and girls alike—of the infant schools were gathered together to the number of three thousand five hundred to sing on the steps of the Church of the Salute. The idea of this form of chorus-singing in the open air sprang from the Maestro Wolf-Ferrari, the Director of the Musical Liceo in Venice, and was crowned with success. Under the shadow of the great church, which was built as a thankoffering for the cessation of the plague in the seventeenth century, were ranged the boys and girls in holiday attire; the girls being all massed against the building, the boys being placed beneath them. The scene was wonderfully beautiful. The hour chosen was 6 P.M., when the sun was sloping to the west, and every dome, tower and steeple was touched and gilded with his departing rays: while on the square of the Salute the little figures of the children formed vivid patches of colour against the grey walls of stone which formed the background.

The youthful choristers, who sang in unison, were accompanied by the town band, and the hymn of four verses which they sang was a thanksgiving to the Father of Heaven, who maketh His sun to rise, His rain to fall on all alike in lavish, full abundance. The words were written for the occasion by Signora Maria Pezzè-Pascolato, whose elegy on the fall of the Campanile in 1902 has stamped her as one of modern Italy's real poets, and the music was an adaptation of an old Sicilian sea-song. The hymn was admirably rendered; the blending of the voices was first-rate, while the attention given to time, tune, light and shade was as good as could be desired.

The scene above and around the Church was extraordinary, and such as can only be had in Venice. Balconies, roofs and pinnacles were all turned to account, some of the positions looking horribly dangerous, and making many a safer-placed spectator shudder. On the Grand Canal all traffic was stopped, and boats, barges and gondolas were wedged together in such close proximity as to offer an easy passage to any one who chose to step from boat to boat over the hidden waters of Venice's chief highway. The success of this open-air concert reflects the greatest credit on all concerned, and will, we trust, be repeated as often as possible.

Colonel Newcome, Mr. Tree's new part in the play of that name which was produced at His Majesty's Theatre on Friday, does not give that eminent actor the same chances as Oliver Twist did. Indeed, for the first two acts, we see very little of the Colonel, and what we do see is comparatively unimportant. It is not until the later scenes, when the Colonel is old and broken, that Mr. Tree's peculiar gifts of character-acting find their field, and then, it is needless to say, he makes full use of them. The third act shows him in Clive's lodging (little Rosey has already been killed off in an interval) suffering under the lash of the old Campaigner's tongue, and being cheerful and patient by an effort, proud and hopeful and very pathetic; and the last act shows his death (the author of the play makes him die in the courtyard at Greyfriars, and die alone) with the famous "Adsum!" on his lips.

There has been a good deal of feeling and of judgment before the event paraded over this play—with the natural result that the "first night" on Tuesday was something of a demonstration in Mr. Tree's favour. "I feel," he said in his speech on the fall of the curtain, "that we have won"—words in themselves sufficient to show the temper of the occasion. Mr. Tree and Mr. Michael Morton, the adapter, have "won," we believe, in the sense that they have secured a popular success. The reputation of Thackeray as a novelist, which has been dragged into the discussion, does not matter, for the simple reason that it must remain above and beyond any effects induced by adapters of his novels into plays. The reputation of Mr. Michael Morton, the brave man who attacked the Herculean task of turning such a novel as "The Newcomes" into something so utterly different as a play, is in the hands of those who see his work.

The St. James's Amateur Dramatic Club, to whose performances we have referred before, produced on Wednesday of last week that very dismal drama, One Summer's Day. The choice was not a happy one: though it is interesting to witness a play which concentrates into one focus the vulgarity and stupidity and unreality of the average English Drama. To be quite frank, these ambitious and clever young ladies and gentlemen (to their credit be it said) seem more at home with Shakespeare than with Mr. H. V. Esmond. They were ill at ease and oppressed by the witless dialogue and their oppression was contagious. Mr. George Hayes and Mr. Denney Bower however acted with great spirit and Mr. Henry Welti is a recruit who promises very well. As the sulky gypsy Seth he was beyond all praise. Mr. F. Stanley Smith has been seen to greater advantage in romantic plays, not only here but at other dramatic clubs. He can simulate the lover in blank verse with greater ease than in prose: though in fairness it must be said his protagonist was not very encouraging. Miss Kathleen Fearnhead alone among the ladies got the better of her part, and Miss Rooker was a worthy successor to Miss Constance Collier, who created the melodramatic Chiara.

All bibliophiles are excited over the sale of pre-Shakespearean plays which is to take place at Messrs. Sotheby's on June 30. In "the library of a gentleman in Ireland" (we can get no more exact details) there have been discovered seventeen plays all printed between 1660 and 1680. No play hitherto unknown to scholars has been found, but in one or two cases the particular edition now brought to light has no fellow. So that the event will not add materially to our knowledge of those first efforts of the English drama which filled the years before the coming of Marlowe and the great Elizabethan outburst.

Those were interesting years to the student of the drama. The Miracles had died down, the Moralities turned harsh and crabbed. There was life in the Interludes, as they were called, which Thomas Heywood introduced in the reign of Henry VIII., little dramatic (not very dramatic according to our notions) pieces that could be acted in the halls of Colleges and Inns after dinner. And then, too, there was the classical influence, which was beginning to be felt, and the plays on classical lines which some few writers tried to introduce. When Nicholas Udall wrote his "comedy" of Ralph Roister Doister, he called it a comedy not because it was funny (Mr. Alfred Pollard has with greater justice in a different sense called The Play of Mak in the Mysteries our first English comedy), but because it was modelled on the lines of the comoedia of Plautus; and in that deplorably dull work, Gorboduc or Ferrex and Porrex, our first English tragedy, the classical influence is clear. It was not along those lines that our drama was to develop. We owe something to the sense of form and action which these experimenters introduced; we owe far more to the native stuff of Heywood. The ebb and flow of classicism can be traced all through our literature; but the turn of the tide was never so striking as in the days of the great Elizabethan drama.

Messrs. Sotheby will on Wednesday, June 6, and three following days sell a large number of books from the libraries of the late Mr. Edward Viles, Haverstock Hill, the late Harrison Weir and the late Frederick Burbidge, and other properties. Amongst the most notable are an Ackerman's History of the University of Cambridge, an edition of Burns's Poetical Works (1822) which had belonged to Colonel Burns (one of the poet's sons) and has his signature on the second volume, Keats's Lamia (first edition), first editions of many old novels illustrated by H. K. Browne, Turner, Alken, Heath, Rowlandson, Thackeray and others. An interesting feature of the sale is a large number of original drawings and sketches by Harrison Weir.

We have received from Professor William Knight the report of the annual meeting of the Dove Cottage, Grasmere (Wordsworth), National Trust, held last Monday. All goes well with the Trust. The number of visitors for the year ending May 1 last was ninety-five more than in any previous year, and the Trustees are able to increase the invested Capital Fund. During the year past the Trust has lost two valued members, Mr. George Lillie Craik (of Messrs. Macmillan's), who was one of its original members and its secretary, and Mr. C. E. Mathews, also an original member of the Board. Their places have been taken on the Board by Canon Beeching and Mr. George Walter Prothero, and Mr. Etherington Smith becomes Honorary Secretary.

The methods of choosing books in the average provincial public library do not seem to be entirely satisfactory. Failing the official lists, which are sometimes insufficient and sometimes out of date, library authorities must rely upon the reviews in trustworthy periodicals, and upon personal inspection of books. Reviews are of some assistance, but not to the extent that many people believe.

A good review does not always clearly and fully describe a book's subject, but will confine its remarks to a controversial point of great interest to specialists, but not very comprehensible to the book-selector. What the reviewer seeks is new information, fresh arguments. The book-selector wishes to know whether a book is elementary, or very technical, or popular, or advanced, or for specialists, or whether it is illustrated with maps, diagrams or engravings; in the case of every book he meets with he must ask himself whether he has readers for it, or whether he can get readers for it; and the reviews as a rule do not help him to answer the questions. Moreover, the leading journals have not the space to review many books of considerable value to libraries, especially manuals and technical works of all kinds.

Except in the case of libraries near the great centres, personal inspection of books is out of the question, because publishers and booksellers will not send out books on sale or return. The public librarian, then, must make his selection in the best way he can; the result is what might be expected. In many small provincial libraries will be found, not well-knit, and workmanlike collections of books, but what bookmen know as "job-lots"—odds and ends of literature, thrown together without system and without knowledge. Library authorities are not to blame. Circumstances are too strong for them. But they might combine to publish a monthly periodical list giving pithy descriptions of the publications most likely to be useful to municipal libraries, especially to provincial libraries. The large libraries ought to take the lead in assisting the smaller to solve this extremely important question.

Mr. Gerald Massey, hailed by Walter Savage Landor, fifty years ago, as "a new Keats," and of whom Matthew Arnold did not consider Tennyson, "except for the first moment of publication, a serious rival," entered his seventy-ninth year on Tuesday. Mr. Massey's "Ballad of Babe Christabel" created great interest on its publication in 1854; and Hugh Miller's estimate of the poet's "Craig-crook Castle" has an enhanced interest from the circumstance that it was the last literary criticism that came from his pen. "With all his marked individuality of genius," wrote Miller in the Witness, "Gerald Massey reminds us more of Keats than of any other English poet; but with the same rare perception of external beauty he adds a lyrical power and a depth of feeling which Keats did not possess. He has but to give his intellect as full scope as his fancy and imagination, and to bestow on his powers that elaboration and care which high excellence demands from even the happiest geniuses, in order to become one of the enduring lights of British literature."

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—On Tuesday next (June 5) at five o'clock, Colonel V. Balck concludes his course of two lectures on "Northern Winter Sports: Sweden and its People." On Thursday next (June 7) at five o'clock Professor William J. Sollas concludes his course of three lectures on "Mars and the Glacial Period"; and on Saturday next (June 2) at three o'clock Professor W. Macneile Dixon lectures on "Inspiration in Poetry." At the Friday evening meeting on June 8 at nine o'clock Professor Sir James Dewar lectures on "Studies on Charcoal and Liquid Air." These are the final lectures of the season.

Anglo-Russian Literary Society, Imperial Institute, S.W.—On Tuesday June 5, at 3 P.M., Mr. John Pollen will read a paper on "Russian Proverbs."

Linnean Society of London.—Evening meeting, Thursday, June 7, at 8 P.M., when the following Papers will be read; On two new species of Populus from Darjeeling, by Mr. H. H. Haines, F.L.S., etc.; Biscayan Plankton, Part VIII. The Cephalopoda, by Mr. W. E. Hoyle, M.A., etc.; Part IX. The Medusae, by Mr. E. T. Browne, F.Z.S., etc.

London County Council.—Exhibition of pictures for school decoration, to be held at the Council's Central School of Arts and Crafts, 316 Regent Street, W. The Exhibition will be open from 4 to 10 P.M., from Monday, June 11, to Saturday, June 16, inclusive. The pictures, which are German coloured lithographs, have been placed on the Council's requisition list as being of a less conventional character than many of the black and white plates hitherto supplied to public elementary schools. The lithographs are the outcome of an art movement in Germany, which has for its objects the closer and less artificial connection with nature, and the improvement of technique in the reproduction of colour. They are examples of the work of living German artists. The originals have been specially painted with a view to their reproduction in colours and every stone requisite to their reproduction has been prepared by the artist himself. The Council, through the medium of this exhibition, hopes to encourage the production of a series of pictures of this kind of a distinctly English character.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson.—Friday, June 1, at one o'clock. Sale of china, jewellery, miniatures, enamels, silver, Sheffield plate, furniture and early engraved seals.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Wednesday, June 6, to Saturday, June 9, inclusive. Sale of the libraries of the late Edward Viles, Harrison Weir and Frederick W. Burbidge.

LITERATURE

A BUCK OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Buck Whaley's Memoirs. Including his journey to Jerusalem. Edited with introduction and notes by Sir EDWARD SULLIVAN, Bart. (Moring, 21s. net.)

THIS is an extraordinary book, and the manuscript, as was befitting, has had a remarkable history. It is known to have been in existence since 1800, the year in which Thomas Whaley, or Buck Whaley as he was generally called, died. He had evidently proposed to publish it during his life-time, because certain arrangements were made towards doing so by subscription, but perhaps the publishers of that time were not sufficiently enterprising. At any rate, for more than a hundred years it has been knocking about, until Sir Edward Sullivan, who figures as its editor, attracted by the beautiful Irish binding, picked it up in a London auction room. It consisted of two handsome quarto volumes bound in red morocco, inlaid and tooled in gold, and lettered on the back: "Travels by T. W." The book, however, scarcely does justice to the author. Buck, or Jerusalem Whaley, was born on December 15, 1766. He was the son of a man of considerable property, and in his early days seems to have had more money than he knew what to do with. There is a memorial of his father existing in the shape of a cheque which he once drew on La Touche's bank in favour of his wife, probably, as the editor says, the only example of such a document ever written in rhyme.

Mr. La Touche,
Open your p'rch,
And give unt. my darling
Five hundred pounds sterling;
For which this wil lbe your bailey,
Signed, Richard Chape Whaley.

Young Whaley, upon his father's death, became entitled to estates worth £7000 a year together with £60,000 in cash. At the age of sixteen he was sent to France to complete his education, with an allowance of £900 a year, surely as unwise a proceeding as could have been thought of. He ran riot in France for some time and then returned to Dublin, the Dublin of which Burns at that very time was writing:

As sure's the deil's in hell,
Or Dublin City.

It was the day of the Bucks and the Hell-Fire Club, a day of gambling and violence, of luxury and immorality, of drink and love of devilry in general; and the young Buck Whaley seems to have entered into it with all the zest of youth and irresponsibility. The journey to Jerusalem, which earned him his nick-name of Jerusalem Whaley, was undertaken on account of a wager. He was at dinner one day at the Duke of Leinster's when some one asked where he was going to next. Without a moment's hesitation he answered: "Jerusalem." Some of those present were sceptical as to the existence of such a place, and all of them expressed doubts of his ever getting there. Whereupon Whaley "offered to bet any sum" that he would go to Jerusalem and return within two years from his departure. The bets he made on the result amounted to fifteen thousand pounds, which he won. The expenses of the expedition had been eight thousand pounds, so that he was seven thousand pounds to the good, "the only instance," he says, "in all my life before in which any of my projects turned out to my advantage." A spendthrift, a gambler, and a roué, he lived a life full of adventure, and the extent to which gambling went in those days may be inferred from the fact that George IV., when Prince of Wales, met Whaley at the gaming-table and the commoner not only relieved his princely opponent of vast sums of cash, but in the end succeeded by a grand coup in annexing a Favorita of His Royal Highness, whom her ungallant protector had in a moment of desperation staked as his only marketable asset.

These were times in which men and women staked not only their money, but their lands and even their honour. All this is told in a long and most interesting preface. The book itself reads in part like a piece of realism by Defoe, in parts like so many chapters out of a picaresque novel. Those passages which are most instructive as to the manners of the time are the least quotable. Such is the adventure with the Princess Rohan. Mr. Whaley seems to have been as susceptible to the influence of petticoats as to that of the gaming-table, and some very singular intrigues are narrated in the early part of the book. The following is a fair example of the kind of thing that the reader will find in these pages:

They had taken care to provide a handsome company of female beauties who, by their persuasion and example induced me to sacrifice so liberally to Bacchus at dinner, that before the dessert was introduced the glasses seemed to dance before me. Nothing would then satisfy them, but we must drink champagne out of pint rummers, which soon completed the business.

When I was in a proper state for them to begin their operations, they one and all proposed playing at hiding the horse. I was in no condition to refuse anything, and soon acceded to their proposal, and without being scarcely conscious that I was engaged in it, I lost fourteen thousand eight hundred pounds on my parole, exclusive of my ready money, carriage, jewels, etc. I know not why they even stopped here; for I was in such a state that they might have stripped me of my whole fortune. I cannot, however, feel myself much indebted for this instance of their forbearance. They contented themselves for the present with a bill for the amount, which I drew on La Touche's Bank, and [I] then went to bed in a state of torpid insensibility.

According to his own account, if he had been a millionaire he would have gone through his capital. How his money went will be shown from the following passage:

This Mr. P— gave me letters of credit on all the principal towns which I visited. I drew on him from all parts of France, and whenever I owed him £2000 he sent me two bills of exchange, as first and second, on my banker at Dublin, of the same amount for me to sign, which I always did without hesitation. But when I came afterwards to settle with my agent at home, I found that many of these bills had been paid twice over. This vile negotiator had drawn them in such a manner as to make them appear of different tenour and dates. All my attempts to rectify this mistake and recover the money have hitherto been fruitless: for whenever I wished him to confront my checks with his letters of exchange, he always found some pretence or other to prevent the investigation. I have reproached him in his own house with the infamy of his conduct; and this I have done at a time when it was so dangerous to have any difference with a man who was flourishing under the reign of Robespierre. I can assert with truth and upon my honour, that I do not think I have been defrauded of less than ten thousand pounds in this manner. So much for the honesty of a foreign banker.

Buck Whaley does not suffer from the vice of too much reticence and appears to have been as innocent of shame as were our first parents who ate the forbidden fruit. After returning to Dublin he declares that the quiet life there did not suit him.

I sent over to London for a female companion, with whom I had been intimate, and who immediately accepted the invitation. I had no motive whatever in giving her the preference but that she was an exotic. My inamorata was neither distinguished for wit or beauty; but I will do her the justice to say that she had none of that rapacity and extravagance so common with the generality of her profession. What I expended on her account was from my own free will and suggestion. I hired her a magnificent house, suitably furnished, and settled an allowance of five hundred a year on her; this was merely pro forma, for she cost me upwards of five thousand. At her house I kept my midnight orgies, and saw my friends, according to the fashionable acceptance of the word.

This, too, proved a life much too quiet for him, and he thought of performing, like Cook, a voyage round the world. No sooner did the idea suggest itself to his mind than he flew off to Plymouth with his female companion at his side, in order to purchase a vessel of two hundred and eighty tons burthen and to carry twenty-two guns. He eventually ordered a builder to construct one of this description for ten thousand pounds. This was the state of affairs when the Jerusalem idea was suggested in the manner which has already been described. He intended to have taken the lady with him.

But the inconveniences of a female companion in traversing so much sea and land were pointed out to me in such a manner as induced me to give up that part of my scheme; and I accordingly left her in London on an allowance of two hundred a year, which was regularly paid her till all my property was sold.

The travels form the least interesting part of the story, although those who have gone over the same route since will find it of great interest to compare those places in Asia Minor as they were in the latter part of the eighteenth century with their condition to-day. At the end of his career his fortunes were broken. In his destitution he was forced to take lodging in the neighbourhood of Moorfields, and the account of his life there might almost have been drawn verbatim from one of the eighteenth-century novels. He could not stir out except on Sunday, and he had only one faithful servant in addition to one of his lodging companions, who never seemed to be far away from him. In the end a waiter at Brooks's, to whom he was indebted for four hundred pounds, served a writ on him and, in spite of his sword and pistol coupled with the efforts of his landlord and servant, he was surrounded by twenty constables and taken.

But my companion, who was at that time very ill, entreated me not to hazard my life in opposing so many, who could not fail to overpower me in the end. Her entreaties, and a conviction in my own mind that resistance would be in vain, induced me at length to surrender; upon which I was instantly conveyed to the Bridewell, a prison solely designed for thieves and murderers.

My female friend intended to accompany me, but was refused admittance; and I was thrust into a common room, amidst wretched criminals of all descriptions. I represented to the jailor that I was not committed on a charge of any crime, and that I was a gentleman. "That may be," said the jailor: "but here we make no distinction but according to the money a man can afford to spend. I have excellent champagne and claret, and if you choose to call for either, I can accommodate you with one of my own apartments." I acceded to the proposal and was shown into a room, which, immediately upon my entrance, suggested an idea of my being able to effect my escape.

He plied his jailor with champagne and would have managed to get away if it had not been for the jailor's daughter, "a stout athletic wench," who seized him and carried him off to the common room, where he would have been very roughly handled but for the accident of his possessing ten guineas, with which he appeased the crew that had assembled. He died at a very early age, but, as will be apparent from the last sentences in the book, with a certain odour of sanctity about him.

AN ANTHROPOLOGIST ON THE MORAL JUDGMENT

The Origin and Development of Moral Ideas. By EDWARD WESTERMARCK, PH.D. In 2 vols. Vol. i. (Macmillan, 14s. net.)

WE are all for natural history in these days. And, in the general rush for "origins," it is right and proper that moral concepts should get their share of attention. Indeed, they are in no danger of missing it. What with Psychology, Biology and Anthropology, Moral Philosophy is in a fair way to suffer rather from over-attention than from neglect. She has grown somewhat flustered of late, apologetic, and uncertain of her own identity. She would be none the worse now for a short breathing-space in which to "find herself" once more.

To the Anthropological side of these latter-day moral investigations Dr. Westermarck's new book is a valuable contribution. The title of the work—"The Origin and Development of Moral Ideas"—is certainly no small one. But then neither is Dr. Westermarck a small man. He has established his position already in the front rank of living anthropologists. Few books on any anthropological subject have been so widely read, and so generally appreciated, as his earlier work, "History of Human Marriage." We have come to expect that anything from his pen will be both learned and interesting. And this new book of his does not disappoint us.

No one can question the learning. The width of research which the purely anthropological part of the work reveals is amazing. The lay mind may, indeed, stagger under the weight of detail; but as a storehouse of information with regard to the history of the attitude of the human race towards certain universal problems of conduct Dr. Westermarck's book will be invaluable.

Nor, indeed, is the interest of the book less considerable than the learning. Whatever else may be said of the comparative study of moral ideas, it may at least be claimed for it that it is a catholic and a "humane" study. It must "come home" to all of us. This native interest of the subject has not suffered at the hand of Dr. Westermarck. His book remains, at the end of any possible criticism of detail or of any possible divergence of opinion as to the conclusions to which the facts in one case or another may point, essentially interesting. There are, indeed, few dull pages: and in a book of more than seven hundred pages this is no slight thing to say.

The book divides itself into two main parts. The first of these, comprising chapters i. to xiv., approaches the subject from the more purely philosophical side, dealing with the question of the origin and nature of Moral Judgment as such. It concerns itself first with the psychology of that Judgment, of which it finds the explanation in certain so-called "Moral" emotions which precede it. It then proceeds to the discussion of some of the problems connected with the nature of Moral Judgments—the formative influence, e.g., of custom; the question how far moral judgments relate to anything except the Will; the extent to which intellectual competence is a necessary condition of moral responsibility; the importance, from the point of view of moral theory, of determinism. These, it will be seen, are large questions, which involve neither more nor less than a complete moral philosophy.

The second part of the book, which begins with the fifteenth chapter, and is apparently to be carried through the second volume, is of a more purely anthropological character. It gives us the history of the content of the moral consciousness of mankind in relation to certain recognised problems of conduct: what men have thought at different times, and in different countries, about sacrifice, about murder, about slavery, about charity, and so on.

Dr. Westermarck would, perhaps, have done better to have kept these two subjects—viz., the history of actual moral judgments and the analysis of the moral judgment as such—for separate books. Interesting as is the philosophical discussion at the beginning of the present volume, it is still in a sense out of place. It is too full to be a mere introduction; and it is hardly full enough to be an adequate treatment, on their own merits, of the problems involved.

The thesis which Dr. Westermarck is at pains to develop is the thesis that "moral concepts are ultimately based on emotions, either of indignation or approval." "Whilst not affirming the actual existence of any specific emotion in the mind of the person judging or of anybody else, the predicate of a moral judgment attributes to the subject a tendency to arouse an emotion" (p. 4).

We do not feel sure that there is not here, and elsewhere in Dr. Westermarck's discussion, some confusion between the conditions under which judgments of a certain type emerge, and the content of those judgments when they have emerged.

Few people would be disposed to deny that what Dr. Westermarck calls "moral emotions" precede moral judgments, in the history of the race as of the individual. In emotion much, no doubt, is present implicitly which only becomes explicit in the judgment. We should most of us go with Dr. Westermarck so far; and should feel, further, that anthropology may have much to teach us of those stages in man's growth at which his life and conduct are controlled more by the implicit forces of emotion than by explicit judgments. To admit this, however, is not at all to admit that in the judgment itself nothing more is made explicit than the bare fact of an emotion, or even of a tendency to excite an emotion. Most of us would feel that in a moral judgment we are predicating—or claiming to predicate, and that comes to the same thing—a positive quality, which, while it does unquestionably tend to arouse an emotion of approval or disapproval, is nevertheless not itself merely such a tendency. Suppose, however, that we allow, for the moment, to Dr. Westermarck his formal account of moral judgments as those in which the predicate attributes to the subject a tendency to arouse a moral emotion—there remains the question, an emotion in whom? It can hardly be said that Dr. Westermarck has given a clear and consistent answer to this question. It is perfectly true that he says (p. 105): "Even he who fully sees their limitations," i.e., the limitations of moral judgments, must admit that when he pronounces an act to be good or bad, he gives expression to something more than a personal opinion, that his judgment has reference not only to his own feelings, but to the feelings of others as well.

This, no doubt, represents Dr. Westermarck's most common view. But he can be just as explicit, in a very different direction, elsewhere. What, for instance, are we to make of the following statement (p. 17)?

If I say that it is wrong to resist evil, and yet resistance to evil has no tendency to call forth in me an emotion of moral disapproval, then my judgment is false.

The criterion of the truth or falsity of a moral judgment is found in the emotions, not of "other persons," but of the person judging. If stealing does not tend to arouse a feeling of disapproval in me, then my judgment, "stealing is wrong," is untrue; in other words, stealing is not wrong. This is subjectivism pure and simple. Dr. Westermarck, while he has no objection to the name, still regards his own "Ethical Subjectivism" as different from any of the ordinary forms of that doctrine. How different?

One answer to this question is apparently given on p. 19:

Ethical Subjectivism does not allow everybody to follow his own inclinations; nor does it lend sanction to arbitrariness and caprice. Our moral consciousness belongs to our mental constitution, which we cannot change as we please. We approve and we disapprove because we cannot do otherwise. Can we help feeling pain when the fire burns us? Can we help sympathising with our friends?

If these words mean what they say, then in the judgment of Dr. Westermarck, the differentia of "Ethical Subjectivism"—that, at any rate, which distinguishes it from the subjectism of the Sophists (p. 19)—is to be found in the inevitableness of the emotions of approval or disapproval. But this is no differentia. It makes not a particle of difference either to the position of "the Sophist" or to "that beautiful modern Sophism which admits every man's conscience to be an infallible guide" (p. 19). It leaves us still with the individual judgment—or rather with the individual emotion—as the sole criterion of what is right or wrong.

And yet Dr. Westermarck himself does not really mean this. On the very same page he tells us that we "do not and cannot recognise as right everything which is held to be right by anybody, savage or Christian, criminal or saint." That is eminently reassuring. But what becomes of the Subjectivism? And what is now the criterion? How am I, for instance, to know whether, in approving a given course of action, I am, for this purpose, a criminal or a saint? And what becomes of the statement that, if I make the judgment: "X is wrong," my judgment is true only if the idea of X tends to arouse an emotion of disapproval in me?

The fact is, that Dr. Westermarck can hardly be said to have given us a consistent theory of the basis of morality. He clings to the name of Subjectivism: and he talks, at least at times, the language of Subjectivism: but his actual doctrine would seem, if we may judge of it by its most usual presentment, to be something quite different.

It is true that he regards the objectivity of moral judgments as a "chimera" (p. 17), and denies that there are any "general moral truths." It is true also that no act is wrong, in his theory, because of any quality inherent in the act, but solely for the external reason that it is disapproved of. But the disapproval which constitutes the act a wrong one is, Dr. Westermarck would seem most commonly to maintain, a social disapproval: and, certain passages notwithstanding, the standard of rightness would seem to be, not the individual as such, but the sane and civilised individual, in whom the common sentiment of his society finds expression. This is something other than what we mostly mean by Subjectivism.

While, however, the general philosophical discussion which opens Dr. Westermarck's book seems to us to some extent wanting in clearness and consistency, we find there much that is suggestive and interesting. It cannot at the same time be denied that Dr. Westermarck is inclined to assign an exaggerated value to his derivation of moral judgments from moral emotions. Thus on p. 314 we find him asking the "important question" why it is that a moral judgment is essentially passed on a character or will. "The explanation," says Dr. Westermarck, "is not far to seek." It is because moral judgments have their origin in moral (i.e., retributive) emotions.

Now, without in the least questioning the emotional antecedents of moral judgments, we may well object to this so-called explanation that it really explains nothing at all. It is, to say the least, no easier to see why moral emotions should be directed only against a will than it is to see why moral judgments should be so. Indeed, while we never find a moral judgment passed on anything except a will, we do as a matter of fact find moral emotions directed, at least momentarily, against inanimate things. The emotion passes, no doubt, with reflection: but that is because in the reflection it has ceased to be a mere emotion, and has become an emotion plus a judgment. There is no reason why we should find difficulty in the fact that moral judgments are passed on wills rather than on acts. But if we did find this difficulty, we should certainly get no nearer a solution of it by carrying the judgment back to an emotion. Dr. Westermarck, discussing in this connection the case of anger against an inanimate object, remarks that the anger ceases when we reflect that the thing in question is "incapable of feeling pain" (p. 315). This surely is singularly unconvincing. If I hurt my foot against a chair, my anger against the chair passes when I remind myself, not that the chair is incapable of feeling, but that it is incapable of willing. If the chair willed my hurt, I should continue to feel resentment long after I had realised that I could not satisfy my resentment by hurting in return. The emphasis which Dr. Westermarck lays on the connection between moral judgments, as judgments on character, and the sensitive nature of the agents on whom we pass those judgments, is as unexpected as it is unnecessary. Moral emotions, he tells us, give rise to judgments on human character because those emotions are directed against sensitive agents (p. 310). To us it seems that the fact that the agent feels is, by the side of the fact that he wills, so comparatively unimportant as to be, in this connection, almost irrelevant.

On the other hand, we should agree with Dr. Westermarck that moral valuation is consistent with determinism. We should hold, indeed, that the problem of free will deserves a more exhaustive treatment than it has received at his hands; and there are points in his discussion which we should be tempted to challenge. We do not, for instance, feel satisfied that he has done justice to Schopenhauer's theory of the will and character.

Though Schopenhauer [he says] be mistaken in his statement that a person's character always remains the same, it seems to me indisputable that the succeeding changes to which it may be subject are imputable to him also in so far as they are caused by his innate character.

Now, in the theory of Schopenhauer, and, indeed, in any consistent determinism, all "changes" in the character (not some only, but all) are the result of the reaction of the character upon an environment which influences it. They are, therefore, in one sense, no changes at all, but only successive revelations of what was in the character implicitly from the beginning: and it becomes misleading to talk, as Dr. Westermarck does, of a self which is "partly innate and partly the product of external circumstances." Or, at least, this is the language of a less consistent and penetrating determinism than that of Schopenhauer.

With his general conclusion, however, that an agent who wills is morally responsible—i.e., is a fit subject of praise or blame—whatever the history of that will may be, we find ourselves in complete agreement.

We have drawn attention to a few points in which Dr. Westermarck has seemed to us unconvincing. We have intended this only as the criticism which makes appreciation significant. And for the book as a whole—for its learning, its open-mindedness, its catholicity of interest—we have the warmest appreciation. We shall look forward with interest to the appearance of the second volume.

ENGLISH PROSODY

A History of English Prosody from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh. Vol. i.: From the Origins to Spenser. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

THE appearance of this volume is of good augury in respect of the study of literature in England. It is a careful attempt, based upon an exhaustive examination of the whole of the available material, to do for English Literature what has never yet been done in any systematic or co-ordinate fashion. When the three volumes of which the work is to consist are published, a blank in the history of our literature will have been filled. Few people more competent than Professor Saintsbury could have been found for the task. He has the commendable habit of reading widely over, about and concerning his subject before he sits down to write about it. It is a non-professorial habit which has stuck to him from the days when he wrote as a journalist; and the publication of the present work, following closely upon his scholarly "History of Criticism," is a sufficient answer to those who shook their heads in academic doubt when a journalist took the Chair at Edinburgh.

That the work will bring peace in the "fair field full of fighting folk" whereon modern scholars of Prosody "clang battleaxe and clash brand," is not to be hoped; rather will it bring a sword, for the central idea of the book runs counter to many widely-received and much-debated theories. We have no desire to enter upon the field, and will content ourselves with saying that, after a careful study of the book, after checking it again and again in the light of opposing views, we have little hesitation in stating that Professor Saintsbury has set the history of English Prosody upon a firm basis, largely because he has remembered "that the Rule comes from the Work, not the Work from the Rule," and because he has been wise enough to take his examples from amongst the experimenters in novelty just as readily as from the writings of the great. The many minor poets are of as much importance in the history of literature as the great who sum up and embody the variations that are to last. The people who carry on the torch during the dark ages of a transition period are so many feelers, groping, often blindly, often with a strange access of light, towards "fresh Woods, and Pastures new." Many fall by the way, and they serve to make the road firmer for the tread of those who follow after.

Professor Saintsbury dates his Origins at 1100: he is probably right, for little is gained by giving the earlier, inflexional language and its alliterative poetry a greater importance in the history of English literature than it can justly claim.

Exactly [says Professor Saintsbury] how the islands may be dotted across the Behring Straits of 1000-1200 the philologist may be left to settle for himself. It is certain that between the poems of the Exeter Book, which roughly represent the further shore, and the work of Layamon, for instance, which represents the hither, a gulf is fixed, so far as we can judge, far mightier than that between the poems of perhaps seven centuries earlier and those of 1000, than, as we more or less know, that between the poems of seven actual centuries later and those of 1200. From the hither shore, therefore we begin, yet not without consideration of the further, or of the islands between, or of the possible assistances to communication.

The present volume, beginning with the "Ormulum" and a few fragments, of a date probably prior to 1210, discusses the productions of the thirteenth century, "The Owl and the Nightingale," the earlier Romances; devotes Book ii. to the fourteenth century (the curious revival of alliteration receiving ample justice); to Chaucer's and Gower's predecessors and contemporaries, what they had done metrically and what they left their masters to do; investigates, in Book iii., the Ballad literature and the Scottish poets of the fifteenth century, paying due obeisance to the Carol "I sing of a maiden," one of the masterpieces of English poetry; and, in Book iv., arrives at the turn of the tide, the incoming of Italian and Classical influence, the position of Spenser. There will be many knots to unravel in the two volumes that follow; volumes which we shall await with some impatience and curiosity, but the present instalment has convinced us that the whole subject is being dealt with in masterly fashion and we are confident that the remaining volumes will be worthy of their theme. For Professor Saintsbury has that quality which made Hazlitt one of the first of critics, he has gusto, he loves literature. You may disagree with him, you probably will, for he is nothing if not original; you may wish that he would not rely so ostentatiously on commas in the division of his sentences; you may desire a less frequent use of the parenthesis and, as Mark Twain would call it, the all-embracing king-parenthesis; but, when you have let the advocatus diaboli have his innings, there remains sufficient to place the writer of the volume under review in the front rank of English literary historians. Dismal though the word "Prosody" may sound in the ears of nine out of ten people, dismal as the science of political economy, we can promise an agreeable surprise to all readers who possess any ear for music, any appreciation of form, in the story of English rhythm and metre here related. Nor is this brilliant result achieved at the expense of the supporters of opposing schools of thought. There is too much of the desire to score off your opponents in the critical writing of the day; especially among those who concern themselves with the Elizabethans is this evident; some portion of the fighting spirit of those days seems to stir the young blood of to-day, and Teutonic methods of bludgeoning your adversary prevail. Young critics might do worse than go through this "History of Prosody" as a text-book in the art of explaining their own views, without being discourteous to their adversaries. They would find therein that the work is placed first, that great personal labour is necessary before the possession of opinions can be justified, and that, though adversaries have to be met, it is always possible to salute before the attack. Even prize-fighters shake hands.

I thank God [says Professor Saintsbury, in a characteristic passage] for almost everything in English poetry that is good at all; but if I knew where the author of Gamelyn was buried, I should make a pilgrimage thither at the first opportunity, and go to the expense of an extra cake and candle according to the particular ritual that might suit the genius loci.

And later:

he [Robert of Gloucester] is only a promising pupil at a Terpsichorean Academy—the Gamelyn man could do "Liverpool lurch," or "Boston glide," or anything else you like, in open ball-room.

We quote these two passages in conclusion as an evidence of our contention that Professor Saintsbury has gusto, has life; he realises that English literature is a very real thing, that the still small voice of the carol, "I sing of a maiden," and the surge and thunder of war-lyric or ballad are as full of life to-day as when they made the pulses beat and the hearts throb of men who have lain for a century dead.

It is inexpressible [he says truly] what a joy . . . such an internal rhyme as "Under molde hi liggeth colde" gives one. The very bones of an Englishman under the cold mould itself ought to start and tremble at the hearing of them.

Last, let us express a hope that all "critical" and "eclectic" editors of texts will take to heart the following words, than which fewer more full of wisdom could be quoted:

a so-called "critical" text, with its pickings from this manuscript and that, or its reconstruction of a single one according to manufactured rules, may to some extent restore prosodic system, but will always be subject to the doubt whether it in the least resembles what the poet wrote.

As in the case of all books sent out for review by Messrs. Macmillan and Co., the title-page is defaced by the impression of an ugly stamp. It is an act of discourtesy to the person whose opinion they solicit unworthy of a great publishing house.

TWO POINTS OF VIEW

Studies in Architecture. By REGINALD BLOMFIELD, A.R.A. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

Character of Renaissance Architecture. By CHARLES HERBERT MOORE, of Harvard. (Macmillan, 12s. 6d. net.)

AMONG the many acute and stimulating statements that Mr. Reginald Blomfield puts forward in his "Studies" is a reason for the often criticised lack of popularity of architecture in England. He finds the cause in the fact that writers have dealt with architecture here either as an affair of dates and technicalities or as a vehicle for moral disquisition, and he adds that the first method has little interest for the layman and the latter none at all for the artist. Having realised this truth, it will be readily understood that the accomplished historian of "Renaissance Architecture in England" gives us a book as interesting as it is sound. It will appeal to the cultivated general reader, not because Mr. Blomfield is in any way superficial or condescends to the lay intelligence, but because out of the fulness of his knowledge and the sincerity of his desire he is enabled to lay before us the results of his own enthusiastic study and devoted work. For example, "A Hundred Years of the French Renaissance" is an essay dealing in a critical spirit with the most authentic French and English books on the subject published since, roughly, 1880. Here Mr. Blomfield permits us to follow him during his tour of inspection throughout the memorials of sixteenth-century French work. If we will, in exchange for his courtesy, allow him a shade of dogmatism and insistence, we shall find sure delight. The enthusiastic writer often fails to win the reader, but the author of "Studies in Architecture" is sufficiently skilful to thrust his point home and yet leave our old beliefs unhurt. After the essay on "Andrea Palladio" and the "Byzantium or Lombardy," which appeared in the Quarterly, follows one, likely to be welcome to the general reader, on the "Architect of Newgate," that is to say, the old prison that has just passed away, the most imaginative building in London. In this closely argued and well-considered paper Mr. Blomfield traces the probable influence that enabled a commonplace man like George Dance the younger to produce a design remarkably adjusted to its gloomy purpose. This "finest abstract expression of wall surface to be found in western architecture" has been held to be little more than a fluke in the art of building when the rest of Dance's work is considered. But the author doubts whether such fortuitous circumstance is possible in his profession and finds Dance's inspiration in that frequent source—Piranesi's work "La Magnificenze di Roma" in which the "Capricci di Carceri" provide a superabundance of such suggestion. Dance was in Rome when Piranesi was at the height of his fame, a student of his work and possibly his friend. But if the wall of Newgate was by no means an original piece of work we are none the less grateful to Dance for having transplanted an imaginative influence which our native architecture lacked even then, and needed still more at a later date, and might suffer gladly even in our own enlightened age.

Of other essays such as that on "Philibert de l'Orme" and the "Italians at Fontainebleau" we have only space to say that the reader will not find a dull moment in them. Throughout the book the drawings by Mr. Muirhead Bone, by Mr. Fulton and the author are unusually interesting and skilful; the photographs and reproductions informative and clear; the whole volume an intimate and pleasing series of studies of "the most intellectual and technical" and, we may add, at its highest, the most satisfying, of the arts.

In many ways an antithetical method to that of Mr. Blomfield is followed in Dr. Moore's work on "Renaissance Architecture." It inclines to be a matter of dates and technicalities and it by no means neglects the moral side; but it is, at the same time, an extremely clear and interesting account of a vast subject; authoritative, calm, instructive; an admirable handbook and book of reference. How different is his point of view from that of the author of the "Studies" is shown very distinctly by a momentary comparison of opinions on the well-known figures of nymphs by Goujon on what is now called the Fountain of the Innocents. Dr. Moore gives a reprint of Du Cerceau's engraving of the original design; Mr. Blomfield shows us photographs of the figures merely, as they now appear. The former says:

The sculptures by Goujon which adorn this structure have, in my judgment, no monumental qualities, nor any notable merits of design. Their movements are awkward, and their lines ill composed. The influence of the decadent Italian art is marked in them, without any new qualities that should entitle them to distinction.

Mr. Blomfield approaches in another manner:

The smile of La Gioconda is not more subtle and disquieting than those divinely beautiful nymphs on the Fontaine des Innocents. In both there seems some strange enchantment not found in the work of other men, some quality that makes peculiar appeal to sensitive natures. Nothing could better attest the completeness of the French Renaissance than the fact that Goujon's genius was recognised at once. The permanence of his influence on French art is the most enduring tribute to his fame. . . .

It may sound pusillanimous and middle-aged, but there is no doubt that the truth lies somewhere between these two estimates. Jean Goujon's drawing rarely attains to attic beauty; but the elusive, alluring charm which Mr. Blomfield finds and compares with that of Monna Lisa, is there also.

A CONSERVATIVE VIEW OF ST. PAUL

The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ. Boyle Lectures 1903-5. By the Rev. R. J. KNOWLING, D.D., Canon of Durham, and Professor of Divinity in Durham University. (Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.)

OF Dr. Knowling's learning and ability there can be no question; he is, moreover, thoroughly well up in the latest results of criticism, and, although he apparently regards critics who are nothing but critics as opponents of Christianity, he usually states their opinions fairly. But his book is an example of that mixture of apologetic and criticism, so popular in England, which is known as "conservative criticism"—the term is frequently used by Dr. Knowling. A "conservative" critic must be something more or less than a mere critic; in practice he is an apologist who makes a limited use of the critical method. Dr. Knowling's position is clearly indicated by a remark that he makes (p. 295) in regard to the Abbé Loisy's opinion that certain words (Matt. xi. 25-27; Luke x. 21, 22) were not actually spoken by our Lord:

If this is the way to retain the Catholic Faith, viz., by giving up some of the most decisive sayings of our Lord about Himself and His relation to the Father, it may be a short and easy, but it is surely, none the less, a very precarious method.

M. Loisy, it is hardly necessary to say, does not "give up" this or any other passage in order to "retain the Catholic Faith," but for the more commonplace reason that the evidence, in his opinion, compels him to do so.

The first part of the book, which deals with the Pauline writings, is the best. Dr. Knowling sums up ably all that can be said in favour of his view that all are the writings of St. Paul (Hebrews, of course, is not in question), and, although his arguments do not remove the doubt attaching to Ephesians, Colossians and 2 Thessalonians—still less the greater objections to the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles—they are in the main of a critical nature.

It is in the second and third parts that Dr. Knowling is revealed as the apologist with a very thin veneer of criticism. He will have none of the attribution to St. Paul of the first conception of the cosmic function of Christ; and he minimises consistently the part played by St. Paul as the pioneer of the Christian dogmatic system. At the same time he attributes to the apostle a developed belief in the Incarnation, an anachronism surpassed by the suggestion that there are "reminiscences of St. John's teaching [i.e., of the fourth Gospel] in the Epistles of St. Paul" (p. 346). The latter resembles Mrs. Gallop's discovery of reminiscences of Pope's "Iliad" in Shakespeare. As might be expected, Dr. Knowling refuses to admit Pauline influence on the Synoptics, but his reasons for doing so have nothing to do with criticism. In regard to the accounts of the institution of the Eucharist—a typical case—he does not seem to have grasped the critical argument. No critic that we know of thinks that the recital in Mark, as we have it, is earlier than St. Paul's. It is improbable that any of the recitals represents the primitive tradition, but a comparison of the Synoptics with 1 Cor. xi. 23-26 suggests that the primitive tradition is to be traced in Luke xxii. 14-19, ending with the words: "This is my body." In any case, it is impossible to reconcile the four recitals as they stand; and that of Luke, at any rate, is plainly a compilation, since it involves two administrations of the cup.

Another thesis of the author is that St. Paul does not in his writings ignore the earthly life of our Lord before the Crucifixion. Such a thesis naturally leads Dr. Knowling into strange conjectures. He finds an allusion to the Virgin Birth in the words "born [or made] of a woman" (Gal. iv. 4) on the authority of "many distinguished critics"; and, since the words "born [or made] of the seed of David" (Rom. i. 3) imply that Jesus was the son of Joseph, Dr. Knowling assures us that it is "maintained by many able writers that Mary as well as Joseph was of the house of David," though he ought to know that there is not a particle of evidence for that baseless tradition. He insists that St. Paul taught a phenomenal Ascension, though nothing is plainer than the fact that St. Paul knew of no "forty days" and that, for him, Christ "ascended above all the heavens" (if, indeed, the apostle himself wrote those words) by His resurrection. Dr. Knowling maintains that the empty tomb is "pre-supposed" in the statement that our Lord was buried and rose again, and ignores the plain fact that the whole argument of 1 Cor. xv. pre-supposes that our Lord's body passed through the natural process resulting from death, and falls to the ground if His resurrection differed from that of us all. It is open to Dr. Knowling to hold that St. Paul was mistaken or not informed on such points as these; it is futile to attempt a reconciliation between St. Paul's conception of the Resurrection to eternal life of a body of glory animated by the pneuma—not the body that was laid in the grave (1 Cor. xv. 37, 44)—and the later accounts of a physical Resurrection to an earthly life of forty days.

How restricted is Dr. Knowling's grasp of the critical method is shown by his treatment of the words (Matt. xi. 25-27; Luke x. 21, 22) already referred to. The great majority of critics naturally find in that passage the influence of St. Paul. To this view Dr. Knowling objects, as has been said, on apologetic grounds. And he actually adduces as an argument for the authenticity of these words the fact that they are "unlike anything else in the Synoptic Gospels!" We should like to know on what ground Dr. Knowling finds himself able to assert that these words "come to us in all reasonable probability from amongst the earliest materials which our evangelists possessed." Of course Dr. Knowling finds it "easy to believe" that St. Paul knew the words to have been spoken by our Lord. But he does not attempt to account for the omission from Mark of so important a saying from the "earliest materials."

PORTRAITURE

The Art of Portrait-Painting. By the Hon. JOHN COLLIER. (Cassell, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE art of portraiture will always be the most living and personal branch of the tree of painting, and is to-day the most flourishing and hopeful. We welcome, therefore, Mr. John Collier's book, in which he frankly scans his subject from say, the late Roman funeral portraits found in the Fayoum to that extraordinary example of animation and gaiety, which Mr. Sargent calls A Vele Gonfie. Historical; Aims and Methods of the Great Masters; the Practice of Portrait-Painting; are the three main divisions of the work, in which this conscientious and accomplished portrait-painter tells us those secrets of the prison houses of the artists' souls which he has discovered. No man of our day could write of his subjects more agreeably, sanely, or with more intimate knowledge, nor produce a volume so likely to gain the attention of the general public. Perhaps, to the sophisticated student, there may be certain glimpses of the obvious in the author's comments on the old masters in the historical section of the work—but then there is always a new generation to whom notes on Rembrandt and Velasquez comes freshly, and we can only envy it so charming an initiation into a fascinating branch of study. When Mr. Collier comes to modern men—a field of criticism beset with pitfall and with gin—he confines himself to the British school, for the not very convincing reason that he believes the art of portraiture is in a much healthier state here than on the Continent. Whether we entirely agree with this statement or no, the result of this reticence is satisfactory, and the consideration of the work of contemporary painters always broad-minded, informing and just. Although Mr. Collier is endowed with a very catholic sense of appreciation, he is a candid friend; but, where he withholds the gifts of "praise, praise, praise," he produces good reasons—for example, the typical case of Whistler, or his views of Watts as a portrait-painter. We gather that Mr. Collier would not be quite in accord with Sir Joshua, when he said that in portraits the grace and the likeness consist more in the general air than in the exact similitude of every feature, and that he is for his pound of flesh and no mere suggestion. In this, as in most other of his conclusions, he will have the world on his side. The forty or more carefully reproduced portraits—some, and those not the most successful, in colour—give good examples of the art the author loves. The "Monna Lisa" is a fine reproduction, and Gainsborough's Perdita and the delightful picture by Mr. Sargent already mentioned, lose very little of their charm in these painstaking prints. The book is a cheery piece of criticism from beginning to end, and leaves the reader as optimistic as the author in regard to the future of portrait-painting.

GLEANINGS OR WINNOWINGS

Gleanings from Venetian History. By FRANCIS MARION CRAWFORD. Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL. 2 vols. (Macmillan, 21s. net.)

THE title which Mr. Crawford has chosen for his work is misleading. It suggests that he has followed in the steps of the professed historians, bringing to light things which they have failed to find or have neglected. Such, however, is not the task which has been undertaken in these volumes. They are not, it is true, addressed to the professor or to the earnest young student, to any one, in fact, who wishes for a complete history of Venice during the period which they cover—from the foundation to 1866. A process of selection has been employed to determine what should be included and what should be left out; but that process is more akin to the act of winnowing than to that of gleaning. Out of the vast mass of material before him Mr. Crawford has chosen those elements of Venetian history which make interesting and pleasant reading, and has passed over, as far as possible, all that is wearisome and hard to remember. The dry bones of political and constitutional history are studied as briefly as may be, receiving just that amount of attention which suffices to give continuity to the book, while full and interesting chapters are devoted to the more generally attractive aspects of history—personal anecdote, social life, manners and customs, festivals and pageants, religious institutions, workshops and prisons. In a word, those who have read and liked "Marietta," a historical novel describing the Murano glass-blowers, and the author's previous work on Italian history, "The Rulers of the South," will be neither surprised nor disappointed by this Venetian study. Mr. Pennell, too, is up to his best mark, and has contributed two hundred and twenty-five pretty but distracting illustrations which, beyond the fact that they represent bits of Venice, have little or nothing to do with the text which they adorn. Some day, perhaps, authors, artists and publishers will realise that text and illustrations alike would stand more chance of receiving a fair amount of attention if the illustrations were kept together, and placed, say, at the end of each chapter or each volume, and not sprinkled at random through the text.

Mr. Crawford has for Venice that admiration which success generally commands, but he does not attempt to whitewash her methods or make excuses for her crimes. He is her apologist only in so far as he calls upon us to admire the great things which she accomplished, at a sacrifice of political morality and personal justice. He brings out effectively and clearly those qualities which made her successful, unique, enviable and often hateful. The wonderful continuity and organic development of the Venetian institutions, influenced so little by external forces, give to the Republic an individuality which no other state can show for a length of time at all comparable with the long life of Venice. And "like to its beginning is its end" may be well said of the Venetian constitution. We read how, on the brink of the Eighth Century, the family hatreds of the Tribunes, or island chiefs, came near to ruining the infant state, and how these families made common cause to envy and hate the first of the one hundred and twenty Doges; and in these quarrels and jealousies we can see the germs of the constitution and the passions which were to colour Venetian history for eleven hundred years. For it was out of the intense jealousy and mistrust which always existed between the families of the governing classes that there grew that unwieldy machinery, those innumerable magistracies, each of which was controlled and hindered in action by others, that system of official limitations and secret spying upon all who occupied prominent positions, in short, every form of over-complication, which led to the enfeebling and finally to the death of the State. But, as Mr. Crawford never tires of repeating, Venice succeeded where others failed: her system, founded on suspicion of every one and disbelief in all good, lasted longer than others and made her greater than other powers; and she died of old age, when the system was worn out.

AN EXTENSION GUIDE TO ATHENS

Primitive Athens as described by Thucydides. By JANE E. HARRISON. (Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d.)

IN the fifteen years which have elapsed since Miss Jane Harrison published her commentary on Pausanias, enough has changed and enough has remained the same to justify her in bringing out a new book on what is practically the same subject. Dr. Dörpfeld, whose fresh discoveries and theories inspired Miss Harrison in her earlier book, may not have made many new discoveries, but he has fairly frequently altered his theories. New books have appeared in English, notably Dr. Frazer's large edition of Pausanias and Professor Gardner's well illustrated and popular guide to Ancient Athens. These are the principal changes; but two things remain the same. The first is Miss Harrison's enthusiasm for Dr. Dörpfeld's views and the second is the general opinion of British scholars. To his theories—at least to those which Dr. Dörpfeld still maintains—Miss Harrison preserves the unswerving loyalty of her enthusiastic youth. British scholars remain unconvinced, and although fifteen years of obstinate opposition might have damped her ardour Miss Harrison returns to the charge in a valiant attempt to storm the citadel.

While the obstinacy of scholars causes her to repeat some of her old arguments, the changes of fifteen years have obliged the author to alter the form of her book. She no longer makes the old Pausanias serve as a guide to the modern visitor, but taking a passage of Thucydides as her text she presents her complicated arguments in the form of a commentary upon it. In this procedure some may observe an effect of the lapse of time. During these fifteen years Miss Harrison has discarded archæology and topography and has busied herself almost entirely with mythology. In that sphere no method of exposition is so familiar as the elaborate attempt to prove a theory of a legend or a custom by means of a commentary on its details. By piling up argument on the separate items, a fallacious effect is produced as of a cumulative and constructive proof, and the cunning mythologist takes good care that the reader shall never be able to observe the construction in its entirety. Miss Harrison shows that the cunning topographer may make use of the same methods. She takes Thucydides's words piece by piece, and, by commenting upon each separately and adapting them to Dr. Dörpfeld's views, she would make the unwary reader believe that she has proved her case up to the hilt, while in reality she has not succeeded in doing more than exhibit perverse views of each separate detail.

The method is known to others besides mythologists. There was once a barrister who proved the innocence of a burglar by showing to the craftsmen in the jury each of the implements found upon him and obliging the jurymen to confess that they were ordinary tools. He did not spoil his argument by appealing to the judge to recognise the bag in which the tools were carried; because the bag was a brief bag, and however familiar a thing in itself, an unusual contrivance for carrying a miscellaneous assortment of tools. We are forcibly reminded of this story in reading Miss Harrison. Some of her identifications are plausible enough, others are improbable in themselves; but all of them become anything but persuasive when they are enwrapped in the brief-bag of Thucydides's text. It would have been wiser to leave Thucydides entirely on one side—he is only arguing and not stating facts and could therefore be disregarded with comparative safety—but unfortunately Miss Harrison is less acute than the barrister of the story. She not only exhibits the brief-bag, but makes it an integral part of her argument when other means of persuasion fail. Of course, in order to do this, she is bound to prove the brief-bag to be something totally different, but scholars as well as the occupants of the bench have eyes, and they can read Thucydides when they see the text.

For the rest, Miss Harrison uses the means of persuasion which are familiar to the lecturer. She rambles off into totally irrelevant disquisitions on mythology, she touches on matters of art and archæology which have nothing to do with her argument, and she writes (or talks) in a chatty style with numerous confidential asides which are made to do duty for demonstration and steps in the argument. She illustrates her book with good plans and photographs, but apart from these it is hard to see what useful purpose it can serve. The book is scarcely intended for scholars, who are hard enough to persuade even when they are faced by a thorough discussion and are not put off with suspicious arguments (see especially the perversion of Strabo on p. 69) and the total suppression of the other side of the case. It can scarcely be intended to be a popular book, unless all the glory of Athens and all the noble works of the Athenians have ceased to interest the reading public. There is only a third class to whom the book can appeal; the class of those who study without depth and without imagination, who know works of art not by their charm and their merit, but by the theories which Germans and others have woven concerning their origin or attribution, and who are less familiar with the things themselves than with the names of the writers who have discussed them. Probably Miss Harrison's book is intended for these, and no doubt a new interest will be brought into the homes of a number of "extensionists" when they are told that "Nine Spouts" has been discovered, and that the sanctuaries of Zeus Olympios and Apollo Pythios were not placed where for centuries scholars have fondly imagined that Thucydides saw them. But Miss Harrison, if she believes in her case, might have sought with advantage to convince a worthier audience.

EUTHANASIA

STAR-LIT silence girdled the snowy places
Where my soul and I, keeping night-long vigil,
Saw a pale procession of spectre faces
Risen from Lethe.

Ghosts of love and friendship, and hopes that never Passed the shining portals of El Dorado,
All the Might-have-beens of my vain endeavour
Weeping went by me.

Fear then gripped me close, for a voice like thunder
Shattered silence, trumpeting words I knew not Till my soul—illuminated by Dawn's red wonder—
Whispered and told me.

Straightway all those grievous ones left their weeping,
Faded, star-like, at the behest of Morning;
So on me a peace beyond dreamless sleeping
Fell, soft as snow falls.

ANGELA GORDON.

GREEK AT THE UNIVERSITIES

CAMBRIDGE well deserves the best thanks and congratulations of all who have the real interests of education at heart. Last year's proposal to make Greek optional at the Little-go was lost by five hundred and seven votes in a poll of two thousand six hundred and eleven. The proposal which the Cambridge University Senate has now thrown out by seven hundred and forty seven votes to two hundred and forty-one was less sweeping, but more insidious. It aimed at the bifurcation of the B.A. degree into two degrees, one for letters and one for science, and gave to candidates for the latter an option between Greek and Latin. This suggestion recommended itself to many who were altogether opposed to making Greek optional at the Little-go. The Times of Friday, May 25, had a leader strongly supporting it and claiming for it the sanction of Professor Butcher's authority. But the less violent change would in the end have been equally fatal to the study of Greek. In pointing out this I would recur to some of the arguments put forward in the Conference of Headmasters in December 1890, when the proposal to make Greek optional in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge was defeated by only two votes in a poll of sixty.

It was urged then by the advocates of the maintenance of Greek that, if the resolution brought forward by the headmaster of Harrow were carried, the study of Greek in England was doomed. This argument was met by the innovators with silent contempt or by improved declarations that "no one fears that Greek will cease to be studied in England," and that "Greek can take care of itself." It is curious that the very contrary of the last proposition was the utterance of one who was among the greatest ornaments of English scholarship. In 1873 George Grote declared his conviction that it was Latin and Greek which required to be fostered, that Greek would soon cease to be studied if it were made optional, and that the sciences would "take care of themselves."

For to make Greek optional for any class of students in the Universities would infallibly be to bring about a premature and excessive specialising even in the course of the boy's school training. If the question whether he would pursue a scientific or a classical career in the University be left to the boy, in the great majority of cases he will decide against Greek. The study of Grammar is distasteful to the beginner, however apt, though to the advanced student it is full of interest and affords a discipline of the reasoning faculties at least as good as that supplied by Euclid or logic. The boy will vote for cotyledons and coelenterata, and his master will have to explain—if, indeed, he knows himself—what these words mean, and that they were used by a people whose commerce and manufactures were small, which had no Stock Exchange, and could not make "corners" in anything—which, therefore, can be of no use or interest for a lad who has to face the pressure of modern life and contend with "the struggling, eager crowds which beset every avenue to success." Specialising would begin at school, and in the course of a generation or two Greek would be in the position now occupied by Hebrew and Sanscrit, and the Greek masters in the public schools would have so little to do that they would be obliged to "double" the parts of instructors in (perhaps) writing or calisthenics.

No attempt has ever been made to show that the passman carries into his subsequent life from the University more mathematics or mental or natural philosophy than Greek. In this connection I may perhaps quote some words of my own on this subject from the Quarterly Review (343) of January 1891:

Let all subjects be optional, or let us have a reason why one subject should be optional rather than another. The truth is, the rank and file of examinees are not now capable, never were capable, and never will be capable, of attaining to a knowledge of Greek, Latin, German, trigonometry, mechanics, or any other branch of study, in the sense in which the term "knowledge" is understood by real scholars and savants. But that is no reason why the passman should not reap great and permanent advantage from being induced to pursue these studies to a certain point, which is in many cases as far as their intelligence will allow them to go. It has been urged by the innovators that "it would be difficult to find in Greek literature a passage which would not pluck at least half of the candidates if anything like a creditable, even a respectable translation were exacted." Would more than half the candidates in an examination in Natural Science display a knowledge which would seem to a master of the science creditable, or even respectable? Moreover, it is fair to call to mind that when a student is required to translate an unprepared piece of Greek, he is asked to show that he has a grasp of the principles of the language. A question of analogous difficulty in the sciences would "pluck" the whole class; but such questions are not put at pass-examinations in science. The point to be dwelt on is, that no attempt has been made to show that the passman carries away from the University a greater or more abiding knowledge of mathematics or mental or natural philosophy than of Greek, yet no one has proposed to make all these subjects optional.

There was a time when professed Latinists knew very little Greek. "Graecum est: non potest legi" is a comment often to be met in the schoolmen when a Greek expression occurs in a Latin text. There are now French and Italian Latinists who have but slight acquaintance with Greek. It is the boast of English scholarship that for more than two centuries Greek and Latin have been studied with equal success and reciprocal illumination. If Greek were ever put on a level with Hebrew and Sanscrit, and if the study of it were confined to a few specialists, even Latin would suffer. Fancy a Greekless Munro or Robinson Ellis, or a Professor of Latin with a third-class man's knowledge of Greek lecturing on Virgil, Plautus, Lucretius, or the philosophical works or the letters of Cicero.

For whose sake would this barbarising measure be passed? It is said that there were at the time of the Conference at Oxford in December 1890 over ten thousand boys at the public schools not learning Greek. It is alleged that many of these would be glad to have a University degree. But Dr. Selwyn of Uppingham writing to the Times of January 1, 1891, said:

I do not know or recollect a single such boy who would be (or have been) likely, under any circumstances, to go to either University.

The persons who would benefit by the revolution would be those who fancy that French or German or chemistry would supply a shorter road to professional success than Greek. But the language of Corneille and Schiller would be little more useful for practical professional needs than that of Pindar or Sophocles, even were we to put aside the question (too large to be entertained here) as to the true function of University teaching. The majority of those who would frequent the modernised University would be the sons of noblemen who look on the public school not as a source of instruction but as an indispensable part of a gentleman's career, the Fitzbattleaxes who think Eton or Harrow, Oxford or Cambridge, as essential as baptism; or the sons of the Gorgius Midases, who send their sons to the place where there are the most "dooks." Such youths will not devote the time gained by the abolition of Greek to other subjects more congenial to them. They go to the University "to kick and knock balls about," to use the vigorous language of the late Professor Freeman, who strongly opposed the barbarisers.

It is better [said the same scholar] that a University should be small and poor but learned, than large and rich but unlearned.

Here is another weighty judgment from the same source:

I doubt whether it is possible for a University to keep up a subject as essential for those who are fit to profit by it, unless it is kept up as essential for all.

Opulent idlers and premature specialisers who believe in "bread and butter" knowledge and think that a University should be a technical school, are the only classes who would benefit by the proposed revolution.

I may, perhaps, be permitted in conclusion to quote a passage which is, no doubt, familiar to many—a tribute from the great prophet of Utilitarianism to the value of a training in Greek:

If [said John Stuart Mill in his address to the University of St. Andrews], as every one must see, the want of affinity of these studies to the modern mind is gradually lowering them in popular estimation, that is but a confirmation of the need of them, and renders it the more incumbent on those who have the power to do their utmost to prevent their decline.

ROBERT Y. TYRRELL.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

SHAKESPEARE IN THE REMAINDER MARKET

A FEW years ago, just before the recent startling rise in the auction-prices of Shakespeare Quartos, I had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of a German gentleman who had found, among the treasures of a library formed by a book-loving ancestor in the eighteenth century, a volume containing nine quarto plays with all of which Shakespeare's name has been connected. The library contained no other Shakespeariana with which these would range, and the owner wished therefore to take advantage of a brief visit to England to dispose of them to the best advantage. A note of the contents of his volume which he sent on in advance, while it showed that eight of his nine plays belonged to editions already well known, raised in me a wild hope that the ninth might be of an issue hitherto undescribed, and I awaited his arrival with all the more interest. Within an hour of his reaching London the little fat volume was in my hands, and as I took it out of its wrapping I felt as if my new acquaintance had brought an old friend with him, for on the plain brown calf cover I saw stamped in gold EDWARD GWYNNE, the name of a well-known seventeenth-century collector, who frequently marked his books in this way. There was no new Shakespeare quarto in the volume—the date in the otherwise flawless list was a mistake. But to find Edward Gwynne buying Shakespeare quartos consoled me for the loss of my anticipated new find.

The actual contents of the volume which had lain hid in a German library for nearly a century and a half were as follows:

(1) The Whole Contention between the two Famous Houses, Lancaster and Yorke. With the Tragical ends of the good Duke Humfrey, Richard Duke of Yorke and King Henrie the sixth. Divided into two Parts: And newly corrected and enlarged. Written by William Shakespeare, Gent. Printed at London, for T.P.

(2) A Midsommer nights dreame. As it hath beene sundry times publikely acted, by the Right Honourable, the Lord Chamberlaine his servants. Written by William Shakespeare. Printed by Iames Roberts, 1600.

(3) The first part Of the true & honorable history, of the Life of Sir Iohn Old-castle, the good Lord Cobham. As it hath bene lately acted by the Right Honorable the Earle of Nottingham Lord High Admirall of England, his Servants. Written by William Shakespeare. London printed for T.P. 1600.

(4) The excellent History of the Merchant of Venice. With the extreme cruelty of Shylocke the Iew towards the saide Merchant, in cutting a iust pound of his flesh. And the obtaining of Portia by the choyse of three Caskets. Written by W. Shakespeare. Printed by I. Roberts, 1600.

(5) The Chronicle History of Henry the fift, with his battell fought at Agin Court in France. Together with ancient Pistoll. As it hath bene sundry times playd by the Right Honourable the Lord Chamberlaine his Servants. Printed for T.P. 1608.

(6) M. William Shakespeare, His True Chronicle History of the life and death of King Lear, and his three Daughters. With the vnfortunate life of Edgar, sonne and heire to the Earle of Gloucester, and his sullen and assumed humour of Tom of Bedlam. As it was plaid before the Kings Maiesty at White-Hall, vppon S. Stephens night, in Christmas Hollidaies. By his Maiesties Servants, playing vsually at the Globe on the Banck-side. Printed for Nathaniel Butter, 1608.

(7) The Late, and much admired Play, called, Pericles, Prince of Tyre. With the true Relation of the whole History, adventures, and fortunes of the saide Prince. Written by W. Shakespeare. Printed for T.P. 1619.

(8) A Most pleasant and excellent conceited Comedy, of Sir Iohn Falstaffe, and the merry Wiues of Windsor. With the swaggering vaine of Ancient Pistoll, and Corporal Nym. Written by W. Shakespeare. Printed for Arthur Johnson, 1619.

(9) A Yorkshire Tragedie. Not so New, as Lamentable and True. Written by W. Shakespeare. Printed for T.P. 1619.

It would, perhaps, have been more correct to have spoken of these quartos as eight in number rather than nine, as the undated issue of the Whole Contention which heads the list and the Pericles dated 1619 were printed together, and the signatures run on continuously, R-Z, etc., of Pericles following on A-Q. of the Whole Contention. In this volume, however, some pains seemed to have been taken to keep them apart.

My German acquaintance doubtless now regrets that he did not delay finding this pretty little nest of quartos for another two or three years. For though Mr. Quaritch gave him as nearly as possible three times the sum which his German advisers had led him to expect, the price he received compares badly with the £2086 which the copies of the same issues of the same plays fetched at Sotheby's last Saturday. Before it was taken to Mr. Quaritch, two great British collectors had the offer of the volume. When Mr. Quaritch bought it, he was not long in finding a customer on the other side of the Atlantic, and Edward Gwynne's book now rests in the fine collection of Shakespeariana founded by Mr. Marsden Perry at Providence, Rhode Island.

It is a pity that so few seventeenth-century bookbuyers put their names on their purchases, for it is only by virtue of an interesting jacket that an old volume of separate plays is likely to remain for long in its original condition. Few collectors can afford to purchase nine plays of which they already possess seven or eight and only lack one or two. It is thus to the advantage of every seller to break up the old volume, and the contents, once dispersed, may easily lose all power of telling their collective history. The occurrence of these same plays in the same editions in the volume recently broken up for sale last week struck me, however, as so singular that I could not believe it to be accidental. It is true that Mr. Hussey's volume was in a binding which could not be earlier than the middle of the eighteenth century, and that the plays were not arranged in the order of those belonging to Edward Gwynne, but as follows:

The Whole Contention. Pavier. [1619.]
A Yorkshire Tragedie. Pavier. 1619.
Henry the fift. Pavier. 1608.
Pericles. Pavier. 1619.
King Lear. Butter. 1608.
Midsommer Nights dreame. Roberts. 1600.
Merchant of Venice. Roberts. 1600.
Merry Wives of Windsor. Johnson. 1619.
Sir Iohn Oldcastle. Pavier. 1600.

On the other hand, the chances that two collectors, without any determining cause, had bound together precisely the same editions of these plays, without the admixture of any others, seemed very remote. Moreover, the dates of the editions on a little consideration seemed to yield a very plausible theory as to what the reason of their juxtaposition might have been. Reckoning them still as nine, we find that four belong to the year 1619, which brings us close to the date of the Folio of 1623. All the five others are much earlier, and for a moment it seemed difficult to explain why three plays of 1600 and two of 1608 should come thus cheek by jowl with others printed in 1619. There is, however, a striking point common to four out of five of these earlier issues—each of them is one of two editions printed in the same year. Besides the “Roberts” edition of the Midsummer Night's Dream and the Merchant of Venice, there are those which bear the names also of their respective publishers, Fisher and Heyes; besides the “Pavier” edition of Sir John Oldcastle there is that with the initials of V. S., i.e., Valentine Sims, as its printer on Pavier's behalf; besides the “Butter” edition of King Lear, there is that known to students as the “Pide Bull” edition, because in addition to Butter's name it gives the sign of his shop, the Pied Bull. Now, every publisher knows by sad experience that a first edition of a book may be exhausted so rapidly that to refuse to print a second seems a mere turning away good money, and yet when the second is printed only a few copies are sold. The demand which seemed so vigorous was really for only another hundred or two hundred copies, and if a second thousand, or even five hundred, are printed, the bulk of them become at once dead stock. It is dispiriting to think that this was the fate which befell the Merchant of Venice, the Midsummer Night's Dream and King Lear, and that Jacobean readers were so much less appreciative of Henry V. than their Elizabethan predecessors. But, if we are to account for these editions of 1600 and 1608 being bound up with other editions printed in 1619 otherwise than as an accident, we can only do so by supposing that they belonged to unsold stock, and that the news of the forthcoming folio of 1623 caused them to be thrown on the market as what we now call a “remainder.”

Before we add Shakespeare to the list of “remaindered” authors, the theory of accidental coincidence in the contents of these two volumes must be disposed of. Now, it has already been noted that Gwynne's volume was bought by a German collector in the middle of the eighteenth century and that the binding of Mr. Hussey's belonged to the same date. Students will remember that it was in 1768 that Capell published his edition of Shakespeare's “Comedies, Histories and Tragedies, set out by himself in quarto, or by the players (his fellows) in folio,” and it cannot be doubted that this (undue) exaltation of the quartos as set out by Shakespeare himself powerfully directed attention to them, and would cause copies to be searched for. On the other hand, as soon as a volume containing nine plays was found, the tendency, as we have noted, would be to break it up, and we have therefore only a few years in which to search for evidence of other volumes with the same contents. The most obvious person to have possessed one is Edward Capell himself, and thanks to the zealous and minute care with which Mr. W. W. Greg has catalogued the Capell collection at Trinity College, Cambridge, I feel as sure that he did as if I had seen the volume in his hands.

Most of Capell's Quartos seem to be fairly good copies, but among them all there are nine, and nine only, which attain the measurements  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{3}{8}$  inches, and these nine are the same nine as we find in the Gwynne and the Hussey volumes. They are now bound in two volumes, which stand side by side as Q 11 and Q 12, the former containing five and the latter four plays, so that, despite rebinding, they may still be said to be kept together.

The discovery that Capell's copies of these nine plays were all of a size, and that an unusual one, sent me at once to the Garrick Plays at the British Museum, and with the clue already given me I had no need to look for the titles on their backs. Within a couple of minutes I had picked out all nine plays from among their fellows simply by their height, and I think that there can be no doubt that David Garrick, like Edward Capell, purchased them in a volume and broke them up to suit his own convenience.

The evidence, then, which we have for these nine plays having once formed a single volume is:

(a) One copy, still united, with the name of a seventeenth-century collector on the cover;

(b) One copy in a binding of about the middle of the eighteenth century, only recently broken up;

(c) Two sets of the nine plays, of uniform and unusual size, traceable to the possession of eighteenth-century collectors, both of them known to have been in the habit of breaking up volumes and rebinding.

I shall be much obliged for any further notes as to copies of these plays which seem at any time to have been bound together. I hope, however, that I am not too sanguine in now assuming that their collocation in the Gwynne and Hussey volumes cannot have been fortuitous. If it be not fortuitous, I can imagine no other way in which it can have come about than that which I have already suggested. After the publication of the First Folio there could have been little object in bringing together a few single plays into a volume. The presence of the quartos of 1619 forbids us to assume any earlier date than this, and it seems probable that the editions of that year, having been allowed their chance individually, were bound up with the remainder stock of the 1600 and 1608 quartos some time in 1622, so as to get rid of them before the Folio appeared. Obviously Thomas Pavier was the prime mover in this device, as most of the editions were his. As to how possession was obtained of the other stock I can at present offer no suggestion. Probably the amount of it was not very large, or a collective title-page would have been printed, as was done more than once when various pamphlets by Gervase Markham had to be sold off in a like manner. I imagine that the separate quartos were stitched together in a paper wrapper, and continued in this form until collectors found them out, and bound them. For the plays themselves it was no bad luck. They were saved from the rough handling of the eager purchasers of the years when they still held the stage, and thus have come down to us in far finer condition than most of their fellows. On the other hand, that plays of Shakespeare should have remained unsold for nineteen years or more and then have been worked off in a made-up volume, in the company of others wrongly assigned to him, is surely a very curious and eloquent fact. Few authors enjoy seeing their precious works offered in second-hand catalogues for a small fraction of their original price. But, if I am right, there will be henceforth a consolation for the “Remaindered” even greater than the historic case of FitzGerald's “Omar.” We can think of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice and Midsummer Night's Dream sold in this way after waiting nineteen years for purchasers, and sing consolingly to one another that excellent refrain from “When King Alfred was at Sherborne”: “If you are feeling rather sore, He went through it all before, And what can you expect?”

ALFRED W. POLLARD.

[Next week's Causerie will be “Science in Fiction,” by A.]

FICTION

Set in Authority. By Mrs. EVERARD COTES (SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN). (Constable, 6s.)

A NOVEL which is serious but not dull, philosophic but not dry, full of purpose but not one-sided, is so rare—and especially so among novels written by women—that Mrs. Everard Cotes's new book should be read carefully and intelligently, not tossed aside as soon as the reader discovers that it is about India and the feasibility of carrying our beloved doctrines of Liberalism into practice in that strange land. Mr. Broadbent himself in John Bull's Other Island was not so doughty a champion of Liberal principles as Anthony Andover, Baron Thame, the Viceroy in Mrs. Cotes's novel. In one point, at any rate, he was determined that a favourite doctrine of Liberalism—the equality of all men and all races—should be made real and practical in India; and so, when a British private soldier is supposed to have murdered a native, the Viceroy overrides the decision of the Chief Commissioner of the district in which the murder is supposed to have taken place, and, in effect—though the gallows are never used—procures the condemnation of the soldier for murder. And, after all, there was no murder, and the man who is hounded to death by the Viceroy is innocent. A terrible comment on the application of the principles of our glorious Liberalism to other lands than our own! But we must not give a wrong idea of this novel. It is not a political object-lesson only. In with the politics is wound a story of men and women, of love and loss and hopes and fears, which displays a number of very cleverly drawn characters, whose thoughts and feelings are of deep interest. The soldier, by strange bonds that remain concealed till the very end, is united by close ties to the Viceroy himself—and the discovery adds pathos to the wretched muddle which everybody made of things. It is not a comforting or exhilarating story, but it is a clever, mature, and thoughtful piece of work that will increase Mrs. Cotes's already high reputation.

A Benedick in Arcady. By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE. (Murray, 6s.)

THERE are certain books which strain life of its ugliness and turbulence and read like the fulfilment of a nice boy's day-dreams. Their effect is different at different times. Sometimes they fill the reader with a kind of cheap cynicism and an unreasoning hatred of their wholesomeness and their blatant, untrue cheerfulness: sometimes it is pleasant to wish, idiotically, that life was a pottering in a German garden or a summer in Arcady, and then they are mildly amusing and agreeably sad: the literary artifice tickles and pleases like a well-made Moselle-cup, and sleep soon brings the book to its proper climax. But strain life of its ugliness and you rob it of its interest, you lessen its poignant beauty. Rose spectacles shed a rosy tint, like the dreadful monotone of contentment. They put us in flagrant sympathy with those fellows who under the name of realists pry only into the slime on the easy edge of the deep river. . . . This is a great fuss about an omelette, as the French say. Mr. Sutcliffe has written a book simple in design and pleasant, if a little diffuse in execution. Benedick has returned from a honeymoon to his old house with its old garden and two old faithful retainers: his wife is a child whom he calls Babe. Here he smokes and thinks and smokes and lives: he sits under a lime-tree and writes a little: or goes for a walk with the Wanderer and meets a cross-grained farmer who is won over to offer them dinner and discloses a profound knowledge of birds; or he meets a blacksmith who quotes Homer in passages. Always on his return his little wife is waiting at the garden gate. In fact, the book is an idyll, and much better written than such idylls are wont to be. There is one kind of idealist who is able to turn away persistently from any unpleasant fact with a sort of happy knack: to this kind the author of this book belongs. There is another kind of idealist—and no less steadfast—who must see all facts and prays Heaven for the power to look a little beyond them and appreciate what is there.

From Paleolith to Motor-car; or Heasham Tales. By HARRY LOWERISON. (A. J. Whiten, and The Clarion Newspaper Co., 3s. 6d. net.)

Mr. LOWERISON has hit upon an ingenious idea, and carries it out admirably. In fourteen short stories he presents a panorama of the great epochs in the social and national life of this country in its evolution from the stone age to the Victorian era. These "tales which are all true, and none of them is true," possess an interest for all readers, and a particular fascination for young people, for whose instruction they are primarily intended: no child could find history or science dull or dry in these pleasant pages. The first story, "Coo," gives us a vividly imaginative picture of the daily life of the brown, hairy people who came from the great plain where now lies the English Channel and settled down in the N.-W. corner of Norfolk. "Coo," "Inito's Axe," "Queena's Sacrifice" are exciting and moving little tales; the author, whose sentiments are humane but robust, does not despise realism as a means of arresting attention. Next follow in chronological order stories of Celt, Briton and Norman, of vassals and overlords, Cavaliers and Roundheads, of Nelson in Norfolk and at the siege of Calvi, and, last, a sketch of the life of a waif in London under modern conditions. Mr. Lowerison is a practical and scientific educationist, and has rarely used his store of knowledge to better purpose than in this volume. It is almost an ideal book for the object he had in view, original, informing, and picturesque.

Anthony Britten. By HERBERT MACILWAINE. (Constable, 6s.)

ANY plot or characters that there are in "Anthony Britten" depend almost entirely for their interest and effectiveness upon their setting. For this is not so much a novel in the ordinary acceptance of the term as a study of London life which Mr. Herbert MacIlwaine has clothed in novel form. Anthony Britten, the rolling stone who returns home from Westralia with a fortune, to be driven away by the uncongenial atmosphere of his family, who have not the intuition of the practised novel-reader that Anthony in his ragged coat is a rich man, can hardly be described as an original type of hero. Still, the warm-hearted and uncouth Anthony takes a strong hold on our interest, and we are swept along with him as he probes the pretentious snobbery of his own family's life, as he is introduced to clubland, and, finally, as he goes slumming and meets with fighting parsons, beautiful society ladies and the rest of them. One character there is which appeals to us upon its own merits, and that is Polly, the overworked maid, who somehow or other seems to be connected with all the characters and is the pivot upon which the sentimental incidents of the plot turn. Regarded simply as a work of art, the book is rather crude for an author of Mr. MacIlwaine's skill. It needs a Besant at his best to cram as much London life into a six-shilling novel as is here attempted, and we confess to wishing that the characters were a little less analytical and introspective and would allow us to share more in their conversations. The faults, in short, are easily felt, and yet the book is good, and we found in reading this novel a real pleasure which is completely absent from the perusal of many other works which, if more artistically constructed, are less virile and less earnest.

Amelia and the Doctor. By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THE village of Barton is the pleasant scene of this pleasantly-written story. The characters are old favourites; the sweet maiden-lady, the grim old gentleman warrior, the Radical sceptical doctor, noble and good as the well-loved vicar, the proud lord, master of an icy courtesy—we know them all: with them we are on as familiar ground as with the incidents in which they figure: the typhus-case, the burglary, the marriage certificate in the old bureau. There is no jarring note of surprise or unpleasantness to mar the pretty tinkle of the story: it is as pleasing and unpretentious as the sound of a distant sheep-bell, heard as the evening draws in, on a moor: it has the same effect, through its very familiarity, upon the mind in gently stirring up the sentiments which bring for their own reasons a little lump to the throat: and finally—to stretch the metaphor to the limit of endurance—it bears much the same relation to art or literature as the sheep-bell does to music.

FINE ART

THE GERMAN EXHIBITIONS

"HERZLICHE ZUSAMMENWIRKUNG," these words, though not looking or sounding so pretty as "L'entente cordiale," are as near as I can get to its meaning in the German which was my native language but which has been sadly allowed to rust.

After the municipal and political "rapprochement," it is fitting that there should follow an artistic understanding between Germans and English, and the three Exhibitions at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, the Grafton Gallery and the Prince's Galleries afford a welcome opportunity for the study and comparison of ancient and modern German art.

I do not think it fantastic to find some characteristics common to the ancient and modern schools distinguishing them from those of other nations. German artists from the time of Hans Balding Grün, Altdorfer and Durer, have excelled in vigorous and expressive drawing, with a marked tendency to distortion and exaggeration, but the sense for colour is still, as it was in those days, the weakest element. The revivalists, Cornelius, Overbeck, and that great artist, Gustav Retzel, were draughtsmen first, and as draughtsmen Lenbach and Menzel will be chiefly recognised.

Knowing the circumstances in which the Exhibition at Prince's Galleries was organised, as an acknowledgment of the generous manner in which English and Scottish artists have been treated in German centres, we are chary of being over critical, but there is no doubt that putting all considerations of courtesy and hospitality aside, these two Exhibitions maintain a higher technical standard than the majority of our own. As was only to be expected, the artists who are "hervorragend" are Menzel and Lenbach, both recently deceased. We knew that Menzel was unrivalled as a draughtsman, but I did not realise that Lenbach was also greatly superior to any English artist in that respect. His economy of line and its delicacy and vigour are amazing. On the other hand, his colour, although usually pleasant, succeeds merely by being "safe," that is, the vague brown and grey juice which Old Masters sometimes acquire with years. When he drops this formula, and attempts something truer to nature, it is apt to become a saffron, stale sort of colour, not at all pleasing. Occasionally he got an exquisite quality, as in the portrait of Frau von Lenbach and Marion in Eastern dress, and his swift lightness of touch is admirably seen in the Portrait of the artist with his daughter Gabriele, Virchow, and the beautiful woman, Frau Lolo von Lenbach. A few veterans are also to be seen who maintain the skilful style of the past, Defregger, for instance, and Gabriel Max.

The latter's subjects are usually of the melodramatic and "queer" order. The picture of the Deluge—three apes watching the approaching flood in terror or resignation—is full of character and powerful technique. But on the whole the modern German is terribly up-to-date, and welcomes with eagerness the latest extravagances of Pointillist and Symbolist. Probably at no distant date Böcklin will be considered as "passé" as Kaulbach or Makart; at present his influence is disastrously evident in Benno Becker, Max Kuschel and Franz Stuck. German artists are unfortunately liable to be influenced by the inflated and pretentious. They are less conservative and timid than the English and less frank than the French, and when they fall there is no mistake about it. Fritz August von Kaulbach, who must not be confounded with the celebrated ante bellum Kaulbach, has some admirable works, Child with Cherries, the portrait of his father, like a very good Watts, and Bacchante. He is not always an artist perhaps, but a painter he is, to his finger-tips, and really this is becoming quite a rare thing in French, English and German art, in which we constantly find bold, thoughtful, or observant work, but seldom the instinctive and inevitable.

It is a pity that von Uhde, who was one of these born painters, should have made a speciality of scenes from the New Testament with surroundings of modern country life. Both sentiment and painting have become confused and muddled thereby. Some of the best works are intensely realistic—the cattle pieces of Zügel, very true and original in their notation of the purple and lilac nuances; the Sargent-esque Mirror-Room by Joseph Oppenheimer, perfect in its way; the Winter Sun of Hans Olde, like a weaker Monet; the passionate portrait of D'Andrade as Don Juan by Max Slevogt; the unflinching portrait of Prof. Dilthey by Reinhold Lepsius. Flax Cleaning in Laren, Holland, must be an earlier work by Max Liebermann; it is too big and prolix for his nervous and witty hand. The decorative piece by Adam Kunz is big, too, but is carried through in a big way, and the peacock, turkey, fruit, and flowers are gorgeous in the rich lacquer of the brush work.

Other excellent works are Arabian Warriors, by the late Faber du Faur, influenced, I should think, by Fromentin, the Mid-day Hour of Walther Georgi, which recalls William Stott, and the Child with a Ball of von Zumbusch.

The bogies of L'Art Nouveau are, I am thankful to say, being gradually eliminated: they threatened to overwhelm all sculpture, decoration and architecture in Germany. Max Klinger, most accomplished of artists, is still sometimes haunted by them, but his bronze, Bathing, gathers beauty in an unexpected way, as the figure is in an attitude which would seem to foretell nothing but ungainliness. Among the drawings are some of Menzel's beautiful studies, a gouache of the Church of St. Francis, Überlingen, by Gotthard Knehl, excellent; a queer etching by E. M. Geyger of The First Man, being nursed by apes, a most undarwinian proceeding, and some lurid and ghastly etchings by Käthe Kollwitz, the illustrator of Hauptmann's "Die Weber." Altogether these two exhibitions are the most interesting of all that are at present on view and are witnesses to a keenness and vigour which make our Academy and other bodies seem sluggish and timid by comparison.

B. S.

GAINSBOROUGH STUDIES AND DRAWINGS

OUR national disposition to put quantity before quality makes it easy for us to neglect smaller galleries when the mammoth art exhibitions are opening. Slowly and painfully we are learning to judge the importance of a painting by other criteria than its dimensions, but we have not yet lost the habit of thinking those exhibitions most worthy of consideration which contain the greatest number of exhibits.

There are many collections of pictures now open to the public of greater extent than the "Selections of Studies and Drawings by Thomas Gainsborough" at Messrs. Colnaghi's galleries (13 and 14 Pall Mall East); but few which, in the language of the guide-book, will better repay a visit. With the exception of The Mushroom Gatherer, an unfinished oil-painting with a yellowish brown, Orchardson-like colour-scheme, all these studies are of moderate size, but they show an extraordinary diversity of medium and treatment. There are admirable landscapes in black chalk, indian ink and sepia, vigorous sketches in coloured crayons like the Spaniel Lying Down (39), portrait studies in oils, rustic scenes in body and water-colour, and bewildering combinations of two, three, even four mediums—barbarous in theory, but at times wondrously effective in practice. There can, however, be no defence for even Gainsborough's varnishing of water-colour, which murders its fresh charm without bringing any compensating attraction. The loss of quality entailed by this process is obvious if we compare, say, the open hilly Landscape (85), sepia and body colour, varnished, on paper, with the more legitimate water-colour Landscape (57), in which a lady and gentleman are walking, and a horse is looking over a five-barred gate. The beauty and delicacy of the limpid colour in this delicious sketch would be irretrievably marred by a coat of varnish. In other respects this drawing is remarkable for its modernity, the economy of means, and the brilliant modelling of the horse by a few deft brush-strokes. Nothing could be better fitted to bring home to the public that Gainsborough's art was essentially an art of suggestion rather than realisation, that it was his constant endeavour not so much to depict the anatomical construction of forms as to show how they appeared to him under the influence of light. It must be added that chalk studies of the Blue Boy, the Duchess of Devonshire, and of the Mrs. Siddons at the National Gallery are included in this most instructive selection.

MUSIC

GRIEG'S PIANO MUSIC

GRIEG has come and gone; at least his two concerts have been given, and, if they have raised no new subject for discussion, they have revived interest in an old one. They have given opportunity to the elders amongst us to indulge in reminiscences of his first visit to England, some to remember a little regretfully the promise of great things which he then seemed to give, many to tell how charmingly Madame Grieg interpreted his lyrics, all to find that the same characteristics which made his "Lyrische Stücke" welcome successors to the "Lieder ohne Worte" of Mendelssohn make them a relief from the splashy impressionism which belongs to the modern school of post-Liszt composers for the pianoforte. What those characteristics are and to what place they entitle him in musical literature are questions which the recent Grieg festival, if so it may be called, reawakens. They must be discussed now from a different standpoint from that of thirty years ago. We have the whole Grieg before us, for, though he should add another book of "Lyrische Stücke" or another group of songs or even a new violin sonata, it is not to be expected that he will break through the limits which have been those of a lifetime. Not only have we the whole Grieg, but we have had it for some time. A very small number of works represent him quite fairly and completely; we may almost say that the two concerts recently enjoyed at Queen's Hall more than represented him, in fact were to some extent tautologous. He has not developed. He had something to say at the beginning of his life and he has just gone on saying it, secure in the knowledge that it is worth saying because no one else could say it, for it is himself. When he began to make music, his music was quite new and people consequently said that it was ugly, but now that he has grown old, and his music with him, time has proved the contrary. What was taken for ugly newness is now the tame oldness of his music. The little turns of uncouth melody, employing over and over again the step of a semitone downwards followed by the leap of a major third in the same direction, strangely piled up harmonic discords and a love of crude-sounding fifths and sevenths—these are the things which made his elder contemporaries regard him as a dangerous revolutionary and now cause young critics alternately to sneer at and to patronise him. Grieg is by no means the only composer whose little tricks and mannerisms have gained him at first an unearned and evanescent popularity and afterwards robbed him of his due appreciation. It happened in a rather different way to Mendelssohn and, if I mistake not, there are at the present day certain composers of works which invariably crowd Queen's Hall or pay the expenses of a Three Choirs Festival, whose popularity will have to wane and die ere they can be properly understood. Grieg's popularity has not died—the audiences at both the concerts showed that plainly—but it has waned.

"Grieg does not seem to be played so much now as he was a few years ago," was the remark a lady lately made to me when she had just played one of his little pieces really effectively and made a rather unintelligible muddle of a couple of Chopin Preludes. That was not entirely her fault; the piano was an old one and would not respond to her touch, and the pedal did not act well, so that the tone quality on which Chopin depends for his effect, was lost. But with Grieg this was of much less importance. A crisp touch, a feeling for the outlines of his well-defined phrases and a sense of rhythm were all that was necessary to let the music speak for itself. In this lies the secret of his success and of his real popularity, apart from that transient kind which is to be referred to his mannerisms. Here is his link with the classics. The old writers of instrumental music, Bach, Scarlatti, and even Mozart and Haydn to some extent, depended largely for their musical expression upon the exact rendering of what they had set down upon paper. Their beauty rests upon the shapes of their phrases and their relation to one another as influenced both by pitch and rhythm. With almost every modern school, however—and especially is this true of pianoforte music—almost one-half of the music is not set down at all; it demands qualities of tone for its due expression which the performer must supply either by his own instinct and experience of the methods of the composer he seeks to interpret, or by carefully following the precedents of acknowledged leaders in the matter of performance. Grieg takes a place with the old writers in this respect. A tone of melting beauty may enhance the charm of his melody or add a poignancy to his harmony, but they will have some effect without it. Seated at some distance from him while he played his solos at Queen's Hall the other day, I found not much sensuous beauty to be detected in his playing; his forte was rather impotent, and his piano excessively delicate, yet each little piece seemed more delightful than the last and drew forth unaffected enthusiasm from the audience. There is a life throb in his rhythm, an individuality in his melody, even when he repeats the same little figure a hundred times in as many bars, which gives to all his music the ring of genuineness, and the modern colour of his harmony is naturally to a modern audience no small ingredient in his popularity.

Grieg is, then, a democrat amongst composers in the sense that his music is what the average amateur both can play and cares to play. Unlike the great classics he has no thought too high for average comprehension, while like them he expresses himself instead of deputing the task to his interpreters. It has always to be borne in mind that the capacity of the average listener is far in advance of that of the average performer. The amateur, especially the lady amateur, loves to play Chopin, but the amateur listener does not love to hear her performance. But with Grieg the one is much better able to satisfy the other; granted the necessary technical ability to play the notes (in his shorter pieces his technique is so well suited to the instrument that this implies no very high standard), and sufficient musical appreciation to understand him, his music can be gracefully played without great refinement of tone in either player or instrument. The decay of domestic music is much talked of at the present day, and, in so far as the idea is true, probably the main cause is the fact that, while people's interest in music keeps pace with modern developments of the art, their performing ability does not. They cannot play the music which they most want to hear, and they resort to such unsatisfactory methods as concert-going, or, worst of all, to the pianola. Beethoven was the first to march boldly beyond the powers of the average home-player, and nearly all his successors have followed his example in their different ways, though what he did because of the need that was in him to express himself, they have often done for the sake of displaying the technique of the virtuoso. But Grieg, almost alone of modern writers, has, in virtue of the qualities which we have been discussing, written home-music rather than concert-music, and consequently among his contemporaries his genius is unique. If he is not played as frequently as he was a few years ago, it is partly because the recital-giving pianist has discovered that he does not write for him, that others can and do enjoy his music without professional assistance; and drawing-room music to some extent reflects that of the concert-room. That he "stands high in all the people's hearts" is certain, and he has done a work which his contemporaries have neglected, so that a high and permanent position is assured to him, and where what is simple and sincere is valued his music will continue to be played and loved.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish shortly "The Garter Mission to Japan," by Lord Redesdale, who, as a member of the Diplomatic Service, has had a long experience of the Far East.—The same publishers announce that Sir Frederick Treves's "Dorset," in the Highways and Byways series will be published early in the month. Mr. Joseph Pennell is responsible for the illustrations.—Messrs. Macmillan have also almost ready Mr. George Wyndham's work on "Ronsard and La Pléiade." It opens with an essay on the famous sixteenth-century association of poets and scholars who called themselves "La Brigade" and afterwards "La Pléiade," in imitation of poets at the Court of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Mr. Wyndham's essay is followed by selections from the poetry of the Pléiade and their school, and the concluding portion of the book is devoted to translations from the various poets in the original metres.

Messrs. Methuen will issue early this month an important book by Edgcumbe Staley on "The Guilds of Florence." Full details of her twenty-one Guilds—historical, industrial and political—are given, together with chapters on her commerce, markets, charities, etc. The illustrations, mostly from old manuscripts, are reproduced for the first time.—The same publishers have almost ready a book on "Beauties of the Seventeenth Century," by Allan Fea, with illustrations from portraits of Lely, Kneller, Cooper, Petitot, etc.; and a new volume in their excellent Connoisseur's Library—"Books with Coloured Illustrations," by Martin Hardie.

Messrs. J. M. Dent have three books of interest in the press: "Picturesque Brittany," by Mrs. A. G. Bell, illustrated in colour; "St. Bernardino of Siena," by P. Thureau Dangin, translated by Baroness von Hugel; and a new translation of Dante's "Vita Nuova."

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. have arranged to publish a work dealing mainly with the formalities necessary to secure protection for copyright and dramatic rights in all countries. It is well known that, owing to the failure to observe the prescribed conditions, valuable rights are frequently lost. The book, which has been written by Mr. W. Morris Colles and Mr. Harold Hardy, Barristers-at-law, will bear the title "Playright and Copyright in all Countries." It deals more fully than has previously been attempted with colonial and international law and the operation of the Berne Convention considered as incorporated into the domestic laws.

Of the Pentland edition of the works of R. L. Stevenson, four volumes will be ready in the middle of next October, and the complete set will be issued, it is expected, in a year from that date. Brief biographical notes will precede the various works. Unlike the Edinburgh edition, a uniform thickness in the volumes of the series will be maintained, and the binding will be in buckram, the covering with which Messrs. Chatto and Windus made readers and admirers of R. L. S. familiar. The edition is limited to one thousand five hundred copies, and Messrs. Cassell reserve the right to increase the price.

In our last issue we announced that Mr. Heinemann had in the press a complete edition of the Works of Henrik Ibsen. Some of the earliest translations of Ibsen's dramas were published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin. In 1889 he brought out Mr. William Archer's version of "The Doll's House," the first complete rendering of the drama, though an earlier translation had been made by Miss Frances Lord, with the title of "Nora." Mr. Archer's translation, in the preparation of which assistance was given by Miss Janet Achurch and Mr. Charles Charrington, was issued in an edition de luxe, with photographs of some of the chief scenes in the play as produced at the Novelty Theatre. In 1889 Mr. Unwin published in his "Cameo Series" Miss Eleanor Marx-Aveling's translation of "The Lady from the Sea," and in 1891 Mr. F. Edmund Garrett's version of "Brand."

The host of Nature-lovers who have availed themselves of "The Wayside and Woodland" series of pocket handbooks to the wild flowers and trees of this country, will be glad to learn that Messrs. Frederick Warne and Co. announce for immediate publication a new volume in the series, dealing with "The Butterflies of the British Isles." Mr. Richard Smith, the editor of The Entomologist, is the author, and he has supplied a popular description and life-history of every native species, together with practical instructions in collecting and preserving the insects. There are coloured plates.

"The Cubs," by Shan F. Bullock, is the title of a new novel which Mr. Werner Laurie is about to issue. In this book Mr. Bullock studies not the Irish peasants as a class, but the Irish boy.

Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack announce that they intend to complete the issue of "The Century Bible." The volumes required to complete the series have been arranged for, and the first is in the press.

Mr. A. B. Todd, of Cumnock, Ayrshire, whose journalistic experience covers a period of over sixty years, who is one of the closest surviving links with Robert Burns, and the annalist as well as life-long champion of the Covenanters, has just seen the proof-sheets of his autobiography through the press. Mr. Todd has always "been a fighter": whatever cause he espoused it had his undivided and strenuous support. At intervals throughout his long life—he is now in his eighty-fifth year—Mr. Todd has written a good deal of verse, and his "Circling Years and other Poems" was widely noticed on its publication thirty odd years ago. Mr. Todd's father was only nine years younger than Burns, and the autobiography will contain reminiscences of the Scottish bard as he appeared to a contemporary. Mr. Todd is naturally a Burns enthusiast; and he had the honour of presiding at centenary celebrations both of the birth and death of Robert Burns.

CORRESPONDENCE

A RHYME TO PORRINGER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Let us render to Cæsar what is due to him and no more. When I was a child, more than fifty years ago, I often read this rhyming doggerel, and have repeated it dozens of times in all, at intervals ever since, so have it rooted in my memory.

The version was:

The Duke of York a daughter had,
He gave the Prince of Orange her;
So there, my friend, two words I've got,
To rhyme with yours of Porringer.

It was put down to Swift, and appeared, I think, in Chambers's Journal—possibly in the "Trifles to smile at," of the original folio issue.

M. PATERSON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The resemblance between one of Canon Ainger's jeux d'esprit, quoted in the ACADEMY of May 19, and an old Jacobite ditty of the eighteenth century tends to strengthen belief in the truth of the saying: "There is nothing new under the Sun."

Compare

The Princess Mary fain would wed,
They gave the Prince of Orange her,
And now it never can be said,
I've not a rhyme for porringer—

(Canon Ainger)

with the following:

Oh what's the rhyme to porringer
Ken ye the rhyme to porringer?
King James the Seventh had a dochter,
And he gaed her to an Oranger . . .

(Jacobite.)

EDMUND J. LUDLOW.

May 26.

CHURCH-GOING-BELL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Cowper in his line—

"The sound of the church-going-bell" happily coined a new word, which should be printed with two hyphens as above. It is, however, always printed and perhaps originally written "church-going bell," as though it were an adjective and noun, and it is this that gives the sense of oddity that many people feel at first sight, who yet appreciate the beauty of the line.

H. S. BARCLAY.

May 27.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My warmest thanks to your correspondent, A. L. Mayhew. In future I shall speak and write without hesitation of the "Parliament-speaking clock," the "battle-marching drum," and the "afternoon-tea-drinking gong." These phrases, I flatter myself, are not only, like Cowper's, "good and idiomatic English," but have a true epic and dramatic ring. Think what a magnificent effect would be produced by such a line as if it occurred in an epic poem! I propose, in imitation of one of our great "dailies," to register it as "copyright in the United States."

"The resonant afternoon-tea drinking gong,"

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

THE WORD "ADOBE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Platt, I would remind that gentleman that Arabic is now a very corrupt language, being largely superseded by Turkish; and the colloquial Arabic of Egypt is as Americanese compared to English.

The only vocabulary I have just now access to, quotes ajorr for "brick," which must be genuine, as it compares so readily with the Assyrian agurru for "fire-baked brick; while igiru is to enclose, testifying to its purpose in building.

Now, the proper word for brick in Spanish is ladrillo, probably connected with the Latin "later coctilis" or burned brick; just as adobe represents the unbaked article. On the general question Mr. Platt seems inclined to separate the Spanish adobar "to dress up," from the Italian addobbare "to deck, to adorn"; and the French adouber "to mend, to repair"; all of which words are inseparably connected with the Latin adobare, as I have shown.

A. HALL.

May 26.

WIT, versus WHITE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The season of Pentecost represents the Jewish "feast of weeks," called the haj-Sebuoth, which occurred seven full weeks after Passover; so it ended on a Sabbath, inclusive. New  $7 \times 7 = 49$ ; thus it was the 50th day, called in Greek pentekostos, falling on our Sunday, the Jewish first day of the week.

It was originally observed for one day only, so the true Pentecost is our Wit-Sunday; so called from the outpouring of the spirit; see Acts ii., when the Apostles spoke with tongues. Our "wit" is from the A.S. witan, to know, as in the "witenagemote," a meeting of wise-men. But in later times the celebration of Pentecost was lengthened, and we have a Monday, a Tuesday in what is called Whit-Sun week, from a different association of ideas.

The fact is that this period, ecclesiastically, was selected for a sort of purification and the examinees were clothed in white, thus the old Wit-Sunday became dominicus in albo or a sort of White-Sunday. Here poor letter "h" is in conflict, and professional dictionary-makers take sides; we might choose for ourselves, but the arbitrary printer steps in and insists on uniformity: as with the spelling of our great dramatist's name, from Shaksbur to Shakespeare, with different meanings.

A. HALL.

A SUGGESTED EMENDATION IN HAMLET

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As you frequently open your columns to questions of words and readings, may I ask you to extend your hospitality to the following suggestion for the emendation of a passage in Shakespeare's Hamlet?

The reading of the passage in question, as found in the earliest quartos, and retained, with variations, in subsequent editions is as follows;

"the dram of eale doth all the noble substance of a doubt to his own scandal"

which is of course nonsense.

Hamlet has been enlarging on the fact that one particular defect—"vicious mole of nature"—often entails discredit upon the whole character of the man. He has glanced at the "little leaven that leaveneth the whole lump," and now borrows a metaphor from the balance.

The crux of the passage lies in the words "of a doubt." We want here a word signifying to "bring down" to "debase." And such a word I think Shakespeare himself supplies.

The verb to "lout" is common enough in the sense (intrans.), cf., to "bend to the earth," to "lout low"; Shakespeare, however, uses it in a trans. and (what is more to our point) figurative sense, in 1. Hen. vi., iv. 3, where we find: "I am louted by a traitor villain," meaning, by my inability to help Talbot, owing to the traitor Somerset breaking faith with me, I am regarded as a "lout," a fool; in a word "I am discredited."

Again we find the word to "lout" used in this same sense of to "debase" in the "Mirror for Magistrates," p. 303, as quoted by Nares, in a passage describing the twofold operation of Fortune:

"Whom double Fortune lifted up or louted,"

i.e., raised and lowered.

I would suggest then that the passage in Hamlet should read

"The dram of evil
Doth all the noble substance often lout
To his own scandal,"

i.e., the little particle (dram) of evil in a man often lowers his (in the main) noble character to his general disparagement.

REGINALD GEARE, B.A.

Lansdowne School, Croydon,
May 28.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

- Leigh, R. A. Austen. Bygone Eton. Being a collection of historical views of the Buildings at Eton College, with descriptive notes. Re-issue. 15 x 11½. Plates xlvii. Eton College: Spottiswoode & Co. 21s. net.
- Bericht der Kommission zur Erhaltung der Kunstdenkmäler in Königreich Sachsen*. Tätigkeit in den Jahren 1903, 1904 und 1905. 10½ x 6½. Pp. 130. Illustrated. Dresden: Meinhold, n.p.
- Royal Academy Pictures*, Parts i. ii. iii. and iv. (complete in five parts). 12½ x 9½. Cassell, 7d. net each.
- 1906 Illustrated Catalogue of the Paris Salon. Containing reproductions in facsimile after the original drawings of the artists. 9 x 5½. Pp. 223. Chatto & Windus, 3s.

CLASSICS.

- The Annals of Tacitus*. Books I. to VI. Translated by Aubrey V. Symonds. New Classical Library. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xiii. 29s. Swan Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. net.
- Gruppe, Dr. O. Griechische Mythologie und Religionsgeschichte. Zweiter Band. 10 x 6½. Pp. viii. 771. Handbuch der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft V. ii, 2, 3. München: Beck; London: Williams & Norgate, M. 15.
- [This volume concludes Professor Dr. Gruppe's work. It contains also the Preface, Contents, Errata, etc. to vol. i., and has an Index to both volumes.]

EDUCATION.

- Buletinul Oficial al Ministerului Cultelor si Instructiunii Publice. Nos 242-253, April 1905—March 1906. Each 9½ x 6½. Bucharest: Göbl.

FICTION.

- Mitford, Bertram. Harley Greenoak's Charge. 7½ x 5. Pp. 353. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
- Inchbold, A. C. Phantasma. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 376. Blackwood, 6s.
- Wood, Montagu. A Tangled I. 8 x 5½. Pp. 228. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- Herring, Paul. The Magic of Miss Aladdin. A humorous romance. Illustrations by Penrhyn Stanlaws. 8 x 5. Pp. 313. Ward, Lock, 6s.
- Calthrop, Dion Clayton. King Peter. 7½ x 5. Pp. 338. Duckworth, 6s.
- Griffith, Major Arthur. The House in Spring Gardens. 7½ x 5. Pp. 306. Eveleigh Nash, 6s.
- Tilton, Dwight. The Golden Greyhound. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 366. Dean, 6s.
- Pierce, Ernest Frederic. The Traveller's Joy. 8 x 5½. Pp. 296. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.
- Grosvenor, Caroline. The Bands of Orion. 7½ x 5. Pp. 332. Heinemann, 6s.
- Tynan, Katharine. The Adventures of Alicia. 7½ x 5. Pp. 311. White, 6s.
- Howard, Keble. The Old Game. 6½ x 5. Pp. 168. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. net.
- [Short stories.]
- Pain, Barry. Robinson Crusoe's Return. 6½ x 5. Pp. 168. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. net.

HISTORY.

- Fraser, Edward. The Enemy at Trafalgar. An account of the battle from eye-witnesses' narratives, and letters and despatches from the French and Spanish fleets. Illustrated. 9½ x 6. Pp. xviii, 436. Hodder & Stoughton 10s. net.

Davey, Richard. The Pageant of London. Forty-five illustrations in colour by John Fulleylove. In two vols. Vol. i.—B.C. 40 to 1500 A.D. Vol. ii.—1500 A.D. to 1900. 9 x 5½. Pp. xxiv, 429 and 649. Methuen, 15s. net.

Eleusis, her Mysteries, Ruins, and Museums. Translated from the French of Demetrios Philios, Director of the Excavations (1882-1894), by Hamilton Gatlif. With plates and coloured plans. 7½ x 5. Pp. 79. Appleton, 5s. net.

[The proceeds of the sale of this book are for the sick and poor of Eleusis.]

Whish, C. W. Reflections on Some Leading Facts and Ideas of History: their meaning and interest. Preliminary volume, with chart. 8¼ x 5½. Pp. 246. Guildford: Billing, n.p.

LITERATURE.

Rickett, Arthur. Personal Forces in Modern Literature. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 228. Dent, 3s. net.

[Contents:—The Moralist: Cardinal Newman; James Martineau. The Scientist: Thomas Henry Huxley. The Poet: William Wordsworth; Keats and Rossetti. The Vagabond: William Hazlitt; Thomas de Quincey. Bibliographical guide and index.]

Duff, David. An Exposition of Browning's "Sordello". With historical and other notes. 9 x 5½. Pp. xx, 224. Blackwood, 10s. 6d. net.

de la Grasserie, Raoul. De la Catégorie du Genre. 7½ x 4½. Pp. v, 256. Paris: Leroux. Etudes de Linguistique et de Psychologie, 6f.

[A theoretical and experimental study of gender in language under three heads: (i) the conception of gender, (ii) its expression, (iii) its grammatical function. M. de la Grasserie divides gender into three kinds, subjective, objective, and artificial.]

Fitz-Gerald, John D. Versification of the Cuaderno Via as found in Berceo's Vida de Santo Domingo de Silos. 10 x 6½. Pp. xiii, 112. New York: Columbia University Press. London: Macmillan. Studies in Romance, Philology and Literature. n.p.

[Contains two facsimiles of manuscripts of the poem at Madrid.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

English Folk-Songs for Schools. Collected and arranged by S. Baring Gould and Cecil J. Sharp. 11 x 7½. Pp. 105. Curwen.

Quiller-Couch, A. T. From a Cornish Window. 7½ x 5. Pp. 367. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 6s.

Traveller's Joy. An anthology. Compiled by W. G. Waters. 6½ x 4. Pp. 319. E. Grant Richards, 4s. net.

Adcock, A. St. John. London from the Top of a Bus. How to see London for 1s. Forty-seven illustrations by Henry Irving. 9 x 6. Pp. 106. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. net.

The Statesman's Year-Book. Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World for the Year 1906. Edited by J. Scott Keltie, with the assistance of I. P. A. Renwick. Forty-third annual publication. Revised after Official Returns. 7½ x 5. Pp. 1604. Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net.

Whates, H. R. Canada: the New Nation. A book for the settler, the emigrant, and the politician. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xiii, 284. Dent, 3s. 6d. net.

[In two parts: (1) The Emigrant in Canada; and (2) An Analysis of Canadian thought. In the first part Mr. Whates has drawn freely upon his letters to the Standard, as a representative of which he visited Canada. His aim is to "encourage carefully selected emigration and the emigration of hardy young men with some capital, much intelligence and determination of character"; but Canada, he points out, is no place for the physically deficient.]

Levy, Oscar. The Revival of Aristocracy. Translated by Leonard A. Magnus. 7½ x 5. Pp. xvi, 119. Probsthain, 3s. 6d. net.

Power, John O'Connor. The Making of an Orator. With examples from great masterpieces of ancient and modern eloquence. 7½ x 5. Pp. 305. Methuen, 6s.

Huggins, Sir William. The Royal Society, or Science in the State and in the Schools. Twenty-five illustrations. 10½ x 7½. Pp. xv, 131. Methuen, 4s. 6d. net.

[Selections from four presidential addresses.]

Mr. Punch on the Continent; Mr. Punch's Railway Book; Mr. Punch at the Seaside. Each 7½ x 4½. Published by arrangement with the proprietors of Punch. The Amalgamated Press, 1s. net each.

[In the "Punch Library of Humour." Designed to provide in a series of volumes, each complete in itself, "the cream of national humour, contributed by the masters of comic draughtmanship and the leading wits of the age to Punch, from its beginning in 1841 to the present day."]

[Messrs. H. R. Allenson, not Messrs. Methuen, are the publishers of Mr. C. S. Horne's "The Relationships of Life," noticed in these columns last week.]

A HOME FOR BOOKS.
Treat your books as your best friends. They will be true to you when all others fail. In other words treat yourself to a

"GUNN"

Sectional Bookcase

Your books will look well in it; they will always be handy, and its specially made doors will keep them free from damage. Built up in sections of any required size, the whole looking like a solid, handsome piece of furniture. Always complete, yet always growing. Full particulars, prices, and name of nearest Agent, post free. Write for "Booklet No. 23" to WM. ANGUS & CO., Ltd., 44 Paul Street, London, E.C.

ANNOUNCEMENT :

OF A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF

"QUO VADIS?"

Mr. JOHN LANE will publish immediately an English rendering of SIENKIEWICZ'S GREAT NOVEL

"THE FIELD OF GLORY."

Sienkiewicz is best known to English readers as the author of the masterpiece "QUO VADIS?"

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON & NEW YORK.

LONDON LIBRARY

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING. President—The Right. Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P. Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; GEORGE MEREDITH, Esq.; ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Esq., F.R.S. Trustees—EARL OF ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; HENRY YATES THOMPSON, Esq.

Committee—Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., LL.D., Dr. J. H. Bridges, Horace T. Brown, Esq., F.R.S., Prof. Ingram Bywater, Prof. Lewis Campbell, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Esq., LL.D., Sydney Gedge, Esq., Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S., Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B., F.R.S., Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D., Mrs. J. R. Green, Rev. W. Hunt, M.A., Litt.D., Sir C. P. Ilbert, K.C.S.I., Sir C. M. Kennedy, K.C.M.G., C.B., Sidney Lee, Esq., Litt.D., W. S. Lilly, Esq., Sidney J. Low, Esq., Sir Frank T. Marzials, C.B., Sir F. Pollock, Bart., Rev. J. H. Rigg, D.D., H. R. Tedder, Esq., Rev. H. Wace, D.D., Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B., A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D., LL.D.

The Library contains about 220,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 3s. a year, with an entrance fee of £1 1s.; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. The NEW CATALOGUE (1626 pp. 4to, 1903) is now ready, price £2 2s.; to members, 25s.

"One of the most sagacious and judiciously liberal men I have ever known, the late Lord Derby, said there was a kind of man to whom the best service that could be rendered was to make him a life member of the London Library."—W. E. H. LECKY.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated] [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER

JUNE

The Prospects of Liberal Finance. By Sir ROBERT GIFFEN, K.C.B.
Russia and England in Persia. By Colonel C. E. YATE, C.S.I.,
C.M.G. (late Chief Commissioner of Baluchistan)

Constitutional Tartars. By Professor A. VAMBÉRY

Lord Durham and Colonial Self-Government. By Miss VIOLET R.
MARKHAM

The Joys of Spain. By AUSTIN HARRISON

Spain under the Saracens. By AMEER ALI, C.I.E. (late a Judge of H.M.'s High Court of Judicature in Bengal)

Mr. Gladstone's Library at "St. Deiniol's, Hawarden." By Mrs.
DREW

Possibilities of Peasant Ownership in Sussex. By WILFRID SCAWEN
BLUNT

Euripides in London. By NORMAN BENTWICH

Ancestral Memory: A Suggestion. By the Rev. FORBES PHILLIPS

"The Law-making Mania." By Sir JOHN MACDONELL, C.B., LL.D.

The Salons and the Royal Academy. By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM

Some Women Poets of the Present Reign. By Miss ISABEL CLARKE

The Education and Training of Engineers—Civil and Naval. By Sir
WILLIAM H. WHITE, K.C.B. (late Director of Naval Construction)

Sunday Schools. By the Rev. E. H. RYCKROFT

Secular Education in the Interest of Religious Truth. By M.
MALTMAN BARRIE

The Government and the Opposition. By HEBBERT PAUL, M.P.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD., 5 NEW STREET SQUARE.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S 6/- NOVELS

HARLEY GREENOAK'S CHARGE.

By BERTRAM MITFORD,
Author of "The Gun-Runner."

THE LOST EARL OF ELLAN.

By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

"A moving piece of narrative."—MORNING LEADER.
"An admirable and interesting story."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.
"Full of admirable pictures of bush life. . . . Excellent humour . . . an enjoyable story."—TRIBUNE.

THE FERRY OF FATE.

By SAMUEL GORDON, Author of "Sons of the Covenant."

"A remarkable novel."—OUTLOOK.
"An imaginative work of considerable distinction . . . a very fine and noteworthy achievement, and a solid and valuable contribution to the serious fiction of the day."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.
"A work of sterling merit . . . a novel of distinction."—JEWISH CHRONICLE.

A MENDER OF NETS.

By WILLIAM MACKAY,
Author of "The Popular Idol."

"The most powerful novel I have read this season. . . . Both the humour and the satire of this admirable novel are excellent."—TRUTH.

RED RECORDS.

By ALICE PERRIN,
Author of "Waters of Destruction."

"Fascinating and exciting."—BLACK AND WHITE.
"Picturesque tales . . . charming art."—SCOTSMAN.
"Mrs. Perrin is one of the finest short-story writers we have. . . . Her work possesses rare sympathy, delicacy, and reticence."—STANDARD.

THE WOMAN IN THE ALCOVE.

By ANNA KATHARINE GREEN,
Author of "The Leavenworth Case."

"Clever and convincing. No one who has read the first chapter will put the book down until he has solved the mystery."—GUARDIAN.

LOVE AND LORDSHIP.

By FLORENCE WARDEN,
Author of "The Heart of a Girl."

"There is scarcely any breathing-space between one thrill and the next. . . . One may open the book at any page almost, and stumble upon a telling incident."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

BEN-HUR: A Tale of the Christ.

By LEW. WALLACE.

EAST OF SUEZ.

By ALICE PERRIN,
Author of "The Waters of Destruction."

16mo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt top, 3s. net.

THE POCKET CHARLES DICKENS.

A Choice of Favourite Passages made by ALFRED H. HYATT.

ALSO, UNIFORM IN SIZE AND PRICE,

THE POCKET R. L. STEVENSON.

THE POCKET RICHARD JEFFERIES.

THE POCKET GEORGE MACDONALD.

TAINE'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Translated by H. van LAUN.

A New Edition in Pocket Size, with 32 Portraits. Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net per vol.; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net per vol.

LITERARY RAMBLES IN THE WEST OF ENGLAND.

By ARTHUR L. SALMON.

With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

LIFE IN MOROCCO.

By BUDGETT MEAKIN,
Author of "The Land of the Moors."

With 24 full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH SEAS.

By CLEMENT L. WRAGGE, F.R.G.S.

With 84 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1779

JUNE 9, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY
(INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER).

ALEXANDER PRIZE.

THE following Subjects have been proposed by the Council:—

- (1) Latin Commerce and Commercial Colonies in the Black Sea, especially in the years 1260-1470.
- (2) The Union of England and Scotland, 1702-7.
- (3) The Political Relations between Great Britain and the United States of America from the Ashburton Treaty of 1842 until the Alabama Award of 1872.

Essays must be sent in before March 31, 1907, to the Offices of the Society, 3, Old Sergeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.

See Staff (honourmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, that on WEDNESDAY, 25th of July next, the Senate will proceed to elect an Examiner in the English Language and Literature, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Prof. J. Lawrence, D. Lit., M.A.

The Examiner appointed will be called upon to take part in the Examination of both Internal and External Students, and will be eligible for two annual re-elections. The remuneration of the Examinership consists of a Retaining Fee for the year, and a pro rata payment for Papers set, Answers marked, and Meetings attended. Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Principal.

Candidates must send in their names to the Principal, with any attestation of their qualifications they may think desirable, on or before MONDAY, JUNE 18. If testimonials are submitted, three copies should be forwarded. Original testimonials should not be sent. (It is particularly desired that no application of any kind be made to individual Members of the Senate.)

By Order of the Senate,

ARTHUR W. RÜCKER, Principal.

University of London,
South Kensington, S.W.
May 1906.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL, WEST KENSINGTON.—An examination will be held at the above School on Tuesday, June 26, 1906, and on the following days for filling up several vacancies on the foundation.—Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Bursar.

ST. PAUL'S GIRLS' SCHOOL, BROOK GREEN, W.—An Examination for foundation scholarships open to girls under 16 years of age will be held at the School on July 10, 11, and 12, which will exempt the scholars from payment of tuition fees. Further particulars may be obtained from the Head Mistress of the School.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 27, 28, and 29 to fill Vacancies in Scholarships and Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the BURSAR, The Bursary, Little Dean's Yard, Westminster.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.
(University of London.)

THE COUNCIL will shortly proceed to fill the vacancy in the Chair of Sanskrit caused by the appointment of Prof. E. J. Rapson to the Chair of Sanskrit in the University of Cambridge.

Applications, accompanied by such testimonials and other evidences of fitness for the post as candidates may wish to submit, should reach the Secretary, from whom further information may be obtained, not later than June 23.

WALTER W. SETON, M.A.,
Secretary.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

ENGLISH DIALECT DICTIONARY by Joseph Wright, 6 vols. imp. 4to complete, published in cloth at £75. 15s. net, offered newly bound in half morocco for £120 net.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BERTRAM DOBEL,
SECOND-HAND BOOKSELLER, AND PUBLISHER,

77 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.
A large Stock of Old and Rare Books in English Literature, including Poetry and the Drama—Shakespeareana—First Editions of Famous Authors—Manuscripts—Illustrated Books, etc. CATALOGUES free on application.

Books Wanted

A RETINO, Capricciosi, 8vo, Cosmopolis, 1860
Army and Navy Gentleman's Companion, 1784
Arnold (Matthew) England and Italian Questions, 1859
Friendship's Garland, 1871
Popular Education in France
On Translating Homer, 1861
Arthur O'Leary, 3 vols, 1844
Artists' Repository, 4 vols. 4to
Art of Cookery, by a Lady, 1747
Art of Manual Defence, 1789
A Sentimental Journal, 2 vols, 1768, or odd
Ask Mamma, in monthly parts or cloth, 1858
Assurance Magazine, vols 1 to 13, or any Astrology, any old books on
A Tale of Rosamund Gray, 1798
Atkins (Sir R.) State of Gloucestershire, folio, 1712
Aucassin and Nicolette, translated by Andrew Lang, 1887
Audsley and Bowes, Ceramic Art of Japan, 2 vols, folio, 1875
Audsley, Ornamental Arts of Japan, 2 vols, folio, 1882
Audubon (J.) Birds of America, 7 vols
Auld Licht Idylls, 8vo, 1888
Australia, any books or pamphlets on, before 1830
Australia, any Views (sets or odd) before 1860
A Vindication of Natural Diet, a philosophical poem, 1813
Bab Ballads, 1869; also More Bab Ballads, n.d.
Bacchus and Venus, Songs and Catches, 1737
Bacon (Francis) any works before 1640
Badminton Library, Hunting, large paper, 1885
Baker (G.) News Jewell of Health, 4to, 1576, or similar works
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

MISCELLANEA GENEALOGICA ET HERALDICA, Vol. ii, First Series (about 1870), wanted; good price given.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury. (Vol. i., 1869 for sale.)

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING.—8d. 1000 words (Remington). Novels, Plays, Duplicating Circulars, etc.—Miss WILLARD, Beaufort House, Osborne Road, Southville, Bristol.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING.—Novels 9d. 1000. Translations, plays, poetry, etc. Miss HANDLY, Bankside, Berkhamsted.

Art

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

EXHIBITION OF CONTEMPORARY GERMAN ART, PRINCES' GALLERY, KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

NOW OPEN, 10 to 6.

ALPINE CLUB, MILL STREET, CONDUIT STREET.—Large Decorative Panels by J. Kerr Lawson are being exhibited by Messrs. Carfax & Co., every day from 10 till 6. Admission one shilling.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

STAMMERING.—The severest and most obstinate cases can now be perfectly and permanently cured by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years; call or write.—Mr. A. C. Schnelle, 112 Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY.
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts, and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscences of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	539	A Literary Causerie :
Literature :		Science in Fiction . . . . .	548
Ab Urbe Condita . . . . .	544	Fiction . . . . .	550
The Likeness of Mary Stuart . . . . .	543	Fine Art :
Unsigned Criticism . . . . .	543	Mr. Augustus John . . . . .	551
Strolling Professors . . . . .	545	Round the Galleries . . . . .	552
Romantic Art . . . . .	545	Music :
Pontenoy . . . . .	546	A Sidelight upon Wagner . . . . .	552
Walt Whitman's Style . . . . .	547	Correspondence . . . . .	554
Tears . . . . .	548	Books Received . . . . .	555
Sumptuary . . . . .	548	Bookshelf . . . . .	556

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

WHEN Mr. Upton Sinclair's novel, "The Jungle," reached us in due course last March from Mr. Heinemann, we put it aside for further consideration. And the more we considered it, the less we felt inclined to have it reviewed in these columns. As a piece of vivid, straightforward and workmanlike writing, it deserved notice; but its workmanship was not the only thing to be weighed. It was, and is, impossible to treat such a book as a work of fiction, for the one important question—the one test by which the work must stand as a manly and daring criticism of life, or fall as one of the lowest pieces of sensationalism ever perpetrated—was just this: Does it tell the truth? If it did not, if Mr. Upton Sinclair had drawn on his imagination for these sickening details to tickle degraded palates, his book would have deserved to stand next to "Maria Monk" in the windows of a certain class of shop, and himself to be reprehended for committing an offence against the public conscience as great as that of any provider of salacious literature. Who in England and among men of letters was to judge whether his facts were true or not?

The judgment has been pronounced, and by the only court which had a right to speak. The United States President, the United States people, have declared that Mr. Sinclair is no panderer to perverted appetite, but a brave man who has dared not only to tell the truth, but to tell it in the form in which it can be most widely distributed and loudly proclaimed. That being so, we cannot but regard it as unfortunate that the Press and the Government of the United States, by taking up one point only of Mr. Sinclair's indictment, have drawn the attention of the public towards one abuse, to the neglect of others which are quite as important and quite as shameful. Some of the daily papers have revelled in the nauseating details of the manufacture of canned and preserved meats. It is good that our food should be pure: it is not good that we should give exclusive attention to our own stomachs when the crimes against society disclosed in Mr. Sinclair's pages are more and worse than that of laying a large number of people open to the chance of being poisoned.

Mr. Sinclair is more than a "pure-fooder"; and it is unfair to him to disregard that fact. The eaters of canned meats may die: the makers of them must die. Caveat emptor: you are not forced to eat canned meat. The miserable Lithuanian or Pole, the Jurgis Rudkus whom political tyranny at home and assiduously spread fairy-tales of wealth to be found abroad drive into the stock-yards of the Meat Trusts, has no choice whether he shall run the risk of death or not. Mutilation, overwork, disease, and tyranny are his certain fate. The revelations which Mr. Sinclair has to make concerning the men, women, and children who work in the stock-yards are more terrible even than anything he has to say of the food that the stock-yards produce. Read his story of how Jurgis Rudkus's wife kept her place in the works, and how, after all, she died; of the house-agent and the "new" house; of the political jobbery and the methods of the police, and you will find disclosed a fouler corruption than any that dead meat can suffer. We should be surprised to hear that Mr. Sinclair is satisfied with the practical good his work has up till now accomplished. His aim was wider than food-reform. Is not man's life more than meat?

A curious contrast might be drawn between "The Jungle" (why, by the way, should Mr. Sinclair have chosen to libel the wild animals?) and Mr. Richard Whiteing's book, "Ring in the New," that was published a month or two ago. In that book Mr. Whiteing carefully abstained from "sensational" details. We saw his heroine starve, indeed, but we saw, not her pains, nor the distressing details of her poverty, so much as the strange spiritual consolation—absurd yet efficacious—which came to her solace. There is truth in both points of view, Mr. Whiteing's and Mr. Sinclair's. Misery has strange alleviations. The present writer has a friend whose fate it was to be four days without food or fire; and his account of his feelings by no means gives the impression of utter misery: he speaks rather of strange mental exaltation. But there are matters with which Mr. Whiteing's method is not brutal enough to deal; there are times when the world needs such a book as Mr. Sinclair's.

The letter from "One in Doubt" which appears in our correspondence columns this week touches on one or two interesting points. It is perfectly true that there are too many newspapers; it is also true that very many newspapers keep "Poet's Corners" and encourage the minor poet by printing, daily or weekly, as the case may be, one or more poems. Those poems are read by the few who care for poetry, and passed over by the many who do not. The few are sometimes richly rewarded for their trouble in reading large numbers of lyrics which bring no pleasure; and they consider that reward more than sufficient to justify all possible encouragement being given by editors and publishers to those who attempt to practise the highest and most difficult of the arts.

The leading literary reviews, too, with one notable exception, devote an occasional article to recent minor poetry, and their treatment of it is always rather on the side of lenience than of harshness. The one thing that all reputable critics of poetry demand is that the minor poet shall think for himself and speak for himself. Facile and watery imitations of mannered poets—Mr. Swinburne and Rossetti are the most commonly imitated—are more than the most indulgent critic can stand; and they are faults which he is far too often compelled to suffer. That all poets have drawn much of their inspiration from other poets is a commonplace: those that have been worthy have worked on that inspiration, have transformed the borrowed material and made of it something of their own. The wise critic will pardon any faults of expression, mistakes in metre, ruggedness, even feebleness in the minor poet so long as his verses show signs of work, of thought, of effort, and of sincerity. Mere idle parrot-work is what he regards as worthy of the utmost severity or the most merciless ridicule.

On the whole, minor poetry, in spite of the dicta to which our correspondent refers, receives a very fair measure of encouragement in modern England, from the Press and the publishers. Still, it could do with more. Too much, indeed, cannot be given it, lest, by some strange chance, there should be one poet lost through timidity or lack of perseverance. But such a case is unlikely. If a man has poetry in him it will out, be the obstacles what they may. As for the bad poetry, it may be left, when once its badness is printed out, to die. It does nothing to check the spread of good poetry. To recommend the poet to find other employment is both impertinent and foolish. So long as the unsuccessful poet does not ask to be supported at the expense of the critic, it is nothing to the latter what occupation the former may follow.

If there is a "slump" in poetry—which, having regard to the number and the quality of the books of verses that reach us, we are quite unable to believe—the fault lies not with critics or publishers' readers, but with the public, which never did and never will read poetry. If only it would! At no period of our history, save perhaps the middle years of the eighteenth century, has the heaven of poetry been more urgently needed than it is now. Book after book of very good verse is published: so far from buying or reading them, the public will not even read the very greatest of acknowledged masters. But we question whether the sale, in reality, much affects the production of poetry. The poet who looks to make a living out of his work is introducing an element into his aim which has no right to be there.

"One in Doubt" is unjust to publishers and their readers. If a publisher makes any money out of a book of minor poetry nowadays, that money probably comes out of the pocket of the poet. Poets have always had to pay for the possession of the divine gift. And yet there is no falling off in the amount of poetry published, as our shelves might show. As to the publisher's reader, so far from being a "hanger-on of literature," he sits at the centre of things and his influence is felt in all quarters. Few people realise how many of their favourite books were written on the initiative and at the suggestion of publishers' readers; few young authors realise how, for the sake of some spark of the real fire, the publisher's reader has overlooked a thousand faults in their work, and recommended the publication of some book that did not really deserve to appear.

The case of editors is even more difficult, for an editor has not only to make up his mind swiftly and amid a thousand distractions on the merit of a work; he has to consider whether it suits the character of his paper or not. Some years ago we read in a daily paper a letter from a gentleman heaping scorn on editors in general because a dozen of them had refused to print passages chosen out of a great English classic and sent in without the author's name. What was that classic? Milton's Samson Agonistes. Let any unprejudiced person put himself in imagination in an editorial chair and see whether he would admit to his paper detached passages of Samson Agonistes. The writer of the letter thought he had proved editors to be fools: he had proved himself to be—unacquainted with the requirements of a journal.

As Ibsen, Taine and Tolstoy were all born in the same year, it is interesting to see whether they have any common characteristics. Like many other young men, Taine and Ibsen began life in a mood of antagonism to existing institutions, and both of them, as years advanced, showed the same dislike of democracy. Both would probably have assented without much difficulty to the doctrine that the majority is always in the wrong. But Taine was less extreme than Ibsen, in that he admired the form of government that works for better or for worse in the British Isles, whereas Ibsen had no particular affection for any established form of rule, but thought that society could only be bettered by the improvement of the individual.

Tolstoy, though he declared Ibsen incomprehensible, had a certain resemblance to him, for both were iconoclasts and both were prophets. Tolstoy's mission has been to destroy all prejudices, so as to pave the way for the establishment of a new order of things, which is to be brought about without the co-operation of the State, and even in opposition to the State. Like Ibsen, he is in sympathy with all who are rebels against society, as it exists at present; even upon anarchism he has cast indulgent eyes. But he has never escaped from the fatalism, which is a characteristic of the East, and his conception of equality is too often one that would be most likely to haunt the brain of a tramp. Tolstoy's remedy for the evil of the world is that man should bathe in the ocean of love as it is set forth in the Sermon on the Mount, whereas Ibsen's prescription is that he should develop and strengthen his individuality. In holding that the human race exists for the production of supermen, Ibsen is at one with Nietzsche; that is, he is an aristocrat, but his tendencies have puzzled even his countrymen, who have called him idealist, materialist, conservative and radical, socialist and anarchist.

Monday of this week was the seventy-third birthday of Viscount Wolsley, who, since his active service terminated in the military sphere, has given a good deal of his leisure to literary matters. It is now twelve years since he gave to the world an authoritative biography of the Duke of Marlborough; his "Decline and Fall of Napoleon" appeared in 1905, and "The Story of a Soldier's Life" three years ago. Lord Wolsley has always had men of letters among his most intimate friends, and of this his library furnishes interesting evidence. "To the Viscountess Wolsley—Whose books and bindings treasured are, 'Midst mingled spoils of peace and war'"—Mr. Lang dedicated his "Books and Bookmen" volume in 1886, which appeared simultaneously with an enlarged edition of Lord Wolsley's "Soldier's Pocket-Book." Mr. Lang concludes the dedication in this happy style:

In this abode of old and new,
Of war and peace, my essays, too,
For long in serials tempest-tost,
Are landed now, and are not lost:
Nay, on your shelf secure they lie,
As in the amber sleeps the fly.
'Tis true, they are not "rash nor rare";
Enough, for me, that they are—there.

In the current Harper's, Mr. W. D. Howells, from the "Editor's Easy Chair," replies to a correspondent who is perplexed as to "why a second-class writer cannot sell his best work, while he can dispose of his worst?" Mr. Howells does not think, with the writer, that those who write for the daily Press lose the "literary touch," nor does he believe that the magazines are degenerating into "newspaperism" in the worst sense. He is convinced that "magazines have never been so conscientiously, so ably and intelligently edited as at present. The poorest of them," asserts Mr. Howells, "has something worth reading in its verse and prose; they have developed a variety and amount of literary cleverness that would have been incredible thirty or twenty years ago."

No one would care about returning to the poor typographical appearance and the too frequently crude, ultra-conventional illustrations which characterised our periodical literature two or three decades ago; but while this is the case, such a magazine as Good Words so far back as the sixties, had more of the imperishable in its pages than have the majority of highly artistic English or Trans-Atlantic magazines of to-day. Many of the serial tales in Good Words in its great days have, when issued in book form, won enduring distinction for their writers, and the same might be said of other contributions. Many noteworthy articles, by writers of more than national fame, are still practically hidden in old volumes of this magazine—contributions by the Duke of Argyll, Dean Stanley, W. E. Gladstone, Norman Macleod, and "Matthew Browne" (W. B. Rands), by "Sadie," Mrs. Craik, Mrs. Macquoid, and Miss Florence Nightingale, by Dr. Livingstone, Lord Kelvin, Mr. Gerald Massey, Mr. J. M. Ludlow, W. R. S. Ralston, and its original publisher, Mr. Alexander Strahan. A volume of selected contributions, in prose and verse, from the earlier volumes of this monthly is likely to be published at no distant date.

In connection with the forthcoming long promised life of William Allingham, the Irish poet who died in 1889, it may be recalled that the late Dr. Birkbeck Hill edited "D. G. Rossetti's Letters to Allingham" in 1898; that a one-volume selection of Allingham's work in prose and verse was published in 1892; and that his complete works, in six volumes, appeared at intervals during the years 1888-93. Born in Ballyshannon in Donegal in 1824, Allingham published his first volume in verse when he was twenty-six. His last volume, "Irish Songs and Poems," appeared in 1887; and "Laurence Bloomfield," the story of a young Irish landlord, regarded by its author as his best work, was issued in 1864. Allingham succeeded Froude as editor of Fraser's Magazine in 1874, and his prose record of walks in various districts of England, which appeared in that periodical under the title "The Rambles of Patrician Walker," was reprinted. To the early numbers of Longman's Magazine Allingham contributed a good many poems.

On the appearance of the one-volume selection from Allingham's work in 1862, an enterprising purveyor of literary "gossip" wrote to William Allingham, Esq., care of the publishers of the volume, asking for information on his plans for future work. The publishers' reply is worth recording: They regretted that they were unable to forward Mr. —'s letter, as they were not sure of Mr. Allingham's present address.

Mr. Crockett, while he dwelt among the Galloway hills, trod a sure literary path with a firm step, avers the anonymous writer of an article in the Scottish Review on "The Decline of Mr. S. R. Crockett;" but the freshness and spontaneity of his earlier years, it is immediately asserted, seem to have vanished. In "Kid M'Ghie," Mr. Crockett labours almost pathetically, this critic says, to be his old self. "The plot is forced, the writing is forced, the humour is forced." "Mr. Crockett has ransacked the Newgate Calendar," we are told, "for episodes, and the whole thing seems to be designed for the syndicates that purvey wildly sensational serials at cheap rate for the weekly newspapers. Mr. Crockett has been pot-boiling with a vengeance . . . He has evidently laboured hard, almost frantically, at his task; but he has given us little to be set by the side of his earlier and healthier work. Only one character in the whole book seems clothed with flesh and blood . . . the rest is leather and prunella of a sadly inferior quality. Let us hope," the severe indictment concludes, "that 'Kid M'Ghie' is Mr. Crockett's nadir." Yet they say that modern criticism is "mealy-mouthed"!

So many famous people have been connected with Buckingham Street, Strand, that any changes in it are of interest. It occupies a part of the site of the palace of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, and when the palace was pulled down the connection of the spot with the family was kept alive by the creation of Villiers Street, Duke Street, Of Alley, and Buckingham Street. It was in Buckingham Street that Fielding lived before he became a student at the Middle Temple, and for many a long year No. 14 was the home of William Etty. The immortal Pepys also went to reside in Buckingham Street in 1684 in a house that may still be seen, though much remodelled, or perhaps, if the Hibernianism be permitted, entirely rebuilt. Opposite it is another house where Peter the Great found lodgings during his visit to London. Here he entertained the king, and here so many sightseers intruded themselves upon him, even when he was at meals, that in a fit of rage he gave orders that no one at all should be admitted. Two Quakers, however, forced their way in, despite the prohibition, and made such an impression that next Sunday the Czar attended one of their meetings. Sixteen years later his remembrance of the Quakers was fresh and green. It is this historic residence that is doomed to disappear.

On Thursday, July 3, Messrs. Hampton and Sons will offer for sale a house at Huntingdon which stands on the site of that in which Oliver Cromwell was born on April 25, 1599. There is nothing particularly remarkable about the present house—which fronts directly on to the road on the outskirts of the town—except the magnificent Chinese wood-carving in the drawing room; but the garden, which is contemporary with and earlier than the days of the great Protector, is exceptionally beautiful. A contemporary portrait of Cromwell by Mary Beales is stated to be also for sale. Another interesting house to be offered for sale by the same firm on Tuesday, June 26, is Ware Priory, Herts, an ancient Franciscan Friary, founded temp. Edward III., and not unknown to history. Reference to the dissolution of this Friary under Henry VIII. may be found in Abbot Gasquet's book on "Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries." Much of the present building dates from the fourteenth century, and some of it from an even earlier age.

The recent appearance of a "pocket" volume of the "Decline and Fall" reminds one of John Henry Newman's criticism of Gibbon in the volume, "Essays and Lectures on University Subjects," published in 1858. Treating of style in his lecture on "Literature," Newman differentiates the artist from the mere dealer in words. The latter can paint and gild anything to order; the artist has his great or rich visions before him, and his only aim is to bring out what he thinks or feels in an appropriate and adequate way. "Gibbon was a great author working by a model which was before the eyes of his intellect, and labouring to say what he had to say in such a way as would most exactly and suitably express it." "You must not suppose," proceeds the Cardinal, himself a master of style, "I was going to commend Gibbon's style for imitation, any more than his infidelity; but I refer to him as the example of a writer feeling the task which lay before him, feeling that he had to bring out into words for the comprehensions of his readers a great and complicated scene, and wishing that those words should be adequate to his understanding. I think he wrote the first chapter of his History three times over; it was not that he corrected or improved the first copy: but he put his first essay, and then his second, aside—he re-cast his matter, till he had hit the precise exhibition of it which he thought demanded by his subject."

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Geographical Society.—Evening meeting, Monday, June 11, at 8.30 p.m. At the Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W. Paper to be read: "The Geography of the Indian Ocean," by J. Stanley Gardiner, M.A. The Right Hon. Sir George T. Goldie, K.C.M.G., D.C.L., F.R.S., president, in the chair.

Royal Colonial Institute.—Meeting at the Whitehall Rooms, Hôtel Métropole, Whitehall Place, S.W., on Tuesday, June 12, at 8 p.m. Paper on "The Development of our British African Empire," by Lionel Declé. Dr. Alfred Hillier will preside.

The Dante Society, 38 Conduit Street, W.—Wednesday, June 13. The Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D. on "The Companionship of Dante." Sir Theodore Martin, president, in the chair.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Sale of English, Continental and Oriental Porcelain, Old English Pottery, a collection of lustre ware, silver plate, bijouterie, etc. Tuesday, June 12, and two following days.—Sale of a collection of Early British, Anglo-Saxon and English Coins formed by an astronomer recently deceased. Monday, June 11 and Tuesday, June 12.—Sale of a collection of Roman coins in gold, silver and bronze formed by an astronomer recently deceased. Wednesday, June 13 to Tuesday, June 19.

The English Drama Society will give two private performances of the fourteenth-century mysteries, "The Salutation," "The Shepherds' Play," "The Kings' Play" (being Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, of the Chester Plays), on Thursday, June 14, at 3 and 8 p.m., in Hollywood Studios, Hollywood Road, South Kensington (by the courtesy of Miss Jennie Moore). Tickets of admission (reserved only, 10s. and 5s.) can be obtained from Mr. Nugent Monck, 20 Regent Street S.W., or Miss Jennie Moore, The Studio.

LITERATURE

AB URBE CONDITA

The Pageant of London.—By RICHARD DAVEY. With forty illustrations in colour by JOHN FULLEYLOVE, R.I. 2 vols. (Methuen, 15s. net.)

WHEN the Preface of a book starts with the assertion of a claim to be "a series of word-pictures of the principal events that have transpired in the Metropolis," the sensitive reader is as likely as not to throw away the volumes, however handsome, without further inspection. The sensitive reader who so treats Mr. Richard Davey's book will lose many a happy and interesting moment. For Mr. Davey is much better than his opening sentence, and his two large volumes are, on the whole, very well written, and full of diverting and even enthralling matter. He does not, as Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer did in a recent volume, catch the soul of this great, horrible, delightful city of ours, and put it in black and white before you: he does not, like Mr. Wheatley, betray himself a scholar of the minutest and most accurate information; but, clearly, he has enthusiasm and originality, wide and pretty deep knowledge of his subject, and he sets that knowledge before you in an agreeable, never wearisome manner. His purpose is not to be minute, but broad: he is an impressionist, not a pre-Raphaelite; but he is not above detail. His book is a store-house of facts, yet never dusty; he gives you vivid impressions, yet never grows vague or sloppy. In a word, if the average reader wants to have a single book on London which will tell him all he wants to know, this is the book. There is more information in Sir Walter Besant's great posthumous "Survey," and the admirable illustrations in that series would make it valuable were the text merely nothing; but those splendid volumes published by Messrs. Black are not within the purses of all of us; whereas for fifteen shillings Mr. Davey will give the reader enough matter to last him and amuse him for many a winter evening.

And what a story it is he has to tell of these events that "transpired"! "London's oldest possession is London's name," and that is older than Tacitus. Who can tell for how long before he wrote that spot on the Thames had been "a place very much frequented by an abundance of merchants' ships"? But we are there in the regions of conjecture. With Roman London we are on safe ground. And yet it is odd to note that:

Beyond fragments of the Roman Wall—which must not be confounded with the mediæval wall that superseded it—and the scant remains mentioned in my text, we have literally no Roman ruin in London—a fact which seems to confirm the more modern theory that Londinium was almost entirely constructed of wood.

Nevertheless, that wooden town was the starting-point of a history which few cities save Rome herself can match for continued importance and pride. London has never been negligible or neglected.

Lancelot swam his horse across the Thames from Lambeth to Westminster, where Arthur and Guinevere held their Court, and whence the false Queen went a-maying with Lancelot prancing by her side. From the quays below the Bridge the penitent Lancelot embarked on his quest of the Holy Grail; and here, too, Isult landed to attend the Council summoned by King Mark. Ursula and her eleven thousand virgin companions sailed from the same quays on their fatal journey to Cologne. Thus London also had its share in the great Arthurian cycle, and in the rest of the legends immortalised by the greatest dramatists, painters, poets, and musicians.

So from the age of legend we pass to the age of mediæval history, that quaint and naïve period when shows and shams were fewer than now. Imagine the scene that follows:

the admission of Prince Henry, Duke of York, and twenty-seven knights, into the Order of the Bath; a ceremony which took place at Westminster in 1499, the recipients of the honour being indeed "Knights of the Bath," for they all of them sat stark naked in hot baths to receive the kingly accolade!

As a proof that Mr. Davey's work is no mere compilation of disconnected scenes and events without thought or method, we may mention the chapters on "Norman London," in which he draws attention to the civilising influence of the Queens whom our Kings drew from France and other Latin countries. Henry II.'s wife, Eleanor of Aquitaine, was particularly effective in this respect; and her successors, the Eleanors of Provence and Castile, Philippa of Hainault, Margaret of Anjou, and others, all came from lands more civilised than our own and all introduced some form or other of art and refinement. Not that all our art was borrowed. In architecture at least the English were original, and Mr. Davey rather sorrowfully contrasts the England of to-day with the England of Plantagenet times, which "was as artistic as Greece or Japan"; a patriotic little dash of exaggeration which will strike pleasantly on the mind of any lover of the antique. It is too late, perhaps, to protest against the sale of the Newgate relics—not all of which were horrible—the threatened destruction of Sir Christopher Wren's house in Billingsgate, the ruthless piecemeal "restoration" of such lovely relics as Barton Street and Great College Street, Westminster, and Church Row, Hampstead. But, too late or not, we will enter our protest. We will even go further than any one has yet dared to do in print, and publicly bewail the loss of Clare Market, of the Portuguese Chapel (which is, we believe, to come down ere long) and the threatened embankment of Westminster. We are fully aware of all the arguments by sanitary inspectors, traffic regulators and other worthy officials. Clare Market was a rookery, and Little Queen Street a desperate nuisance to the man who wanted to get from Waterloo to Euston in a hurry. But life is not all sanitation and train-catching; and before all memory of departed things is lost, we would declare our opinion that Aldwych and Kingsway are vulgar parvenus who will look as ugly and ostentatious as any other Sir Gorgius Midas; and we will drop a tear over the dear, evil-smelling, old nooks and corners, the sagging red roofs, bulging, ripe-toned walls and loved memories—memories of actors, poets, and beauties dead and gone—that thronged Clare Market. There were colour, variety, surprise, association, sentiment, all the tender things that your wide, airy, commonplace, swaggering new streets will never yield.

But we have travelled some distance from Mr. Davey and his Pageants. Open his book where you will, you find that he has an interesting set of associations to display, a striking picture to draw, or a tendency, a movement, to explain. And he connects present and past in a manner which makes both live. There is a sense of continuity roused by the following passage, for instance:

The "White Hart," farther up the High Street [Southwark], was the headquarters of Jack Cade, during his brief occupancy of the city and borough in 1431. Burnt down in 1675, it was speedily rebuilt, and ultimately immortalised by Charles Dickens, who introduces the inimitable Sam Weller upon the scene of this historic hostelry. This, too, has gone the way of so many other interesting relics of past times. A very few old inns still exist in Southwark, and some twenty years ago the writer recollects putting up for the night in one of them, where he was accommodated with a noble old Gothic bedstead, bearing the date 1494, and an inscription on the tester to the effect that "Matthew, Mark, Luke and John" were to "bless the bed that I lie on"!

Mr. Davey has not a few good stories to tell. Some of them are familiar to many people, but none the worse for re-telling; and the various states of society he sets forth make the reader thankful to be born in the days of comparative peace and safety. Let those who travel safely home this evening by 'bus or train to Hampstead ponder the following, which relates to a period only a century and a half ago:

The daring acts of highway robbery between London and Hampstead at last became so frequent as to interfere with the prosperity of the Wells, and the enterprising manager advertised in the public papers that "he had engaged twelve well-known strong men, otherwise prize-fighters, and a number of well-armed fellows, and stationed them at intervals along the more solitary part of the road, for the better protection of the ladies and gentlemen frequenting his place of entertainment."

Such things seem to imply that there is something in "progress" after all; and what progress we have made may be gauged by the fact that "less than seventy years ago, about sixty per cent. of our entire population could neither read nor write."

Mr. Davey is not always accurate, and his style is not always pure, but his book is as good a compendium of the history of London as we know: and it may be added that in dealing with controversial matters, such as the Reformation, though his own leanings are obvious, he is never unfair. Mr. Fulleylove's drawings are pretty, and help to preserve the continuity of the story by showing what the historic places of London look like to-day.

THE LIKENESS OF MARY STUART

Portraits and Jewels of Mary Stuart. By ANDREW LANG. Seventeen full-page illustrations. (MacLehose, 8s. 6d.)

THE fascination which attaches to everything connected with Mary Stuart is naturally intensified when there is question of her vera effigies. Nor can we consider this wonderful. For if on her side personal charm had much to do with her romantic history we on ours are easily attracted by pictures, especially when the subject is known to be beautiful and interesting. Nature forces us to form some sort of image to correspond with the persons of whom we think, and we desire to know whether those preconceived notions are true, or, better still for us, whether we can begin with a clear visual representation of the person about whom we wish to form or reform our ideas. We approach the subject of portraiture, therefore, pleased and expectant. Most of us think that we can take in a picture at a glance, and many fondly imagine that they can read on the features of the face the secrets of the heart. But when we turn to the pictures themselves, what a disillusionment! Of the innumerable Mary Queen of Scots pictures which are found in old mansions, collected in loan exhibitions, and reproduced in prints, Mr. Andrew Lang aptly quotes Marlowe on the vision of Golden Helen:

Was this the face that launched a thousand ships,
And burned the topless towers of Ilium?

"No, no," we cry, critics and non-critics together, "this cannot be." So we turn to the learned for reassurance. Yet, even then, while we regard "the winnowed residue left by critical processes," our hearts grow weary. Most even of these seem "solemn school-girls and wasted devotees." . . . "Only three or four justify her fame for beauty and witchery," and how are we to be sure of their authenticity?

The problem, therefore, is to discriminate the authentic from the fictitious and untrustworthy. A number of capable and enthusiastic scholars have already worked at its solution. Mr. J. J. Foster's "True Portraiture of Mary Queen of Scots," and Mr. Cust's "Notes on Authentic Portraits," are both masterpieces; and, to say nothing of Dr. Williamson, M. Dimier and others, Mr. Andrew Lang has now gone over the ground again with an historical acumen greater than that of any of his predecessors in the field.

The solution which the critics offer may be here indicated, though necessarily only in the simplest terms. First, then, it is antecedently probable that the portraits painted from life should be rare. The greater part of Mary's womanhood (1567-1587) was passed in confinement: even the possession of her picture sometimes spelt danger for its owner. During her reign in Scotland (1561-1567) there was an extreme dearth of artists capable of portrait-painting. During her residence in France, indeed (1548-1561), she was living in an artistic, picture-loving country, and the best-warranted pictures which we have of her date from this time. But she was then but a child, and is represented as such.

The last and most celebrated of these French portraits is by François Clouet. It shows her as a girl-widow of eighteen, in white mourning, and is therefore called Le deuil blanc. We have of this both the crayon sketch at Paris, and the finished picture at Windsor. Of these Mr. Foster's reproductions in colours should also be studied. Photo-prints do them no justice, a point which Mr. Lang should have mentioned. Even though the widow's cap and weeds cut off much of her face and hide the contour, this remains the most authoritative of her portraits, that on which our first ideas ought to be formed.

Then it may be well to pass at once to the monumental effigy at Westminster. Though it was not carved till twenty years after the Queen's death, we may be pretty sure that it gives the features with fidelity, and in effect it corresponds fairly well with Clouet's picture of fifty years before. The features are thus described by Mr. Lang: "Dark narrow eyes, a long, rather low nose, long face, high brow, and pretty oval lower part of the face."

Having thus established the first and last terms of the series, we shall be able to fill in the intermediate pictures with less difficulty, and can see at once why whole classes of pictures, as for instance those of "the Hamilton type," are rejected by the critics.

Mr. Lang's identifications will, I think, be all eventually accepted. The most debated has been the portrait belonging to the Earl of Leven and Melville. Our author displays an infinity of erudition to show that the jewels in this picture are to be identified with those which Mary is known to have possessed. The argument is a novel and a strong one. Still, there are objections which Mr. Lang frankly acknowledges, and we must not be too sure of the conclusion yet.

Very interesting is the little-known miniature of the Duke of Portland, "the lady in a symphony of cream and milk," white being a colour specially affected by the Queen. Mr. Lang has made identification all the more certain by pointing out that the motto Virtutis Amore is an anagram of the name "Marie Stuart," but he does not notice that the white lady is lying propped up in bed. This makes it very probable that her sickness of 1566 is represented, the motto referring to Mary's "godlie and vertuous sayings," during her illness, which were a good deal talked about afterwards.

An important identification again is that of H. Oudry, who painted Mary in 1577, when she was in captivity. Mr. Lang finds that he was or had been the queen's embroiderer, which accounts for his want of skill. There is a true saying that amateur portraits are always more or less caricatures. Mr. Lang is perhaps unnecessarily severe on Oudry's want of skill, which is, after all, easily understood. Lady Milford's miniature should not be passed unnoticed: it is probably the last picture painted of the queen during her life.

In his "Conclusion" Mr. Lang claims to have established for some thirteen pictures "complete proof" that they are "contemporary and authentic, or at least are related closely to others which did possess those qualities," and some of these thirteen come down to us in a considerable number of early copies. Considering the gloomy prospects under which our researches began, such a conclusion may be considered highly satisfactory.

J. H. POLLEN, S.J.

UNSIGNED CRITICISM

Longinus on the Sublime. Translated by A. O. PRICKARD, M.A. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d. net.)

ANONYMOUS genius will for some minds always have an irresistible fascination. Even where an author's name is not forgotten, if the story of his life has perished, there will not be wanting some ready romancer to image it forth for the satisfaction of the curious. And, paradoxically enough, in at least one instance a writer, of whose life some particulars were demonstrable, has been thereupon transformed by some abracadabra of cryptograms into the shadow of another, so that the charm of anonymity may invest his writings.

The book of which Oxford has now given us a translation for the general reader, as Professor Rhys Roberts a little while back gave us a scholar's edition, has had a history that should interest all lovers of problems and mysteries. For any influence it noticeably exercised on subsequent literary criticisms or for any unmistakable references to its doctrines, it might never have been in existence till Robortello published it 1554. Yet since that date there is scarcely a single important critic of literature who does not betray, directly or indirectly, an acquaintance with "Longinus 'On the Sublime.'" The Cambridge editor has collected a list of over sixty translations and editions, and even this is incomplete; for, as we write, there lies before us an anonymous English translation of 1751 with the book-plate of Alexander Brown, Glasgow.

How comes it that a work so generally recognised to be of classic genius was lost to the world till the sixteenth century? Of the eleven manuscripts which give us the text, all but one are no older than the fifteenth century, and that one manuscript, now preserved in Paris, is probably the tenth-century parent of the rest. The early editors from some of the late manuscripts attributed the book to one "Dionysius Longinus," and in our old translation—as in all other books on the subject till recently—this is taken to be the politician and philosopher who acted as adviser to Queen Zenobia, and who, having encouraged her to defy the Emperor Aurelian, was executed by the conqueror. The description of the book in the index to the Paris manuscript as "of Dionysius or Longinus," and in the Codex Laurentianus at Florence as "of an anonymous writer," were considerable reasons for discrediting this view. And now examination of the vocabulary, and of the authors quoted, has shown that the work is in all probability of the first century and by a resident at Alexandria. Again we are led to speculate on the fortunes of the book—buried in obscurity for nine or rather fourteen centuries, as absolutely as any of the works at last recovered from the dustbins of Oxyrhynchus.

But it is not the romantic adventures of the text which alone constitute the interest of the work. In discussing the necessity for high and noble thoughts as the natural material of sublimity, our author writes:

Thus too the law-giver of the Jews, no common man, when he had duly conceived the power of the Deity, showed it forth as duly. At the very beginning of his Laws, "God said," he writes—What? "Let there be light, and there was light, let there be earth, and there was earth."

We can almost fancy that he went to school with—let us say, Apollos, the "Jew of Alexandria." But he was no Jew himself: for he contrasts "our" Demosthenes with Cicero—Mr. Prickard's version, "our defeat" (said of Chaeronea), which an unwary reader might be inclined to quote also, is unfortunately inexact.

Was it contact with the sublimity of the Old Testament that made our critic alive to the difference between the Sublime and the Distinguished in Style? For, however embryonic it may be, the idea of the Sublime as a separable and definite quality in style appears here first in criticism. Coleridge, indeed, in his ample but loose way declared that he never could discover anything sublime "in our sense of the term," in the Classical Greek Literature—and this though he won a medal for a Greek Ode. "Sublimity," said he, "is Hebrew by birth." But it is hard to understand in what sense such general statements can be taken without qualification. Most readers of Æschylus would acknowledge that they have been "awed" by the sublimity of that poet in some passage or other. And, if we concede that the sublime is there, we are driven to suppose that the modicum of truth in Coleridge's statement is that the contact with the patent and easily recognisable Sublimity of Isaiah or Moses disengaged the latent distinction in the Greek mind, so that, at last, what was before confused with other forms of elevation was dimly, if not clearly, differentiated.

Mr. Prickard thinks that a true Greek, if brought in sight of the Victoria Falls, would have wondered, not with "the wonder which hears a voice warning him that the ground is holy" but with "the wonder of curiosity as to its hidden origin and mysterious periods of fullness," "the wonder which says 'I want to know!'" And he thinks analogously that it is hardly like a true Greek that his author tests intellectual greatness, or rather sublimity, by the awe which it inspires. Was the true Greek, then, we are constrained to ask, a sort of "inspired idiot" who achieved the sublime by accident, and could not explain his success till he had met the Hebrew? Or is it not more in harmony with what we know to be the normal development and course in all human activity, to suppose that the Greek, if more seldom than the Hebrew yet as unmistakably, spoke and wrote sublimely by unreasoned instinct, and afterwards in the maturity of his race learnt a self-conscious art of the Sublime? But the eternal problem still confronts us of explaining why, as soon as art can interpret itself and endures self-criticism, it loses its initiative and creative originality. This is not the place to raise this question: we may content ourselves with observing that the apparent insensibility of the Greek to sublimity is explicable, as has been just now hinted, without supposing that Greeks universally were of the pattern exhibited by Mark Twain's Yankees.

Professor Rhys Roberts wanted to reduce his author's sense of the Sublime, as a definite quality of style distinguishable from others, to an inappreciable variation of expression. He would have elevation, dignity, grandeur, eloquence to bear the same sense. Mr. Prickard seems to be on safer ground when he follows the old tradition. It is true that the writer speaks of diction, and composition, i.e., arrangement of words, and figures both of thought and of language as important instruments for sublime expression, but to deduce from this what Professor Roberts deduces is to ignore some very direct remarks of the author. Sublimity, he says in Mr. Prickard's translation is always an eminence and language . . . it is not to persuasion but to ecstasy that passages of extraordinary genius carry the hearer . . . the marvellous, with its power to amaze, is always and necessarily stronger than that which seeks to persuade and to please. . . . Sublimity, we know, brought out at the happy moment, parts all the matter this way and that, and like a lightning flash, reveals, at a stroke and in its entirety, the power of the orator.

And in a later passage he expressly says:

I am not satisfied with the definition given by the technical writers. Amplification is, they say, language which invests the subject with greatness. Of course this definition may serve in common for sublimity, and passion, and tropes, since they, too, invest the language with greatness of a particular kind. To me it seems that they differ from one another in this, that Sublimity lies in intensity, Amplification also in multitude.

He goes on to declare that the strength of Demosthenes, who appeals to passions and "has a large element of fire and of spirit aglow," is in sheer height of sublimity, while that of Cicero is in its diffusion. An Englishman will hardly read the admiring criticisms of Demosthenes without thinking of another orator who breathed as high and intense a patriotism as the Athenian and with his last words in the House of Lords showed as indomitable a spirit as that which bore the defeat at Chaeronea. And this brings us to one of the most valuable qualities in our author.

He is not afraid to count as the first element in sublimity "the faculty of grasping great conceptions," and even if it be a gift rather than a thing acquired, yet so far as is possible we must nurture our souls to all that is great, and make them, as it were, teem with noble endowment. . . . Sublimity is the note which rings from a great mind, or, as the old translator turns it: "the Sublime is an Image reflected from the inward greatness of the Soul."

All who would wish to have criticism attuned to respond to the highest tones of literature will welcome the revival of interest in this "golden" treatise, and Mr. Prickard's translation—easy, modern in tone, generally accurate—possesses an indefeasible title to the consideration and esteem of all interested in literature.

STROLLING PROFESSORS

Rambles in Brittany. By FRANCIS MILTOUN. Illustrated by BLANCHE McMANUS. (Duckworth, 6s. net.)
Esto Perpetua. Algerian studies and impressions. By H. BELLOC. (Duckworth, 5s. net.)

THE work of two earnest men, each anxious to instruct the public in his own learning, lies stored up in the volumes to which the authors have given these alluring titles. Mr. Miltoun's method is to cram as many facts as possible, no matter how miscellaneous and ill-assorted, into the minds of his pupils. He takes in order every township and village which he has managed to discover in Brittany, and sets forth all the information that he has been able to collect from maps, guide-books and inscriptions studied on his hurried journey. His book is scrappy and inconsequent, a confused sequence of facts, set down with no idea of arrangement, but apparently in the exact order in which they were acquired. It is thus a typical guide-book, not full or scientific enough to be of use to one trying to collect statistics, and written in so dry and schemeless a fashion that it cannot possibly interest the stay-at-home reader, who might hope to gain from it some general impression of the country of which it treats. The author will tell you that one part of Brittany is more fertile than another, that one town has more population than another, that this church is older than that, and that the catch is not equally large in every coast town where the sardine fishery is carried on. In his passion for imparting information he will even inform you that: "The French do not use the meridian of Greenwich"; nay, he will teach you English, and point out for your benefit that by good cheer "is really meant good fare." But here he stops. He speaks constantly of the "manners and customs" of various places, yet relates little that cannot easily be met with in almost any province of France. Though he obviously knows well what he calls "the lay of the land," and is as familiar with the roads and lanes as can be expected of one who views everything from a fast-travelling automobile, yet he seems to have gathered singularly few impressions by the way. He does not appear to have been struck, except very superficially, by any piece of scenery, to have met with any incident worth recording or to have encountered any human beings of interest. At any rate, he does not enable his readers to see anything which he saw or to participate in any sensation which he may have had. One or two things, it must be confessed, have been seen by Mr. Miltoun in a way quite his own, and are consequently recorded in an original and unexpected manner. For instance, at Pont Aven he saw girls with black skirts "plaited like an accordion." At Pornic he saw "the port, the bay, and the canal which empties into the salt waters of the Atlantic," and they seemed to him to form "a delightful setting for artists' foregrounds, be the backgrounds what they may." He gives us also a delightful glimpse into the "manners and customs" of the boats on the Loire below Nantes: "they are known," says he, "as lighters, barges and tenders, and go down with the river current and return on the incoming ebb." Notwithstanding an occasional surprise of this kind, the style of the book is monotonous in the extreme. A place is either "important" or else it "should be included in the itinerary"; interesting buildings are all either "literary shrines" or "ecclesiastical monuments," and so forth. If, without giving himself any extra labour, the author had neglected a few pieces of historical or statistical information, and had spent the time thus saved in correcting his book, he might have altered such questionable phrases as "the change became permanent," "the town itself numbers three thousand inhabitants, but it does not look it," "the condition of the inhabitants of Pontiny does not differ from most folk elsewhere"; he might have avoided such unnatural matings of language as "La Pompe, or the Fontaine" and "La gare de Cornbourg is not Combourg"; and he might have thought twice before asserting that any Frenchmen are in the habit of saying: "La mer est si grand et nos bateaux si petits."

Mr. Belloc, alas! has changed sadly since he wrote "The Path to Rome." He has joined the ranks of the Professors. His book is, of course, well written, and it is a relief to turn to "Esto Perpetua," the very title of which has an air of decent calm and rest, much needed by one who has just alighted, dusty and shaken, from Mr. Miltoun's scholastic motor-trip. Nor is his manner that of Mr. Miltoun. He does not bully us with exact information; he is like one of those lecturers or divines, to whom most of us have listened at some time, who, by their air of finality and easy flow of ornate speech, come near to persuading their hearers that their point of view is the only tenable point of view, and that what they know not is not knowledge. He who listens to Mr. Belloc hears expounded the only reasonable explanation of the past history of Algeria, the precise limits to which modern European policy can and ought to go in that country, and what her future must infallibly be. Many of his theories it is not our business to discuss here. Few people, probably, will worry themselves much about them. His points were worth making and he makes them well. It is true that once or twice he is apparently so carried away by his theme that he makes statements which it would be difficult to substantiate. Does he seriously think, for instance, that the Berbers harassed the Carthaginians because they felt "a vague sense of cousinship with the Italians"? And had he utterly forgotten—to take one period alone—our Elizabethan age, when in his general eulogy of the first four centuries A.D. he wrote the following sentence?

It is true that plastic art, and to a less extent letters, failed: for these fringes of life whose perfection depends upon detail demand for their occasional flowering small and happy states full of fixed dogmas and of certain usages.

But it is not because we may disagree with Mr. Belloc's doctrine that we quarrel with him. We do so on the ground that he has written a treatise instead of a delightful book of impressions and anecdotes—especially as in the last sixty pages of the book he shows us what he might have done in this way. These pages will be read with pleasure by those who knew him of old, as he tells of his walk by night along a lonely road, his conversation with casually met persons, his wandering in an abandoned town and his first sight of the desert. Of course, Mr. Belloc knows quite well that neither those who like his impressionism nor those who devoutly accept his teaching will care for the conventional sketch which he has placed as a frontispiece to his book. This depicts a large and self-advertising blue mountain with certain meaningless blood-coloured and saffron stains behind it, and, in the foreground, a poor palm, whose nearest and furthest leaves show an identical shade of bright green. He has put it there as a gibe at the public. He expects the Many-Headed Beast to laugh with him when he laughs at it, and to become reverent as soon as he grows serious. Can it be that he is just the slightest bit too sure of his position?

ROMANESQUE ART

Histoire de l'Art depuis les premiers temps chrétiens jusqu'à nos jours. Tome I., seconde partie. Paris: Armand Colin.

In this volume we have the second instalment of one of those comprehensive treatises due to the collaboration of a number of specialists which are fashionable at the present time. The supply of such books is created by the demand of an intelligent public which refuses to be satisfied with less than the best expert opinion presented in a palatable form. The present volume is the work of a group of connoisseurs whose headquarters are in the galleries of the Louvre, and all of them have already, by the scientific method of their investigations and the lucidity of their exposition, established their claim to speak with authority on the subjects which they profess. When we find Romanesque architecture treated by M. Enlart, illustrated manuscripts by M. Hasekff, and ivories by M. Emile Molinier, we know that each of these branches will be handled with authority. M. Michel, the general editor, concludes the volume with a suggestive chapter on the broader aspects of the history of art and also contributes a valuable study of Romanesque sculpture in France, which we welcome as the first comprehensive treatment of this subject. This is supplemented by a section on Romanesque sculpture in Italy, the preparation of which has naturally been entrusted to M. Emile Bertaux, well known to students of mediæval art in Italy by his recent volume in the "Bibliothèque des écoles françaises d'Athènes et de Rome," a remarkable monument of patient research and critical insight.

The value of such a work of reference as we have before us is dependent not merely upon the authority of its text, but also on the number, choice and adequacy of its illustrations. The cheapening of photographic processes has made it possible for the publisher to do far more for the reader than could be attempted even a few years ago. We may mention in this connection M. Salmon Reinach's "Apollo," which with its six hundred illustrations, unpretending as they are, furnishes an index to the whole history of art, and Professor Venturi's "Storia dell' Arte Italiana," a work which, though slipshod and inaccurate in substance, yet derives a value from its wealth of illustration. Now, the present work is in this respect uneven and somewhat disappointing, and the reason is evidently to be sought in the desire of the publisher for economy. The architectural sections are, it is true, freely illustrated from photographs supplied by M. Enlart, who has travelled widely and made good use of his camera. We are thus introduced to a number of unfamiliar examples of the art, for which we are duly grateful to M. Enlart: nevertheless, his negatives do not always rise above a moderate amateur standard—as, for instance, in the case of the remarkable lantern of Zamora Cathedral—and the undersized process-blocks which have been made from them are often of decidedly poor workmanship. M. Michel's chapter on sculpture, which is copiously illustrated from the series of excellent photographs issued by the Commission des monuments historiques, is thus rendered more attractive and also more instructive. Again, a liberal provision of ground-plans is essential to the understanding of architecture; but the publishers of this book have contented themselves with a meagre selection of line-blocks after Dehio and Bezold, supplemented by a few plans of French churches.

We are not surprised to find that a French publication should devote a large proportion of illustrations to French examples. At the same time, England seems to be treated in a somewhat niggardly spirit. Norman ecclesiastical architecture in this country is represented only by eight small blocks—two doorways, two towers, details of Durham, Romsey and Fountains and a general view of Southwell; while in military architecture we find only a poor illustration of Norwich keep. And this paucity of illustrations corresponds with the meagre and perfunctory treatment meted out to English architecture by M. Enlart. He allows, it is true, that England possesses a greater number of Romanesque cathedrals than France and that they are of greater importance than the French examples (p. 519); but the statement is followed by a bare list with dates, and the whole section is disjointed and is not free from misspellings (Rothbury, Mardstone, Eriesham, etc.)

and other mistakes, e.g., Fig. 252 is described as "Romsey Abbey (Yorkshire)" (sic). On the other hand, M. Enlart has given us not only a full and accurate account of the various schools of Romanesque architecture in France, but a valuable section (amongst others) on the interesting Scandinavian churches in wood or brick, the forms of which are derived from Carolingian models and are connected through these with the Byzantine tradition. In the controversy as to the part played by Italy in the elaboration of Romanesque principles he takes, as we should expect, the side adverse to assigning an early date to the great churches of Lombardy; as to the relations of Italy with France his position is not quite so clear, for on p. 540 he speaks of the "undeniable influence" exerted by Italy on South France (and even perhaps on Normandy); but the tendency of the chapter is to emphasise the receptivity of Italian artists. The truth is that the problems here raised have not yet found their solution; the like questions arise in the domain of sculpture, where M. Bertaux frankly admits that the early date of such monuments as the capitals of Sant'Orso at Aosta and the bas-reliefs of Vezzolano, which belong to the twelfth century, yet present features of unmistakable similarity with French sculptures of later date, creates a serious difficulty. Nevertheless, he holds firmly to the doctrine of French influence. We venture to think that in dealing with the art of the early Middle Ages it will be found better to disregard the barrier of the Alps, and to treat France and Northern Italy as a single artistic province. Even M. André Michel, in his extremely interesting chapter on French sculpture, treats the question with less confidence than M. Bertaux. The latter describes Benedetto Antelami as "an artist who was acquainted with French art, both Southern and Northern," and suggests that he may have served an apprenticeship to French masters at Chartres and at Arles. M. Michel, on the other hand, in demonstrating the eclectic character of Provençal sculpture (as against Vöge), is prepared to admit "Lombard importation" (and especially an acquaintance with Antelami's work) as a factor in the movement which produced as its masterpieces St. Gilles and St. Trophime at Arles. We are glad to find that these divergences of view have not been obliterated by the editorial steam-roller; it is for the reader's advantage that the unsolved problems which lend a fascination to the historical criticism of art should not be slurred over.

Space forbids us to enter into detail as to the other chapters of this volume. We would only note that M. Maurice Prou, in a very brief survey of numismatic history, does ample justice to the artistic merit of Offa's coinage, but does not include a single specimen amongst his illustrations, and that the editor's closing chapter proves him an apt pupil of Lucien Courajod, to whose teaching the historian of mediæval art owes an incalculable debt. We may add that the value of the book is greatly enhanced by the admirable bibliography which concludes each chapter.

H. STUART JONES.

FONTENOY

Fontenoy and Great Britain's Share in the War of the Austrian Succession, 1741-48. By F. H. SKRINE. (Blackwood, 21s. net.)

THE hero of Fontenoy was Maurice de Saxe, and the chief interest of the campaign centres round that fine soldier, of whom it was said by Frederick that he might be "the professor of all the generals in Europe." Without Saxe the battle would have been an uninteresting affair: with him it only forms a link in a chain of events. Mr. Skrine's book deserves attention, because he has shown the place occupied by Fontenoy in that chain, and especially its connection with the Scottish rising of 1745. It was, indeed, difficult for the writer to know what could be excluded from a book to which he had given so ambitious a title. Starting with Dettingen and ending with the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle sounds simple enough; but it involves excursions to India as well as to Scotland, and also necessitates a survey of Great Britain and France in 1740. For a civilian to attempt so great an undertaking was a particularly bold thing, but, after all, some of the best military history of the present day has been written by laymen, so that Mr. Skrine had many precedents. When he confines himself to biographical facts, about Saxe, Ligonier, or Wade, he is at his best: his account of military operations is not so good, though by no means unattractive, and one of his most interesting chapters is that on "The Armies and their Leaders." This subject is one that has to be mastered if the operations are to be understood; but it is difficult, and the average reader's knowledge of it may be expressed by Kipling's verse:

The men that fought at Minden, they was armed with musketoons,
Also, they was drilled by 'alberdiers;
I don't know what they were, but the sergeants took good care
They washed be'ind their ears.

Mr. Skrine's explanations are attractive but not always accurate. His statement about the origin of the Buffs is not only wrong, but gives the idea that he has not delved very deep into the history of the army, an impression which is certainly confirmed by the inadequate bibliography printed at the end of the volume, and it would be easy to quote many instances of carelessness in the book, which suggest that it has been written in haste. For instance he says (p. 104): "François, Duc d'Harcourt (1679-1750). Fought at Ramillies at seventeen." This statement shows either that Mr. Skrine does not know the date of Ramillies or else that he is very careless. And what does he mean by rationale, a word of which he is very fond? He seems to use it as the equivalent of objective, of object, and of function, in different passages. "The rationale of fusiliers was to guard artillery," he writes, "and for this purpose they carried a chevaux de frise," etc. Surely here the word function would have served his purpose, and he might have improved his grammar by writing "a cheval-de-frise," which is a perfectly legitimate expression.

The object of the book, however, is obviously to stir up the English people of the present day to the performance of their duty as citizens. A sermon disguised as history, with Saxe's rêveries as text and a sort of prefatory bidding prayer by Lord Roberts is what the book amounts to, and no doubt, it is a very worthy idea. Lord Roberts proclaims the book to be a trumpet-call to Englishmen who do not seem to understand that alliances and ententes, though excellent in their way, are of little practical value unless we have an army powerful enough to protect ourselves, and be of use to those with whom we are allied.

Fiction "with a purpose" has rather gone out of fashion, and history with a purpose takes its place. The preacher, Mr. Skrine, makes the most of his text. He states, without citing his authority, that we have deteriorated physically; affirms that "there is no surer indication of deteriorating national fibre than a tendency to rely on others rather than on our own strong arm"; and is even moved, in a footnote about the Arquebusiers de Grassin (a regiment formed from bootblacks and vagabonds in Paris) to say "what magnificent raw material is now rotting in our London streets"! This view of the study of history is by no means new, but it is seldom that the moral is emphasised with such zeal as Mr. Skrine has shown. If his historical knowledge were equal to his patriotism, the book would be remarkable. Colonel Lonsdale Hale's study of the People's War in France is the only military history, published in recent years, which effectively combines the teaching of its subject with the enforcement of a moral: but Col. Hale gave thirty-five years of study to his subject—the Franco-German War—before he published his masterpiece.

WALT WHITMAN'S STYLE

Days with Walt Whitman. With some Notes on his Life and Work. By EDWARD CARPENTER. (Allen, 5s. net.)

MR. CARPENTER is, perhaps, the only living writer who can claim to have handled rhythm in the same spirit as did Whitman with any considerable success. And this gives peculiar interest to his study of the American poet's style, a subject which after half a century is still under discussion. To the debate Mr. Carpenter contributes less by formal criticism than by a re-statement of Whitman's doctrine with the insight of a fellow craftsman.

He admits sundry failures in "Leaves of Grass," due now to a lapse in humour, now to some affectation or mannerism, or again to the obtrusion of the writer's set purpose: but he contends, and rightly as we think, that such faults and eccentricities did not arise from lack of literary ability. This is now generally admitted. After all deductions, Whitman is recognised as a master of phrase and of rhythm. The interest centres now in definition. Granted he is a master—then in what field?

While leaving it still somewhat indefinite, Mr. Carpenter helps us toward an answer. Following along the lines already laid down in those suggestive studies of Expression which he gathered together a few years ago under the title of "Angels' Wings," he points out, Platonically, that perfect form must always be decided by the nature of the thing to be expressed. Any change, whether of a word or of a cadence, will alter the essential meaning suggested. If this be admitted (as, indeed, it must be), our question will be seen to turn upon the subjects of Whitman's work. Whether he failed in this poem or in that, can only be decided in so far as we can show whether or no he failed in the expression of his idea.

Criticism is rendered the more difficult by the character of the ideas which he attempted to express; or, indeed, we may say, of his idea, for he apparently simplifies the task of his critics by declaring the unity of his work, the single theme of "Leaves of Grass." But that theme is extremely complex, and the unity is always emotional rather than intellectual. It is, as it were, a "personality," and, even so, a complex and evasive one. Thus the breadth and flexibility of the rhythm—the long forward-flowing recitatives—correspond, so Mr. Carpenter asserts, to "an extraordinarily vast and inclusive" mood or personality.

The suggestion seems to be that Whitman's mastery lies especially in the region of mystical emotions so large in their suggestion that criticism finds itself without a satisfactory standard by which to measure them. At first sight this looks uncommonly like an escape from the issue. But Mr. Carpenter does not wish to escape. He appeals to such readers as have responded to the peculiar stimulus of "Leaves of Grass," asking whether they have found such a meaning expressed therein. It is only necessary to recall such words as those of the late J. A. Symonds in order to acknowledge the justice of this position:

these phrases are redolent of the very spirit of the emotions they suggest, communicate the breadth and largeness of the natural things they indicate, embody the essence of realities in living words, which palpitate and burn for ever.

When discussing the special character of the rhythms Mr. Carpenter says:

here underneath, all the time, one feels a subtle impalpable metre pulsing. Some one possibly may be able to disentangle and define that metre: but I confess that I can't—simply because, each time I read, the meaning holds and fills my mind too full.

We have not left ourselves space to discuss Mr. Carpenter's exposition of that "meaning." It is given partly in two personal studies made in America during the years 1877 and 1884, and partly in the chapter on "Whitman as Prophet." To this latter there is appended an interesting comparison of passages taken from Whitman and the Upanishads. The chapter on "Whitman's Children" is of real biographical value.

TEARS

SOMETIMES when I was near you
The tears would fill my eyes—
To see and feel and hear you
Linked pain to ecstasies.

Now you are gone the stress is
That I must play my part,
And smile while no one guesses
The tears that fill my heart.

DOROTHY FRANCES GURNEY.

SUMPTUARY

Inter silvas academi querere verum.—HORACE.

THE modesty with which Professor Finckel-Smyth, in the preface to the first of the five great volumes before us ("Dress and Manners of the Twentieth Century") speaks of "the industry and research that are necessary in writing on so wide a subject" is characteristic of this profound and brilliant scholar; but we ourselves must not, in praising his diligence, fail in recognition of the magic and genius whereby he has invested his somewhat musty subject with warmth and colour and life. There were many difficulties in the way. We must remember that the Deliverance (Authors) Act of a century ago (which Professor Finckel-Smyth justly calls "The Magna Charta of English Letters"), in proscribing all authorship save that practised by Imperial Patent (and compassing thus the downfall of the Newspaper Nabobs), included the destruction by fire of the whole of the existing printed matter with the exception only of that selected to repose in the Imperial Museum; and of this remnant also the greater part perished in the memorable disaster of forty years ago. Zeal such as that of the Professor, therefore, in the face of such privation, is beyond praise; and for a literary romance to parallel the finding by Professor Finckel-Smyth of the documents in the ruins of the tunnel under the Thames, we have to go back to the discoveries of Grueber and Tischendorf.

It is not possible to do more than select for comment a few of the multitudinous articles of apparel, the names and functions of which the Professor has so indefatigably investigated. We confess to some surprise (since we had imagined ourselves to be not altogether ignorant of the subject) in learning that the expression commonly used to denote a set or suit of clothes, the shell, is to be taken literally; we had identified this exceedingly simple attire with a much earlier century, and had, indeed, not considered it to have been at any time indigenous to these islands. It is interesting also to learn that the term bags was, in effect, synonymous with trousseau; but that, after all, leaves us little wiser as to the precise cut of this garment or garments, and we hesitate to follow the learned author in two of his conjectures: namely, that the odd phrase, "cut saucy over the kicksies" is derivable from the provincial French "qué qu' c' ests" (or as we should say, "what d'ye call 'ems"), and that the term bell-bottomed meant that the hem of the bag or bags was actually adorned with silver bells (cf. cap. II9, pearlies).

These, however, are moot points, and the broadsheets of the period, which in a perfect state would still leave room for ambiguity, lie under glass, too frail even for the reverent handling of Professor Finckel-Smyth. A more serious matter, as it seems to us, is that of the now historical word clobber; and though we have little desire to revive the fierce controversy that raged about this article of dress a quarter of a century ago (in which, if we remember rightly, Professor Finckel-Smyth himself played a distinguished part), yet it seems to us that in receding from his original position, namely, that the clobber was a specific garment and not a contesseration or suit, he is traversing the facts as they are known to us. In the songs of the mimes of the period in question references to bond-street clobber are, happily, not rare; and we believe it was the Professor himself who first pointed out that the barbarous phrase "bond-street" meant no more than bond-strict or strait, thus showing that the clobber was so designed as to confine the arms to the sides after the manner of the strait-waistcoat. Again, we know not how the Professor reconciles the fact that the clobber was frequently spouted (or, as we should say, piped) with the opinion of any practical tailor or modiste that a system of piping-cord throughout a whole series of garments would be highly inimical (to go no further) to the posture of sitting down; and to the many cryptic references to clobber on tick that are extant the Professor does not even refer. We fear that in this particular he has not succeeded in establishing his point; and consequently his corollary of buttonholes—that a lilac or pink buttonhole denoted the colour, while one of cornflower indicated the material of which the hole itself was made—falls to the ground also.

But even in this we are perhaps over-meticulous, and this admirable work is throughout abundantly suggestive. Where much is debatable, it is satisfactory to know once for all that the starver was a short jacket, that the curiously-named top-slep was a wrap, a sautoir, or something to slip on, and that the pyjama was the identical Persian garment of which King Lear said: "Let it be changed." Undoubtedly the chief service of these volumes will be to the student of history. As straws show which way the wind blows, we are here enabled to follow, step by step, the growth of the effeminacy and luxury that even then prognosticated the downfall of a régime. That for the charge of a single brooch or fixing (we refer to the stud) a special officer of the wardrobe, called the stud-groom, should be appointed—that foppishness should go so far that a knuckle-duster was frequently carried in the pocket—and finally, that even in the Courts of Justice corruption should have had such a hold that to tip the cady or cadi was no infrequent practice—these things need no comment. Of scarcely less interest to the serious student is the influence of the military on articles of fashion, i.e., Wellington and Blucher boots and a lady's bonnet Sir Garnet; but on the whole, we are of opinion that Professor Finckel-Smyth has been well advised to give the story of the notorious General Combie in an appendix and to shelter himself in the Latin tongue.

We trust we have said enough to show how indispensable is this monumental work. Ourselves, we like to picture this grand old man of scholarship, peering through the glass at the musty relics one touch would dissipate and weaving therefrom the magic tapestry in which men and women move and pass with the hue and motion of life; and there rises involuntarily in our minds a prevision of another figure—of a Professor yet unborn, who, centuries hence, shall pore thus over our relics and by the spell of his learning kindle them also into truth. The volumes are admirably illustrated, and the plate of the man with the antique red bedsox on his hands is a triumph of the printer's art.

G. F.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

SCIENCE IN FICTION

THE other night I happened to meet at my club a famous man of science who has also a fine taste in literature, and our conversation turned upon the subject of these gossiping remarks. My friend held an opinion which, to tell the truth, I had some difficulty at first in grasping. He said that the truly scientific novel had yet to be written. My mind naturally turned back to a great number of novels in which it seemed to a mere literary man with a colossal ignorance of science that their artistic value had been spoiled by the introduction of his element. The novels of George Eliot owed no improvement to the influence of Herbert Spencer, and it appeared to me that the novelist, in using the Christian religion just as though it had faded back into the condition of a myth similar to those of Greece, was carrying the scientific spirit too far. And, as fiction and poetry are arts closely allied, I wondered whether it was the desire of my friend that the results of research should be mastered and poured forth as they were in "In Memoriam." But in both cases, apparently, I had gone on a false scent. The man of science was large and liberal in his ideas. He did not think that it was the business of a man of letters to acquire such knowledge, for instance, as is necessary in pathology. He did not even ask him to understand evolution. It was necessary for him to have followed the growth of myth and legend in the same manner as the gradual development of the human being from protoplasm can be followed. He did not even need to understand that all those institutions which belong to our civilisation have grown up in answer to the wants of man: in other words, that the Ten Commandments were not thundered forth in tones of authority from Mount Sinai, but were gradually evolved out of the experience of men who appreciated the greater comfort of living in societies. What my friend wanted was not a comprehension of those doctrines but the appearance of a writer who had been imbued with the scientific spirit. Even this is not a full statement of his position, because there are men whose theory of the universe is based exclusively on materialistic explanations and who look forward to no immortality, just as they believe in no divine Creator, not even the "sorting demon of Maxwell." All this a man may have, and yet lack the one thing needful. In the novel which my friend imagined there would no longer be any warfare of creeds; that is where the scientific writer of to-day falls short. He is almost invariably eager for controversy. Until now, he has been so ardently engaged in the destruction of other men's beliefs that he has had no energy to spare for the work of creation. "Under which Lord?" may be taken as the type of such scientific novels as we possess. That is to say, the scientific writer is always in danger of perpetrating a tract. He delights above all else in aggression, or, as he would call it, the destruction of superstitions; but in the future, always provided that my friend's hypothesis is a sound one, these controversies will be dead. In some cases, I fancy, they are so already. I was thinking at the time of another acquaintance of mine, a man now so elderly that soon he will be called old. He was brought up at the feet of his father, one of the early pioneers of science in this country. No religious influence was at any time allowed to come near him, and, although it is possible that he may number a few clergymen among his acquaintance, the subject of their belief is always taboo. He told me not long ago that never on any occasion that he remembers did he enter a church, and what goes on within the sacred walls is a mystery to him; though gifted with a singularly alert and comprehensive mind, he has no curiosity whatever about religion and regards it as something that has passed away out of all reality. He is not even like the wine-stained young man in the poem that Thackeray credited to Penderennis, whom he likened to "outcast spirits that wait and see through Heaven's gate angels within it." The expression used here argues a lost soul, and our man of science (I do not say all men of science, but refer to the particular friend whose conversation I am trying to recall) does not believe that there is any soul to lose. Out of dust was man formed and whatever is in him is dust: there is no dual existence; body and soul are one and indivisible. When the breath goes out of the body there is an end, and utter oblivion. Nobis, cum semel occidit brevis lux, nox est perpetua, una. If you recall to him that nothing in Nature is destructible, he replies that that is only applicable to the atoms. The material out of which a plant is made is indestructible, but if you pull up that plant by the roots the atoms which have been previously collected in it immediately begin to lose their bond of union, and from the moment of its death each of them begins to take its several way. It may be hours or it may be years, but soon or late the wind and the rain and the other forces of nature will carry the atoms that composed this individual body far away to build up new forms that cluster together again and make a life. So it is with the human body. It is, upon dissolution, resolved with more or less speed into the dust and ashes of which it was originally composed. "Imperious Cæsar, dead and turned to clay, might stop a hole to keep the wind away"; or, in more prosaic language, the particles that once formed the tissues of a man enter into the grass and flowers that grow on his tomb, become part and parcel of beast and bird and insect, are disseminated as widely over the surface of the globe as they would be if the body had been cremated and its ashes thrown to the wandering winds.

Now, my friend's contention was that an increasing number of men and women of the new generation hold that this is all we know of the phenomenon called life, and that, in those who come after, such a belief will be bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh. I do not say myself that he is right, and I do not say that he is wrong. But it is easy to perceive what an immense change will pass over man's thought and spirit should this come to be his genuine belief. Let him look out from his metaphysical watch-tower, and how vain and futile must the controversies of the moment appear to him! All those politicians who are now disputing over religious education must, under that new light, be seen to be mere phantoms chasing phantoms of butterflies in the short sunshine of life. Not only will the creeds that sufficed for so many be shaken to their foundations, but the hopes and fears and consolations which have sustained humanity during the ages of its recorded existence will have passed like dreams of the night. We have but to take a concrete instance to see the immense effect that will be produced. Imagine a woman, as many a woman has heroically done, undergoing pain, shame, humiliation, yet held up by an implicit faith that when a period is put to her afflictions her reward will be given "in the green fields of Eden." In a similar spirit is the command: "Lay not up for yourselves treasure upon the earth; where the rust and moth doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven; where neither rust nor moth doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal."

All this is merely to say that with the advent of Charles Darwin we obtained a new cosmogony, and that it is not as the old; and yet, even at the risk of appearing to be indefinite and doubtful, I cannot help questioning this belief of the evolutionist, even on the assumption that what he has postulated must be granted. Let us go so far as to admit for argument's sake that the whole body of belief or superstition—call it what you will—is a fabric that rests on no surer foundation than primæval man's misunderstanding of the true nature of dreams. Even then we have the proposition made by Goethe that Christianity is something that mankind ought to be proud of having evolved. In that case its truths, that have so long been accepted, must for ever remain truths, even though the literal interpretation of them ceases to hold. I have often thought, for example, that the truly divine passage: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow," is true of the potentialities of the human heart, whether promulgated by authority or not. To take a similar passage: "When the wicked man turneth away from the wickedness which he hath committed and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive," contains a truth that is derived, not from a material heaven or a personal deity, but from the unbounded love of justice that is in human nature.

Thus, in spite of my friend's contentions, I think the novel of the future will be very like the novel of the past, except in so far as it will be divested of some of the hypocrisies which we have formerly cherished. Life and life's reward will be prized for their own sake, and the "peace which passeth understanding" will be attributed to its true cause. But, indeed, if we look back to the great writers of the past we seem to see that they have instinctively recognised that these things must be so. Homer and Shakespeare did not depend for immortality upon the maintenance of any particular theory of the universe.

A.

[Next week's Causerie will be "A Short Way with an Unbeliever," by A. Martin Freeman.]

FICTION

King Peter. By DION CLAYTON CALTHROP. (Duckworth, 6s.)

THIS is the chronicle (a chapter to each year) of the first twenty-one years of King Peter of the Little Kingdom; whose mother, Arnice of the red hair, died at his birth, and whose father, a fierce and headstrong ruler, soon followed her after a most unhappy rebellion against the ways of God. A fair and pleasant kingdom, although small, was the baby king's inheritance. To the south and west of it lay the sea, and an "old map" given as a frontispiece shows how, away on the Northern confines, a stream ran from the forest of Boreswode and past the hamlet of Langdon, marking the boundary line. His own white-walled town, perched high on a hill, lay snugly in the south-east corner, with its castles, gardens, and pleasaunces, its abbey and clustering red-roofed houses, just where the River Candida, skirting the eastern wall, widens to the sea. All around him dwelt men and women of every degree, courtiers and warriors, lords and ladies, farmers and fisherfolk, and he knew something of them all. For as a boy he would put on a little red cap whenever he wished to drop his state, and by this token, wandering freely in the midst of a community who loved him, he would hear strange stories from many lips. At four years old it was his bright laughter in a solemn place that broke the spell, as men thought, of a terrible drought. At ten he received his baptism of blood, when some caitiff knights tried to capture him as he kept Christmas with a scanty retinue at his house of Verwod. At thirteen he came near to losing his kingdom in a great rebellion, and helped gallantly to save it. And he learnt many things (of some curious attributes of cowardice, and what a stirring passion ambition may be, and of an unpleasant side to virtue) before at last he came to know, as the prologue has it, of "the storm of life, and of the beauty of sacrifice and of true love." These concluding chapters round off the book with a beautiful and touching incident exquisitely treated. Mr. Calthrop has adopted the pre-Raphaelite tradition throughout, but his detail, always most carefully selected, is never excessive, and he never forgets that, for all the gorgeous colours and fantastic patterns of mediæval Christendom, the general lines of thought and action were far simpler and less complicated than some romancists suppose.

The Bands of Orion. By Hon. Mrs. N. GROSVENOR. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THE novel has all the qualities, good and bad, of amateur work. The writer has thought and felt more finely than she was able to express her thoughts and feelings. Her picture is clouded and blurred, but gives the suggestion of something which has beauty and which is refreshing for that reason. That beauty is seen especially in the close love of the two brothers, Arthur and Richard Dering. Arthur has genius, but is unable to turn his genius to any account. But he inspires Richard with ideas and makes him a successful novelist, and Richard recognises how much he owes to his brother. Arthur was born under Orion, the hunter's star, and is a wanderer. Not even his love for Clare can induce him to settle. Any yoke will always fret him, and he knows it. Clare's gradual recognition of the fact is handled with extreme delicacy and weight. It is far the best thing in the book. But the solution seems to us unconvincing and disappointing. Arthur dies and Clare marries his brother. We can imagine a marriage between Richard and Clare based on ties of memory and affection; but that Richard should want her love, and that Clare should give it, seems frankly impossible, and in flat contradiction to the characters of both, which have not been shown hitherto to be in any way commonplace. We are inclined to feel that the author has come to the conventional lions and gone round without discovering that after all the lions are chained and tame.

The House in Spring Gardens. By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS. (Nash, 6s.)

"THE MASTER" has set the authorities of Scotland Yard at defiance for many years. He has moved mysteriously at the back of half the brilliant crimes in England: he is sinister, and has a long arm to punish any of his minions who do not carry out his commands faithfully. He has many an alias, and with each alias a wife. One of these wives runs her hat-pin into his heart, when he has evaded the police and, in his pyjamas, is driving with her in a hansom-cab. The murder is not due to her outraged sense of what is fitting in dress: the pyjamas she could pardon; she knew that the policemen would most probably not allow him time to dress as a man should dress to drive with a lady, before he shot them and made his escape. Under the criminal lurked the heart of the woman who did not like her Sam (for so she called him) to be faithless. Salome Raffles (such was her name) was not wholly bad. At least she saved the Master from the ignominy of being captured by Colonel Noel, the amateur detective, and lent a graceful touch of romance to his ending. That must surely be remembered in her favour. And Colonel Noel is not entirely stupid. He has the sense to marry Daphne de Boigne and settle down comfortably into a rôle that is far more suited to his capacity than that of an indomitable sleuth-hound. Till then he is a Watson without his Holmes. But his adventures are often thrilling and are well written—with a brave disregard for possibility; and if he is a little dull, it is not really his fault: many honest men are.

Lady Betty Across the Water. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. (Methuen, 6s.)

LADY BETTY BULKELEY's experiences across the water are bright and amusing; the interest is smartly whipped up, and kept spinning and humming gaily to the last page. The setting of her story has some claim to novelty, the scenes are constantly shifting, and so kaleidoscopic in their variety and dazzling effect, that there is barely time to appreciate or criticise them as they sparkle and change and make way for fresh combinations. The only sustained impressions are that Betty is a charming ingénue with the simplicity and shrewdness of her kind; that the way of millionaires in search of new pleasures is hard, their rivalry vulgar and their extravagance childish and irritating. Betty, who is too beautiful for the matrimonial success of a plain elder sister, is packed off to America as the guest of Mrs. Stuyvesant-Knox, that astute lady using the acquaintance adroitly enough for her own social promotion. In New York and at Newport Mrs. Stuyvesant-Knox gives Lady Betty a "real good time," and shows her the wonders that unlimited dollars can accomplish. Some of them are brilliant efforts of imagination which would ensure the success of any pantomime if carried out upon a far less magnificent scale than the revels at Newport. Betty makes one disinterested friend, rich but not too rich, a Kentucky girl with a story and a heart.

More important still, she is haunted by a face seen in the steerage when crossing the Atlantic; and, after that, no aspiring millionaire of Mrs. Stuyvesant-Knox's acquaintance has a chance of entering the ducal fold. For reasons of her own, Betty runs away from Newport and her ambitious hostess, and thanks to the steerage passenger, Jim Brett, she finds friends among his homely kinsfolk, and Jim, who is made of the right stuff, and at a pinch could buy a navy to play with, shows Betty another and a pleasanter side of American life. It is all in accordance with the old order of romance, of which novel-readers never tire, and if there is no new element in Lady Betty's love-story, there are some pretty passages in connection with it and much that is clever and entertaining in the account of her adventures.

Count Bunker. By J. STORER CLOUSTON. (Blackwood, 6s.)

"COUNT BUNKER: being A bald yet veracious Chronicle containing some further particulars of two Gentlemen whose previous careers were touched upon in a tome entitled 'The Lunatic at Large.'" Such is the inscription on the title-page of Mr. Clouston's book. He brings Baron Rudolph von Blitzenberg back to London, where he "vunce did have fun for his money," "a dignified representative of a particularly dignified State." But the memory of old times with his friend Bunker and the proximity of that gentleman are too much for him, and afresh springs the desire to "go once more a-roving by the light of the moon." Straightway he puts it into execution, in spite of his agonised wife's reminder of the state in which he had returned after the last evening spent in Bunker's company. But the Baron is not attached to an embassy for nothing. "In diplomacy it is necessary for a diplomatist to be diplomatic;" and, unblushingly attributing this sapient axiom to Bismarck, he hies him out to meet his friend. Bunker is all that he remembered him, nay, more—much more—and quickly does his inventive genius pile one compromising situation upon another and honeycomb with pitfalls innumerable the paths along which it is his delight to lead his best friend. In any but the author's hands the plot would have justified the reviewer in dubbing this tale a roaring farce, but the adjective would be misleading where the character of the central figure is brought out by delicate touches that raise the story to the level of true comedy. Mr. Clouston loves his pair of boon companions: he makes his readers do likewise, whether in the scene where the Baron heartens up the diffident Tollyvoddle with the exhortation: "Approach her mid a kilt," or on the many occasions when he endeavours to prove not less to his friend than himself that his wife is "ze magnet" and he "ze pole"; only "I jost sometimes vish marriage was not qvite—qvite so uninterruptable." If there is a weak point in the workmanship of the book, it is in the dénouement; the fun is had and not sufficiently paid for, as, to be true to life, it should have been. But, again, this is due to the author's affection for his creations. As personal friends, Mr. Clouston could not put them "in the cart" and leave them there, and this lapse from the strict canons of art will be readily forgiven if in the future the author will (as every line of the concluding chapter hints he will) once more set the Baron and Bunker afloat on another voyage of adventure and misadventure, and—take us with them.

The Evasion. By EUGENIA BROOKS FROTHINGHAM. (Constable, 6s.)

THIS book is admirably named. Superficially, the evasion is that of a young man who cheats at cards, cannot face the odds of confession, allows another man to bear the blame and ultimately marries the very exquisite young girl whom that other man loves. Fundamentally, it is the much more vital evasion by the best type of American mind—the strenuous, upright New England mind—of the doctrine of the Incarnation. This is too controversial a question to discuss in a short review, and yet the main interest of Mrs. Frothingham's novel lies in this greater evasion and its resulting egoism. It is impossible to read the more serious American novel of to-day and not be struck with its insistent note of more or less lofty self-centredness. The part which dress, in its highest development, plays in the American novel of society is typical of this. To be poor, in our old-world sense of the word, to wear an unmodish gown, is a fate so terrible that the sternest American novelist shrinks from finally abandoning his heroines to it, though they may, like Gladys in "The Evasion," know the agonies of the home-made frock for a few short months as one of the principal goads towards a loveless marriage. The hero, Dick Copeland, is the only character who does not evade some—to us—obvious duty, and almost the only person in the book who does not, more or less delicately, live for himself; and we are glad to feel that he will get his reward in a union with the woman he loves, though we leave them both in a state of waiting. Mrs. Frothingham writes with thoughtful distinction, and a fine feeling for character. Her style is cosmopolitan and her point of view that of the dweller in both continents, but her spiritual outlook is of the younger world, and to the end we are left in doubt whether she is on the side of authority, or of negation. In short, her own mental attitude is surely only another witness to her sense of fitness in nomenclature—an evasion.

The Adventures of Alicia. By KATHARINE TYNAN. (White 6s.)

ALICIA MACNAMARA is one of this author's most fascinating Irish girls, and readers know what they can be at their best. Alicia also has the advantage of belonging to an ancient and impoverished family, and is brought up in the picturesque, happy, shiftless manner peculiar to these circumstances—in Ireland. And who will regret the good old times, the past splendours, the falling rents, at least in these pages where poverty, whenever we meet her, wears a gay and smiling face? The author "puts the comether" upon us, and shows us things, not as they are, but as she wishes them to appear, and leaves us with no desire to resist the spell of her charming, romantic story. Misunderstanding and sorrow there are, since not even Katharine Tynan can contrive a story all of sunshine, but there is always a golden path to happiness, and life is half a fairy-tale that might come true. As the elder daughter of her house, Alicia sets out into the world to lighten the family burthen, and, as her friends hope, to marry according to her birth and beauty. Her adventures in the ideal situations she obtains as companion form a series of tales in which she plays the principal part, particularly in the breaking of hearts, while keeping unswervingly faithful to Sir Carew MacNamara of Castle Truagh, who is away on the Indian frontier, with no money and no prospects. Her beauty is fatal to the peace of several households, and brings about a variety of complications and an unusual amount of love-making, monotonous or delightful according to the reader's taste for scenes of this order. Marriage is obviously the only way of stopping Alicia's innocent mischief, and in good time the MacNamara legend justifies itself, and "henceforth there would be no more lack of money than of love at Castle Truagh." There is Molly also to claim our interest, Alicia's wilder Irish sister, and quite as attractive in a daring, impetuous fashion; and Aunt Sibbie and the Colonel, and a score of other pleasant people, young and old, who help to make Alicia's adventures cheerful and agreeable reading.

FINE ART

MR. AUGUSTUS JOHN

THIS remarkably gifted artist aroused discussion from the first and will continue to harass the perplexed critic who has felt that at least he was not to be dismissed with a word. The public, too, or that small section of it which troubles itself about modern art—which, like a woman, is usually right in its conclusions but wrong in the reasons it gives for them—has exclaimed against the “ugliness” of his art, against its defiance of nature, lack of colour, or, when colour is there, its falseness, even discovering something unpleasant in the taste of it, and so forth.

We must go a little deeper than these mere exclamations of dismay or discomfort if it is desirable to place him, and the exhibition at the Chenil Galleries, Chelsea, of eighty-two of his etchings may help us to do so.

Mr. John is curiously typical of that movement which has spread lately among the younger men, especially in the New English Art Club and the International Society, and which I have called the archaistic movement. They are all clever artists, these archaistic ones, but Mr. John's ability and versatility are almost uncanny. When I visited the Royal Academy I thought I had got by mistake into a “one-man show,” as all the pictures seemed to have been painted by Sargent, whilst at the Chenil Gallery a whole Academy or rather museum is displayed. Old Man of Liverpool! Surely not—he hailed from Haarlem, that Old Man. Head of Old Underwood, this attribution is incorrect, as the etching is an undoubted Dürer; Rubens etched the Girl with Curls; Manet, La Gravidà; Legros, The Quarry Folk; and, most curious of all, Mr. Reed, of Punch, has been induced to contribute one caricature, The Idiot. As for the Rembrandts, which abound with appropriate collectors' titles, we actually giggle with delight at their cleverness: Annie with a Feather Hat, Self Portrait, Old Man in Fur Cloak. As I do not frequent museums, which I hold to be institutions as barbarous and ghastly as the Morgue, I was unable to find the originals of some of the Italianate pieces, such as Ursula, but I have no doubt they exist. It is difficult not to seem unfair in such strictures as these, since, after all, the greatest artists are those who have derived most from their predecessors and fellows. But, to put it shortly, two influences are paramount in all art that is on a sound basis:

1. Nature.

2. Immediate predecessors.

Now, most great artists, early in their career, have looked at nature with an eye biassed, it is true, by study of art—Gainsborough, for instance, and Turner—but they did look at her. Mr. John and the whole of his school never seem to have opened their eyes to the world at all.

Secondly, Mr. John makes a leap back for some centuries, and ignores his immediate precursors altogether. For him no painter has existed after Rubens, no etcher (except Mr. Reed aforesaid) after Rembrandt. Our magnificent English schools have had no part in his development; even the Pre-Raphaelites, who are traceable in the other archaistic pictures, are practically negligible, and, of course, all the modern atmospheric effects first discovered by Turner and Constable, and developed steadily for nearly a century by painters of all nationalities, including Whistler, Monet, Corot, Degas, are put aside.

No one was more derivative than Turner. We may imagine Claude whispering in his ear, Van de Velde slapping him on the shoulder, Canaletto pointing a stern finger at some piece of shaky drawing, Ruysdael gently clapping his hands, Titian raising his eyebrows, even Watteau smiling shyly on him; and yet who, after all, dominates the assembly—who but Turner? The kind ghosts are his servants, and not he theirs. All the ingredients have been so welded and moulded together, so absorbed and assimilated, that you can rarely put your finger on any point and say: “that is a bit of Van de Velde,” and in any case no one painter dominates the rest.

But when Mr. John does a Rembrandtesque etching, it is more than Rembrandtesque; it is Rembrandt himself. No doubt any modern artist may modestly deprecate comparison with giants like Turner; my point is that the trick of imitating the handling of the masters has never until recently been pushed to the extent we see now, or by artists of the calibre of Mr. John. He is magnificently equipped, with an eye and hand that make all artists envy his gift; and what does he do with them but repeat what has been said centuries past perfectly and finally? I am sure he could, if he were not unfortunately an honest man, turn out for the markets that are craving for them the “authentic” masterpieces of all the old masters, and be making a pile overtopping that of any of his contemporaries. The signatures alone are wanting; probably they will be supplied by another hand when he can no longer profit by them.

B. S.

ROUND THE GALLERIES

RECENT visitors to the not very impressive exhibitions of the Royal Society of British Artists cannot have failed to remark the virile, direct paintings of Mr. J. D. Fergusson, who is holding a one-man exhibition at the Baillie Gallery (54 Baker Street). In an explanatory foreword to the catalogue the artist states that he is “trying for truth, for reality: through light,” and to the initiated this will reveal the kinship of Mr. Fergusson's intentions with those of Gainsborough, as well as with those of Velasquez and Manet, whose manner of painting his own more closely resembles. Mr. Fergusson is seen at his best in a still life, After Dinner (2); of a grand piano and a table set out for coffee; a Japanese portrait, The Pink Camellia (15), in which the means are concealed more effectually than is his wont; and in another still life, The Japanese Statuette (12), which has the gravity and suave charm of a good Alfred Stevens. Mr. Fergusson's nice sense of quality and harmonious colour is further displayed in a number of coast scenes, but these are so strongly reminiscent of Whistler that they feebly represent the individual force of the painter's considerable talent.

Mr. Arthur Studd, a collection of whose paintings is also at Mr. Baillie's, is well known as the happy possessor of the Little White Girl and other choice Whistlers, and his own works amply testify his devotion to this master. Indeed, The Girl in Brown (14) and the Head of a Workman (33) are little more than echoes, pleasing echoes it is true, of the Rose of Lyme Regis and the Master Smith, and no stronger individuality is revealed in his impressions of Venice and other cities. In short, these are School pictures, though we hasten to acknowledge that the school is good and the scholar apt.

Mr. Mark Fisher's water-colours are far too distinctive and their exhibition is too rare an event for the collection at the Leicester Galleries to be negligible in the most crowded exhibition season. Strongly personal, more personal in some respects than his oils, these vividly recorded impressions of sunny scenes are nevertheless legitimate descendants of the landscapes of Gainsborough and Constable, and mark a stage in the development of British landscape. It is noteworthy, moreover, that rich and deep though Mr. Fisher's colour be, it is never heavy, but ever has that limpid quality which is the prime virtue of the medium he uses boldly, yet with much discretion.

MUSIC

A SIDELIGHT UPON WAGNER

WAGNERIAN criticism seemed almost dead when a recent article on the Ring in the Daily News proclaimed Mr. Baughan the latest of Wagner's assailants. It would have been a bitter pill, perhaps the bitterest of his hard life, could Wagner have foreseen his future position as the lapdog of fashion and the idol of the musical dilettante; but to this he has come, in England at any rate: by such he has been invested with “the divinity that doth hedge a king,” and any one who calls that in question is a traitor. Consequently, Mr. Baughan has got himself into trouble, a result which he probably anticipated and for which he does not much desire pity. At any rate that is not the point I wish to discuss, nor whether the music of the Ring is really symphonic or dramatic, a task for which I should be ill qualified, but to draw some attention to an early work of Wagner's, one which we have heard in London more recently than the Ring performances, and perhaps to draw some inferences from it—"Das Liebesmahl der Apostel." The Männergesang Verein of Vienna gave this as the closing work of their two London concerts last week, and probably it must be considered the chief among the great variety of works which they gave with surprising perfection, though many other things gave greater pleasure. "Das Liebesmahl der Apostel" is not new to London. In a moment of unwonted enterprise the Royal Choral Society sang it at the Albert Hall some years ago, but many people must have heard it for the first time on Monday week, and to some it was a surprise to know that Wagner had ever attempted so considerable a choral work apart from the stage. Now Wagner, or rather his champions, have so often evaded musical criticism on the ground that his music had to be made subservient to the drama (and now they are called upon to defend the counter charge of sacrificing the drama to the music) that at first sight it seems as if with "Das Liebesmahl der Apostel" he had for once descended into the open and given us one opportunity of judging his purely musical powers by the same standards as those of other men. This is true to some extent, but since it was written shortly after Rienzi and before Tannhäuser, it is, of course, infinitely less valuable than such an experiment would have been had it, for instance, followed Götterdämmerung. It is only the tentative Wagner beginning slowly to feel his way towards his own individual expression. How far he achieved anything in the attempt will be seen from some detailed description, which, as the work is still comparatively unfamiliar to English people, may not be superfluous.

The subject-matter is founded on an incident in the Acts of the Apostles, where Peter and John, having been imprisoned for preaching in the Temple, are released with a threat of death should they preach any more in that Name. Wagner treats it as happening to the Twelve, who return to the other disciples and recount what has happened, rejoicing that they are counted worthy to suffer for the faith; they join together in the breaking of bread and in prayer for the sending of the Holy Spirit upon the Church; their prayer is answered and all join in a hymn of praise culminating in the words:

Denn ihm ist alle Herrlichkeit von Ewigkeit zu Ewigkeit!

Apart from the suspicion that Wagner has chosen rather for its obvious possibilities for scenic effect a subject, which, if set at all, should have received only the most thoughtful and spiritual treatment, the main idea is beautiful and inspiring. Three four-part choruses represent the Disciples, twelve bass voices the Apostles, though these latter never sing in more than four-part harmony. The first part of the work consists of unaccompanied choruses, probably suggested to him by his work as Kapellmeister at Dresden, where he tried to revive some of Palestrina's music. The three choruses converse in a capella style, first separately, then in closer combination, the words being mainly an exhortation to courage in the face of persecution. The music is, however, extraordinarily loose, with very little distinctiveness of subject or treatment. Wagner seems to have been content to catch something of Palestrina's manner of dealing with voices, discarding, of course, the restrictions of harmony which his time imposed, and not realising that modern liberty implies the duty of a consistency of musical treatment in form and matter at which Palestrina had not arrived. However, with the aid of one rather poor theme to the words: "Kommt her, ihr die ihr hungert," which is repeated and receives something of the dignity of a principal theme, the chorus is developed to the point where the apostles enter. They tell what has befallen them in music which attempts to do no more than declaim the words in a choral quasi-recitative. All this time the listener feels that the musical point is still to come, and he expects to arrive at it when the full chorus bursts in with the prayer, beginning: "Allmächtiger Vater der du hast gemacht Himmel und Erd' und Alles was darin!" But no. It is still declamatory, one shape of phrase succeeding another, with apparently no purely musical design. With the words: "Sende uns deinen heiligen Geist," the intensity of emotion thickens rather than deepens. Crescendo and decrescendo marks are sprinkled thickly over the score. The effect which he has been unable to produce by musicianship he to some extent gets by working up his singers to a climax of tone and breaking off on a fortissimo chord of D. We then hear in the distance "Stimmen aus der Hohe," singing words of comfort. This theatrical effect is succeeded by another. The orchestra enters, drums and tremolando strings shivering over chords of the diminished seventh. The crescendo is tremendous. Soon the full orchestra blaze out, the chorus cry aloud:

Welch' Brausen erfüllt die Luft? Welch' Tönen, welch' Klingen!
Bewegt sich nicht die Stätte, wo wir stehen?
Gegrüßt sei uns der Geist des Herrn, den wir erfleht!

The Apostles sing a noble-sounding recitative, but still no music, only musical declamation. At last this gives place to something definite. The tenors give out a theme which is the principal subject of the last movement. It is almost amusing to see how like Mendelssohn Wagner's treatment becomes, when the long-deferred moment for definite musical matter arrives, only that this is far weaker than Mendelssohn would have allowed it to be. If Mendelssohn could not have written a better tune than this for a finale, he would have resorted to a chorale and justified himself by classical precedent. Wagner, too proud to do that, makes up a commonplace tune, which, sung by two hundred voices, has a certain effectiveness, and uses Mendelssohn's favourite device of accompanying this with a counterpoint of rushing semiquavers on the violins. Having developed this to some extent in harmony, he returns to a grandiloquent repetition of the time in unison, which leads into the coda. Here is nothing new, save a subject in crotchets to the last line of words, quoted above as the culminating-point. It is evidently suggested by the ecstatic passages in the Choral Symphony, but its effect is not impressive and it gives place to a cadence which is so by sheer weight of tone.

If this description does justice to the work—and in spite of a detailed examination of the score and carefully listening to the recent performance, I am unable to find any deeper musical qualities in it—it is some indication of how little natural grasp Wagner had of the absolute value of music material and its treatment. Here any theme is good enough to serve as a peg on which to hang his tonal effects. He does not discriminate. Nothing is too poor to serve him; the impressive nature of his subject, a great power of vocal declamation and of disposing qualities and quantities of tone in effective contrasts, were at this time what he relied on for his results. From such a starting-point it is well nigh impossible to conceive a composer making the dramatic needs of his theatre music subservient to a symphonic design, which is Mr. Baughan's charge against him. If in his mature works he did so, it is explicable only by Wagner's extraordinary power of acquiring anything which his astute feeling for effect saw to be needful. His power of writing sustained melody was always uncertain and apt to degenerate into something trivial, but he could devise short characteristic figures and themes and these, woven together with the help of his unerring sense of harmonic colour, could be made to take the place of pure melody. Thus the leit motif principle was evolved, as a sort of short cut to composition by one who was keen self-critic enough to discover his own weaknesses, both of natural endowment and of musical education. It could not have been so extraordinarily successful as it was, had it not had the help of alliance with the drama. Wagner was too clever to suppose that such a device could be the sustaining force of pure instrumental music or even of choral music without drama, and when he had evolved it he made no experiments of such a nature as "Das Liebesmahl der Apostel." His less wise successors have done so, however, and its persistent use causes the weakness, if not the complete failure, of the works of many a gifted composer of the present day. The process of weaving together leit motiven may be at times too cumbersome and slow for the pace of the dramatic movement, but it seems less so than any other kind of musical design, and Wagner had found in such early experiments as the one we have discussed the need for some such design in anything calling itself music, even if only dramatic music. It is, in fact, the minimum which music demands in order to maintain its identity in its partnership with the drama. If this much cannot be granted to it, Wagner, in seeking to create this partnership, may only have proved their incompatibility.

H. C. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE ROYAL ACADEMY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reading the current number of the ACADEMY I have been much interested in the second criticism of the Royal Academy under the heading "Fine Art." I should like to give expression to my sympathy with the writer's views regarding the advisability of earlier retirement on the part of Royal Academicians, thereby providing for the admission of younger men, with fresher ideas and readier sympathy with the newer methods and more daring aspirations of youth. Quoting from the article, these views may be summed up in the sentence, "As his age advances the Academician has 'less reverence for the young,'" and one cannot but think that the author had in mind those forceful lines of the inspired poetess, Elizabeth Barrett Browning:

The young run on and see the thing
That's coming. Reverence for the young, I cry.
In that new church for which the world's near ripe
You'll have the younger in the elder's chair,
Presiding with his ivory front of hope
O'er foreheads clawed by cruel carrion-birds
Of Life's experience.

It is a strange anomaly that in the present age, which favours the efforts of youth in almost every direction more than perhaps any other has done, the work of the younger and newer schools of art should be so consistently slighted, misinterpreted and misunderstood. The earlier retirement of Royal Academicians and consequent election of younger men would to a great extent tend to remedy the injustice that at present undoubtedly exists, and to remove the prejudice that is felt in certain artistic circles against the work of the younger and more virile artists of the later schools. It cannot be doubted that the ultimate result of such action would be a great advance in the quality of the work seen at our largest annual exhibition.

K. M. THORNTON.

May 30.

MICHAEL ANGELO

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Sturge Moore's article on "Taste or Imagination?" was first rate. But why, oh why, do you let him say "Michelangelo"? Michael Angelo I know, and Michelange I know, but in the name of the King's English, mediæval and the Entente Cordiale who is this bastard Michelangelo?

R. F.

ENCOURAGING THE MINOR POET

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Certain dailies, taking their cue from an article in The Nineteenth Century, are at the old game of deriding "minor poets," whom they haughtily advise that there are too many bards in the world. The "minor poet" might with justice retort that there are too many daily papers, and consequently too many editors and journalists. During the last six months at least thirty copies of "influential journals" have been thrust unsolicited and gratis into my letter-box. I thought them superfluous, and as no stamps were enclosed they went straight to the dustbin.

The same organs warn young romance-writers to find other employment. From what we hear as to the pay of manuscript-readers and other hangers-on of literature, it would seem as though another telling retort were to hand, and that the lordly advisers were trying to destroy their own occupation. No doubt many young writers almost kill themselves in vain attempts to secure a place, but they who so often wing the shaft that maims should be the last to sneer. Let them call to mind Tony Weller's remark as to what might happen if people left off dying: "What 'ud become o' the undertakers?"

A practical joker of my acquaintance once sent a poem, written by a gifted American bard, the round of all the dailies that have "literary columns," and then to all the monthly magazines. In every case it was returned, and in none was the fraud discovered. He sent the poem all round again, calling attention to refusal, and to its undeniable beauties of language and sentiment. In every case it came back like a shot from a gun, and in many the editors added brief and cutting remarks, yet the fraud was not detected. He interpolated a few lines of doggerel, and sent the poem in its new rig to a certain budget of flippancies. The editor, who has as much to say on such matters as here and there one, accepted and published. This is stark fact. My acquaintance holds the letters, but, mischievous though he is, has too much delicacy to make them public at present.

Now, a plain man might see in the above ample explanation of the "slump" in poetry. We are not all plain men, and some might be inclined to court your readers' opinion. No journal has ever dealt more graciously with poets and young writers than the ACADEMY has. It would be interesting to have a decision from its many gifted readers as to whether the "slump" is due to the persistency of unskilled poets, or to the facts that some editors, instead of running "literary columns," should be carving and weighing cheese, and that the public of most of the dailies prefers cheese, even mouldy cheese, to ambrosia. For my part, I am inclined to think minor poets cannot be too plentiful, any more than skylarks and throistles can. And it would not be hard to prove that much so-called "higher poetry" is very poor stuff.

ONE IN DOUBT.

HAD THE ANCIENT GREEKS "CORNERS"?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you allow me to point out that Professor R. Y. Tyrrell's contention, in yours of to-day's date, p. 527, "... a people [the ancient Greeks], ... which ... could not make 'corners' in anything," is, I submit, unfair to the contemporaries of Aristophanes and to those mentioned by Athenæus. The "regraters" or "fore-stallers," πρωτεύοντες, of the Clouds, as well as the whole description of the Athenian fishmongers in the man of Naucratis (of Athenæus Dr. Tyrrell has an excellent edition, with Latin notes, as I happen to know) prove, I take it, the existence of "corners" in fish and in other commodities.

H. H. JOHNSON.

June 2.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Does not Professor Tyrrell's remark, in his article on Greek at the Universities, about "a people which ... could not make 'corners' in anything," somewhat under-rate the business ability of the Ancient Greeks? Aristotle (Pol. I. 11, 1259 a. 6) tells us a story of Thales, the earliest of Greek philosophers, making use of his astronomical knowledge on one occasion to "corner" the oil trade; and observes in the context that this was a general principle of money-making, and one adopted by some cities, when in financial straits.

G. A. PURTON.

Leatherhead, June 2.

COWPER'S "CHURCH-GOING BELL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is waste of time to argue against a poet's particular use of a locution by producing hypothetical instances of its abuse. As in Cowper's epithet there is no question of the breach of any grammatical propriety the only question can be whether it offends the sensitive literary taste. Well, about matters of taste we cannot expect perfect agreement. We might as well expect unanimity on the Education Bill. I think however that most lovers of poetry will agree that there is nothing very shocking in the sound of Cowper's bell.

A. L. MAYHEW.

"KNOWLEDGE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to the pronunciation of the word "knowledge," about which you wrote a fortnight ago, I do not know if you will think the following story worth printing. Years ago a friend of mine was one of a dinner-party where Tennyson was present. In reply to a question of his host my friend said, "I have no knowledge of the fact." Instantly, to the amazement of the company, Tennyson started up, walked round the table to my friend's seat, held out his hand, and exclaimed, "Let me shake hands with the Englishman who says knowledge instead of knowlege! Among the faithless faithful only he!" And having resumed his seat he denounced in vehement terms the iniquitous mispronunciations of the English language.

"A propos de bottes," may I ask if it is not morally certain that in former times the second "i" in the word "infinite" was pronounced long? E.g., in the well-known hymn of Watts,

Infinite day excludes the night,

and in Milton's poems,

Hoarse murmur echoed to his words applause
Through the infinite host. Nor less for that
The flaming seraph, etc.

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

[Milton was too good a Latinist not to know that the second "i" in "infinite" should be long; and our correspondent is right in his suggestion that it was so pronounced in former days.—ED.]

WIT, VERSUS WHITE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The name "Whit Sunday" means simply White Sunday, the Anglo-Saxon Hwitan Sunnan dæg. It has nothing to do with "wit" or "witan"; the form "Whit-Sunday" arose some time in the twelfth century from the dropping of h by Norman scribes, who could not pronounce the aspirate before or after w. Mr. Hall's "Dominicus in albo" (he means Dominica in albis) was so named from the white garments worn by candidates for baptism, whom Mr. Hall somewhat strangely calls "examinees." The rite was originally administered on the First Sunday after Easter, or "Low Sunday," but was afterwards transferred to Pentecost or Whit-Sunday. The history and derivation of the name is fully explained in Skeat's "Dictionary of English Etymology."

C. S. ERRAM.

Oxford, June 5.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Speight, Harry. Nidderdale, from Nun Monkton to Wharfedale. Being a record of the history, antiquities, scenery, old homes, families, etc., of the beautiful valley of the Nidd. Illustrations and a map. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 571, lxvii. Elliot Stock, n.p.

[Twelve years ago Mr. Speight published a larger work on Nidderdale. In the present volume he has endeavoured "to revise and condense the old work, and thus present the story of this attractive valley in briefer and more portable form."]

Bloom, J. Harvey. English Seals. 93 Illustrations. The Antiquary's Books. 9 × 5½. Pp. 274. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.

Great Buildings and How to Enjoy Them. Gothic Architecture. By Edith A. Browne. 48 full-page illustrations, reproduced from photographs. 9 × 6½. Pp. 125. Black, 3s. 6d. net.

Ancient Records of Egypt. Historical documents from the earliest times to the Persian Conquest, collected, edited, and translated, with commentary, by James Henry Breasted. Vol. iii.—The Nineteenth Dynasty. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 279. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, n.p.

Rembrandt: a Memorial, 1606-1906. Part vii. 14½ × 10½. Pp. 6 + Pl. 7. Heinemann, 2s. 6d. net.

[The Schmidt plates are "Sketch of Leonardo's 'Last Supper': Red chalk (Prince George of Saxony); Pen-and-wash drawing, 'Cottage surrounded by Trees' (Heseltine), and Study in red and black chalk for the etched portrait of Renier Anso, 1640 (British Museum). The Photogravures are: 'Portraits of the Artist' (Vienna); 'Family Group' (Brunswick); 'Portrait of an old Man' (National Gallery) and 'Samson and Delilah' (Palace, Berlin).]

Frantz, Henri. Delacroix. 9½ × 6½. Pp. xxii, Pl. 48. Art Library. Newnes, 3s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Thureau-Dangin, Paul. Saint Bernardine of Siena. Translated by Baroness G. von Hugel. 8 × 5½. Pp. 288. Dent, 4s. 6d. net.

EDUCATION.

Kingsley's Andromeda, with the Story of Perseus Prefixed. Edited for Schools by George Yeld, M.A. English Literature for Secondary Schools series. 7 × 4½. Pp. 94. Macmillan, 1s.

Stories from Don Quixote. Told to the Children by John Lang; pictures by F. M. B. Blaikie. Æsop's Fables. Told to the Children by Lena Dalkeith; pictures by S. R. Præger. Told to the Children series. Each 6 × 4½. Jack, 1s. net each.

Kingsley's Water-Babies, slightly abridged and edited, with introduction, notes, and illustrations, by Janet Horace-Smith and Marion L. Milford. 5 full-page illustrations by Janet Robertson. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d.

Goldsmith's Traveller and Deserted Village; Gray's Elegy; Coleridge's Ancient Mariner; Wordsworth's Simpler Poems. With introductions and notes. The Temple English Literature series for Schools. 6½ × 4½. Dent, 1s. net.

[These four texts are also issued separately in limp cloth cover at 3d. net per vol.]

Kirkman, F. B. La première année de français. Première partie. Phonetically transcribed by L. Savory. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 26. Black, 6d.

FICTION.

Yarcott, W. G. Pinch, Potty and Co. 7½ × 5. Pp. 212. Harper, 3s. 6d.

Harte, Edith Bagot. The Price of Silence. 7½ × 5. Pp. 320. Greening, 6s.

Biddulph, Mrs. Wright. Cressida. 7½ × 5. Pp. 312. Greening, 6s.

Rowland, Henry C. In the Shadow. 7½ × 5. Pp. 316. Heinemann, 6s.

Koch, Mrs. Mary. Paul Jerome. 7½ × 5. Pp. 320. Greening, 6s.

Clouston, J. Storer. Count Bunker. Being a bald yet veracious chronicle containing some further particulars of two gentlemen whose previous careers were touched upon in a tome entitled "The Lunatic at Large."

7½ × 5½. Pp. 340. Blackwood, 6s. (See p. 551.)

Burchell, Sidney Herbert. The Grip of Fear. 8 × 5½. Pp. 322. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

White, Fred M. The Yellow Face. 7½ × 5. Pp. 307. White, 6s.

Bindloss, Harold. Beneath Her Station. 7½ × 5. Pp. 310. White, 6s.

Curtis, Henry. An Imperial Love-Story. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 343. Washbourne, 3s. 6d.

Herniman-Jones, F. The Polyphemes. A story of strange adventures among strange beings. Frontispiece by Harold Piffard. 8 × 5½. Pp. 318.

Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.

Gunter, Archibald Clavering. My Japanese Prince. Being some startling excerpts from the diary of Hilda Patience-Armstrong, of Meriden Connecticut, at present travelling in the Far East. Illustrations by Victor Prout. 7½ × 5. Pp. 256. Ward, Lock, 6s.

Speight, T. W. Mora: One Woman's History. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 128. Greening, 6d.

Halcombe, Charles J. H. Children of Far Cathay. A social and political novel. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 461. Printed and published at the Hong Kong Daily Press Office, 6s.

Koebel, W. H. The Seat of the Moods. 7½ × 5. Pp. 159. Francis Griffiths, 3s. 6d.

Neuman, B. Paul. The Spoils of Victory. 7½ × 5. Pp. 367. Murray, 6s.

Bullock, Shan F. The Cubs: the story of a friendship. 7½ × 5. Pp. 350. Werner Laurie, 6s.

Molesworth, Mrs. The Wrong Envelope, and other stories. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 248. Macmillan, 6s.

[The last story, "A Ghost of the Pampas," is by Mrs. Molesworth's son—Bevil R. Molesworth—who died at his ranch in Patagonia seven years ago.]

GENEALOGY.

The Knights of England. A complete record from the earliest time to the present day of the Knights of all the Orders of Chivalry in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and of Knights Bachelors. By William A. Shaw. Incorporating a complete list of Knights Bachelors dubbed in Ireland, compiled by G. D. Burtchaell. 2 vols. 10 × 7½. Pp. lxiii, 479, and 420 + Index (253 pp.). Printed and published for the Central Chancery of the Orders of Knighthood, by Sherratt & Hughes, 42s. net.

HISTORY.

Shore, Thomas William. Origin of the Anglo-Saxon Race. Edited by T. W. and E. W. Shore. 9½ × 5½. Pp. 416. Elliot Stock, 9s. net.

[“A study of the settlement of England and the Tribal Origin of the Old English People.”]

LITERATURE.

Bayley, Harold. The Shakespeare Symphony. An introduction to the ethics of the Elizabethan drama. 9 × 6. Pp. 393. Chapman & Hall, 12s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Reich, Emil. Plato as an Introduction to Modern Criticism of Life. 9 × 6. Pp. 336. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d.

Louis Wain's Summer Book, 1906. 9½ × 7½. Pp. 96. P. S. King, 1s.

Ruskin at Venice. A Lecture given during the Ruskin Commemoration at Venice, September 21, 1905, by Robert De la Sizeranne. Translated by Mrs. Frederic Harrison. 7½ × 5. Pp. 70. Allen, 1s. net.

Gledstone, James Paterson. Should Christians Make Fortunes? 7½ × 5. Pp. 127. Headley, 2s. net.

MUSIC.

Journal of the Folk-Song Society. No. 8. Being the third part of vol. ii. 8½ × 6½. Pp. 77. London: 84 Carlisle Mansions, Victoria Street, S.W. [Contains songs collected from Essex, Norfolk, Sussex, Wiltshire, Yorkshire, Kent and London.]

Burgess, Francis. Verdi's Il Trovatore and Rigoletto. Nights at the Opera series. Nos. x and xi. Each 7½ × 4. Pp. 56 and 42. De La More Press, 1s. net each.

Dry, Wakeling. Wagner's Flying Dutchman. Nights at the Opera series. 7½ × 4. Pp. 66. De La More Press, 1s. net.

PHILOSOPHY.

Joseph, H. W. D. An Introduction to Logic. 9 × 6. Pp. 564. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 9s. 6d. net.

POETRY.

Lawson, Henry. When I Was King, and other verses. 7½ × 5. Pp. 270. Sydney: Angus & Robertson, 3s. 6d. net.

[Many of the verses in this volume appeared in the Sydney Bulletin and other papers; eleven are reprinted from "The Children of the Bush" (Methuen).]

Newmarch, Rosa. Songs to a Singer, and other verses. 7½ × 5. Pp. 108. Lane, 5s. net.

Sill, Louise Morgan. In Sun or Shade. 8 × 5½. Pp. 226. Harper, 6s. net.

[Several of the poems are reprinted from American magazines.]

The Red West Road, and other verses. By "Quilp N." 8½ × 6. Pp. 55. Wellington: Turnbull, n.p.

[Reprinted from various Australasian papers.]

Drew, Bernard. Cassandra and other poems. 8 × 5½. Pp. 100. Nutt 3s. 6d. net.

Gould, Gerald. Lyrics. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 47. Nutt, 1s. net.

Lawson, Will ("Quilp N."). Between the Lights, and other verses. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 114. Wellington: Ferguson & Hicks, n.p.

[Reprinted from various Australasian papers.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

Plutarch's Lives. Translated by Aubrey Stewart and George Long. 4 vols. The York Library. 6½ × 4½. Bell, 2s. net each.

[This translation of Plutarch's Lives was first published in 1880-1882 in Bohn's Standard Library. Thirteen of the lives were translated by George Long and the remainder by Aubrey Stewart. A revised edition was issued in 1883-4, and it has been frequently reprinted. It is now added to the York Library.]

- Crommelin, May. Bay Ronald, a novel. New edition.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$ . Pp. 348. Jarrold, 3s. 6d.
- Borrow's Lavengro, and The Zincali; Democratic Vistas, and other papers, by Walt Whitman; Landor's Imaginary Conversations (vol. ii.—Dialogues of Sovereigns and Statesmen); and Sir Edward Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World, from Marathon to Waterloo. Each  $6\frac{1}{2} \times 4$ . The New Universal Library. Routledge, 1s. net per vol.
- Poems of Matthew Arnold*, and Dramas and Prize-poems of Matthew Arnold. Edited by Laurie Magnus. Each  $6 \times 4$ . The Muses' Library. Routledge, 1s. net each.
- Viscount St. Cyres's François de Fénelon. With 8 illustrations. Oxford Biographies.  $7 \times 4\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 208. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net. [Abridged.]
- The Works of Shakespeare: Titulus and Cressida. Edited by K. Deighton. The Arden Shakespeare.  $8\frac{1}{2} \times 6$ . Pp. 208. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.
- Scott's Ivanhoe and Charles Reade's The Cloister and the Hearth. Each  $6\frac{1}{2} \times 4\frac{1}{2}$ . Nelson's Sixpenny Classics.
- Ward, Mrs. Humphry. Lady Rose's Daughter. Illustrated by Cyrus Cuneo.  $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 204. Sixpenny Copyright Novels. Newnes.
- Murray, David Christie. The Martyred Fool.  $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 148. Sixpenny Novels Illustrated. Newnes.
- Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (in 7 vols.), vols. ii. and iii. Borrow's Romany Rye. Each  $6\frac{1}{2} \times 4$ . The World's Classics. Frowde, 1s. net each.
- Ainslie, Douglas. John of Damascus. Fourth edition.  $7 \times 4\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 335. Constable, 3s. 6d. net.
- Bremner, Robert Locke. The Modern Pilgrimage from Theology to Religion. Popular edition.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 296. Constable, 2s. 6d. net.
- Haeckel's The Evolution of Man: a popular scientific study. Translated from the fifth (enlarged) edition by Joseph McCabe. Vol. i.—Human Embryology, or Ontogeny.  $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 178. Watts, 6d. net. [Vol. ii, completing the work, will be published in September.]
- Russell, George W. E. William Ewart Gladstone. Fifth edition. Pp. 292. Stanmore, Low. The Earl of Aberdeen. Third edition. Pp. 330. Each  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Prime Ministers of England Series. Dent, 2s. 6d. net each.
- [Originally issued in Messrs. Sampson, Low's "Queen's Prime Ministers" series, taken over by Messrs. Dent and renamed "Prime Ministers of England."]
- Rawlinson, W. G. Turner's Liber Studiorum, a description and a catalogue. Second edition, revised throughout.  $9\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. lvi, 244. Macmillan, 20s. net.

SPORT.

- Fishermen's Weather*. By upwards of one hundred living anglers. Edited by F. G. Aflalo. With 8 full-page illustrations in colour from paintings by Charles Whymper.  $8 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. xii, 256. Black, 7s. 6d. net.
- Grenfell, F. H. Swedish Gymnastics as a Physical Training for the British Schoolboy.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 4\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 28. Simpkin, Marshall, 6d. net.
- [An address delivered at the Annual Conference (1905) of the Association of Preparatory Schools. Reprinted from the "Preparatory Schools Review."]

THEOLOGY.

- Fotheringham, Rev. David Ross. The Chronology of the Old Testament.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$ . Pp. 143. Cambridge: Deighton, Bell, 3s. net.
- Walker, Rev. W. L. Christian Theism and a Spiritual Monism. God, Freedom, and Immortality in View of Monastic Evolution.  $9\frac{1}{2} \times 6$ . Pp. 484. Edinburgh: Clark, 9s.
- Warde, Rev. F. W. Orde. The Keeper of the Keys. Essays on Christian thought in the twentieth century.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$ . Pp. 209. Francis Griffiths, 5s. net.
- Brown, David S. The Home of Faith.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 175. Francis Griffiths, 3s. 6d. net.
- Swann, N. E. Egerton. New Lights on the Old Faith. Sermons for the times.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$ . Pp. 179. Francis Griffiths, 3s. net.
- Sayce, Professor A. H. Archæology and Criticism. Smyth, Rev. Newman. The Spiritual Quality in Evolution. Abbots, Rev. Edwin A. Illusion in Religion. Barnard, P. Mordaunt, The Interpretation of the New Testament in Modern Life and Thought. Frankland, William Barrett. Doctrine and Theory. Essays for the Times, Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10. Each  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$ . Francis Griffiths, 6d. net each.
- Bodley, John Edward Courtenay. The Church in France. Two lectures delivered at the Royal Institution.  $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 182. Constable, 3s. 6d. net.
- Letters and Reflections of Fénelon*. Edited by B. W. Randolph, D.D.  $5\frac{1}{2} \times 3\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. xii, 158. Devotional Library. Mowbray, 1s. net.
- Literary Illustrations of the Bible*. Edited by James Moffatt, D.D. The Gospel According to Saint Matthew.  $5\frac{1}{2} \times 4$ . Pp. 187. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. 6d. net.
- Smith, Goldwin. In Quest of Light.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$ . Pp. 177. The Macmillan Co., 4s. net.
- [Most of the papers contained in this volume appeared originally in the form of letters to the New York Sun. They aim at giving some guidance to those perplexed by certain religious problems.]
- Jones, Rufus M. The Double Search: studies in Atonement and Prayer.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$ . Pp. 106. Headley, 2s. net.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Battersby, H. F. Prevost. India Under Royal Eyes. 165 illustrations from photographs taken by the author.  $9 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 453. Allen, 12s. 6d. net. [Some chapters have appeared in the Morning Post.]
- Okey, Thomas. The Story of Paris. Illustrations by Katherine Kimball. Mediæval Towns Series.  $7 \times 4\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 448. Dent, 4s. 6d. net.
- Cromarty, Deas. Picturesque Lancashire (North of the Ribble). Illustrations and a map. The Shire Series.  $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 141. Valentine, 2s. 6d. net.
- Villari, Luigi. Fire and Sword in the Caucasus. Illustrated.  $9 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 347. Unwin, 10s. net.
- [With a chronological table of recent events in the Caucasus.]
- Clinch, George. St. Paul's Cathedral, London. Little Guides series.  $6\frac{1}{2} \times 4$ . Pp. 231. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.
- Armstrong, Arthur C.; and Inglis, Harry R. G. Short Spins Round London. 285 Maps and Plans.  $6\frac{1}{2} \times 3\frac{1}{2}$ . Pp. 303. Gall & Inglis, 2s. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

The System of the Stars. By Agnes M. Clerke (Black, 20s. net). Modern Cosmogonies. By Agnes M. Clerke (Black, second edition).—In her preface Miss Clarke ventures upon the statement that "Astronomy is essentially a popular science." This might well be challenged; but no exception can be taken to the principle which the writer founds upon this assumption; that a proper literary treatment of a scientific subject, such as astronomy, is likely to clear it of unnecessary technicalities and specialisations, and thereby to popularise it. And in the highest sense, though not perhaps in the broadest, it may be said that this book deserves to succeed in its object, for it has the remarkable feature of combining extraordinary profusion of precise information with an elegance of literary style quite unusual in scientific authors. This conjunction of merits is bound to recommend the book to the average student of the stars, the person, that is, who has read a few books on the subject, and who has enjoyed gazing at the heavens with a field-glass or a small telescope; while it will possess no less weight upon this score with what may be termed the class of regular astronomers. On the other hand, it is to be feared that the book will never be popular in the sense of serving as an introduction to astronomy for the average layman, who may be ignorant as yet of the subject, but willing to learn; for it postulates a certain amount of knowledge, just as it requires a certain amount of enthusiasm and attention for its intelligent perusal. One of the first comments which occurs to the reader is upon the extraordinary magnitude of the task which sidereal astronomy sets itself; a second is upon the vast extent of the knowledge already acquired. As to the first, to quote Miss Clerke's words, it is no less than: "to investigate the nature, origin, and relationship of thirty million stars, and of one hundred and twenty thousand nebulae . . . to assign each its place and rank in the universal order . . . and thus at last rise to the higher synthesis embracing the grand mechanism of the entire." With such a programme it is obvious that: "the prospects of its advance are incalculable; the possibilities of its development virtually infinite." But it is difficult to know whether to marvel more at the potential, or at the actual scope of our knowledge. Certainly the sum of our acquaintance with the stars, as set forth in this book, is a matter of profound wonder in consideration of the state of accumulated knowledge even a few years ago, and of the appalling distances at which the objects of inquiry exist. It gives a good conceit of the power of the human mind, and of the astronomical mind in particular. Of course, the bulk of recent progress in investigation of the stars has been due to the spectroscopic and to vastly improved methods of photography, though the telescope can never be superseded, nor the work of earnest observers rendered nugatory. The fact that stars, unutterably distant, can be weighed and measured, their velocity calculated, and their chemical composition determined with comparative accuracy, may now be taken with composure by the regular astronomer, but must still be regarded as something of a miracle by the average student of the heavens. The book is well arranged, and the subjects are treated in a logical sequence. First, stars are considered spectrographically, chemically, and physically. The temporary and variable stars are mentioned in some detail and are carefully classified, several of the latter being admirably illustrated by light-curve diagrams. This naturally leads to the consideration of double stars, stellar orbits, and variable doubles, of which the numerous varieties as regards period, size, and colour are well described. From double stars it is but a step to "double-doubles," and to multiple stars, whence another step takes us to star clusters, and one more to nebulae. In this series of gradations Miss Clerke seems to indicate that we are working backward; we are tracing the evolutionary processes back to their beginnings, although the relations and methods of inter-action of bodies of various densities, at distances which are necessarily unknown, must remain largely a matter for conjecture. The distances and proper motions of the stars lead up to that apparently baffling problem of the Milky Way, closely allied with which is that of the structure of the heavens, to which Miss Clerke devotes two careful and lucid chapters. Mention has been made of the admirable literary style of the book; but this very merit brings into sharp relief a very inelegant phrase in the note to Fig. 22, which should be altered in future editions. The text is illustrated by many excellent drawings and photographs.

The larger part of "Modern Cosmogonies" has already appeared in the pages of Knowledge and Knowledge and Illustrated Scientific News, whose readers will doubtless welcome the opportunity of obtaining the essays bound together in proper form. Much that has been said of the former book applies also to this, which is perhaps the most brilliant example of Miss Clerke's work. Modern Cosmogonies is, however, on a different plane from the System of the Stars. It aims rather at summarising existing theories and enumerating new ones, than recording facts or basing generalities upon them. And to this extent it is the more advanced and the more ingenious production. Freed from the trammels of description and classification, Miss Clerke gives rein to her literary instinct and to her scientific imagination. And, indeed, in this phrase we have the key-note of the book. Imagination is a very necessary quality for an inductive thinker, a propounder of theories. Theorising is a fascinating occupation, for which imagination is as necessary as facts, but, if the imagination be not scientific, there is danger of the theorising becoming fantastic. In this respect Miss Clerke seems to us to possess exactly the right spirit, to be at once careful in dealing with existing theories, and reasonably courageous in advancing conclusions of her own. To any one interested in modern inquiries regarding the origin of the world, this book may be confidently recommended as both fascinating and profound.

Our Stellar Universe; stereoscopic star-charts and spectroscopic key-maps. By T. E. Heath. (King, Sell and Olding, 10s. net.)—In this book Mr. Heath elaborates an ingenious idea, which he has already brought forward in two separate volumes similarly named. The main principle can hardly be better or more concisely described than in the author's own prefatory words: "All the stars to the fifth magnitude, and such other stars as the author could collect parallax for are projected, without distortion, upon twenty-six plane surfaces, each fifty degrees square. The star discs are drawn to a scale of magnitude, and in the key-maps the magnitude, spectrum and parallax, when known, are written against each star. From the key-maps the stereoscopic charts are made. In these the stars appear to give light proportionately to magnitude and to be in the constellation as seen from the earth, but to be hanging in space of three dimensions; those of which the parallax is known at their relative distances; the remainder at estimated average distances." The greater portion of the text consists of an explanation of the author's idea and method, and of an introduction to the study of the stars in accordance therewith. The idea is clever and original; and it is worked out in such a way as to be of considerable assistance to any one who will follow it out carefully. As the author points out, many astronomers appear to have fallen into the habit of regarding the space of the heavens as spherical; while the average star-map projected upon a plane surface necessarily involves a compromise leading to error. Mr. Heath's system is an antidote to misconceptions of this nature; while the wonderful vividness of the stereoscopic star-charts supplies a stimulus to such minds as do not easily think in three dimensions. Of course, Mr. Heath has to make some compromises himself in order to render his effects intelligible to the ordinary student possessed of ordinary eyesight. He has been obliged, in fact, to magnify the parallaxes 19,000 times, as if the earth revolved at a mean distance from the sun of 1,767,000,000,000 miles, instead of 93,000,000 miles. This, however, in no way detracts from the essential accuracy of the charts, which have been plotted with extreme care. The study of these through even an ordinary stereoscope is extremely fascinating, and would be still more so for any one who took the trouble to follow out the author's suggestion with regard to perforating the cards and covering the holes with gelatine dyed to correspond with the characteristic colour of each star. Turning to Ursa Major as our oldest friend among the constellations, it is very interesting to observe how the difference in the parallaxes of the principal components is illustrated by Mr. Heath's method.  $\alpha$  Ursæ majoris has a parallax of .046"  $\theta$  the same,  $\eta$  .095"; while  $\beta$ ,  $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$ ,  $\epsilon$ ,  $\zeta$ , and  $g$  are each .0165." In the stereoscope  $\eta$  stands out apparently twice as near as  $\alpha$  and  $\theta$ , while the others drop back again, all in the same plane, well behind the plane of  $\alpha$  and  $\theta$ . This gives the student a vivid sense of their community which no verbal statement could possibly achieve. Besides the text already mentioned, the star-charts and key-maps, there are tables, one to find the sun power of any star, and another for working parallaxes for placing the stars in the stereoscopic charts; and there is an admirable index of each of the principal stars, giving a reference to the key-maps, its R.A. and declination, its magnitude and type of spectrum, its distance in light-years, hypothetical diameter in miles, sun power and other data. Mr. Heath has certainly produced a book which will be of interest to every astronomer.

Church Music. (Dolphin Press, Philadelphia.) The Passing of the Precentor. By Duncan Fraser. (W. J. Haig, Edinburgh.)—Some time ago we had pleasure in calling attention to the first number of an important journal called Church Music, which deals with its subject from the Roman Catholic point of view as influenced by the recent motu proprio. The second, a Lenten number, is now before us, and proves even better than the first. In it begins "Gregorian Rhythm, a theoretical and practical course," by the Very Rev. Dom André Morguereau, O.S.B., Prior of Solesmes. This is a matter of such importance, and is, moreover, treated with such learning and in so fundamental a manner, that it should be read and studied by all musicians quite apart from its particular bearing on the liturgical services of the Roman Church. An article, "On Recitation," by the Rev. Ludwig Bouvin, S.J., appears to recommend a practice which has been used during the last half-century by every parish church in England boasting a "musical" service. If, hitherto, Roman churches have been spared vocal recitation with organ accompaniment as a substitute for music, we may counsel those in authority to hear its result in certain Anglican churches before they introduce it to their own. Other important articles are "The Official Lyricale," by the Editor, and a second instalment of the article on "Woman's part in the motu proprio." Easter music rightly takes an important place in this number, including an illustrated article on "The Gradual for Easter day," and there are some forty pages of "Chronicle and Comments." The musical supplements, settings of offertories for feasts of the B.V. Mary, are written in a dignified ecclesiastical style by the Rev. Ludwig Bouvin.—It may, perhaps, seem incongruous to include in the same note with this record of modern activity in the greatest of the churches, a notice of a modest little volume which calls to mind the individual efforts of men who filled the "desk" in the Scottish kirk of the last century. The "precentors" of Scotland were to the people what the organists of North Germany were in the eighteenth century, objects of interest and pride in every parish and centre of all local musical activity. In The Passing of the Precentor, by Duncan Fraser, the author has put on record a number of personal details of the lives and work of these worthies, which it were, indeed, a pity to lose. That the book is slight and sketchy is no fault, and it is adorned with a number of portraits of its heroes, which help to make it a charming little volume. We shall never know how much of the great artistic movements of the world are built upon the foundations of humble and lowliest effort in obscure corners. It is far from desirable that this effort should be written and talked of and lose its natural beauty by being paraded in the Press, but this little volume is a timely tribute to a type of artist who cannot be spoilt by it, since he has departed in favour of the organist and choirmaster.

In so amusing and bright a book as Mr. J. Henry Harris's Cornish Saints and Sinners (Lane, 6s.) we are sorry to find a few lapses from good taste, which spoil what otherwise would have been—with the aid of Mr. Raven-Hill's drawings—a very good piece of work. Every one who knows the legends of the Cornish Saints knows they they are full of quaintness, that they amuse as well as touch by their naïveté, and that, simply told, they are delightful. No stories in the world are less in need of "modern humour" to make an effect, and yet we find Mr. Harris feebly and coarsely imitating Mark Twain at his very worst, with the result that the feelings of any person of taste must be shocked. Take his version of the story of St. Michael and the Conger, "St. Michael had got rid of the very last drop of the L.L. whiskey"—"St. Michael was the gold medallist of his college, and could put two and two together with the help of his fingers"—"The saint took that [the giant's telescope], but forgot to send a 'return' to Somerset House, and pay death duties"—"There was no time to advise the newspapers, and get special correspondents on the spot, but it was reported that the battle [between the Saint and the Devil] was tough and long." What is this but vulgarity and silliness conjoined, as they usually are? But for such errors as these, we should have been glad to recommend a book the appearance of which we can now only lament.

Jewish Encyclopædia. Vol. xii. (Funk and Wagnall.) The twelfth and last volume of the Jewish Encyclopædia is one of the most interesting and representative of the series. The two chief articles appropriately deal with the Talmud, called by Heine the Bastille of Judaism, and with Zionism, which he might with equal fairness have designated its Revolution, thus treating of the corner-stones of both orthodox and modern Judaism. The Talmud, that giant cyclopædia of theology, medicine, mathematics, botany, law, was the great whetstone on which the intellect of mediæval Jewry was sharpened, and the extraordinary Jewish genius for subtlety and casuistry may be well realised when it is understood that there are no less than one hundred and ninety-four branches of Talmudic Law, and no less than one hundred and seventy commentaries on the Talmud which was itself, in its original essence, a commentary on the Bible. The article on Zionism (by Professor Gottheit), which contains an illustration of the interview in Palestine between Dr. Herzl and the Emperor William, is in every way comprehensive, giving the history of the movement from the Messianic aspirations that followed the dispersion down to the formation of the Jewish Territorial Organisation under the leadership of Mr. Zangwill. Among the numerous other contributions we would mention in particular the article on the Temple by Mr. J. D. Eisenshein, which has a full-page illustration of the Holy of Holies and those from the pen of Mr. Jacobson, "Types," "Typography" and "The United States." It is interesting to notice that the current conception of the Jews as a brunette race needs considerable modification, and that not only do many of them exhibit either the mixed or the blonde type but that the distribution of the blonde type among Jews is in inverse proportion to its distribution among Gentiles. In the article on the United States a pregnant comment on the alien problem is supplied by the fact that a million have immigrated during the last quarter of a century. With the twelfth volume is published a compact and adequate guide to the Encyclopædia by Mr. Jacobs. Taking the twelve volumes together they contain sixteen thousand six hundred and six general articles which treat over one hundred and fifty thousand subsidiary subjects, and contain two thousand four hundred and sixty-four illustrations. Speaking generally the work is efficient, although here and there the style halts owing to an inadequate translation from one of the six hundred and four cosmopolitan contributors. The chief impression left, however, by the Encyclopædia is that of the disproportionate predominance of the Jews in finance, literature, art, the drama, journalism, medicine and law. Coming, moreover, at a time when Zionism is entering on a more modern and practical phase, the work is particularly significant as an eloquent testimony to the power and existence of the Jewish race.

The National Gallery, London: I. The Flemish School. By Frederick Wedmore; II. The Dutch School. By Gustave Geffroy. (Newnes, 3s. 6d. net each.)—To their admirably planned "Art Library"—the volumes in which have hitherto been devoted to individual painters—Messrs. Newnes are now adding a companion series on the same lines dealing with "The Art Galleries of Europe." The format of the new series is practically the same as the old, the only change being a quarter cloth instead of vellum binding, while the contents remain the same, a maximum of well-chosen reproductions with a minimum of critical and descriptive letterpress. The opening of the Guildhall exhibition gives a special topical interest to "The Flemish School," whose achievements as seen at the National Gallery are summed up by Mr. Wedmore in a well-balanced and gracefully written essay.

Monsieur Geffroy's essay on "The Dutch School" has not the literary charm of Mr. Wedmore's, and in our opinion Hals and Hobbema deserve lengthier consideration than they receive, but the main facts regarding Rembrandt and the "Little Masters" of Holland are adequately stated. The reproductions in both volumes are good, though the half-tone blocks after Rembrandt's work might, with care, have produced clearer and distincter impressions.

La Bibliofolia, Rivista dell' Arte Antica in Libri, Stampe, Manoscritti, Autografi e Legature is a periodical publication which might be better known than it is in this country, among those who are interested in books as well for their binding and printing as for their contents. It is published and edited in Florence by the proprietor, Commendatore Leo S. Olschki. The articles which see the light in its pages are of various interest. The most important features in the numbers now before us (November and December 1905 and January 1906) are: an article by C. Lozzi, with many reproductions from old pictures, on the Festivals of the Communes of Italy; one by Hugues Vaganay on a book entitled "Le Douziesme Livre d'Amadis de Gaule, contenant Quelle in prindrent les Loyales Amours d'Agesilan de Colchos et de la Princesse Diane . . . Traduyt nouvellement d'Espagnol en François." Paris 1556 by G. Aubert de Poitiers, dedicated to Madame Diane de Poitiers, Duchesse de Valentinois; and an excellent review, with many coloured illustrations, by Leo S. Olschki of the work of M. Henry-René D'Allemagne, "Les Cartes à jouer du XIV<sup>e</sup> au XX<sup>e</sup> Siècle." Of equal (or even greater) value with the letterpress are the illustrations, each issue containing a large number of beautifully executed reproductions, both in line and colour, of bindings, title-pages, frontispieces, woodcuts, illuminated pages, ex-libris and so forth. Amateurs and collectors will find much useful information and suggestive reading in the current notices of sales by auction and articles on the management of libraries, the various problems of the book-trade, and fresh discoveries of inscriptions or manuscripts.

To their series of "Modern Master Draughtsmen," Messrs. Newnes have added the Drawings of Rossetti and Drawings of John M. Swan, R.A. (7s. 6d. net each), and a comparison between these two volumes leads one to reflect what varying, even conflicting qualities may be grouped under the common head of "drawing." If by this word is understood the accurate delineation of form, then surely Mr. Swan must be reckoned the more accomplished of the two. Of Rossetti it has been finely said, "he couldn't draw a man; but he created a woman," and the phrase makes one pause to consider whether the creative faculty, inventiveness, rather than a habit of keen observation and conscientious reproduction, is not the better part of draughtsmanship. Now Mr. Swan can draw anything. It is true he is best known as an animal painter, but his rendering of the human form is not less scholarly and correct even though it lack the masterly breadth of treatment and unity of vision which hall-mark his studies of beasts. Turning over the leaves of this volume of reproductions, gazing at these lionesses, tigers, polar bears and leopards, we exclaim admiringly, "How life-like, how natural, how true, what splendid modelling, what a sense of movement, what superb drawing! Such expressions do not rise to the lips when we take up the other volume of drawings by Rossetti. Opening it, we find we have left the world of facts for the land of dreams, we have exchanged the finely seen for the finely imagined. When he sees such compositions as the Mary at the door of Simon, the craftsman may laud the balance of the design, the magic web of intricate patterning which the artist has spun, but the layman has only one phrase. How beautiful! We cannot say, nor do we wish to say of Rossetti's drawings, "How life-like! Can we say of Mr. Swan's, "How beautiful? Rarely; for Mr. Swan is not primarily occupied with beauty. And herein lies the difference between him and Rossetti. The latter appeals, almost feverishly, to our emotions; Mr. Swan, soberly, to our intellect. Rossetti from the depths of his imagination has brought forth beauty, beauty laden with sensuous charms and saddened a little by the thought of all the sin those charms have caused. Mr. Swan, alert and open-eyed, has journeyed from the poles to the tropics, and faithfully reproducing his observations, tells us the truth about the beast. Often enough the beast is a magnificent creature, majestic in repose, graceful in action. Our sympathy goes out to it and we are grateful to Mr. Swan for the introduction. But when all is said and done it remains a beautiful object rather than a creation of beauty, and this objective beauty leaves us admiring but cold, it cannot quicken the pulse or warm the heart. Inasmuch as it is the end of art to give enjoyment and not to stimulate criticism one should be content with the excellent way in which the drawings in either volume are reproduced. Some reproductions in colour of Mr. Swan's sketches are unusually successful, while the rendering of Mr. Hollier's photograph of Rossetti's "Study for the Salutation" is a revelation of the wonderful way in which colour can be suggested by a monotone. At the first glance it seems an impossibility that the same ink has been used for the eyes and the lips. In the matter of selection, too, the volumes leave little room for complaint, though perhaps more of Rossetti's Tennysonian illustrations might have been given. But the student who wishes to learn as well as to enjoy may reasonably suggest that the method of arrangement leaves room for improvement. From his point of view chronological order should be strictly observed and dates or approximate dates given on all plates. Such an arrangement could be displeasing to no one and would undoubtedly increase the utility of the volumes by allowing the development of the artist to become more easily manifest.

WERNER LAURIE'S LIST

Mr. Werner Laurie is Publishing To-day an Important New Novel of Irish Schoolboy Life. Price 6s.

THE CUBS. By Shan F. Bullock.

THE CUBS. By Shan F. Bullock.

LIFE IN THE LAW.

Reminiscences of the Bench, Bar and Circuit. By JOHN GEORGE WITT, K.C. (Bencher of Lincoln's Inn—Formerly Senior Fellow of King's College, Cambridge). With Portrait, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Mr. Witt's tragic death in a London omnibus recently is probably fresh in the memory of most people. He was a general favourite, and this very pleasant and readable volume of his reminiscences during the last forty years will be welcomed by many. The work was full of personal anecdotes of well-known legal luminaries.

THE MUSIC LOVERS' LIBRARY.—Vol. II.

STORIES FROM THE OPERAS.

By GLADYS DAVIDSON. Illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net.

A charming series of tales arranged from the Grand Operas. Few people know the actual stories contained in the great music dramas of Wagner and others. Most of them are very beautiful and interesting, and this volume contains twenty of the more popular tales, simply written, and in accordance with the libretto.

Vol. I. CHATS ON VIOLINS. By OLGAR RACSTER. 3s. 6d. net.

MODERN MEDICINE FOR THE HOME.

By ERNEST WALKER, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. (Lond.) Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

"A practical, scientific, up-to-date, and popular handbook, which ought to be in every home library."

REMINISCENCES OF A COUNTRY POLITICIAN.

By JOHN A. BRIDGES, J.P. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

The TIMES says:—"The combination of qualities displayed by Mr. Bridges in this pleasant medley of reflections and recollections is at once piquant and rare."

THE LIFE OF OSCAR WILDE.

Very fully Illustrated and with Photogravure Frontispiece. By ROBERT HARBOROUGH SHERARD. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net. [Shortly.]

The renewed interest which has been universally awakened in the public mind, by the appearance of "De Profundis," in the life and work of the late Mr. Oscar Wilde has created on every side a demand for an authoritative book dealing with these two subjects. This volume gives the true facts of his career as a writer, his biography as far as that is consistent with the due observance of discretion, and an account of his literary work in the many fields in which he so greatly distinguished himself.

CATHEDRAL SERIES.—Vol. VI.

THE CATHEDRALS AND CHURCHES OF THE RHINE AND NORTH GERMANY.

By T. FRANCIS BUMPUS. 82 Illustrations. 6s. net.

To a great extent this volume is breaking unfamiliar, if not actually fresh ground. Chapters are devoted to a general survey of the church architecture of North Germany, showing how it developed in the Rhineland, Westphalia, Saxony, and the Baltic Provinces; and how, in spite of the religious wars of which she was the theatre for so long a period subsequent to the breach with Rome in the 16th century, Germany has retained the mediæval furniture of her churches more completely than any other country of Northern Europe.

The book is amply illustrated, and besides the tours sketched out here and there for prospective visitors, a map is provided, indicating the whereabouts of the most important places alluded to.

THREE NEW NOVELS. 6s. each.

ROWENA. Agnes Giberne.

THE MUMMY AND MISS NITTOORIS. George Griffith.

THURTELL'S CRIME. Dick Donovan.

T. WERNER LAURIE, Clifford's Inn, London.

JUST OUT.

INDIA UNDER ROYAL EYES
By H. F. PREVOST BATTERSBYWith 165 Illustrations from Photographs specially taken by the Author.
472 pp. demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

The aim of the book is to bring the great Eastern Empire home to the eyes and thoughts of the English people; to explain simply and illustrate vividly the Public Life, and Social, Political, and Military Problems of India, as well as her Art, Scenery, and Native Customs.

DAYS WITH WALT WHITMAN

With Some Notes on his Life and Work. By EDWARD CARPENTER, Author of "The Art of Creation," etc. With 3 Photogravure Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

[Just out.]

GEORGE'S WHIMS

The Strange Experiences of a Guardian. By PHILIP WHIT-HARD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

"For right appreciation of 'George's Whims' we look with confidence to the crowd."—WORLD.
"Intensely amusing . . . Absolutely unique in plot . . . As a holiday companion, one of the best."—SPORTING LIFE.The "LIBRARY EDITION" of RUSKINEdited, with Additions from the Original Manuscripts,
By E. T. COOK and ALEXANDER WEDDERBURN.

This, the only Complete Edition, consists of 80 different works in 37 volumes, illustrated with 1400 plates and woodcuts, in addition to over 100 other drawings by Ruskin not hitherto reproduced, together with much unpublished matter. Limited issue. Sold only in Sets. Large medium 8vo (9½ by 6½), Holliston cloth, uncut edges, 25s. net per volume,

VOLUME XXIV.—JUST OUT.

VENICE AND PADUA

Including ST. MARK'S REST, GUIDE TO ACADEMY OF VENICE, GIOTTO AND HIS WORKS. 520 pp., with 75 Plates, 4 Woodcuts, and Facsimile of MS.

Complete Prospectus, with Methods of Payment, sent on application.

LONDON: GEORGE ALLEN, 156 CHARING CROSS ROAD.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents
Everywhere.THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties,

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No. 1 105 HOLBORN.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER
FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THESaturday
Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS
THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND
MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.THE ACADEMYA WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____
months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE [A.D. 1720.]

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

The June BOOK MONTHLY is now ready, sixpence net, and if you are interested in books you should get it. It has a talk with Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., on literary affairs, other articles of great freshness, and delightful illustrations. Then it gives particulars of the new books appearing in June, and a full list of those issued in May. The BOOK MONTHLY is published by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will, on application, send a specimen copy.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED DRINK THE
WHITE
DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER. & BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THE AUTOTYPE CO.,

74 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Reproductions in Monochrome
of Famous Works of Art.

By the AUTOTYPE Permanent Process.

Amongst the numerous publications may be mentioned:

Selections from the National Gallery (London), the Wallace Collection, the Tate Gallery, the Walker Art Gallery (Liverpool).

Drawings by Holbein from the Royal Collection, Windsor Castle.

Selected Examples of Sacred Art from various Collections.

Etchings by Rembrandt.

Drawings by Albert Durer.

Pictures from the Louvre, Luxembourg, Paris.

Prospectuses of above issues will be sent free on application. Full particulars of all the Company's publications are given in

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

ENLARGED EDITION, with Hundreds of Miniature Photographs and Tint-Blocks of Notable Autotypes. For convenience of reference the publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' Names. Post free, One Shilling.

A Visit of Inspection is invited to

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRINTERS' PIE

EDITED BY

W. HUGH SPOTTISWOODE

The Great Literary and Artistic Annual,
the Proceeds of which go to Printing Trades Charities.

PRINTERS' PIE CONTAINS ARTICLES, STORIES, AND DRAWINGS BY OVER FIFTY OF THE BEST KNOWN WRITERS AND ARTISTS.

Each copy sold benefits a Charity whose work has peculiar claims for public support.

Each copy has attached to it an Accident Insurance Coupon for £2000 for three months.

1/- AT ALL BOOKSTALLS AND NEWSAGENTS.

1/-

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1780

JUNE 16, 1906

PRICE THREPPENCE

Education

CITY AND COUNTY BOROUGH OF BELFAST.

BRANCH LIBRARIAN.

THE LIBRARY and TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION COMMITTEE invite applications for the post of BRANCH LIBRARIAN for the new BRANCH LIBRARY, OLDPARK ROAD. Salary £100 per annum.

Candidates are required to have had previous experience in Public Library Work and Organisation, and to state their experience in Classification and Cataloguing.

Age not to exceed 40.—Applications, with copies of three Testimonials, to be addressed to THE CHAIRMAN, The Public Library, Belfast, marked on the Envelope "Branch Librarian," and delivered on or before JUNE 19, 1906.

Canvassing will disqualify.

G. H. ELLIOTT, Chief Librarian.

June 5, 1906.

UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW.

CHAIR OF HUMANITY.

THE University Court of the University of Glasgow will on July 19 or some subsequent date proceed to appoint a Professor to occupy the above Chair which is now vacant.

The Professor will be required to enter on his duties on October 1, 1906, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary is fixed by Ordinance at £1000. The Chair has an Official Residence attached to it.

The appointment is made ad vitam aut culpam and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, 20 copies of his application and 20 copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit on or before July 9, 1906.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,

Secretary of the Glasgow University Court,
91 West Regent Street, Glasgow.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 27, 28, and 29 to fill Vacancies in Scholarships and Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the BURSAR, The Bursary, Little Dean's Yard, Westminster.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.

See Staff (honoursmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL, WEST KENSINGTON.—An examination will be held at the above School on Tuesday, June 26, 1906, and on the following days for filling up several vacancies on the foundation.—Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Bursar.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—11 Victoria Gardens, Notting-hill Gate, W.

BRITISH MUSEUM (NATURAL HISTORY).

The following are among the more recently published Works on Natural History issued by the Trustees of the British Museum:—

Catalogue of BIRD'S EGGS. Vol. IV. PASSERIFORMES (continued). By E. W. OATES and SAVILE G. REID. 14 Coloured Plates. Price £1 10s.

Catalogue of LEPIDOPTERA PHALENÆ (MOTHS). By Sir GEORGE F. HAMPSHIRE, Bart. Vol. V. NOCTUIDÆ (HARNETIDÆ). 172 Woodcuts. Price 15s. Atlas of 18 Coloured Plates. 15s.

Synonymic Catalogue of ORTHOPTERA. By W. F. KIRBY. Vol. I. Orthoptera Euplexoptera, Cursoria, et Grossoria. Price 10s.

Synonymic Catalogue of HOMOPTERA. PART I, CICADIDÆ. By W. L. Distant. Price 5s.

Catalogue of MADREPORARIAN CORALS. Vol. V. PORITES of the Indo-Pacific Region. By H. M. BERNARD, M.A. 35 Plates. Price £1 15s.

ILLUSTRATIONS of AUSTRALIAN PLANTS collected in 1770, during CAPT. COOK'S VOYAGE round the World in H.M.S. Endeavour. Part III. 77 Plates and 3 Maps. Price £1 5s.

Catalogue of the TERTIARY VERTEBRATA OF THE FAYUM, EGYPT. By C. W. ANDREWS, D.Sc. F.R.S. 98 Text Figures and 26 Plates. Price £1 15s.

Catalogue of the FOSSIL PLANTS OF THE GLOSSOPTERIS FLORA. Being a Monograph of the Permo-Carboniferous Flora of India and the Southern Hemisphere. By E. A. NEWELL ARBER, M.A., F.L.S., F.G.S. 51 Text Figures and 8 Plates. Price 12s. 6d.

These Works can be purchased through the Agency of Messrs. LONGMANS & Co., 39 Paternoster Row, E.C.4; Mr. B. QUARITCH, 15 Piccadilly, W.; Messrs. KEGAN PAUL & Co., Dryden House, 43 Gerrard Street, Soho, W.; and Messrs. DULAU & Co., 37 Soho Square, W.

June 1, 1906.

E. RAY LANKESTER, Director.

Sale by Auction

Valuable Books, and Illuminated and other Manuscripts.

MESSRS. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE will SELL by AUCTION at their House, No. 13 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C., on WEDNESDAY, June 27, and Three Following Days, at 1 o'clock precisely, valuable BOOKS, and ILLUMINATED and other MANUSCRIPTS, HISTORICAL and LITERARY DOCUMENTS, AUTOGRAPH LETTERS, etc., including 17 extremely rare Pre-Shakespearean plays, Original Sixteenth Century Editions—the First and Fourth Shakespeare Folios, and numerous Works of Shakespearean interest—an interesting Shakespearean Manuscript—the Whitworth Papers—Nelson Documents—John Knox's Book of Common Order, in Gaelic, First Edition—a Letter and Song in the Autograph of Robert Burns; BOOKS from the LIBRARY of W. HAGGARD, Esq.; Byroniana—Manuscript of the Order of the Garter—Blake's Poetical Sketches, 1783, Presentation Copy—Goupil's Illustrated Monographs, etc. May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

STAMMERING.—The severest and most obstinate cases can now be perfectly and permanently cured by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years; call or write.—Mr. A. C. SCHNELLE, 112 Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

Art

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL. — SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

EXHIBITION OF CONTEMPORARY GERMAN ART, PRINCES' GALLERY, KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

NOW OPEN, 10 to 6.

ALPINE CLUB, MILL STREET, CONDUIT STREET.—Large Decorative Panels by J. Kerr Lawson are being exhibited by Messrs. Carfax & Co., every day from 10 till 6. Admission one shilling.

WILLIAM BLAKE.—Exhibition of Paintings and Water-colours. The largest ever brought together in England at CARFAX GALLERY, 24 Bury Street, St. James. 10 till 6. Admission One Shilling.

CLIFFORD'S INN HALL, FRIDAY CLUB EXHIBITION.

Works of Art, Ancient and Modern. Open daily from 10 to 6, till July 7. Catalogues one shilling.

EXHIBITION of important PAINTINGS by MANET, from the Faure Collection, at Messrs. SULLEY and Co.'s Galleries, 159 New Bond Street, DAILY, (June 13-30), 10-5. Admission One Shilling, including catalogue.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GORREY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road Bushey, Herts.

Situations Vacant

WANTED to Hear of a good Translator of Latin and French.—Apply Mas., Post Office, Nantwich.

KHEDIVIAL SCHOOL OF LAW, CAIRO.

LAW LECTURESHIP.

THE Egyptian Ministry of Education invites applications for the post of Lecturer in the English section of the Khedivial School of Law, Cairo. Salary £615 rising to £820. Candidates must be University men, having either a law degree or other legal qualification, and must have some knowledge of French. The successful applicant will be required in the first instance to lecture (in English) on Roman Law.

Applications, stating age and qualifications, and accompanied by copies only of testimonials, to be sent before July 14, 1906, to DOUGLAS DUNLOP, Esq., Gullane, East Lothian, to whom Candidates may apply by letter for further information.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRURY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is produced gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 500 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . .	563	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		A Short Way with an Un-
The Mac Callean Mhor . . .	565	believer . . . . .	575
The Tudors . . . . .	567	Fiction . . . . .	576
A Lost Cause . . . . .	567	Fine Art:
Symbolic Beasts . . . . .	568	Pantin and Zorn . . . .	577
Then and Now . . . . .	569	Music:
A Representative Anglican .	570	The Other Side . . . . .	578
Mr. Kay Robinson's Religion .	570	Forthcoming Books . . . .	579
Ancient Voyages . . . . .	572	Correspondence . . . . .	580
A Little Doctored Faust . .	573	Books Received . . . . .	581
Bookshelf . . . . .	582

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE suspense is over at last and the appointments to the National Gallery and the Tate Gallery are officially announced. Sir Charles Holroyd gets the National Gallery, as every one expected that he would. It cannot be denied that this appointment is something of a blow to those who hold that the Director of the National Gallery should be a kind of Dictator, with the trustees for his servants; a man with a strong and definite policy of his own which it would be the business of the Trustees to accept, assist and authorise. The ideal Director has been described in these columns as "active, alert, rapacious"—a Dr. Wilhelm Bode, in fact; who would know better than any one where good things were to be had, hold his tongue about them till the right moment came and then—snap! He must be content to be a thorn in the flesh of his Trustees, spurring them on to the efforts which, animated and united by a will and a decision stronger than their own, they are only too willing to make. He should be able, even, to bully the Treasury and on occasion to snap his fingers at Authority.

Wilhelm Bodes are few here below; and these are not the qualities by which Sir Charles Holroyd has won the distinguished position he thoroughly deserves. It is early to judge; but his reign, we foretell, will not be a reign of great coups, of surprises and heroic achievements, of booty carried off under the very guns of the enemy. Yet it will be a reign in which, thanks to the tact and energy for which Sir Charles Holroyd has always been remarkable, Trustees and Directors will very comfortably agree not to do nothing, as in the old days, but to do all they can with their cumbrous machinery, a miserable Treasury grant and an apathetic public. The new Director is a young and sturdy man, with an inexhaustible power of work, wide sympathies and a genuine love of art; and even if he does not take up in his new and difficult position a decided and dictatorial line, his many good qualities cannot be without effect on the management of our national collection.

At the Tate Gallery we are in another pair of shoes. Mr. D. S. MacColl is known best as the man who headed the attack on the Royal Academy's administration of the Chantrey Bequest. His appointment to the very Gallery where he will have to house and arrange the Chantrey pictures is a humorous and illuminating comment on the result of the trial (for it was no less) in which he was the prosecutor. There can be no question of Mr. MacColl's decision, knowledge and courage. The question, indeed, is not so much what he will do to the Tate as what will the Tate do to him? Will it tame him? Will it add sugar to the salt of his judgment? Will he put the Chantrey pictures in the cellar, or have the rooms where they hang permanently "closed for repairs"? or will he come to like them, to find them comfortable companions; and set about qualifying himself for an A.R.A.? We hope not: we need hardly say that we believe not. Our eyes are fixed upon the Tate Gallery: we quite expect to see some fun.

The fact that "Il Santo," the recent book of Antonio Fogazzaro, poet, novelist, musical enthusiast and philosopher, has, in consequence of advanced theories and freedom of expression touching clerical matters in Italy, been placed on the "Index," has created a greater degree of British interest in that author's writings than has been manifested hitherto. Fogazzaro has never been one who could be called a prophet not without honour save in his own country, seeing that the Italian editions of "Piccolo Mondo Antico" (which deals with the progenitors of Piero Maironi, "Il Santo") number nearly forty, while those of some of his other works—"Daniele Cortis" for example—are well over twenty. In France and Germany he has long found favour, and translations of his prose and verse are numerous there. Some, too, have appeared in Danish, Dutch, Polish, Russian and Swedish. In England, as yet, he can scarcely be said to have come to his own, although keenly appreciated by a literary few. But he now bids fair to do so, and as Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's issue of an English version of "Il Santo" is likely to elicit inquiry as to his previously translated works, reference to some of them may be serviceable.

"Valsolda" is a volume of verse (mainly descriptive of the natural beauties of the locality by the Lake of Lugano, to which it owes its title), published by Fogazzaro thirty years ago (Milan, 1876). This includes two poems—"A Sera" and "In San Marco di Venezia"—both gems of their kind, which in 1893 appeared in "Italian Lyrics of To-day," a book of translations from contemporary Italian poetry, with biographical notices by G. A. Greene. A further rendering of "A Sera," it may be mentioned, was subsequently produced in the Leeds Mercury weekly supplement, August 14, 1897. An English translation of Fogazzaro's earliest novel, "Malombra," published in 1881 (this, like his later ones, has a mournful end, but is powerful in scenic depiction), was published by Mr. Fisher Unwin in 1896, but attracted little public notice. In 1888 his short sketch (subsequently reproduced with others in one volume), "Un pensiero di Ermes Torranza," appeared in English in the January monthly number of the Rivista Italia.

To the British public at the present moment "Daniele Cortis," published in 1885, is certainly the best known of Fogazzaro's novels. It was translated into English in New York in 1887; and also in London in 1890 (Remington and Co.) A pathetic short story, "Pereat Rochus," originally produced in the Corriere di Roma and subsequently included with the Ermes Torranza sketch in "Fedele ed altri racconti," Milan 1887, was translated into English in two parts, in the June and July numbers of the Italian Monthly Magazine, 1888. Fogazzaro's third important novel, "Il Mistero del Poeta," in which the author covers German ground as well as Italian, came out in 1888, and an English translation, still available, was published in 1903 by Messrs. Duckworth. Translations of expressions of some of his evolutionary theories are to be met with in the 1895 May and July numbers of the Contemporary Review.

An English rendering of Fogazzaro's most popular novel, already referred to, "Piccolo Mondo Antico," might have been expected to appear by this time. But the amount of dialect introduced into it appears, so far, to have proved a stumbling-block, for, to the best of our knowledge, none has been forthcoming, although the book has been reproduced in French, Swedish and Polish. Its sequel, "Piccolo Mondo Moderno"—an inferior work—shares a similar fate. But many are sure to be interested in the translation of "Il Santo," and then they will be curious as to what previously befell the characters and their predecessors. So something remains to be done.

At the extreme end of the churchyard of St. John the Baptist at Southend, facing the sea, lies the grave of Robert Buchanan. The memorial consists of a bronze bust on a black pedestal, and is inscribed as follows: "Robert Buchanan, poet, novelist and dramatist." Surrounded by six cypress trees, the granite kerbing bears the dates and places of his birth and death, and among other inscriptions the following verse from "The City of Dreams":

Forget me not but come, O King,
And find me softly slumbering
In dark and troubled dreams of Thee;
Then with one waft of thy bright wing
Awake me.

It has been customary for admirers of Robert Buchanan's genius to place tributes on his grave each year, and this year was no exception to past years. Many wreaths were deposited on the grave, including one from his biographer, Miss Harriet Jay. One who stood reverently by the grave was forcibly reminded of the lines in Buchanan's dedication to Dante Gabriel Rossetti of his "God and the Man," the amende honorable for a bitterly regretted mistake:

Calmly thy royal robe of Death around thee,
Thou sleepest and weeping Brethren round thee stand:
Gently they placed, ere yet God's angel crown'd thee,
My lily in thy hand!
I never knew thee living, O my brother!
But on thy breast my lily of love now lies:
And by that token we shall know each other,
When God's voice saith, "Arise."

Without ambition the world would not go far, so we must honour the enterprising spirits who presented Mr. Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon at the Crystal Palace last week, for the first time on any stage, and repeated it at the Scala Theatre on Monday. Miss Elsie Fogerty was at their head, and her past and present pupils formed the greater part of the cast. The modern note was rather obtrusive, but most of the players were very young. The Chorus was delightful; it was graceful and ornamental, if not Greek; it sang admirably and postured with smoothness and feeling. If the fire and wild, swaying melody of the poem did not get over the footlights, that was not due to lack of earnestness and heartiness in the expositors. Mr. Lewis Casson's opening speech gave the nearest approach to the thrill of enchantment felt in reading the poem.

"Overwhelming" is the only word for the Ellen Terry Jubilee matinée at Drury Lane. The entertainment was "colossal" and of the highest quality; the packed house was an unforgettable sight; enthusiasm filled the air. As the vast programme proceeded, the applause grew louder and louder, till it seemed that no greater climax could be looked for. The tableaux vivants in themselves were an afternoon's pleasure. The loudest welcomes were given to the simplest and the most elaborate; Miss Ellaline Terriss, sitting in the firelight as Cinderella, evoked shrill shrieks of joy from all the children scattered through the house: and when the curtain rose on Mr. Byam Shaw's "Blessed Damsel" there was a moment's hush before the storm that greeted the golden-crowned Madonna, sitting enthroned above a blue and purple twilight full of white and crimson sweeping wings.

When the curtain rose on Much Ado About Nothing there was desultory clapping, as Mr. Gordon Craig's mysteriously beautiful lighting half revealed the "stars" scattered about the stage: then the retreating wave of sound gathered itself up as Miss Kate Terry came forward; hesitated, grew higher and almost toppled over for Miss Marion Terry as Hero; but when the rose-clad Beatrice ran on, it burst into a roar, flung itself down, spread into a wide sheet of shouting and clapping and stamping, an uproar that swept every thought away and left only a wild exhilaration. It did not subside for many minutes, and then only to break out again at the "dancing star" speech; and there was plenty of energy left for the masked dance, when the three sisters, wreathed in green, came to the front of the stage together. After the reception scene and Signora Duse's silent tribute and all the smiles and tears, the curtain went up again and again, till at last Miss Ellen Terry, with her arms round her sisters' waists, appeared before it. With a final roar the audience decided that it would see nothing better than that, and could in decency ask for no more; and so left the theatre in happiness and exhaustion.

On June 27 Stoke Park will be put up for sale. Stoke Park is known wherever English literature is read, for it includes Stoke Poges. Gray's long connection with the place began in 1742, when his mother went to live there; but the two-storied house with the porch and old garden, gorgeous in autumn with asters, carnations and marigolds, has been greatly altered since her time. The muse seems to have visited Gray with inspiration almost as soon as he went to Stoke, for a few days later he wrote his "Ode to Spring." This was soon followed by the "Ode on a distant prospect of Eton College," which can be seen from a spot near the house. As for the famous "Elegy," it was begun at Stoke in 1742, then put away in Horatian fashion for seven years, then continued at Stoke, then roughly finished at Cambridge, and finally polished into perfect form at Stoke in 1750.

Another of Gray's poems is due to his connection with Stoke. In a fine old Tudor manor-house with high gables, projecting windows and stacks of clustered chimneys, there dwelt a Lady Cobham, who earnestly desired to make the poet's acquaintance. But Gray was shy and inaccessible. Application for an introduction was made to Mr. Purt, a clergyman at Stoke, but he knew Gray so slightly that he could not undertake the responsibility. But Lady Schaub, a guest of Lady Cobham's, knew a Lady Brown, a friend of Gray's, and on these slender grounds she ventured on a visit. Hence a friendship between Gray and Lady Cobham, which almost resulted in her marrying the poet to her niece—at any rate, he seems at one time to have been much afraid that some such scheme was in the air. Gray commemorated the circumstances of his introduction in the "Long Story," in which he inserted the name of Mr. Purt, who was so annoyed that he died of small-pox shortly afterwards.

It was at this old manor-house that Sir Edward Coke entertained Queen Elizabeth, presenting her there "with jewels and other gifts to the value of a thousand or twelve hundred pounds." Here too he spent many of the years that were embittered by the quarrel with his wife, who abandoned him in his old age, when he found himself "alone on earth, suspected by his king and deserted by his friends." She set out for Stoke, indeed, on a report that her lord was dead, in order that she might take possession of the house, but when she found that the report was false and that he was still alive she returned to London. Of the original mansion nothing remains except the fantastic chimneys and a rough shell, which is used as a stable. Here Sir Edwin Landseer had a studio and it was here that he was working when he suddenly became deranged in 1852.

There has been no period of the Public Library movement since the labours of Ewart resulted in the passing of the first Public Library Act in 1850, in which so great an advance has been made as during the last five or six years.

The most recent evidence of expansion is the "Library Year-Book," announced for publication in the autumn. The first attempt to found a year-book after "Public Libraries" by Mr. Greenwood was the "British Library Year-Book," due to the endeavours of the same pioneer, and published in 1897 and again in 1900. Possibly the time was not then ripe for so advanced a publication, as the support received did not justify the publishers in bringing out a new edition. But we hope that this new venture will come to "stay." A copy of the first issue will be presented to every librarian.

A recent coincidence is interesting if only because it "places" the manuscript of one of the most popular poems in our language. Mr. Andrew Carnegie's friendship with Sir Edwin Arnold commenced in India; and Mr. Carnegie became possessed of the manuscript of "The Light of Asia." Not long ago he received the freedom of Gravesend from the hands of the poet's elder brother, a well-known writer on Kentish archæology and antiquities. Mr. Carnegie, who previously did not know of the relationship between the two writers, was presented with the first honorary freedom of the borough in recognition of his gift of—a public library.

A curious light is thrown upon the way public matters are managed in Russia, even in the Art-world; by an article in the current number of the review Souremennost, concerning Prince Paul (or Paolo) Troubetzkoy. The facts, as stated in this journal, and which we give on its authority, are as follows. It seems that about eight years ago, when this sculptor's reputation as a devotee of "the New Art" was at its height, a public memorial was projected to Alexander III., which was appropriately to stand opposite the station for the Siberian Railway, which Alexander III. had laid. Competition for this memorial was not thrown open, but given by Court favour to Prince Paul, as being hors concours, and the sculptor at once had an enclosure erected opposite the station, which has remained as an eyesore from that day to this. Prince Paul Troubetzkoy has now vanished from St. Petersburg, abandoning both his studio in the Nevski Prospekt, and his memorial to Alexander III. The scandal is, that after a lapse of about eight years the authorities have now decided that the memorial shall be open to competition, and the commission given to another. And, remarks the Bourse News, Prince Paul Troubetzkoy is scarcely likely to return: what interest has this Italo-Americanised scion of a princely family, who cannot speak his own tongue, in Russia?

We notice that the birthplace of George Borrow, at Badley Moor, East Dereham, Norfolk, is to be offered by auction at the King's Head Hotel, East Dereham, on June 20. Borrow mentions the house in "Lavengro." It is a red-brick house, with a farm of about fifty acres. The sale will offer a good chance to holiday-makers for a Borrow pilgrimage.

Professor Mackarness having been obliged to resign the Chair of Roman Dutch Law at University College, London, on account of his professional and parliamentary engagements, Mr. R. W. Lee, Fellow and Lecturer of Worcester College, Oxford, Barrister-at-Law, and formerly of the Ceylon Civil Service, has accepted the invitation of the Council to occupy the Chair of Roman Dutch Law for a period of three years.

The Kann collections, it is now stated, have not been bought en bloc for America. They will probably be sold by auction, and collectors may look forward to one of the most important art-sales ever known. The two brothers, M. Maurice, who died this year, and M. Rodolphe, who died last year, built themselves houses adjoining each other and so arranged that their two picture-galleries could, on occasion, be thrown, into one. And then, buying independently of each other, they each formed collections of pictures, china and objets d'art which, when united, could scarcely be matched in Europe or America. Between them they owned some thirty of the very finest Rembrandts, and M. Maurice's collection was especially strong in Hals, and in Ruysdael and the great Dutch landscape-painters. It is reported that he never hung his pictures or unpacked his china, putting it off from day to day, until it was too late.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Geographical Society.—Evening meeting, Monday, June 18, at 8.30 P.M. At the Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W. Paper to be read: "A Fifth Journey in Persia," by Major P. Molesworth Sykes, C.M.G. The Right Hon. Sir George T. Goldie, K.C.M.G., D.C.L., F.R.S., president, in the chair.

Royal Meteorological Society.—An ordinary meeting will be held in the rooms of the Society, 70, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W., on Wednesday, June 20, at 4.30 P.M. Paper to be discussed: "The Development and Progress of the Thunder Squall of February 8, 1906," by R. G. K. Lempiert, M.A., F.R. Met. Soc. Papers to be read: (1) "The Mean Prevalence of Thunderstorms in various parts of the British Islands during Twenty-five Years, 1881-1905," by Frederick J. Brodie, F.R. Met. Soc. (2) "Note on a Typical Squall at Oxshott, May 25, 1906," by W. H. Dines, B.A., F.R.S.

Royal Microscopical Society, 20 Hanover Square, London, W.—The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 20th instant, at 8 P.M. precisely, when the following paper will be read by the president: "On the Structure of some Carboniferous Ferns."

The Musical Association, 32nd Session, 1905-6.—The eighth and last meeting will be held on Tuesday, June 19, at 5.15 P.M., at the King's Room, Messrs. Broadwood and Son's, Conduit Street, W., when a paper will be read entitled, "Prolegomena to Musical Criticism," by P. C. Buck, Esq., M.A., Mus. D. Oxon.

A paper on "The Generalised Law of Error, or Law of Great Numbers," by Professor F. Y. Edgeworth, M.A., D.C.L., will be read before the Royal Statistical Society, 9 Adelphi Terrace, on Tuesday, June 19, at 5 P.M.

Linnean Society of London.—Evening meeting, Thursday, June 21, at 8 P.M., when the following Papers will be read: (1) "The Botany of Southern Rhodesia," by Miss L. S. Gibbs, F.L.S., etc.; (2) "The Authentic Portraits of Linnæus (lantern slides)," by Mr. W. Carruthers, F.R.S., F.L.S., etc.; (3) "Plantae novae Daweanae in Uganda lectæ," by Dr. Otto Stapf, F.L.S., etc.; (4) "On the genitalia of Diptera," by M. W. Weschê.

New English Art Club, Dering Yard, 67A, New Bond Street, W.—Private View, Saturday, June 16. Open to the Public, Monday, June 18.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, June 18-20. Sale of books and manuscripts, including the library of the late Mr. Francis Leven; sporting books, the property of Sir Humphrey de Trafford, Bart.; a portion of the library of Sir Daniel Cooper, Bart., and the collection of early medical works, the property of the late Sir Mitchell Banks of Liverpool.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Thursday, June 21. Sale of the Naval and Military Medals, Orders and Decorations of the late Mr. John Sumner Whidborne of Dawlish.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, June 27-30. Sale of books and manuscripts, historical and literary documents, autograph letters, etc.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson.—Monday, June 18. Sale of the late Rev. C. J. S. Bowles's Furniture (Early English and other), English and other China and Porcelain, Jewelry, Watches, Miniatures, Medallions, Carvings, Pewter and Brass.

The Incorporated Stage Society.—The Fifth Production of the Seventh Season will take place on June 17 and 18. The programme will consist of The Invention of Doctor Metzler, a Play in One Act by John Pollock, and The Inspector-General in Three Acts, based on a translation from Gogol's "Revisor," by A. A. Sykes.

LITERATURE

THE MAC CAILEAN MHOR

The Duke of Argyll. Autobiography and Memoirs. Edited by the DOWAGER DUCHESS OF ARGYLL. 2 vols. (Murray, 36s. net.)

In his time the Duke of Argyll played many parts, and he was very conscious of the fact; hence the two portly volumes which contain his biography. They are to a large extent autobiographical, and only towards the middle of the second volume does his widow take up the pen and tell of the closing years of his life. The book is interesting, in spite of the fact that the Duke evidently had a somewhat exaggerated view of his own importance and seems to have thought that a great deal which concerns his family must have an equal interest for the public. The curious thing is that in this respect he to a large extent sins against the light. In the very first paragraph he says of biography that the "passages—sometimes the pages—which are devoted to family history and genealogies are almost always wearisome." He promises therefore not to inflict on others what he has found irksome to himself, whereat the reader waxes very cheerful until he finds that, in spite of this promise, the Duke goes on for page after page, and page after page, to discuss what the Scotch call his forbears. Perhaps the most interesting fact he tells us is that on the mother's side he was descended from the beautiful Miss Gunning, who, after being Duchess of Hamilton, became Duchess of Argyll. It is scarcely needful to say that in the Duke of Argyll's opinion the type of beauty belonging to Elizabeth Gunning was only to be compared with that face which "launched a thousand ships and burned the topless towers of Ilium." He compares her with Nelson's Lady Hamilton, much to the disadvantage of Emma. Lady Hamilton, we are told, although she fascinated many men, never could enthral the world. "Crowds never waited on her steps, nor did men and women mount on chairs to see her pass." This was the case, however, with the Duchess of Argyll, as may be seen from the portrait of her by Cotes which "represents a beauty of the very highest type—a beauty absolutely devoid of any element merely meretricious." After so much preface we must quote his description of her:

Her general complexion was fair; her eyes were long rather than large, of an almost pure blue, but set off with eyelashes which were dark; all her features were clear-cut, delicate, and harmonious. Everything is in keeping, no colour very brilliant but enough for warmth. Perfect refinement, and perfect symmetry of features and of figure, with great sweetness of expression, are the predominant characteristics, with a pose of the head and neck in lines of faultless beauty. One sees that her carriage and her walk must have set off the whole effect with extraordinary dignity and grace. The artist in this beautiful picture has represented in the background a sunflower throwing its golden disc towards his lovely subject—a graceful artistic compliment, well conceived and well deserved.

Perhaps our taste is not quite so fastidious as was that of the Duke of Argyll, but Romney's pictures of Lady Hamilton seem to present the more entrancing personality of the two. However, we must haste away from the Duke of Argyll's progenitors to come to "My early days and pursuits." His father was a determined enemy of Mr. Pitt, and he had erected a high flagstaff on the top of a new tower at Ardencale. On this flagstaff he hoisted a large Union Jack whenever Lord Grey's Government received any check, so that the people round about, when they saw the flag flying used to say: "Heh, sirs! what's come over the Whigs nco?" He gives a very pretty picture of himself seeking birds' eggs, making an aquarium, and studying natural history generally on the banks of the Clyde. There he seems to have learned his love of Virgil and other classic authors, but we are bound to admit that his love of Roman literature did not enhance the delicacy of his taste in regard to contemporary writers. The present writer is old enough to remember a time when he was somewhat surprised to find that the Duke of Argyll who claimed to be a patron of letters very often invited literary beginners to Inveraray: they were usually of the stamp that comes to no good afterwards, and even in those early days we felt some doubt as to his discrimination. These doubts are not allayed by the literary judgments delivered in the course of this book. The greatest of the geniuses entertained at Inveraray appears to have been Harriet Beecher Stowe, who is described as carefully as if she had been a Sappho or a Jane Austen. "Nothing escaped her," we are told, "and I felt that I gained more knowledge from her remarks during a short drive than from any books I had ever read." We have pages of this adulation, which perhaps will not create very much surprise seeing that patrons of literature in these days usually show their love of letters by encouraging the worst authors. It would be invidious to particularise, but we cannot forget where the foundation of the fame of some of the most notorious novel-writers of the present day was laid. All the Duke of Argyll's geese were swans, as witness the following tribute to the memory of another of his protégés:

Dr. Johnson has said that whoever would desire to have a polished English style "must give his days and his nights to the pages of Addison." I venture to think that this is nonsense. Hugh Miller's English is quite as good as Addison's, and far more full of thought and of charm. It is the brain that makes style in writing, just as it is the brain that makes the harmonies of line and colour in painting, and of sound and sense in poetry. In speaking to Hugh Miller, I felt that I was speaking to a born genius, and the roughness of the setting seemed to me only to set off more distinctly the native brilliance of the gem.

Of course, it is not by any means our wish to disparage a writer so worthy as Hugh Miller, but at the same time to institute a comparison between his literary style and that of Addison is to come little short of being ridiculous. A few of the literary reminiscences of the Duke are, nevertheless, of great interest. The following description of Samuel Rogers, who was still alive when the Duke came to London, is certainly worth quoting:

He was hideous to behold. When I first knew him in 1841 he was seventy-eight years of age, and he continued leading the same ubiquitous social life for ten years longer, till he was in his eighty-eighth year, but he had none of the venerable aspect of age in his appearance. He was a small man with a bald head, a very flat face, and a complexion perfectly cadaverous. His eyes were sharp and observant, but amiability was not conspicuous in the expression. His speech was slow, and always apparently premeditated. He was famous for his sharp sayings, not infrequently bitter. His temper was jealous and irritable.

But the best pen-portrait in the book is undoubtedly that of the Duke of Wellington:

The Duke's eyes were very large, the eyelids cutting across them very high up, but not leaving them uncovered. They arrested all one's attention in a moment. One thought no more of the beaky nose or of the small and firm mouth. I do not think that the softer emotions of humanity were prominent. Self-possession, calmness, circumspection, firmness, truthfulness, and wisdom—these were the speaking characteristics, blended in one calm and impressive whole. His head was not a high one—I mean that it was not a domed head. It was only moderately high, but very broad and massive. It was, as it were, a battlemented forehead, "foursquare to all the winds that blew." His voice was powerful, deep-toned, and with a military imperativeness of enunciation. I need not say, after my one experience of his personal conversation, how I felt the truth of Tennyson's later couplet:

"His language rife
With rugged maxims bewed from life."

This is scarcely the place in which to discuss the political career and opinions of the Duke of Argyll, though, of course, it was as a politician that he cut the greatest figure. In science he was but a brilliant amateur, and was scarcely treated as a serious opponent by Huxley and others whom he drew into controversies. The determining fact about his line of action in politics was that he was a great landlord. He had come into possession of estates that had been somewhat impoverished owing to the carelessness of one of his progenitors, and a great part of his life-work consisted in organising them upon a better footing, while he spent above half a million out of revenue in improving the estate. It was his views on the land question that led to his severance from his old friend, Mr. Gladstone, in 1881. He formed part of the old Whig cleavage of the time. Naturally enough, he was opposed to the Home Rule Bill, and remained in opposition to the party with which he had previously acted, but, at any rate, his was a cross-bench sort of mind, and in no period of his career does he seem to have been a very enthusiastic partisan. He was, however, a man of considerable importance in his day, and his biography was well worth writing; though it might have been advantageously condensed into half the size. We say this without at all under-estimating its value as a document bearing on the Crimean War, the Indian Mutiny, and various other events of the great reign in which he lived.

THE TUDORS

Ten Tudor Statesmen. By ARTHUR D. INNES. (Eveleigh Nash, 15s. net.)

England under the Tudors. By ARTHUR D. INNES. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. INNES has a wise and frugal mind. Having contributed a volume on the Tudors to the History of England edited by Professor Oman, he used the knowledge and experience thus gained, to sketch the characters of ten Tudor statesmen. In the text-book he takes a broader view and covers a larger field. But he excels in the drawing of character, and we are not sure that his later book does not present a quicker impression of the great men who gave a new shape to England and to English policy. At any rate, we do not regret his frugality, and, if his history be read in our schools and colleges, his "Ten Tudor Statesmen" may be cordially recommended to the general reader for his profit and pleasure.

The Tudor age was in many respects the greatest of our history. For variety of enterprise, achievement and character it is without parallel. The men who were fortunate enough to live their lives then might wake up every morning to a fresh discovery. New lands were floating into human ken. New literatures were invented. Old literatures were being brought back by the scholars from the dead. The Latin poets were once more an example to their loyal descendants. Greek, a tongue long forgotten, was once more interpreted by the zeal of Erasmus and his disciples. The masterpieces of all countries and of all time were translated into English for the use of our dramatists. History and drama, two arts that had fallen into oblivion, were practised with an admirable skill and originality. And the graver art of government was pursued with equal energy and courage. The iron hand of Rome was forced from the throat of England, and, whatever were the motives which prompted Henry VIII. to reform, at least it may be said that he led the way to untrammelled thought and to the freedom of the intellect. But achievements so lofty are only possible when character corresponds to intention, when men of bravery and insight are found to do the work that is set them by king and people. For though popular enthusiasm may compass much in the way of sympathy and encouragement, it is the individual and not the mass which is the real author of victory in arms as in the arts.

It is, then, in the character of its great men that Tudor England was richest, and Mr. Innes could not have found better material for his exercises in psychology. And he has treated his material with an almost inhuman impartiality. He is cruel to none. He sees the excellences, which lurk in the coldest brain. He finds the right thing to say even of Henry VII., who, in spite of Bacon's panegyric, has missed the appreciation of the modern world. He recognises how hard was the task which this king set himself to accomplish, how small a chance he had of winning the gratitude of his fellows.

[His whole life [we read] had been a tremendous strain. His boyhood and early manhood aged him prematurely. From the day that he landed in England to wrest the sceptre from Richard, the strain had never relaxed; the bow had never been slackened. At five-and-forty, he may well have been as much worn out as are men less severely tried twenty-five years later in life. The work he had to do was anything but inspiring; he did it with dogged patience. The task was thankless, and he got little thanks. It was accomplished ungraciously, and he receives no grace in return. A dreary life, and a dreary reign; yet the reign is not without admirable qualities, nor the life without gleams of nobility.

That seems to us the right thing rightly said. And Mr. Innes is equally wise, when he sums up the vices and virtues of Henry VIII. Now, Henry VIII. is far more "sympathetic," as the critics of drama say, than Henry VII. He was a bonhomme, if sometimes his bonhomie were forced and false, and even the faux bonhomme will always have his defenders. Moreover, he loved all that was splendid and decorative in life. His reign was one long festival. He delighted in pageants and processions. He was never so happy as when fountains ran with wine in Gracious Street. He took as much pleasure in the revellings of May Day as did his subjects, though he made it an occasion for kingly magnificence. At the same time he was pitiless in cruelty, ungrateful to those who served him best, and prodigal to madness of his revenues. But he touched the imagination of the mob, and he remains the type of the bluff, honest king, that England is supposed to love. Though it is not an easy character to disengage, Mr. Innes has risen to the occasion.

To the instinct for gauging men [thus he writes] he added the instinct of gauging popular sentiment—a perception of the line which must not be overstepped; a knack of gracious and timely withdrawal if ever he seemed to have passed the danger-point. Withal, he recognised that the surest method of getting his own way was to make his subjects believe that it was their way too. His figure is very, very far from being god-like; it is quite remote from the heroic; it might, however, have fairly been called Titanic, if that term did not imply ultimate failure—for he did not fail. Neither his intellectual nor his moral qualities permit us to love him, to praise him, or to honour him; and yet, if we have read him aright, it is impossible not to admire.

As we read these records of Tudor statesmen, we cannot but deplore the gross ingratitude of kings. Of Mr. Innes's ten, two sat upon the throne. Of the eight that remain, five died on the scaffold, and another was snatched from violence only by a sudden death. And it is not only the ingratitude of this policy which appals us; it is the waste. When Sir Thomas More lost his head, Charles V. said the last word of wisdom: "If we had been master of such a servant, we would rather have lost the best city of our dominions than have lost such a worthy Councillor." But Henry was as reckless of the lives of great men as of the public money. No king was ever served more prudently and more loyally than was he by Wolsey. Indeed, whatever wrong Wolsey did was done for his master. And Henry forgot in an instant his eminent services, his statesmanlike policy. The death of Cromwell we can forgive. The death of Wolsey, a ruler of genius, who had stooped only to the chicanery of the divorce, was an act of unpardonable folly. But the deepest stain of all upon the reign of Henry VIII. is the execution of Sir Thomas More. Of this great man's character no word need be said. Praise cannot enhance his perfections, nor gild his simplicity. A scholar, a champion of the new learning, a great lawyer, a wise statesman, a man of honour and amiability, he fell a victim to folly and truculence. We have quoted the comment of Charles V. Let us also recall the lament of Erasmus, the man in all Europe best fitted to appreciate the ability of More. "You will learn from a letter which I enclose," thus he wrote to the Bishop of Cracow, "the fate of Sir Thomas More and the Bishop of Rochester. They were the wisest and most saintly men that England had. In the death of More I feel as if I had died myself, but such are the tides of human things. We had but one soul between us." Such loyal and eloquent words as these prove the futility of human rage, and outlast the impotence of angered tyranny.

A LOST CAUSE

Ἀλβηρίων ΔΙΔΑΚ Εὐριπε κοινά, or The Religious Songs of Connacht. A collection of poems, stories, prayers, satires, ranns, charms, etc. 2 vols. (Unwin, 10s. net.)

As spectators, for the man who fights gallantly in a lost cause we have felt always pity, sympathy, and admiration, in proportion differing according to the cause at stake. From the detached standpoint of the spectator, ready—irrespective of the nationality of the combatants—to applaud a brilliant manœuvre, a defeat turned into a victory by a fine piece of strategy, we have viewed the struggle of a few scholars, backed by a number of interested politicians, to revive the Gaelic tongue in Ireland. And pity has been uppermost in our hearts—pity for a genuine scholar, leading a cause obviously foredoomed, ever mistaking a Jack-o'-the-lantern for a beacon of triumph, and struggling impotently on. The futility of it has awakened our pity, but of admiration there can be none in the heart of any far-seeing well-wisher of Ireland for the losers of a cause aiming at alienation from a country whence only can Ireland's salvation come. Between literature and politics there can be no connection. For a struggle waged in the interests of literature there was little hope of a successful outcome; waged in the interests of politics there is none.

Our concern is with the literary side of the question; and we fail to see why a revival was ever attempted. The claim of the revivalists, as stated by Mr. Leahy, is that Irish literature:

does undoubtedly tell us much of the most ancient legends of modern Europe which could not have been known without it; but this is not its sole, or even its chief claim to be heard. It is itself the connecting-link between the Old World and the New, written, so far as can be ascertained, at the time when the literary energies of the ancient world were dead, when the literature of modern Europe had not been born,* in a country that had no share in the ancient civilisation of Rome, among a people which still retained many legends and possibly a rudimentary literature drawn from ancient Celtic sources, and was producing the men who were the earliest classical scholars of the modern world.

As a matter of fact, Ireland has never had a literature: the claim is based on a dozen or so old legends, romances—call them what you will—contained in the Book of Leinster, the Leabhar na h-Uidhri and other manuscripts. Collectively, a certain amount of interest attaches to them, but none has any particular merit, and literature they are not. One of the best of them, "The Sick-bed of Cuchulain," is preserved in a fifteenth-century manuscript in Trinity College, Dublin, and in the Leabhar na h-Uidhri. The origin of the romance is unknown, but it was transcribed from the lost Yellow Book of Slane by Maelmuiri mac Ceileachair into the Leabhar na h-Uidhri in the eleventh century. In both manuscripts two versions of the original story have been mixed together, with the result that of every incident there are two descriptions, frequently at variance. Of such is the literature of Ireland; and it is that Irishmen shall be enabled to appreciate this sort of thing that they are asked to spend their lives endeavouring to learn an unpractical language.

Before us is Dr. Douglas Hyde's latest contribution to the literature which awaits students of Gaelic. It has been printed—very badly printed—in Dublin, where there are less than three hundred errors in the two volumes. The work is the result of twenty years' collection among the people of Connacht—twenty years of more or less wasted effort. Here and there is a prayer which, crude though it be, is not without beauty, but in the whole eight hundred and eleven pages there are not more than a score of pieces worthy of preservation, and the majority of these are, not the prayers or the poems, but the stories. And all are mixed, as Dr. Hyde observes, with no special order or arrangement on them . . . prayer, story, poem, or again, poem, prayer, story, just as [he] got them from the mouths of the shanachies and old people, or after the manner of the Bolg-antolathairs or miscellaneous collections that were so common amongst us a hundred years ago;

so that selection is difficult.

We may take as an instance that story of "Mary's Well," which Dr. Hyde is careful to tell us he "got from Próinsias O'Connor, in Athlone, who heard it from an old woman who was herself from Ballintubber, in the County Mayo." Here the collector has caught the spirit of the tale both in the Gaelic and in the translation, as when he refers to the ass which regained its sight, though the scoffer was brought home "as blind as the sole of your shoe"—a typically Irish phrase. In the poems he has failed because he has no soul for poetry and certainly no divine afflatus. It is impossible in the space at our disposal to deal at length with the translations, which, since few will read the Gaelic, are the important thing. Dr. Hyde's literal translations are for the most part good—often very good: his verse translations are lamentable, e.g.:

* The only possible exceptions to this, assuming the latest possible date for the Irish work, and the earliest date for others, are the kindred Welsh literature and that of the Anglo-Saxon invaders of Britain.

Ζηλδκιζ μαρι ευ ρειν ο εοι
 Δο εδωκαμα τ-ροιρ εζυρ τ-ριαρ,
 Ζηλδ ιρ ρο ινο 'να ζαε ζηλδ
 Ταβκιρ-ρε ζο βραε δο δια.

which he renders:

And love thy neighbour as thyself,
 (Not for his pelf thy love should be),
 But a greater love than every love
 Give God above who loveth thee.

None but Dr. Douglas Hyde could have written that second line. Apart from its horrors, why the allusion to "pelf"? There is no reference in the Gaelic to anything which could be so designated. Again there is charm in:

Ζη διαβελ ιρ δοιρε δαιλ
 Ζη ρεαρ με ναε αιλ αετ λοετ,
 Ζη ρεαδαυβ αν θεατα εε *
 Ιλ ηρυν α ρπειρ να 'nn mo εοιρ,

but there is none in:

The loathly devil, I wis,
 Whose business is to sow tares,
 Not for body, not for gold,
 Only for my soul he cares.

And:

For the first five hundred years
 —It appears themselves admit—
 Christ's (our Roman) church was still Free from ill, with saints in it, is a very poor rendering of:

Δο ρειρ α η-αδωαλα ρειν
 Κυζ ευδ βιαεκιρ ταρ ειρ εριοιτ
 Ζη εαζκιρ Ιωμδντα εαιε
 Ευδ η-ι αμδαν αν εαζκιρ ριοιρ.

But there are good things in the volumes to reward the searcher, and our last word must be one, not of depreciation, but of regret that so much time and scholarship should have been given to so little purpose.

SYMBOLIC BEASTS

Fictitious and Symbolic Creatures in Art. By JOHN VINYCOMB.
 (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE quaint and fantastic creatures that have come to be especially associated with heraldry, because it is principally in that connection that they occur to-day, are the subject of an interesting work which gives a fairly comprehensive account of their characteristic forms. To the mediæval mind they were by no means exclusively heraldic devices, but were the completely credited figures of actual creatures. Even in the pre-heraldic period—if indeed there were ever times when personal devices, essentially heraldic, did not exist—the tales of travellers joined with tradition to people the world with strange things.

In the Bestiaries and their successors, the zoologists of more than six centuries followed each other in learnedly describing Dragons, Griffins and Cockatrices, as well as Unicorns and other figures that are recognisable as distorted versions of actual forms. The symbolism that is inseparable from the subject is always, in the earlier works, of a religious nature, a beast serving as a sort of illustration to a moral lesson. Thus the Panther is described as of beautiful black colour with white spots, and out of his mouth comes a smell surpassing balsam in sweetness, which entices all animals to him. And he is heraldically depicted "incensed" with flames that issue from his mouth. The Bestiary that was translated by Philip de Thaun for Queen Adeliza, the wife of Henry I., says that "the panther is loved by all animals except the Dragon alone." And the "Significatio" goes on to say that Christ is the panther, the Dragon is the devil. In all such stories the dragon, as is usual in symbolic art, represents the evil principle. But not the dragon alone, for in these curious moralisings the devil appears in many shapes. Onegar, the wild Ass, "signifies the devil in this life." The monkey, "without doubt resembles the devil, he is false and vain, fond of evil deeds." Even Cetus, the whale, is the devil on occasion.

* αν θεατα εε = αν δομδαν ιομλδν.

The religious aspect influenced the descriptive, so that in some accounts of the mystic Phoenix it is said, with obvious allusion, to come again to life on the third day. In the legend of the Pelican it is said:

She fervently loveth her birds yet when they be haughty they smite her on the face and wound her and she smiteth them again and slayeth them and after three days she mourneth for them and then striking herself on the side till the blood runs out she sparkleth it upon their bodies and by vertue thereof they quicken again.

Creatures of the sea are described: Serra, with the head of a lion and the tail of a fish and with wings to fly, so that when it sees a ship in the deep sea it rises aloft. And mermaids, revelling in storm, singing merrily with shrill voices, so that shipmen forget their steering, and are lulled to sleep, to wake, too late, on a sinking wreck.

Besides Griffins and other forms that were also of eastern origin, the effort to depict tigers, antelopes and so forth from descriptions that were all too vague resulted in figures no less fantastic, to which the word "heraldic" has to be prefixed in order to distinguish them from what are now known to be the natural forms of beasts. The descriptions being so various and scanty it is not remarkable that the draughtsman evolved strange shapes. Take for instance the Gazelle. "This beaste in figure is like a kow, having short horns, also long teeth and white about nine inches of length standing out of his mouth like a Bore," and Isidore of Seville is quoted in a Bestiary, as saying that elephants are like goats in shape.

Nevertheless, surprising pieces of more accurate knowledge crop up at times, such as that "when the whale closes his jaws he sucks in all those fishes, but it is only the little fish he thus ensnares, the big ones he cannot seize."

The Unicorn is said in one description to be like a horse, and in another like a goat, and this has resulted in two well-established types.

With the real age of chivalry, the thirteenth and following centuries, when heraldry was at its height, the knightly mysticism which coloured, and was coloured by, the religious mysticism developed its own symbolism, assigning noble qualities to heraldic figures, and consequently a reflected glory on their bearers. These were recorded in heraldic treatises which took their natural history from the learned works that were copied from, and enlarged on, the Bestiaries. They still retained the frank simplicity of belief in the marvellous, though here and there, in the sixteenth century, disbelief is expressed in the existence of some creatures while faith is retained in others no less incredible—doubting the Griffin but accepting the Dragon.

Griffins are emblems of vigilance, for they guarded the Hyperborean mountains, where were gold and precious stones; and of Power, for their amazing strength enabled them to carry away both horse and rider though in full armour. So says Gerard Leigh in "The Accedens of Armorie," 1562, wherein is much of interest and no little humour. In describing the Ass, he says:

Though he be slow yet he is sure. And as he is not the wisest so is he least sumptuous especially in his diet. For his feeding is on Thistles. . . . I could write much of this beast, but that it would be thought to mine owne glorie.

The usefulness of the book before us would have been much increased by the addition of an Index, for which a Table of Contents is but an inefficient substitute. This however, should not prejudice readers against a work on which the author has successfully expended much research and skill. We could have wished for some early examples for purposes of comparison, especially of the dragons and griffins of the Masters of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the engravings of Van Mecken and Schongauer and the wonderful wood blocks of Dürer and Burgmaier among others. In particular, the masterly Griffin, full of dignity and power, that leads the way in the latter artist's "Triumph of Maximilian" and is quite the most magnificent of its wonderful kind. The reproduction of Dürer's seven-headed beast of the Apocalypse is too much reduced to be effective. The author's own illustrations reach a high degree of merit, as was to be expected, and yet are strangely unequal, showing at times very considerable decorative power, while at others there is that futile uplifting of the forepaw that is seen too often in place of the vigorous expression of raging vitality in a similar pose, that is the very essence of the heraldic spirit. Though they are somewhat overwrought, perhaps, and would have gained by simpler treatment, they exhibit very marked heraldic feeling without a too slavish adherence to ordinary types. The Dragon and the Hydra are particularly good.

A word of protest is necessary against the perpetuation of the stiff rod that has for so long taken the place of the torse of particoloured silk that surrounded the helm below the crest. It is true that such wreaths were stiffly modelled in leather in the fifteenth century, but it was reserved for a later and less artistic time to treat them as straight supports instead of circular decorations.

THEN AND NOW

Kaempfer's History of Japan. Translated by T. G. SCHEUCHZER, F.R.S. 3 vols. (MacLehose, 37s. 6d. net.)

Makers of Japan. By J. MORRIS. (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.)

WHEN Dr. Engelbert Kaempfer joined in May 1690 as physician the embassy which the Dutch East India Company sent once a year to the Japanese Shogun's Court at Yedo (Tokyo), the Dutch alone of foreigners were allowed the right of trading with Japan; and that concession was permitted them only under conditions which Mr. Morris describes as humiliating. Certainly the Dutchmen were kept under very strict supervision; but they travelled through a country otherwise closed to foreigners, and Dr. Kaempfer had opportunities of observing and recording things which might have passed without record. It is this which lends peculiar interest to his history, which he wrote immediately in High Dutch. It was translated under the patronage of Sir Hans Sloane by J. G. Scheuchzer, F.R.S., in 1727, and published in two folio volumes, which have not been reprinted in full before the appearance of the present edition. Kaempfer's book is an ingenious cross between the diary of a scientific traveller and a compendious history. Thus, we have chapters on the origin of the Japanese, on the first monarchs of Japan and a list of the Ecclesiastical Emperors, jostling chapters describing the voyage to Japan and the fish and animals and climate of the country. Kaempfer recounts all that he saw of Japan in his journeys, all that he thought of Japan and Japanese customs and all that he could conveniently discover about the history of the people and of their institutions. Quicquid agunt Japanese . . . and though of course he lacks the fervid adulation which we, properly enough, feel for them now, and at times shows a natural resentment at their rigorous treatment of his countrymen, which was too akin to the treatment of dogs during a muzzling craze to bias them in his favour, he yet cannot withhold his admiration for the beauty of their manners and the happy comfort of their life. He can even see beauty in their religion, though he is sometimes fain to sneer at them as superstitious heathen. It is a wise and faithful account with more than an occasional touch of dry humour, which is somehow a little unlooked-for in the learned writing of a Dutch scientist, and on that account uncommonly agreeable: as when in telling of the paper inscriptions hung on Japanese doors he adds: "There is also one directed against Poverty. Houses with this last mark must needs be very safe from thieves and housebreakers."

After reading what Japan was at the end of the seventeenth century, an extraordinary interest is lent to Mr. Morris's book, "Makers of Japan," for Modern Japan dates, as he says, from the advent on the coast of the Idzu province of the American squadron under Commodore Percy in 1853, and up to that time Japan remained much as it was when Kaempfer went with the Dutch embassy to pay homage to the Shogun. Foreigners were excluded and the ancient feudal system was supreme. During the reign of the present Emperor a complete reconstruction of the Empire on a new basis has taken place: a revolution initiated by those in power, contrary to the custom of revolutions. The aim of Mr. Morris's book is to record the history of this unusual revolution in recording the lives of those men (many of whom are still living) who played the chief parts in it—in brief, as he puts it, to supply History through the medium of Biography. His work is admirably successful: it is careful without being laboured, and learned without being dull. It should hold its place in the literature of a nation's progress, the most astounding, perhaps, in the whole history of the world.

As Count Okuma said recently:

The eminence of Japan is ascribable to no mere mushroom growth; it has its roots in the past and her progress is to be explained by natural causes which any one may comprehend who cares to study her history attentively. . . . The victory of Japan points to the ultimate blending into one harmonious whole of the ancient and modern civilisations of East and West.

And in those words lies the kernel of the matter.

A REPRESENTATIVE ANGLICAN

Bishop Wilberforce. By REGINALD G. WILBERFORCE. "Leaders of the Church series," edited by GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL. (Mowbray, 3s. 6d. net.)

NOBODY will dispute the claim of Bishop Wilberforce to a place among Anglican "leaders" of the nineteenth century. Even after every allowance has been made for the natural bias of a son writing his father's biography, that claim is patent in the story of his life. The services that Bishop Wilberforce rendered to the Church of England were very great; no man had a larger share in the revival of her corporate consciousness, and the fact that he did so much was, no doubt, largely due to his exact suitability to his environment. It might be said of Wilberforce, as Macaulay said of Keble, that the Church of England fitted him exactly. He was essentially a man of the Centre, and, like all men of that type, he never pleased the thoroughgoing on either side. But the charge so frequently made—that he was a time-server whose opinions were always in a state of flux—seems to have been quite unfounded; in our opinion Mr. Wilberforce makes out a clear case for the defence in that regard. Had he been a time-server, Wilberforce would hardly have taken so strong a stand against the Prince Consort in the matter of the revival of Convocation, or have described, even in a letter, the Prince's policy as "immoral and fatal." The epithets were not undeserved, since the Prince proposed that a system of marked disfavour should be shown towards High Churchmen in the hope that they would not long hold "principles which permanently excluded them from preferment." His Royal Highness seems to have regarded religion as a convenient pillar of the State; but we wonder by what warrant he interfered in the matter at all.

Bishop Wilberforce's position is summed up in his criticisms on Dr. Liddon's régime at Cuddesdon, quoted on pages 110-111. He did not like the men to say their private prayers in the chapel where chance visitors might see them and be reminded of the Continent by a sight unknown in Church of England churches. The church was for "public" services—and visitors; it is a delightfully British view. And, indeed, Wilberforce was in some ways very insular, though he seems to have broadened somewhat in later years, as his brother-in-law, Manning, did in another way. But Wilberforce was not a man of wide spirit; he took the narrowly orthodox side in the "Essays and Reviews" controversy and the Colenso business, and was rather shocked at F. D. Maurice, though he defended him. How far off the "Essays and Reviews" controversy seems now! The Conservative defenders of orthodoxy have been forced to admit most of the positions which in 1860 Wilberforce considered to involve the abandonment of "God's Word, Creation, Redemption, and the work of God the Holy Ghost." In truth one is not broad because one belongs to the Centre. Nor is there much breadth in an identification of true religion with that particular form which happens to suit the average British temperament. But Wilberforce's ability was essentially on the practical rather than the intellectual side; he was not a profound thinker and his knowledge was not extensive. He never swerved from the conviction that the English Reformation settlement represented the exact and final norm of religious truth, and in that assurance he was able to devote himself to a life of fruitful activity.

MR. KAY ROBINSON'S RELIGION

The Religion of Nature. By E. KAY ROBINSON. (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.)

IN sending this book out to be reviewed, the author accompanied it with a request for special attention as being something more than "a mere nature book." We turned to it, in consequence, with more than usual interest. Mr. Kay Robinson is an accomplished and interesting student of the open air, whose writings, whether appearing in a periodical or a book, are always welcome; but in this instance he seems to us to have got considerably out of his depth. It would be very flattering and insincere to describe him as a scientific naturalist, and as a speculative philosopher he is not more than a tiro. To go direct to the main point, the fault of this book consists first in the author's inveterate habit of putting the cart before the horse, and secondly in his speaking in the most positive terms on matters that have always caused doubt and perplexity in the most thoughtful minds. Perhaps if we state the conclusion of the work it will be possible for the reader to guess at the steps by which it is reached. Mr. Kay Robinson, then, has been engaged in a task that would have been congenial to the late Mr. Gladstone, viz., that of reconciling the Mosaic account of the creation with the doctrine of evolution as it is now generally understood. But he goes about the business in a manner that is more original than convincing. It appears that this book was suggested to him by the letter of a "free-thinker," who declared that the cruelty of Nature was incompatible with the conception of a merciful God. After much cogitation Mr. Robinson has found salvation in the teeth of this rationalist argument. He claims to set forth views "which have brought comfort and complete satisfaction" to himself. We only wish that it were possible to say that they are at all likely to impart similar feelings to those who read the book. The argument appears to us as though it were based on a huge confusion in the meaning of words. The author is by temperament very positive in his statements, and he does not seem to think that the terms he employs need, in a work of this kind, to have exact definition. We did not think it had been seriously disputed by any one professing even the most elementary knowledge of scientific facts that all recent investigation goes to show that life is one and the same thing whatever be its manifestation; that it is the same in the leaf and in the flower as in the philosopher, and that all forms of it are united and blended together. That being granted, the next point to be determined is what is consciousness? "We know," says Mr. Robinson, "that sensitive plants have no consciousness," and the query arises at once to the lips: How do you know anything of the kind? No real student of science would for one moment commit himself to any such statement. A more cryptic saying is that "the human conscience governs one's notions of pain." If for the word "governs" the word "affects" had been substituted, the sentence might have been allowed to stand. Even then, it seems to us that in a book of this kind the nature of conscience should have been clearly defined. Is it an out-growth of that utilitarianism which, according to Mr. Robinson, is the basis of our emotions, or is it, as the old theologians used to hold, a divine lamp set in the human breast for our guidance? He is welcome to take either view, but it seems nothing else than ridiculous in a book of this kind to use the word at all without discussing the point. Even such terms as moral and immoral, right and wrong, require careful explanation, because the very nature of the author's task demanded that he should be able to reconcile the growth of those ideas in civilised man with the statement that they were delivered to humanity by divine authority. He can scarcely establish the latter hypothesis, because he frankly admits that man in a savage state does not differ in this respect from the lower animals:

Where, owing to his environment, man is still compelled to live in some respects the life of an animal, there he blindly follows in those respects all his animal instincts for the good of the race, and enjoys neither happiness nor unhappiness in so doing. What he does by instinct he does as a matter of course, seeing in it neither wrong nor right.

If he had traced the history of those regulations which are generally referred to as human laws, his argument, to say the least, would have been a little more convincing. But by far the greatest defect in his theory is the hiatus which he assumes between the instinct of animals and the reason of man. It is his constant habit to speak of the two as though they differed not only in degree but in kind. The point is one on which it would be a waste of time to argue. Indeed, the controversialist would have no difficulty in showing from Mr. Robinson's own words that if he were logical he would have to admit that reason is only a development of instinct, a larger instinct. In savages as we know them, it differs but in degree from that of the animals they hunt, and there is nothing in man the roots of which cannot be found in the lower animals. His attempt to draw impassable divisions between man and the lower animals is almost childish in its futility. In his chapter on the growth of consciousness he uses in the most confusing manner the terms consciousness and self-consciousness apparently to describe the same thing. "I based my case," he says, "upon evidence which proves that man alone possesses that gift of consciousness which causes him to know when he is happy or unhappy." By that it would appear that when an animal is gay and sportive it does not know that it is happy, and when, as often happens, it is dull and melancholy it does not know that it is unhappy. How he ascertained that is one of the mysteries in which the book abounds. Man has only the experience of his own life to guide him, and it can only lead to error and fallacy if he attempt to interpret animal life by any other aid. The author goes on to say that:

If other animals had self-consciousness, i.e., if they thought about things, including themselves, we should long ere this have been able to invent a language of sounds and signs in which we could converse with them upon all sorts of subjects. But they cannot think about things, only of them; so our converse with them as well as their converse with each other is limited to expressions of simple animal emotions. The possession of language, as a means of expressing thoughts other than mere emotions, thus offers definite evidence that man alone is self-conscious.

As a matter of fact, animals do have language, and can communicate with one another and we with them, though, probably enough, it was owing to the great increase in his vocabulary and hence in his means of communication with his fellow men that man first began to make huge strides in front of the rest of creation. If we add the discovery of fire to the extended use of language we should already have got a long way towards bridging over that gulf which Mr. Robinson represents as impassable. He goes on with his argument in this way:

Another definite proof that man alone is self-conscious is provided by the fact that man alone decorates his person.

Now the phrase here, "decorates his person," is a mere literalism, true to the letter but not to the spirit. A cock-bird when he is displaying his airs and graces before the female is practically decorating himself, although it may be quite true that he does not take up a patch of cloth or other material and add it to his own feathers; the essential thing is not what he actually wears but that he is actuated by the spirit of display.

Mr. Kay Robinson's description of the origin of religion appears to have been self-evolved and takes no account of what others have said on the same subject:

He could fling handfuls of water this way or that; who then drove the mighty rivers along and tossed the waves of the sea? He could blow a flower to pieces; whose breath shattered the forest trees? Thus, by thinking about himself, man could not help thinking of some mysterious being or beings who controlled vaster forces than he. These, in one shape or another, became his gods, whom he tried to propitiate. Age by age the lamp of religion thus humbly lit has burned more brightly, with a purer flame, until in the great revealed Faith, that man has been made in the likeness of God, the whole civilised world is united.

Of course, here Mr. Kay Robinson has given up any pretence of writing scientifically and is using his imagination for the purpose of guessing at what may have happened. It is more reasonable to suppose that the beginning of religion lay in fear. Primæval man, when his intelligence had been developed a little beyond that of his arboreal progenitors, heard the thunder and saw the lightning and might very well have come to the conclusion that some power greater than he was launching the bolt and sounding his artillery. He could not understand the wind and the wave, and so he made gods who controlled them. At night he dreamed of his dead and arose thinking they must be alive, and so framed his Paradise or his Valhalla. This explanation is surely just as good as that which Mr. Robinson puts forward. As to the phrase, "the great revealed Faith," he does not condescend to show how much of what is now accepted as revelation was really bad translation couched in the most beautiful language. As a case in point, it will be sufficient to refer to the sentence with which so many youths have been sent off to college; "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

To sum up the whole matter Mr. Kay Robinson argues too much over the infinitely small. He has pursued those creatures which the school-boy compendiously calls "bugs" and studied their ways, and he has had a great number of letters from those versatile persons who write to the cheap newspapers, and, as far as we can see, this is the material out of which he claims to have framed the Religion of Nature. He has in no sense taken a survey of the vast and varied considerations that would occur to one who had read widely and thought deeply on the growth and development of religious ideas

ANCIENT VOYAGES

The English Voyages of the Sixteenth Century. By WALTER RALEIGH. (MacLehose, 4s. 6d. net.)

If it is delightful to see how zealously we are reprinting our old books, there is a sense in which it is also ominous. For when we desert the recognised classics of literature and pay this homage to men who were of no great importance in their own age or any other, one reason for this attention suggests itself which is melancholy rather than otherwise. It may be perhaps that we are so anxious to preserve certain works, of second-rate interest in themselves, because we are conscious that the supply is exhausted, and that unless we cherish these specimens the whole race will become extinct. When, for example, it becomes necessary to reprint in two stately volumes the "Crudities of Thomas Coryat," we may well ask ourselves how this necessity has arisen. For the book is not remarkable for its literary merits, nor extraordinary for its geographical information, nor curious from the light that it throws upon the age. But yet there is no doubt that it satisfies a craving that would otherwise remain unappeased, and that with all our modern refinements we have lost the art of writing books like this.

A recent work by Professor Raleigh, "The English Voyages of the Sixteenth Century," suggests in a most interesting way some of the reasons for the marked taste we have lately shown for the travels of our ancestors. He shows us what qualities those were in them which delight us so greatly, and, as we realise the nature of their gifts, we may judge of our own deficiency. The contrast, for instance, between the literatures of the age which had read Hakluyt or heard his stories from the lips of the seamen themselves, and that which read Godwin's "Political Justice" and had realised the Empire of which their forefathers dreamed, tells its own story. "Before the first acre of land beyond the seas had been effectively added to the dominion of England, the poets had foretold the British Empire," writes Professor Raleigh. To realise that prophecy was the work of a later age, and the sober performance of it seems to have crushed the prophetic spirit out of us. And it is noticeable that, when Hakluyt's book was first published, all the efforts which it records had so far ended in failure. A great many ships had set forth, a great many lives had been lost; but though the substantial result was small the effect upon the imagination was incalculable. A great distance, spreading no man knew where, tempted both seaman and writer out upon its waters; Drake and Hawkins went hand in hand with Marlowe and Shakespeare.

Hope presumably can thrive only when you are without the thing you want; and it is the consciousness of our own deficiency in this stimulating quality that makes us regret the old voyagers so deeply, study them so enviously and reprint them so piously. For they give us what we can never have again. Whatever future lies before us, it is certain that no one will ever circumnavigate the world again for the first time, and that that particular thrill has gone from our writing for ever. The charm of it, as we trace it in these rough and voluminous narratives, is still so potent that all later books of travel, however marvellous their adventures, seem insipid in comparison. No map is sufficiently perilous and romantic to contain the route of their voyages; for the spirit in which they travelled seemed to transform even the permanent outlines of the globe. We may follow Stanley and Livingstone in the Atlas and add thus to our admiration of their achievements, but to measure the exact course of the Pelican or the Jesus of Lubeck, to make them sail by sophisticated shores where we may even possess relations, is an anachronism of the worst description. We are forgetting that the world was quite different then.

The truth of this commonplace is illustrated once more and with peculiar force by a book like this of Thomas Coryat. For Coryat makes no use of the sea, that almost indispensable element for a narrative of adventure; nor did he, in the work preserved, discover any land that was not already tolerably well known to his contemporaries. He merely walked through the familiar parts of France, Germany and Italy, and returned to his native Odcombe and hung up his shoes in the village church. But though his style is a plodding style, as befits a good pedestrian, he has that gift of transforming the world of which we have so completely lost the secret. Custom draws films across the eyes, and it is almost startling to observe how many things Coryat could see in a little Italian town or in a stretch of the road that are invisible to us. It is true that we make up for this blindness to the external world by an insight into our own souls in which Coryat is hopelessly deficient.

And again, if we see less than he did, we have much more knowledge and sentiment about the things we do see, and many more words in which to express them. Coryat, beside later tourists, is like an intelligent child, inscribing his impressions of abroad in a large and laborious hand for the benefit of his little brothers and sisters at home, who will want to know everything. Like a child he observes no proportion, and his eye is candid and credulous of all things impartially. Here, for instance, we have an elaborate description of the Doge's Palace, and here "divers red snails of extraordinary length and greatness" attract his attention. Again he noticed "things which they commonly call in the Italian tongue umbrellas . . . they are made of leather and something answerable to the form of a little canopy." Still more; he had the good fortune to be able to see forks for the first time with an unprejudiced eye. "The Italians . . . do always at their meals use a little fork when they cut their meat. The reason of this their curiosity is because the Italian cannot by any means endure to have his dish touched with fingers, seeing all mens fingers are not alike clean." Coryat was "quipped by a certain learned gentleman" and called "furcifer" when he introduced the fashion to Somersetshire.

And, again, there are the wonderful tales that are told him by the natives, to be inserted gravely because it is plain that strange things may happen in foreign parts, although he would not like to commit himself as to their truth. Good company also was to be met with on the road; an Italian, for example, one Antonio, "who would oftentimes cheer us with his sociable conceit; 'Courage, courage, le Diable est mort,' that is 'Be merry, the devil is dead.'" Consider with what a labour of words the modern traveller would tell us that the devil is dead and how in the end we should scarcely believe him. Or compare the effort with which a tourist of to-day matches the view to words with some such simple and sufficient remark as this of Coryat's. "I observed an exceeding high mountain betwixt Lasnebourg and Nevalaise. Some told me it was fourteen miles high; it is covered with a very microcosm of clouds." And then it appears that on the highest pinnacle there dwelt a repentant brigand who spent his life in contemplation of two pictures of Christ and the Virgin Mary, "and never came down more." Much sentiment might have been expended with a less result.

No art, indeed, can reproduce this natural simplicity and curiosity of mind, and it is this more than any gift of language which makes this ancient pilgrimage such good reading, though we have all travelled the same way a dozen times. We did not see what Coryat saw. It is a book which records in all good faith the travels and adventures of a pair of stout legs and a couple of keen eyes; it is no record of the accidents and emotions of a soul. We can plod all day long by his side without tiring of our company and end the day the better for our outing.

A LITTLE DOCTORED FAUST

The version of Faust which Mr. Stephen Phillips is contemplating will, it is interesting to learn from the author, be "a compact drama," of which spectacular embellishment will form no part. In Mr. Phillips's view the story is in itself so strong and so rich in all the elements that make for dramatic effectiveness that to treat the subject as one for elaborate scenic display would be to diminish the direct appeal of a great tragedy. "First let me say," said Mr. Stephen Phillips, "how gladly I approach a task which will bring me again into association with Mr. George Alexander, whose admirable treatment of Paolo and Francesca you will no doubt remember. In the version of Faust which I am going to prepare there will be nothing spectacular, nothing to overshadow or intrude upon an immortal theme. As to how I shall treat the story, and as to the form in which it will be written, I am not yet sure—it may be a play in blank verse, or in prose with lyrics." . . . Mr. Phillips added that he had also in view a play on the subject of Harold."—The Tribune.

PROLOGUE.

Alexander (from force of habit). I always told you he was reasonable.

Goethe. Well, I consent. Mein Gott! how colossal You English are! 'Tis nigh impossible For poets to refuse you anything, And German thought beneath some German shade—
Unter den linden as we say at home— Sounds really quite as well on British soil. Our good friend Marlowe hardly seems so pleased.

Marlowe. Oh, Goethe! cease these frivolous remarks. Think you that I, who knew Elizabeth, And tasted all the joys of literature, And played the dawn to Shakespeare's larger day, And heralded a mighty line of verse With half a dozen mighty lines my own, Am feeling well?

Gounod (brightening). Ah! Monsieur Wells Auteur d'un histoire fin et romanesque Traduit par Davray; il a des idées. C'est une chose rare là-bas . . .

Stephen Phillips. He does not speak of Huysmans; 'tis myself.

I thank you, gentlemen, with all my heart,
I thank you, gentlemen, with all my soul,
I thank you, Sirs, with all my soul and strength.
So for your leave much thanks. You know my weakness:
I love to be at peace with all the past.
The present and the future I can manage;
The stirrup of posterity may dangle
Against the heaving flanks of Pegasus.
I feel my spurs against the saucy mare
And Alexander turned Bucephalus.

Marlowe. Neigh! neigh! though you have told us what you are,

And we have witnessed Nero several times,
You do not tell us of this wretched Faustus,
Who must be damned in any case, I fear.

S. P. Of course I treat you as material
On which to work, but then I simplify
And purify the story for our stage.
The English stage is nothing if not pure.
For instance, we will not allow Salome,
Only its author, in my play of Nero.
So in Act II. of Faust I represent
The marriage feast of beauteous Margaret,
Act I. I get from Goethe, III. from Marlowe
And Gounod's music fills the gaps in mine.
Margaret, of course, will never come to grief.
She only gets a separation order.
By the advice of Plowden magistrate,
She undertakes to wean Euphorion,
Who in his bounding habits symbolises
The future glories of the English empire.
As the production must not cost too much,
Harker, Hawes Craven, Hann are relegated
To a back place. It is a compact drama,
Of which spectacular embellishment
Will form no part; the story is so strong
So rich in all the elements that make

A drama suitable for Alexander
That scenery, if necessary to Tree,
Shall not intrude on this immortal theme.

Goethe. Pyramidal! my friend, but you are splendid.
Now have you shown the manuscript to Colvin?

Marlowe. He is a scholar and a ripe and good one,
And far too tolerant of modern poets.

Alexander. One of your lines strikes my familiar spirit.
Surely that does not come from Stephen Phillips.

Marlowe. No matter; I may quote from whom I will.
Shakespeare himself was not immaculate,
And borrowed freely from a barren past.

Goethe. What thinks Herr Sidney Colvin of your work?
S. P. That he will tell you when he sees it played.

ACT I.

Scene: Faust's Studio.

Servant. Well, if you have no further use for me,
I will go make our preparation.

Faust. If anybody calls, say I am out;
I must have time to see how I will act.
As to the form in which I shall be written,
I must decide whether in prose or verse.

My thoughts I'll bend. Give me at once the Times—
Walkley I always find inspiring—

His style, a Studio Murder in itself—
And really I learn more about the drama

(Even the German drama) from his pen,
More curious than that of Paracelsus—

(Reads) "Sic vos non vobis, Bernard Shaw might say Dieu et mon droit. Ich dien. Et taceat

Femina in ecclesia. Ellen Terry
La plus belle femme de toutes les femmes

Du monde." Archer, I have observed,
Writes no more for the World, but for himself.

Then I forgot; he's writing for the Tribune,
That highly independent Liberal paper.

(Faust muses, bell heard.) The Elixir of Life, is it a play
Which runs a thousand nights? Is it a dream
Precipitated into some alembic
Or glass retort by Ex-ray Lankester?

(Enter Servant.)

Servant. A gentleman has called.

Faust. Say I am out.

Servant. He will take no denial.

Faust. Show him in.

Most probably it is poor Herbert Tree,
Who long has planned a play of Doctor Faustus.

(Enter Mephistopheles.)

Mephistopheles. Ah! my dear Doctor, here we are again!

Micawber-like, I never will desert you.
How do you feel? Your house I see myself
In perfect order. Ah! how much has past
Since those Lyceum days when you and I Climbed up the Brocken on Walpurgis night!
That times have changed I realise myself;
No longer through the chimney do I come;
I enter like a super from the side.

Widowers' Houses dramas have become;
Morals and sentiment and Clement Scott
No more seem adjuncts of the English stage.

Faust. Oh Mephistopheles, you come in time
To save the English drama from a deadlock.
Like Mahmud's coffin hung 'twixt Heaven and Earth,
It falters up to verse and down to prose.
Tell us, then, how to act, how consummate
The aspirations of our Stephen Phillips!

Mephisto. Ah, Alexander Faustus! young as ever,
Still unabashed by Paolo and Francesca,
You long for plays with literary motives,
Plots oft attempted both in prose and rhyme.

Faust. As ever, you are timid and old fashioned.

Mephisto. Hark you! one thing I know above all others,

The English drama of the century past.
Though English critics have consigned to me
The plays of Ibsen, Maeterlinck and Shaw,
And Wilde's Salome, none has ever reached me.
Back to their native land they must have gone,
Or else you have them here in Germany.
Only to me come down real British plays,
The mid-Victorian twaddle, the false gems
Which on the stretched forefinger of oblivion
Glitter a moment, and then perish paste.

Faust (drily). Well, if I learn of any critic's death
Leaving a vacant place upon the Press,
You'll hear from me; meanwhile, Mephisto mine,
As we must needs play out our little play,
Whom would you cast for Margaret, alias Gretchen?
Kindly sketch out an inexpensive Faust,
Modelled on the Vedrenne and Barker style
Now much in favour at the English Court.

Mephisto. The stage is now an auditorium,
And all the audiences are amateurs,
First-nighters at the bottom of their heart.
What do they care for drama in the least?
All that they need are complimentary stalls,
To know the leading actor, to be round
At dress rehearsals, or behind the scenes,
To hear the row the actor-manager
Had with the author or the leading lady,
Then to recount the story at the Club,
Where, lingering lovingly on kippered lies,
They babble over chestnuts and their Punch
And stale round-table jests of years ago.

Faust. So Mephistopheles is growing old!
Kindly omit your stage philosophy
And tell me all your plans about the play.

Mephisto. First we must make you young and fresh as paint,

Filters and elixirs are out of date.
A week in London—that is what you want;
London Society is our objective.
There you will find a not unlikely Gretchen,
For actresses are all the rage just now;
Duchesses quarrel over Edna May,
And Mrs. Patrick Campbell is received
In the best houses. I shall introduce you
As a philosopher from Tübingen.
A sort of Nordau, no? Then Doctor Reich—
Lectures on Aristotle at the Ritz—
Advocates Polyandry, children suffrage—
One man, one pianola; the usual thing
That will secure success: here is a card
For Thursday next—Lady Walpurge "At Home"
From nine till twelve—a really charming hostess.
Her ladyship is intellectual,
The husband rich, dishonest, a collector
Of objets d'art, especially old masters.
He got his title for his promises
To England in the war; financed the raid,
A patriot millionaire within whose veins,
Imperial pints of German Jewish blood.
Must make the English think imperially,
And rather bear with all the ills they have
Than fly to others that they know not of.

Faust. Excellent plan! Except at Covent Garden,
I've hardly been in England since the eighties.

ACT II.

Scene: Broken House, Park Lane.

The top of the Grand staircase. Lord and Lady Walpurge receiving their guests. The greatest taste is shown in the decorations, which are lent for the occasion of the play, free of charge, owing to the deserved popularity of Mr. George

Alexander. Furniture supplied by Waring, selected by Mr. Percy Macquoid, Old Masters by Agnew and Son, P. and D. Colnaghi, Dowdeswell and Dowdeswell. Wigs by Clarkson. A large full-length Reynolds, seen above the well of staircase, R. a Gainsborough, L. a Hoppner. The party is not very smart, rather intellectual and plutocratic; well-known musicians and artists in group R., and second-rate literary people L.; among the latter may be seen the author of "In Lord Kitchener's Garden," etc. An Irish peer, and a member of the White Rose league, are the only "Society" present. There are no actors or actresses. Faust, who has aged considerably since the Prologue, is an obvious failure and is seen talking to a lady journalist. Mephistopheles, disguised as a Protectionist Member of Parliament, is in earnest conversation with Lord Walpurge. Footman announcing the guests.

Sir Daniel and Lady Ridgeley, Captain Booth Voysey, Mr. Richard Wetherbee, Mr. Edward Voysey, The Rev. C. L. Voysey, The Bishop of Hereford, Mr. Maldonado, Mr. Andrew Undershaft, Mrs. Gorringer, Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey Tanqueray.

Lady Walpurge (archly). Ah Mr. Tanqueray, you never forwarded me my photographs; it is nearly three weeks ago since I sent you a cheque for them.

Tanqueray. Labby has been poisoning your mind against me. You shall have a proof to-morrow!

Footman. Mr. Gillow Waring.

Lady Walpurge. I was so afraid you were not coming. My husband thought you would give us the slip.

Waring. How charming your decorations are! You must give me some ideas for my new yacht, you have such perfect taste.

Maldonado. Walpurge! what will you take for that Reynolds? Or will you swap it for my Velasquez?

Walpurge. My dear Maldo, I always do my deals through

Footman. Mr. Walter Dowdeswell.

Walpurge. Through Dowdeswell and Dowdeswell, and you, my dear Maldo, if you want to get rid of your Velasquez ought to join the National Art Collections Fund or go and see —

Footman. Mr. Lockett Agnew. 'Er'Ighness, the Princess Swami.

(Enter the Princess Salome.)

Lady Journalist. Fancy having that woman here! She is not recognised in any decent society, she is nothing but an adventuress; talks such bad French too. Have you ever seen her, Dr. Faustus?

Faust. Yes, I have met her very often in Germany. Though the Emperor will not receive her, she is much admired in Europe.

Lady Journalist (hedging). I wonder where she gets her frocks? They must be Worth a good deal.

Faust. From Ricketts and Shannon if you want to know.

Lady Journalist. Dear Doctor, you know everything! Let me see; Ricketts and Shannon is that new place in Regent Street, rather like Lewis and Allenby's, I suppose?

Faust. Yes, only different.

Irish Peer (to Faust). Do you think Lady Walpurge will ever get into Society?

Faust. Not if she gives her guests such wretched coffee.

Lady Journalist. It's nothing to her tea. I've never had such bad tea. Besides, she cannot get actors or actresses to come to her house. You can never attract duchesses without them.

Lady Walpurge (overhearing). I expect Mr. and Mrs. Tree here to-night, and perhaps VIOLA (sensation).

[Enter, hurriedly, Mr. C. T. H. Helmsley.] Mr. Alexander, a moment with you! A most important telegram has just arrived.

Faust (reading). "Handed in at Greba Castle, 10.15. Reply paid. Do not close with Stephen Phillips until you have seen my play of Gretchen, same subject, five acts and twelve tableaux. Hall Caine." Where is Mr. Stephen Phillips? [Stephen Phillips, who has been talking to the author of "In Lord Kitchener's Garden," advances.] My dear Phillips, I think we will put up Harold instead, "The Last of the Anglo-saxons," by the last Anglo-saxon poet.

CURTAIN.

ROBERT ROSS.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

A SHORT WAY WITH AN UNBELIEVER

SCROOGE was one of the most notable heresiarchs of the nineteenth century: he did not agree with Dickens's ideas as to the proper way of celebrating the Feast of Christmas. Therefore Dickens condemned him (unjustly and without even a fair trial, as it seems to many thoughtful people now living in this town, which witnessed his spiritual struggle) to perpetual conversion. Although he is now happily beyond the reach of our praise or blame, and we can do nothing to reverse the sentence passed upon him, still, in the interest of history and for the comfort of those who follow his doctrines, we propose to give here a short summary of what may be gathered from an unbiased study of Dickens's exceedingly biased account of Scrooge (unfortunately the only document we possess in which mention is made of him), together with some critical remarks on the obviously mythical relation of his doings immediately after his condemnation.

Dickens seems to have singled out this obscure and peaceful personage, and made of him an "awful example" in order to promote a wider diffusion of general indiscriminate amiability and an increased observance of the rites of eating and drinking. In his opinion, all men should on the twenty-fifth of December feel equally inclined for beef and beer, family gatherings, the exchange of conventional salutations and boisterous merriment. But one Christmas eve he discovered working in the heart of London, with one half-witted clerk, a lonely, philosophic man, who neither needed nor yearned for the orthodox festivities of the season. The brutal luxuries of slain birds disgusted him; the company of his relatives he desired not overmuch at a season whose annual recurrence causes an old man's mind to wander from the present and induces in him a state of thoughtful brooding over bygone years; and, as for the games, he could not but reflect that it was only intellectual torpor which could rejoice in or tolerate them. Dickens could not escape from this man, whose very existence was at first a puzzle to him, for such a frame of mind as that of the real Scrooge was unthinkable to him. Scrooge appeared to him merely as the man who would not keep Christmas, and, limiting his character-study to this feeble conception, Dickens necessarily misinterpreted the externals of Scrooge's life, and allowed his wrath to be kindled against this lowly person, whose rooms were not decorated with leaf or berry, and whose board displayed no blood-sacrifice. For these sins of omission Scrooge had to be presented to posterity as entirely undesirable. Dickens's theory of Christmas was not to be refuted by an enigmatical character whom he failed to understand. So it came to pass that Dickens wrote the Scrooge Legend, which for the last two generations or so has hidden a valuable personality from our regard.

What are the allegations against Scrooge? First, the bare assertion that he was merciless in business; but this without proof we cannot in fairness accept, considering the prejudice of his accuser. Then he is blamed for his loneliness; but the life of thought naturally begets this estate, and why is Scrooge more than other thinkers to be reproached? Indeed, considering the responsibility he was under in having an imbecile clerk to look after daily, the wonder is that he was not even more morose than he was. Poor Bob Cratchit's madness rendered him incapable of doing much work, and at times was apt to assume dangerous forms, one of them that of playing with fire, and the other that of sliding in one of the busiest thoroughfares of the city. Scrooge, by keeping the coal-scuttle in his own office, did his best to protect his clerk from the consequences of one of these dangerous habits, but the public authorities of the period seem to have been unable to prevent his criminal indulgence in the other. Thirdly it is supposed that Scrooge "sweated" Bob. Fifteen shillings a week is not very high pay for a clerk with a family, but are there many business men who would give even that amount to one of Bob's intellectual capacity? To those who hold that Scrooge was a Midas and a Croesus combined, this charitable disbursement will seem trivial, but the evidence is not in favour of his being a rich man. What his calling was is not stated, but we are told that he had a small and dark office up a court, and that his establishment consisted of himself and his clerk. The next charge is that he was deficient in the social sense and had in his heart no pity for the poor and weak. To prove this, his answer to the officious collectors on Christmas eve is quoted. But in attempting to form a reasonable judgment of this incident several things should be borne in mind. First, that Scrooge was very busy when interrupted by them: second, that it was a time of great anxiety, for his clerk, madly excited by the Dickensian weather, was allowing his fancy to dwell either on the Fire of London or on some prospective slide from the Bank to Charing Cross: third, that Scrooge's nephew had just treated his uncle to a repulsive sample of full-bellied benevolence: fourth, that in spite of the ostentation with which those fat, contented collectors went about their business, they offered no proof of the genuineness of their errand, and the money they took might, for all Scrooge knew, have been given to any but deserving cases: last, that Scrooge, as he plainly says, did not agree with indiscriminate charity, but believed that such social diseases as starvation, destitute childhood and needy old age were evils needing State remedies—fulfilling his own obligations in the matter by willingly aiding with his money State Institutions founded for their alleviation. One more charge remains; namely, that he was inaccessible to the charms of music. In proof of this we are told that he restrained the author of certain hoarse and fog-laden notes from making utterance through his keyhole when he was busy verifying accounts!

The case for the defence is now clear. We see in Scrooge a man who has his own theory of life and lives up to it; an unobtrusive person who does good in his own way and not in that suggested to him by casual callers; one to whom the gin-crawl and the banquet of slaughtered flesh make no appeal; one whose time can be more profitably spent in thought or reading than in the distasteful company of people whose unthinking optimism takes the place of brains and whose heaviest cares can be driven away by a dose of the simplest medicine. And at this point, after diverging so long from Dickens, we come again and for the last time face to face with him. For though, as we have seen, he has grossly misrepresented and vilified Scrooge, yet he evidently felt, in spite of himself and intuitively, the force of Scrooge's moral character, which we can appreciate after a process of dispassionate reasoning. At any rate, he saw that a man of Scrooge's calibre was not to be won over by his message of: "Love your neighbour, fill your glass and pass the bottle." So in order to make the conversion credible to posterity he invented the ghosts. All good Scroogists, of course, believe that at this point the region of fact yields definitely to the region of myth; they do not believe that Scrooge would have seen a ghost; moreover they believe that no array of ghosts, however visible and audible, would have been able to bluff him into making a sudden and radical change in his mode of life, which, as we have seen, was the outcome of a consistent and well-reasoned philosophy. But, by way of meeting the Gentiles on their own ground, we shall take one or two points in the latter stage of the story, to see whether the visions there related would have had the same significance for Scrooge as they had for Dickens.

That Scrooge, on having recalled to his sight events of his past life, which bore witness to the making of his personality, should have become naturally elate or sorrowful, "non pare indegno ad uomo d'intelletto"; but to Dickens it seems wonderful and fills him with boundless glee. With the Christmas-observance obsession strongly upon him, he conducts Scrooge to the house of Fezziwig, whose festivities entirely blot out the reproach attaching to an employer who provided no better dormitory for his apprentices than two beds under the counter in his shop. From here the scene changes to the meeting between Scrooge and the girl, who is bewailing with a touching feminism her inability to retain the affection of a man whom she entirely failed to appreciate or understand. The development of his ascetic and philosophic temperament, leading naturally to a distaste for marriage, was unintelligible to her. She therefore ascribed the change in him to a growing lust for money. Although the remembrance of this episode is sufficiently wearying to Scrooge to make him desire the Spirit to efface the picture, the subsequent remorse and intention of amendment are obviously a figment of Dickens. To pass on to the second visitation, what could it have betokened to Scrooge? The Spirit's throne composed of animal wreckage, the streets foul with muddy snow, the inclement weather? And the shops! Economically they represented a state of wasteful competition; socially they meant a number of overworked assistants, whose method of keeping Christmas consisted in going to bed dead-tired in the early morning and sleeping half the day. Again, what could any thoughtful man discern in the garishly decorated windows but Life's impedimenta? Would he not say with the Greek sage: "How many things are there in the world which I do not want"? As for his nephew's party, enough has been said to prove that Scrooge would have been quite tolerant of it, and quite uninterested in it. In the scene of the Cratchits' Christmas party Dickens achieves real though obvious pathos, and, in setting a crippled child like Tiny Tim in a family hard-pressed in the cosmic struggle, he could make an appeal to Scrooge as he could to all who read his tale. It is quite reasonable that Scrooge should have been affected at witnessing certain sordid details of the home life in Camden Town, and that he should in consequence have determined to help the Cratchit household by an increase of almsgiving to Bob. But can we possibly believe that he was sentimental enough to lose suddenly all his mental balance and be won over by Dickens's preposterous threat, namely, that, unless he became a meddling nonentity for the rest of his days, Tiny Tim would die? Last, we have the third visitation. This shows to Scrooge principally two facts, which he must have foreseen many years back. One was that his death would be hailed with satisfaction by many to whom it would mean the removal of the responsibility they were under to pay what they owed to him. The other was, that he who had lived detached from society must expect to die lonely, as indeed he would have desired.

Our thesis, then, may be recapitulated as follows. First, that Dickens grossly misrepresented Scrooge's past life. Second, that Scrooge saw no ghosts. Third, that if he had seen them, they would not have had for him the significance which Dickens assigns to them. Fourth, that, presuming that in his old age Scrooge had been so far upset by the horrible series of nightmares as to fall into that state of deterioration which Dickens describes at the end of the legend, it would have been a voluntary sacrifice of his personality in order to stay Dickens's hand from the barbarous murder of Tiny Tim.

A. MARTIN FREEMAN.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Snobbery in Art and Literature," by C. B.]

FICTION

The Undying Past. By HERMANN SUDERMANN. Translated by BEATRICE MARSHALL. (Lane, 6s.)

SUDERMANN'S "Es War" is not one of his greatest books; but it is infinitely superior to most of the novels published to-day, and it is with pleasure that we find Mr. Lane issuing Miss Marshall's translation of it. It is no easy task to translate Sudermann, and it cannot be said altogether that Miss Marshall has attained a very high standard. We are constantly reminded by such little things as two consecutive hyphenated adjectives, long involved sentences and sentences which begin with a conjunction and have no verb, that the work is translated. But at least it may be said that she has given us a readable and fairly literary rendering of the original. Many people are puzzled by the last few pages of the book. The position is one in which two men, bosom friends, have been estranged by a woman. Leo von Sellenthin has been the lover of Felicitas in the days when she was married to a man named Rhaden. The discovery of the liaison is followed by a duel, in which Rhaden is killed. Von Sellenthin leaves the country, and in his absence Felicitas consoles herself by marrying his great friend, Ulrich von Kletzingk. When Leo returns he finds the position unbearable, and declines to go near Felicitas. Her husband naturally assumes that it is because he had killed Rhaden, for he is quite unaware of the true state of affairs. Finally, a peace is patched up at Felicitas's own invitation, and before they realise it Leo and the woman find themselves on the brink of resuming their old relationship. The man recoils in time and they decide to die together. But Ulrich surprises them alone at night—his wife leaves him and goes to live alone in Berlin. The barrier between the friends appears to have been removed and most people interpret the end of the book as meaning that the old friendship will be renewed. But this view appears to be untenable to any who read the book with an understanding of Sudermann's views of life. The real ending appears to be that by the undying past, by that sin against the first husband, not only is the second husband's life blighted, but the friends are set for ever upon different paths. The undying past is not the past of the friendship which nothing can kill, but the undying past of the sin, which kills everything. The fact that the book can be thus discussed, even in the space of a brief review, is testimony to its virility and power. The three chief characters in "Es War" are wonderfully drawn; Leo with his strength of body and honest, frank views of life, Ulrich, the weakling, who has lived by sheer force of will, the dreamer who can see evil in no man, and Felicitas. What is Felicitas? To some she is an enigma, to others she is a very ordinary woman, who sinned not from wickedness, but inability to fight against herself. Felicitas is one of the most complex studies of woman-kind that Sudermann has given us, and yet even among English women there are characters not widely different from that of the heroine, if such she can be called, of "The Undying Past."

The Spoils of Victory. By B. PAUL NEUMAN. (Murray, 6s.)

EVEN without the warning preface that "the discerning reader" will easily recognise the real hero of Mr. Neuman's novel, it would not require much learning to supply the names of the original dramatis personæ. Mr. Neuman has given us a tale of a novelist enamoured of an unknown correspondent, who writes letters of appreciation on the publication of his books. The novelist, Champlain by name, has a foolish mother, a sister Laura whom he loves, a friend who is more than a mother to him, many debts, curious taste in dress and architecture, and a great scheme for a collected uniform edition of his works to be called "The Common Life." From all this it will be seen that de Balzac, his "Comédie Humaine," his sister Laura, his mother who treated him always as a boy, his friend Madame de Berny, the Polish lady Madame Hanska and her invalid husband, the fantastic villa at Sèvres, and everything tangible have been transported into a novel of English life. Here they are again, these good people, strings of them, like the Widdicombe fair chorus; most of them to be identified with ease; some reconstructed by guesswork. But "this isn't the end of this shocking affair" by any means. Why change names and places at all if history is to be so closely followed, from the start in Grub Street to the final breakdown of the novelist after his marriage with the unknown fair one? The result is only to make Champlain come very near to being what is vulgarly known as a bounder. Dickens is the nearest approach to an English Balzac, but to say as much is absurd, for an English Balzac is a contradiction of terms. Mr. Neuman thought to create his man anew with the help of externals, and thus missed the more important but less obvious fundamentals. Any one can appreciate the force of Balzac's female characters, and can readily understand that women constituted his first, his last, and his fondest public: the incident of the Polish lady was only an illustration of this. To transfer this knowledge of women and their character to an Englishman in fiction is easy, but it is impossible to imagine an English brain evolving the system of the Comédie Humaine. De Balzac also hated all that was bourgeois and provincial with an excess of zeal rivalled only as a passion by his firm and refined purpose. The assumption of the honorific prefix may seem to show that he had not the true spirit of the aristocrat, but in a genius may be excused what in a lesser man would be snobbish. Mr. Neuman can hardly be unaware that his Champlain and his lady are wholly obnoxious folk: he must, of course, include such types if he himself has a "Common Life" series on the stocks, but it is not fair to play such games with poor de Balzac. He has his fun with all of us, however, and tells us, through Mr. Champlain, that journalists are "so horribly clever, so pat, so quick": magazine writers are "smart, dapper little men," up to any dodge. The flatterer proceeds to describe an editor's room (in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden) where the "walls were covered with soft blue hangings and a couple of Indian rugs redeemed the squalor of the bare boards. Three silver candlesticks with silk shades stood on the small black oak writing table" . . . and so on. These things have vastly arried us, but may cause those who are uninitiated furiously to gnash their teeth as they think of the clever journalists and the luxurious editors and break the tenth commandment.

The Cubs. By SHAN F. BULLOCK. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

THE boys at Thalma lived: there is no doubt of that. They lived like young Elizabethans. There was nothing drab or colourless about the life of Thalma. The bullying of the Pets was terrific; the adventures and wickedness of the Cubs was incomparable; the goodness of Brunel unmarred; the friendship of Jan Farmer for him vivid and inexplicable as most friendships are. These wild Irish boys bear little resemblance to the staid English public-school boy. They play marbles, they steal apples, they shoot blackbirds and even ducks and geese with catapults, they fight at the least provocation, they pay out private scores at important football matches. They are what boys used to be, and are still sometimes thought to be, but are not. The development of the boy has been swift and wonderful. We shall never forget the shock of amazement at hearing a wise old boy of thirteen explain of his master: "Oh yes, he's a good enough chap and bowls at you all right at the nets and all that, but he can't teach math.;" and explain, too, without being kicked. But no matter. That critical spirit was not developed at Thalma; and we are glad of it. Though the wise old boy may shake his head in disdain and mutter "outsiders" as he reads of these fellows who play marbles, we confess to reading every word excitedly, liking their rough-and-tumble doings, and liking still more the relish and gusto with which these doings are described. Mr. Bullock's enthusiasm is so catching that he makes his love felt even for Brunel, the invalid boy who never had an evil thought and dies upon the last page. It seems almost a miracle that the little imp of scoffing should not answer such a clear call as this: if he came for a moment, he quickly hid his little face in both his little hands and was sorry.

Cattle Brands. By ANDY ADAMS. (Constable, 6s.)

WIRE and sheep have to a large extent turned the old-time picturesque cowboy of the West—the last cavalier, as some writer calls him—into a mere farm-hand, and the steady, relentless shooting of the old Rangers, with their motto not to wait for the other man to shoot first and their firm belief after a survey of each other's shot-drilled bodies at the bathing pool that "it was simply impossible to kill a man," has laid the foundation of a system of law and order under which

Times aren't now as they used to be
When gold was flush and the boys were frisky.
And a man would pull out his battery
For anything—maybe the price of whiskey.

So it is only natural to find in books written now dealing with those far-off days a lack of that vivid impressionist colouring with which writers like Bret Harte drove their dashing stories home, and only Mr. Owen Wister now preserves. These stories are somewhat slight in texture, more suited to the ephemeral needs of a magazine than a bound volume, but they have a ring of sincerity about them and an insight into essentials, as is evidenced by the treatment of the inefficient boss, "Bad Medicine," by the self-restrained contemptuous hands of his outfit, where the author has shown himself as capable of self-restraint as California. That the ranch and the prairie have not yet lost their power to attract "the feet of the Young Men" is quaintly brought out in the story headed "A College Vagabond," and the capture of Pegleg testifies to the extent to which the endurance of a man and a Ranger could go, when camping for fourteen days on the trail of a criminal.

FINE ART

FANTIN AND ZORN

IN a letter to his life-long friend, the engraver Edwards, the late Henri Fantin-Latour made the following interesting declaration:

It seems to me [he wrote] that a painter may congratulate himself on having made great progress when he sees that the beautiful is quite close to him. From that moment he is a painter, then it is the painter who sees; before it was the man.

That Fantin himself arrived early in life at this stage of the painter's progress is clearly revealed by the retrospective exhibition of his works which now occupies the Ecole Nationale des Beaux-Arts at Paris. Among this collection is a small interior, La Toilette, painted in 1859, which proves that in his twenty-third year Fantin was sensitive to the beauty of colour afforded by such homely objects as the washhand-stand and mirror in his bedroom. Two years later we find him painting a cup and saucer, a silver mustard-pot, a knife on a mahogany side-board, and other still-life subjects, all rendered with the simplicity, the seriousness, and the direct effectiveness of a Chardin. In these early days he painted portraits also, and again he found his models "quite close to him." He was only seventeen when he painted the first of a long series of "portraits of the artist;" he painted his sisters, and his sisters' friends; he went to the Louvre and made careful copies of the masterpieces of Titian, of Veronese, of Correggio and of Watteau; in short, he studied his art exhaustively by endeavouring to penetrate the secrets of the old masters and then putting his knowledge to the test by painting all things which came under his observation.

Still-life was a favourite subject because, as the painter said of himself, "c'est un modèle qui est toujours prêt, il offre tous les avantages; il est exact, soumis, et on le connaît avant de le peindre." Among the early still-life subjects were a few flower-pieces, and some of them, being introduced into England by his friends the Edwardses, met with an uncommonly favourable reception. Fantin at this time was struggling against hostile criticism and lack of sales at Paris, and henceforward he devoted much time to the painting of flowers, not so much that he preferred these to other still-life subjects, but because he found flower-pieces more readily saleable. Had he been less of an artist, these paintings of flowers—as near to "pot-boilers" as he got—might easily have fallen beneath the high standard he maintained, but to understand Fantin and to appreciate his art it is important to realise that they were regarded by the artist not as ends, but as means. Like his other still-life pieces, they were exercises in painting which would prepare and fit him for the greater works he had in mind, the great portrait-groups by which he paid his homage to genius, the rhythmical and imaginative compositions in which he revealed his passionate adoration of music and his devotion to Wagner, Berlioz and Schumann.

Although no paintings could be more real, more true to life, than the portraits and groups by which Fantin is represented at the Beaux-Arts, he was not merely a realist. He was essentially a romanticist and a poet, but his scrupulous regard for truth to nature caused him to approach romance and poetry by way of realism. So were created those wonderful portrait-groups of his great contemporaries, the Hommage à Delacroix and the Atelier aux Baignolles in which he expressed a chivalrous idea by natural means. In these the vision, though that of an artist, is severely real and simple. In the first, Whistler, Legros, Manet, Bracquemond, Baudelaire, the painter and others are gathered together to view a portrait of Delacroix on an easel. In the second, Manet's friends, among whom we notice Zola, Renoir, Zacharie Astruc and Claude Monet, are watching the master at work. Intimate glimpses into the home life of artists, these paintings are real in that they give a natural rendering of a natural scene. But in the end the romanticism which lay at the root of Fantin's nature conquered, and his tribute to Berlioz, L'Anniversaire, has a less natural and more poetic setting. Beside the tomb of the composer the Muse, in deepest mourning, points to his name. To the left Music weeps over her lyre; to the right advance the heroines of Berlioz: Marguerite with a crown in her hand, Dido with a palm, Juliette accompanied by Romeo with an armful of flowers. And last, in the lower right-hand corner of the picture, we see the back of a man's head and shoulders which we recognise as belonging to Fantin, who in his turn advances with a wreath of immortelles, his bowed head and rounded shoulders most movingly expressive of sorrow and deep reverence. In this work and in such allegorical compositions inspired by Wagner as Le Graal and the Finale de la Götterdämmerung, Fantin probably came nearest to the achievement of his heart's desire.

With an artist so varied it is difficult to say in what consists his chief claim on the memory of posterity. He will assuredly be remembered as a painter of flowers, as a portrait-painter, as a lithographer—in which medium he had no rival among his contemporaries save Whistler—and Whistler never dared to push lithography so far—and if exquisite harmonies of rich glowing colour, rhythmical designs, firm drawing and poetical inventiveness make for immortality, then will Fantin be remembered best of all for what he loved most of all, his Inspirations Musicales, Allegories, and Mythologies.

M. Anders Zorn, the Swedish painter and etcher—a representative collection of whose work is being shown at M. Durand-Ruel's galleries in Paris—is less a poet than Fantin without being more a realist. Like M. Blanche, he is amazingly clever, but again like M. Blanche, he rarely allows us to forget his cleverness. His nudes are wonderful for their elastic modelling, their fleshiness, and the exact values of sunlight and shadow, but his paint is often just a little too sleek, his brush-work a little too "slick" to give complete satisfaction. His ability as a draughtsman and as a colourist it is impossible to deny. His etchings are so well known in England that the qualities of his line need no commendation here, while the portrait of a lady in red, exhibited at the New Gallery about eighteen months ago, revealed in London M. Zorn's complete mastery of this difficult, and, with him, favourite colour. In the Rue Lafitte M. Zorn's passion for scarlet is often betrayed only by the flaming ribbon which binds the hair of a nude figure in a landscape, but scarlet, however small in quantity, is seldom missing from his palette. A few overgrown water-colours cannot atone by their technical dexterity for the painter's inability to see what may and may not be attempted in this medium. Able in construction, clever in execution are M. Zorn's exhibits almost without exception. And there is quality in the paint of some of the portraits and nudes, just as there is quality in the early paintings of Fantin, though not so fine a quality as that shown in his later works with more broken colour. But, admitted that good painting is something of a trick, there is this difference between the paintings of Zorn and of Fantin: with Zorn the trick is done; with Fantin the trick is done and concealed.

MUSIC

THE OTHER SIDE

"COULD God make a sheet of paper with only one side to it?" was the question once put by a small sceptic of four, when the omnipotence of the Deity was first presented to his mind. We do not remember how nursery authorities solved the difficulty of a reply, but the obvious consideration seems to be that though God could of course if He chose He generally doesn't, and that a sheet of paper with only one side to it might prove occasionally unsatisfactory. Talking of sheets of paper, it may seem slightly irrelevant to begin a musical paper in this way, particularly as the anecdote was recalled to the writer's mind by an interesting article on Grieg's piano-music which appeared in the ACADEMY of June 2, in which one side of these naïvely-charming compositions was discussed. But may there not be another side to criticism—another side to Grieg's music? And, if so, may another hearer of Grieg be allowed a few discursive remarks on the subject? It is certainly true that Grieg owes a large measure of his popularity to the fact that a large proportion of his works is easily within the scope of amateurs. An audience, especially a British audience, best likes what it most thoroughly knows. An anecdote of Paderewski, and one which he particularly loves to tell himself, is illustrative of this. At the close of one of his earlier recitals in London, in the days when the great virtuoso was not so rigorously shielded from the public as he is now, a lady hammered at the door of the artist's room. She must see Mr. Paderewski, she positively must, she had something important to say. Admittance was more or less grudgingly allowed, and then the important communication gushed out. "Oh! Mr. Paderewski, I was so delighted with that Beethoven sonata. My daughter Arabella plays it!"

That was her side of the question. But there must surely be another to the general acceptance of any composer besides mere familiarity with his works—a better justification of the proverb: "Vox populi, Vox Dei"? else how could the supreme voice obtain a hearing with regard to Edvard Grieg? It was, again, Paderewski who, speaking of latter-day composers, once said to the present writer that there were two whose genius would only be recognised fully by posterity. Of these one was the giant Wagner, the other was Grieg. No comparison was intended between them, of course; the remark merely emphasised the true originality of both. Reizend was the word used in connection with Grieg. We have no exact English equivalent for the noun from which this adjective is derived, and which ought properly to translate itself into something a trifle less spiritual than "ravishment," and more forcible than mere "charm." To fall under the spell of such a quality is to be first allured, then arrested, then carried out of oneself. All truly lyrical creatures possess this power of enchantment, from the mythical Lorelei on her lonely rock, to the blackbird singing in its green boughs after rain; they thrill us less by actual combination of sounds than by what these sounds mysteriously suggest of unknown and unutterable things beyond. In a word, all lyrical creatures are in touch with the ideal, and to be in touch with the ideal is to hold at least one qualification for immortality. Grieg is nothing if not lyrical, if not an idealist. At his highest he is heroic, at his lowest no lower than the level of the soil. One alternative compels an immediate uplifting of the spirit in those who share his thought; the other wakes that sense of kinship with primitive things which is one of the intimacies of being. In either case, as our mind travels backwards and forwards, it rests on nothing less than infinity. One may find endless definitions for this feeling of the ideal in art. "Le sentiment de l'idéal c'est la nostalgie du beau dans le beau." And again: "C'est l'élan de la beauté créée vers son principe invisible." "Beauty is truth, truth beauty," wrote Keats. The more transparent the sheath of the idea, the nearer we get to truth, the nearer to beauty. Music by reason of its ethereal qualities is the most illuminative medium of any. Grieg's method of handling this medium is certainly simple. "Little turns of uncouth melody," we are told, "employing over and over again the step of a semi-tone downwards followed by the leap of a major third in the same direction, strangely piled-up harmonious discords and a love of crude-sounding fifths and sevenths." O, please, please, Mr. Critic, why uncouth? But let the word stand. Might there not have been rude stone and rough timber in those:

... magic casements opening on the foam
Of perilous seas in faëry lands forlorn?

The thing to be considered appears to some people not so much construction as inspiration, not so much the masonry of the casement as the question: "Can we see through?" Those who can, hear the voice of the Lorelei and—leaving the shams of a circumscribed and everyday world in a neat pile on the window-seat, or window-sill, or whatever other picturesque similitude they may apply to the stuffy stalls in Queen's Hall—not only do they look through, they plunge in. Perilous seas indeed! Who in real life would face conceptions, passions, emotions, as music presents them—who would dare? They are too strong, too simple, too genuine in their prototypes to bear translation here. Society would be overwhelmed, conventions would shrivel, the very limitations of our nature forbid. They belong, alas! to "faëry lands forlorn"—literally forlorn. In so far as other people's perceptions ride the same tides as ours, in so far as we taste the joys of companionship, but we can only travel thus a very little way. Between us and our fellow pilgrims rises betimes an impalpable mist—the mist of each other's identity. Our nearest and dearest are as far removed from us in spiritual experience as are the twin lights of a double-star one from the other, between which, say astronomers, roll billions of miles of space. It is at once the glory and the tragedy of the soul that she sets forth on these wanderings as solitary as on that journey from which there is no return. And, as on that last journey, whenever the summons comes, follow she must. It is, of course, the simple-minded among us who are easiest led away. In the case of the Pied Piper of Hamelin, for instance, the rats were the first to prick up their ears, the children trooped after, and, had the piper cared to pipe longer, doubtless staid townspeople would have been allured in their turn. Garrulous enthusiasts like myself would not have waited for the children; they would have cast their stylo-pens to the winds, and gaily leapt forward with the rats "over the hills and far away." But had there been a truly intellectual person in Hamelin he might have had the piper judicially examined. Answer, thou vagabond! What is thy theory and method? Whence hast thou these uncouth melodies, and why do the people run after thy crude-sounding fifths and sevenths? Why, indeed? Is it because the artlessness of thy tunes is such that rats naturally scamper, and babes toddle to them; while the Arabellas of Hamelin rattle them off easily to Papa and Mama? Or is it because of a certain divine impulse underlying the music, which is the magnet of all popular enthusiasm and belongs to genius alone—das reizende genie which another living genius recognised and praised.

E #.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MR. S. WELLWOOD, 34 Strand, is commencing the publication of a number of finely produced volumes to be called the "Wellwood Books." They are not a "series." Each book will have its distinctive format. The first, which is to be published shortly, is a sonnet anthology, entitled "A Book of English Sonnets." The printing is by the Chiswick Press in an exclusive type designed after Froben, an early Basle printer, and the paper is Van Gelder handmade. The anthology will range from Wyatt and Surrey to poets of the present day, and will contain many copyright pieces which have not previously appeared in any collection. Among the living poets represented are: Mr. A. C. Benson, Mr. Hilaire Belloc, Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, Mr. Robert Bridges, Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mrs. Meynell, Mr. Swinburne, Mr. William Watson, Mr. Watts-Dunton, and others. The edition is limited to five hundred and thirty-five copies on paper at 12s. 6d. net, and ten copies on Japanese vellum at £2 2s. net. After printing the type will be distributed.

Herr Schlaf has arranged to translate into German Mr. Henry Bryan Binns's "Life of Walt Whitman," which was issued by Messrs. Methuen a short time ago.

A selected edition of the poems of the late Mrs. Nora Chesson is in preparation, and will be published almost immediately by Mr. Alston Rivers. Mrs. Chesson, better known as Nora Hopper, left a young family almost entirely unprovided for; and the proceeds of this publication, to which Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer contributes an introduction, will be devoted to the fund now being raised for their benefit. Mr. Hueffer (90 Brook Green, W.) would be glad to hear in advance from intending subscribers to this edition, the price of which will be 5s. net.

Mr. John Murray has in the press a book on "Lord Milner's Work in South Africa" from the pen of Mr. Basil Worsfold.—Mr. Murray will also publish some time this month "An Englishwoman in the Philippines," by Mrs. Campbell Dauncey. The book consists of letters written home during a year spent in the Islands, and contains descriptions of the land and its people, of social customs, administrative difficulties, etc.—An interesting book of reminiscences which the same publisher has almost ready is General Sir Thomas Gordon's "A Varied Life." The author has spent much time in India, Persia, and Central Asia, and his volume is a record of military and civil service, sport and travel.

"The Hampstead Garner" is the title of a new anthology to be issued shortly giving a collection of verses in praise of Hampstead or relating to the celebrated writers who have been connected with the locality in earlier and present times; among these are Keats, Leigh Hunt, Akenside, Mrs. Barbauld, Joanna Baillie and others. The book will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

A book on "Schiller's Dramas and Poems in England," by Mr. Thomas Rea, will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin on June 18. The work is a contribution to the study of the literary relations between England and Germany in the nineteenth century. A complete literary history is given of Schiller's dramas and three of his most important poems in England, and an attempt is made to estimate their influence on British writers.—"In Search of a Siberian Klondike" is the title of a book by Mr. Washington Vanderlip and Mr. H. B. Hulbert, which Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish on the same date. It is a narrative of Mr. Vanderlip's travels in Kamchatka.

Mr. Robert Harborough Sherard's long expected "Life of Oscar Wilde" is now ready for publication. This volume gives the true facts of his career, and an account of his literary work. One purpose of the book is to dispel a number of false reports which have associated themselves with his life and work. It contains many illustrations and facsimile documents of interest and a full bibliography. The publisher is Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

Lord Dunsany—whose "The Gods of Pegana" was reviewed in these columns a short time ago—has another volume of a similar nature in the press: "Time and the Gods." Mr. Heinemann will be the publisher.

Messrs. Routledge are adding to their excellent little Muses' Library "Peacock's Poetical Works": "Suckling": and "Thomson's Poems." To their New Universal Library they are adding a volume of selections from Sir Thomas Browne's writings; Leigh Hunt's "Stories from the Italian Poets"; "Marlowe's Complete Dramatic Works"; and Lord Houghton's "Life of Keats."

Mr. W. Jasper Nicolls is publishing this week, through the De La More Press, a new book entitled "A Dreamer in Paris." Mr. Frank H. Taylor has provided five full-page illustrations and a number of other sketches affording glimpses of almost every aspect of Paris life, grave and gay.

"The Green Gateway—a peep into the plant world" is the title of a new book by Mr. Francis George Heath—the first volume of his "Nature's Doorstep series," fully illustrated "studies of earth, air and water for young people." The Country Press of Kensington, W., will be the publishers.

Messrs. George Newnes, Limited, announce for immediate publication in their Sixpenny Series Mr. David Christie Murray's "A Martyred Fool." By a strange coincidence, this novel, which, as is well known, deals with the adventures of an anarchist who brought about his own destruction in a moment of desperation, was already in the press when the Madrid outrage occurred. This story, therefore, is of particular interest at the present moment.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE PORTLAND MINIATURE OF MARY STUART

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I wish that I could agree with Father Pollen in thinking it "very probable" that in the Duke of Portland's miniature of Mary Stuart, "her sickness of 1566 is represented." But, as Father Pollen says in reviewing my "Portraits and Jewels of Mary Stuart," I "do not notice that the white lady is lying propped up in bed." Indeed I can find no bed in the miniature. A royal bed of the period was a great "four-poster," draped with the heavy hangings of costly fabrics often recorded in inventories. In the picture nothing of the sort is shown but merely the conventional ground of blue.

Again, a lady did not go to bed in full morning costume, and in a sunshade of great size and peculiar fashion, like the subject of the miniature. Once more, Father Pollen probably refers to Mary's dangerous illness at Jedburgh, in October and November 1566. At that season, in Scotland, no woman would wear a summer costume and a great sunshade in or out of bed. She would wear, probably, the costume, trimmed with fur, styled à l'Espagnole. The subject certainly appears to be a convalescent, and, if we had any trace of a miniaturist in Scotland, in 1566, the picture might represent Mary convalescent after the birth of her son, in July 1566. She appears to rest her back against something, as if in a garden chair in the open air. But even if her painter, Jehan de Court, was with her in 1566—and his name and salary are recorded in her Etat—no miniatures by him are known to exist. I incline to think that the miniature was done in France, after her first marriage, when she is known to have been in bad health, and hopes were entertained of her becoming a mother. That the subject is really the Queen, the anagram, Virtutis Amore (Marie Stuart), seems to indicate. But the eyes are certainly grey, whereas hers were brown; at the same time the ermine, I presume, denotes royalty, and the portrait is assuredly not that of any Valois princess. The original, to which the reproduction, enlarged, does scant justice, appears to me to represent the sitter in the open air, in summer weather; not in bed at Jedburgh in November.

A. LANG.

COMMERCIAL "CORNERS" IN ANCIENT GREECE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Aristophanes, Clouds, 1198–1200; ὅπερ οἱ προτένθαι γὰρ δοκοῦσι μοι ποιεῖν, etc., is the reference I should have added to my mention, in mine of 2nd inst., of Aristophanes, as rebutting Professor R. Y. Tyrrell's contention that the ancient Greeks "could not make 'corners' in anything." (I gave the reference loosely—"προτένθαι, Aristophanes, Clouds,"—from memory only, owing to the Whitsun holidays insulating books). προτένθαι are defined by the Schol: "as taking beforehand all goods before they reach the market, and as reselling them (μεταπιδράσκοντας) at a premium (πλειόνους)." If one fondly imagines that "corners" were estopped by Periclean legislation (Curtius, History of Greece, ii. p. 554, French translation): "il (the προτένθης) commettait un délit s'il tentait d'exploiter à son profit les embarras de l'Etat, et de spéculer avantageusement sur la gêne des concitoyens", one sees at once, by the scholiast himself, that the προτένθης, or maker of "corners," was neither scotched nor killed by Pericles and his laws, by his Protection up to the hilt, by his σιτοφύλακες, ἀγοράνομοι, and the rest. The προτένθης continued uninterruptedly, under the alias μετάβολος, says the schol. Our Professor of Greek here agrees with me herein, and specially refers to "corners" in corn in Ancient Greece.

H. H. JOHNSON.

June 5.

AN EMENDATION IN HAMLET

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I venture to ask if your correspondent—Mr. Geare—has seen Professor Dowden's note in his "Hamlet" (Methuen and Co.). He does not find the text quite "nonsense." I have not now a copy of it—but, relying on a memory of some four or five years, he takes "doth scandal" as a verb and makes quite a worthy plea for his case. I'm always suspicious of "emendations" and I only write to ask if Mr. Geare has seen Professor Dowden's note—which was received most favourably by the critics and which seemed to me to quite get rid of the "crux."

W. M. KENNEDY.

June 6.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—This passage needs no violent treatment seeing that we have to deal only with the misprint "of a"; if then we read "offer doubt," we have a sort of chivalric challenge to man's nobility, against the drinking habit under censure, which involves the scandal deplored.

A. H.

A RHYME TO PORRINGER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your note and the correspondence in issue of June 2 re rhyme to porringer have just come under my notice. Possibly another version may interest you. I heard it more than forty years ago at my mother's knee and it was attributed to Samuel Butler, author of Hudibras, under the following circumstances. Two noble lords of King Charles's Court were disputing about the possibility of a rhyme for porringer, and Butler's powers were in question. He was sent for in haste to settle the matter on which a wager of £1000 was pending. He came, and the question being propounded, replied on the instant:

"The Duke of York a daughter had,
He gave the Prince of Orange her,
My Lord, you've lost your thousand pounds
For there's a rhyme for porringer!"

EDITH WARD.

June 8.

THE PRONUNCIATION OF "KNOWLEDGE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—
"No—no—I'd send him out betimes to college,
For there it was I pick'd up my own knowledge."

BYRON, Don Juan, I. lii.

This shows how Byron pronounced "knowledge." And Byron was right. All the great authorities on English pronunciation agree with him. It is not only a correct pronunciation of the word, but it is the only correct modern pronunciation whether in church or in the market-place, in the pulpit or on the stage. There is complete unanimity on this point among lexicographers, grammarians and writers on English phonetics. It will be sufficient for me to adduce the names of Dr. J. A. H. Murray (in the New English Dictionary), Dr. Noah Webster (in the International Dictionary), Dr. Annandale (in his Concise Dictionary), and Dr. Henry Sweet (in his History of English Sounds, p. 338). The shortening of the vowel in the compound is in strict accordance with the laws of English phonology. Compare coal, collier; nose, nostril; vine, vineyard; house, husband; nation, national. Accordingly the pronunciation of "knowledge" with a long o is quite contrary to rule, and should be severely condemned, pace Lord Tennyson.

A. L. MAYHEW.

WIT, versus WHITE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If Whit-Sunday does mean "white" to which I offer no objection, why not spell the word properly, with the final "e"? Archaisms are very well, but exactitude were better.

A. H.

"ACCORDION-PLAITED"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Now do I suspect your reviewer of the "Strolling Professors" of the unspeakable crime of celibacy. May the fair readers of the ACADEMY grant him their pardon and not impute his ignorance of their fashions to the whole of the male fraternity!

Shades of Wheldon! What originality pray can Mr. Miltoun claim for having seen skirts "plaited like an accordion" when "accordion-plaited skirt" is a household phrase among womankind? For the benefit of the more hopelessly uninformed may I be permitted to point out that this particular type of skirt is not so called because of any musical properties it may possess even though it be made of the finest rustling silk.

SUFFRAGIST.

June 9.

[Has Suffragist a wife? Does his wife wear a plaited skirt and pleat her hair? If he had a wife, would she not wear a pleated skirt and plait her hair?—ED.]

A BOOK-GUIDE FOR LIBRARIES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In regard to your interesting paragraphs in the "Literary Week," I have no doubt you will be glad to learn that the late Mr. Foskett (of Camberwell) published a monthly book-journal for libraries at the nominal price of one penny. Unfortunately his enthusiasm was greater than that of his confreres and the publication died an early, but a natural death. At one time the Library Bureau held a permanent exhibition of books for the use of both London and Provincial libraries. But for commercial reasons that no longer exists. The Library Association publish Lists of Best Books in the "Record"; but they are only annual lists, and are therefore too late to be of much practical use.

The Library World includes a "book selector" page, but this is naturally limited and the competent Librarian cannot accept an outside "selection" without question and comparison, although the list is invaluable for the books given; what he really wants is a highly technical book-list of current publications. It would be a great advance if a list such as that you suggest could be promoted, and the time is much more ripe than when the previous abortive attempt was made. But it is doubtful, in view of the animus with which some of the publishing houses on this side of the Atlantic regard public libraries, if they would do anything to foster a new endeavour. Too often the fault of the haphazard nature of the collection is to be found in the inability of the library authority to appoint a competent librarian.

ALEX. J. PHILIP.

June 7.

"ENCOURAGING THE MINOR POET"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is good to find in last week's ACADEMY not one only, but two kindly words (your own and that of your correspondent) for that derided being, the minor poet.

That "minor poets cannot be too plentiful any more than skylarks and throistles can" is a comforting statement that goes a long way to taking the bitterness out of one's next acrid review.

One point, the minor one's reviewer constantly forgets, if he ever knew it, is, that the poet does not necessarily imagine himself to be a major one, because he submits himself to the reviewer's lash. The process may make for modesty as well as heroism, by the way!

Perchance a reviewer does not inevitably contrast the last writer of a novel or a collection of short stories with Scott, Thackeray or Meredith; yet he is mighty fond of pitting the minor poet's work against Shelley, Wordsworth or Arnold, to the former's undoing, with a sense of unction in his own performance, that seems a little disproportionate to the event.

However, minor poets sing on, in spite of an unkind world in the main, and their way is sometimes brightened by the encouragement of an unknown friend, and the sympathy of a kind, if severe, literary journal.

A MINOR POET.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Algeria and Tunis. Painted and described by Frances A. Nesbit. 9×6½. Pp. 229. Black, 20s. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Ellis, William Ashton. Life of Richard Wagner. Vol. v. 9×6. Pp. 460. Kegan Paul, 6s. net.

EDUCATION.

Exercises in Spelling, Dictation, and Composition, for Middle Forms. (A new method.) 7½×5. Pp. 55. Relfe, 6d.

Sprague, W. Norton. Easy Latin Prose. 7½×4½. Pp. 120. Arnold, 1s. 6d. [For the use of those who are commencing the translation of consecutive pieces of prose after having had some practice in rendering English into Latin in the form of sentences.]

Arnold's Modern French Book. I. Edited by H. L. Hutton. 7½×5. Pp. 198. Arnold, 1s. 6d.

[Intended especially for pupils who have done about a year's French by any method.]

McCabe, Joseph. The Truth about Secular Education. Its history and results. 6½×4½. Pp. 96. Watts, 6d.

FICTION.

Cox, F. J. A Stranger Within the Gates. A story of Severn Side. 7½×5½. Pp. 300. Francis Griffiths, 6s.

King, A. R. The Agony of Love and Hate. 7½×5. Pp. 319. Drane, 6s.

Black, Ladbroke; and Lynd, Robert. The Mantle of the Emperor. Being the adventures and operations of Richard Blennerhasset in the following of the Third Napoleon. 12 illustrations by Paul Henry. 7½×5½. Pp. 211. Francis Griffiths, 6s.

Elliott, Robert. Hi-You. A Phase of Immaturity. 7½×5½. Pp. 151. Dublin: Sealy, Bryers & Walker, 2s. 6d. net.

MacPhail, Andrew. The Vine of Sidmah. A Relation of the Puritans. Illustrated. 7½×5½. Pp. 432. The Macmillan Co., 6s.

Harrison, Mrs. Burton. Later-Day Sweethearts. 7½×5. Pp. 318. Unwin, 6s.

Moore, George. Memoirs of My Dead Life. 7½×5. Pp. 335. Heinemann, 6s.

Merrick, Leonard. Whispers about Women. 7½×5. Pp. 320. Eveleigh Nash, 6s.

[Short stories.] Godfrey, Elizabeth. The Bridal of Anstace. 7½×5½. Pp. 409. Lane, 6s.

Pennell, M. Amor Veritatis, or Love of Truth. The Baronet's story. 7½×5. Pp. 223. Elliot Stock, 5s.

Maud, Constance Elizabeth. Felicity in France. 8×5½. Pp. 331. Heinemann, 6s.

[Sketches. Three have already appeared, in a slightly different form, in two of the quarterlies.]

Stranger, Poynton. Toll Marsh. With a preface by His Grace the Duke of Newcastle. 7½×5. Pp. 375. Skeffington, 6s.

HISTORY.

Leach, A. F. History of Warwick School, with notices of the Collegiate Church, Gilds, and Borough of Warwick. 9×6. Pp. 262. Constable, 10s. net.

The History of England from Addington's Administration to the Close of William IV's Reign (1801-1837). By the Hon. George C. Brodrick, D.C.L. Completed and revised by J. K. Fotheringham. Political History of England series, vol. xi. 9×6. Pp. 486. 3 maps. Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.

Harris, Rev. Isidore. History of the Jews' College, 1855-1905 (5616-5666). Being the First Part of the Jews' College Jubilee Volume. 9×5½. Pp. ccii. Luzac, printed for private circulation.

Decle, Lionel. The New Russia. 9×5½. Pp. 279. Eveleigh Nash, 7s. 6d.

Black, Kenneth Macleod. The Scots Churches in England. 8½×5½. Pp. 375. Blackwood, 5s. net.

[Endeavours "to furnish a careful collection of relics and records of 'old unhappy far-off days, And battles long ago,' to survey generally the position of Scots Presbyterianism in England, and to give in . . . detail the life-history of some of the more representative and interesting congregations."]

LITERATURE.

John Siberch. Bibliographical notes 1886-1905, by Robert Bowes and G. J. Gray. With facsimiles of title-pages, colophons, ornaments, initial letters, wood-cuts, etc., used by John Siberch. 8×6. Pp. 49. Printed by John Clay, M.A., Printer to the University of Cambridge, for Robert Bowes and George Brimley Bowes, M.A. (Macmillan & Bowes), No. 1 Trinity Street, over against Saint Mary's Church, 7s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Savage, Ernest A. Manual of Descriptive Annotation for Library Catalogues. With chapter on Evaluation and historical note by Ernest A. Baker. 7½×5. Pp. 155. Library Supply Company, 5s. net.

Farming in the Canadian North-West. By an Old Settler. 7½×5. Pp. 81. Drane, 1s.

Musings of a Chinese Mystic. Selections from the philosophy of Chuang Tzu. Introduction by Lionel Giles. Wisdom of the East series. 6½×5. Pp. 112. Murray, 2s. net.

- Cook, The Rev. W. Hendy. The Creation and Science. 7x4½. Pp. 39. Exeter: Pollard, n.p.
- Carey, Harold. De Beauvoir the Masterful, or The Adventures of Carteret Sausmarez de Beauvoir in the Days of Elizabeth. 7x4½. Pp. 156. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s.
- Newman, George. Infant Mortality. A social problem. New Library of Medicine. 9x5½. Pp. 356. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.
- Department of the Interior United States Geological Survey: Bulletins 265, 269, 272, 273, and 274; Water-Supply and Irrigation Papers 148, 150, 154, and 167; Professional Papers 43, 44, and 48 (Parts i., ii., and iii.); Mineral Resources of the United States, 1904; Twenty-sixth Annual Report of the Director of the United States Geological Survey to the Secretary of the Interior, 1904-5. Washington: Government Printing Office.
- Library of Congress: Journals of the Continental Congress, 1774-1789. Edited from the original records in the Library of Congress by Worthington Chauncey Ford. Vol. v. June 5-October 8, 1776. Washington: Government Printing Office.
- The English Hymnal*. A new hymn-book for use in the Church of England as a companion to the Book of Common Prayer. 5½x3½. Pp. 635. Oxford University Press, music edition, 3s. net.; words only, 1s. net. and 2d. net.
- [Many hymns are included which are not in any other hymn-book. A copy of the music edition will be sent to any benefited clergyman who desires to examine the book with a view to its introduction into his church. Applications for grants of copies at half-price to churches adopting the book should be made through the publisher.]
- Julio Cezaro*. Tragedio en kvin aktoj. De W. Shakespeare. Tradukita de D. H. Lambert. 7x4½. Pp. 85. Brita Esperantista Asocio, 1s. 6d. net. [Uniform with "Hamlet" and "La Ventego."]
- Plumpton, T. Arthur. Hossfeld's Italian Dialogues, with a vocabulary, a chapter on pronunciation, and the conjugation of the regular and irregular verbs. Hossfeld's Pocket Manuals. 5x3½. Pp. 261. Hirschfeld, 1s. 6d.

MUSIC.

- Baughan, Edward Algernon. Music and Musicians. 7½x5½. Pp. 325. Lane, 5s. net.

NATURAL HISTORY.

- South, Richard. The Butterflies of the British Isles. With accurately-coloured figures of every species and many varieties, also drawings of egg, caterpillar, chrysalis, and food plant. 6½x4½. Pp. 204 + Pl. 127. Warne, 6s. net.

POETRY.

- Pearl*: a fourteenth-century poem. Rendered into modern English by G. G. Coulton. 6x4½. Pp. 51. Nutt, n.p.
- Price, Jessie M. Thought for Quiet Moments. Short Poems. 7x4½. Pp. 66. Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. net.
- Cust, Maria Eleanor Vere. Lucem Sequor, and other poems. 7x4½. Pp. 55. Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Robertson, F. W. Lectures on The Influence of Poetry and Wordsworth 7½x5. Pp. 169. H. R. Allenson, 2s. 6d.
- [Two lectures on the Influence of Poetry on the Working Classes, delivered before the members of the Mechanics' Institution, in February 1852; and a lecture on Wordsworth delivered before the members of the Brighton Athenæum on February 10, 1853. "First published elsewhere."]
- Thomas, W. H. Griffith. The Catholic Faith. A manual of instruction for members of the Church of England. Second edition. 6½x4½. Pp. 462. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. net.
- Haackel, Ernest. The Riddle of the Universe at the Close of the Nineteenth Century. Translated by Joseph McCabe. 8½x6. Pp. 142. Issued for the Rationalist Press Association: Watts, 6d.
- Garnett, Richard. De Flagello Myrteo. CCCLX Thoughts and Fancies on Love. Third Edition. 6½x5½. Pp. 96. Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d. net.
- Salome*. A Tragedy in One Act, translated from the French of Oscar Wilde. 6½x5½. Pp. 66. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY.

- Plain Sermons for the Christian Year*. By Various Contributors. Volume 5. Trinity Sunday until Eighth Sunday after Trinity. 6½x4½. Pp. 238. S.P.C.K., 1s.
- Robinson, E. Kay. The Religion of Nature. 7½x5½. Pp. 215. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d. (See p. 570.)
- Neumann, Arno. Jesus. Translated by Maurice A. Canney. Preface by Prof. P. W. Schmiedel. 7½x4½. Pp. 180. Black, n.p.
- Carey, Vivian. Parsons and Pagans. Being an indictment of Christianity and the exposition of a New Faith. 7½x5. Pp. 248. Drane, 3s. 6d. net.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Bell, Mrs. Arthur G. Picturesque Brittany. Illustrations in colour by Arthur G. Bell. 9½x6½. Pp. 232. Dent, 10s. 6d. net.
- Moore, Frederick. The Balkan Trail. 62 illustrations and a map. 8½x5½. Pp. 296. Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.
- Jerrold, Clare. Picturesque Sussex. 7½x5½. Pp. 153. The Shire series. Valentine, 2s. 6d. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

- Etchings of Van Dyck*. By Frank Newbolt. (Newnes, 7s. 6d. net.)—This second volume in the Master Etchers series will be a revelation to many who are familiar only with Van Dyck's work as a painter. Mr. Newbolt does well to remind his readers that Van Dyck was a pioneer in etching, that "he was born in 1599, but a few years after Callot, and actually before Claude, Rembrandt, Ostade, or Hollar, and he followed in the history of etching only Durer and his immediate successors." These are facts generally lost sight of, and their remembrance, while viewing these beautiful and faithful reproductions of the prints in the British Museum, should go far towards establishing Mr. Newbolt's contention that "Van Dyck was one of the greatest etchers who have ever lived, though he died so young, and with so little done"—and, we may add, though he restricted his use of the art to portraiture, and usually the portraiture of his artist friends. A catalogue raisonnée of the thirty-four etchings reproduced is a welcome supplement to the scholarly introductory essay.

Bygone Eton. 1622-1905. By R. A. Austen Leigh. (Eton College Spottiswoode & Co., 21s. net.)—This is a re-issue in a single volume of five monthly parts which appeared during 1904 and 1905: but it contains many additions and a few alterations, and is now an ideal leaving-book for an Eton boy and wedding-present for Old Etonians. Mr. Austen Leigh has contributed numberless books and pamphlets to Eton bibliography during recent years, and his knowledge of the local history and topography is displayed in the interesting notes which he has prefixed to the forty-seven illustrations forming this volume, and ranging from the Founder's Design (1447) to a flattering photograph of "Tatham's" in 1905, just before it was pulled down to make room for the Memorial Buildings. Eton is beautiful in spite of a great many architectural atrocities, and we may be very grateful to Mr. Austen Leigh for avoiding any insistence upon the less prepossessing edifices. Some Etonians will be glad because the book is published before it is possible to include a picture of the War Memorial; and in general it may be said that it was a happy and judicious scheme which lays stress upon "Bygone Eton" rather than upon the more modern aspect of the college. The book is a model of what such volumes should be.

In a series of homiletic lectures, entitled The Scientific Temper in Religion (Longmans, 6s.), Mr. Waggett (a member of the Cowley brotherhood) shows the compatibility of biological science and of the evolution theory with theology. The subject is treated in a lucid and popular manner. Chapters v. and vi. are especially good. In dealing with the question of freedom and determinism the author rightly insists that the fact of experience is of far more importance than any philosophical conclusions which have been reached. At the same time he recognises that, among philosophers, Hegel has come nearer than any other, not to a solution of the mystery, but to its complete statement. He shows that Hegel's theory as to freedom and necessity being opposite poles of the same reality is realised in experience, and of this he furnishes some remarkable illustrations. On the other hand, on page 42 his psychology is confused. To oppose science, as he does, to the critical spirit is unmeaning and untrue, for the scientific position is definitely critical. But, after all, the antagonism between science and theology is now most acute, not in the sphere of biology, but in that of biblical and historical criticism, in the region of inspiration and dogma. Yet only one of the addresses is devoted to the former, and in this the author refurbishes the old discredited attempt to find modern ideas in Genesis. The chapter on "Experience and Dogma" is equally unsatisfactory; for, though the author rightly finds the heart of religion in experience, yet he does not apparently allow that this experience itself is proper matter for scientific (psychological) investigation (page 26), nor does he seem to realise the historical relation between this experience and dogma. It is in the effort to determine this relation that the true "scientific temper in religion" is manifested. Yet the whole of this chapter is little more than a rhetorical homily, which is almost entirely devoted to showing that dogma does not fetter the intellect, a proposition which, to say the least, requires considerable qualification.

A HOME FOR BOOKS.
Treat your books as your best friends. They will be true to you when all others fail. In other words treat yourself to a

"GUNN"
Sectional Bookcase

Your books will look well in it; they will always be handy, and its specially made doors will keep them free from damage. Built up in sections of any required size, the whole looking like a solid, handsome piece of furniture. Always complete, yet always growing. Full particulars, prices, and name of nearest Agent, post free. Write for "Booklet No. 23" to WM. ANGUS & CO., Ltd., 44 Paul Street, London, E.C.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

HAMERTON (P.G.), French and English: a Comparison; crown 8vo, cloth, new; 10s. 6d. for 3s. 3d. Hamerton, The Mount and the City of Autun, 3s. 6d. for 1s. 6d.; both post free.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

MISCELLANEA GENEALOGICA ET HERALDICA, Vol. ii, First Series (about 1870), wanted; good price given.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury; (Vol. I, 1869 for sale.)

"CHRISTIANITY AS CHRIST PREACHED IT." This and other pamphlets free and books on loan from Mrs. SQUIRRELL, Lynton, Stonegate, Leicester.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) under takes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING.—Novels 9d. 1000. Translations, plays, poetry, etc. Miss HANDLEY, Bankside, Berkhamsted.

TYPEWRITING.—AUTHORS' MSS. of all kinds carefully TYPED. 9d. per 1000 after 3000. Knowledge of French, German and Italian. A. U. BOWMAN, 74 Limes Avenue, New Southgate, N.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE

NEW EDITION

Edited by SIR HENRY IRVING &amp; FRANK A. MARSHALL

Is the ideal Edition, dealing not only with the famous Dramatist's Works, but also with his Life, Surroundings, and Associations. It is at once a complete Literary and Stage History, and a Critical Analysis of each Play dealt with.

The greatest interpreter of "Shakespeare" in recent times, the late Sir Henry Irving, took an important part in the compilation of this important Work.

The publishers believe, with no undue exaggeration but in the spirit of honest satisfaction, that they have not come short of their own ideal: and that they have produced for all—the scholar, the general reader, and the judicious book buyer—a Work that cannot be swept away in the advancing tide of successive books, but will justly take its place as the Edition which the widest class of readers will desire to possess for reading, use, and reference.

The illustrations are of the highest order, and have been specially drawn for this Work: they comprise 550 designs embodied in the text, together with a large number of full-page etchings. In addition there is a series of fine reproductions in colour from Shakespeare's Works, after pictures by Daniel Maclise, R.A., Sir J. E. Millais, Bart., P.R.A., Ford Madox Brown, Charles R. Leslie, R.A., J. Northcote, R.A., Sir E. J. Poynter, P.R.A., W. Holman Hunt, Sir John Gilbert, R.A., &c.

Where so many have combined, it is confidently maintained that departmental excellence has been reached.

By special arrangements with the Publishers we are able to offer this unique Work at a price well within the reach of all. We are not offering this Work on the Installment Plan, but by a simple arrangement it has been decided to send each subscriber one volume per month as issued from the Press. The first volume is now ready.

There will be fourteen volumes in all, and the price of each volume is only 4s. 6d., which works out at practically only 1s. per week. All we ask is that a Postal Order for 4s. 6d. should be sent us, together with instructions to send the remaining thirteen volumes as published, one each month, and the volume can be paid for on delivery. All carriage is paid, but no order can be accepted except for the complete set. The Work is printed on a paper of fine surface, especially made to give the best results with the hundreds of pen and ink and half tone illustrations scattered throughout its pages. It is beautifully bound in artistically decorated cloth boards, with an ornamental coloured design in gold by Mr. Talwin Morris. The size of each volume is 9 inches by 7 inches.

On completion of the Work, a Handsome Souvenir in the shape of an impression of the admirable Portrait of Sir Henry Irving as Hamlet, from the painting by Edwin Long, R.A., executed in Photogravure, will be presented to each subscriber.

The size of the engraved surface is 18½ by 13½ inches, with margin suitable for framing. This Portrait has been sold regularly for One Guinea net.

We respectfully intimate to subscribers that all orders will be executed in rotation.

The ATHENÆUM says:

"On the care with which the text itself of the plays has been prepared we have nothing but praise to bestow. . . . The general result of this care and labour is . . . so good that we must congratulate all concerned in it. . . . It is profusely illustrated by Mr. Gordon Browne, whose charming designs, executed in facsimile, give it an artistic value superior, in our judgment, to any illustrated edition of Shakespeare with which we are acquainted."

The SPECTATOR says:

"This handsomely printed edition aims at being popular and practical. Add to these advantages Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations, and enough has been said to recommend an edition which will win public recognition by its unique and serviceable qualities."

The ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE says:

"Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are amongst the most perfect things of the kind we have ever seen."

It can truly be said that it is
AN EDITION
FOR ALL
TIME.

TO MANAGER OF
THE ACADEMY
20 Tavistock Street,
London, W.C.

Please send me, carriage paid, the first volume of the New "Henry Irving Shakespeare," for which I enclose 4s. 6d., I agree to accept the remaining 13 volumes at (4/6 each net) the rate of one each month.

Name.....
Address.....

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated]

[A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER
FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM
YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS
THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND
MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR
SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS

In fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d. net.

THE HAMPSTEAD GARNER. Compiled by "A. M. C." With a Preface by CLEMENT K. SHORTER.

This little volume, it is to be hoped, will not fail to interest all lovers of nature and of poetry; for its object is to bring to their remembrance the praises of the many poets who, linking the present with the past, have from time to time graced Hampstead with their presence, or sung of its beauties in their verse.

NEW NOVELS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LOTUS OR LAUREL?"

SECOND EDITION. In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

HASTY FRUIT. By HELEN WALLACE, Author of
"The Greatest of These," "Lotus or Laurel?" etc.

"An unusually good book, carefully and restrainedly written."

GUARDIAN.

"A tale of merit, with fine character, and good but not insistent moral tone."—TIMES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 5s.

AMOR VERITATIS; or, Love of the Truth.
The Baronet's Story. By M. PENNELL.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt edges, price 5s. net.

CRANMER, Primate of all England.
A Historical Drama. By RALPH RICHARDSON.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 3s. 6d. net.

RADIA; or, New Light on Old Truths. By ALEC C. MORE.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 2s. 6d. net.

REVELATIO DEI; or, The Eternal Revelation of the Triune God. By Rev. BERNARD HERKLOTS, M.A.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER.

ESTABLISHED 1808.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

"The Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1781

JUNE 23, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW. CHAIR OF HUMANITY.

THE University Court of the University of Glasgow will on July 19 or some subsequent date proceed to appoint a Professor to occupy the above Chair which is now vacant.

The Professor will be required to enter on his duties on October 1, 1906, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary is fixed by Ordinance at £1000. The Chair has an Official Residence attached to it.

The appointment is made ad vitam aut culpam and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, 20 copies of his application and 20 copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit on or before July 7, 1906.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,
Secretary of the Glasgow University Court,
91 West Regent Street, Glasgow.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 27, 28, and 29 to fill Vacancies in Scholarships and Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the BURSAR, The Bursary, Little Dean's Yard, Westminster.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.

See Staff (honoursmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—RECTOR, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL, WEST KENSINGTON.—An examination will be held at the above School on Tuesday, June 26, 1906, and on the following days for filling up several vacancies on the foundation.—Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Bursar.

Situation Vacant

KHEDIVIAL SCHOOL OF LAW, CAIRO.

LAW LECTURESHIP.

THE Egyptian Ministry of Education invites applications for the post of Lecturer in the English section of the Khedivial School of Law, Cairo. Salary £615 rising to £820. Candidates must be University men, having either a law degree or other legal qualification, and must have some knowledge of French. The successful applicant will be required in the first instance to lecture (in English) on Roman Law.

Applications, stating age and qualifications, and accompanied by copies only of testimonials, to be sent before July 14, 1906, to DOUGLAS DUNLOP, Esq., Gullane, East Lothian, to whom Candidates may apply by letter for further information.

AUTHOR (B.A. Camb. 25), widely travelled, sound knowledge of India, English literature, French, etc., desires Appointment as Publisher's Reader or other suitable home work occupying a few hours daily.—Address Z., c/o The ACADEMY, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

FISHING in DERBYSHIRE & AROUND;
FISHING in WALES, both by W. M. Gallighan, post 8vo, cloth, new; published at 3s. 6d. net, for 1s. 9d. each, post free.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

MISCELLANEA GENEALOGICA ET HERALDICA, Vol. ii, First Series (about 1870), wanted; good price given.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury. (Vol. i., 1869 for sale.)

BAKER'S Northamptonshire, 5 vols, royal folio, 1822-41
Ballads and Lyrics of Old France, 1872
Ballads in Blue China, 1880 or 1881
Baring-Gould (S.) Iceland, 1863
Were Wolves, 1865
Barker (T.) Art of Angling, 4to, 1653
Barlow (F.) Several Ways of Hunting, Hawking and Fishing, plates, folio, 1671
Barrington (G.) New South Wales, 1810
Botany Bay
Bartsch, Le Peintre Graveur, set or long run
Basile (G.) The Pentamerone, 1848
Batchelar's Banquet, 1603
Beaumont (F.) Poems, 4to, 1640, or any of his Plays
Beaumont and Fletcher's Works, 11 vols, 1843; 1 vol, 1647
Beauty and the Beast, small square child's book, 1811
Beckford, Thoughts on Hunting, 1781, 1796, or 1810, or any old edition
Bede (Cuthbert) Verdant Green, first edition, 1853-1854-1857
Bee (The) Essays on Interesting Subjects, 1759
Behmen (Jacob) Works, 4 vols, 4to, 1764-81
Bell (Curren, E. and A.), Poems, 1846
Bell (T.) Kalgynomia, 8vo, 1821
Belvoir Hunt, Journal of the, any years
Bennett (C. H.) any books with coloured illustrations by, before 1870
Bentham and Muller, Flora Australlensis, 3 vols
Bentham (W.) Handbook British Flora, 2 vols, 8vo
Bentham's (Jeremy) Works, 11 vols, 1843
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

STAMMERING.—The severest and most obstinate cases can now be perfectly and permanently cured by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years; call or write.—Mr. A. C. Schnelle, 112 Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) under takes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. rod. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. rod. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING.—Novels 9d. 1000. Translations, plays, poetry, etc. Miss HANDLEY, Bankside, Berkhamsted.

TYPEWRITING.—AUTHORS' MSS. of all kinds carefully TYPED. 9d. per 1000 after 3000. Knowledge of French, German and Italian. A. U. BOWMAN, 74 Limes Avenue, New Southgate, N.

Art

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

EXHIBITION OF CONTEMPORARY GERMAN ART, PRINCES' GALLERY, KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

NOW OPEN, 10 to 6.

ALPINE CLUB, MILL STREET, CONDUIT STREET.—Large Decorative Panels by J. Kerr Lawson are being exhibited by Messrs. Carfax & Co., every day from 10 till 6. Admission one shilling.

WILLIAM BLAKE.—Exhibition of Paintings and Water-colours. The largest ever brought together in England at CARFAX GALLERY, 24 Bury Street, St. James. 10 till 6. Admission One Shilling.

CLIFFORD'S INN HALL, FRIDAY CLUB EXHIBITION. Works of Art, Ancient and Modern. Open daily from 10 to 6, till July 7. Catalogues one shilling.

EXHIBITION of important PAINTINGS by MANET, from the Faure Collection, at Messrs. SULLEY and Co.'s Galleries, 159 New Bond Street, DAILY, (June 13-30), 10-5. Admission One Shilling, including catalogue.

NEW ROYALTY THEATRE, W.—Friday, June 29, at 3, SAMUEL ARTHUR KING, M.A., in his Recital of Soliloquies from Shakespeare's Plays, and Mr. William Poel's Half-Hour Comedies. Seats at the Theatre and Libraries. "If we could restore the soliloquy, give patience to the audience to listen to it, and the actor elocution to speak it, a great revival would be seen in the British Drama."—Mrs. CRAIGIE.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON

AN ESSAY ON AMERICAN UNION.

By F. S. OLIVER

Illustrated with Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Second Impression.

TIMES.—"Mr. Oliver has chosen his hero well. He has written of what Hamilton's career illustrates and teaches, with great ability, with great enthusiasm and persuasiveness. He has depicted Hamilton with force and clearness, with humour, with sympathy and charm. He has treated a big subject in a large and masterly way. No book has appeared lately which conveys a more valuable lesson or one more tactfully and skilfully unfolded."

OUTLOOK.—"Mr. Oliver has revealed for the first time to the average English reader the significance of an extraordinary personality and the waning of a period; he has thrown reflex light, as he intended, upon the deepest of our problems, and we do not hesitate at all to say that he has written one of the most distinguished books of a decade. Since Lord Rosebery's monograph upon Pitt, to which it is perhaps most nearly related in style and method, there has been no equally acute criticism of the idea of statesmanship and the psychology of popular government."

MR. FREDERICK HARRISON, in the TRIBUNE.—"Mr. Oliver's book does not profess to be a history or a biography, but 'merely an essay on the character and achievements of a man who was the chief figure in a series of striking events.' This is perhaps too modest a claim. . . . As to a biography of Hamilton, a living portrait of the man himself is vigorously drawn in the midst of the historical and political chapters."

STANDARD.—"This clear and philosophic estimate of Hamilton's personality and work."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Mr. Oliver's essay is a masterly performance."

THE POETRY AND PHILOSOPHY OF GEORGE MEREDITH

By GEORGE M. TREVELYAN

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"Mr. Trevelyan's monograph on the poetry and philosophy of George Meredith is an admirable example of literary appreciation. Being at once sympathetic and discreet, it avoids the pitfalls which await the commentator on a living author, and gives the reader precisely the kind of assistance that he needs."

THE CHURCH OF FRANCE

By J. E. C. BODLEY

Author of "France."

Extra crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

TRIBUNE.—"A lucid and thorough analysis of the precise relationship which the Law of Separation has extinguished."

MORNING POST.—"Full of information, and as clear as can be."

SECOND IMPRESSION.

THE LIFE OF ALFRED AINGER

By EDITH SICHEL

Author of "Catherine de' Medici."

With Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations.

Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

TIMES.—"Ainger's peculiar and elfin-like sense of humour, his eloquent and persuasive and golden voice, his inimitable manner, his liveliness, his sensitiveness, his attractiveness, his joy in life, and his lovely gift of filling life with joy; above all, his genius for friendship, and that sweet inviolable loyalty which made his friendships precious—these are all things to treasure and delight in. Miss Sichel has done distinguished work. Her style is animated and sympathetic. She is gifted with very considerable powers of dramatic vision; a most commendable habit of thoroughness."

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

SET IN AUTHORITY. By SARAH JEANNETTE DUNCAN. Author of "An American Girl in London," "The Path of a Star," etc.

SECOND IMPRESSION

ANTHONY BRITTEN. By HERBERT MACILWAINE. Author of "Dinkinbar," "Fate the Fiddler," etc.

SECOND IMPRESSION

HENRY NORTHCOLE. By J. C. SNAITH. Author of "Becke of Cowden," "Mistress Dorothy Marvin," etc.

THE ARENA. By HAROLD SPENDER.

THE HOUSE OF COBWEBBS, and Other Stories. By GEORGE GISSING. Author of "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," etc.

FACE TO FACE. By FRANCISCO ACEBAL. Translated by MARTIN HUME.

CATTLE BRANDS. Stories of Cowboy Life. By ANDY ADAMS. Author of "The Log of a Cowboy," "The Outfit," etc.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LTD., 46 James St., Haymarket.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS OF THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, 1823-1900

Edited by the DOWAGER DUCHESS OF ARGYLL.

With Illustrations. 2 vols, 36s. net.

"It is the charm of autobiography that it enables us not only to see a man as he saw himself, but also to see many traits in him which he certainly never did see, although he unconsciously reveals them. No one will read this autobiography without renewing and enlarging his respect for a very remarkable man."—TIMES.

THE MEMOIRS OF THE LORD OF JOINVILLE

By Mrs. ETHEL WEDGWOOD.

With illustrations, square demy 8vo, 9s. net.

A WEEK AT WATERLOO IN JUNE, 1815

By LADY DE LANCEY. With photogravure portraits and other illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

A VARIED LIFE

A record of military and civil service, of sport and of travel in India, Central Asia, and Persia, 1850-1902. By General SIR THOMAS E. GORDON, K.C.B., K.C.I.E., C.S.I. With portrait, maps, and illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

RESEARCHES IN SINAI

By Prof. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE, D.C.L. LL.D. F.R.S., With Chapters by C. T. CURRELLE, M.A., Officer of the Imperial Order of the Medjidie.

With 186 Illustrations and 4 Maps. Crown 4to, 21s. net.

"This work, with its lavish amount of illustration and wealth of research, is, we have no hesitation in saying, the best book Prof. Petrie has produced, and it will long remain the standard work on this historical peninsula, which links the African and Asiatic continents together."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

WHYMPER'S ALPINE GUIDES

The New Edition of the Guides to Chamonix and Zermatt will be ready Next Week. With numerous Illustrations and Maps, 3s. net each.

SUZANNE

By Miss V. HAWTREY. New 6s. novel.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street.

EDWARD STANFORD'S LIST

JUST PUBLISHED.

STANFORD'S LONDON ATLAS OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY.

QUARTO EDITION.

Containing 50 Coloured Maps, carefully drawn and beautifully engraved. With an Alphabetical List of Names, giving Latitudes and Longitudes. Sixth Edition. Revised and Enlarged. Imperial 4to, price 25s.

JUST PUBLISHED.

STANFORD'S OCTAVO ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY.

Containing 50 Coloured Maps, carefully drawn and beautifully engraved. With an Alphabetical List of Names, giving Latitudes and Longitudes. Third Edition. Revised and Enlarged. Imperial 8vo, price 25s.

JUST PUBLISHED.

STANFORD'S HANDY ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY.

Containing 30 Coloured Maps, carefully drawn and beautifully engraved. With an Alphabetical List of Names giving Latitudes and Longitudes. Second Edition. Revised to date. Size 7½ by 12 in. Price 10s. 6d.

JUST PUBLISHED.

MURRAY'S HANDBOOK FOR IRELAND.

SEVENTH EDITION, thoroughly Revised throughout.

Edited by JOHN COOKE, M.A.

643 pages, 43 Maps and Plans, crown 8vo, 9s.

"The very best guide to Ireland."—FREEMAN'S JOURNAL.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE HANDY GUIDE TO NORWAY.

By THOMAS B. WIELSON, M.A.

With Maps and Appendices on History, Fishing, Photography, Glacier Climbing, and Cycling; and full particulars as to Hotels, Routes, etc.

FIFTH EDITION, thoroughly Revised and Augmented.

296 pp., small, post 8vo, 5s.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 12, 13, and 14, Long Acre, W.C.
Geographer to His Majesty the King.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	587	The Marciana Library at Venice	596
Literature :		A Literary Causerie :
The Undying Past . . . . .	590	Snobbery in Art and Literature	597
The South African War . . . . .	591	Fiction . . . . .	599
Some Phrases and a Method . . . . .	592	The Drama :
Warwick School . . . . .	592	The Stage Society . . . . .	600
Mentem Mortalia Tangunt . . . . .	593	Fine Art :
The Creed and Ethics of		The Paintings of William Blake	600
Materialism . . . . .	594	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	601
Ramsley, without Sonnets . . . . .	595	Correspondence . . . . .	602
The Flight of Youth . . . . .	596	Books Received . . . . .	605

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

A RECORD of the additions to the Civil List Pensions for the year ending March 31 has been laid on the table of the House of Commons, and will be perused with considerable interest by those engaged in the work of literature. It would be ungracious to make any adverse comment on the recipients of these pensions, but it is impossible to avoid asking by what advice the Government acts in this matter. Probably there is no more delicate detail of administration. Poverty in itself can scarcely be a qualification, nor can connection with a celebrated man be always so described. There are some names in this list which will, to say the least of it, call forth a certain mild surprise. However, we append it without further comment.

Those granted in 1905 were :

August 10.—Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Platts—in consideration of the services of her late husband, Mr. John Thompson Platts, to Oriental scholarship in England—£75.

August 10.—Miss Emily Victoria Briscoe—in addition to her existing pension of £30 a year, in recognition of the services rendered to Antarctic exploration by her late brother, Captain John Briscoe, and of her inadequate means of support—£25.

November 30.—Ethel Mary Lewis, Lady Laird Clowes—in consideration of the services of her late husband, Sir William Laird Clowes, to the study of naval questions, and of his ability as a naval historian—£100.

November 30.—Mrs. Emma Leonora Helena Payne—in recognition of the literary merits of her late husband, Mr. Edward John Payne—£120.

November 30.—Miss Jane Dalziel, Miss Grace Dalziel, Miss Dora Dalziel—in consideration of the services of their late father, Mr. Edward Dalziel, to wood engraving and the art of illustration—each £30.

November 30.—Miss Anna Wilkie Lang, Miss Flora Lang—in recognition of the scientific attainments of their late father, Mr. Edward Lang, and of their labours in assisting him in the preparation of logarithmic and mathematical tables (jointly and to the survivor of them)—£120.

December 2.—Margaret Lady Wilson—in consideration of the services rendered to agriculture by her late husband, Sir Jacob Wilson—£90.

December 2.—Dr. Alexander MacBain—in consideration of his services in connection with the study of Celtic philology and literature—£90.

December 2.—Mrs. Annie Howes—in recognition of the scientific attainments of her late husband, Mr. George Baird Howes, LL.D., F.R.S.—£50.

December 4.—Olivia Lady Wilson—in recognition of the services of her late husband, Major-General Sir Charles W. Wilson, K.C.B.—£100.

In 1906 pensions were given to the following :

February 15.—Dr. Charles Immanuel Forsyth Major—in consideration of his services to biological science and of his straitened circumstances—£150.

March 2.—Mr. George Bennett Smith—in addition to his existing pension of £80—in consideration of his services to literature and of his inadequate means of support—£70.

March 2.—Mrs. Katharine S. Macquoid—in addition to her existing pension of £50—in consideration of her contributions to literature and of her inadequate means of support—£70.

March 2.—Mrs. Elizabeth Merivale—in consideration of the literary work of her husband, Mr. Herman Merivale, and of her straitened circumstances—£50.

Total, £1200.

The Australian Commonwealth Copyright Act, 1905, which received the Royal Assent last month, is to be proclaimed and pass into law this week. With some claims to rank as a Code, the Act undoubtedly marks an epoch in the history of Colonial Copyright. It effects, on the lines of Lord Monkswell's Literary and Artistic Copyright Bills, many notable reforms. Copyright includes the right of abridgment, dramatisation and translation. As well as performing right in dramatic and musical works, a lecturing right is created as regards both sermons and lectures. The duration of artistic copyright is assimilated to that of literary copyright, thus establishing homogeneity, but, unfortunately, in the place of the proposed period of Lord Monkswell's Bills—the author's life and thirty years—the old and cumbrous term of life and seven years or forty-two years, whichever be the longer period, has been most unaccountably selected.

Amongst other details we must roughly summarise, "Magazine Copyright" endures for one year only instead of twenty-eight years, as under the Imperial Act of 1842, and the rights of proprietors are strictly limited to publication in their own periodicals. Translations, or abridgments, not the work of the author, must be so declared on the title-page, and after ten years the right of translation, unless exercised, lapses. Notices are made compulsory in the cases of the reservation of performing right in dramatic and musical works. The right of search and seizure is conferred in the case of pirated copies, and penalties provided may be recovered summarily. A simple system of registration is provided for the Commonwealth, but as in England, is only necessary before action brought.

The Act, as foreshadowed in the ACADEMY on November 28, 1903, contains a "manufacturing clause." Primarily, its benefits are conferred upon books, etc., whether by British subjects or not, "printed from type set up in Australia or plates made therefrom or from plates and negatives made in Australia in cases where type is not necessarily used"—an exception which seems to require elucidation. Publication, performance, or delivery must take place either simultaneously with or within fourteen days of first publication, etc. elsewhere. The integrity of Imperial Copyright, of the Berne Convention and International arrangements made by the Imperial Government is, however, sufficiently safeguarded by Part VI., Section 62, which admits literary, musical, dramatic or artistic works "entitled to protection in Australia by virtue of any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom" to the same protection as other works under the Act.

Some doubts seem to be held as to the operation of this section, but it obviously includes all works embraced by the International Copyright Act, 1886, and all works simultaneously published in England with first publication elsewhere. The condition which is attached to this protection is "registration under this part of the Act" and, presumably, the deposit under Sections 75 (1) and (2) of two copies of every book and one, or a photograph, of any work of art required from "every person applying for registration." The position of the United States is, therefore, unaffected by the Act, but remains exactly as before. Subject to simultaneous publication in the British Empire, American works can be protected in Australia in the same way as British works. We propose to deal more fully in a future number with the Act and with the American Copyright Bill now before Congress.

Early next month Scotland will celebrate at St. Andrews the fourth centenary of the birth of George Buchanan, practical statesman, poet, scholar, historian, controversialist, as Dr. Robert Wallace, in his uncompleted monograph, termed the great Scottish humanist. It is remarkable that Scotland has no worthy memorial of Buchanan. "He lived from hand to mouth," Dr. Wallace records.

"During the greater part of his career, he might have prospered in the Church, as Dunbar was willing to do. But he had ideas of his own on that subject, and neither gold nor dignities could tempt him to sell his soul." George Buchanan died so poor that the city of Edinburgh had to bury him at its own expense, and tradition assigns the historic Greyfriars Churchyard as his place of sepulture. An iron tablet with appropriate inscription, affixed to a rod rising from the ground, was placed by a working blacksmith thirty odd years ago as a tribute to this Scots worthy, near the Martyrs' Monument in old Greyfriars, and attracted the attention of pilgrims to the Scottish Santo Campo: but the inscription has long since been obliterated.

About the end of this month Dawley Manor Farm at Harlington, near Uxbridge, will be put up for sale. Dawley Farm was once the residence of Lord Bolingbroke. On his retirement from politics he endeavoured to persuade mankind that he had discovered true happiness in the rural life; and so keenly did he throw himself into his new career as a farmer that he did not disdain to shoulder a prong and help his haymakers. Pope in a letter to Swift draws an amusing picture of Bolingbroke standing between two hay-ricks reading one of the dean's letters, and ever and anon casting up his eyes to heaven, not in ecstatic admiration of what the dean had written, but to see if it were going to rain. When his lordship had to run after a cart, Pope managed to insert in his letter that Bolingbroke had offered a painter two hundred pounds to paint the hall with rakes, spades, and other agricultural implements in keeping with the character of a farm. The summer-house, however, was adorned with quotations from the classics.

At Dawley Bolingbroke kept open house. There might be seen Gay, fat and indolent, with illimitable talk. Thither, too, came Swift with the manuscript of "Gulliver's Travels" in his pocket. Swift hated the French cookery at Dawley: when he asked for beef, he said, he wished to be able to see that it was beef, and when they brought him fowl he wished to be able to see that it was fowl. Another famous visitor was Voltaire. In 1739 Bolingbroke, ever in pecuniary difficulties, was glad to sell Dawley, and much of it was then pulled down. But the steward's apartments, or what was originally a laundry, still remain.

The recent disastrous fire at Faringdon House, Bucks, recalls the memory of the Laureate who preceded Southey. Henry James Pye inherited the Faringdon estate, and as the house was much damaged by a fire, he built the present mansion in 1780. Ten years later he was made Poet Laureate, not because of the excellence of his verses—for probably the most poetical thing that he ever did was to plant a clump of trees in a happy situation—but because he was a warm adherent of Mr. Pitt. His loyalty was unquestionable, and he regularly treated the king's birthday with an ode that breathed the most ardent patriotism. He was known for his frequent allusions to vocal groves and feathered choirs, so that on one occasion a wit, on taking up his ode, exclaimed:

And when the Pye was opened
The birds began to sing;
And wasn't that a dainty dish
To set before the King?

Pye was of ancient family and unimpeachable morality: indeed, there was nothing about him that was not respectable except his poetry.

There is nothing new under the sun. Mr. Kay Robinson's proposition that the lower creatures do not perceive pain, as described in last week's ACADEMY, has a most curious resemblance to Descartes's theory of the animal-automate. Animals, said the great Frenchman, do not really feel.

They are merely perfect machines. You tread on a dog's tail and he squeals. The act is as purely mechanical as the opening of a doll's eyes if you touch a hidden spring. Unhappily, this idea of Descartes had an immense vogue, especially among the Christian philosophers who were anxious to keep man distinct from the brutes that perish. To our mind, much of the callousness displayed by the French to-day towards animal suffering is due to the gradual filtration of this pernicious heresy through all classes of society. Let us hope that Mr. Kay Robinson's book will not lead to a similar result in England.

"Week-ending" is not so new a practice as some suppose. An early "week-ender" was Samuel Pepys. We find in his Diary that he was so much pleased with a Sunday trip to Epsom in July 1667, that he determined to repeat the performance frequently. "Mrs. Turner mightily pleased with my resolution, which, I tell her, is never to keep a country-house, but to keep a coach, and with my wife on the Saturday to go sometimes for a day to this place, and then quit to another place; and there is more variety and as little charge, and no trouble, as there is in a country-house."

Besides the "seventeen extremely rare pre-Shakespearean Plays, original sixteenth-century editions, the property of a gentleman in Ireland," of which we made notice in our issue of the 2nd instant as forming part of the four days' sale of books* to be conducted by Messrs. Sotheby on the 27th, 28th, 29th and 30th of this month, there will be a remarkable array of First Editions, Illuminated and other Manuscripts, Autograph letters, Nelson Documents, and other notable books. Amongst the first editions are Shirley's The Maide's Revenge, a Tragedy, as acted with good applause at Drury Lane, 1639; Spenser's Colin Clout's Come Home Again, 1595; Addison's Cato, 1713; Jane Eyre, 3 vols., 1847; Byron's Hours of Idleness, Newark, 1807; Poems on Several Occasions, 1713, by Henry Carey, the author of "Sally in our Alley"; Martin Chuzzlewit (with some of the original proof sheets); The Vicar of Wakefield, 1766; She Stoops to Conquer, 1773; Decker's The Dead Tearme, black letter, 1608; Dryden's The Hind and the Panther, 1687 (the present copy was sold at Messrs. Sotheby's in 1903 for £19 10s.); Fletcher's Purple Island, 1633; The Deserted Village, 1770; Gay's Panegyric Epistle to Mr. Thomas Snow, Goldsmith, 1721; Paradise Lost, 1669; and Paradise Regained, 1671; Jane Porter's Scottish Chiefs, 5 vols., 1810; Shirley's Hide Parke, a Comedie, 1637; Sir Robert Stapylton's Musæus, or the Loves of Hero and Leander, 1647; Sterne's Sentimental Journey, 2 vols., 1768; Suckling's Fragmenta Aurea, 1646; A Fool's Preference, or the Three Dukes of Dunstable, by Thomas D'Urfey, 1688; Goldsmith's Good-Natured Man, 1768; Spencer's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., 1590-5; White's Selborne, 1789; and many of Ruskin's, Swinburne's, Tennyson's and Thackeray's books.

Of editions of Shakespeare there are two copies of the First Folio, one of the Second and two copies of the Fourth; also an edition of Macbeth, Edin., "printed for Allen Ramsay and sold at his shop, price One Shilling," 1731—the first edition of the first of Shakespeare's plays printed in Scotland; the first illustrated edition of Shakespeare, that published by Jacob Tonson, 6 vols., 1709; and of Shakespeariana there is a great deal. Three Scottish lots of interest, described respectively as the property of a Nobleman, the property of a Gentleman and the property of a Gentleman in Scotland, are the John Knox's Book of Common Order in Gaelic, translated by the Rev. John Carswell and printed in 1567, an extremely rare book; an autograph song by Burns, entitled "Nancy," and a long letter from Burns to the Rev. John Skinner at Peterhead, the author of "Tullochgorum's My Delight," which Burns describes as the "best Scotch song ever Scotland saw." There are several very interesting manuscripts in the handwriting of Thomas Campbell and a letter from Charles Dickens referring to the terrible accident at Staplehurst, on June 9, 1865, in which he narrowly escaped injury. The carriage in which he travelled left the line, but did not, with others, fall over the viaduct.

"What should an annual report of a Public Library contain?" was a paper read in the absence of the writer (Mr. Willcock, Peterborough) by Mr. Bond, Woolwich, on Monday, at the last monthly meeting of the present session of the Library Association. The object of the annual report is the information of the Committee and the Town Council and the increase of the popularity of the library with the general public. The majority of the reports at present drawn up and presented are of little practical value for either of these purposes, in a great measure because of their lack of uniformity, shown chiefly in the want of a general system of close classification. One of the most common features of the average report is its superfluity, and the desired advertisement is better obtained by means of a "chatty" article in the local press. The many tables and forms of statistics now issued in a report could be made more plain to the Committee, more digestible to the Town Council, and more interesting to the general public, if they were arranged in a narrative form.

The financial statement so often omitted from reports is actually the most important table (Mr. Brown, Islington). Without it the ordinary report is a complete waste of money, and it would be advisable for the Association to issue a Library Year Book, and defray the cost by subscriptions obtained from municipal bodies (Mr. Baker, Woolwich). The full report of the American library is a valuable asset, and if adopted here should be largely distributed (Mr. Sayers, Islington). The Croydon report is to be displayed in the waiting-rooms of the railway stations, in restaurants, and cafés. Much of the adverse criticism of public libraries is due to the secrecy surrounding the working of municipal authorities (Mr. Jast, Croydon). Mr. Baker's suggestion was ultimately adopted as a recommendation to the Council of the Association.

The duty of the Association in relation to newly appointed Library Authorities was discussed under the second paper, which was really a statement on behalf of the Council of the Association. The Council proposes to publish a handbook, founded in some measure on the Handbooks of American Libraries, although perhaps not so elaborate, for the guidance of these infant library committees. It will recommend the co-option of outside members, and the delegation of the full powers of the library authority under section 15 of the 1892 Act. The Association will strongly recommend the appointment of a trained librarian at an early date. Where the library authority cannot defray the cost of a qualified librarian the Association will, if requested, appoint an advisory librarian. It will also recommend the appointment of competent architectural assessors for plans for new libraries, and the limitation of a competition to a reasonable number of invited architects (Mr. Brown, Islington). At the same time, the appointment of a librarian is much to be preferred to the appointment of an advisory librarian, wherever such a course is possible (Mr. Preece, Stoke Newington).

The British Museum authorities have taken a retrograde step in the imposition of fees for permission to photograph objects in the Museum. The minimum fee is two shillings for one photograph. If by time, the fee is two shillings for the first hour, and a shilling for every hour after.

From whatever point the subject is viewed it appears to be in the nature of a tax on knowledge, and one quite alien from the principles of the institution, and, in fact, of all public libraries. It may be urged that these photographs are for the purpose of reproduction, and so of profit to the photographer. But by far the greater number of readers at the Museum are engaged in literary work, and as reasonably might be charged for admission on some arbitrarily prescribed scale. It is difficult to see any way in which the photographer incurs expense to the authorities, in excess of the ordinary reader, which would justify the proposal. The matter was brought up at the meeting of the Library Association, and although the meeting was strongly opposed to the imposition of these fees, it was decided to defer the matter to the annual meeting.

To the many columns of "copy" that have been produced over the recent unveiling of a monument to Dumas filis, M. Paul Bourget's contribution is especially remarkable. M. Bourget, who knew Dumas, would have us believe that the son of the "ventripotent mulatto" was an adherent of the simple life—at any rate after he was sixty. He liked to dine out, indeed, but left at eleven, so that he might be able to get up at six, and his diet, even when he was a guest, was of the plainest sort. Alcohol he avoided; and, though he had been a great smoker, yet he lived to hate tobacco. He attributed his good health to his abstinence: "these little things are of such great importance," he said on one occasion in a conversation upon health, pointing to some one who was emitting clouds of smoke. Like Tchaikowsky, he believed in walking for two hours a day, and he held that every one should sleep for seven hours.

Some of his sayings are worthy of our recollection. "In marriage, when love exists habit destroys it, but when it does not exist habit engenders it." "Life is impossible except to those who are indifferent and to those who can forget." "The people in the street—do you know whither they are bound? They are all going to ask some one for something." "A woman's past is like a coal-pit: you must not apply a light to it or there will be an explosion." Is it fair to add that Dumas was gifted with such penetrating eyes that women were known to run away from him as soon as he looked at them?

Visitors to Rouen this summer will perhaps be tempted to make an excursion to the Flaubert Museum, which has just been opened in Croisset, some seven miles away. The little house where Flaubert sometimes stayed has been saved from demolition by the energy of friends. The interior has been fitted up as a museum, containing an old-fashioned arm-chair, the table on which his masterpieces were written, some quill-pens, an inkstand, and one of the little pipes that he loved to smoke. Besides these, a gilded idol, representing Buddha, a few letters, and a novel containing notes in Flaubert's handwriting, make up all the objects that the museum possesses for the moment. It is not very much, but it is a typical example of the length to which Frenchmen go in perpetuating the memory of their literary heroes. What, we wonder, would be the fate of a museum of the relics of an equally famous English author, opened (say) in a village seven miles from York? Would it be visited by any one but Americans?

The following additions have lately been made to the National Gallery, and the National Gallery of British Art: "Sunny Days in the Forest," by N. Diaz—hung in Room XVII. at Trafalgar Square; marble busts of Mr. and Mrs. Wynn Ellis, by Sir Edgar Boehm, R.A.—placed in the eastern vestibule of the entrance hall at Trafalgar Square; a picture entitled "The Last Load," by John Linnell, to be hung in Room III. in the Gallery of British Art; a marble bust of Mr. W. P. Frith, R.A., by John Thomas—placed in Room III. at Millbank. The Trustees and Director have purchased, out of the interest of the Clarke Bequest Fund, "Diana of the Uplands," by the late Mr. C. W. Furse, A.R.A. The picture is hung in Room IX. at Millbank.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Physical Society of London.—A meeting of the Society will be held at 5 P.M. on Friday, June 22, at the Royal College of Science, Exhibition Road, South Kensington. Agenda: (1) Mr. A. A. Campbell Swinton—The effect of radium in facilitating the visible electric discharge in vacuo; (2) Mr. A. O. Allen—A comparison between the Peltier effect and other reversible heat effects; (3) Mr. T. A. Vaughton—The effect of the electric spark on the activity of metals; (4) Dr. P. E. Shaw—Dielectric strength of thin liquid films; (5) Dr. W. H. Eccles—The effect of electrical oscillations on iron in a magnetic field.

The Jewish Historical Society of England.—A meeting of the Society will be held on Monday, June 25, at University College, Gower Street, W.C., at 8.30 P.M. Agenda: Exhibition of the following lantern slides, with explanatory comments: (1) "The Return of the Jews to England," by Sir Isidore Spielmann; (2) "The Crawford Hagadah," by Israel Abrahams, Esq., M.A.; (3) "Some Members of the Whitehall Conference," by Israel Solomons, Esq.; (4a) "Menasseh ben Israel's Marriage Certificate"; (4b) "Simon de Montfort's Leicester Charter," by the Rev. S. Levy, M.A.

A special meeting of the British Empire Shakespeare Society is to be held at the Garrick Theatre on the afternoon of Monday, July 2. Mr. Sidney Lee, the President, will take the chair at 2.30. The Bishop of Ripon will give an address on Shakespeare Plays. Lady Bancroft will distribute the Society's prizes. Miss Ellen Terry, Sir Squire Bancroft, and others will speak. Tickets for non-members may be obtained of the hon. sec., Miss Greta Morritt, 17 Southwell Gardens, S.W.

Exhibition of Works of Contemporary German Artists in London.—A musical reception on Friday, June 22, at the Prince's Galleries, Knightsbridge; music at 5 P.M., tea at 4 P.M. Messrs. Mark Hambourg and Boris Hambourg will perform.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, June 27-30. Sale of books and manuscripts, historical and literary documents, autograph letters, etc.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Friday, June 22. Sale of engravings (framed and in the portfolio), comprising mezzotint portraits after Sir J. Reynolds and others, fancy subjects after G. Morland, engravings after J. M. W. Turner, including several plates from the Liber Studiorum, etchings by Whistler, Méryon, Cameron and others, and mezzotints after Constable by Lucas.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge.—Monday and Tuesday, June 25 and 26. Sale of works of art, including English pottery, many pieces of which came from the Soden Smith Collection; English needlework, the property of Miss Betts, and old watches, the property of Mrs. A. Edenborough.

LITERATURE

THE UNDYING PAST

All that was Possible. By HOWARD OVERING STURGIS. (Constable, 6s.)

IF the province of a novel be something more than to be read for amusement in an easy chair or on a sofa, no fault can be found with the somewhat disagreeable theme chosen by Mr. Sturgis. The events narrated in it are by no means impossible, and it cannot be said by any fair and judicious reader that the author has tried to gild vice or to make it attractive. The chief character in the book is a woman with a past, and a very immediate past, since the story opens while she is passing from one state of life to another. We may as well say here that the tale is told in a series of letters written to an intimate female friend, and the first of these tells how Lord Medmenham, with whom the girl had lived, had deserted her to marry another woman. She does not play the martyr over this in the slightest degree. She has also the satisfaction of having been a good friend to Lord Medmenham. She is able to say with evident sincerity:

Lady Florence has me to thank that her future husband is in every way a pleasanter person to live with than he was before he knew me. I cured him of gambling: he only did it because he was bored; and of drinking brandy and soda in the morning. I never could get him to read books, it is true. "Damn it all, Sibby," he used to say, "it is not in the bond; I never engaged you as a governess." But I did succeed in giving him a taste for music, and taught him to sing quite passably; he has a very pretty voice, and an ear that only wanted cultivation.

Even assuming her, then, to be an erring sister, she was by no means one of the worst of her kind, and when the rupture came she betook herself, after a little hesitation, to a quiet cottage in Wales, where she lived, if not in the "odour of sanctity," at least quietly and respectably. But the consequences of a false step dog one through life. A young man, whose family was the most important one in the neighbourhood, happens to meet her incidentally and becomes very much attracted, even if he does not fall in love, though he is obviously very near doing that; but his friends, having some fama of the lady's reputation, interfere with more energy than was required, since she was absolutely on their side and very far indeed from wishing to lead the boy astray. He, indeed, is easily got rid of, but in the course of the proceedings she forms the acquaintance of his cousin, Mr. Robert Henshaw, who is the Admirable Crichton of the district, his mind full of a severe morality, although he is by nature kindly and even generous. Very gradually and delicately is the tale unfolded. Robert Henshaw discloses a tenderness and warmth of heart that gradually incline the heart of the woman towards him. The state of his feelings is made evident during a visit that they paid together to the quarries from which the immense incomes of the Henshaw family are drawn. While underground, he induces her to listen to the explosion used for blasting purposes, and this is what happened during her fright.

Suddenly it came, like a cannon going off; it was not so loud as I had feared, nor sharp, but somehow I seemed to have waited so long that it was as unexpected as though I had not waited at all, like the deaths of very old people. I gave a little involuntary scream, and stepped back, forgetting that I was on a stone, lost my balance, and should have fallen if Mr. Henshaw had not caught me. And now we come to what I am half unwilling to tell you. For one second I was conscious that he clasped me more tightly than was necessary to save me from falling, and at the same time I felt his lips just touch my cheek.

A very pretty courtship ensues, but the tragic thing in the situation may be judged from the following letter, which we give after jumping over a large number of pages:

I can't write it all down, nor tell you how it came to me that I had mistaken him utterly, and what he really wanted. When, at last, his meaning forced itself on me, I started back with a sudden cry. He took my hands and tried to draw me to him again. My voice sounded in my ears as though it came from some one else, quite strange and unlike myself. "See," I said, "how six months in the country have restored my sense of modesty; your proposition quite startled me," and I laughed, a hard, discordant laugh, with no mirth in it.

Do you see, Milly? it had never once occurred to him as a possibility that he should marry me. What I had taken for the struggle of his love with his worldly prudence, was really between his growing passion and his principles, his virtue, his religion, whatever it was that taught him to regard an irregular connection with a woman as sinful. He had never for a moment dreamed of any other as possible after a past like mine. I had looked on him as an angel—a redeemer—and he had regarded me as something pleasant but wrong, a temptation of St. Anthony, to be resisted if possible; and, when resistance became irksome, to be yielded to, and enjoyed in secret.

Such in bald outline is the story that Mr. Sturgis has set before his readers. It is sad and painful because it shows that while error on the part of a man is easily forgiven and forgotten, a similar error on the part of a woman, even when accompanied by much that makes for honour and loftiness of conduct, is regarded as a stain that cannot be eradicated. We can very well understand that there was a period in the history of society when it was necessary that women who departed from the conventional rule should meet with a certain amount of disapproval, but when this disapproval merges into relentless persecution and hatred, it has ceased to possess anything that can give it justification. The case presented by Mr. Sturgis is an eminently sensible and reasonable one, and it will be no mean reward for his efforts if he should be able to induce the world to take a kindlier view of those whom the clergyman calling on Mrs. Crofts called "erring sisters."

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR

The Times History of the War in South Africa, 1899-1902.
General Editor, L. S. AMERY. Vol. iv., edited by BASIL
WILLIAMS. (Sampson Low, 21s. net.)

THOSE upon whose shelves the first three volumes of this monumental work have an honourable place may find some difficulty in comparing the merits of vol. iv. with those of its predecessors. For there has been a rather unfortunate break in the continuity of the editorial arrangements of this remarkable history. Of what had previously appeared Mr. Amery had been, in the main, the compiler as well as the editor. In the composition of the present volume Mr. Amery's work has been almost exclusively confined to criticism and suggestion. Mr. Basil Williams is an able and conscientious deputy, whose previous connection with the Army adds a happily sympathetic quality to a style marked by clearness and restraint. But the transference of editorial responsibility, however desirable for the purpose of expediting the production of the work, has interfered somewhat with its coherence, and has tended to diminish its personal authority. It is now a little uncertain to what extent Mr. Amery holds himself responsible for the very frank and sometimes very damaging criticism in which the Times History necessarily abounds, the term "General Editor" in such a connection being a little indefinite. Possibly to the general reader the point may not seem one of very great importance. But a commander, for instance, who has been hauled over the coals in one of the four chapters, for the original drafts of which indebtedness is expressed to "two officers who prefer to remain anonymous," will probably like to know exactly how far Mr. Amery is associated with Mr. Basil Williams and the two officers of retiring disposition in responsibility for the reprimand in question.

In any case, the General Editor must answer for a rather doubtful proposition in his own preface. He asks whether crushing victory in the field was attainable in this campaign, or whether we must infer that, in the pursuit of secondary objects:

the only primary and certain means, the destruction of the enemy's forces, was too much left out of sight or only half-heartedly essayed. It is [continues Mr. Amery] for the reader to judge for himself: this volume will supply him with ample material for his judgment.

We are puzzled to know why the reader should be left to judge for himself on a point of such essential significance. Surely it is the historian's, more particularly, perhaps, the military historian's part to clear up any such dubiety, or, at least, to give us a clear expression of opinion on the subject. The failure in the present instance to do so is the more singular since there must be few histories in existence in which, generally speaking, the law is laid down with greater confidence than that which, for the most part justifiably, pervades the work of Mr. Amery and his colleagues.

One more snarl before proceeding to the more gracious work of commendation. It will be remembered by those who studied vol. iii. that chapters dealing with the siege of Kimberley and with the closing weeks of the siege of Ladysmith were mentioned as being "held over" for want of space. These chapters have now been supplied, but their insertion at the end of vol. iv. is most unsatisfactory, and goes far to destroy the lucidus ordo of the whole work. To be brought back, more especially, to the close of the Ladysmith siege, long after the termination of Buller's advance through Natal, and in a chapter subsequent even to that recounting the return of Lord Roberts to England, is positively exasperating, and it is much to be hoped that in any future edition of the History this deplorably faulty arrangement will be rectified.

The above defect is the more to be regretted since otherwise the scheme of the present volume is shipshape and coherent. It includes the operations carried out under the chief command of Lord Roberts, from the date of the entry into Bloemfontein to that of the Field-Marshal's return to England.

It is a period, viewed broadly, of almost continued success. In it Lord Roberts's victorious armies march from end to end of the republics, occupy all the chief towns, and make themselves masters of the whole system of railways; it opens with wholesale surrenders of burghers and closes with the dispersal of the last organised Boer army. Yet that success is from time to time marred by regrettable minor incidents, and, as the event proved, it lacked the quality of completeness. The essential object of all war, the imposition of the will of one people upon another by breaking its spirit of resistance, was not attained.

Such is Mr. Amery's neat and lucid summary of fourteen chapters, in all but one of which—that dealing with the plan of the great advance from Bloemfontein—there is a continuous record of movements and fighting, never so desperate as at Colenso and Magersfontein, but sometimes quite sufficiently thrilling and always vividly instructive. After the necessary digression caused by the incidents of Sannah's Post and Reddersburg, and the sturdy defence of Wepener, we are shown Lord Roberts sweeping irresistibly up to Pretoria. Then, in successive chapters, Buller's advance through Natal, the Western Advance, and Rundle's operations in the Eastern Free State, are carefully detailed. Returning to Pretoria, we have a chapter devoted to Diamond Hill, and another to the tangled operations in the Brandwater Basin, of which the Prinsloo surrender was the extremely satisfactory outcome. The movements under Hutton, Baden Powell, and Ian Hamilton in the Western Transvaal, and the futile performances of the Rhodesian Field Force, are followed by the brighter story of the advance to Middelburg. Finally the "First De Wet Hunt" and the "Advance to Komati Poort," bring us to the close of Lord Roberts's command, the effect of his victories in England and on the Continent, the general belief that the War was practically at an end and the disquieting indications to the contrary.

In any such scheme much must depend upon the estimate formed of the character and work of the chief performer, and here the Times History of the War is never likely to be surpassed for fairness, discrimination and plainness of speech. The final estimate is, of course, eulogistic—it could not be otherwise. Lord Roberts's magnificent optimism, his vigour, his splendid promptitude in rectifying mistakes, whether of his own or of his subordinates' making, his wisdom in securing the railways, his truly Irish tact and sympathy in dealing with his men—these and other fine attributes of this great commander are adequately and even generously recognised. But no disposition is shown to slur over defects and errors of judgment, and the Field Marshal's repeated misapprehension of the nature of the Boer resistance is carefully insisted on. He is freely blamed for his application to South Africa of the punitive processes in vogue on the Indian Frontier, and the policy of farm-burning is condemned in terms which will probably commend themselves to the majority of thoughtful readers. Of Lord Roberts's strategy perhaps the most interesting criticism is that dealing with the misconception which led to the highly regrettable incident known as "Sannah's Post." If anything, however, the conclusion, which dwells on a "want of definiteness" in regard to Broadwood's position at Thaba 'Nchu, errs on the side of leniency. Certainly, Thaba 'Nchu should have been regarded as a detached post, and should have been properly supported. Lord Roberts's failure to close that important gap was one of the most serious and far-reaching mistakes of the war. At the same time, it is pleasant and easy to agree with the Times historian in admitting that, as soon as the Field Marshal understood the danger in which Broadwood was placed, "he showed the rapidity of decision habitual with him in a crisis," and took all reasonable steps to render assistance.

The ineffectiveness of certain lesser commanders in this and other cases in which opportunities were lost is, on the whole, very fairly weighed. But many will question whether Buller might not have been less freely "nagged at" for the slowness of his advance after the Relief of Ladysmith. The physical difficulties with which he had to contend are certainly not over-stated in the chapter which, we are told, is almost exactly as it came from the hands of Lord Lucas, formerly Mr. Auberon Herbert. Comparison, too, of the progress achieved by Roberts and Buller respectively makes insufficient allowance for the fact that a force which is pulling itself together after such experiences as those undergone round and in Ladysmith cannot be expected to move with the élan of one which has met with very few obstacles from the start.

The most completely satisfactory piece of work in the book is the account of the "Sannah's Post" incident, a stirring as well as admirably clear narrative, for which the original draft was supplied by Mr. Lionel James. The chapters on the sieges of Ladysmith and Kimberley would have been, as already explained, more warmly appreciated if they had not been so awkwardly misplaced. That on the Kimberley siege is marked by a just appreciation of the extremely troublesome, but not altogether surprising attitude maintained by Mr. Rhodes. There is an adequate and brightly written chapter on the siege of Mafeking, for which Mr. S. T. Sheppard furnished the draft. The maps and plans and the numerous portraits leave nothing to be desired.

SOME PHRASES AND A METHOD

The Works of Ben Jonson. Vol. i. Edited by H. C. HART. (Methuen, 6d. net paper, 1s. net cloth.)

WE have often expressed our surprise at the continued existence of the "Introduction" to reprints of classical authors and wondered what good purpose it served or whose needs it met. Of late the semi-critical, æsthetic appreciation (we think that is the right word) has bifurcated, and there are now, commonly, two kinds. The more innocent of these consists of a few biographical facts, necessary, perhaps, in these days of hurry, to save the reader the trouble of looking up his author in a biographical dictionary; a few bibliographical details concerning the work; and the reader is then left to form an independent judgment. Of the other kind, the best we can say is that it probably forms a pleasant occupation for the writers thereof.

These thoughts have been again brought forcibly before us by the publication of the first volume of a cheap reprint of the works of Ben Jonson, containing the three plays, The Case is Altered, Every Man in his Humour, Every Man out of his Humour, edited by Mr. H. C. Hart. Any attempt to bring the writings of Ben Jonson into the hands of a wider circle of readers is most commendable, and for the intention, and the act, so far as it goes, we are duly grateful. True, the presumed requirements of the modern reader have been met by levelling down the fancies of Elizabethan spelling and punctuation (be they author's, or printer's); stage directions have been added after the fashion of Dyce and other earlier editors of the Elizabethans (editors who would not leave anything to the imagination of readers, and who desired to regard the conditions of the Elizabethan stage as akin to those of modern times, without reference to historical accuracy); and the lines have been duly numbered, giving the page the appearance of a schoolbook, though for what purpose we fail to understand, for there are no notes. But all these are "sma' sums," and they may be forgiven if one more person becomes acquainted with "rare Ben" by the publication of this edition.

When we turn, however, to the forty-four pages of introduction, we see how hardly the bad old custom dies. There are a few interesting references which the reader will welcome: they would have been more useful in the form of notes, but cadit quæstio. Of what use is it to tell a beginner on p. xiv. that Volpone is by many "considered his finest play," on p. xv. that the Alchemist

"many regard as his masterpiece," and on p. xxxiv. that Every Man in his Humour "is generally held to be one of Jonson's best works"? What kind of feeling will he acquire towards Jonson's Epistles and Epigrams by being told that "many of these are graceful gems in their kind" (p. xviii.), or that "Timber" "gives abundant insight into his . . . visible common sense"? Wherein does invisible common sense differ from visible? And what is to be said of phrases such as the following scattered throughout these pages: "Hosts of characters appear, like the cuckoo in June, heard but not regarded. All are subservient to a few pillars of the play, who utter very beautiful poetry"; "He takes and keeps an interest in his story and contributes it to his audience" (p. xxiii.); "Human follies are ephemeral in their kind, but crimes are unvarying, hence it is that his plays were not for all time but for an age, except historically" (p. xxv.)? Mr. Hart's sentences defy analysis: it is possible with careful study to make out what he means, but his inversions are most irritating: take for instance the passage at the foot of p. xliii.:

There is an old play of Timon, written in Dyce's opinion about 1600, who reprinted it from a MS. for the Shakespeare Society, to which Shakespeare appears to have been slightly indebted in his Timon of Athens. It is reprinted in Shakespeare's Library (2nd edition, 1875), a strange would-be-scholastic production, aping Lucian, which may be described in the words of one of the huge-named characters, "O foolisher than foolishness itself."

We tremble to think what would happen to a public-school boy if he wrote such sentences as these: they occur in a responsible editor's introduction to the plays of one of the greatest of English dramatists.

That Mr. Hart should regard Gifford's notoriously faulty text as "excellent" (p. xxvi.), and that he should have thought it necessary to collate the 1609 edition of The Case is Altered "with Gifford's text for the present issue" (p. xxviii.), indicate with sufficient clearness the editor's textual standard. Serious students of Ben Jonson will await with impatience the long promised edition of Professor Herford. May he, and all other editors of texts, bear in mind a passage from Professor Saintsbury's recently published "History of English Prosody," a passage that ought to be written in letters of gold and kept in front of all who deal in texts:

The editions of Chaucer now current [says he] are constructed with a view of piecing together from this MS. and that, even (where the MSS. will not help) from this printed text and that "critical" text, things that shall comply with the notions as to Middle English grammar, prosody, and pronunciation, which have been ex-cogitated by guesswork, or, if that seem too uncivil, by inferential hypothesis, during the last half century or more. Now in reference to these "critical" texts there is always an irrefutable logical aporia lying in wait. Any single MS., however bad, may be a copy at first or second-hand, careful or careless, of the original. A blending of two or three or more is less and less likely to represent any actual original at all.

WARWICK SCHOOL

History of Warwick School, with notices of the Collegiate Church, Gilds, and Borough of Warwick. By A. F. LEACH, M.A. (Constable, 10s. net.)

MR. LEACH's reputation as a sound and scholarly writer on educational foundations is well established, and it will be further enhanced by this timely volume. Much attention will shortly be directed to the ancient and picturesque borough of Warwick, by the pageant of historical incidents about to be held in the singularly apt setting of the castle grounds. Such a book as this will prove a treasury of accurate information to those who may desire to possess a genuine memorial of most of the events which will be then portrayed; for the story of Warwick School goes back to very early days, and is so closely interwoven with the town in all its aspects that Mr. Leach's book yields much as to the castle, the great earldom, the borough, and the collegiate church.

The more recent history of Warwick school has been so comparatively uneventful that few, save those of the county or district, would call it to mind when thinking of the first score or two of old-established schools of this country. And yet various almost forgotten circumstances gave it no small share of fame and importance for several centuries of its earlier life. As Mr. Leach says :

Warwick School up to the middle of the eighteenth century occupied the place which Rugby has occupied since, and if it had been developed by a governing body of trustees with a single eye to its development, and not with an eye to their own interests or supposed interests, it might well have continued to occupy the position which Rugby has now taken, and the town of Warwick, with far greater advantages to start with, could have thriven as the towns of Rugby and Bedford have thriven on the progress of the school.

The King's Grammar School of Warwick is one of the very few English schools that can boast of a pre-Norman antiquity. There are three, and probably only three, of greater age, namely, the schools of St. Paul's, London, St. Peter's, York, and the King's School, Canterbury; and yet in none of these can the link of the past with the present, in continuous connection, be satisfactorily established in the same clear way as is the case with Warwick. Every one who has had occasion to study the ancient history of Warwick, and certainly every Warwickshire man with the least claim to be considered an antiquary, must, we should think, have studied the ancient register or chartulary of the Collegiate Church of the county town, which is preserved at the Public Record Office. This authoritative transcript of ancient charters, from which Dugdale cites largely both in the "History of Warwickshire," and in the "Monasticon," is in excellent condition and consists of two hundred and thirty-two folios. Among the earliest of these charters is one of "Henry, King of the English" (Henry I.), addressed to the Bishops of Worcester and Chester and to Earl Roger and all the barons of Warwickshire, commanding that the Church of All Saints, Warwick, should continue to hold the customs and the school of the town, as they used to have them in the times of Edward the Confessor, of William the Conqueror and of William Rufus. This particular document has not lain dormant in an ancient chartulary, but was set forth at length in the third volume of the "Monasticon" so long ago as 1673. Mr. Leach has not, therefore, in any true sense of the word, discovered the antiquity of the school; but, although it has been in print for far more than two centuries in a work constantly handled by every ecclesiological or historical student, marvellous to relate, Dr. Way, the present headmaster of Rossal, who was headmaster of Warwick from 1885 to 1896, was actually unaware of the antiquity of the school of which he was chief, and applied to Mr. Leach in 1895 for information. Mr. Leach himself did not know this Dugdale-given fact until asked the question by Dr. Way, and seems to have been astonished when this charter statement "leaped to sight" in the columns of the old historian.

There is good reason, however, to be thankful that Dr. Way aroused Mr. Leach's interest in the history of the school both ancient and modern, for the result has been the production of a very interesting volume, which no one who is in any way concerned with Warwick can afford to neglect. The origin of Warwick, and the union of the old collegiate castle church of All Saints with the later collegiate foundation of St. Mary's, and the dissolution and refoundation of the ancient school are fully discussed and illustrated by a variety of documents that have hitherto been unknown or but sparsely cited. The nineteenth-century story of the school is enlivened by a most piquant and vivid narrative, contributed by the Rev. James Baly, Archdeacon of Calcutta, who became a pupil at Warwick in 1832 when of the age of eight; it is reprinted from recent issues of the Portcullis, the school paper. The large churchyard of St. Mary's was the only available space for sports, for the school playground had been for many years confiscated to serve as the headmaster's kitchen-garden. A vivid account is given of the steeples and tombs and graves, and of the falling of the sexton with the upturned bones. The following brief paragraph from these reminiscences is of interest during the present educational storm, as showing how scanty was the theological school training of the time of the great Reform Bill, and yet it sufficed to produce a learned Archdeacon :

Our religious instruction in school began and ended with writing out and learning on Saturday the following Sunday's Collect.

The preface concludes with a remarkable acknowledgment. Mr. Leach states that all those interested in his book owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Gore, who, when Bishop of Worcester, allowed him "the use at home of the Episcopal Registers." Against such action on the part of Dr. Gore every antiquary and historical student in the land ought to utter a protest. The early diocesan registers of English sees are of absolutely priceless value, and under no pretext whatsoever ought they to be allowed to pass into the private home of even the most distinguished scholar. An interesting point arises in connection with this disclosure: is not the diocesan Registrar the true custodian of these records, and was his consent obtained?

J. CHARLES COX.

MENTEM MORTALIA TANGUNT

Religio Medici and Urn-Burial. By Sir THOMAS BROWNE. (Methuen, 6d. net.)

Religio Medici and Other Essays. By Sir THOMAS BROWNE. With an Introduction by CHARLES WHIBLEY. (Blackie, 2s. 6d. net.)

It would be a very interesting task, if time and space permitted, to compare the religion of Sir Thomas Browne as it is here set down with the beliefs entertained by men of corresponding station in our own day. We look over the familiar pages in these editions and see the magical phrases once more that have lingered in our memory since we began to read, and the spirit of him who wrote them seems to be the direct antithesis of that which modern science has brought forth. The very phrases we refer to could only come to one whose imaginative vision was even stronger than that of his actual eyes, and who lived in a world of shadow and dream where the unseen was populated not only with the common objects of the superstition of the time but with the stately figures of those who had been created by the poets of old and who are thus floated down the ages. There is at once a fulness and a majesty about Browne unequalled elsewhere in English literature. The very first phrase in the Epistle Dedicatory to the Urn-Burial seems to spread out before us all the obsequies of the past :

When the funeral pyre was out, and the last valediction over, men took a lasting adieu of their interred friends, little expecting the curiosity of future ages should comment upon their ashes, and having no old experience of the duration of their relics, held no opinion of such after-considerations.

And, as we turn the leaf, we come upon those massive phrases that have delighted generations of thinking men.

What song the Syrens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions, are not beyond all conjecture.

The mere words "the famous nations of the dead" seem to spread the past before us like some vast ocean over which the curtain of night falls with the solemn words :

But the iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy, and deals with the memory of men without distinction to merit of perpetuity.

Browne's eyes, says Mr. Waller in his scholarly introduction to Messrs. Methuen's edition :

were open to everything in the world of nature around him; he knew the birds, the beasts, and the flowers of his native county; he could correspond with learned men on matters of common interest.

He was a man of science; and the question is what attitude he would have assumed if his curious and searching mind had been brought face to face with modern discovery, if he had heard, for instance, the greatest of our modern students proclaiming that everything bears witness to the fact that the end of life is annihilation, and our only course is to submit to it as inevitable. Such a sentence as the following is the exact contrary of what a modern man of Browne's learning would have written:

Adversity stretcheth our days, misery makes Alcmena's nights, and time hath no wings unto it. But the most tedious being is that which can unwish itself, content to be nothing, or never to have been; which was beyond the mal-content of Job, who cursed not the day of his life, but his nativity; content to have so far been, as to have a title to future being; although he had lived here but in an hidden state of life, and as it were an abortion.

The consequence of it all is that, as Mr. Whibley points out in his adequate and graceful preface to Messrs. Blackie's edition, we read Browne not for his ideas but for his literary merits. Mr. Whibley says what he has to say so well that we can scarcely do better than quote his summing up:

For Sir Thomas Browne was a musician, who played upon the instrument of speech with the skill of a conscious artist. And his daring was equal to his skill. He had no fear of new forms or fresh words. By using Latin derivatives he doubled the resources of our tongue, and cunningly heightened its contrasts. Thus he could always oppose a homely image to one more pompous, and, by the interchange of Latin and Saxon, he could obtain effects unknown before. Thus no literary or rhetorical artifice was beyond his reach. And much as we admire his quiet irony, his gift of epigram, and his ingenious intelligence, it is the genius of the poet, a noble use of words, a vivid sense of metaphor, an exquisite harmony of phrase and cadence which have given his book a gracious immortality.

The subject of this panegyric would probably not have felt any particular pleasure in the terms in which he is here praised. There can be little or no doubt but that his most imaginative phrases represented something real to him, and that the world of spirit existed in his mind as much as the physical earth. He gave far more proof of superstition than is to be found in his writing, and so perhaps "Religio Medici" and the "Urn-Burial" are both valuable now as documents attesting to the state of thought and progress at the time in which they were written.

THE CREED AND ETHICS OF MATERIALISM

Ethics and Moral Science. By L. LÉVY-BRUHL, Chargé de Cours à l'Université de Paris, Professeur à l'École libre des Sciences politiques. Translated by ELIZABETH LEE. (Constable, 6s. net.)

The World's Desires, or the Results of Monism. An elementary treatise on a realistic religion and philosophy of human life. By E. A. ASHCROFT. (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d. net.)

It may be admitted that the inductive method should be applied in sociological research, as it has been in the case of the physical sciences. But the question raised by M. Lévy-Bruhl's book is whether, or how far, such a science can become fruitful in the ethical field. M. Lévy-Bruhl seems only imperfectly to realise the nature of the difficulty. He assigns it principally to the dead weight of opinion fixed by custom, which, no doubt, is very strong; but the real crux consists in the translation of "What is" into "What ought to be," in bringing the products of scientific ethics under the aegis of the internal authority of conscience. Not that he is altogether unaware of the difficulty, for he returns to it more than once, thus showing that he has an uneasy feeling about it and is, perhaps, himself not entirely satisfied with his own attempt to meet it. In fact he never meets it at all.

He acknowledges the correctness of Kant's analysis of the sense of obligation, while very rightly insisting that conscience must no longer be uncritically taken as an ultimate fact of consciousness, but must itself be analysed by the comparative and historical method. Yet, in spite of its composite and variable character in races and individuals, there are certain constant features, more especially the sense of obligation, the abstract sense of right and wrong, of which, as a universal element in Mind, M. Lévy-Bruhl does not adequately realise the significance. And the admitted fact of variation, both statical and dynamical, does not help us to realise, as the writer seems to think, how the passage is to be effected between the recognition of the wisdom of an external rule proposed by scientific ethics and the feeling of its obligation. The problem is metaphysical, and it is because the author thinks Metaphysics out of date that he is unable to appreciate its force. It is, in fact, one aspect of that larger problem which concerns the relations between thought and object, mind and matter. Metaphysics, in its essence, and apart from errors and contradictions, to which inductive science has also been subject, does not deal with shadows, but with real and vital questions that lie at the root of human consciousness, and upon which the whole theory of knowledge, and therefore of morals, ultimately depends.

There is no necessary opposition between Metaphysics and the inductive method, but the two act and react on each other with the result that they are being drawn closer, on the one hand, by the reduction of the a priori element in Metaphysics and of its absolutism to relativity, its theoretical speculations to the position of scientific hypotheses; and, on the other hand, by the gradual realising of the limitations of the scientific method so that hypotheses, valuable and necessary up to a certain point, may no longer be used as universal categories.

It is, then, an error to imagine that Metaphysics can be overthrown by the scientific method, which, so far from destroying its categories, reforms them by widening their application, as in the well-known example of Final Causes: it destroys their old form, only that, like the Phoenix, their undying principle may spring rejuvenated from its ashes. Comte disparaged Metaphysics, as does M. Lévy-Bruhl, but, as this writer complains, he then proceeded to make his own philosophy of history with the increasing welfare of Humanity as its final cause. One of the chief results of the inductive method will be to provide a broader basis for Metaphysics. In the nature of things Positivism must swing back to Idealism.

The historical process, in fact, is exactly that described in the abstract by Hegel—the Subject differentiating itself from the Object, and, in realising the nature of the Object, realising itself, returning into itself enriched and renewed.

For the ultimate strength of the idealistic position is not absolutism as against relativism, or indeed its case would be parlous, but the fact that Mind cannot go outside itself or its own categories, but must refer everything to itself and interpret nature in terms of itself. It is the failure to realise this inevitable truth which vitiates the argument of this treatise throughout. Many instances might be adduced, but it is enough to state the criticism generally and leave the reader to apply it.

At the same time, M. Lévy-Bruhl is naturally an idealist, as all men are at bottom, though it be unconsciously or inconsistently. For, though he criticises the existing moral ideals, yet he has ideals of his own, thereby recognising their necessity as regulative of progress. Devotion to the cause of Humanity and to scientific sincerity are noble ideals, of which the first is already familiar to a Christian Idealist, and the second differs from religious moral ideals only in appealing to a much smaller number and therefore being less operative in promoting general moral progress, while the idea of Progress itself constitutes an ideal.

M. Lévy-Bruhl is right when he contends that some reform is needed in existing moral systems and in his recognition that such reform can only come by the gradual modification of what he calls the "ethical reality." And the means he proposes to that end—of establishing a true science of morals—may certainly promote such reform, at least by helping to abolish some hypocritical conventions of Society. But such reform could only be negative: it could not, as already pointed out, establish any positive rules of conduct.

Mr. Ashcroft's book falls under the same general criticism. His object is more ambitious—to found all the highest ideals of religion and ethics upon Haeckel's monistic materialism, to positivise, e.g., the ideas of "God" and of "self-sacrifice" by divesting them of all non-phenomenal implications, while retaining them as ideals regulative of future progress. The book, though containing some practical wisdom, at times ably expressed, at others much too verbose, lacks proportion, system and thoroughness of treatment. It opens with an enthusiastic description of the nature, and future effects on civilisation, of this new religion. The proper position of this section is at the end of the book, where, in fact, we are treated to another long chapter of the same kind. Parts II. and III. might well have been omitted as far as the main purpose of the book is concerned, since they deal almost entirely with such matters as are to be found in handbooks of Natural Science. The author could then have devoted more space to the chapters on Psychology, a subject which receives very meagre treatment, and also to that on Ethics, which is good as far as it goes, and is on much the same lines as M. Lévy-Bruhl's work, except in its higher "idealism."

Like the latter, the author frequently girds at Metaphysics, but he betrays an ignorance of the subject that the other took care not to show. That this charge is not untrue any one will admit who, being acquainted with the doctrines of Kant, reads the extraordinary summary of them with which Mr. Ashcroft presents us on p. 41 of his book. He will be particularly interested to learn that Kant "successfully reasoned away the hitherto unassailable necessity of the relation of cause to effect."

Such crude attempts at philosophising as these can have only an academic interest to those who recognise that the region of ideals is necessarily metaphysical. There can be no common measure between Absolute Goodness, Wisdom, and Self-Sacrifice, on the one hand, and nerve-centres on the other. Therefore, to say, as does Mr. Ashcroft, that the latter "produce" the former has no meaning, though it is open to science to attempt to trace those conditions of the brain which are the invariable concomitants of these or other ideas.

If this is "dualism," it is due not to "metaphysical subtleties," but to the nature of things, which cannot be arbitrarily reduced to unity by a so-called monism whose claim to be such is founded upon the confusion of ideas so disparate as thought and extended matter. The only real monism is idealistic, for it recognises that nothing can be known except in terms of thought, which finds its necessity, which has its beginning and its goal in the Ego. Let Empiricism deal with phenomena: Idealism has no quarrel with it except when it attempts to explain Mind by physical categories.

RAWNSLEY, WITHOUT SONNETS

Months at the Lakes. By Rev. H. D. RAWNSLEY. (MacLehose, 5s. net.)

THE average clerical writer seems to have but little respect for the decencies of English composition. The practice obtained in the preparation of the weekly sermon might be expected to strengthen the parson's hold on the language, but, in reality, it appears, rather, to have a relaxing effect than otherwise, and the glib preacher soon loses his grip of the pen. Maybe, this is only natural, Oratory and writing, though nearly related, are not twin accomplishments. The sounding, but ill-constructed, periods, which, when delivered from the pulpit, serve to impress an uncritical congregation, will seldom bear the light of common day when exposed to the critical eye in the nakedness of print. Although Canon Rawnsley is by no means an unpractised writer, his work bears this test little better than that of his brother clerics. The baneful shadow of the pulpit lies dark on this book, too much of which is written in what we may term parish-magazine English. The Vicar of Crosthwaite has always been so keenly on the alert to take every journalistic advantage of his fortunate charge that he has gained some reputation as Chronicler-in-Chief of the Lake-Country, or what he, with the unfailing instinct of his kind, prefers to call "Lake-Land"; and, certainly, it is not through any lack of knowledge or enthusiasm that these papers are ineffective.

Canon Rawnsley is an amiable observer of men and manners; he has an eye for natural beauty, and an ear for every echo of folk-tale or tradition that lingers in the dales; but he seems to be almost incapable of expressing himself in precise and straightforward English. More especially in the earlier pages of this volume, verbose, invertebrate, under-punctuated sentences waylay and bewilder the reader. When we stumbled on the phrase "par excellence" in the first chapter (later, we noted that Canon Rawnsley rarely manages to struggle through a month without dragging this undesirable alien with him) we knew that we were destined to trudge over many tedious acres of journalese; but we were scarcely prepared for the sloughs of slovenly and even ungrammatical prose which we were to encounter in our course. The first few lapses from grammatical rectitude we were inclined to set down to carelessness in proof-reading; but, although there are many obvious misprints in the volume, we do not think that the printer can be held entirely accountable for all the violence done to the King's English. We might quote many long and involved sentences as examples of slack writing, but a short and unelaborately bad passage will serve just as well for an instance of reprehensible carelessness. "Purple and gold then may be truly called the favourite colour of March." The east-wind seems to be undecided which is best." (The italics are ours.) The almost invariable absence of hyphens from compound words does not tend to lessen the confusion of the reader. Such slips as "none answer" are of frequent occurrence. On page 58 "Sumer is icumen in" is misquoted. A protest against the excessive and injudicious use of the awkward, impersonal "one" has already appeared in the ACADEMY. Most of the writing in this book is cumbered and clogged by this, the most unwieldy of pronouns. Canon Rawnsley has a keen eye and a noble enthusiasm for colour-effects; but, after all, paint is the proper medium for the expression of the sense of colour. Verbal rhapsodies in colour-names (which in English are curiously indefinite) convey very little to the reader; and, although we are in fullest sympathy with the author's sometimes too floridly expressed appreciation of lake scenery and the reading of his description of "A Sunrise from Helvellyn" gave us much pleasure, we feel that he is happier in his relation of the manners and customs of the dalesmen. "A Lake-Country Sheep-Clipping" is a capital sketch; and his accounts of Ram-Fairs, Hinds' Hirings, Wrestling Matches, Pace-Egging, and Rush-bearing are curious and valuable chronicles.

One other occasion for gratitude we must not omit to record. Knowing Canon Rawnsley's reputation as the most redoubtable of living sonneteers, we turned each page of this book with a timid apprehension of "the inevitable sonnet" that we felt sure was awaiting us on the other side; but, incredible to relate, we reached the last paragraph without finding a single exercise in this form of versification.

THE FLIGHT OF YOUTH

THE little hours went quickly by;
It seems not yet an hour ago
Since dawn was budding in the sky,
And now the Sun is low.

We did not pause at noon to say,
"Already, half the day is done."
We passed the golden time in play
And did not mark the Sun.

Alas! that night-fall comes so soon
For us who revelled in the light.
Pray God, there be a fair full moon,
And stars be bright.

FREDERICK BROUGH.

THE MARCIANA LIBRARY AT VENICE

A LITTLE more than a year has gone by since a great ceremony was held in Venice at the re-opening of the Library of St. Mark's after the removal from the Ducal Palace to the new site appointed for it in the Palazzo della Zecca, or of the Mint. The date of this ceremony was April 27, a day especially chosen as being the sixth centenary of the birth of Petrarch, the poet and man of letters who originated in Venice the idea of a public library and bequeathed his books with this intent to the "Evangelist St. Mark," whom he named his heir. His desire was that these books:

should neither be sold nor dispersed, but preserved in memory of Messer Francesco for the perpetual comfort of the clever and noble men of the city. From time to time [he continues] other volumes will doubtless be added to these first ones, either by the glorious city herself, or by the noble sons of this country, or maybe even by some foreigners, emulous of this my example, so that a great and famous library may arise to equal those of the past, which will prove the glory of Venice, while Messer Francesco, seated at his Lord's feet, will rejoice at having been in some way the author of so much good.

The scheme of the poet that his books should form the nucleus of a library never came about, and no certainty exists as to their fate. It has even been said that they never actually reached Venice, but whether that is so or not it is certain that they were all lost or dispersed, while the legend that a few miserable manuscripts found in St. Mark's Church in 1635 were remnants of Petrarch's legacy is now looked upon as an absolute myth. The idea, however, of "a great and famous library" for Venice was not allowed to perish. The Republic of St. Mark recognised that such an institution was befitting in her midst, and her patricians were equally alive to its advantages. The first important gift to the Library was made in 1469, when Bessarion, Cardinal of Trebizond offered his collection of Greek and Latin manuscripts to the "Serenissima," requesting, as Petrarch had done before him, that they might be housed in St. Mark's, where scholars and men of letters could have easy access to them. The offer was eagerly and gratefully accepted, and nine hundred volumes of priceless value were despatched in forty-eight cases from Rome, and were lodged—not as the donor had desired, in the church—but in the Ducal Palace. Here they remained for close upon a century, when they were transferred to the church, and measures were set on foot to provide a place where they could at once be properly housed and conveniently used. Such a building was designed by Jacopo Tatti, known as Sansovino, and bears to this day the designation of the "Old Library" (Libreria Vecchia). Sansovino himself only carried out the work as far as the sixteenth arch from the Campanile corner, the rest being completed after his death by Scamozzi. The work is looked upon as being Sansovino's masterpiece and the finest building erected in Venice in the sixteenth century. Palladio declared it to be "the richest and most ornate edifice that has perhaps been erected since the days of old," while Aretino pronounced it "superior to the works of the ancients."

The Venetian patricians were noble contributors to the rising Library, and donations from the families of Grimani, Contarini, Recanati, Farsetti, Nani, and Molin swelled the numbers of books and codices which eventually made the Marciana one of the richest and most important libraries in Italy. Nor did the nobles confine their interest to gifts. There were in their ranks men who, like Pietro Bembo and Marco Foscarini, devoted their talents and learning to the Library and added to their other duties that of acting as librarians to the Marciana. Even the age of decadence had less evil effect on the Library than on other institutions in Venice; while during the tempest-tost period of the French Revolution treasures such as the Grimani Breviary, the Diaries of Sanudo, and many a collection removed from old monasteries found a haven and a home on the shelves of St. Mark's Library.

The sense of rest and quiet essential for the well-being of study was not, however, maintained within these walls, for in 1807 Napoleon the Great desired the removal of the Library, so as to throw the building designed by Sansovino into that already used for the Royal Palace. Such a measure was stoutly contested by Jacopo Morelli, the Head Librarian, who pleaded with tears against a scheme so injurious to his "Lady Love" (Morosa), as he termed the Marciana, and whose plea was warmly supported by Canova. Their representations could only obtain the deferment of the evil day, and in 1812 Napoleon's orders were carried out, books, manuscripts and the art treasures belonging to the Marciana being transferred to the Ducal Palace.

A more hopelessly inappropriate place for a library could not possibly have been chosen. The gorgeous, sumptuous halls, where the Doges had sat in state to discuss with their Councils matters relating to the affairs of the Republic either by land or sea, had none of the conditions needed whether for safeguarding the books or for studying them once they were inside those stately, decorated walls. Space, it is true, was there in abundance, but none of it was at the disposal of the Library, and an arduous task fell to the librarians and their staffs to house the books and to erect the cupboards and book-cases in which to stow the treasures committed to their charge. The way in which the volumes were scattered here and there was as far removed from order and practical working as could be; but there was no help for it, and tomes, documents and pamphlets had to be relegated to unused corners of the Hall of the Great Council and the Hall of Scrutiny, too fortunate if such corners happened to be under a dry piece of roof or sufficiently remote from any alarm of fire. For ninety-two years the Marciana remained in these uncomfortable, ill-adapted quarters, an unwelcome guest, but with no other habitation open to receive it, and no apparent sign of one being prepared. In the meanwhile gifts and legacies kept on annually increasing the value and size of the Library, and increasing, too, the difficulties of its accommodation. The books stood two and even three deep on the shelves; and it can hardly be said whether the student who asked for an out-of-the-way, unknown work, or the official who was expected to find it, were the more to be pitied.

On the night of December 21, 1821, a fire broke out in the Ducal Palace, and the Austrian Governor decided that the offices then situated in the old home of the Doges should be removed to safer quarters. The Library, however, with its Archæological Museum and two other literary institutions, was to stay there still, and though much discussion was indulged in as to moving it nothing was done. Time, however, was to set this long-standing abuse right. The condition of the walls of the Ducal Palace, the rents and fissures that began to appear, telling their tale of neglect and misuse, warned those in authority that the heavy burden of an ever-increasing library was no fit lodger for an old and monumental building. Were it to stay there, it could only be at a very serious risk. In 1900 a decree was sanctioned by Parliament, and a grant set apart from the public funds to prepare for the reception of the Marciana the palace used in the days of the Republic as the Mint. These works, however, were only started two years later; and maybe even then no active measures would have been taken had not the fall of the Campanile on July 14, 1902, warned the inhabitants of Venice to see to the safety of every building great or small, public or private, throughout the city. Fears were entertained as to the condition of the Palazzo della Zecca, and, in spite of the reassuring report of the architect, another two years went by ere the building was declared ready to receive the Library. The move was accomplished in the autumn of 1904; the books crossing for the second time the road they had travelled nearly a century previously over the Piazzetta, and taking up their abode at the side of the very place where they had originally been located.

The credit of having obtained the removal of the Library to suitable quarters belongs almost entirely to Dottore Salomone Morpurgo, at that time Head-librarian of the Marciana. He allowed no obstacles to daunt him, and the resolution and perseverance with which he adhered to his purpose and carried it through in the teeth of untold opposition deserve the admiration and gratitude of every student and bibliophile. He has accomplished a good work for Venice and the Marciana, and the memory of what he has done will live in the ages. He was well and loyally served in his work by his under-librarians: Dottori Arnaldo Segarazzi, Enrico Meucci, Gino Levi and Giulio Coggiola, the two latter especially showing their devotion to a good cause with all the zeal and energy of intelligent, honourable men. Dr. Morpurgo has, it is true, left Venice, but his place is admirably filled by Cavaliere Carlo Frati, in whose hands the well-being and able administration of the Marciana are assured.

The plan of the Library in its new quarters at the Zecca is carried out on simple and thoroughly practical lines. On the ground floor are the reading-rooms, a special feature of the public reading-room (known as the Sala Petrarca) being that it is formed of a covered-in courtyard with a sky-light above and admirably arranged for the comfort and convenience of readers and students. Here, too, are the rooms for the catalogues, works of reference and the most recent publications, together with the offices for the lending of books, their distribution, etc. On the first floor are the 11,000 manuscripts which form the special glory and value of the Library, the chief collections either given or bequeathed to it, while on the upper floors are ranged the rest of the volumes, leaving, it must be owned, but a limited space for such works as are sure to demand admittance some day to the Marciana.

The anniversary of the removal of the Marciana has been celebrated by the publication of a beautiful work, entitled "La Biblioteca Marciana nella sua nuova sede," in which its vicissitudes are related in a most full and interesting manner. The account of how the librarians, especially the Abate Morelli, toiled and plotted and pleaded, first to keep the Library out of the Ducal Palace, and then to remove it from so ill-adapted a locality, reads like the pages of some all-absorbing biography. The book contains numerous plans of the Library in its past and present dwelling-places, and gives examples of several choice reproductions from Codices in the Marciana, among them being a very beautiful coloured illustration from the Grimani Breviary, as well as some "ex-libris" of the old patrician families. The work has been a labour of love on the part of Dr. Giulio Coggiola, and proves in a most convincing way that the devotion which was so marked a feature in the Librarians of the Marciana in bygone times is as active and keen and efficient to-day.

ALETHEA WIEL.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

SNOBBERY IN ART AND LITERATURE

THE snob in Art is always with us. His petty cry of Art for Art's sake is but the latest expression of the base-born craving after professional gentility. He oscillates between the fashion-plate and the footlight versions of life, between the conventional and the bizarre. He naturally loathes the mechanical arts, oblivious of the fact that his so-called fine arts are but the off-spring, often degenerate, of those unparalleled times in which the craftsman and the artist were still undistinguishable. That was the golden age before pictures had become detachable from their panels, and a Madonna with Child could be crucified on the walls of the dining-room of a South African plutocrat. The statue, too, was still part of some big scheme of organic decoration, or at most the central figure of the temple or tomb, whose glory, while it filled the shrine or illumined the sarcophagus, never blinded the eye to the fact that it was intended not to conceal but to transfigure the work of the craftsman. It was the trophy planted on the site of yet another triumph of man over the stubborn obstinacy of brass and stone, not a forlorn mass of metal or block of marble, looking for all the world like a stranded relic of the plutonic or glacial period, that humanity has caricatured into a likeness of itself. As for the statues of the past, which find a last refuge in some friendless museum, they recall certain rare exotics unkindly taken from their tropical surroundings to swell the crowded orchid house of some insatiable collector. The best arranged of our museums are but almshouses for decayed statuary. The worst, and they are far the more common, are mere spitals, casual wards in which the Olympians in exile sit higgledy-piggledy like slaves in a hold; or they dream, as it were, of the lordly temples from which they were torn, or gaze upon the remains of their dismembered brethren, whose scattered and mutilated limbs, ticketed and catalogued, recall all the horrors and hideousness of the anatomical peep-show. As for the statues of to-day, who can fathom their unutterable melancholy and sorrowful amazement? Born as it were out of due time and brutally pilloried among hustling crowds who have well-nigh lost every sense of beauty or harmony, amid jerry-built streets, in the midst of a pandemonium of rattling omnibuses and screeching motor-cars, they look down in their pseudo-classic garb like some bedraggled and belated masqueraders in the murky dawn of the twentieth century, surprised like some Rip van Winkle to find themselves awakening ages after the period of their proper floruit. But the vast majority are not even pathetic—they are merely incongruous. Perched on the pillars like St. Simon and exposed to a perpetual downfall of rain and soot, they have all the unhappy look of a man who has left his umbrella at home for ever, when they are not placed, like the Albert Memorial, beneath a sort of tawdry awning under which they are obviously catching an interminable succession of colds. The desolation of the daughter of Zion in a garden of cucumbers is nothing to their desolation. And it has all come to pass because we have cut Phidias into two, or possibly three parts, and we call one of them a stonemason and another an architect, and a third Herr Doctor von Bildhauer, or Professor Chiselhurst. "Nothing but specialists in Art" must be the bane of Art as much as "Nothing but specialists in Science" is the bane of Science. When shall we recover the sense of the oneness of things, with its corollary that there is nothing common or unclean, but only higher and lower? When that millennium arrives it will not be the snob who cuts himself off from the community, but the community which will cut itself off from the snob.

The literary snob, if less exclusive than his artistic double, is so because he dates from further back and with time has learnt experience. He came into existence when painting was, fortunately, not sufficiently advanced to rank by itself as a fine art, and sculpture was at most thinking of a judicial separation from architecture. At all events, the divorce had not yet been pronounced. Alexandria was his cradle, and his immediate progenitors doubtless did good work in separating the Mavis Clares of the day from the sempiternal George Merediths. The besetting sin of the critic is his inordinate desire to pigeon-hole everything. Consequently, while he is admirable in classifying the small fry of literature, when he comes across a mastodon he is only able to pigeon-hole it by mere legerdemain. The first literary conjurer of this kind was the first literary snob. Thanks to his mastery of the graceful and elegant, he pretended to be able to analyse the elemental and dynamic. A man may try to explain Plato for the drawing-room; his explanation may be admirably suited to the drawing-room type of intellect, but it is not Plato. The most successful drawing-room critic is the one who looks for quatorze heures à midi, and succeeds in persuading his audience that he has found it; that is to say, he leaves out the essential and manages to read in something alien of his own. He not only shifts the meridian, but manages subtly to change the values by substituting fancy for fact and virtuosity for imagination. So fully does he believe that he has mastered his trade that he imagines himself capable of providing recipes for the successful reproduction of every type of literature.

The fruits of such a conviction are to be seen in the lifeless products of those cold-blooded worshippers of the Muse, Callimachus, Apollonius Rhodius and that appalling aftermath of poetasters and criticasters that the Alexandrian culture, when transplanted to Rome, produced in the days of Pliny and Juvenal. The results on literature will always be the same, as long as critics with the soul of a Lindley Murray pretend to give formulæ for the production of Hamlets and Othellos. These pseudo-Alexandrians and their Roman imitators would have been invaluable if, instead of laying down the laws for the manufacture of epics, they had anticipated several centuries, and started a school for journalists. Their catechism of what to do and, more especially, of what not to do is a perfect mine of literary etiquette. Their antique chestnuts remind me not a little of a certain volume on Deportment, entitled "Don't," which had a great vogue about twenty years ago among the lower middle classes, and contained such directions as: "Don't pick your teeth with a fork."

So much for the first race of literary snobs, sorry caricatures of Aristarchus and Quintilian. The second dates from the rise of Vaugelas and Boileau. They rediscovered and put once more into circulation the majority of the eternal truisms of their predecessors. They issued regulations for the dress of the Muses as if they were a town council laying down rules for bathing costumes; so many inches of lace and frills according to the "nobility" of the topic, and the periwig always de rigueur. They made a drastic reduction in the list of canonical writers, cut down ruthlessly the number of eligible subjects and issued a general proscription of words, a sort of literary Edict of Nantes au rebours, which, while intended to make for linguistic orthodoxy, robbed the language for a long time, and in some cases permanently, of some of its most vigorous elements. In a word, they succeeded in impoverishing the nascent literature of some of its best life-blood. Like mediæval leeches, having bled their patient white, they left behind them recipes for producing the most anæmic and unnatural poetry the world has ever seen. They thought to ennoble literature; they only made snobbishness part of a literary outfit. Buffon putting on his white cuffs to write his Natural History is an admirable instance of the flunkeyism with which they infested literature. Voltaire's judgment on Shakespeare is that of a literary snob, albeit an uneasy one, half aware of being in the presence of one of Nature's gentlemen. It needed no less than a Victor Hugo to pour new blood into French literature, and permanently to shatter the long-established forces of literary snobbery in France.

We in England have suffered less from this complaint partly because we are by nature Philistines, and literary snobbery cannot flourish so much in a land where three-quarters of the people have not the faintest notion what literature means, and the other quarter are divided among themselves. Still, if we have never had a full-blown Sanhedrin, like the French Academy in its worst days, we have not been without a series of self-appointed high priests of literary elegance which came in with other French fashions in the age of Pope, many of whom showed their genteel limitations. Johnson attempting to measure the pulse of Milton's verse with his poetic metronome and condemning its irregularities was an excellent instance of the eighteenth-century flunkeyism. His direct descendants, Jeffreys and Brougham, acted as if they were standing counsel for the Muses, or at least as holding a watching brief in any case where the so-called poetic licences were exceeded. It was against these sartorial and tom-sorial critics that Byron thundered, and Keats (destined himself to be done to death by these literary flunkies) no doubt had them in his eye when he denounced Boileau and all his works in a passage that Alfred de Musset must have seen when he wrote his celebrated tirade against the self-same "polisson." The history of the recognition of ballad poetry, of the Lake school, of every poetical movement since has been a record of a struggle with literary snobbery. One after another the banned forms of prose and poetry have been received into the catholic fold of Literature. The word "classic" itself has received of recent times a wide expansion. Many works of Science and Philosophy have been allowed a place, though fifty years ago for one critic who would have admitted the Darwin of the potherb garden, ten would have banned the Darwin of the "Voyage of the Beagle." No doubt, literature requires a certain standard of literary attainment, but many a book wanting neither in lucidity nor interest fails to please our professional booktasters, simply because they do not know the ABC of the ideas it professes to illustrate. To a Goethe, Spinoza is a sublime model of austere eloquence: to the amateur of style he is a confused and incomprehensible reminiscence of the hateful Euclid of his youth. Descartes's "Discours sur la Méthode" is the Bible of French thought, whose massive periods form a fitting vehicle to the close-packed loads of ideas that they carry. On the other hand, the mere rhetorician, like Brunetière, sneers at the style as insipid and likens it "to pure water which has no special flavour." I wonder what the English Bible would read like to a civilised man who had never heard of it before the age of twenty. Yet we should surely rather take the verdict of those to whom its text is redolent with the myriads of explanations and applications which generations of commentators have drawn from it or pressed into it. Surely, if a writer can satisfy his critics on the general grounds of grammar and clearness, his merit must depend largely on his message. He may have an audience of a select few, like Spinoza, or one of millions, like Shakespeare. The critic has a perfect right to dispose of the pretensions of the Shallows in Literature, the Martin Tupper and Montgomerys, but he necessarily and inevitably becomes a snob when pretending to criticise ideas of which he does not understand the import or importance. He naturally fails to appreciate the fitness of the language in which they are couched, and joins himself to the elegant mob of the kid-glove critics by declaring the subject unworthy of treatment or the vocabulary vulgar.

C. B.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Poetry of Modern Pantheism," by Edward Wright.]

FICTION

The Bar Sinister. By J. MORGAN DE GROOT. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THERE is a curious pleasure in the contemplation of a foreign landscape touched in by a native hand. Mere physical features apart, we feel that the atmosphere is right. And so, the inhabitants, breathing their native air, live and move and have their being naturally, while the reader, all untroubled by doubts as to local colour, escapes the hovering wonder as to whether they are really true to the life of their particular corner of the world. This is, perhaps, the first impression left by Mr. Morgan de Groot's preliminary sketches of the Dutch village of Grasland and its more noteworthy people. Capital sketches they are, pointed with a plain humour that bites all the better for its air of naïveté. With the development of the story itself, however, there arises a rapidly growing suspicion that, since all the villains and malpractitioners in it are quite paradoxically lacking in shrewdness, all the excellent people with the "good" parts will have to be fools (to put it brutally) in order to keep up the excitement to the end. And so it turns out. Hugo Sax, a cocoa manufacturer (a widower with a grown-up son) has fallen in love with one of his factory girls, but only marries her just before the birth of a boy to them and her own subsequent death. But the legitimisation of little Paul is contrary to the interests of various people, and Sax is duped, on the evidence of a letter in his wife's handwriting, into believing that the child is the son of a poacher in the neighbourhood—a very guileless acceptance, we feel on reading the incident. In spite of this blow he treats Paul as his own son, concealing his supposed illegitimacy as long as possible; but, when the boy eventually discovers it, he feels in honour bound to refuse to marry his benefactor's niece, a girl born blind, with whom he has been brought up, and who loves him as devotedly as he worships her. The pathos of the situation is heightened by the fact that he has been chiefly instrumental in helping to restore her sight, but his manner of renunciation does not appeal to us very strongly, and the author pleads justifiable morbidness only just in time to win a sigh of romantic sympathy for his hero. Be that as it may, when, a turn or two further on, the elder son forces himself upon Laura as a suitor and induces her to accept him by holding out a promise of "rehabilitating" Paul, the wonder is that her suspicions were not aroused, and on the final revelation of the truth to those principally concerned we grow impatient at their hesitation to settle matters out of hand on the score of the recapture of certain documentary evidence by the chief surviving villain. It is really quite a relief when the long arm of coincidence (busier throughout than we have been able to describe) deals the wicked Rudolph the necessary knock-out blow, so that all may end happily in the mists of a Dutch Evening Landscape. But the story itself, as we have hinted, is by no means everything here, and few will read of the Baron de Montfoort, or of the greedy village cronies, Pot and Geld, or of that terror to all sinners in Grasland, Dominé Pel, without paying tribute to highly original powers of impressionistic delineation.

Harley Greenoak's Charge. By BERTRAM MITFORD. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

MR. MITFORD's readers look to him for exciting narrative, and they will not be disappointed. He does not give them much of a story and he tells them no new thing, but every chapter has its thrilling incident, its marvellous escape, and a generous allowance of violence and bloodshedding. Harley Greenoak, South African prospector, hunter, and native trader, is one of the strong men of fiction who keep the British Empire standing by their tact and knowledge of native tribes, and who go to their graves without praise or reward from a jealous Colonial Office. When such a hero promises to introduce Dick Selmes to the adventurous life of the country, "the real thing," we brace our nerves to receive the shocks and thrills in store for us, and they are many. Greenoak's "charge" had "come out to kill," and does it with an enjoyment that is never sated: man, beast, or bird, it is all one to Dick, whose reckless daring keeps Greenoak and the reader alert and busy rescuing him from imminent death every few pages. Only once does woman get a chance to show her mettle, and full advantage is taken of that opportunity. One of the most impressive scenes in the book is that where Elsie Dunn kills five Kaffirs with an axe, deliberately and without a qualm. If the author falls below his best work here, his hand has not lost its cunning in veldt craft, in hunting adventures, in fights with savages: these are, to quote Dick Selmes, "Good—and good again."

The Bridal of Anstace. By ELIZABETH GODFREY. (Lane, 6s.)

MISS ELIZABETH GODFREY has at least hit upon an original opening for her novel. The Greek marriage service, with all its quaint ceremonial, is well worthy of the chapter she devotes to it. We can only regret that so picturesque an entry into married life should be followed by such swift disaster. That the hair of Anstace should turn snow-white on the very night of her wedding seems almost too dire a stroke of fate, though the mysterious disappearance of the bridegroom, Count Basil Leonides, who slips out of the back-door and vanishes with a completeness only attained to by the Russians and Greeks of fiction leads us to the conclusion that she is well rid of him. We have met this type of hero too often before. Anstace is something of a patient Griselda, and accepts the situation with becoming meekness. But this slipping out of back-doors would seem to be infectious. She is seized with the desire to disappear on her own account. After this we are glad to find her in less troubled waters. The little cottage on the coast and its kind inmates are drawn with a sympathetic touch, and the adventures of Anstace are both interesting and amusing. In spite of a certain natural distrust of an unknown lady with prematurely white hair and a propensity for speaking modern Greek, who drops into their circle as suddenly as she dropped out of her own, the people, one and all, take her to their hearts. The resignation with which she accepts her husband's loss, her capacity to wipe away all memory of the past and live happily in the present are somewhat unconvincing. True, when brought face to face with the love of Clyne, the blind misanthrope, she is "thunderstruck," being, we are told, "to her own consciousness as much married to her vanished phantom husband as any wife living under her husband's roof." And yet, after the rather commonplace dénouement, where the inevitable adventuress (Leonides's other wife) makes her usual dramatic appearance—to disappear in her turn as deftly as any of them—we find Anstace bidding an eternal farewell to the man who is and is not her husband, leaving him in his monastery on Mount Athos with the same unnatural resignation she has shown throughout. Miss Godfrey tells her story in easy, flowing style, and handles her unwieldy cast skilfully.

The Grip of Fear. By SIDNEY H. BURCHELL. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

THE tale that is here told by Mr. Burchell, is without even sound and fury; and its signification, like the old countryman's thoughts, "mostly nout." Few things are more depressing than a tired melodrama: this one wanders round the well-worn course, limping and lame and old; not even at the last lap, when the housekeeper goes mad and pushes the lovely twin sister of the first misunderstood wife (she flaunts sadly under the name of Ninon) down from the high wall of the ruined chapel on to the hard rocks far below and the poor old woman overbalances as well and there is a "fearful thud"—not even then does the pace brighten. Once we laughed, and felt ashamed at laughing at the gambols of the poor old story. That was when the young hero leads his bride into his father's house and is obliged to say: "Is it not a noble hall, Ninon?" But our laughter sounded mirthless and unkind. Poor tattered, tired old tale, let it rest in peace!

THE DRAMA

THE STAGE SOCIETY

THE members of the Stage Society regard their hard-working committee as the fat boy in Pickwick. They think it ought to make their flesh creep on certain Sundays in the year. But the wise committee is homœopathic in its doses, and for every shudder it has an antidote. How many people hoped that The Invention of Dr. Metzler, by Mr. John Pollock, had something to do with surgery, and that Gogol's Inspector-General would inspect Russian hospitals? By a sheer accident, I knew the latter play in Merimée's version; otherwise the name Gogol would have suggested something delightfully prohibitive. It might even be the Russian for gaga; the noise which nurses make to children whom they want to swallow indiarubber or something indigestible, concrete or even poisonous. But Mr. John Pollock had provided a kind of Ibsenite melodrama in tabloid form, very burroughs and very welcome; and the Russian play is a delightful farce, which I, for one, enjoyed thoroughly.

Mr. Pollock's work might really have been in three acts, a very rare distinction for a one-act play. So far as characters and background went, there was ample room for development; and the play proves, what few trial performances even suggest, that the author is going to be one of our new playwrights, and, it is just possible, one of our few dramatists. The century is getting on (Mr. Shaw belongs to the last century), and it is high time that we, or rather the Stage Society, produced some one besides Mr. Harkin, the only rising star in prose-drama. The chief blemish in Dr. Metzler is that the balance of sympathy is not evenly sustained in the dialogue. Your sympathies are supposed to alternate between Dr. Metzler, with his philosophic bias for humanism or non-patriotism, and Rosa von West, the jingo daughter. Austrians are always unpopular in literature and drama. Old prejudices about Richard Cœur de Lion detained by the Archduke of Austria, William Tell persecuted by Gesler, the poems of the Brownings and Rossetti's "Last Confession," have all made us unfair to Austria.

Every journalist and every poet is pro-Hungarian. I wept over the wrongs of Kossuth before I knew who he was. I remember a sonnet written "For the feast of Louis Kossuth" in the Swinburnean manner, which I thought referred to a complimentary banquet. So there was really a great opportunity for restoring Austria into literary favour, and the eloquent and fascinating Miss Gertrude Kingston might have expected to obtain our suffrages if any one could. But alas! her speeches to that hopeless pro-Boer, Dr. Metzler, were like Mr. Chamberlain's at the khaki election and the illusion was enhanced by Miss Kingston's unbecoming khaki costume. I was glad that her husband had been killed instead of feeling sorry for her. All my old Gesler-hetze and my indignation with the Archduke who detained Richard fizzed up. I cannot help suspecting that Mr. Pollock's sympathies (though he comes from a distinguished Tory family) were entirely with Dr. Metzler and myself. That is wrong from a dramatic point of view, though sound politically. You should realise Miss von West's indignation and admire her patriotism, for a moment at all events. Now that there is an Austrian exhibition at Earl's Court, it would have been a graceful and opportune compliment to a friendly power if we had been able to make a concurrent dramatic amende for years of literary prejudice. All the same, I offer my congratulations to Mr. John Pollock.

The great disappointment of the evening, to every one but myself, was The Inspector-General. In the huge cast I really cannot select any one for special praise, because all the acting was superb. I will not congratulate the actors, but the Stage Society on being able to obtain the services of these artists. I longed for the two suppressed acts in order to enjoy Mr. Herbert Grimwood, Mr. Henry Kitts, and Mr. Norman Page. Their make-up was on a level with their performance; they resembled a series of exquisite Hogarths or Rowlandsons. Of course, the play is old-fashioned; but so is Hamlet, and it is none the worse for that. I love "asides," and a soliloquy is like hearing a dramatic criticism written by yourself, after reading other people's. It is charming, too, to remember that Russia can laugh, that there is a sense of humour in that dear land of unpronounceable names, all of which sound so tragic. You would suspect some terrible doom to hang over any one called Khlestakov (admirably played by Mr. Michael Sherbrooke). It is a relief to find him a sort of Jingle.

ROBERT ROSS.

FINE ART

THE PAINTINGS OF WILLIAM BLAKE

WHEN M. Auguste Rodin was in London at the beginning of 1904, he visited the exhibition of Blake's paintings then being held at the old Carfax gallery in Ryder Street and admired the work of the English artist, praising, it is said, particularly the imagination and energy of the small water-colour of the Four and Twenty Elders. If he were to return to England during the next six weeks, he would find at the new and more spacious gallery in Bury Street a far finer collection, including all the more notable works of the former exhibition (with the exception of the Wise and Foolish Virgins and Mr. Sydney Morse's beautiful ruined Nativity) and adding to them as many more pictures of equal interest, one of which, the famous Canterbury Pilgrims, is very generally reckoned by those who have hitherto been able to see it as the painter's masterpiece.

The praise of M. Rodin—the most imaginative of living artists—is all the more interesting because it is not often from artists that Blake's work has won the warmest appreciation. The poets who delight in his lyrics and the students who unravel the tangled skeins of his mystical system unite in admiration of his paintings: but the technical imperfections which hinder our pleasure in all but the very finest of them have not unnaturally obscured their merit in the eyes of those to whom technique, in its widest sense, is and must always be of primary importance. In that fantastic mixture of inspiration and petulant prejudice which Blake put forth as art-criticism he damned with no uncertain voice the sins to which he himself was particularly inclined. He vaunts his "clear colours unclouded by oil," his "firm and determinate lineaments": but, if a persistent obstinacy has enabled the visitor to the National Gallery to penetrate into the locked and obscure closet in which four of his pictures have recently been concealed from the public eye, he will discover that the Spiritual Form of Pili guiding Behemoth (of which these words were written) is a darkened chaos whose design can only be traced with considerable difficulty on the brightest of London days. He applauds Gravelot for his remark to Basire, the engraver, that "de English may be very clever in deir own opinions, but dey do not draw de draw," and then ruins a magnificent design like the Christ crucified between the two Thieves with grotesquely mis-shapen limbs and ludicrous hands. In spite of his enthusiasm for clear, bright colours he is almost always timid in the use of them, and relies for many of his effects on Indian ink merely tinted with pinks and blues, and that often in an arbitrary fashion of his own peculiarly irritating to the eye when red and blue streaks are used to model the nude: while the execution of such pictures as Christ blessing little Children or the splendidly conceived Agony in the Garden exhibits all the qualities of "blotting and blurring" which he detested in his bug-bears the "Venetian and Flemish painters" without the corresponding merits which still win the world's admiration for the work of Titian and Rubens, whom Blake considered vastly inferior to Giulio Romano in the esteem of all competent judges. In fact, we need only take into account the mass of inferior drawings which he turned out with such indifference to realise that Blake was as uncertain a critic of his own work as of the paintings of his predecessors.

It is a commonplace—and, like most commonplaces, substantially true—that such work must be judged and appreciated with regard to its imaginative content. But the utmost excellence and interest of subject-matter will not save an art trivial or faulty in its expression: it is further essential that the idea shall become so perfectly incarnate in the presentment of it as inevitably to raise into beauty the actual execution. Not only are many of Blake's drawings æsthetically valueless for lack of spiritual significance, mere illustrations by an artist not especially gifted in his craft, like the Ordeal of Queen Emma (if indeed this is a work from Blake's prentice hand), the Ruth, or the Saint Paul shaking off a Viper: but others, which embody a noble or significant idea, fail none the less because that idea is allegorised rather than symbolised, translated, with the translator's inevitable betrayal, out of the world of imagination into the world of art, and not immediately visualised in the very terms of its expression. In all visionary artists we can make this distinction, even in Dante, for all the miraculous certainty of his technical achievement: it is easy enough to see how in Hell the punishment of the Hypocrites has a mere logical suitability appropriate enough to the sin, while the punishment of the Thieves is vision inseparable for ever from the naked shuddering accuracy of its presentation. But Dante, when the true substance of poetry failed him (call it the Breath of the Spirit or a "subliminal uprush" as you will), had art enough at his command to make verses unequalled in modern literature: while Blake had to fall back on sham Mortimer and sham Fuseli, ill-digested recollections of the "Antique" or of Cinquecento art, and frozen stage-gestures that lose in repetition the shadowy reality they once possessed. Two things could have brought him safety, a living and sympathetic tradition around him, or a sane use of models: but the one he was denied and the other he seems deliberately to have rejected. Thrown on the mercy of his inspiration, he could rise apparently at hazard to the heights of the Vision of Zacharias and Satan tormenting Job or descend to the ignoble inanities of Philoctetes and the Judgment of Paris: he could issue in the same series the exquisite Creation of Eve and the preposterous Expulsion out of Paradise.

To be a great artist in work closely influenced by others requires above all else technical mastery, as Blake himself showed in the practice of poetry, where in the alembic of his art he transmuted Dr. Watts's Hymns into the "Songs of Innocence and Experience," and Macpherson's "Ossian" into the books of "Thel" and "Ahania." But in painting, where once the fire failed him, the Stoning of Achan can scarcely be considered an improvement on Fuseli. It is no accident that he succeeded best in the craft in which he had the advantage of a professional education: he was a born poet, a trained engraver and an amateur painter. It is almost impossible to imagine a disciple in verse (if there had been such a one of the direct lineage) whose work could be set beside "Night" and "The Tyger," "To Tirzah" and a score of the Songs, and English poetry has still to find a match for the best parts of the unfinished "Everlasting Gospel." But if George Richmond's Christ and the Woman of Samaria could be taken from the Tate Gallery and hung in the Carfax sanctuary it might be found, in spite of its obviously derivative inspiration, more pictorially satisfying than all but the very finest of the Master's work.

In Blake's painting the appeal must always be from Philip sober to Philip drunk: "the tigers of wrath are wiser than the horses of instruction." When we turn to the God creating Adam, which fitly occupies the central place at the Exhibition, it seems incredible that its length and breadth should be measured by a few inches, so terrible is the sense it conveys of vast issues and superhuman struggles. On Ghiberti's gate the Creator treads the earth with a homely seriousness, and lifts man from the ground without effort and without emotion: on the roof of the Sistine Chapel the wind whirls Him through the air towards the languid, beautiful image that He has made, and the whole world waits in breathless expectation for their stretched fingers to meet. But in Blake's print the Angel of the Divine Presence, hovering in the blackness on His enormous wings, is Himself in anguish as He tortures the stiff and rebellious clay into the form of the body of man. The tremendous vision has found for itself a surprising magnificence of colour and handling, just as the conception, only less fine, of Elijah seated in the Chariot of Fire has evoked a beauty of composition rarely equalled in Blake's work. But compare either of these prints with the Lamech, where a similar technical method condescends to ugly lines and gestures which have not even the factitious life of the theatre, while the surface texture of the paint has acquired a clumsy hideousness, as of wool-work or stippled chalks: and you realise the extraordinary dependence on what is essentially no matter of painting whatever. For when Jan van Eyck expresses the beauty of a brass pot and a towel, or Manet paints the incomparable Brioche, which may now be seen a few hundred yards from the Blake exhibition, they need await no other inspiration than the ever-present power of an observant patience.

Magnificent as the Adam and the Elijah may be in conception, they remain inferior as complete works of art to the great engravings which form the crown of Blake's artistic life. As Max Klinger has pointed out in his admirable "Malerei und Zeichnung," the technique of drawing and engraving is inherently more suitable for the expression of pure imagination than that of painting: and to this advantage we must add that of Blake's very real skill in the engraver's art even under its more conventional forms. Surely even the beautiful designs for "Paradise Lost" would have gained if they had been carried out as engravings, for which, indeed, they might almost seem to have been designed: for the pale and somewhat obvious colouring in the only two pages which have not faded into monochrome (those numbered D and F in the Carfax catalogue) adds nothing whatever to their charm.

It is unlikely that an exhibition can ever be got together which would show Blake to greater advantage than this at Carfax: by its limitations it probably produces a greater cumulative effect than even the famous and comprehensive collection shown at the Burlington Fine Arts Club thirty years ago, for there are comparatively few of the worse class of his drawings on the walls, though those few might well have been eliminated. It is an exhibition of the utmost importance to all who are interested in imaginative art, and it will, no doubt, set seal on the appreciation which has grown of late to such a remarkable extent. But Blake is badly served by those who overpraise him. As a speculative mystic he would stand first in a far more distinguished company than that of his compatriots: as a poet and as a painter he might perhaps be accorded a place relatively similar—he is honourable among the thirty, howbeit he attains not to the first three. But by so much as the hierarchy of the poets of England exceeds in honour that of the painters does the glory of Blake the painter pale before the glory of Blake the poet.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. CONSTABLE are about to publish bibliographies of Henry James and James Russell Lowell. Titles and collations have been taken directly from first editions, while all subsequent editions are mentioned, and there are many anonymous items—revealing a large quantity of work, especially by Mr. James, previously unknown to his readers. Blank pages are left for future additions and the printing is one side of the pages only. Both are to be issued in special limited editions after the production of which the type will be distributed. Similar bibliographies will be prepared for Emerson and Oliver Wendell Holmes.—Messrs. Constable have also in the press a little volume of verse, entitled "Bird and Bough," wherein are collected some of Mr. Burroughs's poems. As the title implies, the pieces are all poems of Nature.

"Saunterings in Spain" is the title of a book which Mr. Unwin has in the press. The volume gives a traveller's impressions of the cities, the scenery and the art of Spain, and contains descriptions of the cities of Barcelona and Madrid, the Academia de San Fernando, the chief pictures in the Museo del Prado, the Escorial, Toledo, Cordova and its Cathedral, Seville, its Museo and its monuments, Grenada and the Alhambra, and Gibraltar.—On June 25, Mr. Unwin will have ready a second edition, revised and brought up to date, of Mr. Arthur Hayden's "Chats on Old China." Twenty-five new illustrations have been added.

The volume on Queen Anne, which is to conclude the Goupil series of monographs, is in the hands of Mr. Herbert Paul, who is well acquainted with the period covered by, and the personalities who gave distinction to, the reign of Anne. The chief writers of the period, Addison and Steele, Pope and Swift, will come under Mr. Paul's critical notice. Kneller, the Court painter in Queen Anne's day, will be largely represented in the illustrations, to which the royal collections at Windsor and Kensington Palace, and the private collections of the Duke of Marlborough and the Duke of Buccleuch, will contribute.

A new volume of Verse by Mr. G. L. St. M. Watson is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock. It will be entitled "With Brandished Bauble" and will consist chiefly of pieces of light verse and parody, some of which have appeared in The World, Punch and The Daily Chronicle.

Mr. Bloundelle-Burton is about to publish with Mr. John Long an historical novel, "Traitor and True," dealing with an attempted rebellion against Louis XIV.

CORRESPONDENCE

IRISH LITERATURE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your last issue the reviewer of Dr. Hyde's Religious Songs of Connacht makes the following statement: "As a matter of fact, Ireland has never had a literature: the claim is based on a dozen or so old legends, romances—call them what you will."

As the reviewer shows familiarity with Irish this positive statement might mislead some readers of the ACADEMY. It is therefore well to put on record what the facts really are.

Of the peoples of modern Europe the only ones which have any literature older than the year 1100 are: the Celtic peoples of the British Isles—the Irish and the Welsh; the Teutonic peoples of the British Isles, the Anglo-Saxons; the Northern Teutons, Norsemen and Icelanders; the Romance-speaking peoples of Northern France; the Continental Teutons, more especially those of Western and South-Western Teutondom. Of these literatures the Irish is by far the oldest as regards subject-matter, and is also by far the most extensive. Of the other literatures in question, that of the Northern Teuton is the oldest as regards subject-matter, that of the insular Teuton, the Anglo-Saxon, the most extensive. Welsh occupies the fourth place as regards extent. As far as variety is concerned Irish occupies the first place, followed again by Anglo-Saxon.

Irish literature comprises: mythical story telling in prose and verse; heroic saga, likewise in prose and verse; legendary history, chiefly in prose, but also to no small extent in verse; romantic chronicles; annalistic chronicles, chiefly in prose, but also, especially the definite educational portions, in verse; collections of customs and discussions of legal theory; saints' lives and edificatory religious literature; discussions of grammatical and metrical theory; an immense mass of topographical legend; a certain amount of non-religious literature of edification with the Hebrew Proverbs and Wisdom literature or to the Scandinavian Hava-Mel; a considerable amount of encomiastic poetry; a small but very precious amount of lyrical and elegiac poetry; a not inconsiderable amount of translation from or adaptation of classic literature in its Pagan and Christian forms.

The extant remains of this literature, every line of it written before 1100, the production for the most part of a professional literary class, would fill at least four volumes of Encyclopædia Britannica size. It is a literature the different genres of which have their own definite and long-established convictions, as is shown by the fact that a not inconsiderable amount of parody, some of it excellent, has survived.

The question of merit can only be fairly discussed by comparing Irish with other literatures approaching it in extent and age. It is a question I am perfectly prepared to discuss with your reviewer if he wishes. I will only point out that in one kind of early literature—not commonly held to be the least interesting or important—lyrical and elegiac poetry, Irish is superior to any of its rivals.

I have been a reader of the ACADEMY since 1873, a not infrequent contributor to its pages during the past twenty years. It is with profound regret that I see it giving authority to statements, the erroneous-ness of which would have been apparent if five minutes' thought and research had been devoted to them.

ALFRED NUTT.

[Our Reviewer writes: "I am indebted by Mr. Nutt's letter, though I am fairly well acquainted with the arguments advanced; but I am unable to admit his contentions. There may be sufficient of the material to which he alludes to fill four hundredweight of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica'; but it is no more literature as I understand the word than are the wretched novels which bishops read and rant about. The question of merit is not to be decided by comparison. The point of my article was that Ireland has no literature to warrant a league in endeavouring to revive a useless language. I wish it were otherwise."]

THE PORTLAND MINIATURE OF MARY STUART

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It may seem an odd thing that Mr. Andrew Lang and I should take opposite views as to whether the Duke of Portland's miniature of Mary Stuart represents her lying in bed, or not. But those who look at Mr. Lang's book will see that the miniature frame cuts off almost everything outside the half-length figure. The picture is there somewhat enlarged, yet even so the details on which the discussion turns are few and small. In my opinion they are but two: bedclothes pulled up to below the elbows and a nightgown. If I am right in so describing these adjuncts (and I am really unable to take any other view of them), then the question seems for me settled, though some other details might have suggested a different interpretation, had they stood alone. As it is, the composition seems to me quite intelligible and coherent.

Mary's health was always somewhat uncertain; she was often confined to bed. According to the custom of those homely times, she would transact business there. During her sickness at Jedburgh, for instance, both the nobles of her court and the French ambassador were at her bedside. Would it have been wonderful if, under such circumstances, her ladies should have taken care to throw a warm covering over her shoulders and something light over her head? This I think accounts for the cape of white silk lined with ermine (no part of a "summer" or a "morning costume"), the ruff, and the ample semi-transparent veil, which is spread out over the pillows, covers the head like a bonnet, and is fastened under the chin. The blue background is, I agree, "conventional," and tells neither way. If it had been meant to represent "open air," the anagram would surely never have been painted upon it.

If we imagine that Mass had been said in the sick-room (as it probably was at Jedburgh), that would account both for the head being covered, and for the little attentions to toilet, as well as for the prayer-book, and the anagram; that is to say for all the details in the picture.

When we remember that white was supposed to be the colour which best became the Queen, it is surely no wonder that some one should have thought of depicting her in bed. Such a thought would naturally lead to a composition such as this, "a symphony in cream and milk." But once more—let the reader turn to p. 28 of Mr. Lang's book, and judge for himself.

J. H. POLLEN, S.J.

WIT, VERSUS WHITE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The question is asked: "If Whit-Sunday does mean white, why not spell the word properly, with a final e?"

The answer is, because that would be an improper spelling; improper because the i is pronounced as the i in it, not as the i in white. Our old spelling was phonetic, and even our modern spelling is so to some extent, or we should be worse off than we are.

It is the old story. Few seem to understand that it is the spoken language that counts; and if the spelling does not represent it, then the spelling fails to express the truth.

The right question is, why is the i shortened in this compound? I have discussed this question repeatedly; suffice it to say that it is explained at p. 24 of my cheap Primer of English Etymology. The briefest way of putting it is to say that we usually shorten a long syllable when we add a tail to it. Thus have gives harrier; know gives knowledge, rhyming with college; and (I quote from p. 25) white yields the derivatives Whitby, Whitchurch, Whitster, Whitleather, and Whitsunday; but the i is long in whiting, where the i is followed by a vowel.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A. H. asks why we should not spell the first syllable of the word White since Whit equals White. He might with just as much reason ask the same question with reference to the following names of places all of which contain the word White, namely, Whitacre, Whitby, Whitchurch, Whitcombe, Whitfield, Whitgift, Whitney, Whitstable, Whitwell, Whitwood, Whitworth. In all these words the vowel is shortened in accordance with the rule of compound words explained in my letter last week on the pronunciation of "knowledge."

A. L. MAYHEW.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If "Whit-Sunday" were properly written thus in two words (with or without the hyphen), your correspondent A. H. would be right in retaining the full form "white" in the prefix. But it ought to be written "Whitsunday," being a compound word; and in that case, as Mr. Mayhew has opportunely reminded us, "the shortening of the vowel is strictly correct. For other compounds with "Whit" = "White," compare the personal and place names, Whitworth, Whitwell, Whitchurch, Whitton, Whitstable, and many more.

C. S. JERRAM.

Oxford, June 19.

MUSIC-DRAMA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—What is the difference between drama and lyrical or music-drama? Or is that begging the question, and is there really no difference at all? One would think so from Mr. E. A. Baughan's article in the Daily News, called forth by the performances of The Ring and discussed by your music critic in the ACADEMY of June 9. Mr. Baughan seems to show that the Wagner-myth has pretty nearly come full-circle, and Superman must be smiling, if he reads the papers, to see the whirligig bring in his revenges. Wagner, after long exile in the wilderness, at last came into his kingdom; and for many years a hint or a whisper against his right divine and plenary inspiration was heresy to be visited with all the anathemas, and, had that been possible, the auto da fé of the Holy Office of German Professordom. Now we are informed that he is by no means the impeccable artist that the Familiars (of whom our hierophant was one) formerly proclaimed him: that his art is, in fact, "a failure." We are, it seems, to recant our oaths of loyalty. The opera-king's robes are but tinsel after all; his crown is only gilt, and tarnished at that; his sceptre no longer inspires awe; and before long, doubtless, his somewhat dilapidated Majesty will be packed off to kick his heels in the limbo of departed kings. Thence, however, he will certainly come to resurrection in no very distant future; and, shorn of his more extravagant pretensions, will rank, no longer indeed as a god, but as a mighty hero in the world of art.

It is all very amusing, but it is the orthodox career of genius. The aspirant to fame struggles to the wheel of Fortune, clutches at its rungs, and is whirled aloft (as was Don Quixote by the windmill) to a dizzy eminence, whence he is flung to earth; then, after a bit, he picks himself up, and—perhaps with a broken bone or two—crawls away to a surgeon; and thereafter journeys through life more humbly, perhaps more helpfully, than in the brief moment of his giddy apotheosis.

Mr. Baughan is in my view largely right, though his solemnity is somewhat comic. He is always inclined to be precious, it is true, and to be singular in his judgments; but there is generally sound sense in what he says, and the fact of his having travelled so far along this road is significant of a similar though less decided movement among the herd of critics to whom he is so superior. But though one may agree with him on many points, the blame he now awards is surely as extravagant as the adulation of former days. Wagner's art has its limitations as all art has, but it is not "a failure." Mr. Baughan says: "The orchestra was such an obsession with Wagner that, in order that it should have full play, he actually conditioned his drama for its needs. Scenes were prolonged beyond all dramatic necessity." Here I think he somewhat loses sight of the distinction indicated in my opening question. Lyrical drama can never have the swiftness of drama pure and simple. Shakespeare's dialogue can turn and double with his thought with a rapidity quite alien to the genius of music. All opera must expand and dwell upon situations at a length that would be intolerable in spoken drama. The two must react on each other; neither partner in the union can be quite the same as before marriage. You may prefer the one or the other; but it is no more use complaining of music-drama because it has not the swiftness of drama, than it is reasonable to reproach an apple for not having the flavour of an orange.

I can go more fully with Mr. Baughan when he says: "There seems to be no reason why the voice-parts should be robbed of melody to give it to the orchestra. It is the dramatis persona, and not the instrumentalists, who are supposed to be feeling . . . the voices are often badly placed in the scoring." This is one of Wagner's real faults, and he was reproached with it forty years ago. Unfortunately the critics had raised the same cry of "Wolf!" so often in previous cases that it was enough then to quote the gibe levelled against Mozart—that he had put the statue in the orchestra and the pedestal on the stage—to discredit the whole argument. The fault, however, is the natural defect of Wagner's qualities: he was so carried away by his discovery of the magic mirror in the orchestra to reflect the secret passions and glorify the drama on the stage, that he lost sight for a time of other things.

I cannot, in the space allotted to me, discuss the whole of Mr. Baughan's charges in detail. In all that he says I think there is a certain modicum of truth—even in the case first quoted; for there is always the problem how far the music and the drama should yield to each other; and Wagner no doubt sometimes made mistakes as all artists do, however great they may be. The chief point I would dwell upon is the intemperance of criticism in musical matters. It seems to be thought that every musical writer who makes a name is of necessity an advance on all previous writers. He is in the van of progress; and one who cannot acknowledge all his claims is ipso facto an out-of-date old fogey. Thus, to question Wagner's infallibility twenty years ago, would have been simply to write oneself down an ass. To write then as Mr. Baughan has written now would have been merely to call forth a smile of contempt. The same process goes on over every great reputation, yet the critics become none the wiser. In literature one is not necessarily an ignoramus because one does not bow the knee to every new writer and worship at every shrine. It is acknowledged that one cannot be universal after all, and must be allowed his tastes and distastes. The Muse is a lady of some three thousand years of age; and though quite youthful still, is no longer giddy, but has attained a certain poise and self-reliance. Music, in our sense, is a mere chit of a girl, not more than two or three hundred years old, and still given to gush. Not to adore the last new prophet is to proclaim one's incompetence. Yesterday it was Wagner; to-day it is Strauss and the Russian school; to-morrow, who? When will musicians realise that a new arrival is simply a new personality, congenial to some, and uncongenial to others? Grieg was not an advance on Wagner, but different; a lyrical poet who, while Wagner was proclaiming that "absolute music" was played out, gave us the charm of a fresh vision. Progress in technique must of necessity reach its term; but just as a new poet, while using the words and grammar of his predecessors, is able to leave the impress of a new personality on his hearers, so must it be among musicians. For the types of genius are as inexhaustible as the conceptions of the Divine Mind of which they are the embodiment.

H. O. A.

SCROOGE'S CONVERSION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Scrooge is only one of the many of Dickens's characters that suffer a more or less violent conversion. Pickwick is too well known to need mention. But what of Mr. Lorry in "A Tale of Two Cities"? What relation is the tactless, stiff-kneed, embodiment of a bank we see at the Royal George Hotel, to the affable, elastic old gentleman we meet under the same name later on?

The pendulum of mediocrity is for ever swinging between love and hate; and it has always seemed to me something of a strange anomaly, that its high priest should have been a man of such strongly divided sympathies. Dickens always loves or hates. No one is neutral, and in romance there is nothing the average reader dislikes more, than a character dyed permanent grey. They may start grey, but, gentle novelist, please note, whatever their virtues or offences, we must not be left in any doubt as to your sympathies before the end.

I think the conversion of many of Dickens's characters is caused by this amiable fault. But to me it becomes an unpardonable offence in the case of Harold Skimpole. How my heart "burned within" me as I read: "in simplicity, and freshness, and enthusiasm, and a fine guileless inaptitude for all worldly affairs, he is a perfect child." Here, thought I, we are going to have a fine study of the vagaries of the artistic temperament—and so we did for one chapter; and then, little by little, the conversion went on, until we had instead merely a portrait of heartless villany which even the exigencies of the plot did not demand.

Pardon my trespass upon your space, but even now I have only suggested the study.

M. P.

June 19.

SPELLING AND PRONUNCIATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is difficult to argue with a writer who is apparently a devotee of Pope's airy philosophy that "Whatever is is right." On this principle he might contend that it is "quite right" to spell "precede" and "secede" in one way and "proceed" and "succeed" in another, though both are derived from the selfsame Latin verb, and though our eccentricities of spelling and pronunciation are the laughing-stock of philologists. Why do most English writers give us "honour," but Macaulay and Dickens "honor"? Why do most of us write "author" and "labour," "actor" and "fervour"? Why does the Bible give us "judgment" and the Prayer Book "judgement"? Why do most of us sound the "h" in "who" and "whom," and slur it in "which" and "where," sound the "t" in "oft" and slur it in "often"? Why do Milton and our French cousins make "colonel" three syllables, and every one else two? Why do most of us pronounce "mourn" and "morn" exactly alike, and "surpass" and "trespass" differently? Why have "propose" and "proposition," "one" and "only" different pronunciations? Why do vast numbers of English-speaking folk pronounce "girl" differently from "twirl" and "swirl"? Why do we all pronounce the "l" in "wold" and "shoulder," and decline to pronounce it in "would" and "should"? I once heard two of the most distinguished scholars of our great English Universities disputing whether "sough," used by Tennyson of the wind, should be pronounced like "plough" or like "trough." Who shall say which of the two was "right," or whether either was "right"? Not all "the lexicographers, grammarians, and writers on English phonetics," including the immortal Noah Webster, can determine the point.

Your correspondent's extraordinary theory about compound words might stagger even Macaulay's "Fourth Form boy." Do all "lexicographers, and grammarians, and writers on English phonetics," "in church or in the market-place," in "the pulpit or on the stage," pronounce the first syllable short in "bygone," "wholesome," "cow-slip," "winefat," "swineherd," "ploughshare," and "nobleman"? If not, what becomes of the "strict accordance with the laws of English phonology," which your correspondent proclaims with so much unctio?

Having said thus much, I bid farewell to your correspondent's complacent dogmatism, which I, like Tennyson, emphatically decline to share.

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

AMERICAN OR U.S.A.?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I was sorry to observe in the last issue of the ACADEMY, in the notice of Mr. Upton Sinclair's book, the adoption of the adjectival United States instead of American.

Surely the ACADEMY is aware that the designation United States appertains to several countries, notably to the great and populous Brazil; whereas American connotes but one, viz., America, which is not, however, to be confounded with the Continent of North America or that of South America.

I may remark, too, that several influential newspapers have lately shown a regrettable tendency to lapse again into references to the "United States Ambassador" in spite of the official notification that the Embassy is the "American Embassy" occupied by the American Ambassador.

A CANADIAN.

June 18.

["The Press and Government of the United States" was the phrase our correspondent censures. We should have added: "of America." Had we written: "the American Press and Government," the confusion would have been greater still, for, if Brazil is United States, it is also America; and the "official" phrase, "the American Ambassador," is even more arrogantly out of proportion to its actual content than "the United States Ambassador" would be. The confusion will continue until every one, on or off the Press, takes the trouble to say "United States of America" in full. We hope, by the way, that our correspondent has not fallen into the common error of imagining that the house "occupied" by the "American Ambassador" (in Park Lane) is the American Embassy. It is—until the Longworth Bill shall have become law—merely a private house: the American Embassy is in Victoria Street.—ED.]

THE ETHICS OF EDITING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A few months back a reviewer in your columns called attention to the perfunctory editing of a play by Mr. J. S. Farmer. I have a similar charge to bring against this gentleman, who does not appear to be troubled with a very tender conscience. Some days ago I bought for eighteenpence a volume in a series called the "Museum Dramatists," containing two interludes by John Heywood, The Pardoner and the Friar and The Four P.P. As I felt curious to see how far your reviewer's strictures were justified, I took the trouble to test Mr. Farmer's accuracy by comparing his text of The Four P.P. with the two early editions in the British Museum. One of these editions is without a date, but is supposed to have been printed in 1545 or thereabouts. The British Museum catalogue reads 1545? not 1545 as Mr. Farmer incorrectly states, it is also practically unpunctuated; the other bears the date 1569 on the title-page, and appears to have been the copy used by Dodsley for the text of this play in his collection of Old Plays (1744). It contains a number of manuscript corrections and the punctuation is revised throughout. Both corrections and punctuation agree with Dodsley's first edition.

Here we have two early editions from which it is not impossible to make a reasonably correct text. Now Mr. Farmer assures us, at the end of his preface, that his text is that of the earliest edition, i.e., the undated edition now in the British Museum (C. 34. c. 43). After spending four or five hours at the British Museum I can say without the slightest hesitation that it is not so. If Mr. Farmer had been bold enough to confess his evident contempt for the intelligence of the student of English literature, he would have said nothing about the earliest edition, but would have called his text what it really is—a reprint of Mr. W. C. Hazlitt's which was published as long ago as 1874. I should then have known what to expect, and I can assure him that I would not have parted so readily with my eighteenpence. I shall now show the degree of accuracy to which a modern editor can attain. Page 29:

"To Jehosaphat and Olivet
On foot, God wot, I went right bare.
Many a salt tear did I sweat
Before thy carcase could come there."

It is obvious that there is something wrong with the last line. Turning to the earlier editions I find that one reads thys and the other this. The word in the text was first introduced by Mr. Hazlitt. Page 32: The Palmer is telling us the value he sets on pardons and pardoners, and goes on to say:

"Wherefore I went myself to the self thing
In every place and without saying:
Had as much pardon there assuredly,
As you can promise me here doubtfully."

The reader will be amazed at the punctuation, which is a fair specimen of the Dodsley-Hazlitt-Farmer system, but he will be more amazed to know that the meaningless word saying in the second line appears in the edition of 1545 as faynyng and in that of 1569 as fayning. Page 33:

"Which is far aside heaven, by God," should be (ed. 1545):

"Which is far a this side heaven, by God," and on the same page, "In part of your saying" should be: "In part of your sayings." Page 34:

"Long life after good works indeed
Doth hinder man's receipt of mead;
And death before one duty done,
May make us think we die too soon
Yet better tarry a thing than have it;
Than go too soon, and vainly crave it."

In the old editions the word printed mead appears as mede (1545) and meed (1569). In the fifth line, if we put a comma after the word thing, and instead of than retain the reading of the old copies then, we succeed in making the lines intelligible.

Page 35: By our lady than have I gone wrong. Ed. 1545, then. Now, on my faith, well watched. Ed. 1545, full well watched.

Page 41, third line from bottom: do is a misprint for to, and on page 42, fourth line from the top: on takes the place of only, thus reducing the line to nonsense. Page 44:

"All his life after I undertake,
He shall never be vexed with the tooth ache."

In the edition of which Mr. Farmer claims that his text is a reprint the last line reads:

"He shall be rid of the tooth ache."

This is the metrical counterpart of the preceding line, and I am certain Mr. Farmer would not have rejected it if he had really gone to the original. On page 46 richesse appears as richness. Page 50:

"But her head so giddy and her belly so short."

The word belly appears as hellys (ed. 1545) and as heles (ed. 1569). The unhappy emendation is to be credited to either Mr. Hazlitt or Mr. Farmer, as the earlier editions of Dodsley preserve the original reading. Page 52:

"That was the thing that grieved me so
That nothing could realise my woe."

Both the old editions read release.

I can say without a shadow of exaggeration that the above variations represent something like a tenth of the total differences between the two early editions and Mr. Farmer's. They occur on almost every page and are incomprehensible except on the assumption that the editor imagines that no care is necessary when it is a question merely of an English writer. I shall be told perhaps that Mr. Farmer is "no Bentley," that no man is infallible. I admit cheerfully that Mr. Farmer is indeed "no Bentley," but there is a limit to human fallibility, and for myself I find it well to draw the line at Mr. Farmer's editions of English writers. Is it a cause, then, for wonder that scholars such as Professor Bang and his colleagues at Louvain should smile disdainfully at the English editors of our literature, when men of the standing of Mr. Farmer and Mr. Churton Collins fail to recognise that an editor's first duty is to produce the best possible text, and that critical, biographical and exegetical details are of secondary consideration?

FRANCIS WOOLLETT.

GERMAN ETYMOLOGY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I retain a pleasant recollection of the pre-Wagnerian German Opera in London, including performances of Mozart's Magic Flute, and its German form of Zauber has haunted me ever since. Our chief authority, Professor Kluge, is quite indefinite herein.

Our word witch is their "zauberinn," which affords a starting-point for investigation; and with us a witch is closely connected with wicked, see A.S. wican, wiccan; Icel. víkhja, víkinna. Witch is certainly connected with the slang term feich, and fakements lands us on the Latin facitius; it is a very widespread root as in the common fetich of Africa, Portuguese feitico, Spanish hechicero, German hexe, Eng. hag; and we have the form setizo, an idol, in 1670. Now zauber being still to find, I propose to derive it from the Greek σοφός "cunning," so our sophistry; the word as used by mediæval Latinists included all forms of wickedness. In German the application of sauber extends to sauber, clean, neat, pretty; säubern is "to clean"; it compares with our sobriety, but not from σοφός, yet from the nearly allied σώφρων; and the change from s to z as initials, prepares us for the Dutch tooveren, to enchant, while tooveraar is a sorcerer; with the allied sniver, meaning clean, neat, pretty, and a reversion to the initial z. Viewed phonetically, we see that saub=σοφ, and taub (deaf), Dutch doof is from τῶπος; so we have an exact parallel. But we have now tapped a different root-word, viz., hexe, which Kluge says has not been satisfactorily explained; still, I would point to the fine old town of Hexham, and here is the word. This place-name was Hagustald with varied spellings; it has early Celtic and Roman remains, being close to the Wall ascribed to Hadrian. The prefix hagu represents the Greek ἄγος, ἄγιος; the suffix stall means a place, Latin stabulum, Sanskrit stha; this English site became sacred as a religious sanctuary, and they preserve the fugitive's "frith-stool" or seat, which replaced the pagan holed-stone; see the Greek forms ἀγίασμα, or τὸ ἄγιον, a sanctuary.

So hag and hexe are connected in their origins with ἀγίω to hallow, make sacred; and the descent to hag as an old woman, with the cognate hedge, an enclosure or boundary, reminds us how sacred were the limes or landmarks that separate contiguous territories.

Having, it may be hoped, established the German hexe, it is well to point out that we have the superlative hext, meaning "highest."

"The erchebischof of Canturberi,
In Engelande that is hext," which points to the German hoch; everything associated with hallow, sacred: say a sanctuary, Latin sanctus, "holy," inspires awe and elevated feelings; so, if the Greek ἄγος from ἀγω, to lead, i.e., highest in command, survives by corruption as hexe it may involve hoch and high; but we have again tapped a fresh root-word, viz., awe: see Gothic agis, certainly Greek, including αἰγίς, Latin agis, the Titanic shield, inspiring awe by its affixed Gorgon's head. The German form ehre does not come in here, being merely a mutation of hehr, exalted sublime, sacred: cf., herr, lord, master, gentleman.

A. HALL.

June 15.

ESCHEW

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I should be glad to learn whether you or your learned correspondents regard it as justifiable to pronounce "eschew" as "e-shu." This has been my custom for some years, but having lately been subjected to severe rebukes for not pronouncing the word as though it were connected with the process of mastication, I appeal to your tribunal.

H. D. A. M.

AUTHORS AND ARTISTS' BLUNDERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some time ago you asked for examples of inconsistency in any standard works. I have found three that may be of interest:

(1) Dr. Blimber's school, in "Dombey and Son," is said to have been restricted to ten pupils. In H. K. Browne's engraving about fifteen are represented.

(2) In the same book in a "small room," in a "mere cottage," with everything "on a diminutive scale," it is said that "there are games of skill and chance set forth on tables . . . fantastic chessmen, dice, backgammon, cards, and billiards." Ch. iii. vol. 2.

(3) In "Jane Eyre" Rochester is described as having an eye knocked out: later on he recovers the partial use of one of his eyes.

J. E. A. STEGGALL.

[The first was mentioned in our notes.—ED.]

THE SLUMP IN POETRY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I see that some of your correspondents are propounding theories to account for the alleged slump in poetry, the existence of which has, I understand, been discovered by one of those curious people who concoct paragraphs about literature for the general press, and whose sole qualification seems to be absolute ignorance about literature. So far as my experience goes, I believe that poetry of merit finds a publisher and a public more readily at present than at any time in the past, and that, allowing for the fact that we have no great poetic genius writing to-day, the level of merit of what poetry is published is singularly high. I believe it would be impossible to make a reputation with work of a kind that delighted our parents and grandparents, and I firmly hold that the anthologist of 1950 will find very much to reward his search in the poetry of 1890-1906.

I am bound to say that in my experience, whether it be poetry or any other form of literary art, good work tells in the long run. With very very rare exceptions, after a dozen years it is the really good stuff which is found to go on selling. There is a public, and as far as poetry goes it is not such a very small one, which can and does appreciate.

ALFRED NUTT.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Staley, Edgcombe. The Guilds of Florence. Illustrated after miniatures in illuminated manuscripts and Florentine woodcuts. With bibliographical and chronological tables. 10½×6½. Pp. 622. Methuen, 16s. net.

Clouston, R. S. English Furniture and Furniture Makers of the Eighteenth Century. Illustrated. 9½×5½. Pp. 362. Hurst & Blackett, 10s. 6d. net. [Much of the letterpress and most of the illustrations have appeared in The Burlington Magazine and The Connoisseur, but the reprinted matter has been re-written and revised.]

Jackson, T. G. Reason in Architecture. Lectures delivered at the Royal Academy of Arts in the Year 1906. 9×6½. Pp. 189. Murray, 10s. 6d. net.

[Part of the book formed the substance of two lectures delivered at the Royal Institution in 1905. They were afterwards re-written and enlarged for the Royal Academy of Arts.]

Hardie, Martin. English Coloured Books. 10½×7½. Pp. 340. 28 full-page illustrations. The Connoisseur's Library. Methuen, 25s. net.

[From the "Book of St. Albans," 1486, which contains the earliest English illustrations in colour, to the "three-colour process." Good tables, appendices and index.]

Ritter, William. Etudes d'Art étranger. 7½×4½. Pp. 471. Paris: Société de Mercure de France, 3fr. 50.

[Studies in painting, music and literature, Norwegian, Polish, Austrian, and others not French.]

Calthrop, Dion Clayton. English Costume. II.—Middle Ages. 9½×6½. Pp. 142. Black, 7s. 6d. net.

[Illustrated. Vol. i. "Early English," appeared in April. See the ACADEMY April 28, 1906, p. 412.]

Class Illustrations for the Study of Architectural History. Comprising the complete series of 300 plates as appearing in the fifth and enlarged edition of "A History of Architecture on the Comparative Method," by Banister Fletcher and Banister F. Fletcher. In four sections. Section I.—Classic Architecture. 90 Plates, comprising illustrations 1-89, with the diagram of "The Tree of Architecture." Batsford, 4s. net.

[Orders must be for not less than five copies of any one section, or two copies of the complete collection.]

Rembrandt, A Memorial, 1606-1906. 14½×10. Pp. 6. With 7 plates. Part VIII. Heinemann, 2s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Reade, Aleya Lyell. The Reades of Blackwood Hall, in the Parish of Horton, Staffordshire. A record of their descendants: with a full account of Dr. Johnson's Ancestry, his Kinsfolk and Family Connections. Eighteen plates and twenty-nine large tabular pedigrees. 13½×10½. Pp. 283, xlii. Spottiswoode & Co., privately printed for the author.

[Three hundred and fifty copies have been printed and the type distributed: a few remain and may be obtained from the author, Park Corner, Blundellsands, Liverpool.]

Jackson, B. Daydon. George Bentham. English Men of Science Series. 7½×5. Pp. 292. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.

[Bibliography and index.]

The Memoirs of the Lord of Joinville. A new English version by Ethel Wedgwood. Illustrated. 8½×5½. Pp. 409. Murray, 9s. net.

[The translation is based on Francisque Michel's edition of the fourteenth-century manuscript known as Supplement 2016, Bibliothèque royale.]

Sherard, Robert Harborough. The Life of Oscar Wilde. With a full reprint of the famous revolutionary article, "Jacta Alea Est," which was written by Jane Francesca Elgee, who afterwards became the mother of Oscar Wilde, and an additional chapter contributed by one of the prison-warders who held Oscar Wilde in Gaol. Illustrated with portraits, facsimile letters, and other documents. 9×5½. Pp. xvi, 470. Werner Laurie, 12s. 6d. net.

De Villiers du Terrage, le Baron Marc. Conquistadores et Roitelets. Rois sans Couronne: du roi de Canaries à l'Empereur du Sahara. 8×5. Pp. vi, 474. Paris: Perrin, 5f.

[Studies in strange by-ways of history; the adventures of many men, who have tried to win crowns from Bethancourt, King of the Canaries, 1402, to M. Max Lebaudy, Emperor of the Sahara. Illustrated with maps and portraits.]

Bussey, H. Findlater. Sixty Years of Journalism. Anecdotes and Reminiscences. 7½×5. Pp. 304. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.

[Reminiscences of sixty years' journalistic work.]

DRAMA.

Osmaston, F. P. B. Cromwell. A drama in five acts. 7½×5½. Pp. 211. Kegan Paul, 5s. net.

Pain, Mrs. Barry. Short Plays for Amateur Acting. 6½×5. Pp. 120. Chapman & Hall, 1s. 6d. net.

EDUCATION.

A Midsummer Night's Dream. Edited with introduction, Notes, Glossary, etc., by P. T. Creswell. Narratives from Macaulay. (1) The Trial of the Bishops; (2) The Siege of Londonderry; (3) The Massacre of Glencoe. Edited with Introduction, Notes, Glossary, etc., by Fanny Johnson. English Literature for Secondary Schools Series. Each 7×4½. Pp. 92 and 119. Macmillan, 1s. each.

Vigny, Alfred de. Histoire de l'Adjudant. Edited by Cloudeley Brereton. Choix de Poésies pour les enfants. Rédigé par Mlle. M. Humbert. Little French Classics. Each 6½×4½. Pp. 34 and 40. Blackie, 4d. each.

Elliot, G. F. Scott. A First Course in Practical Botany. 7½×5. Pp. 344. Blackie, 3s. 6d.

FICTION.

Fogazzaro, Antonio. Le Saint. Traduit de l'Italien par G. Hérèle. 7½×4½. Pp. 380. Paris: Hachette, 3fr. 50.

[A French translation of "Il Santo" which has been placed on the "Index," and the Italian edition of which has been withdrawn by the author.]

Fogazzaro, Antonio. The Saint. Translated from the Italian by M. Prichard-Agnetti. 7½×5½. Pp. 400. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

- Hale, Louise Closser. A Motor Car Divorce. With drawings by Walter Hale. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 319. Duckworth, 6s.
- Animal Heroes*, being the Histories of a Cat, a Dog, a Pigeon, a Lynx, two Wolves and a Reindeer, and in Elucidation of the Same over 200 drawings by Ernest Thompson Seton, Designs for cover, title-page and general make-up by Grace Gallatin Seton. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 362. Constable, 6s. net.
- Sergeant, Adeline. The Coming of the Randolphs. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 307. Methuen, 6s.
- Sturgis, Howard Overing. All That Was Possible. Being the record of a summer in the life of Mrs. Sibyl Crofts, comedian. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Constable, 6s. (See p. 589.)
- van Vorst, Marie. The Sin of George Warrenner. 7½ x 5. Pp. 371. Heinemann, 6s.
- Brebner, Percy James (Christian Lys). The Crucible of Circumstance. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 389. Warne, 6s.
- Warden, Florence. Law, not Justice. 8 x 5½. Pp. 325. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

HISTORY.

- The Times History of the War in South Africa, 1899-1902*. Vol. iv. Edited by Basil Williams. Photogravure portraits, maps and plans 9½ x 6½. Pp. xviii, 597. Sampson Low, 21s. net. (See p. 590.)
- Avery, Elroy McKendree. A History of the United States and its People, from their Earliest Records to the Present Time. In fifteen volumes—vols. i. and ii. Pp. 405, 458. Cleveland: The Burrows Brothers Company. $6.25 per vol.
- Denis, Ernest. La Fondation de l'Empire Allemand (1852-1871). 9½ x 6½. Pp. viii, 528. Paris: Colin, 10fr.
- Kisky, Dr. Phil. Wilhelm. Die Domkapitel der geistlichen Kurfürsten in ihrer persönlichen Zusammensetzung im vierzehnten und fünfzehnten Jahrhundert Gekrönte Preisschrift. 9½ x 6. Pp. x, 197. M. 5.40. Rudorff, Hermann. Zur Erklärung des Wormser Konkordats. 9½ x 6. Pp. 66. M. 3. Quellen und Studien zur Verfassungsgeschichte des Deutschen Reiches in Mittelalter und Neuzeit. Band I. Hefte 3 und 4. Weimar: Böhlau.
- von Walter, Johannes. Die ersten Wanderprediger Frankreichs: Studien zur Geschichte des Mönchtums. Neue Folge. 9 x 5½. Pp. x, 179. Leipzig: Deichert, M. 4.80.
- [Bernhard von Thiron; Vitalis von Savigny; Girald von Salles; Bemerkungen zu Norbert von Xanten und Heinrich von Lausanne.]

LITERATURE.

- La Biblioteca Marciana nella sua nuova Sede*. xxvii Aprile MDCCCXV. 12½ x 8½. Pp. 117. Venezia: Biblioteca Nazionale Marciana, n.p.
- [See p. 596. The book contains the inaugural discourses, two chapters on the history of the Library, from 1719-1812, and from 1812-1904; a Bibliografia Marciana, and many full-page and inset illustrations.]
- ea, Thomas. Schiller's Dramas and Poem in England. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 155. Unwin, 3s. 6d. net.
- [The author has attempted "to give a short review of the various translations of Schiller's dramas and poems, to show how they were regarded at the time of their appearance, and, lastly, to give a brief account of their influence on the master minds of the first half of the nineteenth century."]
- Jones, W. H. S. The Moral Standpoint of Euripides. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 35. Blackie, 2s. 6d. net.
- [Introduction, including ancient authorities; Essay proper; Index of important passages.]
- Library of Harvard University. Bibliographical Contributions, No. 57. Catalogue of the Molière Collection in Harvard College Library. Acquired chiefly from the library of the late Ferdinand Böcher, A.M. Compiled by Thomas Franklin Currier and Ernest Lewis Gay. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 148. Cambridge, Mass., n.p.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- The Royal University of Ireland: The Calendar for the Year 1906. 8½ x 5. Pp. 535. Dublin: Printed for the Royal University of Ireland by Alex. Thom & Co., n.p.
- [The papers set at the examinations in 1905 are published in a separate volume forming a supplement to this Calendar.]
- Wells, J. The Oxford Degree Ceremony. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 98. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1s. 6d. net.
- [The object of this little book is to attempt to set forth the meaning of Oxford forms and ceremonies, and to show how much of University history is involved in them. As far as possible the language of the statutes, whether past or present, has been introduced: the forms actually used in the degree ceremony are given in Latin and translated.]
- Tucker, C. Comyns. On the Doctrine of Personal Identity Considered with Reference to a Future Life. 7 x 4½. Pp. 31. Longmans, 1s. 6d. net.
- Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation*. Edited for the Society by Sir John Macdonell and Edward Manson. New Series. Vol. vii, part i. 9½ x 6. Pp. 287. Murray, 5s. net.

MUSIC.

- Prod'homme, J.-G. Les Symphonies de Beethoven (1800-1827). Préface de M. Edouard Colonne. 8 x 5½. Pp. xiv, 492. Paris: Delagrave, 5f.
- [A chapter to each symphony, its history and thematic analysis, with a tenth chapter for the unwritten tenth symphony. After most of the chapters come lists of the composer's works, thus forming a complete bibliography.]
- Simcoe, H. Augustine. Sullivan v. Critic; or Practice v. Theory. A Study in Press Phenomena. 7½ x 5. Pp. 150. Simplin, Marshall, 1s. net.

POETRY.

- Drinkwater, John. The Death of Leander, and other poems. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 40. Birmingham: Cornish, 2s. 6d. net.
- Mackay, Alice Dacre. Song of the London Man, Song of South Africa, and other poems. Portrait of the author. 7 x 4½. Pp. 212. Kegan Paul, 5s. net.
- Walker, Rev. Richard Johnson. The Mystick Pair, and other poems. 8 x 5½. Pp. 79. Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d. net.
- Herklots, Bernard. Revelatio Dei: the Eternal Revelation of the Triune God. A poem. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 96. Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d. net.

POLITICS.

- Sabatier, Paul. A propos de la Séparation des Eglises et de l'Etat. 3me. édition, complètement revue et très augmentée. 7½ x 4½. Pp. lxxiv, 216. Paris: Fischbacher, 3f.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- The Dramatic Works of William Shakespeare*. Vol. iii. New Century Library. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 588. Nelson, 2s. net.
- [Contains King John; Richard II.; Henry IV.; Henry V.; and Henry VI.]
- The Hampstead Garner*. Compiled by A.M.C. With a Preface by Clement Shorter. 6½ x 4½. Pp. viii, 200. Elliot Stock, n.p.
- [A quotation for every day in the year from some poet who either lived at Hampstead or sang of it.]
- Reich, Emil. Hungarian Literature: an historical and critical survey. Second edition. With an authentic map of Hungary and full index. 7½ x 5. Pp. 272. Jarrold, 3s. 6d. net.
- Arrowsmith's Dictionary of Bristol*. Fifty-four illustrations. Second edition. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 448. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 5s. net.
- [A revised and enlarged edition of the original dictionary published over twenty years ago.]
- Theological Essays of the late Benjamin Jowett*. Selected, arranged, and edited by Lewis Campbell. 7 x 4½. Pp. 267. Frowde, 2s. 6d. net.
- [Essays on: The Character of St. Paul; St. Paul and the Twelve; Conversion and Changes of Character (Romans vii.); Casuistry (Romans xiv.); Natural Religion; Righteousness by Faith; Atonement and Satisfaction. The Essays on "St. Paul and the Twelve," and on "Casuistry" have been slightly abridged; the remaining five are given here as they appear in Professor Jowett's second edition (1859).]
- The Proverbs, Epigrams, and Miscellanies of John Heywood*. Comprising: A Dialogue of the Effectual Proverbs in the English Tongue concerning Marriages—First Hundred Epigrams—Three Hundred Epigrams on Three Hundred Proverbs—The Fifth Hundred Epigrams—A Sixth Hundred Epigrams—Miscellanies—Ballads—Note-book and Word-list. Edited by John S. Farmer. Pp. 466. The Dramatic Writings of Ulpian Fulwell. Comprising: Like Will to Like—Note-book and Word-list. Edited by John S. Farmer. Pp. 67. Each 7 x 4½. Privately Printed for Subscribers by the Early English Drama Society, 18 Bury Street, Bloomsbury.
- The Works of Ben Jonson. Vol. i.—The Case is Altered; Every Man in his Humour; Every Man out of his Humour. Edited by H. C. Hart. Standard Library. 7½ x 5. Pp. xlviii, 235. Methuen, 1s. net. (See p. 592.)
- King John and Julius Caesar*. Red Letter Shakespeare. Each 6½ x 3½. Pp. 119 and 117. Blackie, 1s. 6d. net each.
- Greenwell, Dora. Everlasting Love, and Other Songs of Salvation. Heart and Life Booklets, No. 10. 6½ x 4. Pp. 44. Allenson, 6d. net.

SCIENCE.

- Sainsbury, Harrington. Principia Therapeutica. 9 x 5½. Pp. 244. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.
- [Few medical books are so well written as this. As the title implies, the subject of it is principles, not details.]

THEOLOGY.

- Gwatkin, Henry Melville. The Knowledge of God and its Historical Development. 2 vols. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 308, 334. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 12s. net.
- [These volumes represent the Gifford Lectures delivered at Edinburgh in 1904 and 1905. They have been re-arranged with more regard to unity of subject and less to uniformity of length, and considerable additions have been made. Thus, the first series of ten lectures is condensed into nine, while the second, also of ten, is expanded into seventeen.]
- The Religious Opinions of Elizabeth Barrett Browning as Expressed in Three Letters addressed to Wm. Merry, Esq., J.P.* 8 x 5½. Pp. 56. Hodder & Stoughton, 2s. 6d. net.
- [Published by permission of Messrs. Smith, Elder, on behalf of the Proprietor of the Copyright.]
- Macalister, R. A. Stewart. Bible Sidelights from the Mound of Gezer. A record of excavation and discovery in Palestine. Illustrated. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 232. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.
- [A series of Biblical incidents or passages are chosen and studied with special reference to the light which, it is claimed, the results of the excavation have thrown upon them.]
- Ropes, James Hardy. The Apostolic Age in the Light of Modern Criticism. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 327. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.
- [This essay, "substantially in its present form," was prepared for a course of Lowell Institute Lectures, given in March 1904.]
- Haddon, Alfred C. Magic and Fetishism. Religious Ancient and Modern series. 7 x 4½. Pp. 99. Constable, 1s. net.
- Inge, William Ralph. Truth and Falsehood in Religion. Six lectures delivered at Cambridge to undergraduates in the Lent Term, 1906. 7½ x 5. Pp. 176. Murray, 3s. 6d. net.
- Thureau-Dangin, Paul. La Renaissance Catholique en Angleterre au XIX<sup>e</sup> Siècle. 3me. partie; De la mort de Wiseman à la mort de Manning (1865-1891). 9 x 5½. Pp. 543. Paris: Plon, 7f. 50.
- Smith, William Benjamin. Der Vo-christliche Jesus nebst Weiteren Vocstudien zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Unchristenthums. Mit einem Vorworte von Paul Wilhelm Schmiedel. 9 x 6½. Pp. xix, 243. Gieszen, Töpelmann, M. 4.
- Seeberg, D. Alfred. Die beiden Wege und das Aposteldekret. 9½ x 5½. Pp. 105. Leipzig: Deichert, M. 2.50.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Mitton, G. E. Clerkenwell and St. Luke's, comprising the Borough of Finsbury. Edited by Sir Walter Besant. The Fascination of London series. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 127. Black, 1s. 6d.
- A First Visit to the Outlook Tower*. 7½ x 5. Pp. 32. Edinburgh: Geddes, 3d.
- [The Outlook Tower is on Castle Hill, Edinburgh, and was acquired by Professor Geddes in 1892, as an outlook and a type-museum, showing the relation of Edinburgh to the world.]

A NEW IRISH ILLUSTRATED MISCELLANY*THE SHANACHIE

Fcap. 4to. Antique Paper. 1/- net

THE MIRACULOUS REVENGE. A Story by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.TWO POEMS. By W. B. YEATS.

And Prose and Verse from Lady Gregory, Lord Dunsany, S. O'Sullivan, G. Birmingham, F. MacCarthy, Stephen Gwynn, Father O'Leary, P. Colm, A. P. Graves and Grace Rhys.

Illustrations by Hugh Thomson, Seaghan MacCathonaioil, Elinor Monsell, George Morrow, Jack B. Yeats and Beatrice Elvery.

MAUNSEL &amp; CO., LTD., 60 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE*RED

DRINK THE

WHITEDELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.& BLUEIn making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER
FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM
YOUR NEWSAGENT THESaturday
Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS
THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND
MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.THE ACADEMYA WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds,
Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By
post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest
and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.
By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by
his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd., 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

Printed for the Proprietors by BALLANTYNE & CO. LIMITED, Tavistock Street, London, and Published at the Offices of COUNTRY LIFE, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden. and GEORGE NEWNES, LTD. Southampton Street, Strand.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1782

JUNE 30, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW.

CHAIR OF HUMANITY.

THE University Court of the University of Glasgow will on July 19 or some subsequent date proceed to appoint a Professor to occupy the above Chair which is now vacant.

The Professor will be required to enter on his duties on October 1, 1906, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary is fixed by Ordinance at £1000. The Chair has an Official Residence attached to it.

The appointment is made ad vitam aut culpam and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, 20 copies of his application and 20 copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit on or before July 7, 1906.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,
Secretary of the Glasgow University Court,
91 West Regent Street, Glasgow.

CAMBRIDGE GRADUATE (double second class) desires, from middle of July onwards, Tutorship. Experience in Coaching, Classics, Mathematics, Science, Literature.—Tutor, c/o THE ACADEMY, 20 Tavistock Street, Strand, W.C.

BACKWARD BOYS SUCCESSFUL.

See Staff (honoursmen), fees (moderate), successes (18 years), diet, testimonials, etc.—Rector, Combe Florey, Taunton.

SEVEN RESIDENT TUTORS FOR 14 PUPILS.

KHEDIVIAL SCHOOL OF LAW, CAIRO

LAW LECTURESHIP.

THE Egyptian Ministry of Education invites applications for the post of Lecturer in the English section of the Khedivial School of Law, Cairo. Salary £615 rising to £820. Candidates must be University men, having either a law degree or other legal qualification, and must have some knowledge of French. The successful applicant will be required in the first instance to lecture (in English) on Roman Law.

Applications, stating age and qualifications, and accompanied by copies only of testimonials, to be sent before July 14, 1906, to DOUGLAS DUNLOP, Esq., Gullane, East Lothian, to whom Candidates may apply by letter for further information.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Book-sellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

MISCELLANEA GENEALOGICA ET HERALDICA, Vol. ii, First Series (about 1870), wanted; good price given.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury, Vol. I., 1869 for sale.)

Sale by Auction

Valuable Autograph Letters and Relics of the Wesley Family.

MESSRS. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE will SELL by AUCTION at their House, No. 13 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C., on MONDAY, JULY 9, and Following Day, at 1 o'clock precisely. AUTOGRAPH LETTERS AND HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS, including specimens of R. Burns, Lord Tennyson, Carlyle, Thackeray, Dickens, Lord Nelson, Napoleon, Franklin, Washington, and others. Important Correspondence of C. Darwin, John Ruskin, Sir John Franklin, Lord Beaconsfield, E. B. Browning and Sir W. Scott. Fine Letters of Frederick the Great. Autographs of Musical Composers, Important Letters and Relics of the Wesley Family. Desk Chair used by Oliver Goldsmith, Collections of Autographs in Albums, etc.

May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

FISHING in DERBYSHIRE & AROUND; FISHING IN WALES, both by W. M. Gallighan, post 8vo, cloth, new; published at 3s. 6d. net, for 1s. 9d. each, post free.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

J. POOLE & CO.

Established
1834.

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,

All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

HAMERTON (P.G.), French and English: a Comparison; crown 8vo, cloth, new; 10s. 6d. for 3s. 3d. Hamerton, The Mount and the City of Autun, 3s. 6d. for 1s. 6d.; both post free.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

"CHRISTIANITY AS CHRIST PREACHED IT." This and other pamphlets free and books on loan from Mrs. SQUIRRELL, Lynton, Stoneygate, Leicester.

STAMMERING.—The severest and most obstinate cases can now be perfectly and permanently cured by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years; call or write.—Mr. A. C. Schnelle, 112 Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING.—AUTHORS' MSS. of all kinds carefully TYPED. 9d. per 1000 after 3000. Knowledge of French, German and Italian. A. U. BOWMAN, 74 Limes Avenue, New Southgate, N.

Art

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S SPRING EXHIBITION includes choice Landscapes and Portraits by the Masters of the Early British School.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

EXHIBITION OF CONTEMPORARY GERMAN ART, PRINCES' GALLERY, KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

NOW OPEN, 10 to 6.

ALPINE CLUB, MILL STREET, CONDUIT STREET.—Large Decorative Panels by J. Kerr Lawson are being exhibited by Messrs. Carfax & Co., every day from 10 till 6. Admission one shilling.

WILLIAM BLAKE.—Exhibition of Paintings and Water-colours. The largest ever brought together in England at CARFAX GALLERY, 24 Bury Street, St. James. 10 till 6. Admission One Shilling.

CLIFFORD'S INN HALL. FRIDAY CLUB EXHIBITION. Works of Art, Ancient and Modern. Open daily from 10 to 6, till July 7. Catalogues one shilling.

EXHIBITION of Important PAINTINGS by MANET, from the Faure Collection, at Messrs. SULLEY & Co.'s Galleries, 159, New Bond St. DAILY (until July 7), 10-5. Admission, 1s including catalogue. LAST WEEK.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

AND AFTER

No. 353. JULY

The House of Lords. By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL Bart.

The Story of the Capitulations. By EDWARD DICEY, C.B.

The Absorption of Holland by Germany. By J. ELLIS-BARKER

German Trade in South America. By Major-General Sir ALEXANDER B. TULLOCH, K.C.B., C.M.G.

Disarmament. By Colonel the Earl of ERROLL

Wireless Telegraphy. By Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY M. HOZIER, K.C.B.

"Soft Siena" and her Children. By Miss ROSE M. BRADLEY

A Plea for the White South by a Coloured Woman. By MARY CHURCH TERRELL Timber planting on Waste Land. By JOHN NISBET (late Indian Forest Service)

Mrs. Atkins and "the Dauphin." By RALPH NEVILL

Letters of Lord Acton to Mary Gladstone. By the Right Hon. ALFRED LYTTELTON, M.P.

The Marriage Ritual of Toledo. By the Rev. HERBERT THURSTON, S.J.

Conservative Organisation and the Agricultural Labourers. By T. E. KEBBEL

Conflict or Compromise? By D. C. LATHBURY

The Prospects of the Bill. By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.

International Art: A Duologue. By Miss F. P. SEELEY

The Revival of Sculpture. By H. HAMILTON FYFE

Improved Shop Architecture for London: The New Regent's Quadrant. By Sir ASTON WEBB, R.A., F.R.I.B.A.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD., 5 NEW STREET SQUARE.

THE BOOK MONTHLY

CONTENTS FOR JULY

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR

The Book-Gospel of the Summer, and Pictures of People of the Hour

A THACKERAY CLUB

What Sir Theodore Martin and Others Think of the Idea

ADVANCE, AUSTRALIA!

The Poets and the Poetry of a Poetic Young People.—By Leon Brodzky

THE TURKISH NOVEL

A Thing of Shreds and Patches and of Popularity.—By Captain F. W. von Herbert

A LONDON LETTER

And Thoughts for the Time on the "Times" Book Club

TO PASTURES NEW

Some Literary Shrines now made Accessible by Rail.—By A. H. Diplock

A PEER OF THE PEN

The Late Duke of Argyll and His Literary Friends

LIGHT AND LEADING

New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY

Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month

BOOKS OF THE MONTH

A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions and Reprints of June

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., STATIONERS' HALL COURT, LONDON

SIXPENCE NET

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY, Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 22s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net. By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden." Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 11d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations. 21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450 Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each. By post, £2 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS, V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,

and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	611	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		The Poetry of Modern Panthe-
George Buchanan . . . . .	613	ism . . . . .	621
The Impartial Historian . . . . .	615	Fiction . . . . .	622
Dr. Plato on the Stump . . . . .	616	Fine Art:
Old Masters and New . . . . .	617	The New English Art Club . . . . .	623
The Old Testament in Greek . . . . .	617	The Faure Collection of
The True Sportsman . . . . .	618	Manets . . . . .	624
Restoration Lyrics . . . . .	619	Music:
Heresies on Style . . . . .	620	Brahms: Opus I. . . . .	625
The Owl . . . . .	621	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	626
		Correspondence . . . . .	627
		Books Received . . . . .	630
		Bookshelf . . . . .	630

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

It were greatly to be desired that some competent person would set himself to make a proper anthology for children. These collections abound, but we do not know of one that is satisfactory. The late Mr. W. E. Henley was perhaps as successful as any one else, but he was too intent upon tuning the heroic lyre, and the ideal selection ought not to be by any means one-sided. An anthology that we have before us at the present moment called "Lyra Britannica" sins in an opposite direction. It is like the net seen in the Apostle's vision, holding all things clean and unclean, tours de force that we have laughed at in the pages of Punch, minor verse written in choice Yankee, parodies and quips and quiddities from the accomplished hands of Mr. Barry Pain and others. We do not object to these things in due place and season, but they do not strike us as likely to produce a fine taste in the pupils who attend our elementary schools.

Unfortunately, it is not possible to give a recipe for making a good anthology. Many who are able to discourse with great wisdom and eloquence on the merits and demerits of poetry develop the most extraordinary vagaries of taste when called upon to illustrate their judgment by selection. The late Mr. Palgrave gave us one unsurpassable anthology, but he had behind him the ripe judgment and advice of the most illustrious poet who ever was made lawyer. In our time no one seems to have developed, or at least turned to account, the fine and fastidious taste that would give such a collection of verse as is desirable for use in elementary schools. The professors at the Universities are themselves somewhat to blame in this matter, chiefly for the reason that they set the fashion. Once upon a time it was their cue to glorify the old at the expense of the young, but nowadays they show their sympathy with the modern spirit by finding that the living geese are all swans. There is not one man in a thousand capable of selecting the best from contemporary work.

The republication of popular novels is in itself to be commended, but it seems to us in somewhat doubtful taste to issue, as though it were a new book, a work that had a success seven or eight years ago. This is what was done in the case of "All That Was Possible," a novel reviewed at length in last week's issue. There was nothing to show that it was not an entirely new book, and it would be most unreasonable to expect that the reviewer in whose hands it was placed should be familiar with all the imaginative literature that has been poured out of the press in the course of a decade. Some publishers are in the habit of attaching a little bibliography to every new issue, and so scholarly a practice ought to become general.

Our remarks on the minor poet have called from a correspondent (whose letter we do not publish because his indignation has betrayed him not only into bad grammar but into bad language) the story of his drama in blank verse which was published "a year or so ago." There were, it appears, but two reviews of it in all the London Press. One was only four lines in length; the other began: "The less said about this the better," a phrase which our correspondent dubs "fine prating." He goes on to say that he wants "a proper opinion" about his drama; and we were beginning to wonder whether we could spare the space to an examination of it which should justify or refute our contemporary's sweeping censure, when his next sentence gave us pause. "Suppose you give one [i.e., a "proper" opinion]: well, frankly, I won't take it; because I think that true criticism is not given to any of us British."

Authors, as critics know, are very difficult to please; few, we hope, so difficult as our correspondent. But we are not concerned with this display of the temper of a naughty child who cries "Shan't!" when invited to accept the apple it longs for. The letter raises the whole question of the relation of critic to author. "Our illustrious critics," writes our correspondent, "who know so much more than we do." The phrase is typical. To begin with, "illustrious" is what not one critic in a thousand can ever become. His work is nearly always done anonymously; and when he takes to signing it, it is a hundred to one that personal considerations sway the balance of his judgment a little. "After the brainsweat it took me," says our correspondent, "two reviews in a twelvemonth does not seem enough." Waiving the question whether this almost unanimous silence is not a proof that—to adopt our correspondent's grammar—they was enough, let us ask: "What of the 'brainsweat' of the critic who has to read and value a thousand such works as this drama in blank verse?" There is probably as much "brainsweat" in a dozen critical articles as in any drama; but the article gets no reviews, and the critic no notoriety.

"Who know so much more than we do." That, we submit, is exactly why a man is selected by an Editor to be a reviewer, because he knows. It is his business to know: it is not the business of the "poor wretches," who, as our correspondent says, with a confusion of thought that is too common: "try to practise, and not preach, Literature." And it is just because he knows that the critic is able to preserve his sense of proportion, which leads, sometimes, to the disappointments of authors. That there are many cases of extravagant laudation in modern reviewing, no one would deny. Mr. Arthur Symonds once collected a few, and describes in an essay his amazement at learning how many works of transcendent genius had been published during a few months; but that only strengthens our position, which is that, if the author of the present day has any good ground of complaint against his critics, it is that they are too anxious to "praise, praise, praise," not to blame, blame, blame. Their generous enthusiasm sometimes leads them to persuade an author that his work is greater than it is.

Referring to a statement made in these columns last week, that Scotland had no worthy memorial of George Buchanan, Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier write to call our attention to a column erected to his memory at Killearn, near his birthplace, and the monument in Greyfriars' churchyard, erected in 1878 at the expense of Dr. David Laing. Illustrations of both these monuments are given in the little life of Buchanan by Dr. Hume Brown, which is reviewed on another page. The latter, it may be noticed, does not stand on the spot where Buchanan's grave is supposed to be; that being still marked by the iron tablet referred to in our note of last week. In the quater-centenary edition of Dr. Wallace's work on Buchanan, also reviewed on another page, the frontispiece is a fine reproduction of the beautiful memorial window in Greyfriars' Church, put up at the expense of Mr. James Buchanan and designed by James Ballantine. One feature of this window is the St. Andrew's Cross, surrounded by the motto "Nemo me impune lacessit," which George Buchanan is said to have originated.

The meeting of the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty last Tuesday, brought out a fine record of work done, and increased aspirations for the future. The appeal issued at the meeting for funds to complete the purchase of Gowbarrow Fell and Aira Force has already been answered, as Canon Rawnsley, the indefatigable honorary Secretary, announced in the Times of Thursday, and that property will in due course pass into the hands of the Trust. Then there are the seven hundred and fifty acres of common at Hindhead which are safe from the builder; and the Office of Works has acquired the famous standing stones of Stennes, "the Stonehenge of Scotland," as well as the very ancient walls and Elizabethan ramparts at Berwick-on-Tweed.

The Trust now feels that it must enlarge its powers and its scope; and the following resolution was proposed by Canon Rawnsley, and seconded by Mr. J. C. Bailey: "That the time has arrived when a constitution of higher authority and more suitable character should be conferred upon the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty, together with larger powers in relation to the protection and management of the property which the trust holds for the nation, and that the council be and it is hereby requested and authorised to take such steps to secure those objects as it may deem expedient."

Although the subjects of the Warwick pageant which begins on Monday (July 2) are almost entirely historical, Warwick has her literary memories. Here for several years dwelt Thomas Cartwright, the fiery Puritan divine, who was master of the Leicester Hospital. Cartwright's pet aversion was a bishop, and as he was as free from them at Warwick as it was possible to be in the days of Queen Elizabeth, he accepted the post with alacrity, preaching much at his own risk and at the risk of those who heard him. The impression he made at Warwick appears to have been great, and it is narrated that on one occasion when he was rebuking, for his evil life, a man who made a great profession of piety, the sinner "sank down and being carried home died within a few hours together." Cartwright also died at Warwick.

Another man of letters, connected with "the slow mediæval town," as Mr. Quiller-Couch calls Warwick in his book upon the Avon, was the untameable Walter Savage Landor, who was born in what is now the High School for Girls. Landor had always an affectionate regard for Warwick, and its mulberries, its cedars and its fig-trees made an enduring impression on his memory. In his seventy-eighth year he writes that he had just picked up from a gravel walk at Warwick the first two mulberries that had fallen, a thing he remembered having done seventy years before. At one time he believed that he would never see the town again. At Trinity, Oxford, he had held "a wine." The man opposite was also giving "a wine," and Landor took it into his head to fire some shot through his shutters. This led to his rustication and a quarrel with his father, when he left Warwick, as he thought, "for ever." His sisters, however, lived there after their father's death, and there he visited them.

"The Platts," and "Monmouth House," two Tudor Houses of great historical interest, are to come under the hammer early in July next, and it is to be hoped that the opportunity of securing the property free from the hands of the speculative builder will not be lost. The houses were originally one mansion, built by the Robert Cary, who in 1603 was Warden of the Marches and carried the news of Queen Elizabeth's death to James I. of Scotland. For this service he was created Viscount Leppington and Earl of Monmouth, and came to reside at Moor Park, Herts. It may be remembered that the de la More Press recently republished his very interesting memoirs in their "King's Classics." The mansion at Watford was built as a dower house; and after his death in 1635 his widow resided there until her own death in 1640, after which it came into the possession of the Carpenter family, who have owned it almost uninterruptedly ever since. The houses contain much old oak panelling and a massive Tudor staircase. Messrs. Hampton and Sons are the auctioneers.

"Who's Who" tells us that Mr. Thomas Hardy "relinquished architecture for literature," but that he has not forgotten his first love was shown by an interesting paper on church restoration, written by him for the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings and read by a deputy at the general meeting on Wednesday. He is a great advocate of the policy of "masterly inaction" which was pursued with such success by an apathetic century now past, and states that were he practising as an architect he would not undertake a church restoration in any circumstances. Of the more open abuses in so-called restoration, he told many tales, among them the following:

"The chancel of a church not a hundred and fifty miles from London has in one corner a vault containing a fashionable actor and his wife, in another corner a vault enclosing the remains of a former venerable vicar, who abjured women, and died a bachelor. The mural tablets, each over its own vault, were taken down at the refurbishing of the building, and refixed reversely, the stone of the theatrical couple over the solitary divine, and that of the latter over the pair from the stage. Should disinterment ever take place, which is not unlikely nowadays, the excavators will be surprised to find a lady beside the supposed reverend bachelor, and the supposed actor without his wife. As the latter was a comedian he would probably enjoy the situation if he could know it, though the vicar's feelings might be somewhat different."

"Such facetious carelessness," Mr. Hardy added, "is not peculiar to our own country. It may be remembered that when Mrs. Shelley wished to exhume her little boy William, who had been buried in the English cemetery at Rome, with the view of placing his body beside his father's ashes, no coffin was found beneath the boy's headstone, and she could not carry out her affectionate wish. This game of Monumental Puss-in-the-Corner, even when the outcome of no blundering, and where no reasons can be pleaded on artistic or other grounds, is, indeed, an unpleasant subject of contemplation by those who maintain the inviolability of records. Instances of such in London churches will occur to everybody. One would like to know if any note has been kept of the original position of Milton's monument in Cripplegate Church, which has been moved more than once, I believe, and if the position of his rifled grave is now known. When I first saw the monument it stood near the east end of the south aisle."

Mr. Hardy quoted Sherborne Abbey as an example on a large scale of the banishment of memorials of the dead, to the doubtful advantage of the living. The human interest in an edifice ranks before its architectural interest, however great the latter may be, and therein lies the whole difficulty of restoration. The ideal method, he thinks, would be to enclose the ruined church in a crystal palace, covering it to the weathercock from rain and wind, and to build a new church alongside. "But," he adds, "even a parish entirely composed of opulent members of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings would be staggered by such an undertaking." The only example of such a work that we can recall is the wooden house of Peter the Great, on the island of the Citadel of St. Petersburg, which Catherine II. enclosed in stone, but that is on a comparatively small scale.

Although France has always had a fair share of famous bibliothécaires since the days before her kings instituted their admirable but arbitrary short way with libraries, there has been no association of librarians or of those interested in the library movement. The omission has now been rectified by the formation of the "Association des bibliothécaires français" under the presidency of M. Deniker. The association will not be confined to librarians, but will include "les personnes s'intéressant aux bibliothèques." And, building on the experience of library associations of this and other countries, it has been started on broad lines; and will consider "toutes les questions concernant les intérêts des bibliothèques et des bibliothécaires," and boldly proposes to start examinations and a Bulletin.

Two new publications from America deserve attention. The first, "Library Work," is described as a bibliography and digest of current library literature. The first number, apart from three or four introductory pages, is entirely composed of a bibliography of books, pamphlets, and articles in library and other magazines and periodicals published last year. Future numbers will devote space to "material that librarians will find of value, and worthy of preservation." Copious annotations, generally forming a synopsis of the book or article, add materially to the value of the bibliography.

The "Book Review Digest," which also has first seen the light this year, is a concentrated American Review of Reviews, giving excerpts from the reviews appearing in the principle European and American literary journals. American evaluation, a word which has not yet appeared in the English dictionaries, is here shown to perfection. "Plus and minus signs indicate the degree of favour or disfavour of the entire review." After quoting from our review of Dr. Emil Reich's "Failure of the 'higher criticism' of the Bible," the name is preceded by two minus signs, thus: — Acad. 69: 1221. N 25, '05. 720w, showing that the book was not favourably reviewed. We were, we admit, a little surprised to find another entry dealing with Richards's "With John Bull and Jonathan" preceded by a + sign; which inclines us to believe that the compilers of the work are simple folk.

The Library World (London), which completes its eighth volume with the current issue, announces an enlarged and improved format for the next number.

It is forty years since the Reverend John Mason Neale died, and no life of this poetically gifted scholar and singularly devoted servant of his Church has yet appeared. A biography is now in hand, and will be ready presently. Born at Conduit-street, London, in 1818, Neale, who was one of the founders of the Cambridge Camden Society, spent nearly all his life as Warden of Sackville College, East Grinstead, where he established a sisterhood which, despite bitter official opposition in its early days, has grown to large proportions. Neale wrote a History, still authoritative, of the Eastern Church and an expository volume on the Psalms, issued in 1860 and expanded and republished in four volumes, with Dr. Littledale's name added to the title-page, in 1874; and he wrote much in the Church periodicals of his day. He occupies a high place among English hymnologists; and the forthcoming biography will give interesting glimpses into the secret life of the translator of Bernard's "Jerusalem the Golden" and the writer of the Greek-inspired hymn, "Art thou weary."

The "Country in Town" Exhibition will be opened by Princess Christian in the Whitechapel Art Gallery, at half-past three o'clock on July 5. Plans for beautifying crowded areas in London will be on view. An endeavour will also be made to show how much of Nature still remains in the Metropolis or has been brought back to it, not to mention that which will be found on its outskirts. Suggestions will be thrown out with regard to nature study in urban schools, and there will be aquaria, vivaria and bee-hives, nesting-boxes, fern-cases, and flower-tables.

A series of afternoon and evening lectures on cognate subjects is being arranged. The Exhibition will be open until July 19, and, as admission will be free, contributions are invited towards the necessary expenses. All communications should be made to the Honorary Secretary, Mr. Wilfred Mark Webb, Toynbee Hall, Whitechapel, E.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Anglo-Russian Literary Society, Imperial Institute, London, S.W. — Paper to be read at 3 P.M. on July 3: "The Jews and Zionism," with lime-light illustrations, by the Rev. Arthur M. Cazalet.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, July 3. — Sale of a miscellaneous archæological collection formed by Edward Bidwell, Esq., including a series of rare antique lamps, candlesticks, leather bottles, pipes, a carved horn of the Viking period, etc.

Messrs. Hampton and Sons, July 3 and 4. — Sale at Annesley Lodge, Regent's Park, of the Earl Annesley's furniture (William and Mary, Louis XIV. and Louis XV.), sixteenth-century tapestries, Boucher paintings, and china.

Messrs. Gorer and Sons, 170 New Bond Street, announce that the exhibition of the Trapnell Collection of old Chinese porcelain will close on July 10.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge, July 2, 3 and 4. — Sale of the collection of coins and medals the property of the late Rev. Major Paull.

LITERATURE

GEORGE BUCHANAN

George Buchanan and his Times. By P. HUME BROWN, M.A., LL.D. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier, 1s. net.)

George Buchanan: a Biography. By D. MACMILLAN, M.A., D.D. (Morton, 3s. 6d. net.)

George Buchanan. By ROBERT WALLACE. Completed by J. CAMPBELL SMITH. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier, 1s. net.)

THE approach of the quater-centenary of George Buchanan has naturally been the cause of bringing into existence a number of popular books dealing with this interesting figure in Scottish history. The main authority for his life is, of course, the great work of Professor Hume Brown, of which one of the books before us is a version written for young people, though it contains facts which do not appear in the larger work. They are derived, the author tells us, from an official document containing an account of Buchanan's trial by the Inquisition in Lisbon. Another authority is the biography by Dr. David Irving. To these two might have been added Mr. James Hannay's work. In addition there is a vast accumulation of other literature bearing on the subject.

Buchanan's life has many points of interest, though perhaps the most attractive is the illustration of what the experience of a poor scholar was in mediæval times. Certainly it is a tribute to the old education arrangements in Scotland that one who was born to poverty should have been able to cut so conspicuous a figure. Buchanan was born, as he tells us himself, in February 1506, at Moss or Mid-Leowen, on the Blane Water about two miles northeast of Killearn in Stirlingshire. The country round about may be described as the land of Buchanans, and we are accustomed to think of it in these early times as having been inhabited by people who were little removed from savages. But the care for education was even then a popular feeling in Scotland, and before the parish school system invented by Knox and the reformers there were many facilities in Scotland for the acquisition of learning. What the reformers did was to secure that there should be a school wherever there was a kirk, so that "the youth-head and tender children shall be nourished and brought up in vertue, in presence of their friends." At a very early age Buchanan must have shown proof of exceptional cleverness, for when he was about fourteen or fifteen years old, he attracted the attention of his mother's brother, James Heriot, one of the same family as George Heriot, who founded Heriot's hospital in London and was the jingling Geordie well-known to the readers of "The Fortunes of Nigel." This James Heriot, then, had his promising young relative sent to the University of Paris, then the great centre of education for the whole world. Scotland and France were extremely friendly at the time, and the boy found many of his compatriots there. Poor they seem nearly all to have been. "In the case of most of them" says Professor Hume Brown, "their clothes were so torn and tattered that they looked more like beggars than future clergymen and doctors." The life they led there looks to us at this distance as being somewhat squalid. They were not only ill-clothed and ill-fed, but while lords and knights amused themselves with the pastimes of chivalry these poor scholars indulged in all sorts of rowdiness when night lent its cloak to their actions. Probably Buchanan was somewhat less boisterous than the others, because he never seems to have enjoyed good health; and at the end of two years his college career was brought to a close by the death of his relative, and he returned home "so broken in health that it took him nearly a year to recover." At that time there was trouble between England and Scotland on the score of France, and we next find Buchanan serving in the army of his sovereign, James V. In 1525, however, he resumed his studies at St. Andrews under a Professor named Major, who enjoyed the reputation of being one of the greatest scholars in Europe; but his teaching illustrated some of the mediæval folly, if we are to trust Professor Hume Brown. He gives the following example:

Roman Catholics are not allowed to eat meat in Lent, but they may eat vegetables and fish. But in peas and beans, says Major, there are little animals, so that in eating peas and beans you must eat the flesh of live animals. Is it right, then, asks Major, for a good Catholic to eat peas and beans? Yes, he answers, because, in the first place, the creatures are dead, and, secondly, because you do not know you are eating them. Then, Major goes on, what is a good Catholic to do in the case of the beaver? It lives half on land and half in the water; is it, then, a fish or a land animal? Why, says Major, the thing is quite simple; eat the beaver's tail and the part of its body that goes under water, and don't eat the rest. In other parts of his books Major asks even stranger questions than these. For instance, he asks whether God, if He chose, could become an ox or an ass, and whether John the Baptist's head, when it was cut off, could be in more places than one.

It would seem that the clever young scholar was able to see through his preceptor. At any rate, we may infer as much from an epigram brought forth by Major's saying that he was Major by name and not by nature:

"Major by name," thou sayst, "and not by nature,"
The greatest liars sometimes speak the truth,
And in thy endless stream of idle chatter,
What wonder if thou once hast spoken sooth.

The explanation was that Buchanan had been gradually and perhaps unconsciously imbibing the literary thoughts of the Reformers, and was already engaged in antagonism to the Schoolmen, much as Erasmus was at the same time. After becoming Bachelor of Arts at St. Andrews he returned again to his beloved University of Paris. This time he lived in a college for Scottish students which had been set up two hundred years before by a certain bishop in Scotland. Professor Hume Brown gives a vivid picture of the life of those poor scholars at the time.

They usually had little money to buy clothes, and those they had they had to wear till they were threadbare and tattered. But it was during the cold winters of Paris that they suffered most of all. Houses in those days did not keep out the cold as ours do now, and it was only very rich people who could afford to buy enough of fuel to keep up a sufficient number of fires. During the daytime in winter the only way the students could keep themselves warm was to play games in the open air. But it was in the night-time that the cold was hardest to bear, and we hear of them lying awake shivering in their beds—that is to say, some straw or rushes strewn on the floor with but scanty covering to keep them warm.

Buchanan himself gives a most graphic picture of the students in the class:

Hardly are things again quiet when five o'clock sounds, and the porter rings his bell calling the scholars to their task. Then in all the majesty of cap and gown forth issues the master, the terror of his charge, in his right hand the scourge, in his left perchance the works of the great Virgil. He seats himself, and shouts his orders till he is red in the face. And now he brings forth the harvest of his toil. He smoothes away difficulties, he corrects, he expunges, he changes the text, he brings to light the spoils he has won by ceaseless study. Meanwhile his scholars, some of them, are sound asleep, others thinking of everything but their Virgil. One is absent, but has bribed his neighbour to answer to his name at roll-call. Another has lost his stockings. Another cannot keep his eye off a large hole in his shoe. One shams illness, another is writing letters to his parents. Hence the rod is never idle, sobs never cease, cheeks are never dry. Then the duties of religion make their call on us, then lessons once more, and once more the rod. Hardly an hour is spared for our meal. No sooner is it over than lessons again, and then a hasty supper. Supper past, we continue our labours into the night as if the day's tasks, forsooth, had not been sufficient.

Buchanan left Paris to become tutor to a young Scottish nobleman, the Earl of Cassillis. He did not remain long with him, however, but returned to Scotland, accepting an offer from King James V., who wanted a tutor for his natural son, James Stewart. In this situation he might have remained for some time but for the feud between the king and the Franciscan monks, who became the subject of his satire, so that King James by artifice had to get him out of the country, after which he returned to Paris. There he stayed for twenty-two years, during which time he changed from being a Roman Catholic into being a Protestant, and we find that he was back in his native country in 1561.

It is difficult for us to-day to form an accurate estimate of Buchanan. He was pre-eminently the poor scholar of his time, and it was unfortunate for his reputation that his work was done in Latin. Sir David Lindsey of the Mount, who was a contemporary, had begun to show the capacity and potentialities of the vernacular, and we cannot help regretting that Buchanan did not follow his example. His hearty and satirical humour with its trenchancy of phrase and biting epigram would have found an excellent medium of expression in broad Scotch. Another factor that counts in the estimate of his place in literature is that the best of his work was devoted to the controversies of the hour. He would have made an exceptionally fine journalist, if he had chanced to live in the twentieth century. What his effect on the reformation was, must to a large extent be a matter of guess-work. He was not a zealot in religious matters, and the best that can be said for him is to be found in the phrase of Sir James Melville: "He was also of gud religion for a poet." It was a time, as Dr. Robert Wallace points out, when Ubi tres medici duo athei was a common phrase. But he entered with no particular zest into the religious disputations of his time. Despite the excuses made by his apologists, it is quite evident that in conversation he was given to indulge in skulduggery. Long after his death it was customary in Scotland to begin facetiæ of the coarser kind with the remark: "As George Buchanan says." No doubt thousands of stories were fathered on him with which he had nothing to do, but at the same time there can be little question but that his conversation was as free as, for instance, that of Chaucer.

THE IMPARTIAL HISTORIAN

The Church in France. Two lectures delivered at the Royal Institution. By J. E. C. BODLEY. (Constable, 3s. 6d. net.)

EVERY one will regret to learn from Mr. Bodley's preface that his health has again broken down; and we may take it that this accounts for the very slipshod English of too many passages in these lectures. But there are more serious defects than those of grammar or style. Mr. Bodley says that he did not wish to publish the lectures and was at last induced to change his mind by many requests made to him "both by writers in the journals and by private correspondents"; he would perhaps have been wiser had he resisted the importunities of injudicious friends. Even if there be "no book large or small in the English language to help [English people] to understand the constitution of the Concordatory Church, now disestablished, or to follow the phases of the controversy," this volume will not fill the gap. The difficulty of treating so large a subject in a small compass is obvious, and, in fact, the author's treatment is very superficial. No doubt he was hampered by the exclusion of controversial questions from the platform of the Royal Institution; this rule, or Mr. Bodley's interpretation of it, has prevented "the phases of the controversy" from being adequately or even intelligibly described. There is little or no attempt to go down to the fundamental causes of the present situation; no reader would get from the lectures any clear notion of the real meaning of the long conflict of which Separation is the inevitable climax. Indeed, the author takes pains to divert attention from any thorough investigation of causes. He attributes Separation to "a series of accidents," and believes that the French people are quite indifferent to it, an opinion which few will share who look below the surface of things. Certain events may have hastened it, but sooner or later Separation was bound to come, as was foreseen years ago by such men as Paul Bert, who were opposed to it in their own time and in the then existing circumstances.

Mr. Bodley's conception of impartiality has, perhaps, as much to do with the inadequacy of the lectures as the rule of the Royal Institution. He seems to think that the truly impartial method is to dismiss a controversy as a "squabble about a diphthong" in which both sides are equally wrong and unreasonable. The most frankly partisan treatment, provided it were honest, would give a truer view of the matter than this. One can make allowance for bias; one can get no intelligible idea of the matter at all from its presentation by a writer who views it from an eminence so lofty and remote that all distinctions are obliterated. Mr. Bodley, for instance, is quite superior to biblical criticism and what is sometimes called the neo-Catholic movement. He admires the Church as a venerable and above all a gentlemanly institution; he likes its autocratic régime and no doubt considers it a useful instrument for keeping the lower classes in order; but he is apparently not interested in religion. This point of view leads him to dismiss the whole liberal religious movement as an unimportant matter, in which nobody in France takes any interest; and that is quite misleading.

Equally misleading is his reference to the Dreyfus affair. "The Clerical party became in a measure," we are told, "the scapegoat for an infatuation which it shared with nine-tenths of the population." But the question is whether the moving spirits in that party did in truth share the infatuation or were not rather responsible for it. The French people was convinced that the latter was the case; the facts seem to me to justify that conviction. Again, Mr. Bodley's impartiality leads him to treat the clerical feeling against the Freemasons and the anti-clerical feeling against the Jesuits as equally silly and baseless. In fact, the clericals are quite justified in hostility to the Freemasons, since the Masonic Lodges in France (which have for the most part abandoned the ritual and distinctive tenets of Freemasonry) are little more than ordinary political organisations with strong Radical and anti-clerical opinions. On the other hand, Republicans and anti-clericals are equally justified in disliking the Jesuits, who have been the back-bone of the clericalist and anti-republican parties, and whose schools fed the army with disloyal officers. But political hostility is one thing; it is another to accuse your political opponents of worshipping Satan and practising obscene rites: that was the accusation brought against the Freemasons (not only in France but in England, Scotland and all over the world) by the clericals, and believed by the vast majority of French Catholics. The names of Léo Taxil and Diana Vaughan do not occur in Mr. Bodley's chaste pages, but they are important names in the recent history of French Catholicism; and the fact that French Catholics were deceived by the most preposterous hoax that has ever been perpetrated on a large body of people must not be left out of consideration, if we wish to understand the present situation. How came it that Catholics were so superstitious—so incredibly gullible? The cause is surely to be found in their training and education; when we have once recognised that, we are in a position to understand the legislation against the teaching Orders and the movement for the repeal of the Loi Falloux.

It is only by ignoring these and other important facts that Mr. Bodley is able to be "impartial," that is to say, to refuse to distinguish. But a historian must distinguish; that is his business. In all controversies there are right and wrong on both sides; in all, or very nearly all, there is more right and less wrong on one side than on the other. The historian ought to tell us to the best of his ability where each side was right or wrong and on which was the balance. If he declines to make the attempt, the suspicion arises that he knows that the balance is against the side on which his own sympathies lie.

When Mr. Bodley comes to consider the Separation Law itself, he leaves most of his impartiality behind, but does not, unfortunately, gain in accuracy. The following statement, for instance, is very far from accurate:

Many moderate Republicans, together with the survivors of the old Liberals and the like-minded members of the Right, regard the law as an act of repression intended to starve religion out of the land, and aimed against religious liberty.

This is the opinion of the clerical extremists and of such papers as the Croix. The moderate opponents of Separation, though they still believe it to be a mistake on various grounds, nevertheless admit almost without exception that the law as it stands is on the whole a fair and liberal measure. A considerable minority of Catholics hold that the position of the Church will be better under the new law than under the Concordat; their one fear is that there will be no sufficient check on the power of the Pope over the French Church. (Mr. Bodley is of the latter opinion, but it is quite inconsistent with his other opinion, that the State still keeps a tight hold on the Church.) The Protestants and the Jews consider that their liberty is amply safeguarded by the law; yet, being small and scattered minorities, they would suffer far more than a larger body from any oppressive provisions. In fact, the Separation Law leaves not a single restriction on the religious liberty or the spiritual functions of the Churches; it gives them, moreover, privileges not given by French law to other associations (that is what M. Clemenceau meant when he complained of its "concordatory spirit"); what restrictions it imposes relate to questions of property, and most of these are restrictions on the arbitrary disposal of Church property by the episcopate, the results of which Roman Catholics in England know to their cost. In a sense, no doubt, it is a "law of re-establishment," as every Disestablishment Act must be; for an institution must be either "established by law" or else illegal. If Mr. Bodley could free himself from the dogma of the plenary inspiration and infallibility of Napoleon, perhaps he would be more just to the humble efforts of "ordinary mortal men" who had to provide a substitute for an arrangement which, however admirable it may have been in 1802, had become quite impossible in 1905.

In his interpretation of the Law Mr. Bodley makes some serious mistakes which any French lawyer could have corrected. He quite misunderstands the effect of Clause 4 (pp. 100, 101), which has nothing to do with the conditions on which associations cultuelles can be legally formed, but defines the conditions to be fulfilled by those particular associations to which the ecclesiastical buildings and property are to be assigned. He states (p. 107) that the associations cultuelles "fall under the provisions of the Law of Association of 1901," whereas only five of the twenty-one clauses of that law apply to them. And—which is still more serious—he interprets the Associations Law in such a way as to suggest that the associations cultuelles can be at any time suppressed by the Government. This passage (pp. 64-66) he has, it is true, modified since the lecture was delivered. In the original lecture he entirely ignored the provisions of the Associations Law, and declared that all associations in France still required the authorisation of the Government, which could suppress them at any time; that the Government possessed, in fact, the same powers as under the Second Empire. But, although he now prints in an appendix the text of the Associations Law—and although that text clearly shows that associations other than religious Orders now require no authorisation (Clauses 2, 6), and can be dissolved only by a judgment of a court of law (Clause 7) if their objects are illegal or immoral (Clause 3), or if, being associations déclarées, they have not complied with the formalities (Clause 7)—Mr. Bodley still talks of associations being "authorised by the Government" and still adheres to the opinion that the Government has the power of suppressing them conferred upon it by certain clauses of the Penal Code, which are expressly repealed by the Associations Law (Clause 21). As Mr. Bodley does not explain why he believes that the Associations Law means the opposite of what it says and that its repealing clause is inoperative, it is enough to say that his opinion is unique and would startle a French lawyer.

The amusing thing is that this laborious struggle to overcome hard facts is all to no purpose. For Mr. Bodley has omitted to notice that the circumstances in which associations cultuelles can be dissolved are laid down by the Separation Law itself (Clause 23) and, in this regard, they do not fall under the Law of Association.

ROBERT DELL.

DR. PLATO ON THE STUMP

Plato as an Introduction to Modern Criticism of Life. By EMIL REICH (Doctor Juris). (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d.)

DR. REICH is a very clever man. Most people, who have nothing to say and an irresistible desire to say it, address themselves to Toynbee Hall or to the sad-eyed zealots of University Extension. But our Doctor Juris from Hungary knows a trick worth two of that. He goes to Claridge's and insists that he shall be fashionable. Not content with dragging in the name of Plato with a patent irrelevancy, he seems to imagine that he is a sort of an incarnation of the philosopher; and by a subtle flattery he pretends also that his audience is as highly cultivated as that which heard the real Plato in the groves of Academe. There they sit, the beautiful ladies and the clever men, at the feet of Dr. Plato Reich. Do you not recognise Alcibiades in the corner? And if Aspasia be not there, it is only because the matrons of England and America love not the rustling of her perfect gown. But Plato is there, and Plato is eloquent, and Plato is discursive, and Plato is ready to prate of any question under heaven from the British drama to Nelson's love-affairs. Above all, Plato is adroit enough to persuade his audience that he is Platonising, and no sooner does he make the astounding statement that in China there are no ideals whatever, than all the note-books are brought out in a hurry, and you may hear their hand-made pages crackle all over the room.

Dr. Plato, in fact, is delighted with his auditors. "We are now speaking," says he, "of gentlemen and ladies in the monde." That is the right spirit of learning. Be aristocratic or nothing. What should "the people" know of Platonism or of love? Peasants marry, we are told, "that they may have two more hands to work." And tradesmen are no better, "for they, too, simply marry for the simple purpose of co-operation." But gentlemen and ladies, like Dr. Plato and his audience, are more wisely guided. They are in no hurry, for they know, if they have been to Claridge's, that "love proper will come," and, if they have listened attentively to the Doctor, they know also that "it is a most incomprehensible passion." There's depth for you! There's research! There's discovery! "Love is a most incomprehensible passion," and you may pierce that great secret by going no further out of your way than Claridge's.

London, indeed, is more highly privileged than any city since the sixteenth century. "An audience similar to this," says the Doctor, "sat before Lorenzo the Magnificent four hundred and thirty years ago, and heard him talk of Plato." And we are sure that our modern Lorenzo is no less magnificent than his predecessor. In one respect, perhaps, he has the advantage. His style, if, like himself, it can be magnificent, can also step down from its state; if lofty, it can also be familiar. The heart of Claridge's must have warmed to him when he said of those who take part in the Symposium: "These men were the pick of Greek culture." Could you add or subtract a syllable from that elegant phrase? And with how fine an ease does he admit you to the secret of Lessing's early life! "He was fiancé to a woman," says the Doctor, "a widow, who kept him going for six years." Thus does the philosopher unbend. Thus does he remind you that he, the legitimate descendant of Plato and Lorenzo the Magnificent, is still a plain man, like the rest of us.

And in nothing does he show his superiority to the common professors of our Universities more clearly than in his genial ignorance. He is evidently a man of the world, and his knowledge of Greek, as of English, is of the world too. Nothing arouses his indignation so readily as the spectacle of men teaching Plato before they have learnt to understand him.

At the Universities [says he] we see young dons of twenty-two attempting this feat; estimable young men, no doubt, whose experience of life may have extended to having been drunk once or twice, or perhaps having been smiled upon by a barmaid.

Now Dr. Plato is not of this kind. It is Life, not study, that has engrossed him. Europe knows him, and America. He is not like the poor dons, who sadly accept the smiles of barmaids and who permit themselves now and again to get pensively sodden. Indeed, he has been so busy living that he has not had time to acquire much learning. What better proof of his sincerity could you have than that? Had he been a don, whose solitude is cheered by an infrequent barmaid, he would not have written down that weird word kremastistikon. He would not have left us wondering who Phothius was. He would not have discussed the love of Damon for Pericles. He would not have spoken of "Eros and Amor and Cupid." He would not have told us gravely that the love of woman is not mentioned "in the Eleusinian Mysteries." Again, had he been merely an estimable young man, whose knowledge of life is bounded by one or two bouts of drunkenness, he would have been able to avoid an inextricable tangle of contradiction. He would not have assured us on one page that imperialism is unfavourable to literature, thus forgetting his own contemporaries of the fifth century, "the pick of Greek culture," and then asserted on another page, without apology or explanation, that the Armada made Shakespeare.

He would not have made the astounding statement that this same Shakespeare, whose vocabulary is the largest known to history, "uses as few words as possible, and of the simplest character." In brief, there are many things which Dr. Plato would not have said and done, had he been a mere don, with an imperfect knowledge of barmaids. But for the Doctor, Life (with a capital) is all important, Life, generous and versatile, which allows him to understand the wiles of Lady Hamilton, and, under an august name, to introduce the philosophy of the Yellow Press to the pick of English culture. Is not Life, which can accomplish so much at so cheap a cost, better than the knowledge which belongs to the wretched don of the rare carouse and rarer barmaid? Is it worth while to spell correctly, if you can tell anecdotes about the Zingaree woman? Yet even the Doctor, upon whose shoulders the mantle of the Athenian philosophy has fallen, is not altogether happy. In one flash of self-knowledge he has pierced the mystery of his success.

A Hungarian [he says, with a cunning eye cast upon himself] will talk of Icelandic institutions, of Norwegian troubles; he will discuss Shakespeare as few in this country can, c'est pour se sauver. But there is nothing more in it; it is all talk.

And when the glamour of Life (with a capital) is dimmed, we are compelled to confess, even with the horror of the intermittent barmaid before our eyes, that it was not by accident that the Doctor was born in Hungary. "There is nothing more in it; it is all talk." Alas, poor Plato! Alas, poor deluded Claridge's!

OLD MASTERS AND NEW

J. M. W. Turner. By W. L. WYLLIE, A.R.A. (Bell, 7s. 6d. net.)

Peter Paul Rubens. By HOPE REA. (Bell, 5s. net.)

The Art of the National Gallery. By J. DE WOLF ADDISON. (Bell, 6s. net.)

Sir Lawrence Alma-Tadema. By PERCY CROSS STANDING. (Cassell, 5s. net.)

Henrietta Rae. By ARTHUR FISH. (Cassell, 5s. net.)

THE lack of interest in art shown by the English people has long been a byword with the nations; but, if we may judge by the number of books on painting and pictures that are now put before the British public, this reproach will soon be out of date. The series on British Artists, for example, has run into large editions and must help forward the interest in painting to no small extent. The latest work in this collection is, however, especially for artists and art students, as it seems to us. Turner's greatest admirers are the painters, and Mr. Wyllie, whose work is to some extent comparable with the master's, enjoys it with the exquisite pleasure of the technician and the sympathies of a cunning hand. Among the many "Lives" of Turner the present has an agreeable freshness, a kindly feeling and an artistic knowledge which make it the pleasantest and most useful of reading. The story of the development from the stained and tinted drawing to the water-colour of to-day, which Turner and Girtin did so much to bring about, is well told, and the exact position of Turner in the genesis of art is carefully determined. If, says Mr. Wyllie, his readers wish to grasp the difference between realism and the style of Turner they cannot do better than compare the great Calais Pier of 1803 with Mr. Henry Moore's Newhaven Packet or Millais's Fringe of the Moor. Turner in his day revolutionised style and the palette, but since his time we have had generations of experimentalists, if not as successful, at least as bold as he, with the result that what was blindly worshipped a decade or two ago is now open to the criticism of students. In Mr. Wyllie's book we have an artist's history of an artist's life and work, which is interesting and informing on every page. In a slightly different way this might almost be said of the beautiful addition to the series of "Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture" the "Peter Paul Rubens" by Miss Hope Rea. The various periods of the great Flemish Master are each fully considered, and the incidents of his crowded and brilliant life told anew with a knowledge and élan which hold the reader's attention from the first page to the last. There are many admirably printed illustrations from the pictures in the finest galleries of Europe. These are fully representative of the thousand or more paintings which Rubens left to a delighted world. Among the most interesting of the pictures given in this book is the Earthly Paradise, in which the beasts and birds are by Breughel, the splendid, vital Peasants' Dance from the Prado, the inspired Christ à la Paille, and the series of beautiful portraits. Miss Hope Rea's book will be welcome to all interested in one of the greatest masters of all time. To pass from the particular to the general, to leave Peter Paul for the consideration of the whole of the "Art of the National Gallery" by Mrs. J. de Wolf Addison, the author of the "Art of the Pitti Palace," is the next step among this list of art books. Here, once more, the charm and beauty of our own collection are spread before us. Although Mrs. Addison disclaims any attempt to offer a complete account of the various schools of art, still, as far as it is possible to illustrate it by examples within our Gallery, the historic continuity is emphasised. The facts, brought together within an easy compass, are stated with lucidity and grace, and art as a whole is indebted to a writer at once devoted and enthusiastic, critical and clear. Of course much depends on the reproductions of pictures; these are well selected and carefully produced. The prints from photographs of the Doña Isabel of Goya; the Bacchanalia of Poussin; the Vision of St. Helena of Veronese; the Mars and Venus of Botticelli, to mention only a few, are in themselves a valuable possession, and when we say that the letterpress is a worthy complement to the pictures it will be understood that Mrs. Addison has produced a book—on a subject already admirably treated—that will be likely to hold its own for several generations.

After this feast among the greatest painters of all ages it is perhaps hardly fair to turn to the first volumes of Cassell's Artists' Series: Mr. Percy Cross Standing's volume on "Sir Lawrence Alma-Tadema," and that by Mr. Arthur Fish on Mrs. Normand, who is more generally known as Henrietta Rae. This class of book on living painters is undoubtedly very popular, and, if it needs must be done, it cannot be better accomplished than in the well-illustrated books before us. Both artists are, of course, warmly praised in these works, and many interesting details—such as the nice things that Leighton and Millais said to Miss Rae about "La Cigale," or how Alma-Tadema made his bargain with the dealer, Garnhart—are given us. The illustrations remind us of far-off happy hours in the presence of the varied paintings from both artists, and of ideals in art which are already, we fear, a little out-grown.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN GREEK

The Old Testament in Greek. According to the text of Codex Vaticanus, supplemented from other Uncial Manuscripts, with a critical apparatus containing the variants of the chief ancient authorities for the Text of the Septuagint. Edited by ALLAN ENGLAND BROOKE, B.D., Fellow and Dean of King's College, and NORMAN McLEAN, M.A., Fellow of Christ's College, University Lecturer in Aramaic. (Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE Septuagint, which is the Old Testament in Greek, has many claims on the attention of the Biblical critic and scholar. It has the earliest manuscript authority extant, for the earliest Hebrew manuscript dates from 916 A.D., and the Codex Vaticanus belongs to the fourth century. The Septuagint version was read in the Jewish Synagogue, before and after the Christian era, and was used and still is used by the Eastern Church. It was the version read and quoted by our Lord and His Apostles, while the references and allusions to it in the New Testament are numerous. All the ancient versions were made from it, except the Syriac and St. Jerome's Latin, while our English Authorised Version, as well as the Revised in very many cases, adopted its readings. The Septuagint is also said to preserve not only many important words, but some sentences and several old verses which originally made a part of the Hebrew text, but have long ago entirely disappeared, so that some have thought that the translators must have used manuscripts of an age before the time of Ezra. Moreover, the tenses in the Septuagint are also said to be more trustworthy. The tense in Hebrew denominated "future" is never so in reality, but simply an habitual present, precisely like the present tense in English; and the past tense is idiomatically used to express the certainty of the action yet to be accomplished. Again, the Greek of the New Testament cannot be adequately understood without a knowledge of the Hellenistic Greek used in the Septuagint version; and, further, many Greek words occurring in the New Testament are used in a sense unknown to classical authors, the meaning of which can only be discovered by reference to the corresponding Hebrew words as translated in the Septuagint Version. The Hellenistic Greek of the Bible differs essentially from the Attic Greek in its comprehensiveness, in its syntax and etymology. The very fastidiousness and precision of Attic Greek made it impatient of all foreign intrusion. On the contrary, Hellenistic Greek, like Axylos, who sat near the wayside with a welcome for every stranger, was a composite which welcomed words and idioms of many ages and languages. The words of Homer and Hesiod are found side by side with words that were favourites with Herodotus or with Xenophon. Expressions long buried in the obscurity of a remote lyric poet leap forth into a fresh life; the purest Attic appears on the same page with an antiquated Aeolic form or a modern barbarism; words that have never before reached the dignity of the literary standard, that are only known to fame through the Comedies of Aristophanes, now for the first time are consecrated to another use in Hellenistic Greek.

The aim of the editors of the present work is "not to provide a reconstructed text of the Septuagint but to supply full information by incorporating the results of Dr. Swete's edition, by reproducing with greater accuracy and clearness all the important evidence collected in the great Oxford edition of Holmes and Parsons and by completing it from all the sources which were not yet available when that edition was published." The selection of thirty cursive manuscripts as representative of the remaining Greek manuscripts of the Octateuch was made after an examination of the text of ten specimen pages, carefully chosen for the purpose by Dr. Hort and Dr. Swete, in all known manuscripts of the Octateuch—"altogether over one hundred and twenty—to which access could be obtained. Of the thirty cursives thus selected new collations have been made and revised by the editors—in many cases with the help of friends—either from the manuscripts themselves or from photographs. The collations of the seven ancient versions which are quoted have been made and revised throughout by one or both of the editors. The collections of patristic material were for the most part made by fellow workers, or published indices were used by the editors. For the redaction of all the evidence the editors are solely responsible." It may be added that on the burning question of the Virgin Birth of our Lord it is the Septuagint which furnishes the strongest evidences in its favour, and is confirmed by the Peshitto Syriac Version, both reading—not "a young woman" but "the Virgin" (Isaiah vii. 14), where the present Hebrew text gives "young woman," though originally the evidence seems to show that as late as the second half of the first century after Christ the Hebrew texts read "the Virgin." "Was the change to 'the young woman' deliberately meant," writes Dr. Peters, "to exclude the Christian interpretation of the passage, or was it a mere blunder, the adoption into the text of the emendation of a stupid literalist?" In all charity we hope that the latter explanation is the correct one.

Last, it is remarkable that while the Septuagint version agrees with the Hebrew text in the Law, yet in many cases it differs widely from the Hebrew in the Prophets, and the Historical books chiefly in omissions, as in Jeremiah, which is much shorter in the Greek. It is certainly clear that the translators of the Septuagint had a different Hebrew text before them from that which is now extant.

T. H. L. LEARY.

THE TRUE SPORTSMAN

Chats on Angling. By Captain H. V. HART-DAVIS. (Horace Cox, 10s. 6d. net.)

MOST of these "Chats on Angling" have appeared already in the pages of The Field; but they are so brightly written and so well illustrated by the author that all lovers of angling will be pleased to renew acquaintance with them in their present form. The book has, indeed, no literary pretensions, but this is equally true of most books on sport. It will, however, take its place in the study or the smoking-room side by side with "Fishing and Shooting" by Sidney Buxton, Sir Edward Grey's book of "Fly Fishing," "Days of my Life" by "John Bickerdyke" and other pleasant books of the same kind—friends that we can always depend upon for an agreeable hour when the weather is bad or the solitary cigar is lighted after dinner.

Captain Hart-Davis is not only a good fisherman but a man of wide sympathies, with that keen appreciation of nature and love of the country which mark the true sportsman. He has succeeded in transferring to his pages the atmosphere of the river-side; and we feel as we turn them over that we are sauntering, rod in hand, beside some familiar stream, we hear the sounds of the water-meadows and smell the scent of flowers.

Since the publication of Mr. Halford's excellent series on Dry Fly Fishing it has not been given to any one to write much that is new about angling. But whether the author writes in praise of the dry fly, or discusses the education of south country trout, or makes his contribution to the insoluble problems of salmon-fishing, we find the same freshness which was characteristic of his former book, "Stalking Sketches."

In his inevitable comparison of the wet fly fisher with the votary of the dry fly, there is a good deal of truth in his remark that, whilst a fair angler will catch fish with a wet fly, the dry fly fisherman, to be successful, must be first-class. "The art of fishing the floating fly is not one that will admit of any mediocrity." Perseverance he strongly advocates, especially in salmon fishing. "There is but little doubt that the fly that is kept going catches most fish." He supports the reaction that has set in against a multitude of flies, and believes that fish care more for the size than the precise shade of colour. He recommends the use of field-glasses when fishing, and defends it to some purpose; though many anglers think them an unnecessary encumbrance, and Mr. Dewar declares in his "Book of the Dry Fly" that "field-glasses for trout-fishing are simply foolish." Anglers would save themselves many disappointments if they would take to heart the warnings given here against cheap tackle; though it should be remembered that not every fisherman enjoys the privilege of angling in waters that contain 5 lb. trout or 30 lb. salmon.

In the course of his "Chats" our author introduces us to many waters—the Test, the Driffield Beck, the Awe, and two Donegal rivers, the Clady and Crollly. He relates a good anecdote of his Irish gillie:

"We were going back to England on the morrow, and were settling up generally, when my gillie Pat said to me, 'Your honour, would ye buy me a pig?' "And why should I do that, Pat? Are you not content with your tip?" "Well, your honour, I don't want ye to pay altogether for it, but only to buy it for me." After some further conversation I consented to go up to the shanty on the hill where his old mother lived. There I found her haggling over the price of a sow; she averred that £3 was more than the sow was worth, the man was holding out for £3 10s. Eventually I became the purchaser at £3, and, paying the money, told Pat that as he had been a good gillie to me he could have the pig for his own. All the blessings of heaven were showered on my head by Pat and his mother; but no sooner had the dealer departed than Pat, producing an old stocking, extracted three sovereigns therefrom and solemnly handed them to me. Asked what all this comedy meant, Pat at once replied, "Ach, sorr, would ye have me let the praste know I'd got three sovereigns in my pocket?"

Some of his hints are excellent; in casting a dry fly, "always imagine that the plane of the water is some foot or so higher than it really is. The result will be that your collar will fall as lightly as gossamer." The novice is exhorted not to wander up and down the bank, scaring fish and thus spoiling sport for other anglers. It is wise to lunch at a spot where you can watch the river, as fish often come on the rise just at lunch-time. Many an angler will recollect occasions when he has caught the only fish of the day by taking this precaution: we ourselves accounted for two brace of trout this Easter on the Otter "between the sandwiches."

So observant an angler is certain to have observed many curious incidents. On one occasion he saw a number of trout rising at and following a swarm of bees right across a loch in Forfarshire; on another he watched a blackbird feeding on May flies.

The expression "Simon Pure," which he uses several times as synonymous with "the genuine article," perhaps calls for some explanation, since it is one of those expressions which a great many people use, and very few can explain or derive. Simon Pure was a character who is counterfeited by an impostor in a comedy entitled A Bold Stroke for a Wife, written by Mrs. Centlivre, wife of the principal cook of Queen Anne and George I., and acted at Drury Lane on February 3, 1718.

The distance between Letterkenny and Gweedore is not fifty miles: twenty-five miles would be nearer the mark. We note also a few slips in English, to be corrected in a second edition, on pages 28, 69, 82 and 101. But the type in which the "Chats" are printed is a pleasure to read, and the general "get up" of the book is very attractive. It is not often that so much information and such useful suggestions are so lightly and brightly put together for the angler's delectation.

RESTORATION LYRICS

Lyrics of the Restoration from Sir Edward Sherburne to William Congreve. Selected and edited by JOHN and CONSTANCE MASEFIELD. (E. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a pretty little book bound in vellum, tied up in white leather strings, and placed upon the market in a decorative card-board box. It is announced as one of a series of "chapbooks"—a word which some one may have told the publisher is the Greek for "anthologies." An anthology, at any rate, is what she has produced, beginning with a more or less critical introduction, and ending with some brief biographical notes on the poets—shall we make a wild dash at the publisher's etymology and say the "chaps"?—from whose writings extracts have been made. These last are so scrappy and inadequate—and yet of such varying scrappiness and inadequacy—as to suggest that the editors proceeded on the principle of glancing at the works of reference, closing them, and then writing out what they happened to remember. On no other hypothesis can we account for the fact that Thomas Otway gets six lines, while in the case of Waller and Sir John Denham only the dates of death and birth are mentioned and the name of Henry Vaughan is unsupported even by these bare particulars. At the principle on which the pieces have been selected we hardly even venture to guess. The Restoration period, so far as we can make out, is taken by the editors to begin in the reign of Charles I. and to continue until the end of the reign of Anne. At all events it is taken to include Matthew Prior, who was neither of the same school nor of the same epoch as Davenant, Sedley, Rochester and the rest. "The age which these writers inaugurated," say the editors, "has been called the Augustan age." Which age, since the singers on the list belonged to more than one? And what name are we to give to the period of Pope and Addison if the style usually bestowed upon it is to be used for a period about half a century earlier? These are a few—but only a few—of the questions raised by Mr. and Mrs. Masefield's introductory remarks.

The bulk of the introduction, however, is devoted to denunciation of the "unspeakable atmosphere" of the reign of Charles II. The indictment is easy to draw, and still easier to overdraw, especially with Pepys' Diary lying on the table. This is how Mr. and Mrs. Masefield draw it:

When the King came to his own again, in 1660, there was a reaction. The revolt, like most revolts, was violent. In their hatred of arbitrary rule, the released people renounced all law. In their new liberty to enjoy, they exceeded; not, perhaps, because they were fond of dubious pleasures, but because they had forgotten their old orderly pastimes, and could not delight themselves but crudely.

There is the old mistake here—that the corruption of the Stuart Court corrupted the manners and ideals of the English people. The inference is, no doubt, suggested by the writings of Pepys and Harrison Ainsworth; but Harrison Ainsworth was a writer of fiction, not a student of history, and Pepys was a drunken old reprobate, only differing in his naïveté from the drunken old reprobates of other times, and not in the least concerned to portray the habits of the community at large. A truer picture—one has only to look at it to feel that it is truer—is that to be found in the Diary of Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick. Her pious life in the country balances the disorderly life of the courtiers in the town; and it was by no means the isolated life of the saint who flies from the world to the wilderness. She entertained, she visited, she went to church. She held a creed hardly less evangelical than that of Bunyan and his Baptists, although she was a faithful adherent of the establishment; and she always found plenty of persons in her own rank of life who were delighted to converse seriously with her on serious subjects. We gather from her pages how great a part the sermons of eminent divines played in the life of the metropolis, even when the Court "declared," according to Mr. and Mrs. Masefield, "that vice should be the sole occupation of a man of sense"; while, as a daughter of the great Earl of Cork, and a sister of Robert Boyle, she was in close touch with the intellectual life of the time, and saw how little serious progress was impeded by the noisy frivolities of the gallants. That atmosphere can hardly have been wholly bad in which even frivolity was expected to find elegant literary expression; but the men who were giving it that expression were not the true representatives of English life on its literary or on any other side. Their period, it must never be forgotten, was also the period of Sir Isaac Newton and Robert Boyle, of Ken, and Baxter, and Tillotson, and Stillingfleet, of John Bunyan and John Milton, who were not only growing up; but doing their best work at the time. Their works have not only counted for more with posterity; they also, if we may judge by the vulgar test of sales, counted for more with their contemporaries. It is true that Milton only got £5 for the first edition of "Paradise Lost"; but it is also true that, within eleven years of its publication, between 1667 and 1678, 3000 copies had been sold. What arrangement Bunyan made for the publication of "The Pilgrim's Progress" we do not know; but we do know that the work passed through eleven editions between 1678 and 1685. They were the really popular, as well as the really great writers of the Restoration period; and essayists who set out to infer the moral tone of the age from its literature would do well to bear that in mind.

HERESIES ON STYLE

THAT the style is the very man is the aphorism with which it is almost obligatory to begin, if only for the purpose of disputing it: and, indeed, there are several reasons why it cannot be accepted without a good deal of qualification. Some men have more than one style: other men have neither been born to style nor have acquired it, but have had it thrust upon them. W. E. Henley, for example, thrust a style upon his disciples. He was a strong man with fixed ideas about the use of the English language. His contributors fell in with his views—presumably on the principle of “anything for a quiet life.” Thus arose a school of writers who gave the impression of a band of brothers—all with their noses in the air. That upward growth was not, however, natural and spontaneous. Their noses had been tilted for them by the editorial arbiter of their elegances. They really differed widely from each other, though the differences had been temporarily obscured by the compulsion of a common style. The style in this case was not the man himself, at any rate, not the whole man.

Man dons a different singing robe to suit the task before him, even as he uses one language with his butler and another with his intellectual guest. Even if we admit that a man's style, if it be his own, must to some extent mirror his personality, we have to be careful. He, at any rate, would be a bold man who said that, given the style and nothing else, he would undertake to infer the personality therefrom. Dyspepsia is a thing which affects personality and gets into style; but who would infer from Carlyle's style that he was a martyr to the malady? That inference could be drawn with much more plausibility from what we happen to know of Mrs. Carlyle's domestic arrangements than from anything that we read in “Sartor Resartus” or “The French Revolution.” Who, again, would infer from the preciousness of Stevenson's prose that his talk was a mixture of fine English and full-blooded slang? Yet Mr. Andrew Lang has assured the world that he spoke of some of his sensational compositions as “regular crawlers,” and that he called Julius Cæsar “the howlingest cheese who ever lived.” Clearly there was some room for erroneous deduction here. Moreover, there are other cases in which error would be not only possible but unavoidable. From Bishop Stubbs's prose style only one inference could be drawn—that he was an unconscionable bore; whereas every one who knew the historian bears witness that he was a most genial companion with a keen sense of humour. If he thought about it at all, he probably thought that style was no more wanted in an English history than in a cookery-book. His concern was to tell people things which he knew and they did not; his personality was nobody's business but his own. The result is a style which does not bear even the remotest relation to the man.

That is an extreme case, but not an example which we recommend for imitation, in spite of the tendency of scholars to impeach the bona fides of all historians whose histories permit themselves to be read. Better to err with Froude than to be right with Freeman; though, as Mr. Paul lately reminded us, Froude did not err very often, and Freeman was by no means always right. But, as a matter of fact, a good deal of nonsense has been talked about style, as if it were an accomplishment worth pursuing for its own sake, and capable of giving a title-deed to immortality. The truth is that it is not through their style that even the stylists live, though some of them have deceived themselves and expected that they would do so. Flaubert notoriously was such a one: possibly Pater was another. The Frenchman, at any rate, invented the doctrine of the “inevitable word,” and the corollary that “the inevitable word is the harmonious word”—which is nonsense—and he spent years trying and rejecting words until he found those that exactly fitted into his mosaic. He differed from Mr. Henry James in that he published not his experiments with words, but only their final result: and that result is certainly a flawless piece of workmanship. The secret of his triumph, however, was hardly, if at all, in the perfection of his technique. When he was left alone with his technique, he failed, as in “Salammbo.” Where he succeeded, as in “Madame Bovary” and “L'Education Sentimentale,” we read him not for his harmonious words, but for his minute observation, and his pessimistic vision of the futility of human strivings—not for style, that is to say, but for ideas. No man's style is so individual that it cannot be imitated by Mr. Owen Seaman. Mr. Seaman can write, as the whim takes him, exactly like Mr. Meredith or exactly like Mr. Hardy. It does not follow that, if the whim took him, he could write another “Richard Feverel” or another “Jude the Obscure.” In works like these it is the thought and not the style that is the man.

A philosophy of style, in truth, is, in the main, a philosophy of clothes. There is a limited sense in which it is true that the tailor makes the man; but there is a larger sense in which the very contrary is the truth. Certainly inferences as to a man's character can generally be drawn from his taste in dress. A vain man dresses in one way and a meek man in another. Loud checks are eloquent; so are velveteen jackets: so are spring-side boots; so are elaborate waistcoats; so are made-up dress-ties; and so are dirty collars. But though these sartorial indications tell you something, they are silent about essentials. They do not, for instance, help you to distinguish the thief from the honest man, the hero from the coward, or the man of genius from the fool. The Christ Church undergraduate went altogether too far when he stayed away from the Balliol tutor's lectures on philosophy, saying: “How can a man lecture in bags cut like that?” And even in the case of the dandies who have set the fashions, it has been their personality far more than their dandyism that has won them their place in history. No doubt there were dozens of Beau Brummell's contemporaries who dressed as well as he did; but his was the strong individuality beneath the dress. He stopped a peer in Piccadilly and asked him whether he “called that a coat.” When the Regent cut him on the staircase he inquired: “Alvanley, who is your fat friend?” The real man stands out in such acts of self-assurance, not in the rejection of trays full of unsuccessful neckties.

Similarly with style. A certain cultivation of style is a proper concession to decency. One feels it indecorous that great thoughts should be too sloppily attired, as some of the greatest indubitably have been. The involved sentences of Kant and the shapeless prose of Bishop Stubbs are almost improper. They suggest a picture of the philosopher and the historian going for a walk in the park in their dressing-gown and slippers. When the reporter, describing the trial trip of the Thames steamboat wrote: “Still forging ahead, the sun set behind the chimney pots,” he carried carelessness to the verge of rudeness. Mr. Baring-Gould does the same in the passage in his new book about the Riviera in which, telling the story of the divorce of the Prince of Monaco, he writes that “after eleven years of married life the Pope dissolved the marriage.” This sort of thing is an offence, as if a man were to sit in the stalls at the opera in knickerbockers and Norfolk jacket. Good literary manners forbid, and the plea of ignorance of the requirements of good literary manners is no valid excuse. But it does not follow that the opposite extreme of literary dandyism is admirable. The literary clothes, however elegant, will presently go out of fashion. It is the thought tricked out in them that will remain to be tried in the balance. It is an arguable belief that the works of Robert Louis Stevenson will presently, for that reason, go the way of the works of John Lyly. At any rate, it is certain that the stylists whose work lasts are the stylists who have something to say—such stylists as Gibbon and Carlyle. The style, in their cases, was by no means the man, and was hardly even the ninth part of the man.

THE OWL

WHEN all the children lie asleep
And the village lamps are out,
The owl from the falling barn does creep
To roam the world about.

Her wings are quiet, her eyes are keen,
She needs no starry light;
To her each timid thing is seen
That nibbles in the night.

But when the dawn begins to break
And the glimmering hour is chill,
She wings her way across the lake,
Or hoots upon the hill.

Now soon dear Robin sweetly sings:
Unharm'd go mouse and vole—
The owl has closed her silent wings
And sleeps in her shaded hole.

LAURENCE ALMA TADEMA.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE POETRY OF MODERN PANTHEISM

THE English poets of nature of the eighteenth century were children of an age of landscape-gardening and humanitarianism. For them the fair aspects of the world and the generous emotions of mankind were the things that really existed. To the novelists they relinquished the task of depicting the dubious actions of men. "The outward shows of sky and earth," and the gentler movements of the human heart were the sources of their inspiration. Passion they wanted, it is true, and without passion no great poetry can be conceived: but they did not lack either ideas or the faculty of exquisite observation. Above all, they had a fund of poetic instinct sufficient at least to enable them to infuse life and warmth into the frigid philosophy of their contemporaries and to transform it into a sort of religion. Underbuilders in the temple of English poetry, they laid the strong foundations upon which "Tintern Abbey" and other splendid works were erected. They were men with original powers of mind. By combining a realistic description of the phenomena of nature with an idealistic interpretation of its spirit, they elaborated a form of mysticism of a peculiarly poetic type. In the universe of the ancient mystics there was little matter for poetry. Everything there was a symbol for something else: nothing retained that independent significance which enables the imagination to create for its ideas a solid and definite body. The revolt of the poets of nature of the eighteenth century was, however, more especially directed against the deist's conception of a universe of mechanical forces. In this there was not left even a subject for the mystical allegories which Oriental writers weave unceasingly out of the phantasmal pageantry of their strange world. The deists invalidated the implicit feeling of a relation between man and nature. Thomson, the first of modern descriptive poets, restored to that feeling all its force and made it explicit. The pantheism of his "Hymn on the Seasons" is not, perhaps, remarkable for any subtlety of thought, but it is informed by genuine sentiment:

These as they change, Almighty Father, these Are but the varied God. The rolling year
Is full of Thee. Forth in the pleasing Spring
Thy beauty walks, Thy tenderness and love . . .
Then comes Thy glory in the Summer months
With light and heat refulgent. Then Thy sun
Shoots full perfection through the swelling year:
And oft Thy voice in dreadful thunder speaks,
And oft at dawn, deep noon, or falling eve,
By brooks and groves, in hollow-whispering gales,

Thy bounty shines in Autumn unconfin'd,
And spreads a common feast for all that lives.
In Winter awful Thou! With clouds and storms
Around Thee thrown, tempest o'er tempest rolled,
Majestic darkness! on the whirlwind's wing
Riding sublime, Thou bid'st the world adore.

Thomson, like Cowper, who followed him in proclaiming that:

There lives and works
A soul in all things, and that soul is God, wanted the vehemence of emotion which creates for itself an original and striking way of expression. He was only the obscure progenitor of a famous race. Sluggish of mind and indolent of temper, he left in the rough the notions to which later writers of genius gave a more brilliant form. His idea of the power and beneficence of nature kindled in the fiery soul of Rousseau a blaze of passion in which the spirit of a new age was born: his idea of the divinity of the actual universe quickened in Goethe and Wordsworth, in Shelley and Victor Hugo the faculty:

To see the world in a grain of sand,
And heaven in a wild flower;

which enabled them to combine the primitive sentiment of universal sympathy and the modern sentiment of universal curiosity in a feeling for natural beauty of an incomparable intensity and breadth.

The range and variety of the poetry of nature inspired by the pantheistic movement are indeed extraordinary. The only connection between some of the writers is a common sense of the mysterious affinities between man and his earthly surroundings. In Goethe and Wordsworth, however, the idea of the harmony of all things predominates. Under the inspiration of this idea they weave together the world of emotions and the world of objects in verse with a subtle power of suggestiveness. Sometimes a frame of mind is expressed in the form of a landscape:

Ueber allen Gipfeln
Ist Ruh;
In allen Wipfeln
Spürest du
Kaum einen Hauch;
Die Vögelein schweigen im Walde.
Warte nur, balde
Ruhest du auch.

Sometimes a landscape is depicted in the form of a frame of mind:

I cannot paint
What I was then. The sounding cataract
Haunted me like a passion: the tall rock,
The mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood,
Their colours and their forms, were then to me
An appetite, a feeling and a love.

But this is done without endowing natural scenery with human qualities, or despoiling the mind of man of them. The relation between nature and man, on which this poetry rests, is a real relation. To Byron's question:

Are not the mountains, waves, and skies a part
Of me and of my soul, as I of them?

Wordsworth would have replied that the human soul was not a part of the mountains, waves and skies, but that these things might become a part of the human soul. The connection was a one-sided one, arising from the influence exerted on the imagination by natural objects:

Ah Lady, we receive but what we give,
And in our life alone does Nature live.

The later poets of the pantheistic school do not appear to have so definite a point of view. Victor Hugo and Shelley, for instance, vacillate between contrary beliefs. In "L'Abime" the French writer gives one of the grandest expressions in literature of the awe aroused by the thought of the unity, vastness, and sublimity of the universe of modern science. But in other poems by him all idea of the order and gradation of things is veiled by the primitive mystery of blank ignorance. Everything that stirs or seems to stir is regarded with reverence. The movement of some frog in the sedge, the action of some human soul impelled by an heroic impulse, provoke the same rudimentary sense of godlike power. This can scarcely be called pantheism: it is mere animism. In Hugo it seems sometimes to be only extravagant rhetoric. Shelley vacillates in the same manner: but it is his pantheism which seems to be rhetorical: his animism is a genuine superstition. Shelley was a man with a divided mind. In regard to the idea of religion he was a narrow and hasty sceptic, who adopted as the most philosophic form of religious indifference a cold, glittering sort of pantheism which he borrowed, like Byron, from Wordsworth, and, like Byron, emptied of all real meaning in the borrowing. He said of Keats:

He is made one with Nature: there is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder, to the song of night's sweet bird;
He is a presence to be felt and known
In darkness and in light, from herb to stone,
Spreading itself where'er that Power may move
Which has withdrawn his being to its own;
Which wields the world with never-wearied love,
Sustains it from beneath, and kindles it above.

But he himself never fell on his knees in adoration of that Power. In regard to the sentiment of religion, however, he was as susceptible as a savage. He was the most sceptical and the most superstitious of men. Finding in his vision of a universe of mechanical forces no divine, creative Spirit to worship, he turned in moods of deep feeling to some striking object in nature, and prayed to that. His "Ode to the West Wind" is surely the strangest hymn in the language of any civilised people:

If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear;
If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee;
A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share

The impulse of thy strength, only less free
Than thou, O, uncontrollable! If even
I were as in my boyhood, and could be

The comrade of thy wanderings over heaven,
As then, when to outstrip thy skiey speed
Scarce seem'd a vision; I would ne'er have striven

As thus with thee in prayer in my sore need,
Oh! lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!
I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!

The passion there rings true. The sincerity of Shelley's animism is the source of all that is new and wild and lovely in his poetry of nature. To him, when he surrendered himself to mere feeling, the world was a fairyland. Every natural object there was animated with an eerie life of its own, which he sometimes depicted in myths that have the glow, the freshness and the simplicity of the legends of primitive races. There is, for example, the exquisite chorus in "Prometheus Unbound":

The pale stars are gone!
For the sun, their swift shepherd,
To their folds them compelling,
In the depths of the dawn,
Hastens, in meteor-eclipsing array, and they flee
Beyond his blue dwelling,
As fawns flee the leopard.
But where are ye?

"This is just the way," as the author of "Primitive Culture" remarks, "in which early barbaric man would talk." In fact, the one great poet of the romantic school who tried to adopt a naturalistic conception of the universe was compelled by his own starved heart to reject it for another quite as fantastic, but, fortunately, far more beautiful.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Prehistoric Ghosts," by J. A. MacCulloch.]

FICTION

The Mantle of the Emperor. By LADBROKE BLACK and ROBERT LYND. (Griffiths, 6s.)

THIS book purports to be an account of certain events unknown to history in the early life of Napoleon III., previous to his instalment as President of the second Republic. These events are spread over many years, and therefore can hardly be called a connected story. The thread which connects them is the personality of the narrator, a close friend and staunch admirer of Louis Napoleon, who (as is customary in this class of book) sits down in his old age to write the history of his youth. This personality is not very interesting, nor is it meant to be; but the interpretation of the temperament of Louis is a careful piece of work, and, as a character-study, even without the light of after-events, is worth reading. It atones for the scrappy nature of the incidents, and leads us to think that the authors would do better with authentic history, or with historical romance based on fact, than with the invention of incidents in the lives of historical persons—always an unsatisfactory method of making a story. They have a straightforward style, occasionally spoilt by the use of such words as "proceeded" for "went." The book is well printed, though a few misprints have been passed, and the type and paper are good, though the sewing does not allow the book to lie open—a very common and very annoying fault. The illustrations by Mr. Paul Henry are uncommon, and of a higher class of work than those usually given to new novels: the frontispiece portrait of Louis Napoleon is particularly successful. The weakness and charm of the face help us to understand the qualities of the man as depicted in the book; and the treatment is really artistic.

A Dazzling Reprobate. By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. (Unwin, 6s.)

MR. TROWBRIDGE has called his jeune premier Lothair, which gives a gleam of light to a mind bewildered by reading his most remarkable preface (called "Some Liberties with a Peri") in conjunction with the motto on his title-page, from "The Ballad of Reading Gaol":

And the damned grotesques made arabesques,
Like the wind upon the sand.

Comte Lothair de Palamède comes to London to see "society," under the auspices of his father's old friend, Lady Lioncourt. The society that he sees is the most up-to-date possible, but its doings are related with such an air of courtliness that we rather think, with Kipling, that "the Thing that Couldn't have occurred," and that a society novel has been accomplished without vulgarity. Yet the essential vulgarity of life in fashionable London is quite visible through the description of its pleasures and its vices. When we have safely passed Mr. Trowbridge's three deliberate lions at the gate—his shilling-shocker title, his naked-soul motto, and his Egyptian Darkness of a preface—there is a brilliant world to be enjoyed, full of verbal felicities, whose people it is interesting to meet and delightful to part from. They are all butterflies, but they are brilliant butterflies who, if they had not had a genius for frivolity, would have been cultivated folk. They have the air of being spectators of their own set; Mr. Trowbridge cannot persuade us that any one of them is a real representative of that set; they see it too clearly. They spend their lives in making arabesques, and their damnation consists in their knowledge that they are grotesques, about as purposeful or useful as "the wind upon the sand." Naturally, with opinions so far in advance of his years, Lothair has an interesting sojourn. His friend, Clanrebel, is the hero; an effeminate gentleman who "thumbed his 'Paradise Lost' and kept marble Cromwells in Pompadour bedrooms to remind him of energy"; who calls his love-affairs "scarlet emotions," and allows his valet to blackmail him from pure physical fear. Everybody in the book is well drawn and distinct. Mr. Trowbridge plays fastidiously with his characters, his words, his incidents. He refuses to break his toys, and contents himself with the thought of how easily they could be broken. But at the end of his brilliant, amusing, airy novel, we are left with a sense of underlying sadness. "Qui pensera pleurera" are the last three words of this strange book. Mr. Trowbridge is evidently sorry for his "damned grotesques."

A Stranger within the Gates. A Story of Severn Side. By F. J. Cox. (Griffiths, 6s.)

THIS simple, unconventional story takes us into one of those quiet country corners rarely visited by so much as an echo of the outer world. The people in Avenham are content to jog along the old paths, neither desiring change nor tolerating strangers, and this atmosphere of aloofness is consistently maintained. When Alec Lovell becomes a miller on Severn side, he meets with hostility from the conservative inhabitants, more particularly from Saffery, hitherto miller-in-chief to the neighbourhood. Miss Trevanion, of the Manor, and Saffery's daughter Dora, however, see in the handsome young miller the Prince Charming of their dreams, and do not hesitate to let him understand as much. Socialism and political economy lose their zest for Mary Trevanion from the moment Lovell appears, and Dora goes over to her father's rival with unfilial haste. About this part of the story there is a strange, childlike frankness and absence of discretion; there is no concealment where love is in question, confession is rife, and the characters generally show a "coming on" disposition when their hearts are touched. Yet it is all done in the most natural, primitive manner; it may provoke a smile now and then, but it always secures sympathy. Dora's farewell to Lovell, before marrying a man she does not love, is a fair test of the author's ability to deal honestly and delicately with scenes of emotion and embarrassment; it is skilfully done, and avoids the commonplace: thus it might happen in life, and rarely happens in fiction. We gather that this is a first novel, and it exhibits defects due to inexperience. It is both timid and overbold; independent in characterisation, it is imitative in minor points; well-worn epithets and turns of phrase occasionally fall discordantly upon the ear otherwise agreeably soothed by good English, free from affectation and the catchwords of the day. That tea, motor-cars and millinery are never even mentioned is almost a distinction in itself in tales of this kind. "A Stranger within the Gates" is in many respects an attractive story, and we would say, with Rip Van Winkle, "Go on, and prosper."

Dr. Fuchs und Seine Tertia. By FRITZ PISTORIUS. Heitere Bilder. By LUISE KOPPEN. (Berlin: Trowitsch.)

THESE are two very quaint and very enjoyable books for those who can read them in the original German. Dr. Fuchs is a schoolmaster, one of those lovable, humorous old schoolmasters about whom it is delightful to read. In the adventures of Dr. Fuchs and his class the reader finds many incidents reminiscent of his own schooldays, although the school in which Dr. Fuchs taught the Lower Third was a German school. But the story of the little plot between Dr. Fuchs and the drill sergeant, the paper chase, and especially the story about the sins of the fathers are all delicate little sketches of human nature which is common to all nations.

Life in a little village vicarage forms the background for Miss Koppen's "Heitere Bilder." Here we have the early life and adventures of the pastor's little son, a sort of German Wee MacGregor with all the humour and pathos of his prototype. Little Fips is a character drawn with a loving hand. His sayings and doings are those of a real child and are not the manufactured sentimentality that usually passes muster in sketches of child-life. Fips of the Golden Heart he might have been named, for there is hardly an adventure in which he is not helping some one or other of his father's poorer parishioners over a stile. The majority of the stories are light and humorous, but occasionally a more serious note is struck, and it is indeed difficult to say which portions of the book are the more enjoyable.

FINE ART

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB

THE demolition of the Egyptian Hall, and of the Dudley Gallery which lurked behind its queer façade, turned adrift that ill-assorted couple, England's Home of Mystery and the New English Art Club. No longer is the Saturday visitor to the inner shrine of Art compelled to force his way through a reluctant throng of sightseers bent on the "unreserved" enjoyment of thrilling illusions, who used to regard with undisguised suspicion the apparent intrusion of "private view" guests into the sanctum on which their hopes were fixed. After a temporary sojourn at the Alpine Club, the painters evicted from Piccadilly have settled for a time in Dering Yard, off New Bond Street, where an L-shaped gallery affords them light enough but insufficient space. The room is both narrow and low, so that it is difficult to recede so far as one would wish to do from certain specimens of New English Art, to which distance lends coherence, if not enchantment, while, on the other hand, the "line" tends to sink from the generally accepted level in the direction of the knee, or, let us say, to a convenient elevation for the child whom we have all known when he was "so high"; the kind of height is sufficiently indicated by that expressive phrase without resort to a two-foot rule. Perhaps the critic is thereby subtly challenged to view the exhibition with an innocent and childlike eye.

Save for the absence of one or two painters whom we are accustomed to see regularly represented, notably Mr. Orpen and Mr. Strang, the exhibition is much of the usual type and of average, if not surpassing merit. There is always evidence of the thought and research which preserve exhibitors at this club, many of whom have the further advantage of youth, from falling slaves to routine. It is to be wished that thought and research were more often allied to a sense of beauty. Perhaps the esprit de corps which animates the Club, and adds immensely to the interest of its exhibitions, tends to make it a little too exclusive and indifferent to outside opinion. A determination to paint only such pictures as painters shall approve is all very well, but a determination that only painters shall approve them is another thing, and less commendable. I am far from suggesting that any such determination is expressly formulated or consciously held, but it may strike a member of the usually unthinking public, if he happens to be roused to thought by his visit to Dering Yard, that the public's ideas of what is or is not a subject worth painting are just a little too much disregarded. After all it is the public, not the painter, that buys the picture. Is it a very Philistine suggestion that a rather more conciliatory attitude towards the despised public might do one or two of the painters no harm? They need not descend to the depths of popularity in which some members of a more august institution are content to grovel, but there is a public that does not care for the pretty, and yet is dissatisfied when the ugly is offered in its stead. Need it be scorned if it demands the beautiful?

Pictures with a charm that lies in something beyond the reach of dexterity and technical accomplishment, and appeals to a taste which those virtues by themselves are not enough to gratify, are not common in this or in other exhibitions. Mr. Steer has done better things ere now than his Chepstow Castle or his Music Room, good as both are. The picture which will excite most attention is the portrait of himself which he has painted for the famous gallery of painters' portraits at the Uffizi. It is said by those who know him to be "an absurdly good likeness"

(why are good likenesses absurd?), but one must retreat to the remotest limits of the L-shaped space before the texture of the coat comes right, and then the accessories of the room seem a little petty and effeminate as a setting for the large, strong head. Other notable portraits are that of The Artist's Father by Mr. Francis Dodd, whom the public ought, surely, soon to keep at work in painting other people's fathers, and that of Sir John Brunner, by Mr. John, a far more sympathetic performance than his other portrait of an academic dignitary in purple robes. In compensation for the severely restricted colour of these two, he has indulged in unwonted splendour of scarlet, purple and blue in the Van Dwellers, a gorgeous apotheosis of the joys of the gipsy life in a richly coloured country under a summer sky and clouds of dazzling white. Mr. Rothenstein exhibits another of the Jewish subjects which he has shown at several recent exhibitions, and this is, perhaps, the most interesting of them all as a composition, while the colour is immensely enriched by the addition of a faded crimson and gold curtain, faultless in texture, to the white costumes with stripes of dull blue worn by the Mourners in the Synagogue. Mr. Tonks's Crystal-Gazers and Mr. Muirhead's The Choice are fine in colour, the first blond and cheerful, in a scheme not very remote from Mr. Steer's, the second more rich and sombre. In the farthest corner of the room hang two very different works side by side which possess more of the quality of charm than most of the pictures here: Mrs. Will Fagan's Tell-Tale Wing, in which the red mantle under which Cupid hides is not quite worthy of the fine flesh painting and beautifully poised head of the girl, and Professor Holmes's splendid study of blue sea and mountain veiled in various degrees by a grey volcanic cloud. May 5 must have been a memorable day for the landscape painter who found himself on the shores of the Bay of Naples, and the two pictures dated afternoon and evening of that day show what a vivid impression the unwonted colour-effects created. The Church at Anacapri, by Mr. James Charles, produces unintentionally, no doubt, a curious optical delusion; the upper part of the church rises firmly above a bold projecting cornice, but the lower part, which should be equally solid, appears, at a little distance, to be a reflection of the rest in water.

The drawings, as usual at these Exhibitions, are excellent. There are several of the beautiful flower pieces in water-colour of Mr. Francis James, many examples of the late Mr. H. B. Brabazon's delicate art and of the sober, dignified landscape work of Mr. Alfred Rich, from which the eye needs to be readjusted by a difficult effort to the hot and violent African sketches of Mr. Sargent. Mr. Bone's Construction of an Underground is the most imaginative of his drawings, Hyde Park Corner the finest of a more realistic kind. The large Westminster Cathedral subject, in pencil, with its minutely finished surfaces, is a work of marvellous industry and truth, but drawings which depend more on pure line display this artist's unique gift to greater advantage. Mr. Dodd's pastels, Mr. Rothenstein's three portraits in red chalk, and two fine heads by Mr. John must also be mentioned; in one of these it is curious to find Mr. John adopting a conventional manner of shading by long, slanting lines across the hair and face which closely approaches a rather early habit of M. Legros. Both drawings show restraint and concentration without loss of the strength which was so conspicuous in Mr. John's earlier, more exuberant work.

C. D.

THE FAURE COLLECTION OF MANETS

THE twenty-two paintings and water-colours by Edouard Manet which will remain on view at Messrs. Sulley's galleries (159 New Bond Street) till July 7 are the most representative works by this master that have yet been exhibited in London. Single examples have been seen at International exhibitions, and an interesting group was included in the French Impressionists' Exhibition at the Grafton Galleries last year, but this last was composed chiefly of pictures produced during what is termed the Spanish period of the painter, and incompletely revealed the width of his range and the maturity of his powers. The collection patiently accumulated by M. Faure of the Paris Opera not only contains some of Manet's greatest triumphs in painting, but illustrates his professional career from the year 1856 when, a lad of twenty-four, he left the studio of Couture, to 1882, the last year but one of his life. To be strictly accurate, the Tête de Vieille Femme was painted while Manet was still under Couture's tuition, the Antonin Proust in the first months of his independence; but both show the same characteristics, careful, virile modelling, sombre colour, and paint less creamy than Couture's, though not so fluid as Manet's afterwards became. Next in order of date come two copies, one of Titian's La Vierge au Lapin, the other of Les Petits Cavaliers, generally attributed to Velasquez, both reproduced with a verve and simplicity of brushwork which rival the originals in the Louvre. There is no evidence of laborious addition of parts, for at twenty-seven Manet had the faculty of seeing the whole at a glance and of painting that whole simply, spontaneously and directly. To the same year belongs the full-length portrait of the Bohemian Collardet, known as Le Buveur d'Absinthe, which was rejected by the Salon of 1859. Its rejection is not difficult to understand, for its merits are reticent, and the Jury, horrified at what must have seemed an audacious simplification of human form into a few broad, sweeping planes, would hardly be prepared to recognise its strength and precise rendering of values. Couture's influence is still visible in this life-sized portrait, but in the next important work at Messrs. Sulley's, the famous Liseur, which dates from 1864, Manet claims kinship with greater painters than his master.

In some respects Le Liseur is the greatest, as it is the most popular, of M. Faure's Manets. The painting is carried further here than was Manet's habit, as may be ascertained by studying the exquisite drawing and modelling of the one hand visible. Again, Manet, though no psychologist, has put a wonderful amount of character in the face of the grave, gentle old man immersed in his book. The painting is still dark, the colour-scheme does not even rise to the silver of Velasquez, but Le Liseur might hang without loss beside a Titian, Rembrandt or Velasquez, the three masters who seem to have been Manet's idols at the moment.

In 1865 Manet visited Madrid, and the Goyas he saw there gave him, in all probability, a strong impulse towards painting in a higher key, towards striving for a greater truth to nature's lighting. The perfect way had already been indicated by Boudin, and it is of this French painter rather than of any Spanish master that we are reminded in the great sweep of sea with the rightly curved horizon, La Plage de Boulogne-sur-Mer, painted by Manet in 1869. That brilliant still-life, La Brioché, unsurpassed for sheer realism, represents Manet's next year of painting, and prepares us, better than the grey Port de Bordeaux (1871) and two little seascapes in water-colour, for his famous masterpiece of 1873, the portrait of the engraver Belot, better known as Le Bon Bock. To understand where Manet had now arrived we must remember that the Olympia in the Luxembourg, the Execution of the Emperor Maximilian, the Déjeuner sur l'Herbe were already things of the past. In Le Bon Bock Manet painted a jolly Frans Hals type of man, in a direct, rollicking, Frans Hals manner. Compared with the hand of Le Liseur, the hands of Le Bon Bock are loosely suggested rather than stated, but—and this is the point—this seemingly careless suggestion is right in relation to the rest of the painting, which is built up not by careful drawing of details, not even by assiduous modelling of the parts, but by mere planes of colour simply and truthfully set down as they are revealed to the painter through the medium of light and shade.

Still more striking as a vindication of the doctrine of impressionism is Le Grand Canal de Venise of 1875, a radiant vision of Venice with her colour neither exaggerated—as it was by both Turner and Ziem—nor understated—as it was by Canaletto and most of his followers—but reproduced with all truth and humility. For beauty of colour this picture is unsurpassed in the gallery; it has few rivals outside. Henceforward Manet's paintings, with the exception of certain portraits like the Henri Rochefort, bear greater and greater resemblance to the work of his comrades, Renoir and Monet, less and less to that of his old loves, the Spanish masters from Greco to Goya. In 1879 paralysis gave Manet his first warning of the end, but we see no signs of failing power in his dexterous flower-piece, Roses et Lilas, or the still-life Les Pêches of the following year. For actuality the last equals the Brioche, and no pen save Mr. Berenson's could hope to do justice to the tactile values of the bloom on these delicate fruit. But for the absence of a certain finesse in the handling of the pigment, the portrait, Le Printemps, also known as Jeanne, might be a Renoir, with his rare appreciation of sunlight filtering through foliage on to young flesh. At the end of his life Manet had the notion of representing the four seasons by four types of Parisian women. The Autumn is at the Museum of Nancy; M. Faure purchased the Spring, but Winter and Summer were never completed, for in 1883 the painter died, one year after he had produced the Monet-like picture of his last home, La Maison de Bueil, and one year after he had received the belated Cross of the Legion of Honour.

That Manet had his limitations no one will deny. He was neither a psychologist nor a dramatist. He can scarcely be called a conscious decorator, for his works rarely show a sense of composition. He makes no effort to relate the groups of people on the shores he paints, and the happy balance of the Grand Canal is, we feel, more the result of accident than of design. But then it never occurred to Manet, most modest of painters, that nature needed alterations and improvements. To him Truth was Beauty, Beauty Truth; he never sought to know more, nor had he higher ambition than faithfully to serve his dual goddess. Visible truth was his realm, and within that realm he was supreme. He did not wish to peep behind the scenes, he did not attempt to pierce the veil of externals. "Our sight," said Addison, "is the most perfect and most delightful of all our senses," and with that sentiment Manet was wholly in agreement. He asked for nothing more but, in his own words, "to be inspired again and again by a new aspect of things." He was content to take those aspects as they were revealed to him by the light of Nature. His ambition was to hand down to others those aspects unimpaired, that others might share the great joy with which he himself had been filled.

MUSIC

BRAHMS: OPUS I

OCCASIONALLY the futility of the London concert season is broken by the appearance of a notable work or a notable performance. Some one plays something which is not played every day or plays in a manner not always to be heard, and such refreshment comes sometimes from an unexpected quarter. Then is the joy very great, far greater than when one has gone to hear some celebrated pianist or violinist, expecting his usual "masterly interpretation" of concert-room pieces. Some such pleasure the audience received at a concert of a lady pianist, Miss Moggridge, given at Aeolian Hall the week before last, when she played the first piano sonata of Brahms. Over and above the excellent technical qualities which are the reward of earnest and patient work, her playing showed such intelligent insight into Brahms's methods and enthusiasm for his aims as justified the ambitious choice, and she was able to carry her audience with her through the intricate mazes of that mighty development in the first movement, to regale them with the pathos of the lovely folk-tune slow movement, and the rough humour of the scherzo, as well as the many phases of emotion which weave the continuous texture of the finale. It is in truth a wonderful Sonata. Did ever Opus I show such mastery? Small wonder that Schumann hailed its composer with his famous article, "Neue Bahnen," and yet now, after fifty years, it is an event to hear it in a London concert-room, not because it has had its vogue and has passed into one of those acknowledged classics upon which the newcomer hesitates to embark, but because it and its companions, Op. 2 and 5, have never really arrived, never become fully understood and appreciated by the few who could play them and the many who might listen to them. They still remain practically the last word as regards the pianoforte sonata, works which, from whatever standpoint they are viewed, appear flawless. The lover of form finds in them all he admires, idealised; the seeker after emotional beauty finds abundant measure, but ordered and controlled by a reason which is above mere impulse.

Opus I starts with the bold statement of one of those fundamental C major phrases which belong to no composer in particular but are a universal heritage. In the diatonic rise of melody through a perfect fourth (from E to A) lies the germ from which the inspiring melodic outline of this first movement springs. We who know the second subject of the piano quartet in G minor and the "How lovely is Thy dwelling-place" of the German Requiem know what the upward soaring melody of Brahms is, and at once suspect the hidden possibilities of such a beginning. To the first hearers of Opus I, to those who had ears to hear, the unfolding of the sonata from this melodic germ must have been indeed a revelation. He at once expands it and marches up the scale to a cadence on the dominant; then with a rushing scale passage he arrives at a chord of B flat in which key he immediately restates his subject, and this induces a still greater answering extension of the upward phrase, in order to break through again with the first climax of tone into the principal key. Then he begins to build, with imitations of this, phrases which accumulate in power and intensity, and are shaped by a rather Beethoven-like counterpoint. Perhaps in this he shows something of his pupilage, but it leads to a second subject which is very characteristic of himself, a melody in which the pathos of folk-song is plainly heard. It is in the key of A minor instead of the more usual dominant, and imparts to the whole first section a curious sameness of tonality, probably designed by Brahms for the sake of greater contrast in the magnificent development section which follows. Of this I dare not venture upon any sort of analysis, since without the help of musical quotations it could seem nothing but a dry statement of technicalities, or, what is perhaps even more unbearable, an ecstatic expression of a personal enthusiasm, too often mistaken for musical criticism. It must suffice to say that the two themes are interwoven in the most intimate manner. After the second theme has been suggested in thoughtful fashion in the key of C minor it makes a more energetic appearance in the bass against one of Brahms's rising passages of syncopated chords in the treble, and then the vigorous rhythm of the first subject appears and the two compete in splendid climaxes of tone. There is practically no new material save new accompaniments and contrasting counterpoints added to these themes. Even to lovers of the later Beethoven the close texture of this movement must have come as a surprise, and to us, used as we are to the most intricate orchestral polyphony, it demands the utmost concentration of attention to understand and follow it. It is, however, no dull, intellectual music: everything is relevant and vital; there is no mere sporting with themes. There is, indeed, very little of the clever young man about Brahms's early music, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary. After this tremendous movement he indulges in the most charming little set of variations upon a real old folk-tune. The plaintive theme to which in the first variation a menacing triplet figure is added, clears to a serene close in major key, like a summer's day which a thunderstorm has threatened. An exuberant scherzo follows. It is young and virile and might be called boisterous, were it not so innocent. It lacks the more subtle sense of humour which brings gaiety very near to tears in the later Brahms, but in the trio there is a splendid example of Brahms's soaring melodies, one fit to place beside those referred to from his later works. After a regular repetition of the scherzo we reach the finale, in free rondo form, with a racing principal theme. The tunes are more numerous than in the first movement and follow one another with Schubert-like freshness woven into a whole by the oft-recurring and unmistakable rhythm of the principal subject. Nothing is a more remarkable evidence of Brahms's early maturity than the certainty with which he handles his finale. I remember that a very wise critic said in answer to a youthful criticism of my own, in which I complained of the weak anti-climax in a work which he had commended: "Yes, but who can write a finale?" The problems certainly require a nicety of balance not often attained. It has to be at once the climax of the whole and yet avoid the profundity of the first movement. No abstruse line of thought can be started at this stage, so that a composer is thrown back upon his purely musical capacity for writing beautiful melody. Brahms's signal success in this movement must have been one of the signs by which the discerning prophet could foretell his greatness and pronounce him one of the elect.

How comes it that this work, itself so beautiful and the forerunner of a long line which we have all learnt to respect, remains in comparative neglect? Neglected it is, although most educated pianists have given some study to it and its sister sonatas. It is very difficult to play, but so are Liszt's Rhapsodies and Pabst's paraphrase of Eugene Onegin. Its difficulty, however, is different from these. Its technique is uncompromising, simply because Brahms could not get his thoughts on to the paper in any other way. From first to last there is not one passage which gives the player an opportunity for display or the hearer for exclamation. The passages are infinitely harder than the stock scales and chord passages of the virtuoso composer, but, when mastered, they do not proclaim themselves as an achievement, but simply serve their purpose as music. Later, Brahms discarded the sonata as a vehicle for the expression of piano solo music. Perhaps these early efforts showed him, not that the form was exhausted, but that it opened up such unbounded possibilities that ten fingers and one keyboard could hardly play the music which must belong to the sonata of the future. In every combination of instruments, from the sonata for violin and piano to the symphony for full orchestra, he continued to develop the form, and with each work to prove its almost endless resources, so that the significance of Opus 1 is almost incalculable and its influence upon posterity cannot be gauged until the work of Brahms has been far more completely assimilated than it has been at present or seems likely to be in the near future.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish early in July the fourth volume of the Hon. J. W. Fortescue's "History of the British Army" and volume five of Mr. Herbert Paul's "History of Modern England." About the same time they promise "Great Bowlers and Fielders," by G. W. Beldam and C. B. Fry. Messrs. Spofforth, Bosanquet, Schwarz and Jessop contribute the chapters on bowling and fielding, and Mr. Beldam the action-photographs. The same firm have also in the press a translation of Pierre Loti's novel, "La Troisième Jeunesse de Madame Prune," under the title, "Disenchanted." In "Coniston," a new novel by the American Winston Churchill, the author has forsaken historical romance and writes of modern domestic life. Messrs. Macmillan will publish the book early next month.

A history of "The Great Revolt of 1381" by Professor Oman will be issued immediately by the Oxford University Press. Had André Reville survived to complete his projected history, this book would not have been written. It is with the aid of Reville's transcripts—a vast collection of records of trials, inquests, petitions, and escheators' rolls—that the whole story of the rebellion has now been retold. Professor Oman includes some new and unpublished material regarding the Poll-Tax.

Messrs. Methuen have a number of interesting novels in their autumn list, and "Profit and Loss," by John Oxenham, is announced for early publication. Other novels are: "The Eglamore Portraits," by Mary E. Mann; "The Guarded Flame," by W. B. Maxwell; "Cartouche," by Bernard Capes; "The Wickhamses," by W. Pett Ridge; "A Midsummer Day's Dream," by H. B. Marriott Watson; "Listener's Lure," by E. V. Lucas; a new novel by Richard Bagot; "The Poacher's Wife," by Eden Phillpotts; and "The Call of the Blood," by Robert Hichens.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett announce that they will publish shortly the first volume of the official "History of the War in South Africa." Volume i. deals with the campaign on the Natal side up to and inclusive of Colenso; in the east of Cape Colony—Gatacre's country, up to and inclusive of Stormberg; in the centre of Cape Colony—French's operations round Colesberg to February 6, 1900, when he joined Lord Roberts's main army; in the western portion of the theatre of war—Lord Methuen's battles, Belmont, Graspan, Modder River and Magersfontein; and Lord Roberts's arrival at Cape Town, and his re-organisation and concentration on the Modder for the relief of Kimberley and invasion of the Orange Free State.

A new book on Haddon Hall, by Mr. G. Le Blanc Smith, will be published immediately by Mr. Elliot Stock under the title, "Haddon: The Manor, The Hall, its Lords and Traditions." The work will deal with the great families who have owned Haddon since the Conquest, and will furnish much new and hitherto unpublished information concerning the estate and its owners. Among other interesting items it will give in detail some curious steward's accounts, the only existing letter of Dorothy Vernon, with a facsimile of her signature, and the pedigree of the Vernons from Godfrey the Consul to the present time. A full description of the building, its tapestry, old glass, carvings and metal work is given, and the book will be fully illustrated by photographs and facsimiles.

Messrs. Pitman announce for publication on July 2 "The Queen's Tragedy," by Robert Hugh Benson. Father Benson's new novel is a dramatic picture of the reign of Mary Tudor, who in the tragedy of her closing years, when all her high projects had miscarried, was as Mr. Benson puts it, a "veritable Queen of Desolation." The lights, as well as the shadows, of the Court are in evidence in this imaginative romance. Many famous people cross the page, notably the Princess Elizabeth, Cardinal Pole, Stephen Gardiner, and Archbishop Cranmer. But the central figure of the book is, of course, Queen Mary herself, who in a sense was as much a martyr as any Protestant who perished in her chequered reign.

Mr. Arnold Fairbairns will publish shortly "Early Flemish Art," by A. G. Temple, an illustrated catalogue of the pictures belonging to this school now being exhibited at the Guildhall Art Gallery; "The Episcopal Arms of England and Wales," with full-page coloured plates with blazons and historical note; "Everyman, a Morality," illustrated with twelve full-page and other line drawings by Ambrose Dudley; and "Strongholds of the Barons," by J. Ivo Ball—illustrated popular descriptions, with historical notes, on the castles of England and Wales.

A book entitled "The Philippine Islands," by Mr. John

Foreman, will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin on July 2. It is described as "A Political, Ethnographical, Social and Commercial History of the Philippine Archipelago." The latter portion of the work deals fully with the War of Independence, the career and personality of Aguinaldo, the insurgent leader, the American Government, religious difficulties, trade and agriculture since the American advent, the coming "Philippine Assembly," and the labour, education and other questions.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie is issuing "The Cathedrals and Churches of the Rhine and North Germany," by Mr. T. Francis Bumpus, in the Cathedral series. Chapters are devoted to a general survey of the church architecture of North Germany, showing how it developed in the Rhineland, Westphalia, Saxony, and the Baltic Provinces; and how, in spite of the religious wars of which she was the theatre for so long a period subsequent to the breach with Rome in the sixteenth century, Germany has retained more of the mediæval furniture of her churches than any other country of Northern Europe. Descriptions are given of such little-known and seldom-visited cathedrals and churches as those of Münster, Soest, Paderborn, Hildesheim, Halberstadt, Magdeburg, Naumburg, and Erfurt.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons will publish early in September "The Book of Tea," an interpretation of Japanese character by Okakura Kakuzo, who will be remembered as the author of "The Awakening of Japan."

Among other novels which Mr. John Long will publish during the summer months are the following: "Phœbe of the White Farm," by May Crommelin; "A Persian Roseleaf," by Lieut.-Col. Andrew Haggard; "The Brangwyn Mystery," by David Christie Murray; "The Mystery of Magdalen," by Mrs. Coulson Kernahan; and "The Girls of Inverbarns" by Sarah Tytler.

Professor Cockburn Henderson, of Adelaide, has in preparation a life of Sir George Grey, to be published by Messrs. Dent. The author has made personal research in South Africa and New Zealand for the purpose of his book.

The Strand Magazine for July inaugurates a revolution in the methods of binding magazines. Every reader who takes up a copy will be struck with the ease with which it can be opened. It has long been a subject of complaint that the usual method of "wire stitching" rendered a magazine impossible to open flat, much less to double back for ease in holding. It is therefore a fact of the greatest interest that these drawbacks have at last been completely overcome by an ingenious machine, which does away with stitching altogether. At present, it is the only machine of the kind in the world, and the sole rights in this country have been acquired for a considerable term for magazines by the proprietors of the Strand Magazine, which is the first periodical to afford its readers the benefit of this remarkable improvement. The greater part of the July edition is bound by this process, which it is hoped to apply to the whole of the August issue.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE ETHICS OF EDITING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—While in cordial agreement with the general point and purpose of Mr. Francis Woollett's letter in your issue of June 23, may I be allowed to make a mild protest against his last sentence, or rather, perhaps, against what seems to be implied in it? Mr. Woollett, having criticised Mr. J. S. Farmer's edition of Heywood's Four P.P. with considerable, though by no means undeserved, severity, asks: "Is it a cause, then, for wonder that scholars such as Professor Bang and his colleague at Louvain should smile disdainfully at the English editors of our literature, when men of the standing of Mr. Farmer and Mr. Churton Collins fail to recognise that an editor's first duty is to produce the best possible text . . . ?" As I have edited two texts for Professor Bang's "Materialien," and am therefore, I suppose, included among his "colleagues at Louvain," I may perhaps be permitted to point out that though the series of course owes its origin to the energy and enthusiasm of Professor Bang, and though it is printed on the Continent, it is by no means entirely, as might be inferred from the expression used by Mr. Woollett, the work of foreign scholars. Of the twelve reprints which have now appeared in it, seven have been edited—so far at least as the text is concerned—entirely by English editors in England, and therefore any merits which they possess cannot be used as an argument for the inferiority of English work.

But what indeed is the standing of Mr. Farmer as an editor of drama, or why should his work be taken as representative of English scholarship? There are surely many "English editors of our literature" who can do and are doing good work, and who can be trusted to produce—with by no means extravagant allowance for human fallibility—correct texts. There would perhaps be more of them if others, including reviewers, would more often do as Mr. Woollett has done, and, having compared the reprints with the originals which they profess to represent, publish the results of their investigation.

R. B. MCKERROW.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Like your correspondent, Mr. Francis Woollett, I too have a bone to pick with Mr. Farmer. In the small volume which contains the Four P.P. is another of Heywood's interludes called The Pardoner and the Friar. This is an extremely rare play, the only known copy, Mr. Farmer says, being the one in the Duke of Devonshire's collection. That may be so, although I am under the impression that Mr. W. W. Greg, whose knowledge on such matters is both extensive and exact, mentions another copy. This is by the way, however. What I wish to point out is that Mr. Farmer's claim that his edition is reprinted from a transcript of the original copy is not at all supported by his text.

I have not, of course, compared it with the early copy, but if the facsimile reprint of 1820 (?) faithfully represents the original, there are at least a dozen differences between the two, and it is a curious and instructive fact that these differences are the same as those in Mr. Hazlitt's Dodsley. I will give one example of this which will also show that Mr. Farmer could not have read the proofs of the play with his transcript, or with the facsimile reprint. On page 6 Heywood makes the Pardoner say:

"Nor have no disdain nor yet scorn
Of these holy relics which saints have worn,
First here I show ye of a holy Jew's hip
A bone——"

Mr. Hazlitt notes that the old copies read shepe instead of hip, and the reading of the facsimile reprint is also shepe. If Mr. Hazlitt had turned to his Chaucer he would have found the relic in question in the Prologue to the Pardoner's tale:

"Then have I in latoun a shoulder-bone,
Which that was of a holy Jewes shepe."

The blade-bone of a sheep is by Mr. Hazlitt converted into the hip-bone of a Jew, and this brilliant emendation is allowed to stand by Mr. Farmer although he knew (Introduction, page ix.) that the relic was a sheep's bone; "sheep's jaw" he calls it with characteristic exactitude. I would ask Mr. Farmer, if he seriously wishes to make his venture a success, to eschew Mr. Hazlitt and all his works, to turn over a new leaf, and reprint faithfully in the old spelling from the earliest copies. This may be a little more costly, but it is false economy, to say nothing of any ethical implications, to go on in this haphazard way.

SIDNEY WRAY.

THE PORTLAND MINIATURE OF MARY STUART

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There is something rather comic in a controversy between me and Father Pollen as to whether a lady is wearing a "nightgown" or morning dress! A "nightgown," in 1560, was what we call a "dressing gown," usually of velvet lined with fur, to judge by Darnley's. Mary's dress of some soft white material has a broad white sash round the waist, which is not an element in a modern "nightgown." Her ruff is as large and formal as that in the full-dress costume in the Leven and Melville portrait, an odd thing to wear in bed. On her head is a huge coal-scuttle-shaped sun-bonnet, buttoned below the ruff, developing into a kind of lawn mantle. The ermine jacket might be worn as a mark of rank, and would suit a convalescent seated in the open air. If it were possible to print the block in your paper, the question might be left to the fair sex to decide. Meanwhile specialists in the costume of the sixteenth century are the best judges. I should prefer Father Pollen's view, as it would give great historical interest to the portrait. But it is not easy to suppose that a great foreign miniaturist was at Jedburgh, and the work is remote indeed, in style, from portraits attributed to Mary's only painter in Scotland, Jehan de Court.

A. LANG.

GERMAN ETYMOLOGY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is no particular business of mine, but I begin to wonder what some readers will think of such a letter as that by Mr. A. Hall on German Etymology, at p. 604 of your issue for June 23, 1906.

Surely it is not very creditable to print such laughable absurdities. That they are such, any one (however ignorant) ought to be capable of suspecting. Just look at them!

He tells us:

(1) Witch is connected with the slang term fetch. That is,  $w=f$ , and a wit is the same thing as a fit!

(2) That the Spanish hechicero [where Spanish, as usual, uses h for f] is the German hexe! That is to say, an f is an h in every language; and fat is the same as hat!

(3) The German zauber is derived from the Greek σοφός. But the German z is really tz, or a Low German t. In fact, he goes on to connect Dutch tooveran with Greek σώφρω. That is, an s=t. And a so is always hot! And so on.

The climax is that German Hexe occurs in Hexham (!) which (on his own showing) is merely a contraction from Hagustealdes hām: that is, the -exe in hexe is really -agusteald! So now we knew that hex, a hemlock, is short for hagusteald.

You best know what your readers will swallow, but you do not credit them with much intelligence.

Is this conducive to your reputation? That is your affair.

W. W. SKRAT.

June 23.

IRISH LITERATURE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your reviewer's explanation of his statement "that the Irish never had a literature," that is, "literature as he understands the word," disarms comment. I assumed, of course, that the word carried its usual signification, and I would humbly demur to this Humpty-Dumpty-like way of lording it over terms in common use.

I should like to state that if the "point of the article was that Ireland has no literature to warrant a league in endeavouring to revive a useless language," your reviewer is fighting a shadow. I am well acquainted with the aspirations of the Gaelic League, and I do not think I shall be contradicted when I assert that the question of the mediæval literature carries very little weight with it one way or the other. If every scrap of Irish literature older than Keating had perished, Gaelic Leaguers would still be as keen as they are now in fostering the study and development of the language. Indeed, those whose interest, like my own, in Irish is historical and literary, are inclined to blame the Gaelic League for doing so little for the study of the early literature.

Irishmen who are taunted with being foolishly fond of their native tongue may plead the instance of Bohemia. A century ago Czech was in a worse case than Irish is now, nor had it an archaic and interesting early literature to fall back upon. Yet it has justified its existence socially and politically, and has shown its capacity for adapting itself to the needs of modern culture. Here is indeed the chief danger of the neo-Irish movement; if it cuts itself off from the culture of the twentieth century, if it persists in clinging to antiquated religious, moral and social ideas, it will die, and that speedily; if it adapts itself to the time and frankly recognises the difference between the thirteenth and the twentieth century, it may live and grow just as did the Czech movement of the early nineteenth century.

ALFRED NUTT.

SPELLING AND PRONUNCIATION

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Would "A Student of Literature" give some clue to the identity of the "two of the most distinguished scholars of our great English Universities" whom he heard disputing as to whether "sough" should be "pronounced like plough" or like "trough"? And what were they scholars of? And why "sough" used by Tennyson of the wind? A Student of Literature can have studied to very little purpose, or else a very restricted literature, to define a good old humdrum word in such fashion. Ah! indeed, sir, "who shall say which of the two was 'right'?" None but a very foolish person. But he adds, "or whether either was right?" I would answer any man from York to Caithness, or from Kingstown Harbour to Galway Bay. Of course neither of these very distinguished but very ignorant scholars of our great Universities was right. "Right" in such a case is surely the current use in those parts or spheres where a word is in the living, spoken language. And perhaps the "Student of Literature" may not have recognised the sough when he heard it.

A PLAIN MAN.

AMERICAN OR U.S.A.?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—I think that your case in this argument can be strengthened. It is not a fact that "the Ambassador of the Citizens of the United States of North America to the Court of St. James" was officially "The United States' Minister," and afterwards "The United States' Ambassador," and that Mr. Bayard was the first "American" Ambassador? The late Colonel Hay always admitted the inaccuracy of the style and title, "but," he would add, "what are you to do when the greatest country on earth has no name and is peopled by a nameless race?"

A BRITON
(but not an Englishman).

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I fear you still remain oblivious of the point of my little protest of last week.

You say: "If Brazil is United States it is also America." But Brazil is not America: it is not in America any more than the North Pole is in North Poland. "America" (quite independently of the political designation, United States) is a country. South America is a distinct continent, and should be spelt (as the Germans spell it) Southamerica. America was the title deliberately chosen by the Federal delegates (1776-1785) for their country; and the domestic appellation United States should not be employed at all by foreigners. Who speaks of a United Kingdom Army? or a United Kingdom battle-ship? The North-American Continent comprises the countries of Canada, America, and Mexico.

A CANADIAN.

[Again we venture to differ from "A Canadian." Towards the close of his letter he speaks of the "North-American Continent." Exactly. The North-American and the South-American Continents make up America, and Brazil is as much American as New York State. We do not say "United Kingdom Army" because we have the convenient term "British"; if there were an equally convenient term for the United States we should use it. The great point is: had the Federal Delegates the right to take the name of the whole for their small part? Switzerland would have no right to call itself Europe.—Ed.]

ESCHREW

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—This is from the Old French eschewer, and the sch in this and several other old French loan-words in English should undoubtedly be pronounced as in the word "mischief," which represents Old French meschief, and being a term in very common use has preserved the original sound. No one would dream of mispronouncing "mischief," whereas, "eschew" being a comparatively rare word, many people, like your correspondent, pronounce it incorrectly. The same is true of "seneschal," which in the older English dictionaries, such as Sheridan and Walker, is given as "senes-kal," but is now generally called "seneshal." The proper name Marischal is, I am told, always called Marshal.

JAMES PLATT, JUN.

June 25.

THE GRAVES OF MUSICIANS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A contemporary journal has printed the subjoined paragraph in answer to a correspondent:

"The remains of the following musicians have been re-interred: Bach, Haydn, Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, and Dragonetti; and of Englishmen, Dr. Greene, John Davy (in the same churchyard, St. Martin's-in-the-Fields), and Sir William Cusins. For a complete list you had better apply to Mr. Algernon Ashton: he could doubtless also furnish you with the names of those musicians who have been buried at sea—in other words, those who sleep their last sleep in the ocean's bed."

To the above-mentioned nine musical notabilities whose remains have been re-interred I can add Gluck, who was transferred from the Matzleinsdorf Cemetery in Vienna to the Central Cemetery of that city; Rossini, who rested for years in the cemetery of Père Lachaise, Paris, but whose embalmed body was subsequently taken to the church of Santa Croce, Florence; Bellini, who was likewise originally interred in Père Lachaise, but now lies buried in his native town of Catania, Sicily; and lastly, Schumann, who, in the year 1880, was taken from one grave to another in the cemetery at Bonn. Of course there may be other famous musicians whose remains have been subjected to similar treatment, but whose names I cannot now recall.

Regarding those musicians who were buried at sea (which is almost as horrible as cremation), I only know of one—Dr. John Naylor, the well-known church composer and organist of York Minster, who died on May 15, 1897, whilst on a voyage to Australia. Dr. Naylor was an esteemed personal friend of mine, to whom one of my earliest compositions (an Interludium for Organ, Op. 11) is dedicated.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

June 24.

HAZLITT ON SIR THOMAS BROWNE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reading your review of the new editions of the works of Sir Thomas Browne in the last issue of the ACADEMY, the citing of Mr. Whibley's panegyric brought forcibly to mind Hazlitt on the same great writer. I venture, with your kind assent, to quote it for the benefit of those of your readers who may not be familiar with that particular work of the prince of essayists:

"His is the sublime of indifference; a passion for the abstruse and imaginary. He turns the world round for his amusement, as if it were a globe of pasteboard. He looks down on the sublunary affairs as if he had taken his station in one of the planets. The antipodes are next-door neighbours to him, and doomsday is not far off. With a thought he embraces both the poles; the march of his pen is over the great divisions of geography and chronology. Nothing touches him nearer than humanity. He feels that he is mortal only in the decay of nature and the dust of long-forgotten tombs. The finite is lost in the infinite. The orbits of the heavenly bodies or the history of empires are to him but a point of time or a speck in the universe. The great Platonic year revolves in one of his periods. Nature is too little for the grasp of his style. He scoops an antithesis out of fabulous antiquity, and rakes up an epithet from the sweepings of chaos. It is as if his books had dropped from the clouds, or as if Friar Bacon's head could speak. . . .

Surely one of the most extraordinary panegyrics ever penned by one great writer on another—mark the epigrammatic brevity of his sentences.

STANLEY HUTTON.

June 23.

COMBINED GERMAN READER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Having been abroad all the winter I have only just seen that in reviewing my "Combined German Reader, Writer and Grammar," in the ACADEMY of January 20, 1906, you say: "The exercises for translation from English into German do not run on the same lines . . . (i.e., connected passages instead of isolated sentences). It is a pity that having started out on quite the right path Mr. Spearing was unable to keep to it."

But as a matter of fact, about eighty out of the one hundred and twenty English exercises do consist of connected passages, some of them extending over two or three pages, and yet they contain none but the words previously used in corresponding portions of the Reader.

So far as I am aware, such a system has not been carried out in any other German book for beginners. It entailed a great deal of labour, and it is rather disappointing to find a reviewer in a paper of your standing and influence telling the public that I was unable to carry out my own plan.

Perhaps your reviewer was misled by the fact that many of the connected passages consist of short sentences, each printed in a separate line.

H. G. SPEARING.

[Our reviewer writes:—"Mr. Spearing admits that 33 per cent. of his exercises are isolated passages rather than connected sentences, and that seems to me to justify my very gentle rebuke."]

ENCOURAGING THE MINOR POET

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have no quarrel with avowed opportunists. When an editor states that his magazine is a mine of good literature, and that an American melodeon will be given to every subscriber, I can understand his shutting out my friend the poet. When a daily yells: "Hallo, look here! If you will buy a copy we will make it worth your while to send us your cast-off shoes!" I do not expect that daily to publish my friend's ballads or sonnets. I attack the pseudo experts, the Jenkinsons of literature.

I am no poet, though I appreciate beautiful verse, no matter whose name is signed to it. I do not set myself up as a profound critic, though I am sure I should never write across the finest effort of a true poet the words "mere doggerel," and I think it would be impossible to palm off on me the same poem, made marketable by the interweaving of a few utterly inane lines that boomed a silly play written by one of the staff. I have no grievance against true critics, no matter how heavily they lay on the lash, for true critics give chapter and verse of the peccadilloes they punish. I am not disposed to state where, in my opinion, the true critics are to be found, but I believe there are only three journals whose editors would publish this letter. I have read Æsop and Thackeray. I remember the fable of "The Countryman and the Buffoon," and the scene betwixt Woolley and Bludger in "The Ravenswing." Jenkins has not the brutal courage of Bludger, and if, as many publishers maintain, labelled books still find their way to the second-hand shops, and are disposed of as the hangman of yore sold the clothes of his victims, I should never suspect Jenkins of spending the proceeds on brandy as Bludger did. Cigarettes and Chianti, I imagine, would be more in his line.

I happen to know two minor poets. One is a woman, and I may mention that the Jenkinsons are partial to the "slating" of women. The other is an undeniable man, who works hard every day in an unpoetic vocation, and cherishes his original turn of art during a few sweet stolen hours. That they occasionally and with foreknowledge publish verse that does not "pay" is their own business and none else's. They do not complain, they do their best, their best is good, and no doubt they find, as more fortunate poets have done, ineffable reward even in the bare practice of their art. Take an imaginary Jenkins, employed on a paper every spare corner of which bristles with shameless appeals for ads. and subscriptions. Knowing the precarious nature of his employment, he becomes an inveterate crier-up of "successes." Potted Baudelaire, foolish drama in stilted blank verse, anything that appears to have "caught on," he bepraises to the best of his poor ability. For such poets as I have described he has nothing but jeers and lordly lectures. He deems every minor poet an eager and arrant fool, and fails to see that the epithet applies peculiarly to himself, that he is an insufferable bore and pretender as well, and deserves to be tweaked by the nose for his impudence.

The more minor poets the better for literature and the race. What is needed in certain quarters is an installation of literary judges who, instead of playing up to every pompous person who has a title before his name or a string of letters after, will deal with prose and verse on their literary merits, not as marketable commodities. We want critics who will mould the public taste, not pander to it. Indeed, it would be for the enduring good of literature if some wealthy virtuoso financed a journal devoted solely to hostile criticism. Many a foolish pretender would be swiftly "knocked out," but it would be consolation even to victims that they were slaughtered artistically. "If," said the old ox in the fable, "we fall into the hands of Botchers instead of Butchers, we shall suffer a double death." Nothing can be better for literature than fierce competition, but let the competition be fairly arranged and the judges competent. As things stand, the literary field is a topsyturvy "Stamford Bridge," and the winners of previous events, instead of being put on the back mark, receive enormous starts. If the handicapping were otherwise, or if all the running were from scratch, some of the popular people would be speedily distanced. It might be for their good. They might thus gain the leisure requisite to the production of "fine form." Just now some of them appear to be "writing themselves out" with a vengeance.

ONE NO LONGER IN DOUBT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your remarks and those of your correspondent are certainly interesting and suggestive, but in my opinion they hardly reach the crux of the subject. If, in your own words, "poetry is the highest and most difficult of arts," how is it that the numerous books of good verse published are not sought after? Why does their music fall on unheeding ears? Of course, your dictum that "the public never did and never will read poetry," is in a measure correct, but the divine art has always a public of its own; a large, cultured class whose minds are not absolutely fed with the pabulum of stodgy novels, verbose articles, scrappy personalities, or enigmatical discussions on the obvious. The higher products of the imagination can still capture many minds. How is it, then, that nearly all new books of verse are either still-born or else never reach their "few and fit" audience? The reason is, to my mind, because they are not noticed or reviewed in extenso. Other books of often feeble vitality obtain a lengthy review of praise or blame, as the case may be, but the volume of poems is dismissed with a few scant lines of faint notice. Neither its merits nor defects are thoroughly commented on. It is simply ignored or tabooed. Consequently the poetic-loving class is never au courant with the latest verse writers, and thus there is a continual slump in books which might reflect vividly the aspirations and the intellectual life of this wonderful age, fertile in everything to awaken and spur noble effort.

It may be reasonably said, however, that the greater number of new books of verse have no virile or vital force or beauty, but are only weak echoes, impotent or vapid outpourings of groping endeavour, but—as a very well-known poet once observed to me—there is always some exceptional beauty of thought or expression, some outburst of lyrical perfection in a book of the most ordinary verse. Surely, then, it might be worth while for the sympathetic reviewer to select, preserve and call attention to these specimens, if only as an incentive and encouragement for the writer and a delight for the poetical student.

In my opinion, then, every new book of verse, no matter how slight in appearance and texture, ought for its possibilities or appreciation to be very fully reviewed, its imperfections or excellence, its virtues or sins commented on; its importance as a new poetic contribution to a practical age lucidly estimated.

Believe me, Sir, the influences of this questioning, scientific, sceptical and busy era may seem to have dwarfed or shadowed the "force of heaven-bred poesy"; but in unlikely and in unfrequented places or amidst the busy hum of cities there are still those eager to appreciate and enjoy the highest ideals in literature. And when those who guide and direct, the censors and the teachers, give every new book of verse the care and attention the divine art deserves, then the present slump will become a thing of the past and a revival and interest in poetry may even popularise it amongst those who to-day either ignore or misunderstand its functions and influence.

ISIDORE G. ASCHER.

UP-TO-DATE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—Can you help me to find a really satisfactory substitute for the phrase "up-to-date"? Many people who dislike the expression seem forced into using it simply because it does express a number of ideas that do not appear to be suggested by any other one word.

The writers of "The King's English," though condemning the practice of trimming up slang in quotation marks, use "up-to-date" in this way themselves on p. 25. This device, as they themselves say a little further on, however, merely "converts a mental into a moral weakness."

F. H. C.

June 26.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- A Week at Waterloo in 1815.* Lady de Lancey's narrative. Being an account of how she nursed her husband, Colonel Sir William Howe de Lancey, Quartermaster-General of the Army, mortally wounded in the great battle. Edited by Major B. R. Ward. 8½ x 6. Pp. 136. Murray, 6s. net.
- Hay, Marie. A German Pompadour. Being the Extraordinary History of Wilhelmine von Grävenitz, Landhofmeisterin of Wirtemberg. A narrative of the eighteenth century. 9 x 5½. Pp. 358. Constable, 12s. 6d. net. [No index.]
- Gordon, General Sir Thomas Edward. A Varied Life: a Record of Military and Civil Service, of Sport and of Travel, in India, Central Asia, and Persia, 1849-1902. Maps and illustrations. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 357. Murray, 15s. net.
- Old Soho Days, and other Memories.* By the Mother Kate (St. Saviour's Priory, N.E.) Preface by the Rev. Stewart D. Headlam. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xii, 216. Mowbray, 2s. 6d. net.
- Brown, P. Hume. George Buchanan and his Times. 7½ x 5. Pp. 96. Oliphant, Anderson, 1s. net. (See p. 613.)
- [“Expressly written for young people.”]
- George Buchanan.* By Robert Wallace. Completed by J. Campbell Smith. Quater-Centenary edition. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 150. Oliphant, Anderson, 1s. net. (See p. 613.)
- The History of the Life of Thomas Elliott.* Written by his own hand, with extracts from Joseph Wyeth's supplement, appendices and biographical notes. Edited by S. Graveson. Historical introduction by W. H. Summers. Illustrated. 8½ x 6. Pp. 372. Headley, 10s. net.

EDUCATION.

- Rees, F. E. Light for Intermediate Students. 7 x 5. Pp. 166. Mathematical and Scientific Text-books for Schools. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.

FICTION.

- Balmanno: the city of our quest, and its social problems.* 7½ x 5. Pp. 233. Paisley: Alexander Gardner, 1s. net.
- Wyndham, Horace. Audrey the Actress. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 370. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- Wilson-Barrett, Alfred. The House Over the Way. Illustrations by Harold Piffard. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Ward, Lock, 6s.
- Pease, Howard. Of Mistress Eve. A Tale of the Southern Border. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 301. Constable, 6s.
- Blondelle-Burton, John. Traitor and True. A romance. 7½ x 5. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.
- Muddock, J. E. The Alluring Flame. 7½ x 5. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.
- Machen, Arthur. The House of Souls. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 514. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- [Six stories: three have already been published in book form.]
- Bindloss, Harold. The Cattle-Baron's Daugh'er. 7½ x 5. Pp. 316. Long, 6s.
- Marsh, Richard. Under One Flag. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Long, 6s.
- Hilliers, Ashton. An Old Score. Frontispiece by S. H. Vedder. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 336. Ward, Lock, 6s.

HISTORY.

- Redway, Major G. W. Fredericksburg, 1862. A study in war. With five maps. 7½ x 5. Pp. 297. Swan Sonnenschein, 5s. net.
- [The third volume in Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein's excellent Special Campaign series. The maps are conveniently placed in a strong pocket at the end of the book.]
- Hamilton, Angus. Afghanistan. With a map and numerous illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. 562. Heinemann, 25s. net.

LAW.

- The Spirit of Our Laws.* 7½ x 5. Pp. 299. Sweet & Maxwell, 5s. net.
- [An endeavour to “describe in popular language for laymen the whole fabric of our legal institutions.”]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- “General Staff.” The Writing on the Wall. 4 maps. 7½ x 5. Pp. 228. Heinemann, 3s. 6d. net.
- [“The object of this work,” says the author, “is to call the attention of the public to the absolute unpreparedness of our land forces for the tasks which they may be called upon to perform.”]
- Alderson, F. Herbert. Diet and Hygiene for Infants. Being a guide to mothers and nurses how to bring up their children during the first year of life, etc. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 118. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 1s.
- Woodhouse, Arthur. The Foundations of National Greatness. 7½ x 5. Pp. 151. Melbourne: Tytherleigh & Bayne, n.p.
- Dietzel, H. Retaliatory Duties. Translated by D. W. Simon and W. Osborne Brigstocke. 7½ x 5. Pp. 128. Unwin, 2s. 6d. net.

POETRY.

- Kingstead, Julian. Chloris and Zephyrus. A late-spring idyll. 6½ x 5. Pp. 79. Putnam's, 3s. 6d. net.
- Bowles, Fred G. The Tent by the Lake, and other poems. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 64. The Vigo Cabinet Series. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.
- [Certain of the poems are reprinted from Literature, The Fall Mall Magazine, The Lady's Realm, and Poesia (Milan).]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- The Poetical Works of Thomas Traherne, 1636-1674.* From the original manuscripts. Edited by Bertram Dobell. With a memoir of the author. Second Edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xcvi, 187. Published by the Editor, 77 Charing Cross Road, W.C.

The Henry Irving Shakespeare. The Works of William Shakespeare. Edited by Sir Henry Irving and Frank A. Marshall. Vols. ii and iii. Each, 9½ x 7. Pp. iv, 280, and iv, 282. With many hundred illustrations. The Gresham Publishing Co., 3s. 6d. net each.

- [Vol. ii. contains Romeo and Juliet and King Henry VI., i. and ii. Vol. iii. contains King Henry VI. iii, and King Henry VI. condensed (by C. Kemble); The Taming of the Shrew and A Midsummer Night's Dream.]
- Dumas, Alexandre. The Vicomte de Bragelonne. 4 vols. Each 7½ x 4½. Pp. 658, 688, 680, 664. Dent, 2s. 6d. net per vol.
- Plutarch's Lives of Coriolanus, Caesar, Brutus, and Antonius, in North's Translation.* Edited, with introduction and notes, by R. H. Carr. 7½ x 5. Pp. xxxiv, 280. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.
- The Broken Heart.* A play written by John Ford. Edited with a preface, notes, and glossary, by Oliphant Smeaton. 5½ x 4½. Pp. 144. Dent, 1s. net.
- Westcott, Edward Noyes. David Harum. A story of American life. Illustrated by B. West Clinedinst. New edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 410. Pearson, 6s.
- Les Maximes du duc de la Rochefoucauld.* Préface de Paul Souday. 6½ x 4½. Pp. xxx, 156. Les Classiques français. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.
- Hornung, E. W. Raffles the Amateur Cracksman. 7½ x 5. Pp. 368. Eveleigh Nash, 6s.
- [The stories collected in this volume were originally published as two separate books—“The Amateur Cracksman,” and “The Black Mask.”]
- Eccott, W. J. His Indolence of Arras. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 156. Sixpenny edition. Blackwood.
- English History in Verse.* Edited by Ernest Pertwee. With a preface by A. T. Pollard. New Universal Library. 6 x 4. Pp. 407. Routledge, 1s. net.
- [Selections from various poets. From A.D. 51 to 1901.]
- The Ascent of Mount Carmel by St. John of the Cross.* Translated by David Lewis. With corrections and a prefatory essay on “The Development of Mysticism in the Carmelite Order, by Benedict Zimmermann. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 419. Baker, 7s. 6d. net.
- Reid, Stuart J. Lord John Russell. Fourth edition. Lorne, Marquis of. Viscount Palmerston, K.G. Third edition. Each 7½ x 5½. Pp. 380, 240. Prime Ministers of England series. Dent, 2s. 6d. net per vol.
- [Originally issued in Messrs. Sampson Low's “Queen's Prime Ministers” series. The series was taken over by Messrs. Dent and renamed “Prime Ministers of England.”]
- Willson, Thomas B. The Handy Guide to Norway. With maps and appendices on the history of Norway, fishing notes, photography, glacier climbing, and cycling in Norway. Fifth edition. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 275. Stanford, 5s.
- [The author has added a new chapter on the route to Norway via Esbjerg, Copenhagen, and the West Coast of Sweden. Extensive additions have also been made in the chapters on Bergen, Trondhjem, and Kristiania.]
- Burgin, G. B. The Bread of Tears. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 156. Newnes' Sixpenny Novels Illustrated.

THEOLOGY.

- Addis, W. E. Hebrew Religion to the Establishment of Judaism under Ezra. 7½ x 5. Pp. xvi, 316. Crown Theological Library. Williams & Norgate, 5s.
- [An attempt to provide the general reader with a clear statement of fact on the history of Hebrew religion down to the middle of the fifth century B.C.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Morley, George. Sweet Arden. A book of the Shakespeare country. 7 x 4½. Pp. 190. Foulis, 2s. 6d. net.
- Redesdale, Lord. The Garter Mission to Japan. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 280. Macmillan, 6s.

THE BOOKSHELF

WE have before us Part vii. (P-PIZZ) of the catalogue of books in the Free Public Library of the Corporation of Wigan, Reference Department, compiled by the chief Librarian, Mr. H. F. T. Folkard, F.S.A. This number alone contains three hundred and fifty-two pages, and the whole catalogue so far consists of nearly three thousand pages. There are, we learn, sixty thousand volumes in this department of the Wigan Free Library, and from the specimen of cataloguing before us, we conclude that Wigan is not only fortunate in the number of books it possesses but in the librarian it has put in charge of them. The Catalogue is at once a subject-index and an alphabetical list. Thus nearly ninety pages of this section are devoted to the heading, “Painters and Painting,” in works on which the library seems to be exceptionally well-equipped; and among the entries under it we find references to all the articles on artists in the Dictionary of National Biography, the Encyclopedia Britannica. Again, one of the entries under this heading—to take an instance—is “Spanish School of Painters: See Cumberland, Goya, Lewis, Murillo, Passavant, Sterling-Maxwell, Stothert, Strange, Velasquez”; so that the reader who knows nothing at all of his subject is directed by means of these references to the sources of knowledge. The catalogue contains a few notes only, but those admirable, as in the case of Peignot, in whose works the library is rich; and now and then the contents of a miscellaneous book (e.g., Dean Pigou's “Odds and Ends” and “Phases of my Life”) are analysed. The catalogue is clearly printed and very easy to read; and forms altogether, both by its contents and the manner of their treatment, the best specimen of its kind we have seen.

POPULAR HANDBOOKS ON SCIENCE ART, HISTORY, etc.

THE

LIBRARY OF USEFUL STORIES

A Series of Popular Manuals on Scientific Subjects, written by Specialists, and profusely Illustrated

Size 6 in. by 4 in. Cloth, 1s. each. Post free, 1s. 2d.

The Stars	Life's Mechanism
Primitive Man	The Alphabet
The Plants	Bird Life
The Earth in Past Ages	Thought and Feeling
The Solar System	Art in the British Isles
A Piece of Coal	Wild Flowers
Electricity	Books
Extinct Civilizations of the East	King Alfred
The Chemical Elements	Fish Life
Forest and Stream	Architecture
The Weather	Euclid
The Atmosphere	Music
Germ Life: Bacteria	Animal Life
The Potter	Lost England
The British Coinage	The Empire
Life in the Seas	Alchemy
Photography	The Army
Religions	Rapid Transit
The Cotton Plant	The Atlantic Cable
Geographical Discovery	Extinct Civilizations of the West
The Mind	Alpine Climbing
The British Race	A Grain of Wheat
Eclipses	Wireless Telegraphy
Ice in the Present and Past	British Trade and Industry
Wanderings of Atoms	Reptile Life

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED

3 TO 12 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the Westminster Gazette)

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS
THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND
MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION
IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD.
SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR
SPECIMEN COPY.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,"
TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

RECENT BOOKS PUBLISHED BY
GEORGE NEWNES, Limited.

THE MAGAZINE OF FINE ARTS. Vol. I. Nearly 500 Illustrations, many of which are in colours. 9s. net. 9s. 8d. Post free.

DELACROIX. With an Introduction by HENRI FRANTZ. With 48 full-page Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece.

GIOVANNI BELLINI. With an Introduction by EVERARD MEYNELL. With 65 full-page Plates, including Photogravure Frontispiece. (Newnes' Art Library.)

FRA ANGELICO. With an Introduction by EDGUMBE STALEY. 64 full-page Reproductions and a Frontispiece in Photogravure.

3s. 6d. net each. By post 3s. 10d.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF LONDON.

THE DUTCH SCHOOL. With an Introduction by GUSTAVE GEFFROY.

THE FLEMISH SCHOOL. With an Introduction by FREDERICK WEDMORE. (Art Galleries of Europe.)

THE EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL. With an Introduction by R. DE LA SIZERANNE.

THE LATER BRITISH SCHOOL. With an Introduction by R. DE LA SIZERANNE.

Uniform with NEWNES' ART LIBRARY.
3s. 6d. net. By post 3s. 10d.

THE TRAVELS OF MUNGO PARK.

BYRON'S POEMS. 3 vols.

ESSAYS OF ADDISON.

LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.

PLAYS AND POEMS OF CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE.

Super-royal 24mo; lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; cloth, 3s. net, per volume. Postage 2d. extra.

THE CHRISTIAN YEAR

THE SACRED POEMS OF HENRY VAUGHAN

LYRA INNOCENTIIUM

Super-royal 24mo, lambskin, 2s. 6d. each net; cloth, 2s. each net. Postage 2d. extra.

CHEVALIER BAYARD

Lambskin, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net. Postage 2d. extra.

THE DRAWINGS OF DAVID COX.

With an Introduction by A. J. FINBERG. 7s. 6d. net. By post 7s. 10d.

CHARLES MERYON. By HUGH STOKES.

VAN DYCK. By FRANK NEWBOLT. 7s. 6d. net each. By post 7s. 10d.

FRENCH POTTERY. By HENRI FRANTZ.

With 86 Full-page Plates, of which several are in colour. 7s. 6d. net. By post 7s. 10d.

THE SPOILERS. By EDWIN PUGH. Illustrated by C. E. BROCK. 6s. Post free 6s. 4d.

THE CHINESE AT HOME. Adapted from the French of EMILE BARD. By H. TWICHELL. With numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. Post free, 8s.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.

GOLF FAULTS ILLUSTRATED. By G. W. BELDAM and J. H. TAYLOR. Large 8vo. Illustrated. 5s. net. By post 5s. 4d. The cheapest and most authoritative work upon this popular game.

SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD, SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net, by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 13/- each.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd.,
20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

